It is possible to draw together various local records to help suggest what approximate size the freemen group may have had. Lynn provides a few rolls recording internally imposed taxations, the foundation of its budget; that of 1298, for example, lists 487 persons.^[100] Exemptions are probably few, since even persons paying nothing are named, but we cannot account for the possibility of evasion.^[101] However, both freemen and inferiores were taxed, yet not until 1357/8 was a clearcut distinction made, when we find 132 burgesses and 245 non-burgesses.^[102] In 1313 just over 200 Lynn men were accused of attacking Robert de Monthalt when his abuse of his powers, as one of the heirs of the Earl of Arundel, threatened the privileges of the freemen of the town.^[103] Sample analysis of freemen entrances shows that between 1342 and 1353 145 persons became freemen (annual average 12 persons), whilst between 1445 and 1456 192 persons (average 16); for comparison, Ipswich saw an annual average of 12-15 persons^[104] between 1340 and 1351, but an average of only 3 1445-56. The temporary victory of Lynn's reform party inspired unusual interest in administrative affairs on the part of the populace. On 27 August 1412 112 inferiores were made freemen, to ensure the reformers' success in the elections on 29 August, when 148 burgesses and about 100 non-burgesses attended; the large crowds at assemblies, occasionally numbering 200-300, remained in evidence throughout the year, contrasting with peak attendances in the late fourteenth century of 70-110 burgesses. In 1421 119 of the better-off non-burgesses paid fines for trading licences; it should not be assumed that all the inferiores were poor - of the Lynn officials studied here, 65 are known to have been adult residents for some years before taking up the franchise. In 1461 200 of the "more vigorous" residents (those capable of military service) were taxed, but in fact this group included men in their 50s.^[105]

Figures of similar size are forthcoming from our other towns. At Yarmouth in 1344 314 townsmen were pardoned for various infringements of the peace that were clearly an expression of organised community aggression. Saul's analysis of jurors 1329-37 has shown 128 separate persons, only 83 of whom are found in the 1332 tax return.^[106] At Ipswich in 1429 approximately 190 burgesses swore to uphold ordinances newly made, whilst 79 witnessed a constitutional settlement concerning the election of sergeants in 1436.^[107]

Analysis of three groups of Colchester men involved in organised aggressions (1319-25), along the lines already noted at Lynn and Yarmouth, shows 187 different men, and this can be raised beyond 200 if we include other lists from contemporary sources. The lists of women fined annually for breaking the assize of ale include numbers of married women fluctuating in the fifteenth century between about 175-225. In 1451/2 216 Colchester men were sworn into tithing, although only a small minority of the officials and electors of the year were among their number, and in 1472 208 "inhabitants" and 371 "foreigners" swore fealty to Edward IV. [108] By contrast, the largest group in Maldon listed together at any one time were the 55 men sued for trespass by the lords of the borough.[109]

We cannot come to specific conclusions from figures such as given above, but we may note that they all fall within much the same range and many derive from contexts suggesting a fairly complete muster of the freeman group. Hoskins has estimated that, in a town the size of sixteenth century Lynn, no more than one-third of the population were likely to have been freemen. Hammer has suggested about the same figure for fifteenth century Oxford. Martin has said of the proportion of freemen in medieval Ipswich that "it is probably a high one of those who are ordinarily in evidence." [110] Here we can only concur that the freemen section was a minority, but large enough and open enough to warrant the description of limited democracy rather than broad oligarchy. Apart from the extreme cases of Maldon and Norwich, it seems likely that the number of freemen in our towns at any given time lay within the 150-350 mark.

Given this fairly small number of qualified men, and the evidence presented at the beginning of this chapter suggesting that there was a fair turnover in executive office and in elected councils, and that even life-membership councils had at least one vacancy annually, one is led to the conclusion that borough politics - within the limitations it imposed, probably by general consensus, on itself - was marked by a higher degree of popular participation than has previously been acknowledged. It is true that decisive power was concentrated in the hands of an elite we have called the executive committee, but power tends to devolve in such a fashion in most political systems. The number of offices to be filled annually in borough government, in executive, financial, and conciliar branches - to say nothing of the bureaucratic posts, the police organisation, and the ad hoc committees - particularly from the late fourteenth century onwards, when the population had shrunk but the ranks of administration were growing, make it likely that a large minority of the freeman population were involved with administrative duties at some time or other in their lives.[111] An almost complete roster of Lynn freemen drawn up in July 1440 lists 253 names.[112] Of these, 51 were then in office (mayoralty, councils, chamberlains' or clerk's offices) and at least 89 others were past or future officers; that is, approximately 56% of the freemen alive in 1440 held office at some point during their lifetimes. This suggests that the real issue is not one of monopolisation of office, but monopolisation of the freedom. How restrictive was it, in terms of the proportion of freemen to the overall population? And, more importantly, whilst we know it was consciously restrictive, was it artificially so - had it become a form of elitism in itself? These are questions beyond the scope of this study.

The evidence that we have seen suggests that election of the same individual to a post more than once, no matter whether successively or with intervals between office-holding, could have owed as much to necessity as to monopoly, in the face of limited candidates (viz. those with appropriate qualifications and with the will to serve). It also suggests that electoral committees could, over the course of time, accommodate much of the electorate.[113] Yet, before we become overly impressed by the degree of participation, we must ask whether there may not be a fundamental assumption in which we are mistaken. It is easy for the modern writer to assume that office was desired and even pursued, for its power, dignity, and opportunities, and that in this race those members of the community who were socially and economically best-endowed were easy victors. But was this the case? Or were office-holders men who had been willing to accept governmental roles only when called upon by others less willing, or even men reluctant to take on the burden but obliged by the default of others and by the pressure of their peers? To this question we must now turn.

The Monopolisation of Office

Notes

1 Introduction and chapter 2.

2 Glover (op.cit., 80), for example, appears shocked by the fact that of the 202 (sic) mayoralties in Lynn 1400-1600, only 131 men held mayoral office - this he interprets as a particularly bad case of monopolisation.

3 See appendix II, table 3.

4 This aspect of the subject of monopolisation will be discussed later in this chapter; see also chapter 4 regarding willingness, and chapter 5 regarding age, as limiting factors.

Even infirmity was reluctantly accepted as cause for retirement; Edmund Westhorp continued to be listed among Lynn's jurats up to 1491, two years before his death, despite the fact that he had been unable to attend congregations, even to renew his annual oath of office, since October 1486.

45 Saul, op.cit., 232-33, believes that the plague had a great impact. However, in my opinion the economic decline of the town, of which Dr. Saul is himself the most eloquent historian, was the main cause of the change in personnel - a problem only exacerbated by the plague. Britnell, op.cit., 475-77, also sees the Black Death as the end of one administrative phase and the beginning of a new, in terms of official personnel. Periodization can be a convenient device, but can obscure the process of gradual change, which is more fundamental to history than is cataclysm.

46 This phenomenon is also said to be true regarding the late medieval aristocracy; Denholm-Young, op.cit., 22.

47 Meech and Allen, op.cit., 115.

48 E.g. Edmund Westthorp (mayor of Lynn tempore Edward IV) finished his apprenticeship in 1433, but remained abroad until 1450 when he became a freeman; he did not marry until c.1456 and his wife died in 1469, after which he appears to have remained single; there were no male heirs, but possibly one daughter. 62 The Wyth family had produced merchants in Lynn from the time of Edward I. Philip Wyth, chamberlain and jurat of the 1340s, was particularly wealthy; after the early death of his son Philip junior (chamberlain 1359/60), Philip senior's several properties in Lynn passed to his brother John de Wormegay (jurat 1357-76) and thence to John's son, the Philip here discussed. 111 Of the 168 Yarmouth freemen entrants 1429-61, 33 held the office of bailiff, chamberlain or M.P. before 1470, and doubtless many others served in the Common Council. Petchey, op.cit., 170-71, suggests a similar 20% regarding Maldon participation in the sixteenth century. The hypothesis of Bridbury, op.cit., 62, that the proportion of freemen in the community rose after 1349 is based on the unproveable and unlikely assumption that all immigrants entered the franchise.

112 KL/C9/1 ff.20b-22b; one of the chamberlains of the year is missing although certainly alive and a freeman.

113 Tait, op.cit., 321, accused that the popular basis of Lynn's Common Council was not broad, since the electorate of each constabulary was small. Analysis of the turnouts 1425-61 show an average of 166, with a high of 269 and a low of 119, but no detectable pattern; this suggests that individual inclinations plus particular issues of the year may have been influential. If we take the maximum single attendance of each of the nine wards 1438-45 (a period of relatively high turnouts) we can reconstruct a potential electorate of 278 persons. It must be remembered that: a) the jurats did not vote; b) the electorate of the lower council included non-freemen. There seems no reason to doubt that all men who wished to vote could and did. On the open quality of borough government see also Petchey, op.cit., 168-70.

Attitudes Towards Office-holding

Introduction: The human factor

In assessing the character of medieval borough government, it is desirable to know whether office was actively pursued. Some historians, their perspectives coloured by the situation of their own times, have assumed that this must have been the case. However, burgess attitudes towards office-holding are rarely directly evidenced, due to the lack of private records. We must therefore seek indicators of attitudes from the indirect evidence found in formal borough records, and weigh up the pros and cons. Although, in the end, we are left only with an overall picture, and a sketchy picture of how much individual attitudes varied - here we can only fall back on our knowledge of human nature, and assume that some individuals were more drawn to positions of power than others.

CHAPTER 4

Attitudes Towards Office-holding

Incentives to Office-holding

It would be wrong to think of medieval borough officials as permanent salaried professionals, devoting their full-time attentions to governmental duties.[1] Yet we need not go to the other extreme and suggest that they were obliged to serve for nothing.[2] Office-holding may well have been considered a duty, to the fulfillment of which the burgess might need to be compelled by threat of fine for refusal to serve, but it was not one which went unrewarded - 'uncompensated' might be a more accurate term. If it sometimes appears that officials served unpaid, it is probable that our information is inadequate. As Saul has noted regarding the Yarmouth customs officers, "a disguised form of wage" is encountered in expenses granted.[3] Yet there is evidence of salaries too. A recently discovered document in King's Lynn archives appears to be a claim made upon the royal government for moneys owed to some 66 townsmen for service in various posts at various times between 1327 and 1341;[4] it is clear from the periods and figures given that what was demanded was not irregular expenses but standard wages. The officers listed therein nicely complement those paid in the chamberlains' accounts, indicating that all services received remuneration; while the corporation was responsible for paying officers of purely internal administration, the royal government was responsible for the various branches of the customs service, purveyors of victuals, coroners, king's bailiffs, constables, and collectors of national taxes. The corporation paid not only its principal elected and bureaucratic officers, but also temporary servants such as collectors of locally-imposed taxes, and the capital pledges of the leet (2s. for view of frankpledge, 15s. for presentment of offences, divided between 18 men).[5] The various officers of the staple organisation - mayors, constables, clerks, sergeants, weighers, porters, boatmen, etc. - were also paid by the royal government.[6] However, what is equally clear is that the salaries were too small in most cases to be, themselves, encouragements to office-holding; deputy butlers, for instance, received 5s. a year, purveyors 10s., king's bailiffs 3s.4d, constables 6d. annually. Compared to weekly wages of skilled labourers, these amounts seem almost contemptible, and should perhaps be thought of as honoraria rather than salaries. Some minor officers were, however, paid what are clearly wages: in 1285/6 the custos of Ipswich paid a sergeant 2½d a day to hold Ipswich's court, and the collector of petty tolls 2d. a day; and in 1347 a beadle was paid 1d. a day to collect the Lynn husting perquisites. On the other hand, annual payments may have been commensurate with the amount of time and effort required by each particular office; we cannot be sure.

Borough governments appear more generous than the royal government as regards wages, but even they paid little more than subsistence level wages unlikely to have had much attraction for the wealthier townsmen whom we have seen to have been the office-holders. Even town clerks, arguably the hardest worked of borough officials, usually supplemented their incomes with private work and often switched careers to more lucrative legal work. Colchester paid its bailiffs an annual salary of 40s. each in the early fourteenth century; this had risen to 60s. by 1372, but was reduced to 50s. in the fifteenth century. Its town clerk was paid £1.6.8d in 1319, and the local J.P.s of mid-fifteenth century 4s. a day during the assizes.^[7] The Ipswich ordinances of 1320 prescribed £5 as the salary for each of its bailiffs, £1 for each chamberlain, £2 for town clerk, and 6s.8d for each sergeant. By 1463 the chamberlains' salary had risen to 30s. each, that of the sergeants to £1 each, whereas those of bailiffs and town clerk had remained static. The councillors - exceptions to the general rule of payment of participants in government - were allotted pasture-land, subsequently known as Portmansmeadow (a location remembered by today's Portman Road), for their horses as compensation; this payment of land in lieu of money, found also in several other boroughs, was perhaps prompted by the early establishment of a formal council whose members served for life.^[8] At Norwich (1375/6) and Yarmouth (1491) the salaries of the financial officers were each set at £1 (unless possibly the sum mentioned at Yarmouth was a "bonus" additional to salary), whereas in less prosperous Maldon it was 6s.8d (1469). At the same time in Maldon we find the clerk receiving a £2 salary, but the bailiffs and sergeant appear only to have been allowed enough to purchase their liveries.^[9] At Lynn, where financial accounts are less rare, we learn that the mayoral fee was £6 in 1271, £9 in 1297/8, but in fourteenth and fifteenth centuries it usually remained at the £10 level (occasionally, but temporarily, rising to £20), whilst the chamberlains' salary remained at £1 each.^[10]

In some towns salary was enhanced by various perquisites of office. The mayor of Lynn was exempted from local tax during his year of office; and he, clerk, and sergeant received customary fees from private individuals upon performance of certain duties, such as admission of freemen applicants. The latter is also true of Ipswich, where fines were paid by those wishing to have enrolments made in the town's recognisance rolls; whether these were in fact assigned towards payment of ballival salaries, or more probably were additional (as was certainly the case with the town clerk) is not clear, but the 1320 ordinances indicate that a 6d. fee for application of the ballival seal to private documents was separate from the salary. The Ipswich bailiffs also were allowed all local customs taken on fish, onions, oil, and broom.^[11] In 1464 Ipswich's retiring town clerk was granted a pension, but this was not a common occurrence.^[12] Occasionally we find a bonus system whereby officers considered to have done a particularly good job during their term of office would be rewarded, at the rendering of account, by the grant of an additional payment. It is sometimes implied that the payment of the basic salaries of the financial officers depended upon them fulfilling their duties honestly and profitably. At Yarmouth it was decided in 1491 that, any year when the budget produced a surplus, up to £4 of it could be divided between the bailiffs. In fifteenth century Colchester it was prohibited that any negligent or lazy officer be paid anything above the basic salary prescribed by ancient ordinance. From the mid-fourteenth century in Lynn, an additional £10 reward was permitted to mayors who had served diligently; but, as tends to happen with ad hoc procedures repeated on a regular basis, this soon became a formality granted even in years when the budget produced a deficit (e.g. 1376/7). Further expenses were also frequently allowed, particularly in the fifteenth century, so that Lynn's mayor might receive as much as £20-£35 beyond his basic salary.[13] In these circumstances, there is some evidence (presented below) that the financial reward could be an incentive to serve.

Parliamentary wages did not always conform to the 2s. a day minimum required by law. Yarmouth paid this amount, plus expenses, but Maldon could afford only 1s. a day to its 1384 representatives, whilst Norwich and Lynn initially paid 3s.4d a day - a fact that helps explain the lack of writs de expensis frequently sought by M.P.s. If the higher wage was due to those towns' relative prosperity in the fourteenth century, and to civic pride, as McKisack argues, then the occasional lowering of the wage to official minimum may reflect years of hardship. [14] Certainly in the tougher times of the fifteenth century there was a general revision of parliamentary wages, Lynn and Norwich resorting to the minimum, whilst wages were often negotiated with individual M.P.s. Some towns were more willing to accept outsiders as representatives since they would serve without wage or at lower rates: Ipswich's Edmund Winter agreed to serve at his own expense in 1452; in 1469 John Tymperley junior sat for 8d. a day, and his colleague John Alfrey of Hadley was content with being made a freeman in lieu of wages; and in 1472 it was arranged that William Wursop esquire have 5s. a week, but John Walworth junior only 3s.4d. Occasionally, location of the parliament was an influencing factor: in 1463 it was decided that William Wursop and John Lopham, Ipswich M.P.s, would be paid 20d. a day if parliament were held at Leicester or Northampton, 16d. if at any town closer than York, 12d. if at London.[15]

By the fifteenth century boroughs were discovering that even the meagre salaries and wages they paid to their servants were a strain on the budget. The £50 that York paid its mayor was well beyond the means of most boroughs' resources.[16] The total of Lynn officials' salaries grew with the burgeoning ranks of officialdom during the fourteenth century, from about £20 at the beginning, to amounts approaching £40 in the 1370s; even the various efforts to cut back, at the end of the century, could not keep down this expense for long. The consequence, at Lynn and elsewhere, was that when fifteenth century accountings produced deficits, the expenses which were left unpaid were usually the fees (or part thereof) of borough officials and M.P.s; the unfortunate chamberlains in office in such years, having paid expenses from their own pockets, failed to recoup these losses at once from the borough. We therefore find special arrangements being made to pay wages - special taxes levied, or specific revenues allotted to creditor officials - or M.P.s being obliged to sue corporations for arrears owing. In February 1430, when Lynn's mayor Richard Waterden died, alderman John Wesenham refused to take on his role as replacement until he was guaranteed that the salary and reward owed him from two previous mayoralities would be paid.[17]

If there was no profit to be made from wages, office-holding offered other pecuniary prospects. With reference to Yarmouth, Saul considered that: "The greatest benefit of being bailiff was the opportunity to use the position to one's advantage." [18] The opportunities for graft in the customs service are easily perceived, and were often realised, judging from the number of prosecutions by the Exchequer. It was perhaps unavoidable, given the conflict of interests: the king found it convenient to use local men as customs officials, to counteract absenteeism, but such men were usually themselves importers/exporters or the friends of others. We may perhaps be so bold as to suggest (if cynically) that it was the very prospect of facilitated smuggling or access to often large amounts of money that encouraged some men to enter the customs service - certainly it can hardly have been for the wages![19] The potential profits from customs activities, both national and local, lay not only in smuggling, bribery, and extortion, but in the forfeiture system - perhaps instituted with the intent to counteract corruption - whereby customs officials had a right to a part of the goods confiscated from smugglers. This system is visible at all levels, from that of the syndicates farming national customs, through the regular searchers of ships and searchers for coinage, to the local supervisors of markets and crafts. That the profits from customs were attractive at all levels is seen in the large farms the national syndicates were willing to pay, and in the ability of Colchester's farmer of local customs in 1373 to pay £6.13.4d in addition to his usual farm of £35, without raising the borough tolls.[20]

The opportunities for illicit profit from borough office are not so obvious. Embezzlement may have occurred on occasion: Ipswich's 1320 ordinances and those of Colchester in 1372 reveal the suspicion, if not proof, of it. Salaries and perquisites are unlikely to have kept greedy men satisfied enough to prevent it. The executive, financial officers, or others such as Yarmouth's muragers, had the opportunity to put business their own way by supplying borough construction projects with material, or supplying wine and victuals for the numerous occasions required by the corporation. Again, the general influence of a man in office, especially when he controlled judicial or coercive powers, could be attractive and useful. However, the historian would be unreasonably cynical to assume that because opportunities for graft existed they were always, or ever, taken advantage of. Nor is it easy to detect corruption from the regular series of records which form the bulk of borough archives. And, to be fair, it must be noted that customs office had the attraction of being the first step on the ladder of a career in the king's service, leading to more important offices which offered greater (and legitimate) rewards.[21]

CHAPTER 4

Attitudes Towards Office-holding

Reluctance to Serve

Given the dangers and detriments of office, we might expect some reluctance to assume that burden. The evidence of it is abundant, but perhaps not all trustworthy. The most obvious indications of a widespread difficulty in obtaining persons willing to serve in office are the ordinances enforcing participation. Those of Yarmouth in 1272 set 6s.8d as the fine for any councillor who failed to attend when summoned by the bailiffs to deal with community business, as well as setting heavier fines for bailiffs and councillors negligent in their duties. In 1491 fines for not answering ballival summonses were 12d. for members of the upper council and 6d. for members of the lower council. The decrease perhaps reflected that, in the fifteenth century, the adoption of majority vote procedures made non-attendance a less serious hindrance to the transaction of business.[\[36\]](#) Chapters in the Norwich customal dating from about mid-fourteenth century prescribed a fine of 40s. on men elected as bailiffs but refusing to accept the office, and 2s. fine on those citizens summoned to attend assemblies (on behalf of the community) who did not bother to come; this last phrase - "venire non curant" - implies apathy, but the inconvenience of neglecting business affairs is indicated later in the passage, when it is ordered that routine assemblies were to be held only on holy days and non-market days. In 1465 the Norwich assembly set the substantial fine of £40 on those refusing to accept election as aldermen.[\[37\]](#) At Colchester it was granted in 1411/12 that every councillor willing to perform his duties should be provided with 2s. worth of cloth for a hood, but for every default of appearance would lose 6d. of the value of the same; in 1443 fines for default of the aldermen and of the 16 councillors were set at the same levels as those of Yarmouth in 1491 - a further sign of the predominance of the aldermen in the council.[\[38\]](#) It was ordained at Ipswich in 1451 that anyone refusing election to any borough office would be disfranchised in perpetuity; there is no direct evidence of fines for default of appearance at assemblies, but there may well have been such, since promise of attendance was part of the oath of office of the members of the lower council.[\[39\]](#)

At Maldon, where the enfranchised population was particularly small, a strong concern for full participation is evinced. Loss of franchise was the punishment for wardemen who refused to take office. Default in attendance at the regular assemblies by wardemen or the informal council of ex-bailiffs was punished by fines which doubled with every recurrence of the offence; not only these councillors but every burgess was required to attend the courts of election and accounting - the freeman's oath guaranteeing that, were he within seven miles of the town, he would come.[40] At Lynn we discover fines or harsher punishments for persons refusing office, not only in the corporation but also in the Merchant Guild, private guilds, and in such semi-public posts as churchwarden. A £20 penalty was imposed in 1358 upon those refusing mayoral office, although in return for this the unwilling party was granted exemption from being re-elected in the following year.[41] In the fifteenth century there was a complex set of fines dealing with absenteeism, whose roots may be traced back at least to 1358, when any jurat refusing to answer a mayoral summons was to pay 3s.4d, and if defaulting on election day (when every burgess was expected to attend without summons) to pay 6s.8d; every other burgess was to pay 12d. for defaults and chamberlains 3s.4d. In 1372 4d. was set as the fine for anyone summoned to attend an assembly who failed to appear by ten o'clock; those who persistently failed to come to pay their tax were to be penalised 1d. per shilling of their assessment. Elaboration of procedures produced, ca. 1425, a series of fines: latecomers were to pay 4d. or give their excuse; if they did neither before taking their seat in the gildhall, they would pay 8d.; if absent for the whole meeting and then failing to offer an excuse at the next, 2s.; if any refused to sit in a specific place when ordered by the mayor, 4d. It is difficult to tell whether such fines were effective in encouraging attendance and discipline; the revenue from defaults was a fairly regular, if small, item in borough accounts.[42]

Fines for refusal of office, on the other hand, were no deterrent for those determined to avoid the burden and willing to pay to do so, if necessary. This problem is visible not only in those towns that fall within the scope of this study, it is general across the country; although more noticeable in the fifteenth century (largely a function of more abundant and fuller records), it was no less a problem in the fourteenth and even the thirteenth.[43] At Lynn: Peter Lomb in 1292 paid 6s.8d because he refused to take the office of scabin in the Merchant Guild; Thomas Bene refused the office of constable in 1445; Thomas Botkesham and Thomas Salisbury those of councillor in 1424; of the 4 leet affeerors chosen in 1421, 2 resisted being sworn in and the other 2 had absented themselves from assembly, so that the sergeant had to be sent to fetch them.[44] The office of jurat was even more unpopular, partly because it called for more activity than most offices, partly because election was for life and, once in, it was difficult to get out; those wishing to retire had to present a reasonable excuse, proving incapacitation, before a special tribunal. In 1455 three men were elected to fill the gaps that tended to accumulate in jurat ranks; of these, William Pilton and John Adams "nullo modo eorum onera noluerunt sumere" and were fined £10 each, while Simon Baxter was given time to think his decision over and subsequently decided it was prudent to accept the post. Pilton and Adams were again elected jurats in 1456, and offered no resistance on this occasion. John Gedney was more determined: originally elected jurat in May 1437, he refused the office, only to be re-elected in January 1439, but by May he had engineered his dismissal, probably by refusing to join Corpus Christi gild, as was required of jurats; however, at a later time in his life he held the office with better grace (1452-62).[45]

We must beware of taking all refusals at face value. In January 1431 John Muriell accepted an appointment as one of Lynn's ambassadors to Denmark, but at the next assembly failed to negotiate a wage satisfactory to himself and refused to go. In August 1427, John Permonter, elected mayor for the third time, asked to be excused from the office since he had held it twice at burdensome expense to himself; however, he hinted that he might reconsider if guaranteed the additional reward paid and, when he was promised as large a bonus as any previously granted, his reluctance vanished. He used a similar ploy when elected to his fifth mayoralty in 1431, absenting himself from the election and then appearing a few days later to claim illness as an excuse for delaying acceptance of the office, until he had negotiated a reward suitable to himself.[46]

Despite such theatricals, it was universally recognised that certain duties were genuinely burdensome and unpopular. Financial offices were spread widely among the suitable candidates, few men being asked to serve more than twice. It was often difficult to raise juries and there is a noticeable change in jury composition during the course of the fourteenth century, with the more prominent townsmen being increasingly rarely seen as jurors. Twentieth century attitudes towards jury-duty provide perhaps the best comparator for an empathic understanding of reasons for the medieval burgesses' reluctance to hold public office. Tax-collection too was very unpopular; in 1445 the Lynn authorities used the duty as a punitive device, by appointing non-burgesses as collectors, but offering to appoint a substitute for any willing to take up the franchise.[47]

The purchase of exemptions from office is generally pointed at as proof of an unwillingness to serve, but this evidence is a two-edged sword; there were not many who sought such exemptions, and they were usually among the townsmen most heavily involved in office-holding. The inclusion of clauses granting exemptions from jury-duty, tax collection, and royal ministries, in the royal charters to Ipswich and Colchester in 1462/3 - in the former case including a prohibition of fines for refusal to serve - may be discounted immediately as referring essentially to service outside the town; this was merely a logical continuation of borough efforts to obtain as much internal independence as possible.[48] The exemptions, acquired in an earlier period by Colchester, from sending representatives to parliament have been taken at face value and interpreted as showing the low interest exhibited by burgesses in parliamentary affairs.[49] In 1382 Colchester obtained its first grant to this effect from king, with a 5-year duration, on the grounds that the money saved in parliamentary wages and expenses would help finance the building of the town wall. The same excuse was used to obtain renewals of the exemption, so that almost the whole period between 1382 and 1422 was covered, and so too 1422-42 if Colchester's petition for extension, in 1422, was in fact granted. It has not been previously noticed that Maldon obtained similar exemptions, to aid the borough's expenses in repairing the Heybridge, which provided access to the town from the north-east, from 1388-99 and 1407-14.[50] Armed with such exemptions, it is difficult to see why both towns continued to elect representatives to the great majority of parliaments in this period and to return their names to the sheriff. The answer is probably that the exemptions were not, or were rarely, used; they were a safeguard giving the boroughs the option of attending or not, according to whether it suited their interests, and perhaps gave exemption from writs de expensis, so that Colchester and Maldon - the poorest of the boroughs studied here - could negotiate with the M.P.s wages that were acceptable to borough budgets. Although parliamentary attendance was not viewed by medieval burgesses as so important as to take priority over local necessities, a growing awareness of the usefulness of access to parliament in the late fourteenth and fifteenth centuries - particularly the need to exercise some influence over taxation - make it unlikely that a borough could afford to absent itself from national affairs for an extended period.

The exemptions granted to individuals must be seen in a similar light. Between 1310 and 1476, from Lynn, Ipswich, Yarmouth, and Colchester, 17 burgesses are known to have obtained exemptions from the king,^[51] and 6 others were granted exemptions by their boroughs. This is not a large number, divided between four towns and such a lengthy period; however, there are marked concentrations of grants in certain periods. In 1310 the king granted life exemption from tallages, prises, juries, assizes, and royal ministries to Nicholas de Fakenham of Lynn, who is not known to have held any office. In 1316 Ipswich's Richard Leu obtained a similar grant, yet continued to hold offices in the customs service until 1326.^[52] Nothing more is heard until July 1346, when John de Wesenham obtained a grant which added to the earlier specifications exemption from local office, and this became the customary formula henceforth. In September 1346 Wesenham was elected into the ranks of Lynn's jurats, and there is no indication he raised any objection; although only there for a year, this was due to his commitments in the royal administration, he having taken the post of King's Butler in January 1347 (held until 1350).^[53] Only after obtaining a second exemption in 1353 - adding nothing to the first, which had been a life grant - did Wesenham retire from his administrative career, although he continued to hold the odd commission. His example inspired a wave of imitators among his fellow Lynn burgesses, nine of whom acquired exemptions between 1352 and 1383, as also did William Faderman of Yarmouth (1371) and John Boyn of Colchester (1380). Faderman is never known to have held any office, whilst Boyn had held no office since 1355. All of the Lynn men continued to hold royal and/or local offices after the dates of their exemptions, although Robert Braunch may have used his exemption to avoid parliamentary duty and Simon de Gunton his to avoid the mayoralty.^[54] Edmund Belleyetere's career in a variety of local and royal offices had barely begun when he received his first exemption in 1383; even after his second exemption, in 1406, he served as jurat and alderman in Lynn for several years. John atte Gappe of Yarmouth was bailiff four times after his first exemption in 1396, although he held no office after his second (1408).

In the middle part of the reign of Henry VI we find renewed interest in exemptions. A few were granted by the king: to Robert Toppes of Norwich (1443), John Wydewell of Yarmouth (1447), and Nicholas Peke of Colchester (1448). Peke and Toppes^[55] both served as executives of their town later, Wydewell had served only once as bailiff in 1435/6. More exemptions originated from town authorities, relating of course purely to local offices. Norwich had already granted exemption in 1343 to Richard Spynk and his heirs, but this was a special circumstance (not reflective of any general trend), part of a reward for Richard's large donations towards paying borough expenses; it did not prevent Richard's son from holding the ballivalty in 1375 and 1381. Not until 1429 were further exemptions granted by that city: to William Sedman, who had drawn up his will the previous year (perhaps suggesting infirmity), and to John Folcard, neither being subsequent office-holders.^[56] Lynn's corporation granted several exemptions: to John Mafey (1433) from the office of jurat, summonses to assembly, and other community burdens; to Edward Mayn (1441) and William Wyth (1447) from all borough office; and to William Pilton (1450) only from the office of constable.[57] Mafey held no further office and apparently died soon after his grant; Mayn, who obtained his grant during the mayoralty of his close friend John Ashenden, continued to serve as jurat until 1454; Wyth also, theoretically, remained a jurat, although he had not in fact attended any assemblies since 1443! At Ipswich Thomas Medewe and John Trotte were exempted from the chamberlain's office in 1472 and 1476 respectively, and indeed never served.[58]

What are we to make of these grants? It seems clear that, although on occasion used to ensure exemption from specific offices, they were not generally intended to obtain exemption from service per se, for the majority of the recipients continued to serve after their grants. In a few cases we have genuine retirements, usually shortly before death; but the excuses for grants which begin to appear from the 1380s - citing infirmity and old age - are no accurate guide to this. These excuses are not always given in cases of genuine retirement, whereas the fact that Edmund Belleyetere was said to be incapacitated by infirmity and disease in 1383, and by old age in 1406 (when in his mid-60s) did not hinder him from years of further service. We frequently find these standard excuses given to justify the king replacing local coroners or other royal officers, and they are no more valid in these cases. It may have come as quite a shock to Walter Brun and Herman Breton of Yarmouth, when removed from the posts of coroner (1305) and customer (1327) respectively, to learn that they were dead. Fortunately for Herman, this was only a temporary setback to his customs career, which lasted until 1333; whilst the king shortly after had the good grace to admit that Walter was alive, although not at all well.[59] Nonetheless, it is evident that exemption grants were not merely pieces of parchment. Essex esquire John Doreward exchanged a £35 annuity for an exemption in 1404, William Sedman paid £20 for his, Edward Mayn £40, and John Mafey promised to bequeath the community a tenement. A clue to the role of exemptions may be found in associated cases from Lynn: in 1462 Richard Dyke was excused from being elected as capital pledge, leet affeemor, or tax collector while serving as churchwarden of St. Margaret's; at his fourth election as mayor in 1474, Walter Cony was promised that he would not be elected again because of the burden of bearing both mayoral and aldermannic (1465-79) offices simultaneously; Thomas de Morton became town clerk in 1373 and, as a deserved reward for his labours, was granted the franchise gratis in 1377, when promised that he would never be elected clerk against his will, nor obliged to pay a fine for refusal - yet he remained clerk until 1396, when he disappears from the records.[60] The phrase "against his will" features in almost all exemption grants, and shows that they were intended and used as optional assets. Medieval burgesses (for the most part) did not seek to escape what they realized to be their duty, albeit a tiresome one; but they did not wish to be overburdened. A small number, largely of those who had cause to fear frequent election or the repeated payment of fines for refusal, were willing to pay a lump sum to obtain a safeguard against having to serve more often than they thought reasonable.

Attitudes Towards Office-holding

The Pursuit of Power and Prestige

In contrast to the evidence presented above, suggesting that office-holding was generally unpopular, but that the wealthier townsmen accepted office as a responsibility that fell naturally to them, can we find any evidence of men who desire and pursued office? We may quickly point to the minority of office-holders already referred to, in the discussion of monopolisation, who held executive or parliamentary office far more frequently than their peers. We have no direct evidence of their motivations or intentions, but it seems that some men were not averse to holding office more times than their communities might reasonably expect of them. Variation in attitude towards office-holding, from individual to individual, is natural and need not surprise us. Some were likely attracted by the prestige and influence of high position in government,[\[61\]](#) but this is an intangible with which it is difficult to come to terms. For the moment we shall set aside these 'professional' administrators and seek more concrete evidence.

Unfortunately borough records are not so intimate as to indicate whether office was sought, run for, or contested. The procedure of nominating candidates is little evidenced and, when it is, there is no indication of any forethought, although at Lynn mayoral candidates had to be selected from the jurats and those at Norwich from former mayors and sheriffs.[\[62\]](#) In the latter case the assembly nominated, by majority voice, two candidates from whom the upper council would choose a mayor; and we occasionally hear of two candidates for a single seat in Lynn's Common Council.[\[63\]](#) On the whole, however, the impression given is that all candidates for office were nominated by independent parties (whether with or without the candidates' prior approval is uncertain), rather than put their own names forward. We discover rivalries for office only in crisis periods, when parties struggling for control of government supported one of their own members; in these cases we find double elections producing stalemates, as often as one nominee winning over another. Otherwise, in normal, peaceful times, consensus was probably the rule, and not only may the man elected not have stood for office, he may sometimes not even have been present at the election or aware of his own candidacy. We may recall the case of John Asger, absent in Bruges at the time of his election as Norwich's mayor, so that a messenger had to be despatched to locate him. Lynn's ordinances of 1358 specifically provided for the circumstance of a man elected mayor in absentia and not wishing to serve.[\[64\]](#) Those may have been rare cases, but the more frequent refusals and the general distaste for office already noted make it unlikely that men normally stood for office at their own initiative or of their own volition.

A rare explicit case of a local man seeking local office is that of William Reyne, and the very fact that it was entered among the otherwise rather routine records of Colchester's court rolls suggests how atypical the affair was. On 7 September 1360, a few weeks before the town's annual elections, Reyne, a mercer not particularly prominent in the local records during the previous decade, approached the bailiffs in public court and offered to pay £10 to the community if he were elected as one of the bailiffs for the coming year.^[65] This was agreed upon (apparently without any offence to political sensibilities - although the typically terse record does not reveal the reactions of the authorities to this unorthodox proposal) and William was duly elected, the start of a career which encompassed 8 ballivalties, 2 parliamentary seats, and several years in the council, between 1360 and 1393. Influenced by the contemporary eulogistic account of the achievements of Reyne's 1373/4 ballivalty - again an atypical record, which opens the Red Paper Book and is likely associated with the creation of that volume - Benham said of the 1360 affair that: "The arrangement seems to be characteristic of William Reyne, who was an ardent public servant Apparently he was not indifferent to flattery and love of office."^[66] The connection between the two unusual records is curious but, unfortunately, it may be stretching the evidence too far to suggest that Reyne sought office because he loved power and wished to use it to the benefit of the community. What we have in 1360 is actually an arrangement to farm the office of bailiff, with Reyne taking half the profits of the office, notably court ameracements and perquisites. This does not make the situation any less unusual, although farming arrangements are found in Colchester, Ipswich, and Maldon quite commonly with regard to lesser offices, generally involving the collection of customs. Reyne's actions were not those of a politician, but (more typically medieval) those of an entrepreneur.

In addition to the Reyne case, we have that of Thomas Botkesham and Thomas Salisbury, mentioned earlier as having refused the Lynn offices of Common Councillors in August 1424. In fact, in November following, both accepted posts as jurats and it seems not at all unlikely that, aware of the imminent vacancies in the jurats (Salisbury's father being one of those about to retire), they turned down conciliar roles to hold out for the higher status.^[67] Then there is the case of Ipswich bailiffs Thomas Stace and Thomas le Rente, deposed in 1321 on various charges including that they had been maintained in power by a coven of supporters who conducted borough elections in secret.^[68] The control of office by this partnership and a few close friends and allies lasted for more than two decades, and they seem to have well understood how to use power to personal profit. Throughout history there have been unscrupulous men who have sought office for personal gain, and they tend to attract the attention of historians more easily than those who did not offend and so drew less notice to themselves in official records. We must expect to find some of these black sheep in the later Middle Ages, when the rule of law was poorly respected and its enforcement was weak, encouraging individuals to rely on their own resources and to act, in the default of others, in their own interests. It does not mean we should tar all medieval borough rulers with the same brush; nor should we judge those men by twentieth century ethical standards - rather we must understand them according to their own standards, insofar as we can identify such.

It may be that posts in the royal service were more sought after than offices in local government. The potential illicit profits from the customs service were greater than those from borough offices, and customs posts might prove stepping-stones to higher levels in the royal administrative network, where the rewards could be even greater.^[69] Thus we find outsiders seeking customs posts in East Anglian boroughs, particularly in the fifteenth century, and competition between men farming customs - the fickleness of royal government, where money was changing hands, making for frequent alterations in personnel in the late fourteenth century and occasional confusion as to who was in what post. Ipswich's John Goldyng decided to secure his position as pesager by forging "for life" in place of "during pleasure" in the letter patent appointing him in 1371; the fraud was discovered c.1379 but (after a temporary suspension from office) the king was persuaded, as usual, by the offer of money to pardon and reappoint John in 1380.^[70]

Parliamentary office presents a similar case. It could be the first step in a career, by bringing the ambitious within earshot of the king, his ministers, or other powerful men of the realm. Thomas de Melcheburn attended several parliaments, and may have made important contacts there, before beginning a dedicated career in royal service in the 1330s. Others sought parliamentary office to support the interests of noble masters in parliament; this is, of course, a well-documented feature of the fifteenth century power struggle between national factions. Men like the several John Timperleys, whose careers are difficult to disentangle, but who were retainers of the Duke of Norfolk and who, in his interests, found seats at Ipswich (1455, 1469, 1478, 1483), Suffolk county (1445), Reigate (1453, 1460), Steyning (1467), Gatton (1472), and Bramber (1472). Ipswich also had associations with the series of Gilbert Debenhams of Wenham, two of whom sat for the borough in 1450 and 1455, although they were more accustomed to sit for the county. Albeit that the family ranked among the country gentry by this period, it probably stretches back to the Gilbert de Debenham, son of Richard Child of Debenham, who acquired property in Ipswich between 1339-58 and was buried in Little Wenham in 1361.^[71] But, of our towns, it was rather Yarmouth and Maldon that acquired a reputation of non-resistance to outsiders holding its parliamentary seats. At the former John Paston had some influence, his friend John Damme of Southwold procuring a seat there in 1442, and another ally William Yelverton in 1435 and 1437, whilst it was through Paston's efforts that John Russe (M.P. at Yarmouth several times in the reign of Edward IV) obtained a customs post there in 1463.^[72] John Lowes, William Willy, John Ulveston, and Richard Suthwell were other outsiders who sat for Yarmouth. In this category at Maldon we may name William Laweshull, Walter Wrytell, William Tuft, and John Worthy. None of the outsiders held any other borough office, and the few who held citizenship in the boroughs for which they sat usually took it out only as a formality to facilitate their election. They do not, strictly speaking, concern us. Yet it is noticeable that the increasing appreciation by the gentry of the value of parliamentary seats was slower to dawn upon individual townsmen - despite Edmund Winter's offer to sit for Ipswich at his own expense in 1453 - and upon corporations as a whole, which seem concerned primarily with evading the payment of wages.^[73]

If there is any indication of a change in attitude to office-holding, perhaps it lies in the development of ceremony in the later fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. This may be taken not merely as a visual expression of civic pride, and even civic patriotism, but as part of the growing awareness of the dignity and prestige of office. In fact, ceremony was a possibly vital reinforcement of the sense of identity, of autonomous administration, and of the predominant role of a select group within that administration. And yet this at a time when the identity was being shattered by the widening gulf between classes, the autonomy being undermined as the interests of the urban upper class and non-urban gentry moved closer together, and the powers of the ruling class were coming under challenge from the ruled, who felt they were being excluded from even their traditionally limited role in government. Originally the community's identity was expressed in its chartered privileges, common to all burgesses - the franchise is essential to an understanding of the self-governing borough. But it became increasingly obvious that some townsmen were more equal than others and, in the fifteenth century, we see separate estates evolving within urban society, and political power no longer shared between equals but divided among estates; such is the fundamental reason behind the creation of lower councils. Ceremony provided the means for emphasising, to themselves and to outsiders, the unity of the members of the ruling class, and their wealth-based superiority over the ruled; but it also provided contexts in which all burgesses could act together harmoniously.

It is difficult to ascertain how far back stretched the notion that officers of the community should have some sort of uniform to distinguish them. Colchester's 1372 ordinances provided for the purchase of ballival liveries, and in the following year we find further evidence of civic vanity in the work of bailiffs William Reyne and his junior associate John Clerk in building marble steps up to the front entrance of the town hall, tile steps to the back entrance, and having ornamentations carved into the benches and seats of the hall. These can only have been extravagances intended to impress the onlooker in a town where, a few years later, there was an effort to cut back on parliamentary wages. By 1411 the councillors had the beginnings of a livery in their hoods.^[74] By the beginning of the reign of Edward IV, the Maldon bailiffs were each allowed 16s.8d for a livery, but only 13s.4d if they failed to buy gowns of the proper colour; and the chamberlains were each to have 5s. for a hood.^[75] We hear of liveries for Ipswich's sergeants, town clerk, and customs collector in the 1446/7 accounts, whilst in 1429 the refusal of a portman to wear his livery was ordained to be an offence punishable by deposition.^[76] The liveries of Lynn's clerk and sergeant, which included special hair-cuts, are heard of as early as 1360. Those of Norwich's mayors, ex-mayors, and aldermen are referred to in 1415. Aldermen were to pay a fine of 10s. if they refused to buy and wear livery. This ruling came in the context of the Tripartite Indenture of 1424, an internal agreement between the component branches of the ruling estate, designed to strengthen solidarity within the group by having all pledge to be obedient to the mayor, to be loyal to each other, to submit personal quarrels to mayoral arbitration rather than making them public, and not to resort to demagoguery to gain power. This, more than any other document from our towns, illustrates the separation of the ruling class from its subjects.^[77] To what extent the sumptuary legislation of the second half of the fourteenth century, rendered somewhat ineffective by the high degree of social mobility and ambition, influenced the development of livery it is difficult to say; probably both were facets of the growing habit of conspicuous consumption. Margery Kempe, as a young woman, took much pride in the ostentatious fashion in clothing she wore, which she considered a visual indicator of superior social standing. It was of course at the major political meetings, religious processions, and social pageants, in which the general public participated, that the ruling class took care to display its liveries.[78]

For other symbols of political identity we may point to the ceremonial maces and swords, precursors of liveries, carried solemnly before borough executives in procession to indicate the coercive power of those officers. Such rights are maintained now only for the sake of tradition, but were taken much more seriously in the later Middle Ages. At Lynn, for example, when in 1377 the visiting borough seigneur, Bishop Despenser, insisted that the borough mace (tipped with black ivory) be carried before him rather than the mayor, an enraged populace attacked him and he was lucky to escape with his life. In 1446 the Bishop vetoed a grant by the king that Lynn's mayoral sword be carried point-erect (as in London and Norwich) rather than point-down as was customary.[79] Even at Maldon, where the corporation was not terribly prosperous, there was a ceremonial mace, although it may not have been ornamented with gold and silver as were those of Norwich.[80] The enlargement, improvement, and decoration of town halls, particularly in the first half of the fifteenth century, is another sign of civic ego; Dobson has described them as "the material expression of that late medieval transition from urban community to urban corporation." [81] One cannot fail to be impressed even today by the Norwich gildhall (rebuilt at the end of the reign of Henry IV) even though it is dwarfed by the neighbouring modern city hall; and Lynn's gildhall (rebuilt early in the reign of Henry VI), with its chequered flint facing and great south window, remains visually striking. Again, we may recall the procedural regulations introduced in this same period which, like liveries, show the taste for conformity, orderliness, and ceremony; at Lynn this extended to the making of valedictory speeches by retiring mayors: rather formal, if brief, affairs which related nothing of substance but expressed a humility and unworthiness that it is, unfortunately, difficult to take seriously.[82]

To sum up, we may conclude that for most men office-holding was no great ambition to be pursued, but a duty which the wealthier members of the community were best-endowed to perform. For the unscrupulous, office might give access to large profits or the manipulation of power in the interests of self, friends, or family. For the others - and to be fair we should assume this to be the majority in the absence of evidence otherwise - it was a financial burden in its demands upon their time and their private revenues; the wages of office were nothing compared to the profit to be made from a year's involvement in the import or export of merchandise. Not until the fifteenth century, as class consciousness developed, does the sheer prestige of office seem to have outweighed its liabilities, and even then specific offices with accounting responsibilities remained unpopular. Whether the frequency with which individuals held office reflects their personal attitudes is something we can never know for certain. Men who served once or twice may often be men concerned only to do their duty and let well alone thereafter. Men who held office on numerous occasions need not necessarily be those most skilled at exploiting positions of power, but they are certainly more interesting to us, and an examination of the extent of 'professionalism' in borough government must command our attentions next.

CHAPTER 5

Professionalism in Administration

Introduction: A tradition of service

There are three aspects of professionalism that require consideration and will receive attention in turn: the acquisition of expertise in administration; the selection of officials from men qualified by special training or skills; and the devotion of full-time energies to administrative careers. McKisack concluded from her studies that the qualification of experience played an important role in influencing the selection of M.P.s, both in the sense of prior parliamentary experience, as indicated by re-elections, and familiarity with borough affairs and administration.^[1] We may extend this thesis to borough government as a whole and ask whether, despite the reluctance of men to serve in office too frequently, the burgess community was not wary of appointing rank amateurs to positions of importance in local administration, instead preferring to establish a hierarchy of experience reflecting the hierarchy of offices that we have already seen. This is the conclusion drawn, explicitly by Hammer regarding Oxford's government and by Petchey for early modern Maldon, and implicitly by Rogers who points out that the upper ranks of Stamford's council in the latter half of the fifteenth century were occupied by men with a tradition of two to three decades of continuous service.^[2]

CHAPTER 5

Professionalism in Administration

Expertise as a Factor in Selecting Officers

If there is any trace of policy in customs appointments, it is perhaps in favouritism shown to men with special training. From 1354 to 1375 all the men appointed as controllers, an office entailing only the keeping of a duplicate customs roll, were clerks.^[91] These include Henry Talliser, Yarmouth's town clerk circa the 1330s-'50s.^[92] It is not uncommon to find town clerks active in the customs service, either as a sideline to supplement their borough-paid salary, or after they had left the borough post. At Lynn we have various examples. Benedict de Massingham, acted as a junior clerk under his father Thomas (town clerk c.1312-38) in the early 1330s, and succeeded him briefly as town clerk in 1338/9, before going onto the controller's office 1339-41. Thomas de Morton not only served as clerk to the borough (1373-96) but also, like Thomas de Massingham, to the Merchant Guild (1385-87), in addition to holding simultaneously the post of controller (1378-89). And Roger Raulyn, who was town clerk c.1397-1401 and briefly controller in 1401.^[93] John Tilney, a lawyer who performed clerical work for Lynn's reform administration, was also a controller, from 1425-32, and held other customs posts in Yarmouth and Lynn 1432-35, whilst Geoffrey Costyn and Adam de Brandeston, who performed similar clerical duties for Ipswich in the reigns of Edward II and Edward III respectively, are also found in customs posts.^[94] Other clerks to be found in the customs service include: William Whetacre of Lynn (see above); John de Acle of Yarmouth (see above); Ipswich's John Bernard alias Stathe (searcher 1392, controller 1395-1401), who was also an administrator of the hospital of St. Mary Magdalene and St. James; and Nicholas le Clerk (controller 1296-98, collector 1302-07), also of Ipswich.^[95] A number of other customs men were amateur or professional attorneys.

Although the clerks and lawyers in the customs service were outnumbered by merchants - a sort of specialisation being seen in the number of vintners serving as deputy butlers - the not infrequent choice of men whom we may expect to have been able to read and write is interesting. When the king required that controllers write their counter-rolls with their own hand, what he was concerned with was not professionalism but a safeguard against fraud and absenteeism.^[96] Nonetheless, the stipulation may have encouraged the employment of trained men - although, when we read Geoffrey Starling junior's declaration (in 1387) that he wrote his counter-roll personally, we remain uncertain, for there is no other evidence of Geoffrey's literacy and so many medieval official statements cannot be taken at face value; here, Geoffrey's concern is to certify the accuracy of the information in the role.^[97]

We really have no adequate understanding of how many laymen could read and write, and to what extent, in the later Middle Ages - a period renowned for the 'spread of literacy'. These abilities appear to have been uncommon amongst the urban classes, because non-essential in a society where commercial calculations were worked out on the English equivalent of the abacus and recorded by carving notches in wooden sticks, where the wide use of signet-rings precluded even the need to sign one's name,[98] where the notion of recording everyday affairs in writing was itself relatively novel (outside of ecclesiastical institutions), and where a class of professional scribes existed to cater to the occasional need for documentation. The ability to read was still considered proof of training in the Church, the test of maturity was still the ability to count money and to measure, and education for most burgesses lay in the apprenticeship system, sometimes followed (in the case of merchants) by a 'graduate course' as factors serving overseas.[99] Grammar schools begin to be heard of more frequently in the fifteenth century, often when their schoolmasters, a troublesome lot, appeared in court; such men are seen in Colchester by 1424 and Ipswich by 1412 - in the latter, Richard Felaw bequeathed in 1483 a house in which to hold the school and others to support the master.[100] But precisely what effect this optional education had on burgess literacy is difficult to gauge. Occasionally we come across special individual educational arrangements, such as the case of Robert Beche, town clerk of Colchester (1349-80), who bequeathed property to a probably illegitimate son, Andrew, the profits from which were to pay for Andrew's maintenance and education at Cambridge for five years. Britnell suggests that Robert's intention was to provide for a successor to his profession but, if so, the plan did not materialize; Andrew may have gone to Cambridge, but on his return he showed no great interest in borough administration or clerical service generally, although Robert's legitimate son John, a notary public, followed in his father's footsteps as attorney in Colchester court, and possibly town clerk c.1393, whilst a great-grandson of Robert, another John Beche, was very prominent in Colchester's administration 1428-57.[101] Although we know little of it, the passing of skills and education through family ties is not to be underestimated as a factor in the spread of literacy.

Books were rare and valuable and few burgesses are known to have owned them. The widow of Norwich mayor Richard Purdaunce bequeathed an unusually large collection of books in 1481; Yarmouth bailiff Robert Cupper bequeathed a psalter, a primer, and three epilogues (1434); and Ipswich bailiff Robert Drye left at least one book-case, although his will is surprisingly silent on the subject of books.[102] Possession of such objets d'art is no proof of reading ability. More interesting is the "quemdam librum vocatum le papir de debitis suis et aliis libris" belonging to, and one suspects drawn up by, Ipswich bailiff and customs collector John Rous; the book was stolen from his house in 1414.[103] A private volume of John Lawneye of London embodies copies of all deeds, wills, and other documents (carefully listed in chronological order) relating to the descent of certain property in Lynn; although the script is too fine for us to suppose that Lawneye drew up the book himself, the purpose was very personal and the direct appeal it contains to his heirs to recover the said property, of which he had been defrauded by his mother-in-law, suggests not a book for public reading but rather a family memorandum.[104] Private documents rarely survive from medieval boroughs, and for the most part were not intended to; unlike Liber Lynn, most were draft documents often on cheap, perishable paper. It is difficult to believe, for example, that the disordered and somewhat scrawled memoranda of some Lynn officer - probably one of the town's legal counsellors - on two small membranes were intended to outlive their use in obtaining repayment of expenses from the corporation.[105] Not a few medieval records survive quite fortuitously.

Perhaps a rudimentary reading/writing ability was more common than our evidence can reveal. That only a minority of customs officers were trained scribes meant the occasional slipping of standards. In 1457, during a smuggling enquiry at Lynn, Lord Scales ordered controller John Herman to produce his book of controlment; to which Herman replied, one imagines with some embarrassment, "that he had non Book yer of excepte oon litell scrowe whiche was of his owne hande writing". And in 1357 the king had to reprimand the Yarmouth customers for sloppy practices in making out letters of coket: failing to enter their names, the date, or the type and value of merchandise.[106] That some ability to write was possessed by men who did not expect to have to use it in official capacities is suggested by two cases: at the 1416 election in Lynn a list of names of those elected was drawn up personally by one of the electors, John Alger, a mercer of little administrative activity; and the first draft of Margery Kempe's memoirs she dictated to her merchant son (during his visit from Prussia, to where he had emigrated), although the priest who was asked to write the final copy found the son's draft "so evel wretyn ... it was neithyr good Englysch ne Dewch, ne the lettyr was not schapyn ne formyd as other letters ben." [107] Maybe there were other merchants, like Margery's son, whose script was good enough for their own eyes.

Besides the customs service, the other area in which professional training may have been an asset - although, again, not a pre-requisite - was parliamentary representation. The occasional prohibitions of lawyers being returned to parliament do not seem to have had much effect, and the presence of a sizeable number of men with legal or clerical training has been noticed by several historians.[108] From Lynn, Ipswich, and Colchester,[109] between 1295 and 1406, 39 men categorised as professionals in our occupational analysis (i.e. 70% of that group) served as M.P.s. In addition, 18 other men known to have had clerical skills or to have acted as amateur attorneys were also M.P.s. As the table below shows,

| % of professionals in office-holding group | 4% | 11% | 10% |
| % of parliamentary seats held by professionals | 16% | 14% | 25% |
| % of same held by other skilled men | 5% | 13% | 9% |

professionals were selected to represent these boroughs in parliament to a degree disproportionate to their involvement in borough government otherwise.

The ability to write and some understanding of the law may therefore have been influential when the borough electors selected M.P.s. There is good reason for this: one of the principal functions of M.P.s was to report on parliamentary business to their communities, and memory (which was wont to be faulty) could be supplemented by written notes; in 1413 John Tilney presented to Lynn's assembly 18 folios written by him reporting on parliament's decisions on the Hanseatic trade.^[110] In addition, boroughs took advantage of sending their representatives to where the seat of government lay, to have them deal with town business in the Exchequer or other branches of the central administration of the king; such duties were at other times allotted to town clerks or attornies retained by the borough for that specific purpose. Besides attending the 1413 parliament, Tilney and his colleague were instructed to prosecute the claims of the reform administration at court, seek repayment of loans made to the king, present the grievances of Lynn merchants regarding their treatment in Prussia, and treat with Southampton representatives on the question of freedom from tolls; at the second parliament of that year the same pair were also charged with trying to obtain a confirmation of the borough charters.^[111] It was precisely such needs, perhaps combined with a reluctance of others to serve, that prompted boroughs to make use of their town clerks in fourteenth century parliaments. At Lynn, Thomas de Massingham was elected to 20 parliaments (although one was prorogued and another revoked) and 2 Councils between 1318 and 1338, Richard de Skyren to 2 (1340, 1344), Thomas de Morton to 11 parliaments and one Council (1377-94). At Ipswich, John Lenebaud was sent to the parliaments of 1318 and 1319, Geoffrey Costyn (although no longer town clerk) to 4 between 1328 and 1332, Adam de Brandeston to that of 1355, John de Lyng to another in 1384, and William Bury (again after leaving the clerkship) to one in 1423. At Yarmouth we know the identities of few of the town clerks, but one, William Ambrose, attended 11 parliaments (1307-30), whilst Henry Talliser and Godfrey de Colney - who were either town clerks or town attornies - attended 5 parliaments between them (1322-44), and Geoffrey de Somerton attended 6 (1378-84). At Colchester Robert Beche and his successor Michael Auger were each sent to one parliament, whilst Warin atte Welle, who was employed as a scribe by St. John's Abbey and whom circumstantial evidence indicates to have been town clerk c.1310-26, sat 4 times between 1329 and 1340.^[112]

As with the customs service, merchants outnumbered clerks and lawyers as borough representatives. Yet even this was a sort of professionalism if we consider that the parliamentary business with which boroughs were primarily concerned, and on the subject of which they might wish to present petitions or arguments, was largely that concerning commercial or other financial affairs. Occasionally the king specifically requested that the boroughs send representatives who were particularly knowledgeable in maritime matters, mercantile affairs, or even special branches of trade.^[113] A similar interest in expertise is seen in the arrangements for affeerors of arrested chattels, witnesses to commercial transactions, and even sometimes men assessing taxes, to be chosen from those with the best knowledge of the value of goods - in other words, merchants. Also in the development of a group of untrained para-professional attornies, essoiners, and perhaps even executors - Colchester's Simon Clerk is regularly found in this last role between 1377 and 1403.^[114]

Legal or clerical training was no pre-requisite for the elected offices in borough administration; indeed, the business experiences of men pursuing careers in commerce or land-holding, which entailed some familiarity with aspects of the law, was probably a more important grounding. Nonetheless, the town clerks, the lawyers who involved themselves in borough government, the men who built careers from service to the king, and the burgesses who dedicated much of their lives to holding borough offices: between them, they provided a solid if narrow backbone of experienced administrators whose devotion to their towns guaranteed a stability to borough government that the annual elections, combined with the general unpopularity of office, otherwise might have disrupted.

At Ipswich, although 21 was recognised as the usual age of majority, the custumal indicates an age of 14 was sufficient to validate property transactions; however, this was probably only in the case of orphans - otherwise apprenticeship dictates, or those of parents, often determined when a male would begin his career as an independent adult; Twiss, op.cit., 88, 160.

14 Red Reg. ff.73b, 157b. Robert therefore held the chamberlain's office at a relatively late age; by contrast, Philip Wyth junior held the same office at the early age of 22.

18 Brunham is a quite exceptional case who was first elected jurat only four years after his entrance to the franchise (by patrimony) in 1353. One might normally expect that such an apparently lengthy political career would indicate two separate persons of the same name; but in fact Brunham's term as jurat was unbroken except for those years when he was chamberlain or mayor, and when the records themselves have gaps. His son John became a freeman in 1394, and the records clearly identify our man thereafter as John senior. John's great influence in the borough is suggested not only by his length of service and his role as Gild alderman tempore Henry IV, but by the fact that he had allies in the jurats in the persons of his in-law Kempes, relative Robert de Brunham, and former apprentice Edmund Belleyster. 22 Despite this, the impression given by other evidence suggests quite a few officers from Colchester, Ipswich, and Yarmouth lived into their late 50s and early 60s.

24 See chapter 3.

25 Appendix II, table 2.

26 It has not been possible to calculate the average jurat age pre-1350 due to the survival of very few lists of memberships.

27 Paradoxically, one consequence of the older age of mayors in the fifteenth century was a greater tendency for them to die in office, which may partly explain the decrease in the average number of times the mayoralty was held (appendix II, table 3).

28 KL/C4/11; KL/C2/29.

29 The average age of councillors is artificially high because, in the first few years of its existence, many members were older burgesses who had not previously qualified for jurat status.

36 These 4 cases are discussed in chapter 2 and chapter 3. CHAPTER 6

The Quality of Government

Introduction: Chronicles of sin

If it seems to the reader that heretofore a somewhat rosier, or more sympathetic, picture has been painted of borough government than is consonant with orthodox views of the subject, it may be that this chapter will redress the balance a little. For we must now look at evidence of the general conduct of the men who governed their boroughs, not so much from the perspective of corporate policy as of individual behaviour.

It is largely due to the character of the surviving records that the judgements we, not as moralists but as historians, must pass speak unfavourably of our subjects. When judicial matters are one of the principal foci of borough and national records, we unavoidably receive an impression, not so much exaggerated as unbalanced, of the misdemeaning or felonious conduct of townsmen. Documents of the town court are central to the medieval archives of several of our towns, in a variety of forms ranging from leet to assize and coroners' records, and therefore encompassing a broad spectrum of illegal activities; in addition, the assembly was also a disciplinary and punitive institution. Both Chancery and Exchequer records provide us with information on an equally broad ranges of crimes, complementing more than duplicating local records. It is difficult to provide a contrast to the criminality of the townsmen, since the vast majority of public records were not created for the purpose of chronicling commendable behaviour; in this case good news is, unfortunately, no news.

CHAPTER 6

The Quality of Government

The Theory: "Good and Vertuous Governance"

As Reynolds has pointed out, "Medieval townsmen ... thought that government by the few best men - that is, the more prosperous and able as well as the more virtuous - would be good and benevolent: it would be aristocracy and not oligarchy."^[1] In this we see a watered-down version of the notion of professionalism discussed in the previous chapter. The electors of Colchester were enjoined to choose as borough officers "the most abylllest, the most wysest, discretest, and the most profytabylest persons."^[2] The same expectations of merit and capability are implicit in the use of the title probi homines and its variants, often applied to the urban rulers. These multi-faceted terms could equally be interpreted as "law-abiding men", for good government depended not merely upon the supposed innate qualities of the governors, but upon their adherence to the rule of law. Thus, the establishment of self-government at Ipswich in 1200 concluded - one might even say climaxed - with the communal decision:

quod leges et libere consuetudines ville predicte ponantur in quodam rotulo vocabitur le Domesday. Et quod ille Rotulus semper commorabitur in custodia Ballivorum eiusdem ville, qui erunt pro tempore, ut possint scire et cognoscere modum qualiter agere debent in suo officio, whilst a second roll containing the statutes of the Merchant Guild was to be in the possession of the alderman, to guide his government of that institution.^[3] And, when the loss of the original Domesday necessitated its reconstruction from memory, the task was assigned to a special committee "des plus sages e meuz avisez ... qe meux se conussent en les leys e en les usages."^[4] At Lynn and Colchester, and perhaps commonly but unexpressedly elsewhere, certain ordinances of constitutional significance were read out at the annual electoral assemblies, as reminder both to the community and its officers of their duties.^[5]

However, the clearest expression of expectations of the quality of government are found in oaths of office. Above all we find the demand, both on the part of the community and of the king, for impartiality. When selecting officers, electors were to ignore personal friendships or enmities, and were not to be influenced by persuasion or gifts from others. Those officers, for their part, were to deal with rich and poor as if equals. This reflects not merely the belief that government should be just, but also that borough officers were representatives of the whole community, not just some special interest within it. The other central themes of oaths of office are diligent and honest fulfillment of duties, and placing the good and the profit of the town before all other interests (those of the king excepted - in form at least, but perhaps not in spirit).[6] The functions of the oath of office were various, we may posit:

- It outlined the general duties of, and limitations on, the officer and indicated his position in the hierarchy of authority.
- It committed the officer to constitutional rule, via the promise to uphold the town ordinances, and to certain standards of behaviour; transgression of these principles was thus the more easily punishable on the grounds of breaking of the oath.
- It was the point in the annual proceedings at which the elected officers were formally endowed with the authority of their offices; elections often occurred days or weeks before this actual assumption of power. It was the urban equivalent of coronation.

That the administering of oaths of office was necessarily a public ceremony, which the records are sometimes at pains to point out, need hardly be said.

On the other hand, oaths of office also show a realistic appraisal of the opportunities available for misuse of power; as the saying goes, there is no smoke without fire. Officers involved in judicial administration were warned not to show favouritism, for love nor money, to any party and were not to sit in judgement on any case in which they were plaintiff or defendant. All officers were expected to take their duties seriously, so that the town not suffer from their negligence. Financial officers were required to account for all monies which had passed through their hands, without concealment, and town clerks to make record of the same without any fraud. Whilst the executives, although not to meddle with town finances or have in their possession money which ought to be secure in the town treasury, were expected to ensure the honest performance of duties by clerks and financial officers. Collectors of tolls and taxes were likewise not to exempt those who should pay, nor demand from anyone more than they should pay. That the community depended for good government not so much on the character of its officers as on the solemn commitment placed on those men by their oaths we may infer from a chapter of the Ipswich custumal regarding the ballival duty of hearing recognisances: while bound by his oath of office, the word of a bailiff was sufficient to prove that a recognisance has been made; but, once out of office, the word of the ex-bailiff, if unsupported by written record, was worthless.[7]

It was in the interest of every officer to adhere to the standards imposed by their oaths, for upon such the legitimacy of their rule rested. If the authority of the ruling class was to be upheld, it was in its interest to punish any members who transgressed.[8] In their default, the community reserved the right to act for itself and, although we lack precise evidence, this appears to be what happened when the greatly erring Ipswich bailiffs Thomas Stace and Thomas le Rente were deposed in 1321.[9] Deposition was but one of the weapons in the armoury of the community when it came to disciplining dishonest or negligent officers. Disfranchisement or withholding of wages were alternative or additional threats; at Yarmouth a heavy fine of 40 marks was the penalty on councillors. It was not uncommon for officers, particularly those handling borough revenues, to be required to find manucaptors or put up bonds for the faithful fulfillment of their duties.[10] It was amply clear to office-holders that their governmental behaviour was to be, as the king told the Norwich rulers in 1380, "congruum bone fidei et consonum rationi pro communi utilitate civium"[11]: the "common good" was central to the goals of medieval borough government.

But we must not mistake this theory of government for its practice. Oaths had more than symbolic implications in the context of Catholic society. Thomas Fraunceys of Colchester petitioned Chancery that he had been imprisoned on a trumped-up charge in an attempt to coerce him into surrendering certain lands, of which he was trustee, to a wrongful claimant; he had refused to disinherit the rightful heirs, avowing that he "had lever abyde in prison term of his live then to dampne his sewle." [12] The opportunities for abuse of office must nonetheless have been sorely tempting when service was underpaid and when wealth was built from enterprise and the exploitation of opportunity. When medieval government failed to meet up to its expectations, the failure was blamed not on the constitutional arrangement so much as on "lak of good and vertuous governance." [13] In consequence, disciplining or replacement of leaders of government was normally considered sufficient to rectify the problem. Perhaps they were right: human failure is undeniable. Yet the historian, with the advantage of perspective, may perceive in the system of government underlying inadequacies not so easily dealt with. [14]

CHAPTER 6

The Quality of Government

The Practice: Abuses of Power

We shall turn finally to examine offences relating to abuse of office. A man with the evident force of character of John Halteby did not need to rely on the force of authority to back up his deeds, and he is not found in many offices. However, the backing of an official title, given the belief in the dignity of office and the element of royal authority delegated to the borough executive, could be advantageous when furthering one's own welfare. Yet, if Saul is correct in his opinion that the principal attraction of executive office was the opportunity to use power for personal profit,[\[110\]](#) it is surprising that there is not more evidence of such abuse. We have already noted the somewhat tyrannical government of Stace and le Rente in Ipswich, involving fixed elections to ensure maintenance of power, extortion and favouritism in distribution of services, and application of communal revenues to private ends. Had this been typical governmental behaviour it would have less excited our attentions, and not given rise to such a drastic response by the burgesses of Ipswich. Other examples tend to be scattered. The hundredal inquisitions of c.1275 found that Yarmouth bailiffs of 1273-75, William de Acle and Richard Randolf, had taken payments (whether bribes or extortion is not clear) from foreign merchants for performing their office, and that Alexander Kellock, mayor of Lynn c.1266/7, had taken bribes to issue licences for corn-export against the prohibition of the king. Against this we may place an event of 1433, whereby mayor John Brekrope informed Lynn's council that a ship had offered him "a reasonable sum" for licence to depart with a corn cargo; upon being advised that only the king could authorize this, he prohibited the departure.[\[111\]](#)

Merchants and tradesmen in office may have occasionally put business their own way. An unknown pair of Colchester bailiffs of the late fourteenth century were taken to task for ignoring the royal and local statutes by selling beer and wine during their term, with the result that other taverners, either from fear or to curry favour, agreed to retail the bailiffs' beverages too. In response to this abuse, the community re-affirmed the statute, and the clerk made, in his account of the proceedings, a biblical allusion to the effect that sins were that much more grievous when performed by men responsible for upholding the law.[\[112\]](#) According to the Yarmouth murage accounts of 1342-45, a major supplier of construction materials was in fact one of the muragers, Simon de Halle. However, this may have been a matter of convenience, and the total value was just short of £2 - hardly the stuff from which fortunes are made![\[113\]](#) Hillen criticised Lynn mayor William de Swanton (1355/6) for claiming 52s.4d recompense from the borough treasury for his horse, which he had presented to a visiting Queen Philippa as a gift.[114] Certainly this was an excessive price for a horse, but we may suspect that it was a fine animal, and decorative harnessing may have been included. The court rolls of Ipswich and Colchester reveal a slight tendency for executives to bring more of their personal legal business - suits and recognisances regarding debt or land transactions - into court during their terms of office than at other times. As bailiff a man could exert special pressure on his debtors to repay: within a few weeks of his election in 1376, Stephen Baron of Colchester had received 4 recognisances of debt. And it was financially sensible to have deeds and other documents enrolled at a time when the customary fees for this service would go towards one's own salary. But there are no extreme cases of this, and the practice varied considerably from person to person. Nor does it seem especially reprehensible behaviour. Minor irregularities such as a bailiff witnessing his own recognisance, even if the other bailiff were not present, were extraordinary yet did not provoke objections from any quarter.[115]

The responsibilities of office seem to have been taken seriously, on the whole, and, despite the leet amercement in 1456 of Yarmouth bailiffs Thomas Fen and John Alman for allowing the gallows to fall into disrepair, it did not require the heavy fines for negligence ordained in 1272 and 1491 to remind the bailiffs of their duties.[116] On the contrary, default of duty or abuse of power are more commonly found at lower levels of the governmental hierarchy. Sergeants in particular were a source of trouble. The customals of Ipswich and Yarmouth provided for fines, temporary suspension from, or even deprivation of, office in the case of sergeants who failed to perform their duties or who stirred up malice between members of the community. The latter seems to refer to the fact that private quarrels were often brought to the attention of sergeants, or ward constables, before being taken to court. These officers were forbidden to try to settle the quarrels themselves, as this deprived the borough court of revenues; in 1375 a Colchester sergeant was accused of this. In 1464 the Colchester bailiffs dismissed one of their sergeants for concealing private quarrels from the court, settling them himself, and pocketing the ameracements, as well as for refusing to obey the orders of the bailiffs. At an unusually well-attended assembly in Ipswich in 1470, sergeant John Newport was dismissed for unspecified injuries and deceptions - doubtless much as above - against bailiffs, portmen, coroners, burgesses, community, and the town franchises; a strict injunction was issued to future administrations never to re-appoint him in any office. And there was a general complaint in late fourteenth century Colchester about sergeants adapting the traditional ceremony of bede-ales into organised extortion meetings, whereby those who came and drank the ale (proceeds from which went into the sergeants' purses) would not be pressed to appear in court cases, whilst those who failed to come would be indiscriminately fined.[117] We also encounter frequent amercement of aletasters or other minor officials in Maldon for unsatisfactory performance of duties, as well as frequent accusations against capital pledges and leet afferors at Lynn of false presentments, concealment of offences committed by themselves, or of over-fining convicted parties; in 1439 it was demanded that the leet officials pay back the wages they had been given.[118]

One of the growing concerns of the borough government was the problem of maintenance in office. We are not thinking here so much of monopolisation of local office, which lay largely within the powers of the corporation to prevent, or of the influencing of parliamentary elections by local men: there was a markedly high occurrence of the borough executives returning their own names as M.P.s,[119] but it is not clear that there is anything sinister in this. Rather, of intrusion of the influence of external lords in electoral decisions, and thereby the formulation of borough policy as a whole. A fiercely independent spirit - characterised in part by a hostility to neighbouring communities or landlords with rival jurisdictions, and a determination to exclude the interference of external royal officers in internal urban affairs [120] - prevailed during the thirteenth century and climaxed in the first half of the fourteenth. It is therefore significant that it was in the fifteenth century that the greatest fear of maintenance and patronage was evinced, for they were becoming a prominent feature of national politics; the urban families who had led their communities in the struggle for independence had largely disappeared by now, and some of their replacements did not feel the same exclusive loyalty to their boroughs - Thomas Wetherby is an excellent, and notorious, example.[121] As early as 1372 in Colchester, however, we encounter ordinances requiring that officers be elected from residents who were not in the service (taking neither fee nor robe) of any other master, particularly any having interests within the town.[122]

What was to be avoided was evidently a conflict of loyalties. While the king insisted, somewhat ineffectually, in 1413 that M.P.s be residents of their constituencies, local authorities were also struggling to preserve their own integrity. A Lynn ordinance from the first half of the reign of Henry VI set a fine on any burgess supporting, by word or deed, any person acting against borough liberties. The Norwich Composition of 1415 prohibited any mayor, sheriff, or alderman from taking the livery of any lord while in office, upon pain of disfranchisement, and declared that whoever sought royal letters patent granting him office in the city would be barred from office. A Colchester ordinance of 1447 ruled that persons elected as bailiff, J.P., coroner, claviger, or alderman must hold only the livery of the town; the election of any holding the livery of other lords was to be void. At Ipswich in 1455 and 1474 we encounter ordinances against the same abuses (letters of recommendation, maintenance of outsiders in quarrels), affirmation of the exclusive rights of residents in elections, and the same penalties: fines, perpetual bar from office, disfranchisement.[123] It would be misleading were we to try to classify towns, or parties within towns, as Yorkist or Lancastrian. A distaste for political strife, which disrupted trade, was innate to the urban character; passions could usually be roused only over local political issues. The predominantly mercantile influence in towns encouraged the hedging of bets: it was wise to keep in favour with both national parties, but especially in that of the side which was currently in the ascendant. Personal adherences to particular magnates were more in the nature of commercial than political alignments, insofar as we can see. Nonetheless, there was a certain amount of inevitable and irresistible meddling by great men and their lieutenants in borough affairs, which it was safer to tolerate. The best-known expression of this being the election of outsiders as M.P.s; here the boroughs lost out in that such representatives could not be as concerned for borough interests as local men, but they gained from the greater influence of the outsiders in the highest circles of power.[124]

of this is Gilbert Debenham esquire, servant to the Duke of Norfolk.[125] He had property in and around Ipswich and his belligerent partisan activity in the county earned him sufficient hostility to make him the target for a (thwarted) assassination attempt in Ipswich (but by non-townsmen) in 1468. He used Ipswich as a base for smuggling, and had so much influence over the bailiffs that they arrested and fined a customs searcher who had caught Debenham smuggling. Debenham did not get along so well with town clerks, however. In the 1430s William Bury, who by then had exchanged clerical duties for a lawyer's career, complained that Debenham had brought a false plea against him in Ipswich court, where the bailiffs were abetting him by having false entries made in the rolls. The reason for this was that Bury was defending Thomas Bloys in that court against an accusation of Debenham's; Bloys too complained to Chancery that he would be unjustly convicted due to Debenham's influence over the bailiffs. Ipswich's town clerk of the time of Edward IV, John Balhed, who was heavily in debt to Debenham, resented him sufficiently that he (so Debenham claimed) released another of Debenham's debtors from custody and made a false entry in the court rolls to justify it. Did space allow, other incidents could be related where Gilbert Debenham influenced the bailiffs of Ipswich and of Colchester to arrange miscarriages of justice to his advantage.[126]

Subversion of justice was nothing new, however. Leading burgesses were sometimes difficult to bring to task when their friends and allies were in control of judicial administration. The bailiffs of Yarmouth refused to entertain Margaret Fastolf's plea of dower, regarding borough property, against more influential members of the Fastolf family; the result was that the king had to order an enquiry, with which the bailiffs refused to cooperate. A royal investigation had also been necessitated in 1268, when the Yarmouth bailiffs declined to pressure William Gerberge to pay a foreign merchant, agent for Prince Edward, a debt of £45. And again, in 1339, the bailiffs ignored a royal order to force John Perbroun to restore goods stolen by his servants from Guelders merchants.[127] At Lynn in 1463 a quarrel between councillor William Marche and mayor Simon Baxter, apparently based on the former's rebelliousness against the latter's authority, came to a head when the mayor led the jurats and other councillors in an attack on Marche's residence. Marche then petitioned the royal Council and obtained a subpoena against Baxter. This only further infuriated the mayor, who had Marche thrown in prison. From that location Marche petitioned for and obtained a writ of corpus cum causa; but this the mayor refused to let the town sergeant or the gaoler return.[128] The end of the affair is not recorded; it almost certainly would have been Marche humbly submitting to the mercy of mayor and jurats, although it may have taken a few years of disfranchisement for him to accept the inevitable. We will finally select, from a number of cases among the early Chancery proceedings, that of Colchester bailiff John Bishop, seen abusing justice on two occasions: once in favouring one of his tenants who had brought a plea of account before Bishop; and again in persuading William Stonard, defendant in a plea of account, who had ingratiated himself with Bishop, to counter-sue the plaintiff for debt in piepowder court where, Bishop promised, he would condemn Stonard's opponent.[129]

All this is not to say that the townsmen of the ruling class were exempt from the law on the occasions when they controlled its administration. They were not. The leet court was particularly fearless in accusing such men, and in amercing them heavily when warranted; but then these men were often the heaviest and most persistent offenders.[130] The wealthier men of the borough could more easily afford the risks inherent in illegal activity: payment of fines, purchase of pardons. And, given their wider and more diverse sphere of operations, there was more scope and greater temptation for such activity. Bad apples there were a few; men whose consciences were not overly bothered by breaking the law on occasion, there were more. Yet it is easy to overlook the majority who have not, or do not appear to have, seriously offended during the (relatively?) honest conduct of their businesses and lives. A certain amount of corruption was endemic to medieval society, at all levels, and we do not need the witch-hunt of 1341, purging the local networks of royal administration nation-wide,[131] to demonstrate the fact. For the most part, however, borough rulers seem to have been able to reconcile community, class, and personal interests in a tolerably responsible fashion; to which the usual quiescence of the townsmen at large is adequate, although not unambiguous, testimony. Judgement of the character, ethics, and integrity of the urban ruling classes has been traditionally based on, and does indeed come down to in the final resort, an understanding of the moments of crisis, when discontent was expressed by the masses via political conflict. At the last, therefore, we too turn to this.

Introduction: At moments of crisis

Political struggles between borough factions - whether it be rivalry between groupings of potentiores or the apparently class-based hostilities that have been interpreted by some as democracy versus oligarchy - have received plenty of attention from historians, due in part to the very conspicuousness of those affairs, and in part to the historiographical emphasis on moments of crisis. Unfortunately, evidence of solidarity in the community has been exploited less. In this chapter, although mainly concerned with the former aspect of borough history, we will touch upon the latter to offer some degree of balance.

Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

Discontent and Division

Although townsmen were capable of closing ranks against a threat to their common privileges and prosperity, whether from an external enemy or a rebellious voice from their midst, they were also capable of divisions and dissensions within the community that could sometimes be difficult to reconcile. If the surviving evidence is an accurate indicator, outbreaks of internal hostilities were not common in any given town. Harmony, in the sense of the populace acquiescing in the just governmental decisions of those they chose to rule them, appears as the predominant theme of borough politics. Machiavelli's definition of politics as change and conflict was not characteristic of medieval English boroughs, but was rather the product of an historical environment in which those features were predominant. The rarity of crisis periods in any individual town, however, does not mean that we can lightly dismiss them as aberrations. It is from the aggregate evidence of towns across the country that we sense political conflict to be a recurring theme in the history of medieval urban development. Yet it is not easy to understand what lies behind this internal strife. Part of the problem is that the incidents take place over a large chronological span, from the late twelfth to the fifteenth century. There does seem to have been a concentration of expressions of discontent in the second half of the thirteenth and the early fourteenth centuries; but even this is a lengthy period and, if the momentum was begun by the national discontent expressed in the civil war of Henry III's reign, no historian has yet given a convincing explanation of how the latter phenomenon might have inspired the former. Unfortunately, evidence from borough archives for most of this period is slight and unhelpful. Although we do encounter complaints of unjust monopolisation of office by cliques, complaints more commonly centre not on the constitutional arrangement so much as on abuses of government: unfair taxation, embezzlement of community funds, evasion of market laws. Green concluded, from a comparison of complaints from Lynn in the early fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries, that the townsmen of the latter period possessed a greater political awareness. But we cannot be sure that this impression is not merely a consequence of richer records in the later period.^[14]

Both the political and financial aspects of the complaints are reflected in the identities of the parties in conflict. The rich/powerful are invariably the targets for complaints, while the complainants are the "middle people" and, less often, the "lesser people". The memberships of these groups, their relationships to one another, and the precise role of each in the borough community, are not usually specified by the records; and so the description of these groups as 'classes' is rather tentative - we must not read too many modern connotations into the term. A wealth difference and the association of the upper class with the families providing government personnel may be inferred with reasonable confidence, but not much else. It would be dangerous to suppose that a rigid stratification existed since, as this study has tried to show, there was a fair amount of social mobility.[15] On the other hand, we need not go as far as Morey in suggesting (with regard to Lynn) that the simplified tripartite structure of urban society obscures the real nature of conflicts.[16] His point that the personnel of the opposing parties do not neatly fit into the divisions is well taken but, if we dismiss the medieval insistence on those divisions as the basis of conflicting forces, we may ignore an important clue.

The theory that the three classes were merchants, craftsmen, and unskilled labourers, and that political conflict was essentially a struggle for power between gilds representing mercantile and artisan interests, was long ago sent to the historiographical graveyard, as a continental theory inapplicable to English conditions.[17] With the exceptions of London and a few particularly important industrial centres, there is no real evidence for a formal gild role in power struggles. Despite Norwich's system of popular participation at assemblies via crafts representatives (1372), in those towns with which this study is concerned, craft gilds begin to become a factor in the political structure only in the fifteenth century.[18] Our occupational analysis of office-holders suggests that craftsmen were not excluded from borough government at any period; if they were more prominent in the fifteenth century, it was largely due to the introduction of lower councils and the elaboration of the hierarchy of offices. The tripartite class division is not one of occupation but simply of wealth (and associated socio-political status). Inequality itself does not seem to have been questioned - it is notable that the urban lower classes, for the most part, did not feel that the Peasants' Revolt of 1381 had anything in common with their own grievances;[19] but the wealth gap was a source of resentment when increased by the rich misusing positions of trust and responsibility to line their own purses with money intended for the benefit of the community as a whole.

If it is not easy to relate borough conflicts to national political events or economic trends, neither has any historian yet been able to argue that outbursts of discontent relate to specific stages in urban development, the different rates of development then explaining the lack of simultaneity in the outbursts. To a large extent, historians' interpretation of moments of urban crisis has been inextricably bound up with the theories of democracy vs. oligarchy discussed in the introduction to this study. Gross rejected Brentano's theory of craft gilds rebelling against merchant gild tyranny, on the grounds that (as he believed) borough government was originally democratic and therefore not dominated by the merchant gild.[20] Green, however, from her thesis that originally oligarchic government was overthrown, or at least modified, by democratic revolutions, suggested that this was facilitated by the training in self-government given lesser townsmen via gild administration.[21] Bridbury's emphasis on the open character of society from the late fourteenth century onwards similarly forced him into the extreme interpretation of the preceding period as one of closed corporations maintaining a strict monopoly of power and privilege, through restrictive control over entrances to the franchise; he therefore interpreted political strife as the product of the "mortified pride and stifled ambitions" of the non-enfranchised craftsmen.[22] Meyer better reflected the historiographical mainstream of his time in suggesting that, although the craft guilds did gradually come to dominate borough governments, the former were institutions as oligarchic in nature as the latter.[23] It is clear that the subject of urban conflict must be tackled carefully, with each incident examined first in isolation and in local context, not just as part of a wave of seemingly identical occurrences sweeping across the country. Tingey's observation, for example, that grievances concerning financial maladministration at Norwich and Lynn are closely related, chronologically, to murage grants,[24] although not in itself a sufficient explanation, is an hypothesis more helpful to the historian at this stage than speculations as to whether the governments of those towns were oligarchic or democratic at that time. Here we will look in detail only at the troubles in early fifteenth century Lynn, partly from considerations of space, partly because that is the best documented of such events from any of our towns.

CHAPTER 7

Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

Discords and Disputes: Ipswich

Interestingly, we find at Ipswich a dispute similar to that at Colchester. The two common sergeants ordained in 1200 had, by the reign of Edward II, been supplemented by two other officers apparently intended as ballival sergeants and possibly appointed by the bailiffs rather than elected by the community. In the fifteenth century the bailiffs were showing such favouritism to their own pair that jealousy and hostility had arisen among the sergeants. In 1434 therefore the community persuaded the bailiffs to allow them to elect all four sergeants as equals. This may seem a minor matter, but it required the mediation of the Duke of Norfolk before a final settlement in 1436, and shows the concern that ballival government not become too independent of community control.[\[31\]](#) However, this is the only sign of popular discontent after the reign of Edward III, unless we care to read anything into the ordinances of 1429 and 1474, the initiative for which one suspects came from above, not below.

Political unrest at Ipswich centres around the events of 1320/1, much of which we have touched upon already, and the key feature of which is the replacement of one power clique by another. The rise of the fortunes of Thomas Stace and Thomas le Rente, although it did not begin in 1291, may be said to have reached its first plateau in that year, with their inclusion in the committee appointed to reconstruct from memory the lost codex of borough laws; it is unnecessary to elaborate upon the importance of such a role.[\[32\]](#) Stace and le Rente were doubtless among the more junior members of this committee, neither having held any important post previously, and both probably representing the second generation of migrant families, le Rente's father having been fairly well-to-do, although not politically active, but Stace's only a tailor.[\[33\]](#) The ranks of their committee colleagues well illustrate the changing personnel of the ruling class. The families who had manned the incipient government at the beginning of the century had mostly disappeared, although Vivian fitz Silvester was on the committee (approaching the end of his career), and the long-lasting Maister and Leu families were represented. There were also representatives of families that rose to prominence in the reign of Henry III: the two Haraud brothers, William le Mayden, Laurence Cobbe, Alexander Margaret (his family coming from London), and three members of the Clement family.[\[34\]](#) Even more recent arrivals to the borough were several men who, by the time of the 1283 subsidy, had already risen into the ranks of the wealthiest burgesses and were just beginning to participate in administrative work: Thomas Aylred, Philip and John Harneys, Arnold le Peleter, Elias le Keu. Finally, there were the newcomers who, along with Stace and le Rente, had not yet entered government: Nicholas le Clerk, John de Whatefeld, and Gilbert Robert.

It was particularly from the younger and newcomer members of the committee that le Rente and Stace built up their clique of supporters. Thomas le Rente's daughter was married to Richard son of Gilbert Robert (whose wife was a Harneys), whilst Thomas' eldest son had married a daughter of John de Whatefeld. Stace, le Rente, Whatefeld, and Gilbert Robert were, in 1312, partners in a scheme to lease Horswade Mill from the community for ten years. Thomas dil Stone, a member of the Clement family, was a business partner of le Rente in 1281. Nicholas le Clerk was associated with le Rente in a homicide in 1283 and was a business partner of Gilbert Robert in 1305. Alexander Margaret and Laurence Cobbe can also be connected with le Rente in contexts outside borough government. Richard Leu was co-collector (and co-embezzler) of customs with le Rente, and was a business associate of Thomas Stace in 1291. Thomas le Maister chose Stace as one of his executors in 1301.[35] This was essentially the group involved with Stace and le Rente in the monopolisation of ballival office from 1295 to 1321. Further support for this charge, laid in 1320, is seen in the personnel chosen as M.P.s: when not selected from the 'in-group' we have defined, they were men not previously associated with borough government (except for town clerk John Lenebaud) but who were associated with Stace and le Rente, either in business, legal, or other contexts.[36]

Popular discontent with this state of affairs is first revealed by the royal letters of protection that Stace, le Rente, their families, and various supporters found it necessary to take out in October 1320; two of these supporters were charged with unspecified crimes against the community in November, a fortnight before the issuing of the reforming ordinances.[37] The accusations laid in these ordinances, resembling in several respects the London reforms of the previous year, were: that market laws were being broken; that the bailiffs were augmenting their salaries with extortionate fees charged for the use of the common seal, with burgess entrance fines, and with the proceeds of excessive taxations; and that they were being maintained in power by a clique holding elections in secret.[38] It is difficult to determine whether these charges were justified, or contrived by a rival group of power-seekers. Maintenance cannot be proved, but it is certainly suggested by the evidence we have already reviewed; the reference to secret elections may indicate that the portmen, a group dominated by Stace, le Rente, and friends, had taken over the role of electors. The absence of records of burgess entrances between 1308 and 1321 (not due to any absence of records as a whole) also looks very suspicious and may hide embezzlement of fines.[39] And, in May 1323, charges relating to market offences were brought against a number of supporters of Stace and le Rente, [40] although this may partly have been the bringing to bear of pressure for submission to the reformers' authority. The solutions offered by the reformers were much the same as those in Colchester in 1372:

- elections were to be made in public, by common assent;
- chamberlains were to handle receipts and expenses and to account annually before the community;

- entrances of freemen and applications of the common seal were to take place only in public;
- salaries were regulated;
- clavigers were to keep the common seal and borough treasury secure.

It is probable that these efforts, as in Colchester, would have satisfied the reformers, had not Stace and le Rente fought back, by trying to secure the intervention of the king on the complaint that their opponents were rioting, resisting ballival authority, and obstructing the collection of tolls.[41] This sealed their fate, and at some point in the spring of 1321 Stace and le Rente were deposed from ballival office. This was a drastic, but not a revolutionary, act: provision for it had been made in the 1320 ordinances, and even this rested upon a statement in the 1200 charter that the borough executive "non amoveatur quamdiu se in balliva illa bene gesserit nisi per commune consilium predictorum burgensium."[42]

We need not dwell on the subsequent clashes of the oligarchic and reform parties in a struggle for control of government which gradually faded away as the foci of controversy died - le Rente in 1323 and Stace c.1329.[43] We must turn rather to look at the nature of the conflict. The 1320 ordinances are undeniably democratic in tenor, in their emphasis on community authority and the public performance of governmental duties. Apart from the removal of the principal offenders, Stace and le Rente, from power, and the disfranchisement of Richard Robert - largely due to his own obstinate resistance to the reformers - the oligarchs were not made political outcasts, however; this no doubt helped ensure no prolongation of hostilities. Most of them continued to serve in government. What was achieved, however, was the breaking of their exclusive grip on office. The former oligarchs were henceforth joined in governmental ranks by a number of new faces, many of them from the reformers.

Yet of those who benefited from the defeat of the old guard, none did more so than the leaders of the reform movement: John de Halteby, John de Preston, and Geoffrey Costyn. Costyn was four times bailiff and four times M.P. between 1326 and 1332. Preston has the appearance of a career administrator, monopolising office in Ipswich to a greater degree than his old enemies had done.[44] Halteby, working primarily behind the scenes, used coercive tactics to dominate Ipswich up to his murder ca. July 1344. Costyn and Halteby were business partners in 1322, whilst Halteby and Preston both appear to have been protégés (or tools) of Despenser.[45] As sincere as the grievances and reforms of 1320 may have been, one is inclined to suspect that the main goal of the reform leaders was to oust the Stace/le Rente clique in order to obtain power for themselves. It is questionable whether the quality of government much improved with the change of personnel. The counter-accusations of the oligarchs in 1324, although not entirely trustworthy, suggest that financial maladministration and abuse of justice were either inextinguishable problems or were standard charges against political opponents which must never be trusted without substantiating evidence.[46]

Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

Discords and Disputes: Lynn

The troubles in early fifteenth century Lynn have received less detailed attention from historians than those in Norwich, with the consequence that they have been easily misunderstood. The history of political conflict at Lynn, like its constitutional history, is complicated by the lordship of the Bishop of Norwich. Periodically, the borough rulers made attempts to break free of this dominion, notably by seeking to usurp episcopal rights of judicial administration. In this they were encouraged by the willingness of the king to grant them liberties which, despite disclaimers insisting that no grant be implemented to the damage of the Bishop's prerogatives, subverted episcopal initiative in Lynn's development. Dissatisfaction on the part of the burgesses with the power of the Bishop's officers in the town finally found expression in 1236; the accusation of that date was essentially extortion, and the same charges were laid against the Bishop's bailiffs and his Tolbooth custodians at the hundredal inquiry of c.1275.^[56] If we conjecture that burgess resistance rallied around the mayoralty, this would explain why the Bishop left it until 1234 to complain about the creation of that office, which had been in existence in Lynn for some two decades. Although the focal points of this dispute - which had led the Bishop to excommunicate the townsmen - were ostensibly the appropriation of the authority to impose external taxations and the election of mayors, the Bishop's concerns really seem to have been the independence of the mayoralty and, as later renewals of the dispute suggest, mayoral arrogation of judicial administration. For the time being, the Bishop - always the defender rather than the aggressor in these disputes - was content to settle for each mayor, upon coming into office, taking oath to respect episcopal rights in Lynn.^[57]

Discord between Bishop and community is again discovered in 1295, and in 1298 a cause is specified in that the burgesses' enlargement of the town ditch and building of sluices to keep water therein had resulted in encroachment on episcopal territory. The objection was probably not to the action itself, but that it was taken without seeking the Bishop's permission; furthermore, this was only one of a number of usurpations, as the composition of 1309 between town and Bishop showed. This compromise, and the complaints which preceded it in the same year, suggest that the main source of dispute was the town courts. It is not quite clear how many of these there were. The leet court was evidently judged to belong to the Bishop, since he farmed it out to the burgesses by the composition. The husting court (granted in 1204), it was arranged in 1309, would be presided over by the steward, but the mayor would act as controller regarding pleas of burghal tenure, and the court profits would belong to the community. This court, apparently the principal bone of contention, does not appear to be the same as the "steward's court", rolls from which survive from 1317/8 and 1448 under that title, whilst a cathedral account roll for the manor of Lynn from 1331/2 lists the revenues from the steward's hall and husting separately. The steward's court dealt only with petty pleas of transgression and debt, but was largely boycotted by the ruling class, who brought their pleas of debt before the husting; the latter also dealt with pleas of land and was conceded in 1309 the power to deal with probate, for borough purposes, although enrolment of testaments was subsequently transferred to other records which further symbolised borough authority in this area.[\[58\]](#)

The most determined effort by mayor and community to gain sole control of the courts was made just before mid-century. The path for this was paved by: seeking constitutional advice from Oxford, Lynn's model town, and from the royal government; bolstering the rights of Lynn's administration to levy taxes and enrol wills in the town hall; and acquiring the farm of the king's part of the Tolbooth.[\[59\]](#) Having probably usurped control of the husting in the mid-1330s, to which the Bishop responded (as traditionally) by threatening to abolish the mayoralty, the burgesses, by wilfully misinterpreting the 1309 composition, convinced the king in 1346 that the Bishop had in fact acquired the leet and husting by their grant in 1309, and had then leased the former back to the community. On the grounds that this supposed grant in mortmain was unlicensed, the king was persuaded to seize the courts into his own hand; the fact that the Bishop of that time was out of favour, for other causes, doubtless did not help his case. It was then a simple matter for the burgesses to arrange to farm the courts from the king. This brilliantly simple plan fell through after the Bishop was restored to favour and his appeal was heard by the king, who had not entirely trusted the arguments of the Lynn burgesses. The result was a definitive restoration of judicial jurisdiction to the Bishop in 1350. [\[60\]](#) A new composition in 1352 restored the status quo, the Bishop again recognising the mayoralty and the burgesses bowing to the terms of the 1309 agreement.[\[61\]](#)

Although the physical attack on Bishop Despenser in 1377, which led that haughty prelate to discomfit the townsmen with a sentence of interdict, does not properly belong to this sequence of conflicts, it shows the continuing resentment of episcopal lordship.[\[62\]](#) The borough had recovered from the repercussions of this misdemeanour by the last decade of the century, when seen acquiring property left and right, to enhance borough revenues; in 1392 the Bishop granted the corporation land on the banks of Mayor's Fleet[\[63\]](#) on which to build a watermill. The amity did not last long. Argument arose in 1401/2 over whether the Bishop was responsible for repairing the Bishop's Staithe, the deterioration of which was detrimental to the port as a whole. In 1402 mayor Thomas atte Brigge was complaining of extortions by episcopal officials. And in 1404 the Bishop was suing the burgesses for disseising him of 120 acres of land and for intimidating members of his Council. The corporation fought an expensive and unsuccessful legal battle against the Bishop, ending in a new composition in 1406 which, however, only enforced that of 1309; it is hinted that the old dispute over control of the courts had once again reared its head. The corporation was distracted from further efforts against episcopal rights by internal political troubles, after the settlement of which the struggle against the Bishop was largely abandoned, despite the trouble in 1447 over the method of carrying the mayoral sword.[64]

The failure of the corporation in its battle with the Bishops was partly due to lack of unity within the ranks of the townsmen. There was perhaps always a measure of support for the Bishop in the ranks of the ruling class, or at least a cautious sentiment of not wishing to provoke the lord of the town. In the struggle between the factions led by Robert de London and Alexander Kellock, at the close of the reign of Henry III, the latter was an anti-episcopal party so perhaps the former was loyal to the Bishop.[65] Although it is going too far to suggest that the Bishop and Lynn's lower class, the inferiores non burgenses, were allies in a constant struggle against the ruling class, an alliance partly stemming from the landlord-tenant relationship and partly from a shared hatred of the potentiores,[66] it is true that the inferiores, particularly after 1309, looked to the Bishop for protection when they had grievances, just as the corporation sought the king's assistance in its efforts to weaken episcopal dominion; there is some indication that only the freemen section of the population was involved in the 1377 attack on Despenser.[67]

The earliest complaint from the Lynn community against its rulers was in 1277 and (matching the pattern in our other towns) related to forestalling. At the end of Edward I's reign we find a wider range of charges. In 1304 the "poor men of the community" complained of excessive taxation and misappropriations, and soon after of forestalling again, by the rich burgesses. The latter, guilty or not, thought it safer to buy a pardon from the king (1305) for levying tallages without community consent, embezzlement of murage, and other financial and market crimes. Yet in 1311 further complaint resulted in a royal commission to audit the accounts of Lynn collectors of taxes, murage, community rents, and court profits, to as far back as 1296.[68] Perhaps consequent to the 1305 pardon, the complainants evidently appealed to the Bishop to step in, and he used the occasion to assert his own rights. The 1309 composition included a clause requiring that internal taxations be levied only at need and then assessed fairly "after the faculte, myght & power of every man", with tallage accounts to be audited by a committee composed of men from each of the three classes.[69] It also acted against another abuse, or rather an unwarranted assumption of power, which has generally been interpreted as a prohibition of forcing residents to take up the franchise.[70] Despite the attractive, and differing, justifications for this interpretation, and the fact that such recruitment pressure was indeed exerted in the fifteenth century, in 1309 it seems that what was prohibited was rather the requirement that non-burgess residents buy annual licences if they wished to retail or wholesale goods.

That the Lynn accusations are much the same as those from other boroughs leads one to think that financial maladministration must have been a crime general to borough rulers. Perhaps it was so, but it must be said that we have little or no evidence outside the charges themselves to back up this conclusion. Lynn is a rare case in leaving us records of the local taxations. These documents give no clear evidence - nor should we expect them to - of abuses at the turn of the century. Yet they do show two things. First, that the taxation process was not simple, for the local taxes were then the core of the borough budget; the tax exemptions of mayors, and the system of paying community debts (usually to potentiores who had provided loans, goods, or services during the year) via tax exemptions or allowances, were susceptible to misunderstanding by the uninitiated members of the community. Second, that when, in 1302, the community asserted its right to assess the tax itself, rather than by the usual committee, it proved incapable of so doing and resorted simply to repeating the assessment of the previous year - hardly a fair method, given the ups and downs of mercantile affairs.[71]

Again we hear complaint of unjust taxation in 1337 and 1375. It may be that these new taxation grievances centered on the fact that, tempore Edward I, only moveables and not realty were subject to assessment, whereas in 1375 the complaint was that the rich burgesses were refusing to pay their taxes because realty was now being taken into consideration. Complaint, by John Blower and others unnamed, to the Chancellor and subsequently to the Bishop that they had been excessively taxed in a royal subsidy, so that others could be under-assessed, resulted in disciplinary measures by the corporation: Blower was fined £20. This was a trying time for Lynn: the residents of South Lynn, jealous of their privileged neighbours, were resisting demands that they should contribute to the expenses of common defence, and complaining about the Merchant Guild's monopoly of the sale of stoneware; a faction amongst the burgesses was agitating for the promotion of St. Nicholas' from chapel to parish church - possibly a separatist movement; hostage rights were causing problems; and the community was becoming restless over the growing expense and extravagances of administration.[72]

Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

Forces for Political Change

Not only at Lynn, but at Norwich and, less obviously, at all of our other towns, the fifteenth century represents compromises - sometimes gradual, sometimes more abrupt - between the theory and reality of borough government. If these adjustments became increasingly unfavourable to the lower urban classes, we should not blame this entirely on evil intent on the part of the rulers, for it was a mostly gradual and generally subtle development of elitism. Yet, that some measure of conscious policy was involved is suggested in the occasional coincidence of political conflict and alteration in the status of upper councils from elected to life-membership bodies. This alteration was fairly clearly the goal of the potentiores in early fifteenth century Lynn and Norwich, and the period of power of the Stace/le Rente oligarchy in Ipswich was marked in its early stage by something similar - either the transition itself, or the addition to life-membership status of the device of co-optation. The Yarmouth council was life-membership by 1386, and the same ambition may have played a role in the crisis of a decade earlier. The alteration may have been prompted by an increasing awareness of the possibilities for self-interested use of power, although it seems more likely that the ruling class feared (perhaps justifiably) the harmful effects that might result from the intrusion of the less capable[\[114\]](#) townsmen into decision-making. Thus, the Norwich potentiores in 1415 were resisting what they feared, perhaps mistakenly, was a demand by "every person of the smallest reputation" of the city to have as much say in government as "the more sufficient persons". The same fear and resentment was expressed by Lynn's potentiores representative, John Wentworth, in August 1412, when complaining to the Bishop that the new freemen, made to increase the strength of the reformers within the electorate, were mere shoemakers and tailors of whom 20 or so were worth only a penny.[\[115\]](#)

However, it is dangerous to suggest too much uniformity to the characters of the political conflicts occurring in separate locations at different times. Popular objection to the unauthorised use, or more often the unjust and self-interested use, of power may have been a common basis to most of these affairs; but each is complicated by one or more of: personal ambitions, family rivalries, power-struggles between established aristocracies and the nouveaux riches, interference by magnates or other external interests, or even the duplicity of the king wishing to restore peace to local government without upsetting the tradition of aristocratic rule. Would the Ipswich crisis of 1320/1 have arisen without the forceful character of John de Halteby to propel it? Would the popular concerns in Lynn, tempore Henry V, have come to a head if the town had been under the lordship of the king alone? We cannot say for sure. Historical events are what they are, complex causal equations; we can analyze and differentiate the components, but we cannot know whether one or more selected components, if operating independently of the others, would produce the same result. However, one thing we may be more confident of is that the ideals of aristocratic rule and peaceful government were not only held by the king, but also were firmly implanted in the political philosophy (such as it was) of townsmen. This fact helps explain why political crises in English boroughs were not as revolutionary and drastic in character as those on the continent, and why, in the long run, borough governments evolved into closed corporations.

87 Reliance has been placed primarily on the H.M.C. report, which printed mainly the more formal documents relating to the constitutional conflict. A major source of information - a formulary/chronicle/letter book compiled by the town clerk (KL/C10/2) in the reign of Henry V - was used in 1812 by Richards (who misread several entries) but was not known to later students of Lynn's history.

Morey's statement that the attack on episcopal officials in 1402 was made by a group which cut across class boundaries is misleading; of the 24 accused, 14 were jurats that year, one was town clerk, one chamberlain, 3 or 4 became jurats prior to 1411, and 2 others were almost certainly supporters of the potentiores; C.Cl.R. 1399-1402, 575.

89 Copies of which are included in KL/C10/2 ff.9b-12 and KL/C2/27, the latter the source of the transcript in the H.M.C. report (pp.191-93); both the transcript and the former copy contain a few errors. 94 By comparison, the Common Council of 1420 comprised 13 merchants, 12 artisans, and 2 unknown.

95 Mediocris: 36 merchants, 12 artisans, 38 unknown; inferiores: 7 merchants, 115 artisans, 10 professionals (mostly barbers and sailors, but also a lawyer, a scrivener, and an illuminator), 36 unknown. Of the unknown inferiores 16 have occupational surnames (15 artisan), some of which almost certainly indicate occupation accurately.

97 E.g. the refusal of the jurats to be sworn in on 29 August 1412, to protest the unorthodox electoral proceedings; but even the records, made by a town clerk who slightly favoured the potentiores, admit that the proceedings were supported by the majority (178 persons) of townsmen then present; KL/C6/3 m.18.

111 Since financial maladministration was the basis of popular grievances. In this the Common Council fits nicely into the reform tradition emphasising checks and balances on executive control over borough revenues.

112 That only freemen could serve in borough offices was a principle that even the reformers did not question.

Conclusion

At the close of this study, if one thing is evident it is that there is no simple, or single, label that will serve to categorise the government of boroughs in the later Middle Ages. We can certainly find examples of oligarchies in the boroughs: the period of power of Stace and le Rente in Ipswich is a clear case, assuming the charges laid against them to be accurate (as they seem); and there is at least a suggestion of oligarchic ambition in the behaviour of the rulers of Norwich and Lynn in the late fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries. Yet it would be dangerous to assume that these, the more conspicuous affairs in the boroughs' political history, were other than interludes in a normally more restrained, more harmonious relationship between rulers and ruled. It is precisely in the context of extreme political developments that we find the most forceful expressions of popular objection.^[1] Study of the governing personnel - for government itself is an abstract when separated from the men who interpreted and directed it - reveals a diversity which makes categorisation difficult: such is the stuff of history. At this point in historiographical time, the historian must be concerned, not with attempting to characterise borough government generally, but with the nature of the governments in individual boroughs. Some general suggestions and conclusions may be offered here, but it must be borne in mind that they depend largely on the evidence from only a handful of examples not necessarily 'typical'.

Evidence has been presented to show that the political hierarchy may be overlaid with hierarchies of wealth and age. Yet an attempt to classify the borough rulers as a plutocracy or a patriarchy would swiftly founder on presentation of contradictory examples which cannot be dismissed as exceptions to the rule. Occasionally, relatively young men attained high position in the political hierarchy, and men of apparently only moderate means mixed with the richest townsmen in the same positions. Nor would it be difficult to point to burgesses, qualified by wealth and by the experience of age, whose participation in government was negligible or non-existent. Even were either or both of the above labels applicable, this would not necessarily be helpful in understanding the character of borough politics. If men in executive office or in the upper levels of the conciliar structure tended to be the older members of the community, this owes much to the time required to work one's way through the hierarchy of offices - a hierarchy that became increasingly elaborate and formal as the ranks of officialdom grew - combined with the comparatively low average life-expectancy. In a community where the number of qualified (i.e. enfranchised) persons was quite small to begin with, the group in whose hands the real power of decision lay seems more a class of survivors than a senatorial elite monopolising government to the unjust exclusion of others.

Similarly, wealth was no formal pre-requisite for office, but there were good practical reasons why the wealthier townsmen were the heaviest participants in government. Wages of service were not commensurate to the outlay in terms of personal expense and, more importantly, time which would otherwise be spent in making a living. Illicit profits from service were not as great in borough as in royal office, and the risks involved in taking such profits could be borne only by those already wealthy enough to buy their way back into favour. There is a good measure of truth in the medieval saying that "Pore be hangid by the neck; a rich man bi the purs."^[2] Ample evidence remains to indicate the unpopularity of office-holding, although precisely how general was this attitude it is difficult to say. There was certainly a small number of townsmen who actively courted office; and a somewhat larger group may be said at the least to have acquiesced in their repeated election to high office. These were the backbone of urban government. It may be that they did desire and pursue office, but this can remain only a hypothesis when our records are not so intimate as to reveal the behind-scenes machinations of politics. And, on the whole, it is not a hypothesis that one is inclined to accept readily. Office was probably seen by most as a burden; although the growing consciousness, towards the close of the Middle Ages, of its enhancement of social prestige and of the advantages of manipulating justice and administration^[3] alleviated this to an extent. However, it was recognised that the duties of administration must be borne, and it was clear enough that the wealthier townsmen were best able to shoulder the burden. It may even be, as Dobson suggests, that the accumulation of great wealth by individuals, in the face of corporations barely able to balance their budgets, was tolerated by the community only because those individuals bore the heaviest responsibilities of protecting and preserving borough liberties and prosperity.^[4] It is reasonably clear, at least, that no man was required to serve in a position the liabilities and responsibilities of which were greater than he could manage, although every burgess was expected to participate in government to some degree - even if no more than in tithing or tax collection roles, or simply in attending assemblies.^[5]

If wealth and age were not, as such, qualifications or pre-requisites for office, a greater importance seems to have been attached to experience, skill, and wisdom. This we may conclude from the political hierarchy, structured to ensure that men who attained positions of greatest authority and responsibility had been tutored in administration and versed in the needs and resources of the borough, through holding a series of subordinate offices. We could reach the same conclusion from the specifications that officers be chosen from men of capability, faculty, and sufficiency. Clerical and legal skill was taken into consideration, for some posts more than others, but even merchants or prosperous tradesmen and artisans were believed to be qualified: worldly-wise, familiar with the workings of the courts, successful in negotiations with their fellows, able to speak for the borough to external authorities. It is not insignificant that town councils evolved, in all probability, from more hazy groups already associated with advisory functions and with rendering of judgements in some court context. We may trace professionalism back this early, in that the customary law by which the towns were largely administered was retained in the minds of these men, from whom, subsequently, executive officers were chosen to preside over newly-independent borough courts. It does not appear that all towns committed their customs to writing from the beginning; and, when they did, the lists seem not so much comprehensive as representative of the more intricate cases. Again, the single, professional town clerk particularly responsible for advising the corporation on matters of borough law - a role that sometimes specialised to the point of mutation into the office of Recorder - is not generally manifest until the early fourteenth century.

What we must always remember is that medieval men desired, above all, efficient government that promoted the well-being of the whole community while adhering to the principles of justice, consensus, and harmony. The history of medieval Italian cities shows the extremes to which townsmen might be willing to go to obtain this. Be it democracy, oligarchy, or dictatorship: the end was more important than the means; in this at least Machiavelli was well-attuned to the mainstream of lay political thought. Indeed, it is to Italy that we must look for the most explicit theorising about the qualities of government, such as to Brunetto Latini's Trésor. Lest we think that Italian city-state politics have no relevance to English urban history, we should note that extracts from Latini were included, only one generation after his work was written, in the compilation of the Liber Custumarum of London (tempore Edward II), a work that may well have been consulted by other towns seeking constitutional guidance from the mother of English cities. The extracts included a list of twelve qualities Latini held to be desirable in a good ruler,[\[6\]](#) and the London scribe of the book of customs declared them worthy of being taken into consideration when mayors of London were elected. This revealing, if idealistic, list indicates that a man chosen to rule his peers should:

- Possess a wisdom that derives from experience, which itself is the product of age.
- Possess a noble heart that leads him to conduct his life honourably; electors should not be influenced by power stemming from personal attributes or family background.
- Be committed to the principle of justice - considered a very important quality.
- Possess rationality: the ability to perceive truth, and to know what course of action is the best to follow; in other words, to be a man of intelligence.
- Be objective (as opposed to gullible); a man was to be judged by his actions, not his appearance.
- Not be covetous either of money or prestige.
- Be a good speaker, capable of diplomacy and wisdom (discretion?) in speech.
- Not be extravagant in his personal expenditure; presumably such habits would influence his expenditure of public monies.
- Not be of immoderate temper (i.e. quick to anger).
- Be rich and magnanimous; this to ensure he could not be corrupted by offer of money, preferring to give than to receive.
- Hold no other office (the concern here seems to be with division of attentions, rather than conflict of interest).
- Be faithful and loyal to God and to the people; Latini considered this as the "chief quality".

Even if it was too much to expect that any man match up to such standards, the combination of experience and of the element of paternalism in corporation policies might lead us to characterise borough government as a meritocracy.[\[7\]](#) Yet somehow this seems too approbatory a title for a group motivated, arguably, as much by self-interest as by concern for community welfare. Aristocracy may be the most acceptable description, so long as we take 'government by the best' to refer not to moral character but to capability,[\[8\]](#) and we might cautiously qualify the title as 'aristocracy of wealth' to avoid presumptions of heritability of power, which the facts do not justify.

If this is considered the nearest we can come to a classification, however imperfect, we must nonetheless return to the terms democracy and oligarchy, with which this study was begun. It is difficult to doubt that democratic principles were the foundation of the borough constitution: popular election (direct or indirect), consultation or consensus, and the accountability of officers - with the ultimate right of the community to depose officers guilty of maladministration. All these express the basic tenet of borough politics, that the community was the ultimate source of authority. This is well expressed by John de Viterbo, who was no political philosopher but rather an administrator of Florence in 1228; in his treatise on urban government he wrote (concerning consultation) that "The principle to be followed is that all shall approve matters which concern all: let the judgement of all decide the future of all."[\[9\]](#) This was as true for English as for Italian cities, and as true for the fifteenth as the thirteenth century, but let us not forget that the translation of principles into reality tends to be modified by issues of practicability. Professor Reynolds was right to doubt that urban political history displays any great trend towards or away from democracy over the course of the later medieval period.[\[10\]](#) Any search for so blatant a transition will be liable to blind students to the real significance of the actual changes, subtle, for the most part gradual, an interaction of various influences. Elements of democracy and oligarchy co-existed in urban government throughout, not uneasily, yet a measure of tension between them necessitated periodic readjustment of the constitution to find a workable balance. Modification took the form of circumscribing executive power through the elaboration of constitutional checks[\[11\]](#) and emphasis on accountability, while at the same time restrictions were being placed on direct popular involvement in decision-making. Yet to interpret this latter trend as the growth of oligarchy would be to ignore the larger numbers, drawn from a broader social spectrum, participating in government in the fifteenth century. Perhaps, in the last resort, the changes reduce to a growth in consciousness of the classes composing the urban populace: consciousness of their relationships, their differing interests, and the role of government in shaping and reconciling the same, as well as of government itself not merely as a necessary function but as a corporate entity. Experimentation and more detailed, precise definition are prominent features of urban constitutional development.

If democratic principles were modified - even consciously subverted in some cases, it might be possible (although not easy) to argue - the aim was to bring the theory of borough government more in line with the equally long-established practice. The reconciliation of democratic and aristocratic elements in government was not to the medieval townsman the incongruity it might seem to the modern mind; indeed, it was felt that government at its best combined aspects of monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy.[\[12\]](#) Latini's list of desirable attributes of rulers suggests a realization that the quality of government depended more on the character of leaders than on the soundness of governmental institutions (whereas in the Church the opposite theory held sway). Aristocratic and democratic elements both had long traditions, the latter in the folk moot,[\[13\]](#) the former in the informal proto-conciliar groups that we posit as influential in administration even prior to the epoch of self-government. The crystallisation of those groups into formal councils may have been intended to bring the men of influence in the borough under some degree of popular control. On the other hand, we cannot dismiss the possibility that, in some cases at least, councils evolved by expanding the sphere of operations of existing bodies.[\[14\]](#) Within the borough council lay the seeds of change. The achievement of life-membership status, when combined with co-optative electoral methods, removed what was effectively the decision-making section of the community from popular control (short of revolution). And it ruined an original purpose of the council in representing the community-at-large in government; although it is difficult to believe that early councils could ever have been genuinely representative, given the conditions mentioned above favouring office-holding by the urban upper class. The consequence of this change, distancing the original council membership from popular control,^[15] was the creation of second councils to represent the community. The model of the two-tiered parliament, with its estates of lords and commons, was perhaps not so far from the minds of the ruling class, and terminology of the fifteenth century seems to reflect this somewhat. Although two councils served to institutionalise rather than heal the division between classes/estates, while the lower council remained under popular electoral control the effective role of democracy in borough government remained pretty much at the level it had been before. Since the executive was selected from the personnel of the upper councils, the change also increased his independence from popular control, particularly given the division of electoral authority (in Norwich and Lynn) between the two enfranchised estates.

Equally important in undermining democratic principles was the evolution of the executive committee, a feature even more common to our towns than change in the status of the upper council. This elite had no formal place in the fifteenth century constitutions and was therefore not subject to direct control. Yet there seems no doubt that it was the most influential group in government: at it, rather than the council generally, was aimed the Lynn reform movement of the early fifteenth century; at Colchester it came to control the aldermannic positions in the council, and at Maldon it had completely displaced the wardemen as the decision-making body by the mid-sixteenth century; at Ipswich it formed the majority in the comparatively small council of portmen. Since experience was valuable in borough government, it is easy to see how the executive committee, which dominated assembly meetings in terms of visibility, could have dominated decision-making. It is not as easy to judge how important a contribution to this development were the judicial powers accorded to the elite by the king in his expansion of the royal network of local administration. What we see therein is another of the contradictions in the urban constitution: the application of both ascending and descending theories of authority; the strong role of the monarchy in England checked not only the degree of urban independence, compared to continental towns, but also the application of populist theories to borough government.

When we look beyond purely political developments for causes of change, the waters grow murkier. Economic and demographic deterioration from the late fourteenth century have been used to explain seemingly oligarchic developments. However, the so-called 'urban decline' is itself a questionable phenomenon, not necessarily general; East Anglia perhaps weathered the storm better than most areas,^[16] although even the fortunes of the towns studied here varied widely. Yet if the gulf between classes was not still widening, certainly an awareness of the gulf (of its size, rather than its existence) was awakening in the consciousness of townsmen. In the growth of ceremony we see not only the formal expression of social superiorities, but also the whole gamut of social relationships; ceremony, while it pointed out the differences, also attempted to demonstrate the binding ties that made the notion of community a reality.^[17]

The segments of this community were interdependent: the rulers were relied on for benevolent and efficient government, and the ruled for obedience, since the power of urban administrations was less coercive than consensual. Had class antagonisms been as intense as some have claimed, there would surely be more evidence than we find of violent conflict in the boroughs?

The normally peaceful course of borough politics suggests that government largely conformed to expectations of aristocracy rather than oligarchy. It is difficult to justify charges of monopolisation of office when we look closely at the evidence. The component families of the urban upper class were linked by intermarriage and common interests - not least, admittedly, the desire to preserve the status quo - but there was a good deal of rivalry and of diversity in backgrounds too. Merchants may have predominated, but artisans and professionals were not meagrely represented, and we have also the more nebulous land-owning interest. Furthermore, individuals tend not to fit so neatly into any of these individual categories to the point where we might hypothesise a clearly delineated division, and conflict, of interests. To try to identify an elite of families monopolising government would produce a group so large that, when compared to the enfranchised population, it would hardly appear an elite at all. Besides, such a task would be quickly frustrated by the mobility within the ranks of the ruling class. For the many reasons enumerated elsewhere in this study, the ruling families were not even coming close to maintaining their representation in government from one generation to the next, and there was plenty of room for new men, either immigrating in a generally promotional pattern from smaller communities, or rising from lower ranks of the borough community. For a man of capability and ambition, no matter what his background, there was no serious obstacle to him rising to the pinnacle of borough society and government. The structured promotionalism of the administrative hierarchy, with promotion dependent partly on popular will, is itself a sign of the open character of medieval urban government.

If the effective exercise of power devolved upon a relatively small group, this is a feature common to political systems and not incompatible with democracy. It is too easy to condemn the past by using as a yardstick the standards of modern western democracies. Yet, in fact, one might be hard-pressed to find a fundamental difference between the political systems of the medieval borough and the parliamentary democracies of western nations of the twentieth century. Consider the following characteristics:

- no direct control over the government, except at election time;
- restriction of electoral rights to those who have taken up citizenship;
- no direct control over selection of the executive;
- upper council not elected, but appointed by other members of the government, generally for life, and chosen on the basis of superior experience and wisdom;
- actual power of day-to-day government concentrated in the hands of an executive committee, over whose selection the electorate has minimal control;
- a promotional system, whereby politicians work their way through the ranks and are evaluated for leadership roles partly on a basis of their experience in government;
- participation in office-holding by only a minority of those qualified;
- the tendency for political leaders to be persons who have acquired wealth and/or status

- in other walks of life;
- the cult of the leader as the focal point of popular expectations of government;
- popular participation at governmental assemblies prohibited (except by invitation), and a representation system imposed instead;
- decisions of highest importance rarely referred back to the community;
- an emphasis on financial accountability, through formal auditing procedures and/or auditing officers;
- periodic public complaints about excessive taxation, government corruption, or misuse of public funds.

Are these more (or less) applicable to the medieval than to the modern situation? Plus ça change, plus c'est le même chose.

If we are hardly in a position to criticize the fact of power devolving to small groups of borough rulers, nor should we assume that efforts of governmental elites to strengthen their hold on power were necessarily inspired by corrupt motives. The pressure imposed by the community for profitable government, and pressure from the king for peaceful and orderly rule, likely provided sufficient impetus in themselves. A number of factors, more naturalistic than sinister, might be suggested to explain why, as the later Middle Ages progressed, there was a clamping down on democratic impulses inherent in the concept of the borough as a community of peers. In part it was a perhaps inevitable consequence of the general formalising, legalising, and bureaucratising of government: a tendency to emphasise structure and procedures. This encouraged a 'closed shop' approach which favoured orderliness. At the same time, government is, by its nature, a response to problems facing society. If life went on entirely harmoniously, we would need government for very little. As borough governments faced problems and crises, their members doubtless felt the need to exercise greater control over the course of events - not least in order to protect themselves from blame if things got out of hand and came to the king's attention. So they wished to concentrate power in their own hands, and subdue the unruly power of the community. A further factor might be that at the beginning of independent borough government, in the early thirteenth century, burgesses looked inward - at the commune - for the answers about how to govern themselves. By the fifteenth century, there was a growing sense of the larger sphere - the development of parliament and the war with France perhaps playing significant roles here - of nationalism; in the national sphere the dominant model for government was King and Council, with a representative assembly to petition and assent.

Since the proof of the pudding was in the eating, constitutional change was not obnoxious even to the conservative townsman. We need not resort to burgess apathy to explain changes apparently detrimental to popular rights; apathy is never easy to gauge, but it seems that the townsmen's interests were aroused when occasion warranted. Voluntary acquiescence seems a better explanation, although it is true that an otherwise unorganised populace may have relied on the appearance of leaders before underlying discontent could find forceful expression.^[18] How far we may trust those expressions for an accurate picture of misgovernment is uncertain, for popular complaints are complicated by personal ambitions, group rivalries, and perhaps also misunderstandings of administrative procedures. Furthermore, resolution of the conflicts too often are not recorded, or were forestalled by the purchase of pardons (not in themselves a certain admission of guilt), or produced settlements so moderate in nature as to suggest that problems were not perceived as being deep-rooted in the constitutional arrangement. Indeed, rightly or wrongly, complaints were directed at erring rulers more than at the system itself, for the error was seen as basic human failing. Perhaps it was, for our investigation of the illegal activities of the ruling personnel shows, if not a prevalent, then an unfortunate degree of opportunism, corruption, and disregard for the law and for the principle of rule by law. Yet, in a society where self-interest and self-help were almost essential to success in life, governmental failings were not to be eradicated by the exchange of one set of ruling personnel for another. The temptations towards abuse of office were greater than many could resist; even the best-intentioned were susceptible to the corrupting influence of power or, by association with others less reputable, were entrapped in a web of events beyond their control. One who had cause to know left this poignant epitaph for the medieval politician:

Owt of the slimy mud
Shall mire himself, and hardly scape
The swelling of the flood. [19]

- 13 We need not look to the spurious lex regia or the Aristotelian revival for the foundations of medieval democracy, despite some possible influence on the Italian communal movement. Similarly, whilst trained lawyer John Tilney may have been familiar with the populist theory of Bartolus of Sassoferrato, it is futile and unnecessary to speculate on how this may have influenced the reform movement in early fifteenth century Lynn.

14 E.g. Lynn's Great Jury for pleas of land, and Maldon's leet presenters.

15 Deposition of individual members remained theoretically possible, although this now lay largely with the executive; but removal of councillors en masse could not have been achieved peacefully.

APPENDIX I

The Officers of Borough Government

Lists of Office-holders 1272-1460

Lists of executive personnel have been compiled by earlier students for all of the towns falling under this study, excepting Maldon. Notably:

- by Harrod (Calendar of Court Rolls ...) for Colchester, where the Red Parchment Book fortunately provides an almost complete list from the reign of Edward III;
- by Bacon and Martin (Borough and Merchant Community ...) for Ipswich;
- again by Harrod (Report on the Records of Lynn) for Lynn;
- by Hudson ("Revised list ...") for Norwich;
- and by Palmer and Saul for Yarmouth.

The Return of the Names of Every Member ... is the basic source for lists of parliamentary burgesses. Le Strange (Norfolk Official Lists) also published lists of parliamentary burgesses and executives of Norwich, Lynn, and Yarmouth, largely based on some of the above sources.

As existing lists for Norwich are, for the most part, correct and complete, they have not been repeated here. It has been possible to make corrections and additions to the lists for Colchester, Ipswich, Lynn, and Yarmouth, however, which are therefore entered in full. With the exception of Norwich, lists of financial officers have not been previously published and consequently are included here.

Except in the case of Yarmouth, original records rather than the published lists form the foundation of the compilations below. Where names in the latter deviate from those in the former, faith may be placed in the lists herein provided, although it has sometimes been necessary to make judgements between conflicting evidence. Very occasionally, earlier lists have included names which I have been unable to trace in the records; these have been accepted, tentatively, where they seem reasonable. Lists for Ipswich tempore Henry VI, published by Bacon, were drawn partly from a volume not now extant; but evidence from other records suggests Bacon's lists to be accurate on the whole.

N.B. that where a name is placed in parentheses it designates that the man replaced the person listed immediately before (for reasons of death or dismissal) during the term of office.

APPENDIX III Parliamentary Representation

Certain qualifications must be noted with regard to this analysis. "Re-election" is to be understood in the broader sense, not according to the more strict meaning of election to an immediately succeeding parliament; for justification of this usage, see J.G. Edwards, "Re-election and the medieval parliament," History, II (1926), 204-05.

By "high office" is meant the executive (including Ipswich coroners and Maldon constables), financial officers, and town clerks. For Yarmouth, the figure of 17 in column T, for 1295-1349, ought perhaps to be reduced to 15, as Godfrey de Colneye and William de Gaysele may have briefly served as town clerks.

Maldon is not known to have been represented in parliament before 1332. Due to the paucity of borough records before 1383, the analysis in columns O-T for Maldon, 1350-99, is based on incomplete evidence; and the figures in columns O and P might be more accurate if reversed.

Evidence regarding the identity of administrative personnel in Colchester is unsatisfactory prior to the reign of Edward III; so statistics in columns O-U for the period 1295-1349 should be viewed with caution. Again, for most of the medieval period the membership of Ipswich's portmen council is uncertain; figures for all periods in columns Q, R, and U are therefore likely to be too low, and those in column T too high.

Figures in columns A-K for London, Bristol, and York are given for the sake of comparison; they are taken from McKisack, Parliamentary Representation of English Boroughs, 40-42, 64.

OF THE ASSISE OF NOVEL DISSEISIN

How possession lost by wrongful force may be restored by the assise of novel disseisin.

[005] how, once acquired, it may be taken and lost, without his consent, by wrongful force.
[006] [Then] how and by what action [possession] so lost may be restored to the person [007] despoiled, for no one ought to be disseised of his free tenement without judgment, nor [008] put to answer for it without the precept of the lord king and without writ.² First we [009] must see how and in what ways a disseisin is committed, then the kind of remedy
[010] available, at once or after a time, ³<[and then] what punishment follows.> [Something] [011] must first be known of the trespass or injuria and the nature of the act, [012] that the kind of remedy and the punishment that follows may then more readily be [013] understood. <In this action of novel disseisin, which arises ex maleficio, one seeks the [014] thing itself and the penalty ([which] is personal)⁴ as [in the action] vi bonorum raptorum,⁵ [015] and also the damages he sustained during the spoliation.⁶ The penalty is [016] threefold:⁷ one because of the spoliation against the peace, for which a corporal
[017] punishment is exacted, another because of the wrongful detention, for which a [018] pecuniary penalty is exacted, and also an added penalty, arising out of custom not [019] right, that the principal disseisor, he alone, not the others, though all are convicted [020] by the assise, give⁸ the sheriff an ox.>⁹ A disseisin is committed not only when one is [021] himself driven out of his tenement, of whatever kind, violently, wrongfully and without [022] judgment, or when his procurator or members of his household, in seisin in his [023] name, are so ejected, but also if, when ¹⁰he has gone to market or into foreign parts, [024] no one left in possession, another enters and refuses to admit him on his return,¹¹ or [025] when he attempts to enter, by himself or with the help of others, forcibly repels him.

[026] A disseisin is committed not only where one ejects the true lord himself, his procurator [027] or his household, or refuses to admit him or repels him on his return, but also where [028] he prevents him, or his procurator or his household, though still in possession, from [029] using [the tenement] at all, or

Medieval Sourcebook: The Assizes of Bread, Beer, & Lucrum Pistoris

[Arkenberg Introduction]

*The Assize of Bread and Beer (including the Lucrum Pistoris), only takes the form found in the printed Statutes of the Realm in 6% of all Common Law English statute books written up to 1350. More often the three component parts, the Assize of Bread, the Assize of Beer, and the Lucrum Pistoris, appear alone in the statute books as separate instruments. Occasionally, though, the Assize of Bread and the Assize of Beer show up combined in a single instrument--the Assize of Bread and Beer. But in this instance, the Lucrum Pistoris still stands alone as a separately-titled instrument. Together or separately these three instruments appear in over half of all statute books written. Their popularity should not surprise. First issued in various forms during the reign of Henry II, with variations in form and issuance dates down to that of Edward II (See: G. J. Turner, "Some Thirteenth Century Statutes. II," Law Magazine and Review, 4th ser., 22 (1897): 240-250, p. 241), the three regulated the price, weight, and quality of the bread and beer manufactured and sold in town, village, and hamlet (See: Alan S. C. Ross, "The Assize of Bread," Economic History Review, 2d ser., 9 (1956): 332-342, pp. 332, 334; R. H. Hilton, A Medieval Society: The West Midlands at the End of the Thirteenth Century (London, 1966), pp. 230-231; Judith M. Bennett, Women in the Medieval English Countryside: Gender and Household in Brigstock Before the Plague (Oxford, 1987), p. 120; Bolton, Medieval English Economy, pp. 127-128; Helen M. Cam, The Hundred and The Hundred Rolls: An Outline of Local Government in Medieval England (London, 1930; reprint ed., 1963), pp. 211-212).*

Assisa Panis (Assize of Bread): When a Quarter of Wheat is sold for 12d., then Wastel Bread of a farthing shall weigh £6 and 16s. But Bread Cocket of a farthing of the same grain and bultel, shall weigh more than Wastel by 2s. And Cocket Bread made of grain of lower price, shall weigh more than Wastel by 5s. Bread made into a Simnel shall weigh 2s. less than Wastel. Bread made of the whole Wheat shall weigh a Cocket and a half, so that a Cocket shall weigh more than a Wastel by 5s. Bread of Treet shall weigh 2 wastels. And bread of common wheat shall weigh two great cockets.

When for 20s., then for 6s. 9d. $\frac{3}{4}$

And it is to be known, that then a Baker in every Quarter of Wheat, as it is proved by the King's Bakers, may gain 4d. and the Bran, and Two Loaves for advantage [for the furnace?] for Three Servants, 1d. ob. for Two Lads, ob. in Salt, ob. for kneading, ob. for Candle, q. for Wood, 2d. for his Bultel ob.

Assisa Cervisie (Assize of Beer): When a quarter of Wheat is sold for 3s. or 3s. 4d. and a Quarter of Barley for 20d. or 2s., and a Quarter of Oats for 16d., then Brewers in cities ought and may well afford to sell two gallons of beer or ale for a penny, and out of cities to sell 3 [or 4?] gallons for a penny. And when in a town 3 gallons are sold for a penny, out of a town they ought and may sell four; and this Assize ought to be holden throughout all England.

Lucrum Pistoris (Gain of the Baker): And if a Baker or Brewer be convicted that they have not kept the foresaid Assizes, the First, Second and Third time they shall be amerced, according to the Quantity of their offence; and that as often as a Baker shall offend in the weight of a farthing loaf of bread not above 2s. weight, that then he be amerced as before is said; but if he exceed 2s. then he ought to undergo the judgment of the Pillory without any redemption of money. In like manner shall it be done if he offend oftentimes and will not amend, then he shall suffer the Judgment of the Body, that is to say, the Pillory if he offend in the weight of a farthing loaf under two shillings weight as is aforesaid. Likewise the woman brewer shall be punished by the Tumbrell, trebuchet, or castigatorie, if she offend divers times and will not amend.

Judicium Pillorie (The Judgment of the Pillory)

[Arkenberg Introduction]

The Judgment of the Pillory provided the articles for inquests into violations of the assizes of bread and beer, weights and measures, and forestalling. It appears in about of quarter of the Common Law statute books written through the mid-14th century.

If a Baker or a brewer be convicted, because he has not observed the Assize of Bread and Beer, the first, second, and third times, he shall be amerced according to his offence; if it be not over-grievous; but if the offence be grievous and often, and will not be corrected, then he shall suffer punishment of the body, that is to wit, a baker to the pillory, and a brewer to the tumbrel, or some other correction.

First, six lawful men shall be sworn truly to gather all measures of the town, that is to wit, bushels, half and quarter bushels, gallons, pottles, and quarts, as well of taverns as of other places; measures and weights, that is to wit, pounds, half pounds, and other little weights, wherewith bread of the town or of the court is weighed; that is to say, one loaf of every sort of bread. And upon every measure, bushel, weight, and also upon every loaf, the name of the owner distinctly written; and likewise they shall gather the measures of mills. After which thing done, twelve lawful men shall swear to make true answer to all such things as shall be demanded of them in the King's behalf upon articles here following; and such things as be secret, they shall treat of secretly, and answer privately. And the bailiffs shall be commanded to bring in all the bakers and brewers with their measures, and all things under written.

First, they shall inquire the price of wheat, that is to wit, how a quarter of the best wheat was sold the last market day, and how the second wheat, and how the third; and how a quarter of barley and oats.

After, how the baker's bread does answer in his court, that is to wit, wastel and other bread after wheat of the best, or of the second, or of the third price.

Also upon how much increase or decrease in the price of wheat a baker ought to change the assize and weight of his bread.

Also how much the wastel of a farthing ought to weigh, and all other manner of bread, after the price of a quarter of wheat that they present.

And for default in the weight of the bread, a baker ought to be amerced, or to be judged unto the pillory, according to the law and custom of the court.

Also if any steward or bailiff, for any bribe, does release punishment of the pillory and tumbrel, being already judged, or to be judged of right.

Also if they have in the town a pillory of convenient strength, as appertains to the Liberty of their market, which they may use, if need be, without bodily peril either of man or woman.

After, they shall inquire of the Assize and price of wine, after the departure of the justices in eyre, or of them that were last in office of the market of the town; that is to say, of the Vintner's names, and how they sell a gallon of wine: and if any corrupted wine be in the town, or such as is not wholesome for man's body.

Also of the assize of Beer in the court of the town how it is, and whether it be observed; and if not, how much [how many?] brewers have sold contrary to the assize; and they shall present their names distinctly and openly, and they shall be amerced for every default, or be judged to the tumbrel, if they sell contrary to the assize.

Also if there be any that sell by one measure, and buy by another. Also if any do use false yards, weights, or measures.

And if any butcher do sell contagious flesh, or that died of the murrain. Also they shall inquire of Cooks that seethe flesh or fish with bread or water, or any otherwise, that is not wholesome for man's body, or after that they have kept it so long that it loses its natural wholesomeness, and then seethe it again, and sell it; or if any do buy flesh of Jews, and then sell it to Christians.

When a quarter of barley is sold for two shillings, then four quarts of beer shall be sold for a penny; when for two shillings sixpence, then seven quarts of beer shall be sold for tuppence; when for three shillings, then three quarts for one penny; when for three shillings sixpence, then five quarts for tuppence; when it is sold for four shillings, then two quarts at one penny. And so from henceforth the prices shall increase and decrease after the rate of sixpence.

There shall be 4 chamberlains, to be chosen on August 29 in this manner, that is: two of them to be chosen in the same election that chooses the bailiffs (as is written in the article about that election); and the other two shall be chosen the same day by the bailiffs and the 24, after the election [of bailiffs] has been made, before everyone leaves the community house – they are to be [selected] from the wisest and most able and diligent of the 48, for the profit of the town. At least 2 of the chamberlains shall continue [i.e. be reappointed] in that office for two or three years [running] if they are found to be profitable for the town. The chamberlains shall duly and honestly collect, or make to be collected and levied with the support and help of the bailiffs, all kinds of rents, farms, fines, amercements, customs by water and by land, and all murages, wrecks, strays, penalties, forfeitures and all other duties due the town, or belonging to it by right, and [shall] safely keep them in the box [i.e. treasury]. At least 2 of the chamberlains shall sit in court every day of session, to collect and receive all manner of fines, amercements and customs, as they are brought in by the officers to be put in the box, and [shall] honestly keep them for the profit of the town. With the money thus collected and received, the chamberlains shall pay each year all types of costs, such as by right must be paid by advice of the bailiffs in discharging the town [of its responsibilities]. The chamberlains shall be ready each year with their [account] books to come before bailiffs and auditors, on a day assigned them, and to give an honest account of all profits, revenues and receipts collected by them and [expenditures] paid, according to their oath.

Political theory

Relatively few medieval philosophers focused their attention on political aspects of human activity. For most, power structures and the task of government were an integral part of a larger picture of the relationships between Man and Nature and between Man and God. It was not until the Late Middle Ages that we begin to see the notion emerging that political science might be something worthy of study in its own right, and then it was less from an abstract perspective than from observing actual practice and trying to rationalize this within existing theory and norms.

That being the case, we can hardly expect to find explicit statements of political doctrine issuing from pragmatic townsmen, few of whom had much formal education. For the most part, we have to infer their political views and values from the way they acted, the institutions and procedures they put in place, and the way they expressed themselves in documents related to the operation of government – documents such as charters of liberties, borough customs and the by-laws that succeeded them, and records of legal disputes. Even here we are treading on uncertain ground, for most of the documents that have come down to us are official records, undetailed, formulaic, and impersonal; we cannot be sure whether (or to what extent) they reflect the political attitudes of the general populace or superimpose the terminology and perspectives of the clerics and lawyers who drafted them. Historians tend to rely on political crises to bring forth something more than the routine expressions of political viewpoints, but here again it is hard to know whether what was said in the heat of conflict represents everyday opinion. Nor should we automatically assume that principles, whether explicit or implicit, were necessarily upheld in practice.

Uneducated townsmen may have been, but stupid they were not. It would be a mistake to assume that they acted solely out of self-interest, or were driven purely by some kind of social and/or economic determinism, in developing their political institutions and behaviours. They did not operate in an ethical vacuum or independent of the larger political context of lordship. The Church promoted values such as peace and justice which had political dimensions, and the State (itself a relatively modern concept with limited applicability to the medieval period) had structures for formulation of law and the administration of justice that embedded political values. While we cannot be certain that the laymen to whom these were preached or on whom they were imposed shared these values, it is unlikely they were unaffected by them.

Nonetheless, the concepts historians have liked to use as yardsticks to characterize urban government – notably democracy and oligarchy – were not available for most of the Middle Ages, and even when they became so were largely the preserve of philosophers. In applying such concepts retrospectively we inevitably risk a present-minded interpretation of the past. However, although many values were shared, there was not a uniformity in political outlook within medieval urban society. Those medieval thinkers who wrote on, or around, politics reveal a range of ideas so that it would be hard to point to a political orthodoxy; we can expect a corresponding diversity of ideas, if less developed and less articulated, to have existed among the masses.

During the High Middle Ages philosophers naturally focused on autocratic systems and on issues such as authority and sovereignty, as a medieval world emerged in which popes, emperors and kings were key players. It was necessary to define the relationship within Christendom between these players, and the relationship of each with their subjects. But the twelfth century, in particular, saw the rise of urban communities with some measure of political autonomy (the degree varying from place to place within Europe) and with increasingly complex societies and internal power relationships. One of the more prominent of the traditional conceptualizations of medieval society, differentiating three orders – those who fought, those who worked, and those who prayed – was as early as ca. 1100 being seen by some as needing modification, through addition of a fourth order: townspeople. But even within that fourth order there was not homogeneity. The growth of long-distance trade and the harnessing of rural and urban resources to fuel such trade, population growth prompting increased immigration into towns, and the integration of towns into the administrative framework of larger territorial entities, all helped bring about increasing specialization of labour: traders, producers, administrators, professionals. This accentuated stratification within urban society meant that such a society would encompass a range of goals and interests that had to be channelled, resourced, and harmonized through politics. At the same time that such developments were underway in secular society, organizational diversity was becoming more marked within the Church, notably with the formation of new religious orders of a fraternal character.

These developments must have helped prepare the ground somewhat for receptivity to Aristotelian ideas, when they were rediscovered by scholars and made available in Latin around the mid-thirteenth century. To Aristotle, of course, the city was a natural political unit and (in the absence of a strong religious philosophy that had a single divinity delegating power to earthly representatives) it was easy to view the community as a source of authority, and democracy as one of several viable political options. Aristotle himself preferred timocracy, a benevolent rule by the most honorable members of society (the term was corrupted by medieval thinkers to be more akin to oligarchy, but aristocracy expresses a similar concept to the original use of timocracy). Aristotle's concepts helped medieval philosophers come to terms with emerging urban powers. Above all, attentions were focused on the city-states of northern Italy, closest in essence to those of ancient Greece; the Italian cities' efforts to assert freedom to the point of autonomy from any external authority made it necessary to produce some kind of rationalization, and some of the greatest political philosophers of the Late Middle Ages came out of that milieu. Unfortunately for us, towns in England, or elsewhere north of the Alps, received far less attention; the other side of that coin is that the work of political scientists was less likely to have any influence on the attitudes of English townspeople.

We should not think that Aristotelianism was the catalyst for a revolution in political thought. There was a long-standing foundation for the notion of the people as a source of authority, in the popular assemblies that made decisions affecting rural communities and in custom – practice given the force of law through repeated observance by a community – governing local communities. Concepts from Roman law – not least the famous maxim from Justinian that what touches all must be approved by all – also prepared the ground for Aristotelian ideas, while a growing appreciation of Ciceronian civic doctrine likewise bolstered the efforts of those integrating cities into the medieval political framework. But perhaps above all we must recognize that Christian ethics and values remained throughout the Middle Ages the foundation stone for all philosophy, political included. It was not Aristotle's convictions but more his concepts and language that were adopted and adapted for integration into established Christian thought.

This was a gradual process. Thomas Aquinas made the first major effort in the late thirteenth century; in so doing, he did much to make Aristotelianism more palatable to Christian thinkers. He took the descending theory that was inherent in Catholic orthodoxy, in which power was delegated from God, through the Pope, to princes, etc., and fused to it Aristotle's view of Nature and natural law as a source of human civilization and laws; this meant that secular government could claim to obtain its authority from God via the agency of Nature, without the intermediation of the Church. From this viewpoint, an ascending theory was possible and, without seeking to undermine the hierarchical establishment (although his ideas provided the fuel for later anti-hierocrats), Thomas acknowledged the existence of democracy in the sense of power emanating from the community: "they may elect their leaders from the people, and the election of leaders belongs to the people" [Summa Theologiae, I-ii, question 105, article 1]. It followed from this that the rulers represented the people (unless one wished to adopt the extreme view, not unknown in the Middle Ages, that election irrevocably transfers power to those elected). Although Thomas did not employ his arguments in an anti-monarchical fashion, he did follow Aristotle in concluding that the optimal form of government was a kind of limited monarchy, in which there was a dominant ruler at the head of a state but that ruler governed with the assistance and advice of the best men of the state, and through consultation with the people.

What Aquinas had started, successors extended to the logical conclusion of portraying the feasibility of sovereignty of the people. Thinkers such as John of Paris, and Marsilius of Padua moved towards the conclusion that any ruler – unless behaving tyrannically – required the consensus, or at very least the acquiescence, of the people to exercise their authority. In essence, that authority therefore derived from the people; and what the people could give, the people could take away. Bartolus of Sassoferrato and his student Baldus of Ubaldis came at the subject from a different perspective – that of legal realists observing what was going on within the Italian city-states – but arrived at essentially the same conclusion: that the will of the people was source of authority for law, simply because their consent to be subject to the law was the basis for its effectiveness. Observing that customary (unwritten) law was founded on the tacit consent of the community, Bartolus argued that the explicit consent of the people could equally well give rise to new, written laws; thereby, since government was viewed essentially as the formulation, application, and enforcement of laws, a people could be self-governing within its own territory.

There was thus a dichotomy, or perhaps ambiguity would be a kinder description, in the political system of medieval Europe. Descending and ascending theories of authority co-existed necessarily. Even though autocracy was the most conspicuous form of government, fostered by the requirement for wide-territory authority maintained partly by military might, by the inheritance of imperial ambitions, and by the theocratic underpinnings of the Church, there was a strong tradition of collective decision-making through institutions such as the folk moot or Church councils. Monarchs were not in a position to be absolute rulers; their coercive powers were limited. For their orders to be carried out, they relied greatly on co-operation from local authorities. Consulting with selected subjects and obtaining their consent to important acts (e.g. legislation) was a practical necessity, perhaps especially in England where the feudal character of kingship made it particularly dependent on support from at least the king's immediate (baronial) subjects. England's towns, although not in a position to aspire to the communal autonomy of some of their continental counterparts, nonetheless held some power – particularly economic – in the kingdom and the king ignored them at his peril. It was in his best interest to allow them a measure of self-government. That self-government itself reflected a political dichotomy, in which principle and practice did not always walk hand-in-hand. Even though democracy and oligarchy as such were foreign concepts to the medieval townspeople, we can see expressions of each, both in the values and in the practice of politics, sitting – sometimes comfortably, sometimes less so – side by side in the towns.

The portrayal by Bristol town clerk Robert Ricart of his home town reflects social and political perspectives that he shared with other members of urban patriciates.

Political values and attitudes

What then are some of the values and attitudes that shaped political beliefs in English towns? One of the most commonly encountered terms with political implications is that of "community". Before exploring what this meant, we must first rid ourselves of any associations with egalitarianism or libertarianism, two fundamental tenets of modern democracy. The perception that medieval society was naturally divided into orders or ranks, just as modern society is seen as class-based, was so deeply ingrained that it was little discussed and rarely challenged. The Church blessed this belief by emphasizing that all orders had an important role in contributing to the well-being of the whole; the reward for the common people being content with their lot was the levelling that would take place in the afterlife. Aristotelian ideas did not alter this, for he had acknowledged that the challenge of government was to balance the often conflicting interests of poor, rich and middle class through a system that was politically stable.

Within urban society there had probably always been a reasonably clear socio-economic differentiation and the gap between haves and have-nots became more pronounced as the economy sophisticated. Successful entrepreneurs became quite rich and invested in land purchases, partly through aspirations to rise into the ranks of the gentry and partly because those lands generated raw materials that fuelled their commerce. Meanwhile, the urban population was swelled by individuals or families lacking sufficient land for self-support, but most of these only joined the ranks of wage-labourers or the impoverished. In the middle – for the general perception was, as in Aristotle's day, that of three urban ranks – established craftsmen or small retailers tried to protect themselves from new competition, or uphold their interests against those of the mercantile element, by creating associations (which we today refer to, not strictly accurately, as guilds) that controlled access to and regulated the performance of skilled occupations. While there were no rigid barriers to social mobility, only a minority were able to make a success of themselves; for the remainder there must have been frustration or hopelessness, buried under a facade of acceptance but occasionally prepared to boil over into violence.

Where there was hierarchy there were relatively clear authority structures; everyone knew his or her place, even if that place need not be considered fixed. Hierarchy was therefore considered conducive to order (the just accommodation of social needs in a directed, non-violent fashion), and in the interests of order the Church was happy to sanctify secular authority. In most places, and certainly in England, hierarchical authority was accepted as natural. Rights were not seen as inherent to the human condition, but particular to an individual or group, acquired through specific and documentable grants from an authority or through established practice from time immemorial (although in the Middle Ages, time beyond memory sometimes meant only a generation or two). Liberty was not an idealistic, generalized principle but a pragmatic goal involving the acquisition of immunity from external authority in specific areas of jurisdiction. Charters of borough liberties were thus instruments for according rights and transferring jurisdiction, with the concomitant authority, to the towns. In those towns liberties were mainly accorded to organized groups; affiliation with such groups enabled individuals to share in the liberties. One such group was the community.

"Community" was therefore a term with political connotations; but like many medieval terms, it seems to have been used imprecisely, or with the meaning varying from one occasion to another. Sometimes applied to the urban populace at large, more often it appears to have been intended to convey those residents who had some share in the special advantages and obligations of a self-governing town, and in whose interest and for whose benefit local government acted. There followed from this its applicability to public meetings for the purpose of learning of, or giving input on, governmental decisions. Initially at least it was used to encompass both ruled and rulers. Only towards the close of the Middle Ages, when constitutional developments had led to the establishment of political estates within the larger towns, was it used in ways suggesting intentional differentiation of those two groups. Be that as it may, when the townspeople of Ipswich gathered in June 1200 to set up institutions for local self-government, what they were doing in essence was to create a political community: a consociation whose constituents agree to exercise their rights in an ordered fashion for mutual benefit; it may be significant that the term "community" in fact does not begin to be used in the record of proceedings until the key institutions were in place and empowered to act on behalf of the burgesses.

It is sometimes said that a key characteristic of medieval society is that it was organized into collectives, whether formal or informal, and that for most individuals identity came only through membership in such groups. There is some truth in this, but it is a generalization. The tithing system is one illustration of the importance of belonging to a group. Guilds and parishes are other examples of such collectives, or greater or lesser degrees of organization. There was no medieval concept of, or term for, "the individual"; legal texts instead used vaguer terms that meant "someone". And we may note that persons of the same name were differentiated by assigning them (or them taking) surnames that in most cases associated them with a larger group – whether family, occupation, or territorial unit. However, it would be wrong to think that medieval people had no sense of individualism; economic entrepreneurialism, along with preparedness to violate communal norms, provide indications that self-interest was a very real driving force. Nor should we forget that, for all its support of social structure, the Church's preoccupation was with the salvation of souls on an individual basis.

The purpose of a community was to give strength and support to individual needs and aspirations, on the assumption that such needs and aspirations were shared by members of the community, and to protect individual rights or the liberties with which the community had been endowed. It was the creation of unity (of overall purpose) out of diversity. To achieve this, it follows that any community needed and wished to organize and govern itself. At the extreme end of the concept, the "commune" was an association whose goal was to achieve independence from external authority, by force if necessary, through presenting a common front of persons bound to each other by an oath of mutual support. Often associated with revolutionary movements, the "commune" was more a continental phenomenon, only very occasionally manifesting itself in English towns; although its spectre was often raised by parties to political disturbances, charging their opponents of making "sworn confederacies". In fact the whole concept of citizenship, which required the taking of an oath of allegiance (e.g. Lynn, Ipswich), was not so very far from the communal principle. But for the most part a community was a far less revolutionary association than philosophers such as Aquinas portrayed as a desirable within society, arising from the natural human need for sociability.

If a community was an association of persons with common interests and mutual obligations, then it also followed that a "common good" could be identified. This is another concept that reflected political values of medieval townspeople; the notion is often captured in phrases talking about something being done for the benefit of the community. Individual interests were subordinated to communal interests, and private possessions could be called upon to meet communal needs (e.g. taxation). Lesser associations, such as craft guilds, might be regulated or even suppressed by government so that the interests of their members did not override those of the community at large. Just what the common good might be at any given point was, of course, open to interpretation; the concept of community might be invoked by either side in a political conflict, with those challenging the establishment using the term to infer a solidarity amongst an aggrieved populace, while those defending used it to suggest a state of orderly social relations they were trying to protect. Despite its susceptibility to interpretation, "community" was clearly intended to refer to an association imbued with some measure of political authority and capable of delegating that authority in order to administer itself. In that respect, charters granting incorporation towards the close of the Middle Ages did little more than formalize a situation long existing in the towns.

If day-to-day administration was in the hands of the upper crust of urban society, this was not inherently alarming to the rest of the community. Political authority was considered to be founded upon the law, and one of the principal tasks of government was to uphold the law. As noted above, early law (in the form of custom) had its origin in the will of the community. Those who governed were just as much subject to the law as anyone else, and faith was put in the supremacy of law – or more accurately of justice, the upholding of rights (ius). While absolute social equality may not have been a value to which townsmen subscribed – even though some custom emphasized equal opportunity – equality before the law was. It was believed all, poor or rich, should receive a fair trial – that is, procedural justice – without favouritism being shown by judges to any party, however powerful. This is evident from stipulations in officials' oaths or customs (e.g. see the several mentions of this in the setting up of self-government at Ipswich), as well as in complaints of judicial maladministration in the context of urban political conflict. The same concern with equal justice was seen in the attitude towards taxation, that it should be fairly assessed; this too was a recurring source of complaints against borough governments. Such complaints suggest that the practice of government too often did not match the ideal.

Nonetheless the ideal of rule by law was there, if perhaps less ingrained than it is today, and adherence to the principles underlying the concept of community and common good was expected to assure that. The common good had two dimensions: on the one hand, the pursuit of what was beneficial to the community in terms of meeting the material needs of members; on the other, the fostering of moral virtue. The purpose of law was to encourage moral behaviour. The view of government as a "stewardship of the rich" was based on the assumption that the wealthier members of society were worthier – that is better qualified (in part from an ethical standpoint) – to administer justice and act for the common good. Such men had a major stake in the material well-being of their community; success in life had brought them wisdom and experience in managing affairs; they had a natural authority, which came from the respect they had already earned within the community; and as men already wealthy, they could afford the time required to serve their community with minimal financial reward, and they should be capable of generosity and less susceptible to corruption. Wisdom and virtue were the qualities that it was hoped the urban upper class would bring to the administration of existing law and the formulation of new laws. Such appears to have been the theory; although to find it explicitly expounded we have to look outside England, to writers such as Brunetto Latini, we occasionally catch sight of these principles in borough documents such as officials' oaths of offices (e.g. the mayoral oath at Bristol).

Power and wealth thus went hand-in-hand with the acquiescence of the community. Since all English rulers, from kings down to bailiffs, were considered to be limited in the exercise of power by custom, law and the need to consult with the community, what was of concern was not whether government was democratic or aristocratic, but whether it was just and beneficial. An important part of the task of a just and beneficial government was to achieve and preserve peace, love and harmony across the social hierarchy which, as noted, was not itself open to question; such was the glue that held a community together.

Justice was not simply a matter of legal administration, there was also the question of social justice. It was the duty of government to protect the defenceless and provide for the needy; hence the courts showed particular concern for the rights of widows and orphans, and urban governments involved themselves in the administration and even the founding of hospitals for the sick and the impoverished. Interestingly, this may have benefitted the ruling class most, as there was a distinction between the poor worthy of charity – those downwardly mobile, having suffered from misfortune – and those unworthy, having fallen into poverty through sin or laziness. For the wider community, benevolent rule manifested itself in the provision of public facilities such as a supervised marketplace, sanitation measures, a water supply, the maintenance of roads and bridges, and police and defensive provisions. Insofar as medieval urban society was fraternalistic, it was so in the context of benevolence within a stratified society, rather than an egalitarian sense.

Not only charity, but the promotion of amicable relations was a moral duty of government; which is part of the reason why government was prepared to intervene in personal disputes to try to mediate a peaceful resolution. In a similar fashion, maintenance of peace and order (which, we must remember, was at least as much in the interest of government as in that of the governed) required that dissent not be tolerated to the point where it brought about a disruption of social or political relations. The late fourteenth and fifteenth centuries saw many urban governments specifying acceptable and unacceptable behaviours at council or community meetings.

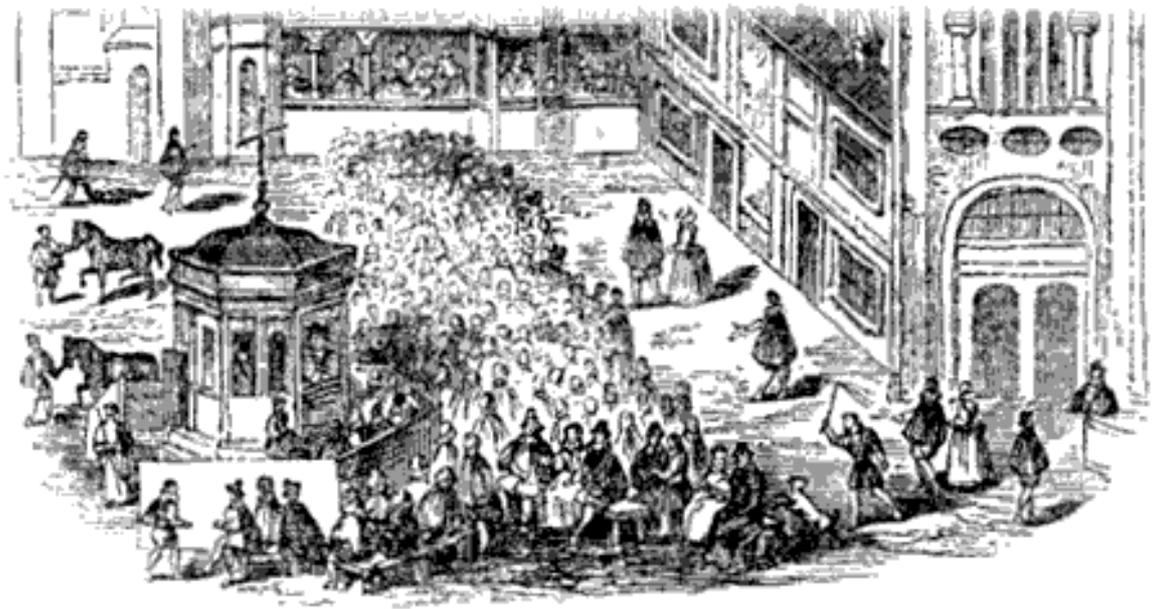

If we can see that justice, benevolence and social harmony were yardsticks according to which the quality of government was measured, it is not so easy to see how such ideas came to be infused as fundamental urban political values. It is hard to imagine that townsmen were avid readers (or rather, in most cases, the audiences of readers) of the treatises of philosophers and theoreticians such as those mentioned above. To some, perhaps a large, extent the way in which government was fashioned was dictated by a limited set of options available as solutions to problems common to most societies. The options were narrowed and defined by the context of Christianity and its moral and ethical teachings, by the emerging model of national government and the influence of that government over the developmental course of local administration, and by a long-standing tradition of communal decision-making and informal law-making.

On the other hand, we cannot entirely rule out either direct or indirect influence of some of the ideas of classical or medieval philosophers. The presence of an adapted version of Latini's tract on good government among London records, although an isolated occurrence, shows that some townsmen had enquiring minds and might see the relevance of such ideas to their own environment. This was London, of course, a law unto itself among English towns; but by the same token a source of influence and inspiration. We should remember that not all townsmen were uneducated. Clerks, notaries, lawyers became increasingly common participants in urban government during the Late Middle Ages; some are visible among reform movements that challenged the political status quo in towns, and perhaps they may be channels for populist political ideas, however diluted. The clergy itself could be influential among the townspeople to whom they preached; the level of education among the clergy varied, but ideas spread through the universities might well have filtered down to townsmen. A diversity of political viewpoints existed within the ranks of the Church; friars in particular could be relatively radical, although we should avoid reading anything sinister into the occasional use of friaries for meetings of political dissenters, while the fact that clergymen are sometimes listed among groups making political mayhem may also not be significant in regard to the introduction of populist ideas.

Another mechanism for the spread of ideas or news of political developments was travel, both by traders and pilgrims. In the case of towns that were destinations of international commerce, residents were well-positioned to learn from foreign counterparts what was going on in the communes of France or the city-states of Italy, for example. But even the smaller towns had a measure of access to these types of travellers. Nor should we ignore the filtering of political ideas through London. However, in the final resort it is probably sufficient to think that the ideas expressed by men like Latini (who was less concerned with the type of government, he incorporating concepts associable with both descending and ascending theories, than with its quality), Aquinas, or even Bartolus, were themselves shaped not only by classical forbears but by what was to them a rational interpretation of the nature of society and its political dimension; and that the same ideas might occur to others who were also, for their own reasons, preoccupied with issues of governance.

Consent and representation

If both philosophy and tradition provided grounds for an ascending theory of authority that stood in juxtaposition to the autocratic rule that, on the surface, seems more characteristic of the Middle Ages, there remains the question of how and to what extent the principle of the community as the source of authority was manifested in practice. The dichotomy between theory and practice has often led historians to dismiss the former as empty and characterize English urban governments as oligarchies. However, the seeming contradictions are perhaps of the essence of politics. That the majority of even the enfranchised male adult residents of a town had little say in the day-to-day decision-making of local government is no less true of modern democracies than it was of the medieval situation, and does not diminish a principle that is today considered in essence democratic. The idea that decision-making (that is, legislative) authority was grounded in the people was, if not a universal, then a widespread opinion for much of the Middle Ages; from this viewpoint, the role of the executive was to uphold laws authorized by the community. We may note that it was not a usual feature of borough charters to include grants of the right to make by-laws, probably because it was taken for granted – although the charters, by prescribing the scope of borough jurisdiction, defined the limits within which local legislation was valid; occasionally the explicit recognition of the town's lord was sought for such a right, but perhaps only in special circumstances dictated by particular need.

A concomitant of the people-as-source-of-authority principle was that executive officers were servants of the community, appointed by the latter to operationalize its will, expressed in a way that might better be thought of as collectively than democratically. The situation in England was of course complicated by the fact that towns, although self-governing in some respects, were also under the authority of the king; so they were subject not only to laws made locally but those imposed from above, and their executive was answerable to both community and king – the issue then became one of prioritization, and in that battle the growth of a national system of administration gradually won the upper hand. But we should not let this situation muddle us. The election of representatives to whom popular authority was delegated was a well-established principle in the medieval period, in both the secular and ecclesiastical spheres, at times applying to rulers at the highest levels of power. In fact, there was a large literature discussing elections in the ecclesiastical context and the way they transferred authority. Documents from urban archives are by contrast far more focused on procedures than principles, but it seems clear that elections were political events in which at least the entire enfranchised citizenry, if not the (male adult) community-at-large, was expected to participate, and lip-service was generally paid to the idea that officials were elected by the community, even when the actual practice was somewhat different.

For power – which requires both means and opportunity – inevitably rested on consensual at least as much as coercive foundations. This is well illustrated by events at Ipswich in 1344 [see `conflict_ipsw1.doc`], where the bailiffs felt powerless to apprehend the assassins of a prominent but unpopular townsman because the community condoned the deed and not even a handful would not support the bailiffs in the execution of their duty. It has already been noted that the English monarchy itself was reliant on consensual support from the baronial community which – as John, Henry III and Edward II discovered – was willing to resort to rebellion to restrain the king from absolutist tendencies and ensure that the nobility was properly consulted, and their advice listened to, on matters of national import requiring decisions. The barons even recognized that, in a sense, they were only representing the community of the realm; those who overthrew Edward II and Richard II made some effort to evidence popular consent for their actions. A powerful group of barons in 1258 used force to impose on the monarchy constitutional and administrative changes (the Provisions of Oxford, expanded the following year as the Provisions of Westminster), which among other things established a new consultative council that advised the king on matters of state, required the broader community to be consulted through parliaments held three times a year, controlled appointments to the major bureaucratic posts, and reformed abuses such as excessive taxation. The same sorts of concerns are seen in movements for governmental reform at the local level.

Taxation, which necessitated the infringement of the rights of the king's subjects, and legislation were in particular matters felt to require community consultation and consent, and parliament came to be the principal mechanism through which this was achieved; it was a kind of court that came to assume a conciliar role. While parliament's emergence as a regular tool of government served a number of differing ends, including the monarchy's efforts at centralizing administration, and we should beware of thinking of the medieval institution as a fundamental of democracy, it did represent for the nobility a venue through which they would be consulted and could give or withhold their support for royal initiatives, and for the common people a public forum in which their concerns and grievances could be put before the king. The king was not, constitutionally, obliged to pay attention to his barons or his commons, but he was expected to act for the common good; from a practical standpoint he required their willing assistance to govern effectively. Edward I paid explicit homage to the political principle that decisions affecting the community must be agreed to by that community.

At the local level too, taxation and legislation were types of governmental decisions felt to require community consent; it is hard to say to what extent this mirrored and to what extent it paralleled developments at the national level. Historians are not certain what are the practical implications of phrases such as "by the consent of the community", before the fifteenth century when we see the spread of lower councils intended to represent the community and give consent on its behalf. But the very fact that, prior to the introduction of those mechanisms, such phrases are almost ubiquitous in urban records of important decisions taken by the borough authorities is itself a clear indication of the perceived source of authority. Although some historians continue to argue that "urban political theory normally expressed a descending concept of political power" [Rigby and Ewan, Cambridge Urban History of Britain, 305], on the grounds that jurisdiction was accorded to executive officers by the king or other lord of the borough, this is not the view expressed in most medieval urban records. To dismiss phrases referring to community consent as rhetoric, lip-service or mere formulae simply because they are ever-present, or to assume that consent simply masked acquiescence in decisions made by an elite, is to miss the point. The rare occasions when we hear of the community rejecting proposals are suggestive that consultation may well have actually taken place, as opposed to being taken for granted, even though that consultation may have been of a yea-or-nay character, as opposed to meaningful discussion. In most cases, rejected proposals likely never saw the light of day in urban records.

At the same time, nor should we be naive enough to imagine that the community at any time took the lead in governmental decision-making, or that political assemblies were necessarily attended by the entire qualified populace, or even a majority. Today political apathy contributes to giving the community a largely acquiescent role in most political decision-making, and we should not expect higher standards from our medieval forebears. Given the belief, noted above, that government was best conducted by those of moral fibre and prudent judgement – the probi homines or prudhommes – it is most probable that the community was content to approve much of what was put before them, something that does not diminish the importance of that approval. And there is ample evidence that items of business of genuine concern to the community would draw large crowds to the town hall to hear debates and express opinions; this in itself posed a problem for government.

Consultation involved tapping into the collective wisdom of the community (a notion that increasingly fell into disrepute as the growing socio-economic divide fostered contempt for the rabble). Decisions that could be described as consensual were more likely to win adherence from the populace, and provided legitimacy for the suppression of any future opposition or resistance. There was a low tolerance for dissonance in society, for fear that dissenting opinions might lead to factionalism or violence; in the absence of strong policing mechanisms, there had to be reliance on consensual behaviour, or at least the appearance of consensus. Urban governments preferred to have it recorded that decisions were reached or elections made through unanimous agreements, and criticisms of government or any of its members were increasingly addressed through by-laws that imposed fines or, where the dissenter was unrepentant, sterner judgements to the point of exile. In the same way, higher levels of government were often reluctant to intervene in local disputes (unless a sustained breakdown of public order occurred), preferring for matters to reach an accord locally.

The impracticality of the community as an institution of government, even if its role were restricted to consultation and consent, must have been as apparent to our medieval counterparts as it is to the citizens of modern democracies. Just as authority to administer had to be delegated to executive officers, so the authority to deliberate and make decisions had to be delegated to a select number of representatives. In most if not all cases this had probably come about naturally before any constitutional provision was put down in writing. Again, it made sense in the context of medieval values for these representatives to be drawn from the prudhommes, the wiser men of the community, and the domination of town councils by such men should not fool us into thinking of urban government as oligarchic. Towards the close of the Middle Ages the need to obtain the best advice manifested itself in the retention of legal experts by those towns with a budget that could accommodate the expense. Even when chosen from electoral districts (which we do not know to have been general practice) councillors were intended to be representatives in the sense of acting for the entire collective, rather than particular neighbourhoods or interests within the community.

Consilium is another of those imprecise medieval terms; it is often difficult to tell from the context whether it refers to a relatively informal process of obtaining counsel, or suggests a more formal institution, the council. Although a council was apparently a formal component of the constitutional arrangements established when Ipswich acquired rights of self-government in 1200, we cannot be sure that this unique account is either reliable or typical; although, if we can put our faith in it, then it would seem that a council was no innovation in English communities in 1200 (quite how the men of Ipswich would have known this is not clear). It seems likely, however, that in many towns formal councils evolved out of informal counselling or some quasi-judicial body; I have discussed this elsewhere and will not go into the matter again here.

The task of the council was not, at first at least, to stand in place of the community in assenting to local legislation or other executive decisions. It was to advise the executives and to actively participate in the formulation of legislation and decisions. The urban constitution continued to provide for general assemblies at which the community could be sounded out on important matters. But during the latter half of the fourteenth century and continuing more strongly into the next, we see some significant changes taking place, with attempts to redefine the political community by restricting popular participation to the enfranchised segment and to major occasions, such as elections; and/or to substitute for the assembly a second (lower) council intended to represent the interests of the rank-and-file or, sometimes, the crafts – which suggests growing recognition that the original (upper) council had failed to represent popular opinion, as opposed to the interests of the class from which it was drawn.

The complex reasons for this change are still imperfectly understood, and I always feel as though venturing into quagmire when I try to summarize the trends. In an urban population where the gap between rich and poor had grown, in part as the wage-earning class was swollen with immigrants, where the wealthier burgesses now had as much if not more in common with the rural gentry, and where economic success was more dependent on competition rather than collaboration, it must have been increasingly difficult to identify a "common good". Socio-economic differentiation brought with it more class consciousness and corresponding attitudinal change, a growing divide in trust between the urban estates. Achieving social harmony was relying more and more on ceremonies that symbolized at the same time hierarchy and unity, and more attention was given to proceduralism and orderliness, to ensure that political meetings were not disrupted by unruly mob behaviour. The desire for order began to take precedence over the principle of community consultation. With new magisterial powers delegated by the king to local government, and with local custom increasingly superseded by national statute, it became easier for the urban ruling class to divorce itself from the concept of the community as the pre-eminent source of authority. Theory notwithstanding, the practical operation of government was in the hands of an elite, and the fifteenth century saw a largely successful effort towards capturing this reality within the urban constitution; the effort included dispensing with popular assemblies. These trends tended to proceed more rapidly in the larger towns, where social, economic and political divides were more marked.

Two other, related, trends in the development of the political system should be mentioned. One was that the concept of community assent, as a collective and unanimous agreement to political decisions, was replaced. The "what touches all..." maxim implied unanimity, and urban records of decisions often claimed not merely the consent of the community, but of the entire community. It was not the role of such records, or in the interest of local government, to chronicle debates or political manoeuvring that may have lain behind decisions; nor have we much evidence on whether, at borough elections in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, voting was conducted through careful counting, through loudest shout, or some other method. As the recognition sank in that a council could, in some regards at least, substitute for the entire community, it opened the door for the notion that a section of the council might substitute for the entire council. The challenge of achieving full council attendance or of consensus within conciliar ranks made the concept of majority vote attractive. It was usually a numerical majority, although some philosophers argued that quality (i.e. of the councillors, in terms of experience, wisdom, status) might also be a governing factor – a matter which seems less arcane in the context of English medieval towns, if one considers the emergence of an influential elite within the ranks of the council.

That upper elite is one indication of the second trend that must be mentioned, which concerns the changing relationship between executive and council. Maud Sellers [York Memorandum Book, part II, Surtees Society, vol.120 (1911), v], perhaps influenced by Norwich's historian William Hudson, distinguished between the "communal period" of borough government and the "magisterial period". Despite being prone to the inadequacies of any generalization, this may be one useful way of thinking about the changing character of urban government over the course of the Late Middle Ages. By "magisterial" Sellers had in mind a government focused on the executive officers (mayor and bailiffs), although Edward Miller later narrowed this definition to the mayoralty alone [A History of Yorkshire: The City of York, Oxford: University Press, 1961, 70]. But we would do better to think of it as government focused on a small group of particularly influential townsmen, highly experienced in government (through having borne the mayoralty), and assigned special judicial authority.

The case of Beverley, where the council became so prominent that an executive magistrate was dispensed with entirely, may at first glance appear to be an exception to the rule. But perhaps we are missing the point. At Lynn and at York, for example, we see in the late fourteenth century power being more evenly shared among a group within urban society, as restrictions were put on the frequency with which a man might hold the mayoralty; such provisions may have been intended both to spread the burden and to prevent the office acting as a vehicle for political dominance. At Kingston upon Hull in 1379, the subjection of mayor, bailiffs and chamberlains to the supervision of a council of eight, whose members could not be re-elected until after an interval of three years, could be interpreted as a democratic move; but it is just as likely to be a move by the urban upper class as a whole to bring local government to rein.

During the thirteenth century the nascent mayoralty relied in part on a cult of personality; we find individuals who provided strong leadership being maintained in power for consecutive terms; some of the earliest mayors seem to have held office for several years in a row. This was perhaps the result of popular demand, or perhaps due to the prominence of a controlling interest in the town. At that period a conciliar group was hazy: even though it is partly attributable to the poverty of urban archives that we see little of such a group, it is also likely that such a group was relatively informal, notwithstanding the evidence of Ipswich which is known only through the rewriting in the late thirteenth century, at the instance of a group representing conciliar interests. The emergence of a conciliar institution within local government should perhaps be viewed in a similar light to the development of a baronial interest intent on placing a check upon monarchical power.

By the close of the fourteenth century we see the mayor as less of an urban monarch and more as the president of a group of peers. Only in special circumstances might one acquire unusual prominence through re-election to consecutive terms – such as William Frost at York during the late 1390s and early 1400s, when the city had to come to terms with the major new powers it had acquired, or William Appleyard at Norwich who was instrumental in obtaining county status and a mayoralty for the city. The constitutional role of the council was by now not only formalized but entrenched and power was devolving towards it. It was possible for leading townsmen to exercise considerable influence from within the council without being in occupation of the mayoralty; Nicholas Blackburn at York and Richard Whittington at London are examples of men who had served long, performed well as mayor, and continued to have command respect and exercise influence in those years when not mayor. These men of experience and authority were needed as the scope of judicial administration of urban government necessarily increased, to ensure continued independence from external authorities in an age when the royal government control over justice was extending; above all the delegation of Justice of the Peace authority to that select group of townsmen provided the bolster that established an elite within an elite. Yet even as they were obtaining their enhanced independence from county officialdom and increased authority over the urban community, they were being tied more directly, more closely to the central government and to the will of the king. While, socially and economically, they were building closer ties to the landed gentry of the county, whose interests were often not the same as those of the urban traders.

Housing administration in confined spaces, such as guildhalls, was one of several factors encouraging the development of forms of government based on delegation of authority from the community to a limited set of representatives. Representation and restrictiveness are two sides of the same coin.

Political conflict

In the above discussion we can see some of the causes for political conflict within medieval towns. Before reviewing that, it should be noted that many conflicts were occasioned not by disputes internal to the community, but by those between the community and other authorities. These might be disputes with the lord of the borough – particularly where that lord was a conservative ecclesiastical institution – prompted by the desire for greater autonomy. Whereas the king, as an absentee landlord, was less resistant to leasing out new privileges, extensions of jurisdiction, or sources of income, lords with a local presence were more inclined to hold onto their jurisdiction and try to milk it for whatever revenues it could bring in. Or again the disputes might arise from a competition for jurisdiction, territorial or commercial, with a manor, market, or another town in the vicinity. Such disputes sometimes served to instil a sense of solidarity within the community, but on other occasions might divide local opinion and even prompt internal power-struggles, often with an alliance of convenience between the lord and the lower class, in opposition to the ruling class.

External opponents were useful tools for giving an urban populace a sense of united purpose. But such enmities could not be perpetually pursued. There was ample time for townspeople to look within and realize that some of their principles – community, the common good, justice for all, social harmony – were not well reflected in the practice of government. The community was a collective of individuals, motivated at least in part by self-interest, and a collective of other groups, each of which had its own interests. Mutual support for the purpose of common prosperity must have been a more attractive proposition for those in the lower ranks of urban society, than for those who had risen to the top. Wealthy townsmen could attribute their success as much to their personal capabilities and individual initiative, not forgetting family connections, as to membership in a privileged community; many may also have felt that their superior characteristics and skills entitled them to a dominant role in government.

The task of governing was not an easy one. Urban rulers were torn between loyalties: to the community, to family, to their trade, to their social peers, and to their personal business. The difficult choices faced in reconciling those interests, and the corresponding demands on their time and energy, only increased as the Late Middle Ages progressed. The drawn-out foreign wars in which English kings engaged during the late thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, along with their heavy demands for financing through taxes and their adverse and sometimes disastrous effects on commerce, put a pressure often severe on urban resources. The growth of the English cloth industry added another complication by encouraging ambition among the cloth-producing and cloth-retailing groups, who wanted a share of the decision-making power in the hands of established merchants who had built their success on trade in agricultural produce and other raw materials. In fact, there was periodic if not continuous pressure on established urban families to maintain their socio-economic position as capable new men migrated to the town or rose from the lower ranks. In some towns, such as Colchester, the ruling class was not so heavily mercantile that it had difficulty incorporating the nouveaux riche. But where the mercantile elite had been long entrenched, as at London, tensions inevitably resulted as different interest groups quested for a share of power. The ramifications of national political conflicts, bad harvests and their effect on the urban food supply, the demand for higher wages after plague had decimated the labour-force, the growing complexity of the national legal system, the scare given to the establishment by the Peasants' Revolt, are other factors impacting on the challenges faced by local administration.

It was too much to expect that local administrators could maintain a harmonious balance of interests – politics is more pendulum than a balance. It was easy to succumb to the temptation to favour one's own, although we should not automatically assume that many did. The common good, virtuous government and social harmony were ideals; the failure to achieve them was more conspicuous in some cases than in others. We find complaints about, and popular outbursts against, maladministration from the second half of the thirteenth century into the first half of the fifteenth, and so far no clear pattern has emerged to explain the timing – perhaps there is no pattern. The problem was not blamed on unattainable ideals or flaws in the political system per se, but on human failure: greed and corruption on the part of specific rulers. Embezzlement of communal funds, unjust assessment of taxation, perversion of justice were the types of charges commonly levelled, and they speak to the values we have already noted. The failure was seen as human, not systemic, and the usual solution was typically to replace the erring rulers with others from the same class and introduce greater fiscal accountability and limits on the behaviour of officials. In fact, it might have been difficult to significantly alter the political system in a way that would have been acceptable to the king. In the latter phase of internal political conflict, in the late fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries, concerns were less over misgovernment than constitutional changes that were putting urban rulers beyond the control of the populace. Indirect election of councils or executives and the transformation of councils into life membership bodies, gaps in whose ranks were filled by co-optation, fractured the chain of authority and reduced the prospects for men of ambition to rise to the highest levels of society.

Historians have much debated the character of internal political conflicts within English towns. If there is no consensus, it is partly because our knowledge of the conflicts is in most cases sketchy, particularly as regards motivation of the players. It is partly because we cannot always take at face value the statements of official records. And it is partly because the causes were complex, varied from case to case, and were probably not well understood even by those involved. What appears to be a popular movement seeking political reform was often a mix of interests, some or many of which were likely self-seeking. There was certainly a political dimension to the conflicts, even if the notion of a struggle between democracy and oligarchy owes more to the perspective of nineteenth-century scholars, their eyes on municipal reform of their own era, than to any conscious or overt ideological differences of the participants. There were no political parties in the modern sense; to avoid misleading modern audiences, historians prefer to talk of political alliances by using the term "faction", in part because they usually surface in the context of factionalism, i.e. conflict.

We can perceive a variety of dimensions to factions. From one perspective we can identify personal ambition for power, whether on the part of one or more outsiders or disaffected insiders, or family rivalries at play in a political arena. From another we might see a clash between rich and poor, the powerful and the disempowered, but such outbursts were generally reactive, without any clear agenda, unless there was some kind of strong leadership; it may have been the appearance of such a leader that explains the timing of political unrest. From a third, a power-struggle between different economic interests, such as craft vs. mercantile; but socio-economic inequalities, as we have noted, were less an infringement of medieval values than were abuses of positions of trust. Nor can we ignore the possibility of national events having a ripple effect on local affairs. More in-depth study of more episodes of political division will be needed before we can see if any general conclusions may be drawn about the phenomenon.

We focus on urban conflicts because they are the more conspicuous events in a history largely unwritten, and of course because they are fascinating. But it should not be thought they are typical, nor that the picture of urban society we see through them is necessarily normal. They were not really revolutionary, in that they were not trying to overthrow the existing order. Furthermore, there was some recognition, beginning with Magna Carta, that if a ruler acted outside the law or failed to uphold the law, or promulgated law for personal gain or the advantage of an interest group that ran counter to the common good, such rule was unjust. In this situation, it was believed that aggrieved parties should, in sequence, speak out against injustice, seek redress through the legal process, and try to persuade the ruler to reform; if that failed, then the final and justifiable resort was to use armed force to protect communal rights and depose the offending ruler. In the case of towns, theoreticians argued that the extreme measure was only acceptable if supported by the entire community. Hence, in urban conflicts we often seem to find complaints to the king, followed by attempts to introduce political reforms (either by winning control of the administration, or through pressure-tactics of popular demonstrations), before the most serious outbursts of violence take place, with the name of the community invoked at each stage.

Let me reiterate that such outbursts are exceptions to the rule, although when political passions were aroused the resulting disputes could be bitter and sometimes prolonged. Allowing for the biases of surviving records, we are safer to assume that acquiescence in governmental decisions was a more typical behaviour of the community, for politics was about lordship and loyalty. Yet a recognition that rulers relied on such acquiescence is reflected in the resort to mob action to express popular displeasure. However, ultimately, political conflict resolved to the advantage of the ruling class, even where they had to make power-sharing compromises, as the monarchy was inclined to support the status quo and to reinforce it so that it could better meet its own priority of maintaining social and political order.

In the seventeenth century the London mob became notorious for its rioting; the disempowerment of the lower classes had left no other avenue for expression of discontent or resistance to tyranny. Mob action was equally a concern for, if not a fear of, London authorities from thirteenth to fifteenth centuries.

The character of government

Historians have played rather loose and free in labelling urban governments in medieval England as oligarchic; they have become ensnared by an historiographical tradition. The control of government by the upper class, with the acquiescence of lesser social orders, does not make it oligarchic; the term would more usefully be restricted to its Aristotelian meaning of monopoly of power for selfish gain or other corrupt purposes. When urban governments became oligarchic, as sometimes happened, we can see that it was considered unacceptable from the popular complaints and open opposition, these often accomplishing at least a partial corrective to the situation. Aristotle would likely have classed the government of medieval English towns as aristocratic, which for him did not have the negative connotations it has today. Today, democratic is probably the closest term we have to categorize it, for it is hard to see substantive differences between government in medieval towns and modern western democracies.

It is easy to fall into the trap of focusing on periods of popular discontent in towns and assuming that medieval townspeople were constantly disillusioned with government. To put things into a comparative perspective, let me describe modern public perspectives on the character of government in my own country, Canada. A survey-based study (sample size 1500) conducted by Leger Marketing in April 2002 concluded that the majority of Canadians believe Canada's political system to be corrupt at every level of government. This is, it should be remembered, in a nation considered one of the more open democracies of the world. Of those surveyed, 69% believed that there was a high or moderate level of corruption at the federal level, 68% felt the same about the provincial level, and 53% of the municipal level of government. Politicians themselves were the most highly blamed for this perceived state of affairs, while their entourage and senior civil servants were the groups next targeted for blame. One particular area of grievance was the channelling of public money into the pockets of politicians' peers (i.e. other members of the same capitalist class), via purchases of goods and services. Furthermore 22% of Canadians felt that their political system is not truly democratic. Although the Prime Minister responded to the survey with a prompt denial of corruption in government, within the next few weeks several Cabinet ministers would lose their posts through scandals.

A second survey (sample size 2000) touching on the health of democracy, conducted by the Association for Canadian Studies and Environics/Focus Canada in June/July 2002, found that three-quarters of Canadians believe the wealthy members of society have too much influence over political decision-making, while over two-thirds feel the same about a superior external power (the United States) and about leading commercial interests. Individuals and small businesses are perceived as being correspondingly deprived of political influence; individuals in particular are seen as disempowered. I, for example, could not imagine successfully pursuing political power at almost any level of government, lacking the connections and the financial resources required. Only a very small minority of citizens seek active participation in government, and the extent of consultation (however superficial) of the citizenry on government decisions is far more restricted than it was in medieval towns – most calls for referendums on matters of import are rejected.

We should bear in mind that public criticisms of the political system are not necessarily valid. What is important is that they represent public perceptions and suggest a disenchantment, warranted or not, with the power-structure and with politics. Yet it is a system of rule in which, for the most part, citizens willingly acquiesce, criticism peaking only when governmental acts are widely perceived not to be benevolent or for the public good. The same cynicism, or realism, depending on one's standpoint, is seen in the statement of a newspaper editor that: "clearly those attracted to executive power today seek it via the legislature, posing as the people's tribunes at election time so as to become their masters." [John Robson, "Gay marriage vs. Magna Carta", Ottawa Citizen, 17 July 2002, p.A16] Many people living in western democracies hold the opinion that politics by its very nature fosters corruption, whether manifested through rhetorical dishonesty or through misuse of power for personal benefit, and they feel excluded from the decision-making process. A sense that such public consultation as exists is largely for the sake of show and that one individual's vote makes little difference to the outcome of an election have played a role in de-motivating citizen involvement in the political system, except through organized interest groups. A fatalist attitude towards political corruption is visible at all levels: Canada's Prime Minister, upon dismissing one of his ministers for giving a contract to a former lover, was quoted in the media as shrugging things off: "These things happen." It is worth noting that much of the attention focused, at this time of writing, on Canada's political system comes towards the end of an administration which has held several consecutive terms in office, and one of the complaints is that too much power has become focused in the office of the Prime Minister.

Dangerous though comparisons can be, there are nonetheless many parallels here that might be drawn with the situation in English towns in the late fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries, when our records of local government have become fuller and more regular. A similar growth in alienation from the political system, a feeling of exclusion from meaningful participation, a fear that power-holders act to protect their own interests more than the interests of the community – interests that, as noted, had become increasingly complex and difficult to reconcile – and an increased attention to supposed corruption or maladministration, are features that become more pronounced in that period, although we cannot be certain how much this is a facet of the better records. Popular frustration may help explain why there was a preparedness to look for leadership to men on the peripheries of the ruling elite, men held back on the normal path of political advancement and prepared to seek power by championing popular reform. Fear of this may similarly be a factor in explaining why more strenuous efforts were made by the authorities to create disincentives to popular dissatisfaction, by imposing heavy punishments on aggrieved members of the community who criticized, slandered, spread rumours about, or even laid hands on members of the governing body.

Whether resentment of the ruling elite was justified is not easy to assess. Popular discontent is muddied by the struggles of different interest groups within the community, mainly economic interest groups, to increase their influence, by personal ambitions or vendettas, by divisions within the ruling class, and by long-standing conflicts between internal and external authorities for jurisdiction in urban matters. We cannot rule out the possibility that medieval complaints about urban governments are sometimes, or in part, the consequence of false perceptions or misunderstandings. I have elsewhere indicated that the taxation system used in Lynn was inevitably subject to misunderstanding. Taxation is inherently unpopular; in my own time strenuous efforts are being made by governments at all levels to lower taxes or at least prevent tax increases, at a devastating cost to social services, so politically unpopular are taxes. We must therefore be careful in taking medieval complaints at face value. Which is not to say, either, that complaints were groundless.

The central government was prepared to intervene where it seemed that there were grounds for accusations of maladministration or corruption. The concern was partly for the king's oppressed subjects, partly over the threat to sources of royal revenues, and partly because the king considered that all exercise of power was by royal delegation, which gave him an inherent interest in local government. It was in part the royal interventions that tended to be frequent in the thirteenth century – often resulting in suspension of city privileges, including self-government, and imposition of more direct royal rule – that encouraged the urban ruling class to document the urban

Populist sentiment and values in urban society were ultimately stifled by the monarchy, whose interest – like that of townspeople – was less in the character than in the effectiveness of government in achieving the common good. From the perspective of the king, however, the common good involved the standardization of administration across the realm and the preservation of law and order. It was partly in consequence that, at the close of the Middle Ages, borough government had become more closed, with the citizenry less directly involved in matters such as elections and the scope of elections having been narrowed (when alderman were chosen for life, and the mayor selected from their number), albeit that the number of citizens involved in the corporation had expanded with the introduction of large second councils. However, the additional judicial powers accorded to an elite-within-the-elite by the central government made it easier for a small group with little accountability to the populace to dominate the larger towns.

The emergence of relatively independent local government, with a developed corporate identity and more elaborately structured administrative hierarchy, characterized in part by greater bureaucratization and proceduralization, took place in the context of a growth in scope and strength of the central government of king and parliament. The central government, with its perspective of descending authority, favoured closed corporations as an agency for ensuring public order. This imperative gave strength to the organic tendency for power to devolve to the few most active in politics – those whom today we might consider professional politicians.

Medieval urban government was only as good as the men who ran it, and as stable as the faith the community had that those men were acting in the public interest. A few bad apples were enough to seed distrust in the relationship between rulers and ruled. It may be less that this gulf – a divide of interests, perspectives and even values – grew larger as the late Middle Ages progressed, than that it became more institutionalized.

commune, in medieval history, collective institution that developed in continental Europe after the fall of the Roman Empire. Because of the importance of the commune in municipal government, the term is also used to denote a town itself to which a charter of liberties was granted by the sovereign or feudal overlord. Although in most cases the development of communes was inextricably connected with that of the cities, there were rural communes, notably in France and England, that were formed to protect the common interests of villagers.

It is lawful for a comburgess personally (if there is no bailiff at hand) to attach the goods of a debtor who is trying to avoid him. He must not retain the attachment in his own possession, but immediately bring it to the bailiffs, and attach himself to prosecute the debtor. If he retains the attachment in his possession and the debtor satisfies him for the debt, upon which the attachment is returned to the debtor, all without the involvement of a bailiff, the citizen is to be heavily amerced for taking the law into his own hands.

In case of a writ to replevy goods and chattels, the seizer of the same is to provide the bailiffs with sufficient pledges for their return [to the individual from whom they were seized] if the court judges that to be right. The defence of the seizer may then be heard. If both parties are peers of the city, the case may be argued at the weekly session. If the party from whom the goods have been seized is a foreigner and the claimant a peer, the case is to proceed on a daily basis if the claimant acted without a writ, or a weekly basis if he had a writ. The seizer is to be distrained three times (if necessary) to answer in court, each distraint being of more valuable items than the previous; at the third distraint, he is to be warned to appear in court by the sergeants (who are to advise the bailiffs that the warning has been issued). If he continues to refuse to answer for the seizure, the items from the first two distraints are to be appraised by reliable men, in full court, and forfeited to the king. Distraints are to continue daily on whatever goods he has in the city, until he is prepared to answer in court. The same procedure applies in pleas of debt and trespass. Equal justice is to be done to every person, lesser or greater, without regard to any man's status and without any favouritism. In these pleas the bailiffs may receive [to be heard] attornies of the plaintiff and defendant, once they have attached themselves to pursue, or defend against, the accusation.

[Replevin involved the plaintiff seizing goods which he claimed the defendant had wrongfully taken from him (e.g. as a distraint), and then giving security to the authorities to guarantee that he would pursue the issue in court and would return the goods he had seized if the court decided against him.]

In all pleas in the city involving distrain, if the defendant – whether a peer of the city or an outsider – is absent from the city, or it is suspected that he is planning to absent himself in order to delay answering in court, the attached item is to be retained [until the defendant appears to answer]. If it has to be committed to the defendant's pledges, its value shall first be appraised. If the pledges fail to have the defendant in court to answer the plaintiff or to stand to judgement, the pledges shall be held answerable to the plaintiff for the appraised price of the distrained item delivered to them, as fully as if it were they who were defendants in the plea. In addition they shall be heavily amerced for failing to have the defendant in court.

The attachment of appellees.

[014] It sometimes happens that those appealed of homicide, wounding, robbery or

The writ of attachment.

[019] ‘The king to the sheriff, greeting. If A. has made you secure with respect to the [024] if the appeal is for breach of the king's peace, as in the case of breach of the peace

[025] and wounding, breach of the peace and mayhem, breach of the peace and robbery, [026] breach of the peace and the rape of virgins etc., let the writ be drawn in this way:

Another writ on the same matter for the same purpose.

[028] ‘The king to the sheriff, greeting. If A. has made you secure etc. then put B. by [029] gage and safe pledges to be before our justices at the first session etc. to answer
[030] the said A. regarding [blows and] the breach of our peace whereof he appeals
[031] him.⁵ And have there the names of the pledges and this writ. Witness etc.’ If it [032] pleases the king that appeals [against appellees] attached in the county until the [033] arrival of the justices for homicide or breach of the king's peace should come before
[034] him or his justices of the bench, let a writ for summoning the appeal then issue
[035] in this form:

Welcome to the new website.

The Domesday Book was commissioned in December 1085 by William the Conqueror, who invaded England in 1066. The first draft was completed in August 1086 and contained records for 13,418 settlements in the English counties south of the rivers Ribble and Tees (the border with Scotland at the time).

The original Domesday Book has survived over 900 years of English history and is currently housed in a specially made chest at London's Public Record Office in Kew, London. This site has been set up to enable visitors to discover the history of the Domesday Book, to give an insight into life at the time of its compilation, and provide information and links on related topics.

Medieval Sourcebook: The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle: The Domesday Book, 1086

One of the most remarkable documents generated by the new circumstances King William faced in England was Domesday Book, a veritable treasure trove on information for King William (as well as for the modern historian!). The following documents explain some of the chief features of the survey.

The Genesis of the Survey, 1086

The king spent Christmas with his councillors at Gloucester, and held his court there for five days, which was followed by a three-day synod held by the archbishop and the clergy. At this synod Maurice was elected bishop of London and William bishop of Norfolk and Robert bishop of Cheshire: they were all chaplains of the king. After this the king had important deliberations and exhaustive discussions with his council about this land and how it was peopled, and with what sort of men. Then he sent his men all over England into every shire to ascertain how many hundreds of 'hides' of land there were in each shire. He also had it recorded how much land his archbishops had, and his diocesan bishops, his abbots and his earls, and--though I may be going into too great detail--and what or how much each man who was a landholder here in England had in land or live-stock, and how much money it was worth. So very thoroughly did he have the inquiry carried out that there was not a single 'hide,' not one virgate of land, not even--it is shameful to record it, but it did not seem shameful for him to do--not even one ox, nor one cow, nor one pig which escaped notice in his survey. And all the surveys were subsequently brought to him.

William the Conqueror Assessed

If anyone would know what manner of man King William was, the glory that he obtained, and of how many lands he as lord, then will we describe him as we have known him, we who had looked upon him and who once lived at his court. This King William...was a very wise and great man, and more honored and more powerful than any of his predecessors. He was mild to those good men who loved God, but severe beyond measure to those who withstood his will. He founded a noble monastery [Battle Abbey] on the spot where God permitted him to conquer England., and he established monks in it, and he made it very rich. In his days the great monastery at Canterbury was built, and many others also throughout England; moreover, this land was filled with monks who lived after the rule of St. Benedict; and such was the state of religion in his days that all who would, might observe that which was prescribed by their respective orders.

King William was also held in much reverence. He wore his crown three times every year when he was in England: at Easter he wore it at Winchester, at Pentecost at Westminster, and at Christmas at Gloucester. And at these times all the men of England were with him, archbishops, bishops, abbots and earls, thanes and knights. So also was he a very stern and wrathful man, so that none durst do anything against his will, and he kept in prison those earls who acted against his pleasure. He removed bishops from their sees and abbots from their offices, and he imprisoned thanes, and at length he spared not his own [half-]brother Odo. This Odo was a very powerful bishop in Normandy. His see was that of Bayeux, and he was foremost to serve the king. He had an earldom in England, and when William was in Normandy he [Odo] was the first man in this country, and him did William cast into prison.

Amongst other things, the good order that William established is not to be forgotten. It was such that any man...might travel over the kingdom with a bosom full of gold unmolested; and no man durst kill another, however great the injury he might have received from him. He reigned over England, and being sharp-sighted to his own interest, he surveyed the kingdom so thoroughly that there was not a single hide of land throughout the whole of which he knew not the possessor, and how much it was worth, and this he afterward entered in his register. The land of the Britons [Wales] was under his sway, and he built castles therein; moreover he had full dominion over the Isle of Man; Scotland was also subject to him...; the land of Normandy was his by inheritance, and he possessed the earldom of Maine, and had he lived two years longer, he would have subdued Ireland by his prowess, and that without a battle.

Truely there was much trouble in these times, and very great distress. He caused castles to be built and oppressed the poor. The king was also of great sternness, and he took from his subjects many marks of gold, and many hundred pounds of silver, and this, either with or without right, and with little need. He was given to avarice and greedily loved gain. He made large forests for the deer, and enacted laws therewith, so that whoever killed a hart or a hind should be blinded. As he forbade killing the deer, so also the boars; and he loved the tall stags as if he were their father. He also commanded concerning the hares, that they should go free. The rich complained and the poor murmured, but he was so sturdy that he took no notice of them; they must will all that the king willed, if they would live, or keep their lands,...or be maintained in their rights. Alas that any man should so exalt himself.... We have written concerning him these things, both good and bad, that virtuous men may follow after the good, and wholly avoid the evil, and may go in the way that leadeth to the kingdom of heaven.

Medieval Sourcebook: THE DOMESDAY BOOK 1086 - Instructions and Extract

THE DOMESDAY BOOK 1086

Inquisitio Eliensis. Domesday Book: Additamenta, p. 495. Latin.

[TR Introduction] The first approach to a modern assessment roll or cataster is the well known Domesday Book. The existing literature on this remarkable memorial is so extensive, that it has not appeared advisable to quote largely from it. Our first quotation contains the instructions issued to the Commissioners who made the record. The second is a specimen return. There is a wide variety in the returns, though certain factors recur constantly in each statement. The survey is the most extensive document, embracing as it does the entire area of England held by the Conqueror, which we possess in regard to medieval times. It is important to note how the feudal power as founded by William is no longer dependent like the Empire of Charles upon the personal estates of the crown, but brings the entire land under its influence through the feudal dues, and thus paves the way for the modern state founded upon the obligations of all its citizens.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR COLLECTION OF THE DOMESDAY RETURNS.

Here is subscribed the inquisition of lands as the barons of the king have made inquiry into them; that is to say by the oath of the sheriff of the shire, and of all the barons and their Frenchmen, and the whole hundred, the priests, reeves, and six villains of each manor; then, what the manor is called, who held it in the time of king Edward, who holds now; how many hides, how many plows in demesne, how many belonging to the men, how many villains, how many cottars, how many serfs, how many free-men, how many socmen, how much woods, how much meadow, how many pastures, how many mills, how many fish-ponds, how much has been added or taken away, how much it was worth altogether at that time, and how much now, how much each free man or soeman had or has. All this threefold, that is to say in the time of king Edward, and when king William gave it, and as it is now; and whether more can be had than is had.

On 24 November 1997, as part of its new policy of openness, the British government published a detailed schedule of all the property and goods it owns (as a sign of the times it is available on CD-ROM as well as in a 550-page book). It lists about 300 billion pounds worth of valuables, including foreign embassies, paintings, landholdings and miscellaneous goods.

The formal title of this document is the Register of National Assets but the press has decided, in one of its periodical fits of concerted mild inaccuracy, to call it the New Domesday Book or Domesday Book II. The listing is certainly wide-ranging, but it has only a little in common with the original Domesday Book, which was ordered by William I in 1085 to assess the wealth of England for possible taxation purposes. Nobody is proposing to tax items on the Register; it's more probable that some of them will be sold off to raise cash for the Treasury.

In origin, Domesday is just a Middle English spelling of doomsday, a name which only came to be applied to the survey a century after its compilation, at first facetiously as being an unavoidable and final judgement (contemporaries called it “the description of England”). A doom was originally a statute, decree or judgement (especially applied to the day of the Last Judgement in Christian theology, as in the crack of doom, and doomsday itself). There had earlier been doombooks, codes of laws, particularly the one said to have been compiled by King Alfred at the end of the ninth century. The doom-settle or doom seat was in early medieval times the place of judgement in a court of law. Later doom came to refer more generally to one's fate or destiny, often with a sense of evil befalling one.

It's closely related to the verb deem, which first came into the language with the sense of pronouncing judgement or acting as a judge; later it weakened to mean expressing an opinion or considered view and is now rather a formal word. It's also, if you go back far enough, linked to do. The Russian term Duma (ˈdʊ:mə/), an elected council, is also related to it, as is Dáil (ˈdɑɪl/), the name for the lower house of the Irish parliament.

The English suffix -dom is another cousin, which originally meant a jurisdiction, an area over which some official had the power of asserting his doom, such as a kingdom, but which later evolved to mean some condition or state, such as freedom or wisdom. Yet another—though much more distant—relative is theme, which in Greek derives from the same root as the English do.

The Domesday texts
Kyoto University, Japan, 7 April 2001

So very narrowly did he have it investigated, that there was no single hide or virgate of land, nor indeed (it is a shame to relate but it seemed no shame for him to do) one ox nor one cow nor one pig which was left out, and not put down in his record.

Medieval chronicles are stuffed with hyperbole and one suspects that the intended readership was expected to be able to translate the references to the 50,000 men, 500 ships, and the like into the more realistic 'enough to knock your cowl off.' The writer of the 1085 annal of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle knew full well that he was overstating the case, but he understood that his audience likewise would comprehend: the scale of the Domesday inquest was unprecedented. The initial reaction was horror, but in the course of time it changed to respect and then admiration; by the early twelfth century the Domesday inquest, and more particularly Domesday Book, had entered the popular imagination as an unimpeachable authority. It was a mystique that has remained into the present day. With the possible exception of Magna Carta, no other medieval document generated such enduring veneration. It is this, it seems, that is the abiding reason for the survival of so much documentation from the process. Medieval government was to be capable of producing more comprehensive surveys, but none would be able to muster such abiding interest.

The volume of information is awesome. Where most surveys in the Middle Ages go largely unnoticed in the chronicles, there are two contemporary accounts of the Domesday inquest. The 1085 annal of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle has already been cited. Bishop Robert of Hereford, probably writing in 1087, had a slightly different perspective.

[In the] twentieth year of his reign by order of William, king of the English, there was made a survey (descriptio) of the whole of England; of the lands in each of the counties; of the possessions of each of the magnates, their lands, their manors (mansionibus), their men both bond and free, living in cottages or with their own houses and lands; of ploughs, horses, and other animals; of the services and payments due from all the men in the whole land. Other investigators followed the first and were sent to counties that they did not know, and where they themselves were unknown, to check the first description and to denounce any wrongdoers to the king. And the land was vexed with much violence arising from the collection of the king's taxes.

Further information is furnished by a letter of Archbishop Lanfranc to a commissioner in East Anglia, identified simply as 'S,' in which he confirmed that he had no demesne lands in the counties assigned to the commissioner. A slightly later account of the inquest in Worcestershire is recorded by Hemming in the first Worcester cartulary. Bishop Remigius of Lincoln, Earl Walter Giffard, Henry de Ferrers, and Adam, brother of Eudo the king's steward were sent to Worcestershire 'by the king himself to seek out and set down in writing the possessions and customs, both of the king and of his leading men, in this province and in several others, at the time when the said king had (details of) the whole of England set down in writing.'

A handsome body of evidence of procedure. Of the records that emanated from the process itself (table 1) the three largest are contemporary manuscripts. Exon is a composite document. The bulk of it is a series of accounts, fee by fee, of the lands of the king and his tenants-in-chief in Somerset, Dorset, Devon, and Cornwall with a single Wiltshire entry. Interspersed are geld accounts, related to an inquisitio geldi, lists of terre occupate, that is lands that had been illegally seized, and summaries of fees detailing total geld assessments, ploughs, population for the demesne and enfeoffed lands and a ploughland total for the whole fee. Welldon Finn established that Exon was written by a number of scribes and Caroline Thorn has shown that it is no coherent document. Each fee tends to be entered in its own quire, but the scribes change without any apparent pattern, even on occasion in the middle of a sentence, and there is much correction, emendation, and addition of material. There is no indication that the collection was originally bound, and it is best interpreted as a series of discrete sections united by a more or less common origin rather than an editorial schema.

LDB and GDB, by contrast, are self-evidently compilations that follow a programme. LDB is confined to the three counties of Essex, Norfolk, and Suffolk which form the major divisions of the text. Within each county section the account proceeds by fees and concludes with a list of invasiones, illegal seizures of land. The volume is the work of seven scribes, the last of whom was responsible only for the colophon at the end of the volume, the running heads, and the rubrication. Nevertheless, it is apparently a fair copy, with relatively few corrections and additions. GDB exhibits much the same form. It covers the rest of England county by county and within each fee by fee. There are claims relating to lands in Yorkshire, Lincolnshire, and Huntingdonshire and a summary list of villas and manors in Yorkshire. The volume is, however, largely the work of one scribe with a second adding the odd correction or gloss, and, very occasionally, entry. It is, by far, the most accomplished of the Domesday manuscripts. The reader's eye is drawn to the names of manors by the use of rustic capitals and rubrication, and a standard layout was employed. It was evidently drawn up for reference use.

The remaining documentation survives in later copies. Four texts are full Domesday-like compilations. ICC is the widest in scope, covering all the land in thirteen out of sixteen of the Cambridgeshire hundreds except for the demesne estates of the king. In marked contrast to the parallel account of the county in GDB, however, it is arranged by hundred and vill as opposed to fee. IE is a composite source. Surviving in three manuscripts, much of it is an account of the estates of Ely Abbey in the six counties in which it held land in a form that is very close to LDB and ICC. Additionally, however, it preserves what have been called the articles of inquiry in the prologue, lists of jurors for the counties of Cambridgeshire and Hertfordshire, summaries identical in form and content to those of Exon for a number of fees in Cambridgeshire and for Ely in Hertfordshire, Huntingdonshire, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Essex, and a schedule of Ely claims. Bath A is an Exon-like account of the lands of Bath Abbey in Somerset. The Crowland Domesday is a composite account of the lands of Crowland Abbey which draws upon the GDB account and an independent geographically-arranged list of villas and hundreds.

The rest of the corpus consists of some twenty-seven texts that with varying degrees of detail which fall short of full Domesday descriptions. Apart from their relative brevity; there is nothing that characterizes them as a coherent group. Nevertheless, for convenience we shall call them these sources 'schedules.' Their salient features are summarized in table 2.

Documents are, of course, meat and drink to the historian. We are all adept at validating and assessing our sources. The analysis of early charters is now almost a science with criteria drawn up to establish not only authenticity but degrees of authenticity. In some editions Anglo-Saxon charters are accorded stars like the best hotels. Similarly, chronicle criticism has been honed down to a fine art. Texts are collated and autographs or 'originals' are identified. These are disciplines that, in their place, have all been well-learned. I shall argue here, however, that they are inappropriate to inquest records and have in consequence misinformed historians about the nature of the Domesday sources and the relationship between them.

Employing techniques of charter and chronicle criticism, much of recent Domesday scholarship has been concerned with producing a taxonomy of these sources. All of the texts in the Domesday corpus are in some way related to the Domesday inquest, but the problem has been to determine the nature of the relationship in each case. The most comprehensive examination of the corpus as a whole was undertaken by Dr Howard Clarke in 1985. He drew together analyses of individual schedules by a number of scholars, notably Galbraith, Sawyer, Harvey, and himself, to produce an account of the genesis of Domesday Book. He accepted that documents like Abingdon A and the Kentish Assessment List were pre-Domesday sources pressed into service in the inquest to inform the initial collection of evidence from the tenants-in-chief. Evesham A represents the sort of schedule that was then drawn up for validation by hundred jurors, and seigneurially-arranged Bath A and geographically-arranged ICC are representatives of the two types of source that their presentments took. From these county drafts regional returns, exemplified by Exon and LDB, were produced with the use of 'conversion tables' like Evesham K and Q which facilitated the transformation of a hundredal to a seigneurial form where necessary. Finally, GDB was produced by abbreviating the regional returns.

This analysis accepts a number of assumptions that must be tested. The first relates to techniques of dating texts. That the Domesday inquest was conducted in 1086 is clear, but none of the Domesday texts is unambiguously dated. The colophon at the end of LDB states categorically that 'this survey (ista descriptio) was made in the one thousand and eighty sixth year of the incarnation of the Lord, and in the twentieth of the reign of William, not only through these three counties, but also through the others.' It must be noted, however, that this is a postscriptal comment written by scribe 7, who did not otherwise participate in the production of the volume, and he almost certainly understood ista descriptio as the survey rather than LDB. None of the remaining texts is explicitly dated, the best indication being a statement that a text or schedule was drawn up 'when England was described' or the like. The problem is a common one with medieval records and the normal way of tackling it is to narrow down a date range from the known history of individuals and institutions. 'Dead dating' works well with charters; people cannot grant land or witness transactions when they themselves are dead or not in office, and if they do a fishy smell hangs over the document. Unfortunately, however, the Domesday documents are not always amenable to this type of analysis. It has been asserted that Abingdon A must pre-date Domesday because in one entry GDB records a successor to the tenant. At best this can only prove that the document is earlier than GDB, a different matter from demonstrating that it precedes the Domesday inquest. At best, for Domesday texts are often imprecise in their record. Queen Matilda appears as a tenant-in-chief in the Buckinghamshire folios and yet at the beginning of 1086 she had been dead for over two years. The problem is even more acute with holders of land before 1086. The assize was set at 'the day on which King Edward was alive and dead' at an early stage in the process, although this had been amended to the more realistic 'in the time of King Edward' by the time GDB came to be written. Thus, it is often assumed that a past tense in a Domesday text can be safely translated as 'before 1066.' In fact, the referent might be to any predecessor in the previous thirty years. Earl Siward appears regularly in the Northern folios and yet he died in 1055 and Earl Waltheof more widely, although he was still in possession of his lands within a decade of the inquest. Domesday was dependent on its sources and these were various.

On these grounds content is an equally treacherous anchor. Sally Harvey dates the Kentish Assessment List as pre-Domesday because it records TRE geld assessments where GDB has TRW figures. Inherent in her argument is the assumption that the purpose of the geld inquest, which she saw as a contemporary but independent initiative, was to reassess tax liability. This is in itself questionable, but even within its own terms the argument does not work. In many counties TRE assessments are given and there is no indication that a reassessment was ever intended; Domesday hidation survived in many cases into the thirteenth century and occasionally beyond. But more to the point in Cambridgeshire there was a reduction in liability between 1066 and 1086 and yet both assessments are used in different contexts throughout the Cambridgeshire text. It would seem that the burden of the Danegeld might be reduced but by necessity other dues continued to be calculated on the older assessments.

Dead dating is, then, of dubious value. Given the manifold sources of the Domesday texts, it will probably always be misleading in providing a terminus ante quem; a reference to a person will not be an adequate ground for fixing a date before which a text was written. It can be of more positive use in determining a terminus post quem. It is self-evident that a document that makes reference to King William must have been written after 1066. On these grounds Dr Christopher Lewis was able to argue that GDB must post-date the death of William the Conqueror, if only in part, because in the Huntingdonshire and Surrey folios William de Warenne is called Earl William, a title he was granted by William Rufus. In this case, however, the deduction can only be made because it is apparent from the manuscript that comes, 'earl', is an integral part of the text. Where such a reference is postscriptal certainty dissolves. Claims have long been made that the Surrey section must already have been written when William the Conqueror issued a writ, 'after the description of the whole of England,' which set the assessment of Westminster Abbey's manor of Pyrford in Surrey at 8 hides, for in GDB the scribe originally recorded its liability as 16 hides only subsequently to add postscriptally that 'it now gelds for 8 hides.' The assumption, however, is unwarranted. The writ clearly sets a terminus post quem for the addition, but can hardly provide a terminus ante quem for the text itself. At most it can be said that the information was not in the scribe's original source.

Here we must substitute a positive with a qualified negative. Where we have original working documents this is often possible. Even qualified negatives, though, can become meaningless when we have texts only in later copies, for there is generally no way of knowing whether a reference is integral. Evesham K contains surveys of Gloucester and Winchcombe with information that dates them to c.1100, but this hardly dates the whole text. Rather it merely provides a terminus post quem for that part and may or may not provide a terminus post quem or indeed a terminus ante quem, for the rest of the text. Place-name forms, it is true, can sometimes hint at different strata in compound documents, but it can never be assumed that a scribe always copied what was before him. In the Crowland Domesday place-names were modernized to fourteenth-century forms except for those of places in which the abbey no longer had interests at the time of writing, and it would seem that the scribe only accurately copied those that were unfamiliar to him.

If precise dating is elusive, textual forms promise the possibility of constructing a relative chronology. Frank and Caroline Thorn have eloquently demonstrated how the language and layout of Exon have directly influenced the production of GDB. The GDB scribe's repeated transcription of textual peculiarities and misunderstandings of emendations demonstrate beyond doubt that the Exeter text was his principal source for the account of the South-Western counties. Where one or both texts are later copies, this sort of analysis is rarely possible, but diplomatic may betray a relationship. The geographically-arranged ICC is a case in point. The account of each vill commences with the statement 'X [the place] defended itself for y hides, A¹ holds....' while other fees in the same vill have the form 'In the same vill A² holds..' These forms are consistently translated into GDB as X defended itself for y hides..' and ' In X A holds...' and it is thus clear that ICC precedes the account and was probably a principal source.

More subtle are editorial reorganizations of material. The GDB scribe is consistently more concise and organized than the scribes of Exon with only the occasional slip hinting at his more expansive source. They in their turn had imposed their own concept of what was required upon their material and the process indicates that Bath A was one of their sources. In content this document varies little from Exon, but where the one lists demesne and villagers' hides followed by demesne and villagers' ploughs, the other regroups the information so that the demesne assessment and ploughs come first. Furthermore, its language is somewhat looser. All in all, it seems clear that it was slightly earlier than Exon.

The organization of texts may also hint at a relationship. Common sequences of vills and hundreds are ubiquitous in the Domesday corpus and in themselves prove little beyond a common identity in a process: many a schedule exhibits a structure that is identical with that of LDB or GDB, but it may as easily be a precursor of the engrossed texts as an abstract or extract thereof. Evesham K and Q are difficult to interpret on these grounds. Rather it is in the disruption of sequences that relationships become apparent. The Suffolk section of IE shares a villar sequence with its LDB counterpart, but the order of hundreds is completely different. It would thus seem that it was extracted from a geographically-arranged source in which each hundred was entered in a separate quire and as such it represents a precursor of the LDB text. Again, however, the phenomenon is not always easy to interpret. It has been commonly assumed that the sequences are ultimately derived from the order in which hundred juries were called to make their presentments, and it therefore follows that aberrant forms must precede that stage in the inquiry. On these grounds Professor Sawyer has claimed that Evesham A stands at the very beginning of the Domesday process, representing a geographical arrangement of seigneurial returns preparatory to validation by the hundred juries. In reality, however, changes could be made at later stages in the process. The bishop of Worcester's breve in the Worcestershire folios of GDB is radically different in organization from the rest of the Worcestershire text, but it manifestly postdates the presentments of the hundred juries. Similarly, the Yorkshire Summary appears to postdate hundredal presentments, for it is the formal archetype of much of the Yorkshire text, but in the account of the lands of the Count of Mortain there is a disruption of that order occasioned by a scanning of the Summary exemplar a number of times.

From these techniques of dating sources a few firm conclusions can be drawn. GDB was conceived as an abbreviation of its sources which drew directly on Exon and ICC, and in Yorkshire was preceded by a document that had the same form as the Yorkshire Summary, while Exon in its turn drew upon Bath A and LDB was preceded, in part at least, by IE. These are precious conclusions. They are, nevertheless, a meagre harvest from such a volume of material. There is scarcely enough material to produce a complete taxonomy. A way forward seems to be offered by analogy, but in reality it is a method fraught with pitfalls for the unwary. The placing of LDB in the Domesday corpus illustrates the dangers. V. H. Galbraith, and most subsequent writers, have equated it with Exon. The argument put forward, however, is essentially a classic syllogism. Exon is earlier than GDB and records demesne livestock where GDB does not; LDB records demesne livestock and therefore it is contemporary with Exon and earlier than GDB. In fact the differences between Exon and LDB are greater than the similarities. Exon is a working document, in effect a series of office files. LDB, by contrast, is a fully compiled fair copy. Its affinities are nearer to ICC than Exon, but its closest analogue is GDB itself. LDB is undoubtedly different in certain respects, but equally GDB varies in its range as the scribe worked on his task. Why, then, should the record of demesne livestock necessarily divorce LDB from GDB? As I have pointed out elsewhere, together they embody an evolving editorial programme. Features like the invasiones and the measurements of villas and manors are seemingly carried over into the first folios of GDB

The problem here is not only one of choosing the right characteristics to compare, it is also one of perception. All too often the production of the Domesday texts has been seen in rigid, mutually-exclusive stages, witness the table produced by Clarke. Symptomatic of this attitude is the assumption that, like chronicles, all documents have a single stemma, that is a straight line of transmission from a single original. The upshot has been to elaborate the taxonomy. Time and again it is asserted that if two documents share material but each contains data that are not found in the other, then they must be independently derived from a third source. So the Braybrooke Cartulary schedule has given birth to an ur-ICC and Exon to an intermediary before GDB. In reality, however, there is no necessity for documents to be copied from one source: many are patently compilations from a number of sources.

The concept of a stemma is, then, an unhelpful one, for it applies a model of authorship to a process that is of necessity other. The neat taxonomy that Clarke produces is less a function of what the texts themselves tell us than of a preconceived notion of what the Domesday process was about. What other reason is there for putting Evesham A at the head of the queue than a conviction that Domesday Book was from the outset the aim of the Domesday inquest? We are repeatedly told that all the Domesday texts with the exception of GDB are 'satellites,' they are merely a means to an end. Only thus has it been possible to put them into an order.

It seems to me that the authority for this concept is dubious. The so-called 'articles of inquiry' preserved in the prologue to IE have frequently been adduced as evidence of the purpose of the inquest at its earliest stage. They are, however, bad evidence. The articles are undoubtedly in a form that is very like that of Domesday Book: what is the name of the manor, what is its assessment to the geld, how many ploughs are there, how many men, what are its resources, what is it worth. But this list of questions does not necessarily imply a feudal survey. No mention is made of the fee and it could as easily have informed the account of each holding within the villas of ICC as a GDB-like source. In fact, the list is almost certainly very late in the Domesday process. Its very similarity to GDB should long ago have cast suspicion upon it. With no notice made of demesne livestock, it seems hardly possible that it could have informed the process that produced Exon, ICC, IE, or LDB. If not a literary conceit of the late twelfth century when IE was compiled, the list was probably drawn up as an abbreviation guide for the GDB scribe.

The form of Exon has been cited as further evidence that the production of Domesday Book was the aim of the Domesday inquest. Galbraith took issue with J. H. Round who believed that ICC was the typical product of the inquest. His objections, however, were misconceived. Whereas ICC was compiled from various sources to a conscious plan, Exon was a working record. Its form, then, is contingent to the aim of the inquest since it was a function of its sources. As Galbraith himself rightly divined, much of the Domesday data could only come from the tenant-in-chief and it was therefore inevitable that it should be first written down in a 'seigneurial' form. On its own the form of Exon is no conclusive evidence for the aim of the survey.

No more so is the form of ICC. In reality, what evidence the Domesday sources afford suggests that there was no one single enterprise. The Anglo-Saxon annalist pointedly contrasts an audit of 'how many hundred hides there were in the shire, or what land and cattle the king himself had in the country, or what dues he ought to have in twelve months from the shire' with a survey of the lands and resources of his tenants-in-chief in the words 'also he had a record made of how much land his archbishops had, and his bishops, and his abbots and his earls.' At least some of the Domesday texts may relate to the former process. Abingdon A is said in the apology that introduces it to have been derived from a hundredally-arranged source which was kept in the Exchequer with Domesday Book, and the compiler of the Crowland Domesday refers to hundred rolls likewise kept with Domesday which he had consulted. Several other records make reference, more or less unambiguously, to similar records.

It seems clear enough that any examination of the processes of the Domesday inquest must start with those documents that can be related to each other, that is, Exon, ICC, IE, and above all LDB and GDB. Devoid of any clue as to their provenance and function, the remaining texts are useless as guides. The origins of some will probably always remain uncertain. For most the best that can be hoped for is a suggested function once different processes have been identified in the principal Domesday texts.

The Domesday texts, then, do not obey the rules of charter and chronicle criticism and they should not be made to do so. In essence the inquest was an investigation, and like all effective investigations its correspondents and sources were manifold. It took evidence from representatives of all levels of society from the humblest peasant to the greatest lord, and it drew on routine administrative and estate documents as well as its own records. By its nature its sources were multifaceted and attempts to formulate a taxonomy inevitably traduces the process. We have to resign ourselves to the fact that sometimes we will remain uncertain about the function of a document. But in return we have a much richer understanding of the truly communal enterprise that was the Domesday inquest.

The essoin of bed-sickness.

[002] A person's absence is excused by an illness 'of residence,' from which the essoin
[004] difficulty in coming, no other essoin intervening, neither that of service of the king
[005] nor any other.² It lies when one [essoined] of difficulty in coming is so impeded by [006] illness³ that he cannot come, and, excusing himself from the journey, returns to his [007] home, [as where] a passing illness has turned into 'languor.' We must then see [008] whether the infirmity is a passing illness or 'languor.' If it is a passing illness, after [009] the view the essoinee will have another day, fifteen days later at least. If it is 'languor,' [010] a year and a day will then be given him, so that the year be an entire one,
[011] according as that is made up of moments, hours and days, that is, of three hundred [012] and sixty-five days and six hours, whether the year is a leap year or not, nor, because [013] of the excrescent day, will a leap year be longer by a day than any preceding [014] year, nor by an hour or a moment, as will be explained more fully below, [of the [015] year and day.]⁴ Within the year this illness is properly called 'languor,' but if it
[016] lasts beyond the year, it may be called 'dangerous disease,' that is, incurable disease.⁵
[017] An essoin of bed-sickness does not follow every essoin of difficulty in coming,
[018] for there are certain writs in which only the essoin of difficulty in coming follows, [019] simply and by itself, never the essoin of bed-sickness, except sometimes by accident, [020] as by the narratio, when a writ of entry is turned by the count into a writ of right.
[021] There, at the beginning of the suit the essoin of bed-sickness does not immediately
[022] follow the essoin of difficulty in coming, only when the nature of the writ of entry
[023] has been changed into that of a writ of right.⁶ Similarly, the essoin of bed-sickness [024] only follows immediately on the essoin of difficulty in coming when the nature of [025] the writ of common of pasture is changed into a writ of right by the count, a specification [026] of quality and quantity having been made, as in the writ of quo jure and the [027] like.⁷ The essoin of bed-sickness may follow the essoin of difficulty in coming and [028] later, by the count, cease to follow it, as where one first sues by a writ of right: he

[029] will have both essoins at the beginning, but when the writ of right is turned into a
[030] writ of entry by the count and the tenant puts himself on a jury, the essoin of bed-sickness
[031] then ceases to follow the essoin of difficulty in coming, since by the count
[032] the plea begins to be of another nature.⁸ And so in a writ of right where the inheritance
[033] descends

[001] an attorney¹ therefore, if that may conveniently be done, and if the lord does not [002] come he will swear on the soul of the lord of the suit.² he will swear that he will [003] have his lord on another day to warrant his statement and his essoin, and to [004] prove by oath that he was so detained by illness while on his way to court that [005] he was unable³ to come etc., as above. If he comes on that day, he will warrant⁴ the [006] essoin, provided he proves by oath that he was impeded as his essoiner explained in [007] putting forward his essoin. /But we must see whether the proof ought to be made [008] to the judge or to the party, because if to the judge he may remit it if he wishes, [009] because of the delay which would follow and the number of proofs. If it ought to be [010] made to the party and not the judge, it cannot, without acting contrary to law, be [011] remitted without the party's consent.⁵ Therefore if someone is absent for one or [012] another of the foregoing reasons, let him send his essoiner to excuse him and put [013] forward his excuse, in accordance with what was said above.^{6 7} <Essoins have their [014] order just like actions. There is the essoin of difficulty in coming within the realm, [015] if one falls so ill on the journey to court that he cannot appear, neither to gain nor [016] to lose. An essoin of bed-sickness or⁸ reseantisa sometimes follows this essoin, where⁹
[017] the right itself is in question. When one has been so essoined within the realm by [018] one of these or by both, the essoinee is not permitted to go outside the realm in [019] order to gain himself a delay by the essoin of beyond the sea.¹⁰ There are several [020] kinds of beyond the sea essoins, for instance, of beyond the sea and this side the sea
[021] of the Greeks and of beyond the sea of the Greeks:¹¹ 'of this side the sea of the [022] Greeks,' as on pilgrimage to St. James, or for some other necessary reason, as the [023] army or the like, in Germany or Spain or the like; /In these essoins the delay of the [024] simple essoin of beyond the sea will be given the essoinee, at least forty days and [025] one flood-tide and one ebb.¹² If mention is made of a [more] remote place, for some [026] necessary purpose, as was said above, a greater delay will be given at the will and [027] discretion of the justices, according to what seems appropriate according to the distance [028] between the places. Delays are then arbitrary, provided they are at least forty [029] days, as above. And the same will be done within the realm in the essoins mentioned

[030] above, [that is], according to the distances between the places, provided the delays
[031] are at least fifteen days.]¹³

[001] one ought to transfer himself to parts beyond the sea in order so to acquire further
[002] delays, since suits are to be restrained rather than extended.¹ And so if one is essoined [003] simply 'of beyond the sea,' without any addition, though the essoin of the [004] Holy Land would lie for him, it will never afterwards be allowed him, because after [005] he has so essoined himself, at a certain place not far away, he ought not to transfer [006] himself to more remote parts in order to acquire further delays. A plea shall never [007] remain sine die for any essoin of beyond the sea unless one has set out for the Holy [008] Land [in] a general passage.²

Essoins of the service of the lord king of this side the sea.

[010] Essoins of difficulty in coming of this side the sea are simple, but sometimes essoins [011] of this side the sea arise³ which are not essoins of difficulty in coming because the [012] essoinee is not taken ill on the way, while coming to court, but detained by the service [013] of the lord king so that he cannot come. They may⁴ precede and follow such [014] essoins,⁵ not once but more often,⁶ as long as he is in the service of the lord king,
[015] provided that on each day he has his warrant at hand.⁷ [Subject to the distinction [016] noted above,⁸ when one essoins himself of service of the lord king the essoin ought [017] to be admitted and allowed and a day given since the will of the lord king must [018] not be questioned.]⁹ If on the day given he does not have his warrant, he will remain [019] undefended.

Pleas specially excepted, in which the essoin of the service of the lord king does not lie.

[021] There are, however, certain specially excepted pleas in which the essoin of service
[022] of the lord king does not lie, because of necessity, as in the assise of darrein presentment,

[023] as [in the roll] of Trinity term in the fourteenth year of king Henry at the end
[024] of the roll, in the county of Suffolk, an assise of darrein presentment concerning the [025] church of Great Thurlow.¹⁰ [To the same intent in the roll of the Bench in the thirty-seventh [026] year of king Henry in the county of Kent, between Boniface, archbishop of [027] Canterbury, and Robert St. John, concerning the church of Eyneford.]¹¹ The time
[028] limitation makes this necessary. Sometimes the essoin of service of the lord king [029] does not lie because of favour, as in the case of dower, because if, immediately after [030] the lawful essoins of difficulty in coming, the person summoned does not appear, [031] proceedings are taken to default. Also, sometimes and according to some, because [032] of the favour shown to minors, as

[002] as against one who has no excuse. Similarly, the reason of pilgrimage excuses, [003] whether it is short or long. And here we must also see whether the summons came [004] first or did not. Serious ill-health also excuses one who has been summoned, for he [005] does not suffer the penalty for contumacy whose defence is ill-health.² It sometimes [006] arises from illness on the journey, called of difficulty in coming, [sometimes] from [007] illness at home, called of bed-sickness.³ One is also excused because he is occupied [008] in a more important case,⁴ as where one is impleaded in the lord king's court, or [009] called before it for some reason; he is excused in all inferior courts.⁵ But what is to [010] be said of court christian, since we must obey God before men? I say that the suit [011] must still be deferred,⁶ and that the king may warrant [the postponement], because [012] of the reverence due the prince.⁷ The onset of an overpowering force which cannot [013] be resisted⁸ excuses the absence of one who fails to appear up to the fourth day,⁹ [014] as where one on the way to court, having no other excuse, is captured by the enemy
[015] and detained by force so that he cannot appear. And so if he falls among thieves.
[016] And so because of accident,¹⁰ because of the force of a river, or because a bridge is [017] down, or because a heavy gale makes shipping hazardous,¹¹ provided that the person
[018] summoned cannot come in due season by a circuitous route, for if he may come [019] in time by so doing he is not excused by such accidental occurrence.

The excuses of one who does not come to court after summons.

[021] One is not excused if he leaves home later than is proper, if had [he left] earlier he [022] could have come without difficulty and the accident would not have hindered him.¹²
[023] And so if he leaves home earlier than he ought and meets with an accident, that [024] must be imputed to him, because had [he left] at a suitable time he would not have [025] met with it. And so [though] the person summoned may be in a case by which his

[026] appearance is impeded,¹³ if he sought the disputes and causes whereby he was impeded, [027] provided it was after the summons and not before. And so if he has fallen [028] into an accident willingly, when he could easily have avoided it, and here we must [029] also see whether the accident befell him before the day of summons or after it; if [030] before, the excuse lies for him, as described above. ¹⁴It will not lie if he puts forward
[031] a reason why he could not come, as¹⁵ because a bridge was down, and on the same [032] day

guilds or gilds, economic and social associations of persons engaging in the same business or craft, typical of Western Europe in the Middle Ages. Membership was by profession or craft, and the primary function was to establish local control over that profession or craft by setting standards of workmanship and price, by protecting the business from competition, and by establishing status in society for members of the guild. In the Western world today the term guild is used for certain associations that have little connection with the medieval institution. Some of the great professional associations (e.g., in medicine and law) fulfill some of the functions of the old guilds but are rarely given that name.

[002] will cause them to be attached and show what they have done to the sheriff and his [003] bailiffs.] And that if they have heard the hue and cry raised against such men, that [004] immediately on hearing it they and their household, the men of their land being [005] assembled,¹ will follow the trail through their own land and at its boundary

[007] from estate to estate with all diligence until the wrongdoers are apprehended,² [008] such pursuit not to end unless some obstacle intervenes, darkness or other reasonable

[010] after the hue has been raised, is arrested at once, pursuit shall end. And hence if a [011] man has been crushed, drowned, or has died or been killed in some other way by [012] misadventure, let the hue be raised at once but pursuit need not be made from

[021] stranger they will not permit him to depart on the morrow before daylight, and [022] then only with three or four of the nearer neighbours as witnesses.^{6 7} Let the [023] serjeants and bailiffs of the hundreds then be called together, and the names of [024] the hundreds or wapentakes and their serjeants enrolled in order, each of whom [025] shall undertake on oath to choose four knights from each of the hundreds, who [026] shall at once come before the justices to do the king's bidding. These shall immediately
[027] take an oath that they will choose twelve knights, or free and law-abiding [028] men if knights may not be found, who are not appealing anyone nor being appealed [029] themselves and are not under suspicion of breach of the peace, homicide or other [030] crime, through whom the king's business may best and most profitably be expedited.

[031] And let the knights cause the names of these juries of twelve to be noted down at [032] once on a schedule and deliver it to the justices. When the jurors arrive they also [033] shall take an oath, in this form, the first of them as follows:

A travelling man, a wayfarer, an itinerant merchant or trader.

This ancient word was originally the Anglo-French pied-poudreux, meaning someone with dusty feet (in Scotland the term was sometimes translated into the delightfully Tolkienesque dustyfoot). This was a graphic description of the state of someone travelling about on the unmade roads of medieval England. The word was most often applied to itinerant merchants who toured the country to buy and sell at fairs. Many of these fairs had been established by royal charters that gave rights to lords of the manor or religious houses to charge taxes and tolls and to enforce them. The enforcement was carried out in a rough-and-ready way through courts of piepowder (in Scotland these were sometimes known as courts of dusty feet). These courts usually had jurisdiction over such matters as contracts, trespass and debts, and they sorted out trading disputes, punished theft and violence and did their best to keep order. Because few such fairs lasted more than three days, justice had to be swift and summary. The piepowder courts died out during the course of the nineteenth century along with the fairs that had brought them into being; the last is said to have been that in Hemel Hempstead in Hertfordshire, which last met in 1898.

No resident of the city may engage in commerce here unless he is at scot and lot and contributes to the aids imposed on the community. All who are to be accepted as a peer of the city is to be of free status and not the anyone's serf – careful enquiry is to be made about this before they are admitted [to the franchise]. Those who are admitted are to undergo the entrance ceremony before at least 12 of those assigned by the community each year to this task, at one of the four set dates each year; if a lesser number is present, applicants may not be admitted (or, if they are, their entrance shall be null and void). All applicants are to be carefully questioned under oath, in private, as to the quantity of their goods; if the 12 have any doubt that he is telling the truth, they may inquire further from those who have knowledge of him and his means. If the applicant is a foreigner and has not been apprenticed in the city, he must pay at least 20s. [as entrance fine] to the community, and more if his wealth allows it. No apprentice is to be admitted as a peer unless his master and his neighbours speak well of him, and for no less than 13s.4d – more, if the 12 decide he can afford it. An indented and duplicated roll is to be kept recording the names of the 12, the name of each entrant, his fine, the names of his pledges, the terms of payment of his fine and of the year and a day, and the name of the clerk making the record; one copy of the roll shall remain in the possession of the clerk, the other shall be placed in the common chest. No-one except the sworn clerk may make such enrollments. Each entrant shall pay the clerk 6d. for that service. The new peer shall provide security for his having, within a year of his entrance, a fixed residence (unless he already has one) for him and his family and for bringing his moveable possessions into the city; if he has not accomplished this after a full year, he shall be considered as an outsider. No entrant is required to contribute to any [local] taxes in the city during the year following his entrance, except an aid towards construction or repair of the city walls; however, he will be liable to contribute to any aid or tallage imposed by the king (from which no-one can excuse himself). If a serf wishes to enter [the franchise], he must first obtain letters from his lord granting permission.

[The "12" referred to are almost certainly a quorum of the council of 24, to whom it would naturally have fallen to make the decision on whom to admit to the franchise. Since freemen had to be able to contribute to common financial burdens, it was necessary to ensure they had the material means to do so. The clause "if the 12 have any doubt..." was omitted from the Book of Pleas version.]

SCOT FREE

[Q] From Pete Barnes: “Exactly whence came the term scot free? Does it, as it sounds, refer to citizens of Scotland? Or am I reading something into that?”

[A] As with the word hopscotch, scot free has no connection with Scotsmen, frugal or otherwise. It’s a Scandinavian word meaning “payment”. The expression derives from a medieval municipal tax levied in proportional shares on inhabitants, often for poor relief. This was called a scot, as an abbreviation of the full term scot and lot, where scot was the sum to be paid and lot was one’s allotted share. (This tax lasted a long time, in some places such as Westminster down to the electoral reforms of 1832, with only those paying scot and lot being allowed to vote.) So somebody who avoided paying his share of the town’s expenses for some reason got off scot free. It was also used for a payment or reckoning, especially one’s share of the cost of an entertainment; when one settled up, one “paid for one’s scot”. Again, someone who evaded paying their share of the tab got off scot free. It’s been suggested that this usage may have come from the old habit of noting purchases of drinks and the like by making marks on a slate, or scotching it, but the evidence suggests this is just a popular etymology, and that the usage comes from the same idea of a sum due to be paid.

Trading in the city is a common right of all peers of the city, but certain persons contrary to city custom have the practice of using several of their servants, or others whom they claim to be their servants or representatives, in order to purchase multiple shares in merchandize to the disadvantage of peers. Henceforth no-one is to make purchases except personally or through a single servant only, so that his fellow citizens who may wish to join in purchasing the same merchandize are not prevented from having an equal share, as they ought. Whoever is convicted of contravening this, as result of a complaint or an action taken by the bailiffs, is to be heavily amerced and the complainant is to recover damages and his share in the bargain. If no complaint is made at the time of the offence, but one is later revealed to have been committed, the bailiffs should make enquiry and punish the guilty in a way designed to deter others and avoid the scandal such offences bring on the city, lest the community is compelled to apply a remedy by the bailiffs' failure to act.

[It was a fundamental right of freemen to be able to claim a share in any mercantile bargain made by one of their fellows, if they were present when the bargain was made. Only in special cases could they claim a share if not present. The use of multiple representatives undermined this equal shares principle, and favoured the urban upper class, which supplied most bailiffs – perhaps explaining the final clause of this chapter, suggesting that the bailiffs might be reluctant to investigate such abuses in absence of a specific complaint, and producing a statement of the source of political authority in towns.]

Every burgess who contributes to charges borne by the town may have [a share in] any merchandize brought into the haven, at the time when it is first offered for sale, without any restrictions or prevention by the original buyer [i.e. whoever first makes a bargain to purchase the cargo from its owner].

By the nomination and decision of the bailiffs and 24 then in office, at the said [electoral] assembly each year there shall be written down for each leet the names of 9 of the most "discrete well-dysposyd and indyfferent" persons of the 48 who are then present in the house[, each name on its own slip of paper]; in default of that number of the 48 [being present for each leet] other well-disposed persons then present are to be nominated [by bailiffs and 24?]. Those persons who served as electors last year to be excluded, as specified in the old ordinances. The said 9 names for each leet are to be put in 4 hats, each leet in its own hat. All 4 hats shall be brought before the bailiffs, where a child ["an innocent"] or an illiterate man shall be called forth and he shall take out of each hat 3 slips and lay them down before the bailiffs. These 12 [named persons] are to be called forth, tasked and sworn according to ancient custom of the town, and the said 12 persons so tasked shall choose the officers for the year to come, that is: 2 bailiffs, 2 chamberlains, 2 churchwardens, 2 muragers, 2 collectors of the half-dole, 8 "discrete and sufficient" herring wardens, and 4 auditors (who shall comprise 2 of the 24 and 2 of the 48, of the wisest and most sensible, skilled in auditing accounts). If 9 of the 12 [electors] are in agreement [in their choice], even though the other 3 disagree, the verdict of that 9 shall be accepted and the election shall be valid.

[1. Commission of enquiry, 16 October 1341]

Commission to Gilbert de Umfravill, earl of Anegos, Henry de Percy, Anthony de Lucy, Thomas Surteys, Thomas de Heppescotes, Thomas de Fencotes, Adam de Bowes and John de Menevill, reciting that whereas the king has been informed that men of Newcastle-upon-Tyne and other parts of the county of Northumberland are taking victuals, armour and other things to Scotland for the sustenance of his enemies and rebels, that confederacies are made in the said town with the intention that one confederacy elect as mayor, one man, and another confederacy may elect another man, whereby grievous dissensions will arise, that the collectors of customs, controllers and troners, bailiffs, escheators, taxers and collectors of the tenth and fifteenth and other quota and subsidies granted to the king, and other ministers in the said town and county have borne themselves ill in their offices, that many men of those parts have taken wools and other things liable to custom beyond the sea without payment of custom, or from the port of Berwick-on-Tweed, where less custom has to be paid thereon, and some have concealed wool to prevent its being taken for the king's service and that ministers of the king and others by colour of their offices have committed manifold oppressions in those parts, for which a remedy is not applied, he has appointed them to find by inquisition the names of those who have perpetrated the premises and specially to enquire the bearing of the ministers, to find the names of those who by conspiracy caused discords in the election of the mayor contrary to the custom of the town and the manner and cause of such conspiracy, as well as the names of those who made proclamations and alliances to disturb the place by electing a mayor after that the king on account of the dissensions over the election committed the custody of the town to four of the good men, charging all to be attendant upon them in the custody, and whether John de Denton or Richard de Acton lately elected by reason of the discord to be mayors of the town, meddled in the mayoralty after they had been inhibited by the king, to hear and determine the premises and all complaints at the county of trespasses against the peace, to order that the election of a mayor be duly held and all those hindering or opposing the election chastised and punished and to quash any election made in opposition to this.

On 5 December 1341 at Newcastle upon Tyne, jurors from various wards in the county of Northumberland presented before Thomas Surteys, Thomas de Heppescotes and their associates, king's justices assigned to sit in judgement on [\[cases involving\]](#) trespasses, conspiracies, confederacies, oppressions, injuries, grievances, and abuses committed in that county, that on 1 October of that year, when the election of the mayor of Newcastle customarily and rightfully was to take place in the town, the then mayor of the town, John de Denton, and two of the bailiffs of the town, Gilbert Haukyn and Peter Graper, had an official proclamation made that all who owed suit to the court were to be at the plea hall in Newgate of the town. But then the other two town bailiffs, Thomas de Burneton and John de Galeway, through a conspiracy hatched between themselves and Richard Scot, Thomas Flemyng, William de Burneton and others of the town, intending no good, dissociated themselves as a group from the mayor and bailiffs and, at the instigation of Richard de Acton and his wife Matilda, had a large number of the lesser people of the town (ignorant men of little understanding) gather at the church of St. Nicholas. Through this confederacy thus made among them, contrary to the custom of the town, they elected Richard de Acton as mayor in contravention of customary and usual method of electing their mayor and with the result of creating dissension and discord within the community of the town.

This indictment, among others taken before the same justices, the king caused by his writ to come before him to be tried in the following year. The sheriff was therefore ordered to have Thomas de Burneton, John de Galeway, Richard Scot, Thomas Flemyng, and William de Burneton present to answer [\[the charge at that time\]](#). The trial of Richard Scot continued from one session to another and from [\[law-\]](#) term to term until the present time – that is, 3 November 1345. On which date, a certain Henry de Bywelle, the attorney of Richard Scot, came before the king at Westminster and, when asked how he wished to acquit [\[his client\]](#) of the charges of conspiracy and trespass, he stated that the king had issued letters patent pardoning Richard Scot of the offence, and showed the pardon to the court.

On which grounds it was decided that the case against Richard be dismissed.

[\[3. Reform ordinances, 8 February 1342\]](#)

1. If any persons persistently violate the peace, by day or by night, and will not obey the custodians of the peace, all the community shall assist, and raising hue and cry, take the offenders, and have them punished according to law. And if any shall refuse to aid, etc., they shall be brought before the mayor and twenty-four brethren of the twelve mysteries, and be heavily punished and fined; one half of the fines to go to the king, and the other half to the common use of the town.

2. Every burghess of the town, whether poor or rich, or of whatsoever condition, shall have the liberty of going on board ships, whether native or foreign, to buy whatsoever merchandise may be on sale; and if any wholesale merchant go on board and purchase a large quantity of goods, every burghess of the town shall have the right to buy of him for the sustenance of his family at the same price that the merchant gave. Nothing is to be sold from a ship until a plank has been placed on board connecting the vessel with the shore, under pain of forfeiture.

3. Whereas, many quarrels and dissensions have arisen concerning the elections of mayors and bailiffs by confederations and procurations, so that the town, with its mayoralty and liberties, has fallen into the king's hands: it is ordered that twenty-four of the most honourable, decent, and honest brethren of the twelve mysteries – namely, merchants of woollen cloth, mercers, skimmers, tailors, saddlers, corn merchants or boothmen, bakers, tanners, cordwainers, butchers, smiths, fullers – shall be chosen, two from each mystery; which twenty-four shall elect four, either of themselves or of other honest, respectable, and faithful men in the community; which four shall take to themselves other eight, making twelve, and these twelve shall elect other twelve, making twenty-four, by which twenty-four the mayor for the year ensuing shall be elected, and the mayor so elected and sworn, with the aforesaid twenty-four electors, shall elect the bailiffs and all other officers for the same year.

4. It is ordained and agreed that the mayor, with the bailiffs and their chamberlains, at the end of each week, shall see and compute all the issues and profits of the town, and write them in a roll, one part of which shall remain with the mayor, bailiffs, and chamberlains, and the other part shall be delivered to the aforesaid twelve mysteries, so that the whole community shall know the value of the town at the end of each year, and in what manner the receipts and payments have been dealt with, and in order that none may sell the property of the town to the deterioration and depreciation of the community. No writing or muniment to be sealed with the common seal of the town without the consideration, consent, and inspection of the aforesaid twelve mysteries.

5. The mayor and chamberlains for the time being shall cause auditors to be elected, who shall render an account yearly, within the fifteen days before Michaelmas, of all the issues and profits of the town.

6. It is agreed that all assessors of taxes shall be elected by the twenty-four of the aforesaid mysteries, with other honest men of the community, who know well and understand the state, condition, and capabilities of the community, and the mysteries of the town; the four-and-twenty to hold a counterpart of the taxation roll against the assessors, so that the community shall be able to see that the taxes are faithfully assessed and levied.

7. It is agreed that all tax-masters and collectors of the pence of our lord the king, the mayors also, and all other officers who levy taxes and other dues from the community, shall render account to the auditors assigned and appointed by the community and the twenty-four; so that all the community may be able to see in what manner the taxes are levied, and how much of those levied by the king they are to bear. The king's assessors, however, are not to account to such auditors without the royal command.

8. It is agreed that the good usages and customs of the town shall be reduced to writing, and that copies of the same shall be delivered to the twenty-four of the mysteries, and to all other burgesses who desire it, so that the usages and customs of the town may not by the will of the bailiffs be lost.

9. In each year, on the day of election of the mayor, all charters and muniments touching the liberties of the town shall be shown and read before the community, so that if any charter or muniment be withdrawn or lost, he or they in whose custody they remain may respond and give satisfaction.

10. Whereas, pleas of land by writ are pleadable in the courts of the town of Newcastle, by virtue of the liberties thereof: it is agreed that, to avoid the disinheriting of the men of the town, the rolls of the courts shall be preserved and safely kept in the treasury as matters of record; and that the chief clerk of the town shall freely exhibit them each year at the mayor-choosing, in presence of the community. And if any of the rolls be lost or withdrawn, he shall reply and make satisfaction, etc.

11. Whereas, Tyne Bridge is in places broken, falling, and decayed, while the rents of the same are subtracted and withheld: it is ordered that the master of the bridge, with the aid of the twenty-four brethren of the twelve mysteries, and of the whole community, shall call in the arrears of payment, and apply them to the repairing and restoration of the structure.

12. Equal law shall be made and maintained in the court without change – that is to say, there shall not be one law for the rich and another for the poor. Judgement in the court shall be given according to law, and execution shall not be influenced by favour or gift to any magistrate, bailiff, or other officer. Any person convicted of offending herein shall be removed from office.

13. The assize of bread and beer shall be held and maintained according to law, and the master bakers, and not their servants, shall bear the penalties by the statute ordained. Proof or test of all measures, ells, and weights shall be made twice, or at least once a year.

14. The chattels of felons, and their lands and tenements, are to be delivered and placed in safe custody; and those who kept them, and their heirs, and all persons whomsoever having the custody of them, shall answer for the value of them to the justices itinerant, so that the community may be indemnified.

15. The fines of such persons as are convicted of any transgression against the peace and liberty of the town shall not be relaxed or condoned by favour or procuracy.

DISCUSSION

The ruling elite | Rivals for power | The contest of 1341

Other causes of the internal division | The conflict continues

Newcastle-upon-Tyne was an important town in the most northerly parts of England in medieval times, as it is today. Prior to the Conquest there were no towns in the north-east, with the possible exception of Durham; on part of the site that was to become Newcastle a small community of monks had established itself and there may in consequence have been some lay settlement in the vicinity. After the Normans began (1080) to build a castle to guard the Tyne crossing close to the coast, on the site where a Roman bridge and the fort protecting it had stood (part of the frontier defence of Hadrian's Wall), it is not surprising that more settlers were attracted. The fortification stimulated growth of both a town and a port, which quickly flourished, for throughout the medieval period there was little competition: although a few dozen settlements with some urban characteristics emerged or were founded, none rivalled Newcastle.

It had acquired distinctively urban privileges by the beginning of the twelfth century, and these were encapsulated in what may have been one of the oldest constitutional records written down within an English town, the "laws and customs of the burgesses of Newcastle". Constitutionally, it served as a model for Durham, Wearmouth, Gateshead, Alnwick, Hartlepool in the way that York, London, Oxford, and Winchester did for towns (mainly) in their parts of the country. Its customs show that commerce was already lively at Newcastle, and that the burgesses' control of commerce extended into the hinterland and up to the mouth of the Tyne. King John granted the town self-government via fee farm in 1216. Coal became increasingly important in the local economy in the decades that followed, Newcastle supplying the east coast down as far as London. Wool and hides, sourced from the flocks and herds supported on estates of the region, especially those of the Church, were predominant among the exports, however; in 1275 Newcastle was one of the ports authorized for wool export, and it became a staple town in 1326. A few years earlier, in 1318, the king had granted that the local fair, held each August, be extended from two to twenty-six days, a further indication of how the town was prospering. The abundance of wool stimulated a local cloth-making industry. By the close of the thirteenth century, local tolls on commerce were the principal source of revenue financing local administration; judging from the national taxation assessments of 1334 Newcastle was the fourth wealthiest town in the realm. As the principal port of the north-east, it later became the centre for customs administration.

The town was strategically important, particularly during the wars with Scotland when it served as a base for royal armies, and construction of stone walls was underway from the 1260s – at least, a grant of murage was obtained in 1265. Leland later described Newcastle's walls – equipped with 7 main gates, 19 towers, and turrets spaced out between the towers – as the most impressive of any English town. The town's commercial and military roles intertwined, Newcastle serving as a supply depot for the frontier settlements (e.g. Berwick) and castles that the king tried to hold within Scotland. Newcastle merchants benefitted from the victualling of the royal forces, both from local resources and by importing from other parts of the realm. A wealthy elite was able to develop in Newcastle, comprising merchants and local land-owners.

The ruling elite

Although we know the names of several reeves who administered the town in the latter half of the twelfth century, government by mayor and bailiffs was an outcome of the royal charter of 1216. A merchant gild also existed and may have been particularly important in an earlier period. As was common in towns, the wealthy elite furnished the office-holders and some leading families provided heads of government over several generations. The Scot family was one such, a Nicholas Scot having served as mayor at some point in the 1220s, Peter Scot on several occasions in the 1240s and '50s, another Nicholas Scot in 1259/60, while in the 1270s and 1280s it was Henry Scot who served several mayoral terms, he and John Scot appearing in the office (sometimes called "chief bailiff") in the 1290s. Henry's son, another John, was bailiff 1314/15. The last member of the family – assuming they are all related – to hold the mayoralty was another Nicholas Scot, elected in 1310 and again in 1321, by which time he had acquired a knighthood and served as sheriff of Northumberland. The Richard Scot who features in the political conflict of the 1340s never attained the mayoralty, although he had tasted power through election as one of the bailiffs in 1332, 1333, 1335, and 1337; he seems to have been a grandson of Sir Nicholas.

The only other family as prominent in Newcastle politics in the thirteenth century was the Karliols: Henry de Karliol appears as a bailiff in 1232/33 and in the following year, and then for at least two terms during the 1240s, when a Thomas de Karliol also appears in that office; Henry was mayor for at least half of the terms during the 1250s, and Thomas served as bailiff and mayor in the same decade. The two men practically monopolized the mayoralty in the 1260s, with Thomas apparently serving for at least five terms and continuing his run into 1270, further terms in the office came in 1270/71 and 1278/79. In the 1260s a Thomas de Karliol junior appears as bailiff, once during Henry's administration and once during Thomas senior's, and again during the latter's mayoralties of 1270/71 and 1272/73; Thomas junior was Henry's son. He was again elected bailiff in 1277 and for four consecutive terms 1286-89 (still referred to as "junior"). A Hugh de Karliol had joined the roster in the 1280s, with several terms as bailiff and he became mayor in 1291, although his term was cut short when the town liberties were suspended in February 1292 by the king, as a result of Quo Warranto proceedings into whether the town had the right to a mayoralty; after the liberties were restored, the town used the term "chief bailiff" instead of mayor, but during Edward II's reign the title of mayor gradually crept back in. Hugh de Karliol reappears as chief executive in 1294/95, but his baton was passed along to Nicholas de Karliol, bailiff for four consecutive terms (1299-1302), and immediately afterwards elected mayor in 1303 and re-elected in 1304. During that last term, Thomas son of Hugh de Karliol was one of the bailiffs. Nicholas was again mayor in 1309/10, and Thomas, having served as bailiff from 1309 onwards, was moved up to the mayoralty in 1313. The family had all but exhausted itself, however; although a Hugh de Karliol was bailiff in 1344/45 and 1347/48, this surname does not appear again among the office-holders until the very close of the century.

As the political power of the Karliol family began to wane, that of the Emeldon family briefly rose to community leadership in the person of Richard de Emeldon. As he was the first of that surname to enter the ruling elite at Newcastle, it is likely he was an immigrant, presumably from the Northumberland village of Embleton (about half-way along the coast between Newcastle and Berwick). Although his commercial activities and his tax assessment were, when he first appears in the 1290s, modest, his listing in the tax record next to that of wealthy burgess Samson Cutler, along with evidence from his chantry foundations, has led to the hypothesis he may have first married Cutler's daughter and later the widow of John Scot [Edward Miller, "Rulers of Thirteenth Century Towns: The Cases of York and Newcastle upon Tyne," Thirteenth Century England: Proceedings of the Newcastle upon Tyne Conference 1985, Woodbridge: Boydell Press, 1986, 131-32.]

He was to become the most prominent townsman of his time: political leader, the principal wool merchant of the town, and ship-owner; as a self-made man, we can imagine that he was forceful and self-confident. Bailiff in 1301/02 and re-elected in 1302 and 1303, he became chief bailiff in either 1305 or 1306, was again elected to the office in 1307 and 1308, 1311 and 1312, and then for no less than 7 consecutive terms from 1314 to 1320, before Sir Nicholas Scot interrupted a run that then continued through the 1320s – although we do not have a complete list, Emeldon's name is the only one appearing as what now was mayor again up to 1329. He was put back in office, for the last times, in 1331 and 1332. Rarely in any English town was seen such a prolonged domination of the leading office in local government, but Richard failed to establish a dynasty: his heirs were daughters, and the John de Emeldon who was frequently bailiff between 1345 and 1368 was the son of Richard's nephew William de Emeldon (and thereby grandson of John de Denton). It took the battle of Halidon Hill (1333) to bring Richard's career to a close, he dying along with his contingent of 47 footsoldiers. This must have been a traumatic loss for the people of Newcastle, and likely helped set the stage for the political conflict to follow.

It is immediately following the end of Richard de Emeldon's "reign" that the principals who were later to engage in a bitter political hostility came to the political forefront. In fact, Constance Fraser ["The life and death of John of Denton", Archaeologia Aeliana, 4th ser., vol.4 (1959), 306] has argued that the appointment of Adam de Galeway, Richard de Acton and John de Denton as collectors of murage in 1327 is a reflection of the new order coming into power, as Emeldon (who was to be one of the supervisors of the muragers, together with Thomas Frismareys and Thomas Daulyn) had yielded to such men his formerly pre-eminent role in the export trade. Denton and Acton were re-appointed in the murager posts in 1332. In 1333 John de Denton was elected to his first mayoralty; he was to return to the post in 1336, 1337, 1340, and 1341. He had already been in the post of customs collector for some years. By the beginning of 1333 he had been given the authority to enforce the king's rights to a wine prise in Newcastle and other ports in the north-east, and in 1334 he and Acton were royal tax collectors. He was beginning to amass a large amount of power.

Perhaps from the beginning political rivalries were active: following Denton's first mayoralty, Richard de Acton was elected in 1334, and it appears that Denton may have been replaced towards the close of his 1337/38 term, as Hugh de Hecham is named as mayor in a deed in September 1338. However, this is flimsy evidence on which to base solid conclusions, and any notion of opposing factions seeking to control local administration is weakened by the personnel in the ballivalty. Of those later associated with the Acton faction:

- William de Burneton had already held the mayoralty in 1330/31, when his bailiffs were Hugh de Hecham (who however, was replaced around May 1331 by Gilbert Haukyn), John de Denton, Robert de Haliwell, and Waleran de Lumley; Burneton had been bailiff under Emeldon in 1314/15, from 1316 to 1319, in 1323/24 and 1325/26, and from 1328 to 1330, as well as under Sir Nicholas Scot in 1321/22. Other men of this surname had been bailiffs in the 1260s and '70s.

- Richard Scot was a bailiff during Denton's first mayoralty (1333/34), again under Hugh de Hecham (1335/36) and once more under Denton again (1337/38).
- Robert de Haliwell was bailiff during Denton's third mayoralty, he having earlier served under Emeldon in 1323/24, 1327-30, and 1331/32, as well as under William de Burneton (above) and in 1334 under Acton.
- John de Galeway was first bailiff during Hecham's mayoralty of 1335/36, then again under John de Denton in 1340/41, while his brother Richard de Galeway had served during the 1339/40 mayoralty of Waleran de Lumley; the Adam de Galeway who had been bailiff ca.1306 was father to John and Richard, and like Emeldon a self-made man.
- Thomas de Burneton was another of the bailiffs during the mayoralties of Lumley (1339/40) and Denton (1340/41).
- John Frismareys' first ballivalty came under Hugh de Hecham (1335/36); he was again elected in October 1344, but his tenure was brief (see below).

We know fewer of the names clearly associated with the Denton faction, but of those:

- Gilbert Haukyn first appears as bailiff in 1317, alongside Acton and Burneton and mayor Emeldon, this group being re-elected en masse in 1318, with Haukyn continuing for a third term in 1319/20; he was again repeatedly elected bailiff from 1321 to 1323 and in 1325 (no election results being known for 1324 and 1326), and again repeatedly from 1332 to 1334, during which period he first served alongside Denton, then under him, and finally under Acton. He was bailiff again during the Denton administrations of 1336/37 and 1340/41, and that of Lumley in 1339/40.
- Peter le Graper, by contrast, was a relatively new figure in the leadership, having first been elected bailiff in 1337 (under Denton), and his 1340/41 ballivalty was only his second. However, his father, a prominent merchant of the same name, had been bailiff in 1293/94, ca.1295, 1296/97, and 1299/1300, before himself holding the mayoralty for three consecutive terms between 1300 and 1303 (Emeldon first serving under him); and Peter junior appears to have married into the Karliol family. The younger Peter therefore had some roots in the urban ruling class, although Peter senior's father Osmund was a newcomer to the town, a branch of a county gentry family of declining fortunes.

Although it is clear that the top positions in local government were being repeatedly held by a relatively small group of townsmen, the groupings of personnel do not themselves provide any clear insight into factional affiliations in the years preceding the outbreak of hostilities. But then it is perfectly possible that former colleagues fell out, or that political alliances were fluid. Nor should we assume that any particular administration would be staffed solely by members of a particular party, any more than is the case with urban governments today. However, one possible indication of the alliance later to manifest itself in opposition to Denton is given in 1336, when Richard Scot and John de Galeway, then bailiffs, were arrested for the murder of two members of the Lubbard family, with an accusation made at the same time that they had abused their positions of power. Their fellow bailiff, John Frismareys, allowed Scot to escape from custody. All three bailiffs were removed from office. That those ordered to arrest Scot and Galeway were Denton, Acton, and Adam and Peter Graper, may or may not be significant, but at the next election Denton became mayor and the only bailiff of the previous administration untouched by the scandal, Gilbert Haukyn, continued in the ballivalty under Denton. Whether or not this was a sign of political problems within the town, it did not prevent Scot's re-appearance as a bailiff in 1338, and the king dropped the case against Scot and Galeway in June 1339; Frismareys had already been commissioned, in 1337, to levy wool in the north for the king. The king's need for such men to help him finance his foreign campaigns was greater than his need to see justice was done.

Rivals for power

Returning to the two chief opponents, although Denton had more of a grip on the mayoralty than Acton in the 1330s, Richard de Acton had been in government longer, having first been elected to the ballivalty in 1310 (under Nicholas Scot), again in 1315, 1316, 1317, 1318, 1320, and 1322 (all under Emeldon). Since Emeldon was Acton's father-in-law, we may be suspicious. However, Denton's first ballivalty came under Emeldon, in the 1327/28 term, and he was re-elected either the following year or the year after that, or both; Denton served again in 1330 (under Burneton), and for a final time in 1332 (under Emeldon).

Richard de Acton had followed in Emeldon's footsteps as an immigrant who made his fortune in Newcastle commerce; in 1308 he was the second largest exporter of wool from Newcastle, only Richard de Emeldon shipping more. Acton's rise was assisted by good family connections. Whereas Emeldon's family background is obscure, Acton was a younger son of a gentry family. His father, of the same name, had been married to the daughter of one of the Thomas de Karliols, although the son from this marriage predeceased the father and Richard junior was a son by an earlier or later marriage. The younger Richard himself made his marriage alliance with Matilda, daughter of Richard de Emeldon. Having married the daughter of the leading townsman and having been closely associated with the Emeldon regime, he may have considered himself the rightful successor to his father-in-law in the political sphere. An eighteenth century writer on Newcastle's history identified Richard de Acton as mayor in 1333; Welford tried to reconcile this with evidence of Denton's mayoralty in 1333/34 by proposing that Acton became acting mayor after Emeldon's death. Although not inconceivable for a family member to take over the duties, it remains unsubstantiated and it would have been equally if not more likely for one of the bailiffs to take the lead; Acton was not among their number, although Denton was – a stint as acting mayor would have positioned him well to win election in October 1333.

Denton was evidently on good terms with Emeldon too, for there was some family connection by marriage (see below) and he was one of Emeldon's executors; along with his co-executor, clergyman William de Emeldon, whose living at Bothal was close to an estate in Denton's hands, he petitioned the king for repayment of a debt of £26.13s.4d owed for cloth bought by Edward II from Richard de Emeldon ca.1313 – an action (which obtained consent from the king in March 1334, although this was not itself assurance of the money being forthcoming) that would have benefited Acton. On the other hand, Denton's control over disposition of the Emeldon estate, which Matilda had to share with her older sister Agnes, wife of a son of Peter Graper, and her younger sister Jacoba, then underage, could have been one source of problems between Acton and Denton; division of the property remained an issue until at least 1342, when Jacoba (by then married to Alan de Claveryng) was able to lay claim to her share. Denton himself had married the daughter of Thomas Daulyn, bailiff in 1320/21 and 1321/22, and the first occasion on which he is found exporting (wool pells) happens to be just after his father-in-law had been appointed collector of customs on wool.

Whether Denton and Acton were rivals or friends during Emeldon's tenure cannot be said. Fraser [John of Denton, 320-21] found it inconceivable, given their long association in various roles, that they could have been personal enemies, and consequently concluded that Acton was only the figurehead for a faction led by Denton's real enemies, particularly Richard Scot and the Galeways. However, although the pair may have been colleagues on good terms for much of their careers, the difficulties besetting Newcastle's ruling class (described below) could have altered this and turned collaboration into competition. It can be argued that, in the years following Emeldon's death, Acton appears to have been denied the access to the mayoralty he might have expected, given his seniority and experience; this could have been blamed on the economic success, and corresponding political influence, of Denton and his supporters. Acton's response to this peripheralization was ultimately to resort to extraordinary measures to obtain power. We should not focus on Acton's role to the exclusion of those of others, who had their own reasons to be jealous of Denton's successes; but the royal administration (as we shall see) viewed Acton as one of the prime movers, not just a figurehead, in the conflict that would disrupt Newcastle in the early 1340s, while Denton himself in his original complaint claimed that Acton was a willing participant in his election. An alternative hypothesis might point the finger at Acton's wife, Matilda de Emeldon. It was very unusual for a woman to be blamed in a political dispute, since women had no role in politics; yet at the investigation in 1341 she was evidently blamed – probably by Denton – as an instigator of the opposing faction. Perhaps, as suggested above, she was in conflict with Denton over her father's estate and helped turn Acton against Denton.

The evidence for overt political or personal conflict prior to 1341, or to situations that could have given rise to the same, is not unambiguous.

- In 1336 repairs to the ruinous Westgate and its drawbridge, defending the weakest stretch of wall, were begun; but the following year it was reported that the gate was still in bad shape, and in April the king gave permission to the mayor (John de Denton) and bailiffs to spend up to £40 out of the borough fee farm to pay for work, but with the proviso that this be done under supervision of Richard Acton and Robert de Shilvyngton (one of the bailiffs). Despite this, in February 1339 an enquiry began into allegations of misappropriation of murage proceeds.
- April 1337 also saw Sir Ralph de Neville, one of the leading men of the county, appointing attorneys to prosecute Acton and Denton for a recognizance for £200 made to him in Chancery – one of the attorneys being a William de Emeldon, Denton's son-in-law; unfortunately no context for this is given, so we cannot tell if it reflects, for example, some co-venture of the pair, or perhaps an aspect of arbitration of disputes between them.

- In November 1338, Denton was one of a long list of persons summoned before the king for refusing to obey royal orders; again, the context is absent.
- In May 1339, Denton was ordered, upon threat of punishment, to hand back a wool prise he had taken possession of (in what capacity or for what reason is not stated) from the king's receivers.
- In July 1339, the Exchequer was instructed by the king to allow more time to Denton and Acton to present their account as customs collectors at Newcastle, a post Denton had held since 1328 and Acton had become his colleague from September 1333; although such respites were not unusual, this could be a pointer to problems, and several years as customs collectors could well have provided occasion for the pair to agree or disagree on capitalizing on the opportunities for corruption that such a post offered. On the other hand, when respite had been given the pair in 1335, it was because they were busy on the king's business; in Denton's case at least this involved supplying the Berwick garrison and escorting the earl of Moray from one English prison to another. Denton was recommissioned in the role in February 1340, but without Acton, whose place was taken by Richard de Galeway; that pair were themselves replaced in May 1341, by Robert de Shilvyngton and John de Galeway. This was an unusually rapid rate of turnover in the posts.
- In July 1341 Edward III granted Newcastle a renewal of murage (the previous grant was due to expire in March 1342) for 7 years; he appointed as collectors John de Denton, Waleran de Lumley, Richard de Acton, Robert de Shilvyngton, and Richard de Galeway. However, this group could not agree on how to proceed; in May 1343 the king ordered the borough authorities to have the community elect new collectors, for some of the original group had refused to participate in collection, while Denton and others had retained what money was collected and were refusing to apply it to walling the town. Whether this falling out pre-dates or post-dates the October 1341 election, however, is not clear.

The contest of 1341

What does seem clear, however, is that both Acton and Denton had set their sights on capturing (or in the latter's case recapturing) the mayoralty at the election at the beginning of October. Denton having possession, and evidently good support within the ruling elite, he was able to use the customary machinery to achieve his ends. Acton's election, while unconventional, was founded on the authority of the community, and he also had his supporters from within the ruling elite; his popular support allowed him to get the upper hand.

Denton could have lost no time in seeking royal intervention. There is an undated petition from him describing, in terms later reflected in royal orders issued, the rival elections, the resulting dissension within the town, and revealing that Acton had strengthened his position by having his supporters take control of the town gates [C.M. Fraser, ed. Ancient Petitions Relating to Northumberland, Surtees Society, vol.176 (1966), 33-34]. That Denton was in the disadvantaged position is indicated in that he did not request royal approval of his election. He instead proposed that the king order both men not to assume mayoral office but hand over the reins of government to Gilbert Haukyn, Peter Graper, Robert de Haliwell, and William de Acton, whom Denton described as the town bailiffs (the set elected by Denton's supporters, one assumes), and that Richard de Acton should be ordered to hand over to those four the keys to the town gates, until the king and his council could investigate the disturbance.

The king followed that advice, appointed the four men as custodians of the town on October 16, 1341 and on the same day commissioning an enquiry (as above). We need not imagine from this that Edward was favouring Denton's cause; he had his own agenda. In the decade before Edward III came to power, England had suffered much from factionalism. At his first parliament, the young king had set the tone for the opening decades of his reign, by removing all sheriffs, calling for an investigation into oppressions by officials, and demanding that judges not be persuaded to favour anyone but act strictly according to law and custom in dispensing justice equally to rich and poor. This promising beginning came to little. By 1341 Edward was in severe financial straits, due to lavish spending to win friends and allies and on his Flemish campaign. His military efforts were frustrated by lack of funds: tax revenues did not come in fast enough, forcing him to borrow and repay from tax proceeds, something that was unpopular. Deflation contributed to the difficulty in collecting taxes. The tax of one-ninth was granted for two consecutive years by parliament in March 1340, but only in return for the king conceding some wide-ranging reforms. Once more it proved difficult to collect what was assessed, and a prise of 30,000 sacks of wool was resorted to in place of the cash collection, but this too met with resistance. An angry Edward, forced to abandon his campaign, upon returning to England instituted a sweeping enquiry into the supposed maladministration of the officials he blamed for failing to produce the funds he had needed; he discovered in the process an opportunity to help refill his coffers through large fines. Such was Edward's frame of mind when news reached him of the events at Newcastle. His mood may also have been influenced by a large debt the Newcastle burgesses were asking him to repay (see below), and by news that Scottish forces were in the field – he could not afford instability in one of the principal bulwarks against Scottish invasion.

Having suspended the mayoralty and appointed local custodians, Edward on the same day appointed a commission of enquiry which included royal justices Thomas Surteys and others, and later sent his keeper of the privy seal, Sir William de Kildesby, to oversee the investigation. It is possible the burgesses tried to stave off what was coming by holding a new mayoral election, with Robert de Shilvyngton as their choice, but the king was having none of it. Because of the threat of a Scottish invasion, Edward was hard on Kilsby's heels and was present when the inquisition into events was held, which must therefore have been in November.

The investigation must have given the opportunity for all elements of the community to voice all sorts of grievances. For example, at some point during 1341, in the course of a riot that pitted townsmen against the retinue of the earl of Warwick, the former had broken down the gates of the Dominican friary, where the earl was lodged, and the friars now complained that they had not been permitted by local authorities to replace their gates; on 6 December, the king acknowledged the problem and gave the friars the go-ahead.

Seeing perhaps the opportunity to counterbalance the money the king owed the burgesses, Kildesby imposed hefty fines on the principals in the political dispute, totalling £1775.13s.4d, payable in instalments. The largest fine (£266.13s.4d) was laid upon Waleran Lumleye, who had been superseded in the mayoralty by Denton, in 1340; the fine seems less related to any role in the political hostilities, however, than to other offences by Lumleye who was convicted of customs evasion and who, in October 1342 along with Robert de Haliwell, acquired a pardon for having traded with the Scots. John de Denton and Richard Scot received the next largest fines (£200 each) with John Frismareys next (£166.13s.4d); the size of the fines of Denton and Frismareys was because they were also found guilty of customs evasion. Apart from Scot's, the largest fine associated purely with the political disturbance was £160, laid on Richard Acton, again associated with his wife. William Acton, Robert de Haliwell and his sons John and Robert, John and Richard Galeway, Thomas Flemyng, and Geoffrey Wandesford were also heavily fined. A fine of £500 was also imposed on the community as a whole. The king furthermore suspended borough liberties and turned local government over to a warden in the person of Sir William Felton on November 30; Felton, as sheriff of Northumberland, appointed a sub-warden to govern the town.

Other causes of the internal division

It has been suggested that this conflict was essentially one between the merchant guild and the craft guilds, because of the power accorded the latter in the 1342 ordinances. This was doubtless one dimension of the affair, but things were more complicated than that. There was evidently a struggle for control of government between the empowered and disempowered. The former being, it appears, some of those who had dominated government in recent years, backed by a portion of the enfranchised residents, who were themselves among the better-off townsmen and probably predominantly merchants. The latter included non-freemen, some craftsmen, and some of the town merchants who may have objected to Denton's recent domination of the mayoralty, and been at once envious of his financial success and resentful of how he had achieved it as the king's purveyor, and collector of customs and taxes.

The appointment of the custodians on October 16 echoed the terminology of Denton's petition in describing his supporters as the "older and worthier men" of the community, and Acton's as "some of the young people", which led one historian to characterize the latter as "the young hotheads of the town" [Thomas Hodgkin, "Municipal contests in Newcastle, 1342-1345," Archaeologia Aeliana, 3rd ser., vol.5 (1908), 6]. However, the sense of the terms should be understood less strictly in terms of age than as "senior" and "junior", or greater and lesser. In other words, Denton was claiming to have been elected by the better men of the town, meaning those of the ruling elite, while Acton's support was derogated as coming from those not really qualified to meddle in politics. At the same time, Acton's characterization of his supporters as the elder men of the community was an attempt to capitalize on the belief, in the patriarchal society of late medieval England, that older males were more respectable and credible than younger counterparts, had more experience and wisdom, and so had a greater claim to authority.

Why there had been an acrimonious split within the ruling class itself is a complex issue. To better understand matters we have to draw back and look at what was going on in the wider arena. A number of factors were putting the leading members of Newcastle's community under fierce pressure, and it may have been that things started to come apart after the sudden loss of the strong leadership of Richard de Emeldon.

First and foremost there were the hostilities with Scotland, an almost continuous problem for the northern shires from about 1296 to 1346. While Edward I had carried the war into Scotland, under Edward II England was largely on the defensive and Robert de Bruce was subjecting Northumberland to systematic attacks in order to break the morale of the residents and force Edward to negotiate peace. In such a difficult situation, we can hardly be surprised that some leading men defected to the Scottish side, when they felt they had to do so to protect their property – e.g. the rebellion of Sir Gilbert de Middleton in 1318. Although this offered scope for the entrepreneurial, the risks were high and fortune was fickle. As well, the war countered profitable opportunities with onerous demands on the townsmen, particularly the wealthier.

Some townsmen benefited more than others from the situation: Richard de Emeldon, Gilbert Haukyn, and John de Denton were prominent among those who were contracted to supply the king with cloth and victuals. Denton for example was very active in victualling the renewed campaign to recapture Berwick in 1332. Occasionally, merchants might benefit from surplus army stocks, as in 1323, when Emeldon, Richard de Acton, William de Acton, Robert de Musgrave and William Thorald bought flour for £633.6s.8d. But while the royal army was a valuable client for Newcastle's merchants, providing supplies was one thing, getting paid for them quite another. At some point in the final years of Edward II's reign, Thomas de Karliol was pursuing a debt of almost £66 owed him by the king for victuals supplied for the army. Sometimes it was not a matter of purchase, but of forced requisitioning; an earlier petition by Karliol in the same period asked that a debt of £60 due from his account as collector of the new custom at Newcastle (in which position he was for most of the period from 1304 to 1318, partnering with Nicholas de Karliol) be offset against £126 due him for goods seized for the king's needs.

In similar fashion, Robert Oliver, who had been collector of wool customs at Newcastle 1317-23, had been called to account for £366 due from him in that role; in response he had asked allowance for £140 owed him by the king (he having the bills to prove it) and £100 he had paid out to others on royal orders. His requests having been disallowed by the auditors at Michaelmas 1323, he was over the next few months intermittently put in Marshalsea prison, until a final hearing after which he was committed to the Fleet and later the Tower of London, where he spent over two years, despite the king ordering the Exchequer at the close of 1324 to allow most of the claimed deductions. In 1327, Oliver, noting losses he had suffered from the Scots and from burnings, and his good service to the Crown, asked again for the deductions to be made and for him to be allowed to pay the remainder in installments; this was granted.

The king often decided to pay his debts through assignments to his creditors from customs or taxes. For example, in May 1338 the king ordered that his debt to Richard de Acton be repaid by allowing Acton to export wool worth £61.15s.1d duty-free, this being reimbursement for the king's seizure of his wool at Dordrecht (see below); while the following year John de Denton was given a similar permission. But the course of such arrangements did not always run smooth. In 1339 a loan from various Newcastle merchants of £4,000 was to be repaid from the customs they or their "friends" would pay on wool exports; to ensure their access to this revenue stream, the merchants were given the counter-cocket, so that no goods could (in theory) be exported without their knowledge. The following year Robert de Shilvyngton, John Flemyng, Peter Favoler, Thomas Deverwik, John de Haliwell, John de Bury and other of these merchants complained that the arrangement was being violated, in part by the collectors, and in part at the orders of the king, who had licenced Italian merchants to export without application of the counter-cocket and later ordered the merchants to turn the counter-cocket over to a German consortium. With almost half of their original loan outstanding, the merchants were apparently obliged to loan an additional £1333.6s.8d to the king in order to get his agreement to a new arrangement for repaying the now expanded debt, from the taxation of one-ninth recently granted by parliament. This arrangement also went sour, when the king gave priority to paying the expenses of the contingents led by the earls of Salisbury and Suffolk against the Scots; in March 1341 it was agreed that the proceeds from the ninth be divided equally between the earls and the merchants.

Gilbert Haukyn complained to the king, ca.1323, that his three warehouses had been commandeered for one-and-a-half years, as storage depots for grain to provision the army, but that he had never been compensated for the rent of £6 due. Admittedly this was partly Haukyn's own fault, for refusing compensation offered him in the form of a quantity of oats, instead demanding a cash payment. But the point of concern to us here is that many of the town's merchants lost the use of their warehouses for the same reason.

Newcastle was often required to furnish and equip, with crews and provisions, ships from its mercantile fleet to support military campaigns or to patrol the seas in search of the enemy. For example, in June 1324 the king sent orders to mobilize all ships of over 40 tuns belonging to townsmen, of which there were six at that time, of which two belonged to Robert de Musgrave (of which one had been captured, apparently temporarily, by Zeelanders the previous year) and two to members of the Haukyn family; the mayor and bailiffs responded that the ships were all off on voyages, but they promised to impress them as soon as they returned. Again, in May 1337, orders were sent to commandeer all ships of that size for convoy work in Scotland; four ships were removed from commerce during peak season as a result, one being occupied for 7 weeks, another for 18, the third for three periods totalling 26 weeks, and the fourth for two periods totalling 24 weeks. The total cost to the townsmen to equip crews of sailors and soldiers was almost £500; they were in due course to obtain reimbursement from the Exchequer, but the auditing of their accounts resulted in the rejection of about 10% of the expenses claimed, on the grounds of inadequate documentation. By 1340, the Newcastle townsmen were pursuing a claim of £723 they said was owed them for the expenses of ships ordered into service against the Scots, and in July 1341 the king indicated preparedness to make allowance from the borough's fee farm for £868.11s.9d for the cost of the ships and purveyance of supplies for the royal household; the farm, however, was only £100, so reimbursement would be slow. No wonder that the burgesses were reluctant to submit to their ships being commandeered; in September 1342, William de Acton's arrest was ordered because when his ship La Rose was impressed at Sandwich for war service, he and the ship's master broke it free.

A petition to the king from mayor Denton in 1333/34 explained that, in mayor Emeldon's time, by royal order two ships had been sent to sea to take action against the Scots; they had returned with five Flemish ships in which Scots had been found and handed over their cargoes to a royal official. Subsequently, the Flemings had retaliated for this capture by seizing merchandise of Newcastle men, valued at £666.13s.4d. Denton asked the king to consider the losses suffered by townsmen because of the war and the costs of maintaining the town and its bridge, and to arrange for release of the captured cargoes, to exchange for the goods held in Flanders.

Some of Newcastle's merchants were able to capitalize on the war, and on rebellions in the disturbed north, like William de Acton, who obtained from the king in 1331 a ten-year lease of lands in Swinburn forfeited from Sir John de Middleton, hanged for his part in the rebellion of 1318; the land had earlier been leased by another Newcastle wool merchant, William Thorald, and Acton seems to have been seeking to take it over as part of a marriage settlement with Isolda Thorald. In 1339 Acton's son, of the same name, had settled on him when he married into the Newcastle mercantile family, the Musgraves, other land in the same area: an estate was being built up. Richard de Emeldon had acquired over the course of his career substantial property throughout the county, some of it through securities for loans made to Northumberland gentry subsequently ruined by the war or other difficulties. John de Denton and Richard de Acton likewise had county interests. Denton for example is seen in 1337 farming from the Countess of Pembroke her manor of Woodhorn and the borough of Newbiggin (both not far north of Newcastle), the reversion of which properties Denton had acquired from the king between 1335 and 1337 – the countess holding only for life, although she would disappoint Denton by living to 1375. And for some years prior to 1344 he had held, by royal grant, the custody of the village of Matfen (east of Newcastle) during the minority of the heir of the earl of Athol, probably in relation to his lease from the earl of the manor of Ponteland, possession of the larger part of which the king subsequently confirmed to him as a reward for his services to the Crown.

Investment in rural estates was on the one hand an avenue for social advancement, and on the other a means of banking profits from commerce in a way that was relatively secure and provided an annual dividend as well as a nest-egg for retirement. However, the security of such investments was precarious in times of war. Any undefended lands were liable to be laid waste by Scottish raiders, and the continual threat of attack must have been disruptive to efforts to raise crops or livestock and therefore the profitability of estates. In 1364 the manor of Woodhorn, still farmed up to that time by Denton's son, was described as laying utterly waste; the son was in the process of transferring his interest to a member of the Wydryngton family, which his own son continued. Throughout the 1320s we see repeated complaints from the county community about the ruination caused by the war; mid-decade it was being said (probably with exaggeration) that 200 townships in the county had been deserted by their inhabitants. If it wasn't the Scots laying waste to the countryside, then the English army was causing similar problems, either commandeering local produce, or destroying it and driving off livestock to prevent them falling into Scottish hands. Ca.1328 the burgesses of Newcastle were seeking compensation from the king for their grain crops growing in the fields around the town, which the king's army had destroyed on his last campaign (the army camped around Newcastle in July 1327); in consequence, the town merchants asked permission to trade wherever they could, in order to obtain the victuals the townspeople would need to keep them from starvation.

Building of a defensive ditch and wall around the town was almost a luxury for most English towns, which rarely came under threat (particularly after the period of wall-building had peaked), but for a town like Newcastle – not in the immediate line of fire, but not far behind – it was a vital undertaking. The ditch had been completed by 1316, but wall-building continued, with a 7-year murage granted in 1327; as the opening years of Edward III's reign saw a lull in hostilities with Scotland, there is some question as to the seriousness with which construction of the defences continued; however, with renewal of the conflict in 1332, an extension for ten more years was obtained, and this too was again prematurely renewed in 1341 (see above). Despite these grants, it appears that part of the cost fell directly on the shoulders of the townsmen themselves. So too did the burden of manning the walls; obligations for watch-and-ward, necessity though it was, created another impediment for townsmen trying to carry on a business – not just the merchants of course, but also artisans or wage-earners, who had fewer opportunities than the merchants to capitalize on the war effort. A petition to the king from the Newcastle community in 1316 asked for financial relief, due to costs and losses incurred in keeping the town safe from the Scots: defences had been built at much effort and expense; lands outside the defences had nonetheless been wasted by the enemy; the merchants and craftsmen of the town had found it difficult to earn a living because of the obligations to guard the town; and what cargoes the merchants had been able to ship had been captured at sea by Scots or Flemings. The king responded by pardoning payment of the fee farm for two years, although the final authorization for this did not come through until November 1318.

In addition to the costs of walling, the project aggrieved some of the local landowners, across whose property the line of the ditch and walls had to run. In 1337 Richard del Haye complained to the king that the sheriff had torn down his house, on the grounds that its proximity to the castle made it a potential security threat, but that he was still being charged rent on the property; that this demolition had taken place at least twenty years earlier, before completion of the town walls had been completed (which would have made the action unnecessary), is itself suggestive of the difficulty in obtaining compensation for losses. Ironically, by the time Haye laid his complaint the castle fabric had so deteriorated that an enquiry was ordered, and the king had to authorize expenditure on repairs. The town wall must have caused far more problems than the castle. A decision in 1310 to alter the planned course of the wall, so as to enclose a larger part of the town (notably the quayside) probably led to a few surprises for local landowners, although it was noted that the security of the town outweighed the resulting nuisance to inhabitants.

Earlier, in 1300, the Newcastle authorities had requested that the Carmelite friary be relocated (it was proposed to move the brethren to the house of the Friars of the Sack, so diminished that only one friar now lived there), as its church stood where the wall had to run, and therefore construction was held up. Because of the slow process of the royal bureaucracy's information-gathering and decision-making, the transfer did not take place until 1307. The new location, however, also proved to be in the line of fire, for ca.1333 the friary was on a list of complainants that also included St. Mary's Hospital, Nicholas de Karliol, Peter Graper, John de Denton, Nicholas de Stockton (custodian of a chapel on the Tyne bridge), Adam Page, Thomas Thorald, John Paton, Emma Eyre, and Richard de Aukelond, all of whom had lost portions of properties they owned, when the town wall was built across them. They requested compensation out of the receipts from murage, or some other source – if granted, such a request was likely to arouse resentment in the community, which would see the money being raised for its defence going into the pockets of private citizens.

Another effect of the war was that it disrupted judicial machinery in the region, which in turn gave rein to greater flouting of the law – a situation made easier by war conditions in the first place. The "poor men of the county" were ca.1319 begging the king to ensure justices of assize came to the county, it being claimed they had refrained from appearing for some years due to the state of war; at the same time, the harrying of the shires by Scottish forces had so impoverished the residents that they were unable to pay their traditional dues. If war bred crime – and it was widely believed that increased levels of violent crime were due to soldiers returning from the wars – a related concern, not restricted to the north, was over Edward III's preparedness to sell pardons to criminals, which increased dramatically in the 1330s, despite statutes limiting the crimes for which pardons could be issued. The impecunious king refused to stop ignoring the statutes, and his practice continued into the 1340s. The practice of course favoured illegal activity by the wealthy.

The problems caused by the Scottish wars were exacerbated by the intermittent national quarrels with Flanders and France, peaking with a fear of French invasion in 1324. Declarations of hostilities sometimes caught merchants unawares, and in the process of ventures in those countries, and it exposed them even more than in peacetime to the depredations of pirates. The bailiffs were made representations to the king in 1307 and 1312 on behalf of Peter Graper (senior) who ca.1293 had sent a servant to Flanders to trade; war breaking out, the servant deposited the money he had made from sale of wool and other merchandize with a Bruges burgess, for safekeeping, but after peace was restored Peter had been unable to recoup the money. In 1319, Robert de Angerton and Waleran de Lumley sought the king's help in recovering a wool cargo worth (they claimed) £200 in a ship which, en route for St. Omer the previous year, had been intercepted by Flemish pirates and the cargo stolen. About three years later, Richard de Emeldon and Thomas Thorald were likewise seeking help to recover wool and hides (valued by them at £383) captured in 1312/13 by Flemish pirates; Thorald and a servant of Emeldon actually tracked down the stolen goods to Sluys but were warned off, if they valued their lives. At some point between 1325 and 1337, William de Acton sought royal intervention in regard to a cargo of woad worth £80 he was planning to ship in peace-time from St. Valery to Newcastle, but which was seized by officers of the king of France; efforts to persuade the French chancellor to restore the cargo were rebuffed. In 1336/37 it was the turn of merchants Richard de Galeway, Robert de Shilvyngton and Adam Tredeflure to complain of loss of a cargo seized, along with the ship carrying it, at St. Valery by a French admiral, because of a dispute that had erupted between the kings of England and France; Galeway claimed the loss of the ship itself, worth £60 or more, and of cobs, herring, cockles and apples worth £125, while the other two mainly lost woad worth £162.

Newcastle men were not always the victims, however. A complaint made by two Gascon merchants, related to seizure of their ship and its cargo prior to July 1316, was during 1317 leading towards the outlawry of 37 Newcastle burgesses, including Robert de Shilvyngton, Hugh de Hecham, John Wodeman, Thomas Thorald, Robert Musgrave, and several members of the Acton and Haukyn families. They were saved only by repeated interventions by the Earl of Arundel, warden of the Marches, who indicated the accused were in his service, defending the town, and he could not afford to lose them. The opportunism of English merchants could translate at times into piracy. This meant that Newcastle's merchants had to fear not only the pirates of other nations, but also those from among their countrymen; in 1314, ships from some of the Cinque Ports had set upon a convoy of northern ships in their home waters, and made off with the wool cargoes and one of the ships.

As if international trade were not fraught with difficulties enough, Newcastle's merchants were also operating under some disadvantages. Although Newcastle was the authorized port through which wool to be exported, the wool from that region of the country was of inferior quality to that from other parts of the north, as a valuation of wool from different areas confirmed; later in the century the discouraged wool merchants of the town were to tell the king that it was hardly worth their while exporting it. This meant that Newcastle's merchants could not rely on home-grown wool to make their fortunes; they needed to diversify. Furthermore, the customs charged at Newcastle were four times as high as those at Berwick, which prompted merchants – including those of Newcastle – to transport their merchandise to Berwick for shipping from there. These two factors combined to make it hard for Newcastle merchants to compete in the same marketplaces as other wool merchants, without taking actions such as padding their wool bales so that they compensated for low quality with higher quantity.

A troubled wool trade in the north is suggested by several pieces of evidence. A comparison of wool exports through Newcastle in 1308 and 1326, shows that the number of sacks shipped had fallen by one-third, while the number of merchants wealthy enough or daring enough to face the risks had dropped from 118 to 44. In 1336, when five Newcastle men were commissioned to buy up northern wool, at a low price reflecting its poor quality, the commissioners were able only to find small quantities, and most of that from their personal stocks; whether this represents a scarcity of wool, a lack of cooperation from wool merchants, or the commissioners' fear of incurring the wrath of their fellow merchants, is difficult to say. If the last, then John de Denton was less intimidated, for in 1337 he, along with two of the previous commissioners (Robert de Shilvyngton and John Frismareys) were appointed to a fresh wool collection, and the yield was three times as large as that of the previous year; that Denton may have taken advantage of the situation is suggested by him exporting 80 sacks himself the following year, free of customs. By contrast, when Edward III had all the wool of English merchants at Dordrecht seized in 1338, in return for a promise of reimbursement from customs on future exports, among those to suffer were Richard de Acton, Richard de Galeway, Robert de Haliwell, and John Frismareys; Denton's name is absent from the list. Fraser [Ancient Petitions, 215] has suggested that a collapse of the local wool trade in late 1341 may be reflected in the fact that the burgesses, when ordered to provide wool in lieu of the original £133.6s.8d originally assessed in the tax of one-ninth, begged the king – on the grounds of their losses from war and the fines imposed on them by the king – to let them pay the cash instead. Though whether this would have been due to inherent weakness in the trade, or to disruption of commerce by the local political strife, is uncertain.

There are also indications of tensions within the community. In 1305 the "poor burgesses" had complained that they were prevented from retailing cloth they made at home, being obliged instead to sell it only by the bolt (presumably to the town's cloth-merchants and mercers). There were similar grievances relating to restrictions on fish-curing, tanning, wool-collecting, and the retail of wine and groceries. In the complaint 51 "rich burgesses" were named as the oppressors; of the 32 whose trades were identified, 29 were involved in the export of wool or hides. The case was before the Exchequer for some years; in 1308 the plaintiffs were awarded £50 in damages. This and possibly later instances of the merchant guild trying to prevent freemen from buying directly from visiting merchants may be part of what was behind cap.2 in the 1342 ordinances. Those ordinances also suggest that part of Acton's support came from the leaders of the craft guilds; the great majority of Newcastle's mayors and bailiffs had been merchants, and the crafts probably felt shut out of local government. Unrelated to this situation, but equally reflecting some breakdown within the community, was the activity in Newcastle in 1334 of a gang ambushing traders as they came to or left from the town; this was on mayor Denton's first tour of duty, and the king reprimanded him for failing to maintain law and order.

All this paints a picture of Newcastle's ruling class being under considerable stress, as mercantile ventures went wrong, the various national hostilities disrupted both land-based and sea-based commerce, they had great difficulty recovering debts owed them by the king, their ships and merchandize were commandeered for war use, their rural lands (a source of which crops and wool for export) and workers fell prey to the ravages of war, and their urban properties were sacrificed to the needs of defence or provisioning. Governing a town in war conditions must have been challenging and demanding. When Berwick was in 1333 recovered after fifteen years in Scottish hands, Newcastle's William de Burneton was assigned the task of governing it as mayor, which he did for several years; the task required so much attention that Burneton complained he was unable to give attention to his private business (an exaggeration, since customs accounts show him exporting wool, sheepskins and hides from Berwick in 1335/36) and was losing his health through overwork. The king doubled his mayoral fee to shut him up, but £20 could hardly have compensated for the profits he might have hoped to make had he given his full attention to his mercantile business, and perhaps not even for the personal expenses that such duty could have incurred.

In an environment that placed such a strain on those who faced the dual challenge of leading their community and supplying it with its necessities, through hazardous overseas ventures, we cannot be surprised that the fortune of some and misfortune of others – bearing in mind the concomitance of wealth and power – fostered jealousy and resentment, and that Newcastle's merchants feuded amongst themselves. The stress must have been felt by the whole community, making it easier for feuding politicians to stir up the populace.

For merchants to prosper in such trying times, we may suspect that they could not afford to be too scrupulous. Murage, customs, taxation all offered scope for embezzlement and, whether or not sins were committed, it could not have been difficult for a political faction to rouse popular support on charges based on suspicions of corruption. The men who played leading roles in the political conflict were those who, as we have seen, were closely involved in administration of murage and the customs service. They were equally prominent in duties of assessing and collecting royal taxes. For instance, Hugh de Hecham, John de Denton, Richard de Acton, Robert de Shilvyngton, Waleran de Lumleye and Robert de Haliwell were appointed by the king to assess on the Newcastle community £400, granted him in 1337 and to be collected over a three-year period; in March 1339 he had to order the community to cooperate with the group, and a few months later there is reference to a fine imposed on the community because of its failure to send all that was due.

With regard to misuse of position for personal gain, we may point to a case in which John de Denton had obtained from the king on 8 October 1337 a grant of a perpetual lease on three plots of empty land in Newcastle. The community felt, it was later revealed by a complaint to parliament from the mayor in 1351 (upheld by an enquiry the following year), that these were part of the common land of the burgesses, not wasteland at the immediate disposition of the king. But Denton, as mayor and ex officio escheator, was able to convene an inquisition ad quod damnum that judged otherwise, to his advantage, and may also have undervalued the property; it was later alleged that the inquisition jury was packed with Denton's friends and kin. The conflict of interest was, however, acknowledged in regard to delivering possession of the property to Denton: this was normally the duty of the mayor/escheator, but Denton arranged for two other townsmen to be commissioned for the task. This affair may have been behind the grievance reflected in cap.4 of the 1342 ordinances, with regard to unjust alienation of communal property. Further light on Denton's character is shed by his petition of 1337, complaining to the king that he had, in peace-time, sent his servant William de Matfen to Flanders to sell wool, pepper, cloth and other goods worth £500, but that hostilities having broken out between the king and the count of Flanders, the merchandize had been seized by Bruges authorities and William was being held to ransom. An enquiry at Newcastle found that the goods were worth only £89.14s. and that William was being held for quarrelling with a Scotsman who had insulted the king and had to pay a fine of £36 for his release. To be fair to Denton, exaggeration and misrepresentation may have been par for the course.

The conflict continues

Whether or not the suspension of borough liberties and the heavy fines cowed the rival factions for a while is unknown. Certainly the community remained far from happy. A further petition to the king, probably in the first half of 1342, claimed that the town was in danger of collapse, due to the heavy judgement laid down by Kildesby, various taxes imposed on them, their losses due to the Scottish war, the deaths of some of the "good men" by whom they used to be governed and protected, and the impoverishment of many other residents. They requested to be excused from the 108 sacks of wool assessed as their share of the 30,000 granted by parliament, and a review of the judicial records of Surteys and his colleagues leading to a reduction in the fines; they further suggested those sums be applied to the debt the king owed them. The king had other plans for the fine money, however, instructing in April his receiver of victuals in Newcastle to proceed immediately with collecting the instalment due, then wait for royal instructions on what to do with the money; the king was presumably making plans against the next incursion of the Scots, which came that summer and included a siege of Newcastle.

Under the watchful eye of Felton, the burgesses were also trying to put their house in order, although whether the reforms said to have been approved on 8 February 1342, by all the burgesses assembled in full guild at the hospital of St. Mary in Westgate, and sealed with the common seal, was the result of consensus or of one faction having an upper hand is unknown. Possibly all the parties were at that point inclined towards a compromise necessary to restore the peace, but the compromise went beyond addressing the immediate issue of electoral procedures, to more sweeping reforms of administration, particularly financial.

Richard de Acton died around this time, on April 2, the king ordering the escheator to take possession of Acton's lands, perhaps because of the fine still owing; there does not seem to have been any indication of foul play, but the events of the previous few months likely hastened the death of a man no longer young. By July 1343 it appears that Acton's fine had been cleared (if not pardoned) and a debt of the king to Acton was being repaid by allowing his widow and his executors, Adam le Bastynwhait and Roger de Wydrington, the latter Acton's son-in-law, to export wool customs-free. It might have been thought that the death of one of the principals would have helped matters; but it was not to prove so, indicating that we cannot attribute the opposition to Denton to Acton alone, or even primarily.

The king issued a new commission, on April 6, to a group very similar to that of October 1341, and on almost identical terms: to investigate whether any men of town or county had been supplying the enemy or had been involved in smuggling, to look into maladministration by Newcastle officials and into the political dissensions, whether Denton or Acton had tried to exercise mayoral power after the king suspended the mayoralty, and to have a new mayoral election made by the community. This was perhaps just a review of the situation, and a favourable response may have been the cause of the king ordering on May 6 restoration of the borough liberties; this concession was premised on the past efforts of the residents in defending the town against the Scots, the heavy costs they had borne in constructing the town wall and their promise now to keep it in repair at their own cost, as well as to imprison and punish anyone committing offences (i.e. to maintain law and order). Two weeks later the king added a proviso that the restoration of liberties was in no way to be prejudicial to the liberties of the Bishop of Durham.

Presumably mayoral government was restored, but we do not know in whose person. Welford has it as Denton but there is confusion in his lists of officials around this time, and Welford was not even aware of the electoral battle that had gone on in 1341. It would not have been inconceivable for the warden to appoint Denton, as the last incumbent before the breakdown of law and order, particularly given Denton's past services to the Crown; but we can hardly imagine such a result had the February reforms been applied. Other evidence points to Robert de Haliwell having been the choice along with Robert de Musgrave, William de Acton, John de Dunelm and probably Thomas Flemyng as his bailiffs; all of whom were re-elected in October of that year. Later that month, royal approval was obtained for the reforms issued in February – not strictly speaking a necessity, but it strengthened their authority by placing them in the context of a royal charter of liberties.

The reforming ordinances issued in 1342 let us make inferences as to some of the problems causing political dissent in Newcastle. If we assume that they were formulated to address specific perceived abuses, then we it would appear the principal concerns were with:

- Suppressing further outbreaks of politically-motivated violence, and ensuring an electoral process that involved the community yet was also orderly
- Preventing merchants from controlling the victual trade (forestalling is implied in cap.2), for the purpose of profit either from local retail or provisioning the army, at a time when the war was creating a scarcity.
- Putting in place checks on fiscal maladministration, suspected in regard to revenues generally but particularly the proceeds from taxation – taxation grievances being the perennial lever by which politicians could arouse the populace.
- Safeguarding against inequitable taxation and inequitable administration of justice.
- Discouraging officials from using their privileged access to the courts to further personal interests, benefit their allies, or line their own pockets, possibly falsifying records in the process.

Yet we should beware of reading too many specifics into the ordinances, for they are broadly similar to reforms implemented in other towns in response to perceived maladministration. As with such reforms elsewhere, the aim was not to overthrow the existing form of government, but to try to make it more accountable and to put in place checks and balances: the chamberlains (perhaps not new), the council (as the 24 of the mysteries must clearly have been, and not an ad hoc body), auditing of accounts, duplicate records, convoluted electoral procedures. Whether the reforms were targeted at one or more specific individuals whose actions were considered corrupt or self-interested, or whether more generally at merchant-dominated administrations incapable of managing the difficult situation in which Newcastle found itself, as described above, is more difficult to say. Although these ordinances may represent a compromise between the factions, it is equally possible that they represent a triumph of the anti-Denton faction. If so, it was a short-lived victory.

Haliwell's mayoralty of 1342/43 shows no sign of the political feud re-activating. In May 1343 the king set in motion again the collection of murage, apparently suspended due to the political contention. Whether Denton had given up the struggle or not is not clear; but his enemies had certainly not given up their hatred of him. Haliwell was succeeded as mayor by Richard de Galeway in October 1343. In July, Galeway along with some other Newcastle merchants had associated themselves with the consortium undertaking to farm the wool customs for three years. At the end of the first year the Newcastle men reviewed their participation, and withdrew. This failure may have fuelled the past jealousy of Denton's success in profiting from royal service. The arrest in 1336 of John de Galeway may also have still rankled. It appears the Richard, at his own initiative or that of other old enemies of Denton, decided in the latter days of his mayoralty to take advantage of the position of power in which he now found himself, and act decisively against Denton once and for all.

Perhaps tensions were again on the rise within the community. At some point during his term of office action was taken leading to a complaint (July 1344) by the Friars Minor that, whereas from the time before the town was walled, they had a conduit leading from a well to their friary, mayor Richard de Emeldon had covered part of the well, preventing the friary servants from repairing it; subsequently the friars had the well enclosed and locked, but mayor Galeway and his bailiffs, along with thirteen other named townsmen and others unnamed, broke open the enclosure and diverted the conduit elsewhere, while the conduit had also been damaged at other locations. On October 15, 1344 the king appointed a commission to investigate this. Another sign of deterioration is that William Acton, John de Galeway, and John de Frismareys had been fined in May 1343 for smuggling wool and coal, probably the previous year.

On 4 November 1344 the borough liberties were again suspended and the town put under wardens. This was most likely in consequence of the murder of John de Denton. A few days later the king appointed a commission to investigate the killing, the mandate renewed in February 1345, expanded in March, and renewed again in May with changes in the commissioners. The expanded mandate of the commission was to investigate who had killed Denton and what property they owned, who had aided or abetted the murderers, and what felonies, trespasses, oppressions, conspiracies, wastes or purprestures had been committed in the town by its officials or anyone else; this suggests that Denton's death was not an isolated incident, but perhaps part of continuing political factionalism.

In January 1345 the king had granted Denton's widow Elizabeth an annual income out of the customs collected at Newcastle, after she complained that she and her children were destitute because her husband had been maliciously killed by his enemies before making a will and his goods had been carried off – by whom is not clear, but presumably those same enemies; the king's action was motivated, it was stated, by compassion and out of consideration for Denton's past services to the Crown, and half of the annuity continued to be paid to her son, after her death. In May, Elizabeth named those she held guilty of her husband's death, presumably pursuant to the findings of the commission. The list was headed by Richard de Galeway (not specifically identified as mayor, and none of the bailiffs under him were initially among the accused), followed by John de Galeway. Among the 22 named were others who had been among those fined for causing trouble in 1341: Robert de Haliwell and his sons John and Robert, and John Gategang; other members of the Haliwell and Gategang families were also on the list. A member of the Wydrington family was another of the accused. Occupations of the accused were given only in three cases; one was described as a merchant, two as skimmers (a third accused was also later identified as a skinner). It was noted at this time that the accused had fled the county in order to avoid justice and that the king had appointed four men as a posse to track them down, as well as ordering their exaction. The search was still underway in February 1346, when the king, having heard that some of the accused might be hiding in the liberty of Durham, sent orders to the Bishop of Durham to arrest Richard de Galeway (now described as formerly mayor) and 37 others who had been indicted before the justices investigating Denton's murder and other crimes. The list included almost all of those accused by Elizabeth Denton. Among the additions were: Thomas Flemyng, one of those fined in 1341 and a bailiff at the time of Denton's murder; William de Burneton, who along with Flemyng had been among those named as members of the Acton faction; additional members of the Gategang family; two men of the surname Scot, though whether related to the same family that had furnished leaders of Newcastle, I cannot say; and brother Adam de Alnewyk, of the Dominican order at Newcastle. It has been suggested [Hodgkin, op.cit., 8] that the last-named may reflect involvement of the religious orders in the political conflict of the town, but this is unlikely. Furthermore, there appear to have been men from outside the town among the accused, suggesting that Denton's activities in the region – as landlord, purchaser of agricultural produce, and collector of royal taxes – had also made him enemies.

Not all of the accused evaded capture. The two who suffered worst were, ironically, not even among those accused by the widow. Alan Chapman, refusing to plead, was thrown in prison and, like Denton, died there. Gilbert Dolfanby was convicted and hung for his part. In 1341 Dolfanby had leased for life a property from Matilda de Acton, at a very modest rate, although we should not read too much into such a connection and perhaps it was a very modest property. He had been among those fined for their part in the political disturbances of 1341, and among the group associated with mayor Galeway in the forceful action taken against the conduit of the Friars Minor in 1343/44. He had also been among another group accused in August 1345 of having seized ships intending to land cargo at Gateshead, on the opposite side of the Tyne from Newcastle and within the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Durham – there being an ongoing battle between the town authorities and the Bishop for control of commerce on the Tyne, and particularly the coal trade. The accused group included a number of those indicted for Denton's death – Robert de Haliwell (since he leads the list, the offence may have occurred during his mayoralty), Richard and John de Galeway, Thomas Flemyng, William Burneton and others – along with other leading townsmen such as Gilbert Haukyn, William de Acton, John Frismareys, and members of the Karliol family. This was not an act of factionalism but of the principal movers within the community taking aggressive action against an outside rival; however, it suggests that Denton's killers represented the faction dominant in the town at that time.

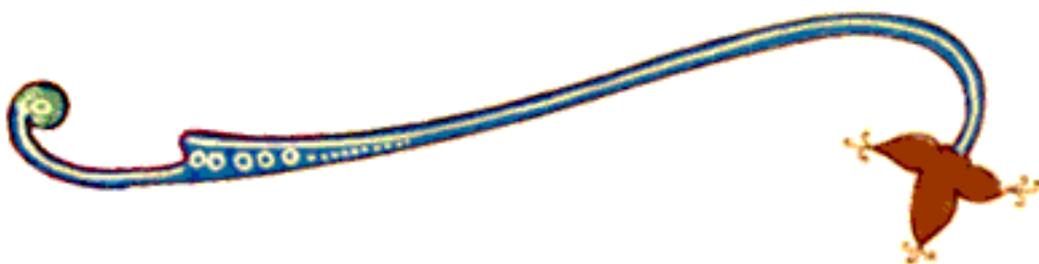

Nor were all of those accused convicted. In October 1345, one of those cleared of blame, Thomas Gretheved, who had been accused by Elizabeth de Denton, requested that the king remove the outlawry that still hung over his head and was preventing him from obtaining restoration of his lands.

From the ensuing investigative report emerges a story (whether true or not we may never know) of the events surrounding Denton's death. Gretheved had been tried in August, by which time Dolfanby had already been convicted and executed. It was stated at Gretheved's trial that, on 26 August 1344, mayor Galeway and the others, motivated by hatred rather than by any just cause, arrested John de Denton and put him in prison. There he was kept until the 31st, when he was brought before the mayor and accused of treason. Specifically that in 1322 he had received money from a Scot in return for he, and his accomplices, agreeing to deliver Newcastle into Scottish hands by arranging to have the West Gate left unlocked for three consecutive nights; and that in August 1341 he had supplied the Scottish king and his army, encamped outside Newcastle, with victuals. Denton either did not deign, or realized it was futile, to respond to these rumour-fuelled charges of his enemies. For this act of defiance, he was ordered returned to prison until he died. By October 18, that death had been accomplished. How, we can only speculate: Hodgkin argued that he was executed by crushing to death, a penalty of a later time for those refusing to answer to the law; Fraser suggested, more plausibly, that he was starved to death. The large number of those accused in his death hints at a lynching, but their indictment was more likely based on participation in Denton's trial. There is much that is unsatisfactory in this story, but it does seem to point to Denton's death at the hands of his enemies, under the guise of some sort of official action.

Gretheved was acquitted of any role in that action by a jury of twelve Newcastle burgesses, which included two of the bailiffs who had served under Galeway (William de Acton and John Wodeman), John Frismareys, and other leading townsmen. Richard de Galeway himself avoided capture long enough to save his life; although outlawed at some point before 4 August 1345, when some of his forfeit property was handed over to Sir Thomas Grey, he had purchased a royal pardon on 16 May 1347, but his property had not been restored. After his death (1359), his widow petitioned parliament and the subsequent enquiry recognized her rights in at least some of her late husband's former property. Among those accused by Elizabeth de Denton, Edmund de Wydrington, who had married into the Shilvyngton family, fled and was outlawed but won a royal pardon in September 1346 for service given in France; and Edmund de Pampeden was imprisoned but released on 6 July 1347, though whether through acquittal or pardon is unclear. Pampeden, Thomas Flemyng, John Gategang, and William Burneton had been outlawed, but later captured and put into Marshalsea prison (London). Friar Adam de Alnewyk had already taken the safer way out through a pardon obtained on 17 October 1345, and so too had Richard Scot, as the second document above indicates. We know that John de Galeway also was outlawed and his property confiscated; the fate of the remainder of those suspected of involvement in Denton's death is unknown, beyond that those who evaded capture must have shared the fate of John de Galeway, but the more important of them never appear again in the lists of borough officials, and so openings were created for new men with no known affiliation with the old factions.

The king restored the borough liberties on 24 October 1345. At the same time he tried to prevent further disputes by revoking the charter of 1342 (although restored in 1371); a new procedure for mayoral elections was drawn up. The role of the craft guilds was removed, with instead the mayor and bailiffs empowered to choose seven others to act with them as a committee to choose four electors, who would co-opt eight others, then that twelve to co-opt a second dozen, and the twenty-four electors would elect the mayor and then, with the mayor, the other officials. Subsequent political quiet in the town was more likely due to the death or flight of most of the principals in the feud than to this procedural change. The mayoralty and ballivalty continued for the rest of Edward III's reign to be dominated by a relatively small group of men holding office repeatedly, but most were men who had little or no association with the feud that had torn apart the ruling class of the early fourteenth century. In 1365 we hear of dissension in the town, which the mayor blamed on a socio-religious guild that was politically active and trying to coerce townsmen into supporting their aims; whether the aims were political is not clear, and it is unlikely this situation was the heritage of the conflict of the 1340s.

NOTES

"Gilbert Haukyn"

The transcript has Geoffrey Haukyn, but this appears to be an error.

"all who owed suit at the court"

Those who, as householders within the area under the jurisdiction of the court (i.e. the borough), were answerable in that court; this most probably meant the freemen, since possession of a burgage tenement was generally a precondition of the (intrinsic) franchise. If this was the terminology entered into evidence by the complainants, it may have been used to highlight the involvement in the disputed election of residents not qualified to participate – the "lesser townsmen".

"plea hall"

I.e. the courthouse, which would likely have served for communal assemblies too. Newgate: It is not clear here whether the street or the gate is intended. The New Gate, in existence by 1309, stood at the northern end of Market Street. The hall of the merchant gild was at the southern end.

"church of St. Nicholas"

The original and principal parish church of the town.

"pardoning Richard Scot"

The pardon was obtained in May 1345 for £200, a figure set by Kildesby, but later halved by the king and his council, who considered the original amount excessive. The pardon was for all trespasses, conspiracies and extortions for which Scot had been indicted before Surteys and his fellow justices, as well as (on a precautionary basis) any other offences pre-dating Easter 1342 of which he might subsequently be accused.

"render an account"

The translation may be at error here; it is more likely the chamberlains who rendered the account to the auditors, perhaps with the auditors making a public report on the outcome.

"king's assessors"

This clause is indicative that the ordinances were reviewed by, or drawn up under the supervision of, the king or his representative (the keeper of the town). Such a proviso would normally have been taken for granted by the townsmen; the explicit statement here is suggestive of a revision, possibly made at the time the king gave his approval.

"usages and customs"

That the writing down of these was effected is suggested in that in September 1343, the Newcastle authorities sent to their counterparts at Stockton-on-Tees a list of these usages, not the same as the customs attributed to the time of Henry I, although elaborating some of those.

"Tyne Bridge is in places broken"

This may reflect another grievance against Denton. In 1335 he, Acton and Hugh de Hecham had been given responsibility for tolls collected to pay for bridge repairs; damage to the bridge by a flood in 1339 may have been laid at his door.

"ells"

Measures of length.

"His father"

Richard de Acton senior does not feature prominently in the records. Constance Fraser [John of Denton, 306] thought that it was the father who was the bailiff and mayor and participant in the troubles of the early 1340s, but it was clearly the son. The son is never referred to in the records as "junior", so it seems likely his father had died during the reign of Edward I.

"wife of a son of Peter Graper"

Adam Graper according to an entry in the Close Rolls [1341-43, p.483], Peter Graper junior according to Miss Martin's notes to the Percy Chartulary [Surtees Society, vol.117 (1909), 336], she also mentions another unmarried and presumably underage daughter, Alice.

"the figurehead"

This led Fraser into the awkward argument that Acton had been persuaded to the role through his family's association with the Karliols, which itself had "a tradition of opposition" to the Emeldon regime, with which Denton was affiliated. This argument ignores Acton's own evident close ties with Emeldon.

"a figurehead"

In the political conflict at Lynn of the early 15th century, the reform faction's figurehead mayor, Roger Galyon, was largely ignored in the repercussions.

"petition"

Many of the examples given here come from Fraser, Ancient Petitions Relating to Northumberland.

"counter-cocket"

Licences to export had to be authorized by application of a cocket (seal) by the collectors, which affirmed that customs had been paid. The cocket was in two parts, normally held by separate officers, to ensure no individual collector could apply it fraudulently.

"diverted the conduit"

In the early years of the reign of Edward I a similar problem had arisen concerning a water-source that the Carmelites were monopolizing after obtaining a grant of it from the king. On this occasion it was the burgesses who complained, stating that the water-source was a man-made well, not a natural spring, and that its water had been important to the work of dyers, fullers and other craftsmen, to the general population for cooking and brewing, and to visiting sailors and merchants for drinking water. An inquisition in 1278 concluded that enclosure of the water-source and routing of the water to the friary would be detrimental to the town; a sharing arrangement was worked out.

"exaction"

The summoning of accused in court; if a certain number of summonses was not answered, the accused could be outlawed.

1. Grant of executive officers for purposes of political reunification

Edward, by the grace of God King of England, Lord of Ireland and Duke of Aquitaine, to all who see these letters, greetings. Know that by the charter of our renowned grandfather Lord Edward, formerly king of England, it was granted to the burgesses of our town of Nottingham that each year at Michaelmas they may elect from among themselves a mayor to be in charge, above the bailiffs and others of that town, in all matters pertaining to the government and improvement of either borough of the town. And that immediately following that election they may elect one bailiff from the one borough and another from the other borough – because of the differences between the customs upheld in those boroughs – who are to undertake all duties pertaining to that office. But now the burgesses have petitioned us that, because of the poverty of the inhabitants of one borough and a shortage of qualified candidates, so that they are at present unable to find a suitable person to undertake the office of bailiff in that borough, we be willing to grant them that they may elect the two bailiffs from whichever parts of the town they consider most expedient. Being favourably inclined towards their petition on this matter, we have granted them that, after the election of the mayor has been held (as indicated above), they have the authority to elect, from the best and most qualified townsmen [chosen] from the parts they consider most expedient, two bailiffs to undertake all duties pertaining to that office, notwithstanding the terminology used in the charter of our grandfather. In testimony of which we have had these our letters patent drawn up, to be in effect as long as it shall please us. Witnessed by myself at Woodstock, 1 May 1330.

1. Conflict over the mayoral election

From time immemorial the burgesses of Nottingham who have occupied the position of mayor or bailiff of the town have had the election of the mayor and bailiffs, and no other persons of the commonalty of the town should interfere therein. On 29 September 1412 very many burgesses of the town, to the number of 49, who had before enjoyed the said offices, being assembled in St. Mary's church to elect a mayor and bailiffs for the good government of the town and having elected Henry Willeford, a sufficient and fit person, to be mayor and Thomas del Strete and John Clerk to be bailiffs, John Stook summoner, William Couper of Nottingham, John Wyrsope, Richard Coteller of Nottingham, Richard Whetecroft, John Fuch, Thomas Gay, Richard Sawer, Ralph Botiller, Robert Waltham, Robert Hayward, Nicholas Holbeche, Richard Koo, John Wyrall the elder, John Glen, William Buxum, John Epurston and John Albeyn, being falsely, wickedly and maliciously confederated and bound together and devising how they might hinder [the said election] used for so long, and entirely subvert the good customs and government of the town, assembling to them a great multitude of other unknown evildoers to the number of more than 100, came [with one] assent to the church on that day with force, armed in manner of war with [arms] of defence, corselets, palettes, baselards, poleaxes and other arms. Guarding the doors of the said [church for a long time], they called out publicly and said with a loud and threatening voice to the mayor, bailiffs and other burgesses therein that unless they would elect John Alastre, chosen by the said evildoers, [to be mayor] and John Braidsall to be bailiff they should be killed before they left [the church]. And so they kept them prisoners there for 2 hours; and if they had not escaped by God's grace through a secret door of the church, the said evildoers would have killed them by starvation or the sword unless they had done all their will. When the mayor at last came out of the church to exercise his office, carrying his mace in his hand, they shouted and said "We will not have this man for mayor or obey him in any way," and William Couper at once assaulted him, striking the mace with a staff so that the mace fell on the mayor's head and gave him a great blow so that he could scarcely escape alive from their hands. Afterwards on the same day the mayor by the advice of his peers and for the good governance of the town made a proclamation there according to custom for the governance of the assize of bread, wine, ale and other victuals in the town; but a great many of the evildoers said "Raca for your proclamation, mayor; we will not be governed by you." Further, to fulfil their evil and wicked intent, they appointed by their common consent the said John Stook to be their summoner to summon and warn them when they should make any assemblies or insurrections, which he did the following Sunday and several times in the year 1412/13, warning them sometimes to appear at the Carmelite friary in Nottingham, sometimes at the Rocheyard there, and sometimes at Larkdale; and they assembled in divers conventicles in the said places, arrayed and armed in the manner of a new insurrection, to resist the said mayor, b[ailiffs] and burgesses in all their ordinances. Afterwards, on Sunday before St. Thomas 1 Henry V they gathered to them many other unknown evildoers at the Minorites friary to take common counsel and ordained that they would obey no ordinance made or to be made by the said mayor. The mayor, hearing news of this assembly, by the advice of his peers took with him the keepers of the peace of the town and other sufficient power to the place where they were assembled and arrested the said John Stook and 20 other persons found there and imprisoned them as the law requires. Whereupon on the same day the said evildoers again assembled with a very great multitude of others armed as above in manner of a new insurrection and came to the prison where the said prisoners were detained, saying and shouting publicly that they would break the prison and have the prisoners with them in spite of the mayor and burgesses, so that neither the mayor, the bailiffs, the keepers of the peace nor any other person dared arrest or resist them for fear of their lives; and unless the bailiffs who had the keeping of the prison had soon delivered the prisoners, they would have killed the bailiffs and broken the prison, to the extreme disturbance of the king's peace and the manifest ruin of the town.

And whereas the said mayor, bailiffs and burgesses have from all time had the election of burgesses to come to the king's parliament and whereas by the assent of 120 more sufficient persons of the town they had elected 2 of the better and more discreet burgesses, viz. Thomas Mapurley and John Odynges, to come on the town's behalf to King Henry IV's last parliament according to his writ, the said evildoers on 16 January 1413 again gathered a great multitude of evildoers at Nottingham and by their assent and will came with strength armed as above to the place where the mayor, bailiffs and burgesses had assembled for such election, saying that they would not agree to an election like that but would by all means have and elect Robert Sutton as one of their burgesses, and they so threatened the lives of the mayor, bailiffs and burgesses that none of the bailiffs and burgesses dared stay with the mayor but secretly departed from him as best they could; and he being thus left aloe with the evildoers, they horribly and maliciously went round about him like torturers, demanding the common seal of the town so that they might make the mayor's return and answer and seal it with the said seal. They pursued him from place to place, shouting with one voice that he should grant their demand, and so threatened him that for fear of death he tried to flee into the house of the said John Odynges to save his life. But John dared not receive him into his house nor help him in any way for fear of the said evildoers, and at last the mayor granted all their demands to save his life. Whereby the said mayor, bailiffs and burgesses dared not for fear of death attend publicly to their business and trade within the town or without save with a great power, to the extreme disturbance of the peace of the late and the present king and the manifest ruin of the town.

DISCUSSION

The two boroughs referred to as within the town of Nottingham were: the pre-Conquest settlement, whose development was spurred by its use first as a base by the Danish army and then as one of burhs in Edward the Elder's programme of defensive fortifications; and a new foundation settled by French immigrants shortly after the Conquest and lying between the English borough and the Norman castle (similar to that at Norwich, not least in the extension of the existing town centre, in relation to the construction of a castle). The cultural differences explain the divergence in some customary laws; legal cases during the reign of Edward III indicate that dower rights and inheritance were among those affected. One of the witnesses to a land grant of 1312 is described as the bailiff of the English Borough; this appears to be because he was the only bailiff witnessing – where both are named they are not identified with either borough. The distinction between the two boroughs persisted into the early fifteenth century, although there is no indication it had any practical implications by that time.

The charter of Edward I to which the letters patent refer was granted in 1284; the letters extract some of the terminology from that charter almost verbatim. The charter had followed a suspension of borough liberties, with direct royal government imposed and lasting for several years because of unspecified offences committed by the community – they had in some way over-extended their authority. When restoring the borough liberties, in return for an increase in the fee farm, the king also gave his recognition to the mayoralty:

On behalf of ourself and our heirs, to help the burgesses and other men of the town return to normalcy, we have granted that henceforth they may have a mayor [to be chosen] from among themselves. Whom, let them elect, each year at Michaelmas at an assembly of burgesses of each of the boroughs of that town, to be in charge over the bailiffs and others of that town in all matters pertaining to the government and improvement of either borough of the town."

It is not until this document of 1284 that we have reference to the town being divided administratively into two boroughs, and this may provide a clue as to the nature of the problem that led to the seizure of the liberties. It is in 1279 that we hear of the king handing custody of Nottingham over to a warden, Robert de Tybetot, or perhaps one should say farmer since he was said to be renting the town for £60 annually, initially for a year. At different times in 1280, the king sent orders to the sheriffs of Northamptonshire, Nottinghamshire, and Yorkshire to release, upon mainprise, various Nottingham burgesses from the gaols of Northampton, Lincoln, Nottingham and York; the charges against them were unspecified "diverse trespasses" committed at Nottingham and it seems not unlikely that these were associated with the reason for the suspension of borough liberties. Whether that reason was internal political strife cannot be said, but it is notable that the accused were forbidden to return to Nottingham until the king had heard their case. Still less can we say whether any political conflict might have had its roots in the separation of the boroughs. It is not impossible that the difficulties at Nottingham were in part a spill-over from the more general unrest of the 1260s, which gave rise to disturbances in several towns, or to hostilities not purely internal in nature – the burgesses of Newcastle-on-Tyne also, in 1279, were in trouble, in this case for assaulting the king's officers of the county who were trying to collect sums of money owed the king.

If, however, the problem were internal division, the introduction of a mayor would have been perceived as a way to unify the two parts of the town. Unlike at some other towns, where the mayoralty existed informally for some years before being afforded official recognition (e.g. Lynn, Leicester) or disappearing (e.g. Canterbury), this grant of mayoralty appears to represent the beginning of the office in Nottingham. Under the charter of Prince John, ca.1189, there is reference to a single reeve to be elected by the townsmen, although also indication that the burgesses were tenants of more than a single fee (tenurial lordship). Witness lists to deeds prior to 1284, where witnessed by town officers, indicate only a single bailiff, although this may itself be evidence of the separation of the boroughs administratively. Those after 1284 are witnessed by mayor and two bailiffs, even when the property involved is specified as being in one or the other of the boroughs, indicating amalgamation.

Before 1284 the king had not explicitly licensed any other English town to have a mayor, except London, suggesting that Nottingham's problem was felt to require an unorthodox solution. Yet we cannot entirely rule out the possibility of the mayoralty existing earlier. In a series of writs sent out by Chancery in 1273, directed at executive officers of 22 towns, 20 were addressed to the mayor (including that to Nottingham) and only 2 to bailiffs, suggesting that at Westminster it was assumed mayors were commonplace; while the bureaucrats were known to be somewhat sloppy in such matters, many towns did have mayors by this time.

The grant of May 1, 1330 was, in essence, a postscript to Edward III's confirmation on the same date of his predecessors' charters of liberties to Nottingham, with new additions. The town had been for some years contesting with the castle, administered by an unpopular agent of the unpopular Edward II, over jurisdictional matters; the new charter settled that quarrel in the town's favour. The charter also represented another restoration of liberties, for in 1328 these had been seized into the king's hands following a deadly confrontation between the townsmen and soldiers quartered in the town. Yet the town was an important strategic centre, both military and provisioning, in regard to the war with Scotland; furthermore, it was a stronghold of Roger Mortimer, from whom Edward was now planning to seize the reins of power. In 1329 the justices in eyre arrived, with a mandate that included a review of borough liberties. The outcome was the charter of 1330. The problem of the unpopular constable of the castle was resolved when, in October, Edward's supporters arrested Roger Mortimer in the castle and a local man was subsequently made constable.

If in the thirteenth century the mayoralty was a rallying point for burgesses – or at least those who aspired to some measure of local self-determination – by the fifteenth century it had become a focus for internal conflict.

Although the disturbances of 1412-13 are portrayed in the verdicts of the two inquisition juries, of which one is given above (the second being almost identical), the account is essentially an endorsement of the complaint laid by the ruling group and so presents their perspective. However, this was not a mere mob rioting against the authorities, as the ruling group would have it, but a division between political parties. For one thing the opposition was clearly organized, involving an effort to set up a coordinated resistance and even a parallel government. One is reminded of the contemporary conflict at Lynn where opposing parties had elected rival mayors, and of that at London a generation earlier when both sides used force to try to determine the election results.

The inquisitions were held on 4 September 1413, but the complaints had been laid before the king earlier in the year, for when Henry V had appointed on 3 April a commission of investigation into the "many trespasses, rebellions, insurrections and unlawful conventicles", it referred to Nottingham men Robert Sutton, Thomas Sutton and William Couper having already appeared to answer before Chancery during Henry IV's reign (i.e. probably in February or March) but having withdrawn without permission, perhaps during the inevitable disruption of affairs of state occasioned by the king's death. Others had been, or were about to be, arrested; for on 27 April the warden of Fleet prison, London, was instructed to release William Pomfret, William del Stabelle, Richard Estwayte, John Wyrale, John Crophille, Nicholas Fossebroke, John Reynalde, John Bowere, William Cook, Reynold Geffecoke, and William del Rodes of Nottingham, on condition they make no more insurrections or illegal assemblies to disturb the town and terrorize its inhabitants; they having found guarantors for good behaviour towards the mayor, bailiffs and good men of Nottingham, in Thomas Strelly, Nicholas Stapelforde, and Reynold Shaw of Nottinghamshire and William Aston of London, as well as standing guarantors for each other.

Some of the opposing party were important townsmen. The party's nominee for mayor, John Alestre, was a member of one of the families that would become prominent in Nottingham during the century, thanks to the wool-trade. He had entered the franchise in 1395 as an ironmonger, with Nicholas de Alastre (his father, and the borough's parliamentary representative in 1393) as his surety; it was to be investigated whether he had the right to enter without fee, by patrimony. Nicholas was also an ironmonger and had dabbled in the production of woollen cloth, but held no office in borough government. By the opening of the fifteenth century, John was also involved in the production and export of woollen cloth; he can be considered a merchant, and his will indicates associations, probably commercial, with Rotherham and Sheffield. He also held several properties in town and connections with local gentry – as supervisor of his will he named a man who was several times county sheriff. In that will, drawn up in 1422, several years before his death in early 1431, his wealth is demonstrated by his monetary bequests totalling over £615, most left to his widow Cecily, his underage children Thomas, Robert and Joan, a married daughter and her four children. About the same time he served as bailiff (1402/03) and mayor (1409/10); he was to become mayor again in 1414/15, 1420/21, 1426/27, and 1430/31 and to serve as parliamentary representative in 1416. We do not know whether he was an active member of the opposition party, but it seems not unlikely he would have been one of its leaders. If not, he was evidently well respected by the populace; in his will he left the unusually high amount of £100 to be distributed among the poor.

The party's nominee for bailiff, John Braidsall (or de Bridessalle, i.e. of Breadsall, Derbyshire), is found in 1393, 1396, 1397, 1403 and 1410 acting as an attorney in the town court; these being the principal references to him, it seems likely that he was in the legal profession. In 1395 he was a tenant of Thomas Mapurley. He never seems to have attained the political office his supporters sought for him.

As shown by the notes below on identified members of the opposing party, several had been or were to be office-holders in the borough and were therefore men of some standing in the community.

Much of the evidence we have related to the careers or family background of those identified from the opposing party is too slight or flimsy to allow for confident interpretation. But it does suggest that rather than a popular rebellion, this was at least in part a struggle between different economic interests in the town – perhaps between groups of crafts, or perhaps between industrial and commercial interests; there seem to have been a number of participants in the leather and metalworking trades among the opposing party. In fact, the impression I have is of a group of men whose craft-based families were once powerful in the borough, but had been eclipsed or displaced by a new group with mercantile interests; more in-depth research would be required to test this hypothesis.

A possible sign of tensions within the community comes in the form of the presentments in the Great Tourn, or Mickletorn (Nottingham's version of the leet court) in 1395. Most such presentments are directed at individual offenders; occasionally one finds blanket presentments against a particular class of offenders. At the 1395 leet there was an unusual number of the latter:

- the bakers were presented en masse for charging too much for baking services;
- all the butchers were presented for selling meat that had been kept around too long;
- the fishermen for the same regarding fish, and for forestalling;
- the taverners for infringing the assize of ale;
- the hucksters (a female occupation) for selling various victuals at too high a price, for forestalling, and for making false candles (lacking wicks);
- the tanners for not tanning their leather properly, and for selling from their houses instead of the marketplace, where goods were more easily subject to inspection;
- the shoemakers for mixing lower-grade with better-grade leather in their products, and for selling too dear;
- the cooks for selling meat and fish either not properly prepared or reheated (a health risk), as well as for forestalling victuals;
- the hostellers for breaking the assize, including selling provisions that had not been inspected;
- the weavers for charging too much for their services, and for

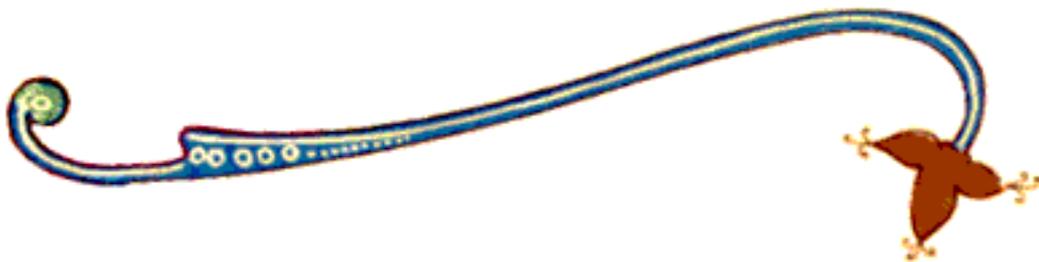

- demanding a surcharge for delivery of their products to the fullers;
- the fullers for charging too much for their services;
- the hosiers for using cloth poorly made, or mixing old cloth with new, in their products;
- the dyers for blocking the streets with their equipment and dirtying the streets by emptying from their vats the water used in the dyeing process;
- the carpenters, plasterers, stonecutters, and all labourers, for asking too much by way of daily wages;
- the apothecaries for using non-standard weights by which to sell, and for mixing old spices with new

These sweeping condemnations reflect either a general malaise in Nottingham society or an attempt by the authorities to bring the crafts under closer control and also to tap into their profits by general fines on trades, acting almost like a licensing process. The same kind of presentations were made the following year, although the list was less extensive. It may be that we see here an expression of mercantile influence on local government policy.

During the same year, a separate set of presentments reveals what seems to be a rather high number (38) of assaults in what was a population of only about two to three thousand; several of the assaults being premeditated. John Odynges was the target of one, launched by a draper, Thomas Fox, who was separately accused of ambushing and beating a messenger of the sheriff of Nottingham. Fox was himself the victim of an assault the following year, although there is nothing to indicate that any of these three bouts of violence was connected with each other. These may again reflect tension within the community, although this could have been occasioned in part by the national conflict.

In 1399 the citizens acquired an important new charter from the new king, grateful no doubt for support given him against Richard II. This gave the borough government expanded judicial powers, notably establishing powers of Justices of the Peace, to be held by mayor, recorder and four other suitable townsmen. This would have helped establish an elite within the ruling class that could have exacerbated political jealousies. This inner clique of power-holders was later to evolve into a slightly larger group of aldermen, forming the borough's inner council. Such trends towards elitism were serving to reduce the involvement of the community at large in decision-making, even though that may have been previously limited to approvals.

During his mayoralty of 1409/10, John Alestre introduced some reforms; what they are has been lost to us – for the core of the surviving records of this period are the town court rolls and they appear silent on the disturbances – but they may have had some relation to expanding the franchise. In his subsequent mayoralty, we find the practice of selling licences to non-burgess residents allowing them to retail. These reforms may give a hint as to some of the grievances that provoked the events of 1412-13, or at least may have won the opposing party's leadership some backing from the unenfranchised section of the population. The licencing programme – a compensation prize? – continued throughout the century; in 1478/79, 68 persons purchased such licences, both men and women, and they included weavers, shermen, capmakers, spurriers, minstrels, barbers, cobblers and other leather-workers, along with a large number of tipplers (alehouse keepers).

"shortage of qualified candidates"

The original uses the term insufficienciam. "Sufficient" in this context was used to express whether a person was considered qualified to hold office, principally referring to the level of wealth, although it might also have connotations of suitability as determined by social status or quality of character, and perhaps even capability.

"Henry Willeford"

Henry had first served as mayor in 1398/99, without apparently having earlier served as bailiff, although he had been chamberlain in 1377/78 and a Thomas de Wylford had been steward of the court in 1375/76. He was a keeper of the peace in the borough during the mayoralty of John Alestre in 1414/15. At the leet court sessions in 1395 and 1407 he was presented for dumping cinders in communal ditches and pits; this might suggest an association with the cloth-finishing industry. He held property in Castlegate, with Robert Squire (several times mayor between 1384 and 1402) and John Odynges as neighbours, and in Lorimer Street.

"Thomas del Strete"

The CIM gives as its reading "Thomas Bethel Strete", i.e. Thomas by the Strete. He was described in 1405 as a draper when, with his wife, he took a life lease on a tenement in Bridlesmithgate, next to one owned by Thomas Mapurley. In 1419 he was suing John Crophill for debt.

"John Clerk"

He had previously served as town clerk, ca.1385-91.

"John Stook"

Possibly the John Stoke who, in 1395, as a member of Holy Trinity Gild, was being sued for a small debt, and who in the same year was presented at the leet court for forestalling coal in order to create an artificial shortage so as to raise prices. The following year he was presented for breaking the assize of ale, both in the brewing and retailing aspects.

"William Couper"

The Cupper surname was common enough in Nottingham, and we should neither assume nor discount family relationships without clearer evidence. Men with this surname were prominent in the town in the late thirteenth century, judging from witness list evidence. Robert le Cupper was mayor in 1301/02, William le Cupper in 1325/26. John le Cupper was bailiff in 1304/05. The William Cupper who was bailiff in 1373/74 is not likely to have been the insurgent of 1413; it was probably he who is found in the 1380s and '90s in the upper echelons of power (based on his position in official witness lists). In 1395 William owed a chaplain 3s.4d in schooling fees for his son, whose name is unfortunately omitted from the official record. In 1415 a William Cooper purchased a licence to retail within Nottingham (i.e. he was not a freeman), but is not otherwise noticed. Thomas Cooper saddler bought a like licence in 1478.

"John Wyrsope"

A William de Worksop barber was a leet juror in 1379, while the Richard de Worksop being sued by a member of the powerful mercantile Plumtre family in 1407 appears to have been a metal-worker.

"Richard Coteller"

Bailiff in 1419/20, he was also known as Richard Frankleyn, under which name he served on the leet jury in 1396.

"John Fuch"

In 1416 he was living in St. Marygate.

"Thomas Gay"

A Thomas Kay was bailiff in 1394/95, and it likely the same man; Kay went on to become one of the borough's keepers of the peace under Alestre's mayoralty of 1414/15 and succeeded Alestre in the mayoralty the following year. He was also alderman of the Holy Trinity Gild ca.1409.

"Ralph Botiller"

He was accused of sneaking into the inquisition hearing in order to write down the names of the jurors, so that his comrades would know who were their enemies. He may have been related to the William Boteler who was clerk of the town court (town clerk?) in the 1390s and represented the borough in parliament several times between 1386 and 1393. Another William Boteler, a butcher, was tithingman of Middle Pavement in 1396, while a third living at the same time was a draper.

"Robert Waltham"

A Roger de Waltham was being sued in 1399 by John Odynges for detention of goods.

"Robert Hayward"

In 1396 his wife was presented before the leet court for selling herring too dear. In 1398/99 he was being sued because one of his pigs, roaming without supervision, had killed and eaten a chicken and several herring of the complainant. In 1407 he was in trouble again, for dumping dung in the street in front of his house.

"Nicholas Holbeche"

A Christopher Holbeck tippler bought a licence to retail in 1478.

"Richard Koo"

A John Koo was presented before the leet court in 1395 for forestalling coal and for blocking the road with a tenement he had built in Castlegate. In 1436 we hear of a Richard Coo chaplain acting as an attorney in the town court, probably because the case involved work in St. Mary's church.

"John Wyrall"

A tithingman (constable) for Bridlesmithgate in 1395/96, the neighbourhood possibly suggestive as to occupation – his partner in the office being a John Lorimer. A John Wyrall junior was in the office of mayor's clerk in 1410.

"John Glen"

In 1436, a Thomas Glen found employment as a bellfounder's assistant.

"William Buxum"

In 1404 a John Buxum was acting as an appraiser of goods seized by the court.

"John Epurston"

In 1404 and on several occasions in 1408 John Epperston was acting as an appraiser of goods seized by the court.

"John Albeyn"

John Albyn was bailiff in 1393/94; his surname is also found as Albayne or Allewyne. In 1396 he was presented before the leet court for forestalling, viz. buying from a Bredon man a cart of tanned hides for which the latter had some verbal agreement to sell to four other citizens. In 1395 his (first?) wife Ivota had been presented for forestalling poultry and other victuals. In 1395 he stood as surety for William Allewyne barker when the latter became a freeman, and in 1416 we hear of John Albayn barker and wife Agnes disposing of a cottage in Hundegate, next to a cottage owned by John Hodynge and formerly owned by John Crophull. In 1414 John Albeyn tanner was one of the sureties for a draper bound over to keep the peace.

Body armour, notably breastplate and backpiece.

"palettes"

Plates protecting elbows and shoulders.

"baselards"

A long knife, or short sword, that became a common weapon for the footsoldier.

"mace"

This would have been his ceremonial mace, indicative of authority, not an everyday weapon.

"Raca"

A term of reproach or dismissal used among the Jews in the time of Christ, loosely meaning worthless or void. Apparently a quotation from Matthew 5:22, it seems more likely the scribe's interpretation than a direct quote of what the mob would have said.

"Sunday before St. Thomas 1 Henry V"

This date makes no sense, given that the inquisition took place in May 1413, there was no festival dedicated to any of the Thomas' that fell within Henry V's first regnal year (commenced 21 March 1413) prior to that date. December 1412 is probably meant, assuming a scribal slip for the regnal year.

"keepers of the peace"

They had a position equivalent to justices of the peace, serving to sit with the mayor on cases related to that jurisdiction; the office seems to have been filled mainly with ex-mayors.

"Thomas Mapurley"

A lawyer who was in practice by at least 1376, he served as bailiff in 1381/82 under the name Thomas del Holt, later settling for his alias named for a Derbyshire village; the family name later became attached to a Nottingham suburb, Mapperley Park. The family had in fact held land in the town and vicinity since at least the mid-fourteenth century. His successful legal practice, operated both locally and in the king's courts, and his administrative roles funded purchases of much property in the town and outside, he building up several estates in the region. He was undersheriff of Nottinghamshire from ca.1387 to 1391, and on the occasional royal commission during Henry IV's reign. He was therefore a natural choice to represent the borough in parliament, and he served in this role on seven known occasions between 1388 and 1413. He was chosen its mayor in 1402, and later acted as its recorder (legal expert), from at least 1407 to 1410, and possibly until his death in 1416. In 1392 he was charged before the King's Bench with extortion and using a position of authority to make false arrests, as well as having the previous year arranged on at least two occasions for his men to ambush Robert Sutton a Lincoln wool merchant while en route to Nottingham; he escaped with a small fine. He was ordered arrested again in 1400, though it is not known what for. He married his daughter into the ranks of the gentry, and one of his sons signed up as an esquire for Henry V's French campaign, while another was sub-dean of York. A later member of the family was mayor in 1473/74 and 1481/82.

"John Odynges"

Odynges, or Hodings, was bailiff in 1408/09. In 1395/96 he was assaulted by Thomas Fox armed with a club, but escaped without serious injury; there is no indication of whether this was a purely personal matter or part of some larger hostility, but in 1408 a Hugh Fox acted as pledge for the prosecution of a complaint of detention of rent brought against Odynges. In August 1399 he was said to be absent in the service of the Duke of Lancaster.

"Robert Sutton" "Thomas Sutton"

Robert de Sutton was a tithingman of Fleshhewergate in 1395/96, one of the chamberlains of 1396/97, and a bailiff in 1400/01. The presentment of Robert Sutton in 1395 for forestalling eels and other fresh fish en route to market is suggestive as to his occupation; he may have been, or been connected with, the Lincoln wool merchant of that name who had business ties with Nottingham and had incurred the enmity of Thomas Mapurley. A later Robert Sutton was Prior of the Carmelite Friary (1442) in Nottingham, but surely could not have been in any position in 1413 to have been a factor in why the opposing party chose the friary as one of its meeting-places. While it is worth noting in this context that the friars were ideologically sympathetic to reform targeting corruption, we probably need look no further than the size of the halls for a reason why at Nottingham, Lynn and London political meetings were held at friaries.

"mayor's return"

That it, the response to the king's writ, confirming that an election had been held as ordered, and identifying the representatives elected. To have force, such a document needed to receive the 'signature' of borough government, in the form of application of the communal seal.

"granted all their demands"

Whether in fact Mapurley and Odynges or Sutton were sent to parliament is unknown, as the official returns have not survived.

"William Pomfret"

A William Draper de Pountefreyt had purchased the franchise in May 1385, and was sued for the entrance fee the following year by the draper who loaned him the money. In 1395 William de Pountefract spicer was accused of forestalling various goods. Perhaps these were the same man. William Pontfrett was bailiff in 1398/99.

"William del Stabelle"

Possibly an ancestor of the Robert del Stabelle who was mayor in 1466/67.

"Richard Estwayte"

Possibly related to Reynold Shaw?

"John Crophille"

A skinner, he appears to have been a one-time neighbour of John Albeyn; in 1419 he was being sued for debt by Thomas del Strete. An earlier man of this name was a tanner (1321). The surname is well in evidence in fourteenth-century Nottingham, with a Robert de Crophull serving twice as mayor tempore Edward II, another Robert de Crophull mayor in 1336/37, and Nicholas de Crophill mayor in 1348/49 and 1360/61; two or more William de Crophulls held the ballivalty on numerous occasions between 1303 and 1347, one being described as a clerk. We should beware of assuming all holders were related.

"Nicholas Fossebroke"

Presented at the leet court in 1395 for dumping materials in a ditch and a watercourse, blocking them as a result.

"John Reynalde"

A David Reynald who took up the franchise in 1468 was a saddler.

"John Bowere"

John Bower of Gainsborough (Lincs.) purchased the franchise in 1396. It may have been the same man who was being sued in 1436 for detention of goods. A William Bower bought a licence to trade as a cobbler in 1479.

"William Cook"

A man of this name was presented in 1379 for selling ale contrary to the assize.

"William del Rodes"

A later William Rodes was a master-wright in 1478.

"Thomas Strelly"

A William de Strelley was bailiff in 1362/63 and a John de Strelley in 1366/67. Later in the fifteenth century, persons of this surname are found among the local gentry.

"Nicholas Stapelforde"

A Hugh de Stapelford was bailiff several times in the early fourteenth century.

"Reynold Shaw"

In 1432 and 1436 Reynald del Shawe de Estthwayt was the defendant in actions for debt.

TRANSLATION

Know all people, present and future, that I, William de Amyas of Nottingham, have given, granted, and by this present deed confirm to Gervase de Barton, chaplain, who celebrates divine service every day in St. Mary's Church in Nottingham, for [\[the good of\]](#) my soul and the souls of my wife Margery and my son John, and the souls of our parents, our children, all our ancestors, and of all the faithful who are deceased, 68s. in annual rents; to be had, held, and received by Gervase and his successor chaplains who shall celebrate divine service every day, in perpetuity, in that church for the souls already mentioned. Viz.:

- thirty shillings of silver from the tenement that William de Holm holds in Lorimer Street, Nottingham, located on the north side of the tenement once of Adam Botild, the which tenement once belonged to William Godynough;
- eight shillings of silver, 4 hens and a cock from the tenement once of John le Spicer, located in the same street on the north side of the aforementioned tenement once of William Godynough;

- twenty shillings from all tenements lying next to each other in the Weekday Market in the town, between the tenement once of Laurence le Bere to the east and the Hall of Pleas of the town of Nottingham to the west;
- ten shillings from a tenement located in the same Weekday Market, between the tenement of William Brian to the north and the tenement once of John Flemyng to the south, as well as from a booth called "the Lyerbothe" in the same marketplace.

That is, thirty-four shillings [due] on May 3, thirty-four shillings on November 11, and the four hens and a cock at Christmas. I have also granted to the same Gervase and to William de Holbeck, chaplains, and their successors as chaplains, an annual rent of four shillings and sixpence due from the tenement of Geoffrey Stoye, which lies in Butcher Street in the town, next to the tenement once of Ralph Stoye to the south; that is, two shilling and threepence on May 3 and two shillings and threepence on November 11. To be had and held by Gervase and William de Holbeck, chaplains, and their successors as chaplains, so that Gervase and William de Holbeck, and their successor chaplains, provide each year in perpetuity on the anniversary of my death a potation for all chaplains, clerics and anyone else attending my obit. Should these rents be wholly or partly in arrears to Gervase or any of his successors, at any future time whatsoever, then Gervase or his successors are permitted to distrain in all the tenements mentioned until they are satisfied for what is due. On condition that if Gervase or any of his successors, after the time when the chantry has been established, discontinue the celebration for a period of eight days without reasonable cause and without appointing in his place another suitable chaplain to celebrate, the one who defaults may not from then onwards ever again demand or receive anything of the aforementioned rents, but is to be completely removed from the chantry and another chaplain substituted in his place.

It is my wish to present to the chantry, after the death of Gervase, during the remainder of my life, as often as the chantry shall happen to be vacant. I further wish that, after my death, my heirs and executors shall when any vacancy occurs present a suitable chaplain to the chantry, within twenty days of the vacancy occurring. If my heirs and executors have not made a presentment within twenty days of the chantry happening to become vacant, or do not wish to make the presentment, in the manner already stated, then in that case it is my wish that the vicar of St. Mary's Church, Nottingham, the mayor of the town, and three reputable men of the parish of that church select and present a suitable chaplain to the chantry, to celebrate and to receive the rents in the manner stated. On the understanding that the vicar, or his successors, have no claim to any right other than (with his associates) the presentment in that case, or through the default of my heirs or executors. If the vicar, mayor, and their associates have not presented a suitable chaplain within twenty days after the chantry happens to become vacant, then it is my wish that the Prior of Newstead present a suitable chaplain to the chantry within forty days thereafter.

I have also granted to Gervase and to William de Holbeck, chaplains, and their successor chaplains celebrating divine service every day in perpetuity for the aforementioned souls, a tenement in the street called Stonestrete in the same town, lying between the tenement of Walter le Palmere on the south side and the tenement of William de Wodeburgh on the north side, and extending in length from the said street as far as the tenement of Thomas Lambock; to be had and held by Gervase and William de Holbeck and their successors, chaplains, for their common residence forever, of the chief lords of that property by the services customarily due therefrom. On condition that Gervase and William de Holbeck and their successors, chaplains, shall provide in perpetuity and at their own cost two wax candles weighing six pounds, to burn each Sunday and festival in the church atop my tomb while mass is being celebrated at the high altar.

In testimony of which I have appended my seal to this indented charter, made in four separate parts. Of which: one part remains in possession of myself, my heirs and executors; a second part in possession of the chaplain and his successors; the third part in possession of the vicar, mayor and their associates; and the fourth remains in possession of the Prior. These being witnesses: Henry de Cestrefeld, then mayor of Nottingham, John de Baston and Richard de Halum, then bailiffs of that town, William de Gotham of Nottingham, Robert de Crophull of the same, John le Colier of the same, Roger de Botehale of the same, Ralph de Wollaton of the same, Hugh le Spicer of the same, William de Crophull of the same, William de Roderham of the same, Ralph le Taverner of the same, John de Tumbly of the same, and others. Given at Nottingham on 27 April 1339.

DISCUSSION

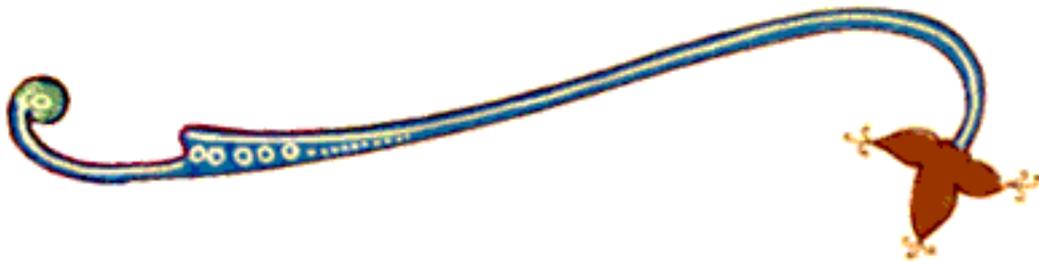

William de Amyas was a leading figure in the political and commercial life of Nottingham during the first half of the fourteenth century. He held the mayoralty four times between 1316 and 1334. He appears to have been a first-generation immigrant to the town and may perhaps have been connected to the mercantile family of the same surname resident in York. After his arrival, he married Margery Palmer, the daughter of a prominent citizen (who also served as mayor). That he had the second highest assessment of any Nottingham townsman in the national tax of 1327 shows how he had prospered in his new home. He traded in grain and probably other victuals in the earlier part of his career, and owned both boats suitable for inland transportation of his merchandize as well as one or more vessels described as "ships" presumably suitable for international commerce. Some of his business came from supplying royal armies or garrisons operating in the north against the Scots, while other stemmed from circumstances of bad regional harvests and famine which hurt the Midlands counties in 1315-16. Later in his career there is greater evidence of his involvement in the wool trade. Part of his wealth was put towards investments in property, mainly within the town; he also acquired some properties in the surrounding countryside, mainly in repayment from a family in difficulties to which he had loaned money.

It has been suggested that he may well have indulged in hoarding grain to push prices higher in times of famine, and he was involved in violent incidents in York (1319) and in 1348 when he and others attached a purveyor of oats for the Queen's horses. His son had been murdered in 1343, while he himself had been the target of a protection racket in 1333. Any proceedings against him for the 1348 incident were forestalled when the Black Death carried him off.

A number of wealthy burgesses "invested" in chantries for the benefit of their souls, and the souls of their loved ones. It should not be assumed that this trend was any more pronounced among those with a particular weight of sins on their conscience, although such might have been part of the motivation in Amyas' case. It was an expression of the religiosity of the times. An early indication of Amyas' thoughts in this direction were his acquisition from the king, in 1324, for a licence to alienate property in mortmain, and a further such licence followed two years after the chantry foundation. Much of the property assigned to pay for maintenance of the chantry lay in St. Mary's parish.

NOTES

"potation"

Hospitality in the form of drink, but perhaps with an element of ceremony.

"obit"

A religious service to benefit the soul of an individual on the anniversary of his or her death.

"present to the chantry"

Presenting to the chantry refers to the right of appointing a chantry chaplain.

"Stonestrete"

More commonly known as High Pavement.

[1. Letter from the mayor, seeking support for his cause, 1414]

Dear and trusty friends, we send you good greetings with all our hearts, letting you know that at the time of drafting this letter, we are healthy in body (thanks be to God), and have not been imprisoned as your opponents have stated in Lynn – which cost us a great deal of money. Nonetheless we are assured, thanks to the favour of my lord [the Bishop] of Norwich and of various other lords, that our opponents shall not have their way. We have high hopes of furthering our election, for the law is on our side. The steps they have taken against us are completely contrary to our charters and our liberties. Therefore keep your spirits up and encourage all those friendly to us, for the effort we have put into our cause has resulted in this great council; we anticipate no resolution until the council is over. We beseech you, and all our friends, with all our hearts to send us gold with as much speed that you can muster, for we have made major commitments and are spending large sums of money to achieve our goals and to protect the interests of the community (which God preserve, forever). Whoever believes in the rights of the community and its well-being, now is the time to put forward a helping hand, and achieve what we wish – or else [submit] to perpetual shame and pain that will last longer than we care to admit. Therefore, as quickly as you may, gather together six or seven of the best persons (as you so judge) and send them around to our friends to tell them the truth of the matter and of this great need, for the benefit of all. And send us an accurate account of what is received from every man, for it is essential if we are to recoup our expenses from our opponents. For many shameful things are spoken about them in the king's house, and in London among the estates. So that the blame will rest on your heads, not on us; for we do not intend to abandon our pursuit for our rights, unless it be due to you alone, which God forbid. Certainly we are going to need £40 or £50 more than we have. To speed things up, assign ten or twelve persons to collect as much as you can and, within three or four days, gather it together; for we must have it quickly, by [the hand of] whomever you think best, to ensure our cause is successful. We hope that every man shall receive back what he puts up [...] for, believe me, in whatever sum they happen to be condemned, we will never release them from it. We write no more at this time, but may the Holy Trinity guide us all, and will be certain to destroy their commission. Written in haste at 2:00 p.m. on the Monday following St. Math.'s day. Your own Bartholomew Petypas, mayor.

[2. Inquisition at Swaffham, 23 May 1415, into disturbances at Lynn]

On Trinity Sunday 1 Henry V [18 June 1413] the said 4 persons came with many others unknown with force and arms, viz. swords and staves, to the guildhall of the Holy Trinity at King's Lynn [sic] and violently and maliciously made an assault by night on the brethren of the gild against the king's peace, so that they were frightened and in great despair of their lives and mutilation of their limbs.

On Monday before St. Bartholomew 2 Henry V [20 August 1414], as Thomas Waterden, John Wenteworth, Thomas Brygge, John Bolt, and John Spicer of King's Lynn with other honourable gentlemen of the country were peacefully in John Warner's tavern in King's Lynn, there came the same 4 persons with a great multitude of people with force and arms, violently, wickedly and unlawfully against the king's peace upon the said Thomas Waterden and others, who intended to go peacefully to their inns and houses; and John Wardeyn glasier and John Cissesson spurrier of King's Lynn with other persons unknown lay in wait with force and arms against the king's peace for the said Thomas Waterden and others as they were going home with lights before them and assaulted them, to the no small disturbance of the king's peace and the bad example of others. John Frevylee, keeper of the gaol of King's Lynn, seeing the disturbance made by John Wardeyn, John Cissesson and many others, arrested them at the gaol by virtue of his office; but Bartholomew Petypas, hearing of this, came thither with force and arms and a great multitude of people and by strength and his own power, in the absence of the said keeper and without his assent or will, received and delivered John Wardeyn, John Cissesson and the others from the gaol, to the great prejudice of the king's laws and the perpetual destruction of the liberties of the town.

On Wednesday, the Decollation of St. John the Baptist 2 Henry V [29 August 1414], the king having directed his letter and command to Edmund Oldhall, then sheriff of co. Norfolk, to survey and hear the governance and ordinance relating to the election of the mayor of King's Lynn, together with other gentlemen of the country, Bartholomew Petypas, then in his mayoralty, with William Halyate, John Bilneye and John Tilneye and a great multitude of men of the town in manner of war with swords, staves and other arms violently and unlawfully against the king's peace disturbed and hindered the said sheriff and gentlemen and the good burgesses of the town as far as they could with armed force and insulting words from the election of a mayor and violently broke the bridges about the town and maliciously guarded the gates with armed men, so that very many gentlemen of the country were unable to get in to the aid of the sheriff, whereby the said sheriff and other gentlemen and the good men, burgesses and mayors elected from of old were frightened and stood in despair of their lives and the mutilation of their limbs; and the said Bartholomew and his fellows would not let the said sheriff, gentlemen, good burgesses and mayors come to the guildhall for the election of the mayor according to use and ancient custom, but they held the election in the house of the Austin friars of King's Lynn, in contempt of the king and of the liberties of the town.

On Friday, the Conversion of St. Paul 2 Henry V [25 January 1415] Bartholomew Petypas made an assault in the guildhall at King's Lynn with his drawn baselard on John Lakynghithe and on other good burgesses of the town during his mayoralty, procured and abetted by William Halyate, John Bilneye and John Tilneye and their fellows unknown, whereby the said mayor was thrown to the ground and trampled upon among them violently, maliciously, wickedly and unlawfully against the king's peace, to the very great terror of the said good burgesses and mayors elected from of old and to the very great despair of their lives and mutilation of their limbs, and Bartholomew and his fellows did other evil things to the said mayor and good burgesses and mayors elected from of old every day maliciously, wickedly and unlawfully, against the king's peace, so that they did not dare for fear of death to hold any session in the guildhall, as was the custom from of old, for the good governance of the town and the preservation of the king's peace there, whereby the mayor, good burgesses and mayors elected from of old are seriously diminished and maliciously destroyed so far as is possible by the said 4 persons and their accomplices, to the very great destruction of the governance of the liberty of the town, to the very great contempt of the king and prejudice of his laws and to the very great deterioration of the liberties of the town.

[3. The mayoral election of 1415, thwarted, provokes an uprising]

Memorandum that on 29 September 1415, between 9:00 a.m. and 10:00 a.m., when Robert Brunham, mayor of Bishop's Lynn, was attending mass in Holy Trinity chapel within the parish church of St. Margaret's, Lynn, burgess William Wyth suddenly appeared before the mayor and, calling on Thomas Abnale prolocutor of the community of Lynn to be his witness, delivered to Robert Brunham the mayor three royal writs, sealed in white wax under the Great Seal of England. One of which [ordered him] to continue to occupy the mayoralty himself until the King's Council has given consideration to the dispute [over the election], notwithstanding the election made by the community of Lynn the previous 29 August; upon penalty [for failure] of £1000.

[The clerk then proceeds to transcribe and/or summarize the content of the king's writs. The first, dated 26 September 1415, referred to the community having elected John Bilney as mayor, and ordered Brunham not to turn over the office to him. The second writ, of the same date, ordered him to ensure that John Spicer, John Bolt, John Waterden, Bartholomew Systeme, John Permonter, Philip Franke, Bartholomew Petipas, John Bilney, William Hallyate, John Bucworth, William Walden, and John Meryell appeared before Chancery in the quindene of Michaelmas. The third, which the clerk noted had been delivered to John Bilney and was not available for copying, ordered Bilney not to take up the office of mayor, despite his election, and to appear before Chancery in the quindene of Michaelmas.]

Robert Brunham having opened these two writs, by mayoral order the common clerk read them out and declared their contents to the mayor and people who were in the chapel. While the third writ was handed over to Robert Beer, the sergeant-at-mace, so that he could execute it. Hearing the clamour made by a great number of people who were pouring into and out of Holy Trinity chapel and the church itself, in consequence of this [turn of events] and in support, as it is said, of the liberties and franchises of the town or borough of Bishop's Lynn, dom. Thomas de Hevenyngham, prior of the monastic priory at Lynn, after the procession [was over], came in person into the Holy Trinity chapel and ordered the crowd and populace in the name of God to quieten down and leave, to prevent the disturbance they were making from interfering with the daily divine services. He asked mayor Robert Brunham to go up into the chancel to hear High Mass (for it was Sunday and there were two services), and this was done, with Robert Brunham being assigned a stall at the entrance to the choir, where he might stand on the right-hand side of the prior; there being present Sir John Litolbury and Bartholomew Petypas a previous mayor of Bishop's Lynn. Meanwhile, so many members of the community of Lynn gathered and came into the church that it was extraordinary.

Once mass was over and the blessing had been given with the sacrament, Bartholomew Petypas earnestly requested Robert Brunham that, if it pleased him, he go into the guildhall, as was the custom and usage, for the swearing-in of mayor-elect John Bilney. He replied that when the Lord Chancellor of England was last in Lynn he had, in the presence of many persons, ordered Robert to continue to occupy the mayoralty until he received other instructions based on decisions reached by the King's Council; and he said that the Chancellor had today renewed those orders to continue in office, via a writ [given] to Robert by William Wyth, under penalty of a thousand pounds. He also said that the Chancellor had in another writ, [delivered] by William Wyth, ordered that John Bilney not be admitted to the office of mayor to which recently elected: "I, Robert, delivered the same by my own hands to Robert Beer, sergeant-at-mace, to give to John Bilney." He added that he had no intention of entering the guildhall for any purpose whatsoever, unless compelled by force against his will – seeing that the populace was stirred up and there was a real risk of that eventuality. Upon this, Bartholomew requested from the mayor the keys to the guildhall. Robert replied that they were at his house. [Bartholomew] requested that he send for them. He replied that no-one in his household had authority to touch them unless he was present in the house in person. He said that it was not his intention to disobey the orders (as above) in the Chancellor's writ, by handing over or surrendering in any way whatsoever his position as mayor, so that he would lose a thousand pounds, and added that if any wished to take his position or office from him against his will, it would be at their own risk. Reproachful words from the vulgar people coming and going in the church have not been recorded here by the common clerk, as it seems to him they are in no way relevant to community affairs; and those things said against the community or slanders against the wise, judicious and providential patricians sworn to the service of the borough, I leave out.

Finally, at the instance of the council and entreaties of Sir John Litolbury and Bartholomew Petypas, former mayor of Lynn, and in order to avoid worse, Robert Brunham agreed to go to his residence in Mercer Row, Lynn, to get the keys to the guildhall, on condition that no-one in any way molest him or harm him physically. When he came out of the church door into the street, so thick was the crowd that gathered around, that by sheer force of numbers they propelled both him and the common clerk to the guildhall door. Then they called forward John Mordon the bellman of Lynn and made the mayor, against his will, send him for the keys to the guildhall doors. When the bellman returned, they made him unlock the door, and then Robert de Brunham was knocked down by the press of the crowd and lay there in peril for some time – never was a mayor so vilely treated, as far as anyone has heard – and likewise the common clerk. After that mayor Robert de Brunham was hoisted up by force, brought into the guildhall, and set down on the low bench in the south corner of the guildhall. While the mayor was so suffering and fearful, the chest or muniment box of the guildhall, in which are placed for security and safe-keeping the community treasures (that is, the royal charters, records, and evidences), was broken open by John Blome fletcher and three royal charters concerning the liberties, franchises and privileges of the borough or town of Bishop's Lynn, sealed with the Great Seal of England, along with a round casket of contents unknown, which were found there, were removed by Bartholomew Petypas the former mayor of Lynn. Taking firm hold of them, he carried them out of the guildhall.

Half an hour later arrived John Bilneye, [who had been] elected, named and legitimately appointed as mayor on 29 August according to [the terms of] the king's charter and the new ordinances enrolled in the king's Chancery with an exemplification issued under the Great Seal of England; he had been detained by a high fever and other infirmities. Entering the guildhall, he seated himself on the lower bench. Immediately the community [wished to] follow up on the election and appointment of John Bilneye, having the common clerk bring about his admittance to the mayoralty by administering the customary oath. The clerk responded that from ancient times it had been prescribed that the mayor's oath was in the muniments chest, written down in a certain bound red book; the clerk did not know it by heart. [At that] the whole congregation raised their voices, crying out: "Indeed, you lie! You can give him his charge well enough!", and again, "Give him his charge!" The mayor [to] Ashebourne: "Why will you not give me my charge?" Upon this the clerk, to avoid the situation getting more out of hand, felt compelled to take from the muniments chest the book with a design of Holy Trinity [on its cover], upon which the oath of John Bilneye the mayor-elect was given and received, in the following words: "Sir, you shall place your hand upon the book and you shall swear that you shall govern and rule the community of this town well and truly, with all your ability and diligence, during the year that you are mayor. And maintain all the franchises of the town, and every parcel thereof both within and without, with all your power, and undertake all duties that pertain to the mayoralty, so help you God at the Final Judgement."

The mayor having been thus sworn, the community ordered Thomas Abnale, the prolocutor of the whole community, to administer to William Ashebourne the common clerk his oath of office according to the good ordinances enrolled at Chancery with an exemplification issued under the Great Seal of England. At this point Robert Beer, the sergeant-at-mace of the mayor and community, arrived and offered and delivered to mayor John Bilney the aforementioned sealed writ prohibiting him from taking up the mayoralty (as specified in [the above copy of] the writ). The latter, with the gravity due the situation, received the writ and ordered the common clerk to open it and read it out to the congregation, and this was done in Latin. The writ having been read out, heard, and understood, the mayor declared that he did not in any way wish to take up administration of the mayoralty, but rather he wished to obey the king's writ in all regards, whatever the writ demanded and required. Robert Brunham asked the sergeant-at-mace where he had been all this time, and why he had not [earlier] delivered the writ to John Bilneye as he had been instructed. He replied that he had been at the house of John Bilneye mayor, but had been unable to speak with him; and, he went on, when he returned to the guildhall it had been impossible for him to pass through the doorway into the hall, due to the size and agitation of the crowd. Such was the excuse he offered. The community then instructed the common clerk to administer to Robert his oath, according to custom, and this was done; and the [guildhall] key was handed over to Robert Beer by the consent of the community.

Robert de Brunham was still sitting in the corner of the guildhall, confused and in pain. There were present Thomas de Hevenyngham, prior of the monks at Lynn, Sir John Litolbury, Bartholomew Systeme, one of the 24 jurats, and John Permonter burgess of the town, [acting] as mediators for the restoration of peace and harmony, since Robert de Brunham had been maltreated and subjected to compulsion against his will, even imprisoned and detained as some say. Robert de Brunham asked the community what it wanted. In response to which they unanimously asked to have handed over to them the key to the chest or muniments box in which are kept the treasures of the borough of Bishop's Lynn – that is, the king's charters concerning the liberties, appurtenances, privileges and franchises, and the records and evidences of the town of Lynn – as well as the key to the treasury where the common seal is kept under communal keys in the possession of the mayor along with the mayoral sword and seal of the mayoralty. As regards the common seal, he had a concern in view of the fact that there was some degree of disagreement, dissension and dispute persisting here and he did not wish the common seal to be put to any kind of use in support of some particular party.

Robert Brunham replied that the room in which the common seal was kept also contained the treasury of the Gild of Holy Trinity of Lynn, of which he was alderman, and that it had four keys, of which the two chamberlains of the town of Lynn had custody of two, while he, Robert, had two in his custody – one by right of his office as mayor, and one by right of his office as alderman of Holy Trinity Gild. He said that he was not prepared to surrender that the mayoralty was responsible, unless [forced] against his will. This issue was negotiated for a long time, from 10:00 a.m. to 5 p.m. and later. Finally, with the consent of Bartholomew Systeme, one of the jurats of the borough of Lynn, and John Permonter, a burgess of good sense, and at the request and advice of the Prior of Lynn and the knight, Robert handed over all the items that had been asked for, as mentioned above, except for the sword belonging to the mayoralty, with an expression of concern and protest that he was doing so under compulsion and against his will. In the meantime, one citizen (whose name is not known at present) took that sword by force from Robert's sergeant, against the latter's will. John Bilneye, the mayor elected, appointed and sworn as indicated above, who was present, continued to protest before the community that this was not what he wanted, and that he did not wish to be in any way involved. And so it came about, against the express wishes of John Bilneye mayor as well as those of Robert de Brunham, that the keys to the muniments chest together with the mayoral seal were handed over to Sir John Litolbury for safekeeping, under the seals of Bartholomew Systeme and Bartholomew Petypas, by consent of and instruction from the community there.

[The account continues with somewhat confused memoranda noting that on 14 October a new writ, dated 6 October, was delivered to Brunham, confirming that notwithstanding Bilneye's election Brunham should remain in office until further notice; which was read out in the Tuesday marketplace on (Tuesday) 15 October as well as (later?) in the Saturday marketplace.]

A little later, by consent of the mayor and others of the 24 jurats as well as others summoned, nominated and elected, the Prior of Lynn, Thomas Brygge, Thomas Hunte, William Hunderpound, and William Ashebourne the common clerk went in person to Sir John Litolbury, who had in his custody the key to the chest and the mayoral seal, under the seals of Bartholomew Petypas and Bartholomew Systeme, to ask him on behalf of the mayor to return them, so that the mayor could carry out the exercise of his duties, by authority of the king's letters patent. In reply, Sir John Litolbury stated that when he was given sufficient authority he would willingly hand them over. Thomas Brygge then said to him: "Sir, we believe you have a writ to that effect." Who replied, saying: "Sir, I told you that when I have sufficient authority, I shall do what is right. You'll get no other answer from me at this time." This was communicated to the mayor by the Prior of Lynn and the others who were there at that time.

the New Ordinances and Constitutions, 2 June 1416]

To all sons of Holy Mother Church who see this document, we the mayor, jurats, and the rest of their fellow burgesses of the town of Bishop's Lynn, together with the whole community of that town, give greetings in the Saviour's name. Whereas our ancestors and predecessors of happy memory, former burgesses of this town, from time immemorial, for the better and healthier government of the town were accustomed to make twenty-four jurats from the more judicious, upstanding, worthy, and qualified burgesses of the town, and to elect each year a mayor, chamberlains, common clerk, common serjeant-at-mace, and other officers and ministers in the town, by virtue and authority of certain liberties and privileges granted to our ancestors and predecessors and their heirs and successors by the charters of the noble ancestors of [... the king ...], with the assent and at the special request of the then Bishop of Norwich [...] under certain manner and form as follows.

Viz., that all the burgesses of the town each year on 28 August be summoned and forewarned by the common serjeant-at-mace, in the name and by the authority of the mayor of the town then in office, to assemble on the following day, along with the mayor and the jurats of the town then in office, at the guildhall of the town, for the election both of the mayor and of the other officers and ministers mentioned. They having assembled, the alderman of the Holy Trinity Gild of Lynn then in office or – if he is unable to attend – whomever he designates as his deputy in regard to this election is to choose and nominate four of the more worthy and qualified burgesses of the town who are not of the status or rank of jurats but are then among those present. Who are to elect to join them eight others of their fellow burgesses, likewise not of the status or rank of the twenty-four jurats, for choosing the mayor and the other officers and ministers of the town for the coming year. Which twelve burgesses so chosen, having been administered their customary oath by the common clerk of the town, should proceed at once to electing one of the twenty-four jurats – and no other – to the office of mayor of the town, and other of their fellow burgesses or others who are not burgesses to the offices of chamberlains, common clerk, common sergeant-at-mace, and gatekeepers, as well as to the offices of bellman and wayte in the town for the coming year.

They having been thus elected to the offices, should in the guildhall on the following September 29 (and not before) without delay be administered by the common clerk the customary oaths pertaining to their offices. This having been done, they should continue to fulfill and undertake their duties throughout one entire year.

In regard to the election of the twenty-four jurats, the ancient custom was thus. Whenever one or more of the twenty-four jurats dies, retires from his position, or because of his faults legitimately warrants removal and expulsion from office, the mayor then in office and the remainder of the jurats, in the presence of each and every other burgess of the town who wishes to attend (upon being given notice by the sergeant-at-mace, on behalf of the mayor), as often as and whenever necessary, should elect, admit and appoint one or more of the more worthy, upstanding, judicious, and qualified burgesses to the place of he or they dying, retiring, or being removed, to exercise the corresponding authority. Those being thus elected, admitted and appointed – the customary oath having been administered – should continue for life in this status and position, unless it should happen due to the causes mentioned that they or any one of them should voluntarily retire or be removed.

Furthermore, should it happen that any one or more of the coroners or constables should die, or on account of old age or for some other good reason should retire or be removed, then the mayor then in office should have the burgesses of the town forewarned by the common sergeant to come to the guildhall to elect to the vacant office or offices. Once all his fellow burgesses wishing to attend have arrived, the mayor should nominate four of his fellow burgesses, who should similarly nominate eight others of their fellow burgesses who are then present. This being done, the twelve so nominated, after having been administered their customary oath, should elect and appoint another person or persons in place of the coroners or constables removed or whose positions are vacant.

While these ordinances, electoral procedures, and ancient customs endured and were observed in the manner described, our ancestors and predecessors, the mayor, jurats, burgesses, and community of the town led a peaceful, contented, and pleasant existence, through a long period of prosperity. But recently serious discord, strife, controversy, riot, dissension, and quarrels have arisen and spread among the fellow burgesses and others of the same town, because of certain new ordinances and constitutions relating to the election of the mayor, the other jurats, and the officers and ministers mentioned; which were made by certain former burgesses of the town and their adherents. Which [discord etc.] has increased to a deplorable level in recent days. The tenor of these new ordinances and constitutions takes the following form:

Memorandum, that recently various disagreements, discords, and controversies have been stirred up and have arisen between the mayor of the town of Bishop's Lynn and the majority of the burgesses of the town, on the one hand, and certain other burgesses of the town, on the other hand, concerning the annual election, and the method of that election, both of the mayor of the town and of the chamberlains, prolocutor, common clerk, common serjeant-at-mace, janitors, and other ministers and officers it is accustomed to elect annually in the town. Also concerning the election, and the method of that election, of fellow burgesses of the town to the status and rank of the twenty-four jurats, whenever and as often as it happens that one or more should be elected because one or more in that position die or voluntarily retire, or are removed because of their faults, and likewise as to the offices of coroner, constable, or others in the town. The present king, our dread lord, has heard of these disagreements, discords and controversies as the result of a complaint by certain persons; and has observed that the disagreements, discords and controversies – stemming not only from the causes just mentioned, but also from older disputes not completely and amicably settled – having lain dormant, have broken out afresh between the parties, and that these are likely to foster and facilitate disturbances and commotions between the parties and the rest of the burgesses of town and the community of the same.

He, wishing not only to take precautions against such dangers but also to put an end to the strife and bring about a secure restoration of peace and tranquillity between the parties, issued a royal command that certain of the parties appear before him. He informed them of his wishes in these matters, following which, he benevolently urged the parties to settle their differences and restore peace, putting an end permanently to the strife amongst themselves. Therefore, with the authority and at the prompting of the king, and also through their unanimous agreement, freely and willingly, the parties reached a final settlement of the disputes, discords and controversies between them, in regard to the elections and day of election of the mayor, jurats, prolocutor, and other officers indicated below; and also in regard to when the mayor assumes office and the way in which his oath is administered. The necessary articles, in the form that follows, were agreed upon unanimously to be valid in the town for themselves and for their successors.

That is, that henceforth and forever the election of the mayor in the town should be made according to the method used in the city of London. Or at least as much as it can possibly conform with the London procedures, insofar as that in the town there are not aldermen, wards, a recorder, nor various other things that exist in the city of London; but rather there are, by town ordinance, twenty-four jurats. That henceforth the election take place annually on 29 August. That whoever is then elected shall on 29 September following, and not earlier, according to custom, take his oath in the town guildhall; the common clerk administering the oath to the person elected. That having been done, he may assume the status and position, and continue therein as the chief executive throughout an entire year. Regarding the method of the election it was agreed that all burgesses of the town who are willing and able to assemble at the town guildhall on 29 August for the mayoral election may freely come there. The assembly having come together, it should be publicly proclaimed that no-one, under penalty of imprisonment, presume to express an opinion or participate in the election unless he is a fellow burgess or a minister of the town.

Immediately afterwards, the prolocutor and the common clerk of the town should instruct all the assembled burgesses to elect and nominate, after careful deliberation, two individuals from the twenty-four jurats or others who have formerly been members of the twenty-four jurats and are of the same status and rank – other than those notorious for having been discharged because of dishonesty, or other faults relating to public business. Choosing and nominating, as candidates for the mayoralty, whichever two of the twenty-four jurats or others the burgesses believe to be the more judicious, qualified, and beneficial for the community, to the praise of God and to the town's advantage, honour, and good reputation.

The nomination of the two nominees should take place according to the following method. The prolocutor and common clerk are first to enquire of the burgesses to whom they would wish to give their support in the first place, and to whom in the second place; and this with an appropriate pause in between, to allow one of them to receive a clear nomination, so that those assigned to this task have fully sounded out public opinion before enquiring about the other nominee. It being carefully and properly ascertained by the prolocutor and clerk who as the first choice and who as the second choice in this matter have the greatest support among the burgesses. To ensure that this is accurately determined and reported to the mayor and jurats, the prolocutor and clerk should themselves be present among the burgesses. And they should be administered a sound oath to report openly, faithfully and without fraud to the twenty-four jurats in the chamber assigned for their sessions, the names of the two persons; that is, of he who had the greatest support in the first place, and he who had the greatest support in the second place.

This having been done, first the mayor of the town, then each of the jurats in sequence should secretly state to the prolocutor and clerk his preference regarding one or the other of the nominees put forward to them, the mayor and jurats, as candidates for the mayoralty. The common clerk, under observation from the prolocutor, should write a confidential record of the individual preferences of each of the mayor and jurats. He of the two candidates on whom the majority of the mayor and jurats agree should be chosen and made mayor for the coming year. The election made in this way should forthwith be faithfully reported to the burgesses. Should the two candidates receive an equal number of votes from the mayor and jurats, then the mayor's vote is to count for two votes; so that, in such a situation, he who has the vote of the mayor should be chosen and amicably accepted as mayor of the town for the coming year.

In regard to the election of four chamberlains in the town, it was agreed that each year, immediately following the jurats and burgesses agreeing on the choice of a mayor, two burgesses of the town should be elected by the mayor and jurats to be two of the chamberlains, by the following method: agreement is to be reached on which two are to have the position or office of chamberlain by the mayor and jurats then in office, or at least the greater number of the twenty-four jurats shall be agreed, the vote of the mayor counting (as above) for two votes in the event that the mayor and jurats are evenly split in their votes and a majority does not exist. For the election of the other two chamberlains each year, two other burgesses should be nominated and chosen as chamberlains by those burgesses themselves who are present (as for the election of a mayor), or by the majority of the same; the testimony and record of the prolocutor and clerk, sworn in the manner mentioned, being always relied on to indicate which two burgesses of the town are decided upon by the majority of the burgesses participating in the election. The intention of the parties being that none of the chamberlains be in any year chosen from the twenty-four jurats, nor that any of those jurats be appointed to the office of chamberlain.

It was also agreed that when any of the twenty-four jurats dies, or it happens that any of them voluntarily retires or is removed from the status and rank of jurat – whether by withdrawal, deposition, or discharge, on account of old age or physical infirmity or any other cause at all – the mayor then in office should immediately designate a day to address this matter. Through the common serjeant-at-mace, he should give notice of this date to the twenty-four jurats and all other burgesses, and forewarn them to appear then in the chamber and guildhall. All burgesses not numbering among the twenty-four jurats who opt to participate should there and then, after careful deliberation amongst themselves, select and nominate from their number two persons whom they consider the more judicious, dependable, and qualified men to assume the status and rank of jurat, to God's praise and the town's advantage and honour. The prolocutor and clerk, sworn to this duty, should be present amongst the burgesses for this business; they should, in the chamber of the twenty-four jurats, faithfully and without fraud (in accordance with the oath they took), immediately report openly to the jurats the names of those two burgesses on whom all the burgesses have agreed.

Regarding which nominees, if it appears to the twenty-four jurats, or at least to the majority, that the two burgesses nominated to assume the status and rank of jurat are sufficiently judicious and qualified, or that either of them is sufficiently judicious and qualified, then he whom the majority of the twenty-four jurats agree to be sufficiently judicious and qualified is immediately to be accepted and advanced by the jurats to their status and rank, once the customary oath has been administered to him; he should forthwith be considered one of their number and ranked with them. Otherwise, if it appears to the majority of the twenty-four jurats that neither of the pair is, for any reason, sufficiently judicious and capable, then, those persons being excluded, the burgesses shall immediately convene again in the guildhall and, in the place of the excluded persons, should select two others from their number. On that occasion, and any thereafter, when there is need for someone to be chosen and advanced to that status and rank, both the choice and the acceptance should be restricted to the more judicious, more dependable, and more qualified burgesses of the town. It was agreed that no-one henceforth should be elected to or accepted into the rank of the twenty-four jurats unless he is of free status and possess [an income of] at least a hundred shillings in rents.

If in the future at such an election there is elected any common victualler who sells by retail, he should abstain from this kind of sale of victuals. Until he does so, he should not be advanced to that rank. And during his time at that rank he should not be a common victualler, under penalty of being removed from the rank.

In the same way, in all regards, that the twenty-four jurats are elected should the coroners and constables be elected, whenever there is a need to elect such officers. With the proviso, however, that coroners and constables may be chosen either from the twenty-four jurats or from any of the other burgesses, at the discretion of the electors.

It was also agreed and decided that, if in the future anyone petitions for the discharge of someone who is of the status and rank of the twenty-four jurats or the removal of that person from the status and rank, for any reason whatsoever, or any of the twenty-four jurats wishes to petition for his own discharge on account of old age, illness, physical infirmity, or any other reason whatsoever, the mayor then in office should designate a particular day and give notice of that date to all the jurats and burgesses, by forewarning them through the common sergeant-at-mace to be present in the chamber and guildhall. Once they have assembled on that date – the jurats in their chamber with the mayor, and in the guildhall those of the burgesses wishing to be present – after serious deliberation in their separate groups on the reasons put forward by anyone for removing or discharging someone, or the reasons that an individual (or someone on his behalf) argues for his own discharge, if the reasons put forward and argued appear valid and reasonable to the majority of the mayor and jurats, and also to a majority of the other burgesses who are in the guildhall, then the jurat against whom the reasons for removal have been laid out or the reasons for discharge have been argued, should be discharged from the rank and status and another person elected in his place, in the manner indicated above with the customary oath being administered. Otherwise the person in question should not, at that time or in any way, be removed or discharged from the status and rank, whether at his own petition or that of anyone else.

In this matter the mayor's vote is to count for two votes, in the event that in the debate on the reasons there is not found to be a majority among the mayor and jurats. As for what was the majority opinion among the burgesses, full credence is to be given to the prolocutor and clerk, who are sworn to this duty, and to the report they will make on this matter, in accordance with the procedure set out in regard to the mayoral election.

It was also agreed that on 24 August each year, the twenty-four jurats and all the other burgesses of the town having been duly forewarned by the common sergeant-at-mace to assemble in the chamber and the guildhall, by the assent of all, or at least a majority, of the burgesses who are not of the rank of the twenty-four jurats, there should be elected one of those burgesses not of that rank to be prolocutor of the town for the year following. Immediately after election, the person elected should take his oath before the mayor, jurats, and all the burgesses, and thereafter assume and exercise his office during the year. The common clerk, sworn to this duty, is to make a report and announcement as to which burgesse the majority of the burgesses have agreed should be the prolocutor.

In regard to the offices of common clerk, common sergeant-at-mace, keeper of the east gate, keeper of the west gate, and keeper of St. Anne's gate, and the offices of bellman and wayte for the town, it was agreed and decided that each year the mayor and jurats then in office should nominate men for those offices. These can be burgesses or any other persons whatsoever, according to the judgement and discretion of the mayor and jurats. This to be done on 29 August immediately after the election of the chamberlains. With the proviso that if controversy of any kind arises among the mayor and jurats regarding any or all of these elections, those persons on whom the majority of the mayor and jurats agree are to be elected to the offices, and appointed individually in the same according to the nomination, the opposition or alternate preference of the minority notwithstanding. If a majority does not exist, but both parties are equal, then the mayor's vote is to count for two votes (as repeatedly indicated above) in order to create a majority.

With the further proviso that the names of the officers thus nominated be immediately announced to the burgesses in the guildhall, and that at least the majority of the burgesses be satisfied with the nominees. If the majority of the burgesses in the guildhall are not satisfied regarding the nominees, or any one of them, the mayor and jurats should proceed without delay to repeating the selection of another nominee. In the place of the persons rejected, there should be nominated such persons as the majority of the burgesses are prepared to approve and find satisfactory. The prolocutor and common clerk then in office, sworn to this duty, are each year to ascertain and report faithfully (according to their oath) to which officers the majority of the burgesses have given approval, and with which they indicate they are satisfied and with which they are not satisfied. But if the majority of the burgesses are not satisfied with the persons nominated in the first round, nor with those nominated in a second round, then the person or persons on whom the majority of [\[both\]](#) the twenty-four jurats and the other burgesses can agree for holding those offices, or any of them, in a third round of elections should be elected to and hold the offices or office.

It was also agreed that in the appointment of the prolocutor and common clerk of the town to their offices, in the guildhall chamber before the mayor and jurats then in office each of them should take his customary oath for the faithful performance and exercise, without fraud, of his office and all things pertaining to the same. The common clerk's oath should be as follows: [\[see "Oaths of officers and burgesses"\]](#). The prolocutor at his appointment should take the same oath (mutatis mutandis). On any and each occasion when it happens that the prolocutor or the clerk – as well as the mayor and all the other ranks and officers – are re-elected to their offices, their oaths are to be renewed; that is, they are to be taken again, as often as this seems expedient to the mayor, jurats, and burgesses. If any prolocutor or clerk is found to act unfaithfully, contrary to his oath, and is duly convicted of the same, he is to lose not only his office but also his franchise of the town; and thereafter may under no circumstances be restored to that office and franchise, nor exercise or occupy any other office in the town in future.

Certain immense expenses, costs, losses, and intolerable damages have come about as a result of the aforementioned discord, strife, controversy, riot, and dissension, from the time that these new ordinances and constitutions were produced and enacted in the town. And over the course of time much worse is feared and can be expected to happen, unless things can be brought under control. They may result in the final destruction and impoverishment, as well as the desolation and probable overthrow, of the entire town – may it be far distant! Observing this, and wishing to take precautions against losses and onerous damages of this kind and, to the best of our ability, pluck up by the roots and entirely erase the strife, quarrels, and dissension from the town and from among its inhabitants, as well as to restore peace, quiet, and true harmony between us, and our heirs and successors, with the support and assistance of the lords [of the town] in re-establishing it forever, by this document we – by our common consent, will, and authority, for ourselves and our heirs and successors – revoke, void, disempower, and annul each and every of the above new ordinances and constitutions regarding the election of the mayor, jurats, officers and ministers, as specified in the above memorandum. Which [ordinances] have been the basis for fuelling grief and hatred, and every instance of the same. It is our will that these new ordinances and constitutions not be applied henceforth in the town, by ourselves or our heirs and successors, or in any way whatsoever be in effect or exercised. But that from this time forward and forever they be completely without power or substance.

Furthermore, for the better, healthier, and more judicious government of the town, through our common decision, assent, will and authority, we wish, grant, order, give and declare for ourselves, our heirs and successors, that the abovementioned ancient customs, ordinances, constitutions and all other commendable and prescribed customs, in each and every of their articles pertinent [to these matters] from now on, and forever, be upheld, adhered to, and firmly observed.

And if it happen that the town's mayor then in office should die within his year, before he has completed the term of his mayoralty throughout that year, the alderman of the gild then in office is to occupy, exercise and undertake the office of the mayor thus dying until the end of that year, as was the case and custom from ancient time, the new ordinances and constitutions notwithstanding.

[The concluding section of the document begins with a statement – whether from the borough authorities or, less likely, the king is not clear – that nothing within the document is to be prejudicial to the lordship rights of the Bishop of Norwich, and that the new common seal of the town was applied to the document at Lynn on 1 June 1416. There follows a statement of the king indicating approval of this exemplification of the revocation, witnessed by him at Westminster on 2 June 1416.]

At which assembly, around 11 o'clock, the mayor put the question whether there was anyone in the guildhall other than sworn and known burgesses. The general response to the mayor was "No". Upon which the mayor had William Ashebourne the common clerk publicly read out before the community the exemplification under the Great Seal of England of the king's inspeximus of the revocation of the New Ordinances [recited].

The public reading of the exemplification of the revocation and annulment of the New Ordinances and Constitutions having taken place, and it being understood, the mayor said: "Sirs, is there any man in this hall who objects to any point in this document of revocation and annulment?" They replied "No." After a brief pause, the mayor again asked: "Sirs, is there any man at all in this hall at this time who objects to any point?" They replied "No." For a third and final time the mayor gave an opportunity, saying: "Sirs, if there is any man in the hall at this time who is not happy or satisfied with these matters, let him stand up unafraid and state his opinion." They replied unanimously, to the effect that they considered themselves well satisfied with everything.

At this the mayor said: "Sirs, as you well know, today is our day to choose our mayor, and other officers, for the coming year. Is it your wish that we proceed to the election, or not?" They replied unanimously that it was. It is the case that the alderman of Holy Trinity Guild, Lynn, then in office may nominate and elect a minimum of 4 of the more judicious, qualified, and dependable burgesses who are not of the status or rank of jurats and are among those present, [who in turn are] to elect eight other of their fellow burgesses likewise not being of the status or rank of jurats, [all twelve serving] for the election of the mayor and other officers and ministers of the town. That alderman, standing bare-headed before the mayor and the community, both asked and requested: "Sirs, is it your wish that I name four persons, as this book prescribes?" Everyone responded that it was. Again he asked: "Sirs, what do you say – is it your wish that I name and call up four persons?" And they said that it was. Having giving the opportunity for proper consideration of the matter, the alderman named John Bryghtzeve, John Broun, John Maupas, and William Spyr, burgesses and merchants of the town of Lynn. They were instructed to go into the council chamber, according to custom and usage, and use their judgement to add to their number another eight of the more judicious, qualified, and dependable burgesses, according to custom and usage, two at a time; these were: Peter Cambell, John Sylesden, William Blakeneye, Philip Franke, John Alger, William Gedeney, Richart Thweyt, and Robert Narburgh.

These 12 came out of the council chamber and one by one took their customary oaths to do their duty (as indicated above) well and faithfully, as contained in the bound red book kept in the muniments chest etc. The 12 then went back into the council chamber for quite some time, to reach an agreement that was satisfactory to them. They came out with their verdict in writing, carried by John Alger. Upon which the alderman, at the suggestion of Philip Franke prior to the decision being announced, left his seat and stood up bareheaded before the mayor and whole community there and asked: "Sirs, has it been your wish that I name and call up four burgesses, as we have done?" For certain, they unanimously responded that it was. Upon which the mayor instructed William Ashebourne the common clerk to take delivery of the verdict. The common clerk asked the 12: "Sirs, are you all agreed?" They replied that they were. He then said: "Sirs, hand over your verdict." They handed over to the common clerk a written paper note in which it was set down that the 12 sworn men had elected John Wesenham as mayor for the coming year, Walter Todenham, William Waterden, William Stile, and Hugh Cook as chamberlains, William Ashebourne as common clerk, Robert Beer as sergeant-at-mace and keeper of the east gate, John Frome as keeper of the south gate, Thomas Groute as keeper of the north gate, and John Mordon as bellman, for the next year coming, beginning as of next Michaelmas, on which day they will take their oaths in the guildhall, as is set down in the exemplification mentioned above.

Memorandum that on the same day, after the mayor, chamberlains, and other officers had been elected, the mayor with the consent of [\[those of\]](#) the community present had arranged, as a favour to the mayoralty, for the council of the reverend father, dom. John Wakerynge by God's grace Bishop of Norwich, to come before the mayor and community gathered there following that event, as observers of the assembly and the people taking part in it. That is: Master John Cays, parson of the church of Fakenham and clerk of the King's Hanaper; Master William Sponne, steward of the hospice of the reverend father; dom. Thomas Hevenyngham, prior of the monks at Lynn; and Edmund Oldehall esq., receiver of the king's revenues for the Duchy of Lancaster in the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridgeshire, and one of the king's justices for keeping the peace in Norfolk, substituting for John Spenser, sheriff of Norfolk, also of the council, because the sheriff is said to be detained in London, infected with a fever and other infirmities. The mayor, 24 jurats, and burgesses there assembled rose to leave with both a cheerful demeanour and feeling of great satisfaction, pleased both with the conclusion of the day's events and the arrival of the bishop's council; and all departed in tranquillity, peace and harmony, giving praise to God and rejoicing in His grace.

On which day, proclamation was made in the town of Bishop's Lynn – that is, in the Tuesday marketplace and Saturday marketplace – around 9 o'clock, in the names of the king and the lord of the liberty of the town of Bishop's Lynn, at the instructions and recommendation of Edmund Oldehalle, king's justice for keeping the peace in Norfolk, with the agreement of those present from the council of the Bishop of Norwich, and in the presence of Thomas Hunte mayor of the town of Lynn, that craftsmen and labourers who were residents of Lynn should not fail to remain at and keep open their shops or selds, pursuing their crafts or other livelihoods as they are accustomed on week-days, unless they are burgesses. And that all vagrants or itinerant persons who were within the liberty should bring themselves before the king's justices [\[to give assurances\]](#) for keeping the peace, so that no insurrections, gatherings, conventicles, or riots in any form or fashion take place this day in the town of Lynn.

[\[6. Letter from the mayor and good men of Lynn concerning a rioter, 1416\]](#)

To the most honourable gentleman and our most devoted friend, John Spenser, sheriff of Norfolk. Respected and reverent sir, we commend ourselves to you, and thank you from the bottom of our hearts for the kindness and courtesy you have shown us in times past, hoping for continuation of the same. We have understood your letter, for which our deepest thanks. As concerns Thomas Feltwell goldsmith, mentioned in your letter, it is well-known throughout Lynn that he was in the past indicted for rebellion and riot, and we have dealt with him fairly and in good faith, sir, since the last time that he was newly indicted. He never showed any repentance in word or action as far as we could tell, nor did anyone speak up for him until now – except only his wife spoke to us on his behalf – but he remained obstinate, full of ill-will, malice and worse. So it seemed to us and our fellows that we were not obliged to do him any favours. And we have been repeatedly informed, sir, that Thomas Hardell, Thomas Enemethe and many others with ill intent are consorting with and gathering again around Bartholomew Petypas, to offer him advice and his party support; and one is an attorney and schemes to have me, the mayor, brought in person to answer before the king or his council, along with all the bonds that we have taken in this matter. We beg you, sir, if it please you, to pay special attention to determining if this is what is being talked about there, and to do your best to prevent it, and send us information on the matter along with your best advice, by a speedy letter. We shall reimburse you for your efforts in a manner that will satisfy you, with God's grace. Sir, we are sending to you, by the carrier of this letter, a little young [...] beer, for we are given to believe that your other is destroyed. As regards your table "meyne" we have written on this matter, and as soon as it arrives we will send it to you. And sir, my wife Elizabeth commends herself to you a thousand times over. If there is anything else we may or can do to please you, do let us know by letter and we shall do whatever is within our power. Dear sir, we can say no more at this time. But Jesus give you long life, body and soul, and continual increase in honours. Written at Lynn, the second day of the month of July, in the fourth year of the reign of King Henry V.

DISCUSSION

It is not often we are given an intimate look at electoral procedures in medieval English towns; when we are, it is often as a consequence of disputes arising over those procedures. The texts above document episodes from a lengthier struggle between political factions in early fifteenth century Lynn. This struggle I have earlier discussed elsewhere and will try to avoid repeating all the same details here. At the risk of over-simplifying, it was a contest for control of borough government between two main interests in the town. One group, the potentiores, aimed to preserve its status as a ruling elite within a larger privileged group: the enfranchised burgesses. The other group, which may loosely be described as a populist or reform movement, aimed to alter the constitution to give or restore, depending on one's perspective, authority to the "community" – its support coming primarily from the lower ranks of the burgesses and from the unenfranchised residents. This group was led by burgesses Bartholomew Petypas and John Bilney, and two non-burgesses, William Hallyate and John Tilney.

Complicating matters was the involvement of the Bishop of Norwich, who had a tradition of being a champion of the interests of the lesser townspeople against the more prominent citizens, and who had long been engaged in a struggle of his own against the potentiores. The latter believed it would be the economic benefit of the town and to the improvement of their ability to run local affairs if they could obtain greater independence from the jurisdictional rights of the bishop. The political conflict internal to the community followed hard on after a series of clashes between the potentiores and the bishop and his officials in Lynn. These were complicated by popular riots, in support of which side is uncertain although a parliamentary petition of 1404 had seven lesser townsmen, claiming to represent the "poor commons", complaining of wrongs and extortions committed by "the great men", who had imprisoned the petitioners. The nature of the bishop's involvement in the internal struggle is also not entirely clear; at the least he gave moral support and showed some favouritism towards the reformers, but he may have gone so far as intentionally to furnish some of the key leaders of the resistance to the potentiores. On the other hand, the bishopric, initially (when the potentiores began their legal contest) in the hands of Henry Despenser who had several reasons to object to those governing Lynn, changed hands three times during the affair, making it necessary for the reformers to repeatedly reassure themselves of episcopal support.

Once the Petypas party had obtained control of government in 1411 by installing a figurehead mayor, Roger Galyon – by force, its opponents claimed (see below) – it quickly showed its intent to introduce constitutional reforms, sending fact-finding missions first to Oxford, where the method of mayoral election reported back could not have been very encouraging, then to Norwich and London. The potentiores were no less prompt to complain to the king that the recent election had been carried out contrary to the chartered liberties of the borough, obliging Petypas to lead a large delegation to Westminster, carrying the town charters for presentation in their defence; the detailed itemization of expenses associated with this episode, in the chamberlains account of 1411/12, shows how seriously this threat was taken.

After scraping through this challenge, the reform administration, in an effort partly intended to cow the potentiores, subjected to a review their past administrations during the years of the struggle against the bishop, and accused them of "numerous injuries, oppressions, injustices, exactions, extortions, and wrongful vexations, and many sums of money in which the mayor and the potentiores became indebted, which were frequently imposed on and raised from the burgesses and inferiores who are not burgesses, frequently without a reasonable cause, to their serious injury and damage, and to the no slight impoverishment of the town, for which reason the opposition of the burgesses and inferiores."

[KL/C10/2 f.10b]

The new administration even went so far as to employ, for eighteen days, some sort of specialist to re-audit the chamberlains' accounts for the previous twelve years. The underlying concern seems to have been that borough expenditures had burgeoned out of control, with the community in effect becoming debtor to the potentiores, from whom money had been borrowed (both individually, and collectively through the merchant guild) or supplies purchased, giving them not only a political but also an economic hold over the town. There was additionally concern for management of revenues from rents, the backbone of the corporation budget, and freeman admission fees; during Petypas' mayoralty, four new rentals of community properties were compiled. The scrutiny may have extended beyond the ex-mayors, for the chamberlains account for that first year of the reform administration also included, in an attached schedule, a petition by town clerk William Ashebourne regarding the expenses of his offices since 1408; although perhaps the clerk simply took the opportunity to try to recoup his personal outlay – an effort he continued to pursue in later years.

The review of past administrations by an investigative committee – from which the potentiores, initially participating, soon dissociated themselves – led to a decision that imposed financial penalties on that group, particularly those who had served as mayor. A note added at this time to both the 1401/02 and 1404/05 chamberlains' accounts (the only fair-copy accounts surviving from that decade) stated that all expenses of that year's administration – many of which related to the legal battle with Bishop Despenser – were disallowed by the majority of the investigating committee (i.e. those who remained after the potentiores had withdrawn). The reason given was that the mayors of those years, and several other mayors since and before, through "confederacies" and "private oaths" had conspired against the bishop, without consent of the burgesses or the inferiores, dishonestly, unjustly, inordinately, and dissolutely spending borough revenues. This referred to the legal battle with the bishop, part of whose costs had been paid for out of the pockets of the potentiores, particularly the past mayors. Under the award issued by the investigative committee on May 20, 1412 the ex-mayors' claims for reimbursement were denied and it was ruled they should repay community money expended on the legal battle.

Another irritant had been the growing salary demands of the mayors; Thomas Brygge, for example, claimed £26.13s.4d for his term in office in 1407/08, and he was excused the 20s. he had been assessed towards a communal tax, apparently a customary perk for mayors. The investigators cut his salary claim to the traditional fee of £10.

However, the reform administration dropped its demand for repayment, apparently on the understanding that the ex-mayors would drop theirs for reimbursement. As a result, agreements were obtained from most of the potentiores in July for their compliance with the award. In December this submission was given, it seemed, more security by each of the potentiores putting up a bond of £100 to guarantee their acceptance of the terms of the award. Later, once the potentiores had regained ascendancy, they would take bonds for good behaviour from their opponents.

The reform party was able to maintain its hold over the mayoralty at the 1412 election, thanks in part to having made 112 of its supporters burgesses days before the election took place; they included Hallyate and Tilney. The occupation of most of these was stated at that time, or later. The list identifies 39 different occupations spread across the board. Most were artisans, with an unsurprising predominance of those involved in the cloth industry (hosiers, drapers, tailors, weavers, shermen, chaloners, listers, steynours, cardmaker), followed by the leather industry (skinners, tawyers, cordwainers, barkers, saddlers), and the metal-working industries (goldsmiths, cutlers, pewterers, spurriers, armourer, locksmith, brasier). Those involved in the food trades are less in evidence than might be expected: there are several butchers, but only a couple of bakers and brewers and a single cook on the list. Similarly, only a handful of middlemen – mercers, chandlers, spicers.

The list suggests that, unlike the situation at London, where different crafts were powerful enough to be rivals for power, at Lynn the split was more mercantile vs. crafts, although it would be dangerous to characterize the political conflict purely on that basis. It does appear that much of Petypas' support came from lesser tradesmen, as opposed to the mercantile potentiores. But, except for two mariners, who might have been ship's masters, there is no evidence of where lay the loyalties of the lowest strata of society: labourers; if indeed they were involved or interested in the struggle for power. The absence of those involved in the building industries, other than for two glasiors and a joiner, may also be suggestive.

However, the list of entrants is not by itself reliable evidence, since Petypas would have selected as franchise entrants those easiest to slip under the net. Many of them were probably financially qualified to be freemen, but had never thought it sufficiently advantageous, economically, to warrant paying the 40s. admission fee; strictly speaking, they were not supposed to retail in the town unless freemen, but this does not seem to have been much enforced until the 1420s. John Wentworth, on the other hand, would have disagreed about their eligibility, for he complained to the bishop that these were mere shoemakers and tailors of whom 20 or so were worth only a penny. These entrances became a bone of contention between the parties. This was partly over whether the entrants had the right to become freemen under guise of most (100) entering by right of apprenticeship, and thereby free of fee as was the case with merchants' apprentices. And partly over the payment of the entrance fees, which appear to have been deferred initially. Petypas later called upon them as a source of revenue to fund his efforts to stay in power, and accounted for them as revenues during his mayoralty (1413/14). But the potentiores subsequently refused to accept this and, suspecting the revenues had never reached the communal treasury, obliged the entrants to take a special oath to divulge when they had become freemen and to whom they had paid their fees; they were also required either to find guarantors for the payment of the fees in full, or to renounce citizenship.

The pressure the reform administration continued to be under during its second term in office (1412/13) is reflected in the chamberlains' account of that year, which deviated from tradition in that it was prefaced by a narrative of events in the ongoing struggle with the potentiores; this was presented as an "account" of the activities of the investigative committee and the subsequent efforts of the reform administration. The account, likely drafted by John Tilney, was careful to state (whether accurately or not) that all actions taken by the administration were done through the assent and consent of the community. The mayoral account of Bartholomew Petypas for 1413/14 has a similarly unconventional character, not least because it extends throughout the term of his successor, as if Petypas considered that he was legitimately mayor during that second year. At the same time, the excitement generated within the community by the radical turn of events is reflected in the large attendances recorded at assembly meetings during 1412/13, often estimated as in the hundreds and triple the level of attendance common in an earlier period.

In late August 1412 the potentiores' representatives, Thomas Waterden and John Brandon, had put their complaints before the Chancellor, Archbishop Arundel, who had in fact been present on May 20 when the investigative committee made its award and received the potentiores submission to its terms. They succeeded in obtaining a writ summoning mayor Galyon to appear before the Chancellor, bringing the document embodying the award and the related bonds put up by the potentiores. The pair put up their own bond, guaranteeing they would pay the court costs if they failed to prove their case against the mayor. Galyon, doubtless at Petypas' instructions, neglected to respond to the first summons; after a second summons, permission was obtained for him to appear by deputy rather than in person. The reformers in their turn had obtained the intervention of the bishop, who summoned the potentiores to appear before him. After the bishop had ordered them to desist and respect the agreement, Petypas sent Tilney to London in mid-September to try to dissuade the Chancellor from proceeding.

All these activities, from about May to October 1412, resulted in expenses of just over £80; but it paid off for, after a period in which the potentiores continued to plot, during October and November groups of the potentiores dropped their actions against the reform administration. Meanwhile, in mid-October, Petypas further secured his party's position by leading a delegation to Westminster (in response to the writ originally directed to Galyon) where they consulted numerous lawyers, and obtained a review by the Chancellor of their complaints, the award of the investigative committee, and the related submissions. The Chancellor pronounced in favour of what had been done, and the king subsequently gave his stamp of approval in late November; to which letters patent of inspeximus the reform administration applied the borough seal in a ceremony attended by various notables. A sealed exemplification of the inspeximus was obtained the following April.

Constitutional reform was still not yet underway, although Petypas and his colleagues were moving slowly in that direction, with the introduction of the office of prolocutor and the intent to seek from Henry V at least a confirmation of the borough charters, on whose brief terminology rested the claim of the community to a say in the mayoral elections. In that latter ambition they were disappointed: the parliamentary representatives (Tilney and Hallyate), assigned to the task, reported that no town had been able to secure confirmation of their charters from the new king. In July, they obtained the promotion of John Bilney into the ranks of the jurats, in place of Ralph Bedingham who had been deposed earlier in the year, for reasons unknown; this meant that two of the reform leaders were now qualified for the mayoralty, placing less reliance on Galyon.

A third term in office for the reformers was achieved through the election in 1413 of Petypas himself as mayor. It continued to be a year of struggle between the opposing parties; very soon in to his term, Petypas despatched his lieutenants to London to advise the newly-elected Bishop Courtenay of the continuing disputes and to seek his intervention. When the potentiores were asked if they would agree to his arbitration, however, they temporized. As the elections again approached in 1414, rumours reached Petypas that his opponents would bring in an armed force recruited in the countryside to help them control the outcome. He tried to pre-empt this by holding the elections on August 21, evidently resulting in his own re-election. Despite this the potentiores assembled a crowd of their supporters at the Augustinian friary on August 29, having been denied access to the guildhall, and held their own election; they further obtained a writ summoning Petypas, Galyon, Bilney, and Hallyate to appear before the king on September 7, to explain themselves. Before setting out, Petypas ensured he still had popular support, by asking an assembly if the community was willing to bear the expenses of the four men's journey to London and obtaining permission to take with him letters of attorney on behalf of the community.

The first document given above, not fully dated, was dictated by Petypas while in London, during the final days of his mayoralty. Dorothy Owen, in calendaring the volume of memoranda in which a copy had been made [William Asshebourne's Book, Norfolk Record Society, vol.48 (1981)] assigned it a date of 26 February 1414, on the assumption that the saint's day mentioned was that of St. Mathias. However, I believe that this document was written in London in the context of the hearing given by the king's council to representatives of the two sides in the dispute, following each party having elected a rival mayor in August, and that the correct festival is St. Matthew's, making the date 24 September. The second document, stating complaints evidently laid by, and represented from the perspective of, the potentiores, indicates the strenuous efforts Petypas made to ensure his re-election, a success that would be overturned by decisions at Westminster.

The outcome of the arbitration of the king's council was that the parties agreed on what were named the New Ordinances. However, this settlement was not really satisfactory to the potentiores and did not prevent further disputes over constitutional matters. The ordinances were put into immediate effect through a new election; but the supposed compromise candidate for mayor, John Lakinghithe, was soon denounced by Petypas for plotting to subvert what the reformers had accomplished. The Lakinghithe administration annulled the mass freemen entrances made under the reform administration (a decision later reversed) and had the disputes brought back before the Chancellor. There they obtained permission to appoint new arbitrators, to be chosen by an electoral committee; however, the committee comprised 17 potentiores and 7 supporters of the reform party, and only the former were present when the arbitrators were chosen. This turn of events provoked violent protests from the reformers, and it was now their turn to complain to the Chancellor, who ruled in April that a fresh arbitration take place through the Bishop of Norwich and Earl of Dorset.

However, the potentiores seem to have been making complaints of their own, with the result that on May 10, 1415 the king appointed four justices to investigate "dissensions, discords and debates which have continued for no small time and still do daily between the mayor and certain of the burgesses of King's Lynn [sic] and certain other burgesses and the commonalty" [Calendar of Inquisitions Miscellaneous, 1399-1422, 189]; the king noted that he had tried to settle the problem by summoning representatives of both parties before him, but had been unable to get them to agree to compromise or even negotiate. The investigations (extracts in document no.2 above) went as far back as the mayoral election of Michaelmas 1411 when, it was complained, an armed mob led by William Hallyate, John Bilneye, Bartholomew Petypas, merchants, and John Tilneye junior, husbandman, had intervened by force to have their candidate, Roger Galyon, nominated and elected.

By this time matters had worsened for the reformers' cause, for Lakinghithe had died in office, allowing gild alderman Robert Brunham, a leader of the potentiores, to assume the mayoralty. When election time rolled around again, the New Ordinances were followed; the community nominated two jurats – probably Petypas and Bilney – and the jurats selected as mayor the lesser of the evils: Bilney. Some of the jurats, however, complained to the Chancellor and sought to have the election annulled. When queried about this by the Chancellor, Brunham replied (according to Petypas' account) that the election had been legitimate. This position, if taken, was soon reversed – perhaps (again, according to Petypas) because the death of Bishop Courtenay left the reformers temporarily vulnerable – and some potentiores, probably Brunham himself during the final days of his term of office, obtained a writ summoning Bilney before the Chancellor. The immediate consequences are the subject of the third document above.

Bilney managed (once more according to Petypas) to justify his election to the Chancellor, but the latter decided it might quieten things down in Lynn if he put aside the claims of both Bilney and Brunham and appointed a third party. Thomas Hunte thereby became mayor, theoretically a compromise candidate. In fact he was evidently perceived as a trusted member of the potentiores for, at a meeting of the corporation in March 1415, when alderman Brunham could not be present, Hunte had taken his place; he had also been an executor of Robert Botkesham, one of the main early targets of the reformers. Once in the mayoralty, whether from a genuine desire to restore peace to local politics or from sympathies with his fellow merchants of the potentiores, Hunte engineered the revocation of the New Ordinances, and the restoration of the key points of the earlier constitution, removing the powers the community had won under those ordinances.

The lengthy text of the revocation, recorded on a single large membrane, which I have divided up into paragraphs to make for easier reading, illustrates the different political perspectives of the parties in conflict in early fifteenth century Lynn. The New Ordinances were based on constitutional arrangements in London. It may seem odd for a movement seeking to break the hold of an elite on government to look for a solution to a city where an elite was perhaps more firmly entrenched than elsewhere. But adopting this model appears to have been the idea of the arbitrators; the reformers probably had few options available, and the example of London provided a source of authority that might prove an acceptable compromise to all interests.

The procedure at the election in 1416 seems to show an electorate in which harmony had largely been restored. More likely it shows a political situation in which the fortunes of the reformers were at a low ebb and there was little resistance to the potentiores aims.

Hunte's querying of the guildhall audience whether they wished to proceed with the election may have been a traditional procedure. It is also recorded for the election of 1412 when, around 10 o'clock, mayor Galyon asked those in attendance – a crowd of about 150 burgesses and 100 non-burgesses – whether they wished to proceed with the election. When dissenters raised their voices, it was put to a vote; the procedure being for all in favour to sit, and all opposed to stand, leaving six persons conspicuously on their feet. The dissent was over the question of electoral procedures. This question was put to the burgesses at large, who responded that by right, granted through royal charters, it ought to lay with them to nominate and elect the mayor and other officers. The procedure followed, at the advice of John Bilney, used the co-optative committee of 12, but with the first four chosen by the congregation – two from the jurats and two from the burgesses – instead of by the alderman (who, like most of the jurats, was boycotting the election).

Hunte's mayoralty did not see the end of the wrangles over the constitution. During his successor's mayoralty the corporation sent a representative to Norwich "to learn how they are governed in those parts." [KL/C39/51 m.9] It would take a couple more years before things started to return to normal, following the introduction of a lower council as the voice of the community, the prolocutor being seen no more.

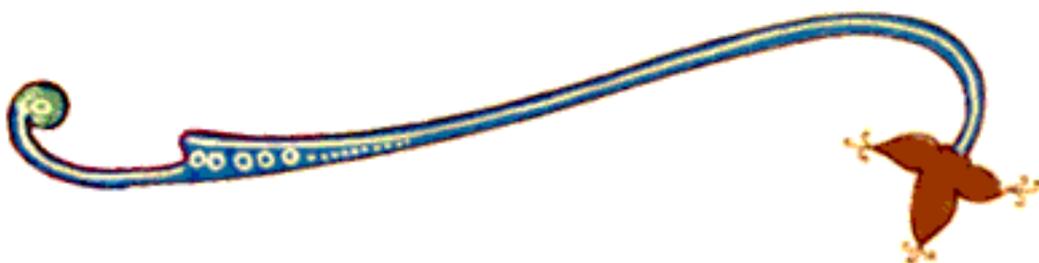

Differences in political perspective of the parties can be seen in the documents above. The potentiores preferred the more orderly process of nominal representation of the community through an electoral committee whose decision was held to symbolize a unanimous decision of the community, although the process of indirect election was influenced by individuals they would select (the alderman of the merchant guild being not merely one of their number, but one of the leaders of that party). The reformers preferred an open majority vote of all qualified voters to determine mayoral candidates, it being recognized that unanimity was unlikely.

The reformers, although they held that the community was the source of authority, acknowledged two separate empowered estates, jurats and burgesses, seeing the two as partners in government with the primary decision as to candidature for office being made by the burgesses. Membership in the jurats, through identification with the Magna Jurata, an originally separate body acting as a jury for the view of land, was restricted to townsmen who held property providing an income of at least 100s. a year. Even the reformers did not attempt to empower the unenfranchised class within the community, although non-burgesses were often in attendance at assembly meetings during the reform administration; on one occasion (28 June 1413), when the potentiores refused to attend because there was such a crowd of non-burgesses present, the mayor replied that because the business in hand was the report of the representatives to the last parliament and the raising of money for their wages, he could not deny anyone entrance to the hall.

The potentiores on the other hand, although they might pay lip-service to communal authority, really saw that authority as divided; they had come to see it as their right to exercise decision-making in local government. Even within their own group they recognized a smaller elite whose opinions counted for more. By 1419, we find expression of this perception of the political hierarchy in a statement that an ordinance had been made in the guildhall by "the majority of the patricians of the bench, the 24 venerable sworn combürgesses of the town of Lynn, and the 27 judicious combürgesses of the common council of the town of Lynn." [KL/C39/52 m.11r] The terminology is significant.

The powerful ex-mayors who had been the principal target of the reformers had now established themselves more firmly in local government, while the community at large was excluded from routine assemblies, being represented by a lower council whose oath suggests its scope was restricted to domestic matters. The institutionalisation of communal consultation through the Common Council ensured more breadth to local government, and perhaps greater accountability. It may be that have helped detach the moderates from the extremists in the reform movement; but it did not involve a significant transfer of power. That and other small concessions to the community, such as that the election of replacement jurats could only take place in an assembly open to community attendance, failed to do more than delay the trend towards the development of a closed corporation. But it was sufficient to bring an end, for exhausted combattants, to one of the more virulent periods of urban political strife for which records survive from the medieval period.

"have not been imprisoned"

Whatever the rumour, it was true as regards John Tilneye, who had been sent to London in advance of the 1414 mayoral election, to clarify to the king matters related to electoral procedure; he remained in gaol for over 8 weeks. On 1 October 1414 Petypas and other of his supporters, by standing as sureties, obtained royal orders to the steward and marshal of the king's household to have Tilneye released from gaol.

"other lords"

Possibly the Duke of Exeter, the Lord Admiral, was among them. He had inherited a part interest in the Lynn Tolbooth, a source of revenue, and had a house in Lynn; he may have been the author of an unattributed letter of June 1413, copied into Ashebourne's memoranda book, complaining of certain potentiores efforts to deprive the author of his rights. Both his personal interests in Lynn and those in his role of Lord Admiral (Ashebourne's book shows a strong interest in recording documents related to the extent of the Admiral's authority) would have made him a valuable ally. Certainly in December 1416, the reformer's legal expert, John Tilney, was trying to bring the Admiral into play to put the potentiores under pressure.

"4 persons"

Petypas, Hallyate, Bilney, and Tilney.

"King's Lynn"

Editorial licence; the town was known as Bishop's Lynn in the Middle Ages.

"John Warner"

Sent by the reform administration in late 1411, along with William Colles, first to Norwich and then to London to seek constitutional advice. In 1413 he was one of the few potentiores not boycotting corporation meetings. During Hunte's mayoralty (1415/16) he was entrusted with an important mission for the borough administration, and by 1420 had entered the ranks of the jurats. Possibly he was considered a neutral party in the political struggle.

"force and arms" "violently" "mutilation"

We must allow for the conventional expression of the time, which was prone to exaggerate both for effect and to ensure the complaint appeared serious enough to warrant the king's attention. This does not mean that any individual account is inaccurate, but that the terminology used was carefully chosen to influence the authorities' definition of the nature of the crime.

"John Cissesson"

One of the inferiores who had been brought into the franchise in 1412 (as John Sysson spurrier) to pack the electorate in favour of the reform party.

"mayors elected from of old"

The reason we find this unusual reference, particularly distinguishing these individuals from the "good men", is that the past mayors were the principal target and opponents of the Petypas faction, and probably the complainants here.

"Holy Trinity chapel"

Lynn's merchant gild was dedicated to Holy Trinity through its socio-religious counterpart, and the dedication and chapel were thereby associated with the borough officials. Note that later in the document the mayor-elect takes his oath of office on a book decorated with an image of Holy Trinity.

"William Wyth"

The surname was a common one in Lynn, without any clear indications whether or not their holders were related at all. There was a series of William Wyths in the late fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries and it is difficult to disentangle them. One was a jurat 1385-87, another jurat 1437-49. A William Wyth purchased the franchise in January 1401 and may have been the man who shortly afterwards travelled to Nottingham on unspecified community business, possibly the same as the William Wyth fined in 1400 for breaking the ale and bread assizes and for keeping a common hostelry and stable. Interestingly, the William who became jurat in 1437 had his status confirmed the following year only on condition he provided himself with a residence that was not a common hostelry; it may have been the same man, as the accusation had also been made at the leet court in 1421, 1428 and 1430. His political affiliations in 1415 (if any) are unclear, and probably he was just acting as an agent serving the potentiores' purpose.

This office was part of the reforms introduced by the Petypas faction when they came to power, and did not long survive their period in power. The role of the two officers, first introduced in January 1413, was to represent the interests of the community during corporation meetings, speaking on its behalf (given that the potentiores dominated the ranks of the jurats, who would normally dominate debates) and, as later events showed, helping coordinate the conduct of elections; the choice of John Bilney and Philip Frank as first holders of the office is indicative of the importance with which it was viewed, as too are the stipulations in the New Ordinances governing the election and conduct of the officer. Whether the office retained as much importance after the resurgence of the potentiores is not certain. Thomas Abnale was not one of the principal movers of the reform party, although one of the secondary lights. He had been one of a small delegation sent by the reformers in October 1411 to sound out the Chancellor about obtaining a new charter of liberties, and in the same month was part of the larger delegation to go to Westminster to defend against the potentiores charges. In August 1416 he was one of the named members of Petypas' entourage when they consulted with the bishop's council, regarding a settlement with the potentiores – a meeting which made the latter very nervous. On the other hand, he had been a junior member of a group, most of whom were jurats, accused by Bishop Despenser in 1402 of posing a threat to him and his servants, and a few years later was rubbing shoulders with men such as Waterden, Lakinghithe, and Galyon as prominent members of the town's Corpus Christi gild. He was also a councillor after the potentiores had regained control of government (1418-25), although this does not preclude his being their continued opponent – during 1418 he and Hallyate brought some unspecified accusation against the corporation. I am not aware of any other instance of this office, so-named, in urban governments, although we may see here adaptation of an office at London, where a common narrator acted as spokesperson on behalf of the aldermen and the common council, while at Norwich a few years later there appears a common speaker as the mouthpiece of the new institution of the Common Council; other precedents are from ecclesiastical institutions. If not London influence, it may be that creating the office was the idea of John Tilney, the legal mind of the faction and its principal link to the Bishop of Norwich.

"John Waterden"

Unless this is a transcription error for Thomas Waterden, one of the leading opponents of the Petypas faction, John would at this time have been only a junior member of the family prominent in the ranks of the mercantile ruling class. It was not until the 1420s that he took on responsible roles in the community: legal counsellor to local government, parliamentary representative, and treasurer of Corpus Christi gild. His appearance in the role of mainpernor in 1410, however, may perhaps suggest he was already embarking on a legal career, and this may in turn suggest his usefulness to the potentiores.

"earnestly requested"

It is not clear from the grammar ("he requested") whether Robert or Bartholomew made this request, but likely the latter, given the tenor of what followed.

"the crowd that gathered"

Ashebourne, likely recording this account very soon after the events occurred (possibly even taking notes as they happened), had already given some indication of his agitation by his brief switch to first-person, declining to record some of the exchanges, and defending the honour of the jurats. Here he gives further sign of that, by switching from Latin to English; he goes back and forth between the two languages throughout the rest of the account.

"bellman"

One of the minor bureaucratic officers of the town, the bellman or bedeman was responsible for making public announcements.

"never was"

Ashebourne's indignation appears to have got the better of his memory, for on 25 January of the same year (it had been complained to Chancery) Petypas and his supporters had, with drawn baselard, burst into the guildhall and assaulted mayor John Lakinghithe, a man of advanced years, and other potentiores; Lakinghithe was likewise thrown to the ground and trampled on, it was claimed. Possibly this treatment contributed to the ill-health Lakinghithe claimed as an excuse for not appearing before Chancery in February. He was dead within a few months.

"William Ashebourne"

He became town clerk of Lynn in late 1407 or early 1408, having previously served the Bishop of Norwich in a similar capacity, perhaps clerk of the steward of Lynn;

he remained in that office until 1423, when he was pensioned off at 66s.8d a year, with survivor's benefits for his wife of 13s.4d annually. The examples that survive suggest that it may not have been uncommon for town clerks at this period to compile important town documents into a convenient reference work. Most of these were formal compilations for posterity; a few purely for personal convenience. Such a notebook, part formulary and part register of memoranda, was compiled by Ashebourne and it shows a particular interest in documents related to the constitutional contest of the first half of his clerkship. It may have been begun as a personal tool, although I suspect the intent came to be the creation a record that might support the potentiores in the later stages of their battle to regain control of local government; certainly the document appears to have remained with the borough archives throughout the 15th century, although at some later date it was removed, to be restored only in mid-20th century. Ashebourne was evidently scandalized by the reformers' behaviour, and they in turn considered him affiliated with the potentiores; although he remained in office during their administrations, they preferred to entrust important clerical work, pertaining to the political struggle, to John Tilney. That preference may also have had something to do with his switch in allegiance from bishop to corporation; he himself recorded his surrender to other episcopal officials of the court rolls, rentals, and other records for which he had responsibility, along with the keys to the archival chest, and of the insult offered him by one of them, describing him as changing from a Paul to a Saul. Ashebourne had lived in Lynn since at least 1392. About ten years later he was accused before Chancery by a tailor of Lynn (later one of the franchise entrants of 1412) of having called Henry IV a "false traitor"; if true it might reinforce the impression that he had a conservative tendency to look with disfavour upon revolution.

This may simply be a statement of fact, or a sarcastic comment from the clerk. If the Petypas faction was supported by the bishop, aiming to overthrow the leading townsmen who were trying to break free of his lordship, then it may be significant that it was the bishop who requested Robert Beer be appointed as sergeant in December 1413, during Petypas' mayoralty, upon the death of the previous holder of the office.

"common seal"

The common seal served as the official signature of borough government; possession of it would allow its holders to act as if in power.

"sword"

This was a symbol of mayoral authority.

"he had a concern"

A hypothetical reading of assignavit causam. The difficulty here is that it is not clear who or what is the subject of the verb. Nor is it clear whether this sentence refers to something explicitly expressed, or an aside by the common clerk.

"exemplification"

An official copy.

"the mayor"

Thomas Hunte.

"fellow burgesses"

The Latin term comburgenses comes close towards being a technical term, superseding the earlier pares, the community of equals in which rights and privileges were shared (although some of the peers came to be, as the possessors of political power, "more equal").

"not of the status or rank"

Indeed, none of the 12 electors chosen were from the '24', although later examples show that this custom did not continue to be fully respected.

"who are not burgesses"

The chamberlains, as officers privy to confidential town business, were selected from freemen, who had taken an oath of loyalty to the town. The common clerk was also, in effect, a freeman, although it was sometimes necessary to give a new appointee the franchise. Lesser officers could be, and usually were, chosen from non-freemen.

"wayte"

Nightwatchman.

"in sequence"

This procedure may imply there already existed a pecking order such as is later very evident in the listings of the jurats.

"election of four chamberlains"

The draft accounts for 1414/15 evidence this divided election procedure having been put into effect.

"24 August"

The important role of the prolocutor in the elections must have made it seem necessary to the reformers that they ensure this position be assigned to someone in whom they had confidence, prior to 29 August. While they could have relied on the outgoing prolocutor, there may have been concern that an individual chosen a year earlier might not, for various reasons, continue to represent community interests as well as someone newly chosen.

"third round"

It is not clear here how the third round would work, but appears that the votes of the twenty-four and the other burgesses would be counted together and a majority vote considered decisive.

"notwithstanding"

The New Ordinances (if we have a complete copy of them in the revocation) say nothing about this eventuality. Possibly – since mayor Lakinghithe had died in early summer of 1415 and was replaced by alderman Robert Brunham, a major opponent of the reformers – this had been a bone of contention, and the reformers may have argued, on the basis of the New Ordinances, that a new mayoral election should be held instead. If so, the reformers had had no qualms (admittedly prior to the New Ordinances) over the unorthodox and pluralistic procedure of their figurehead mayor, Roger Galyon, being appointed by the community as gild alderman. It is not clear exactly when this happened, but it appears to have been while Edmund Belleyetere was still in that office, and so there may have been two rivals in the same post for a while. Galyon's appointment may well have been a pretext to circumvent, at the elections of 1411 or (perhaps more likely) 1412, the problem of the alderman having the customary right to choose the first four electors – a problem the New Ordinances intended to resolve on a more permanent basis.

"new common seal"

This reference may perhaps indicate that the original common seal, removed from the guildhall at Michaelmas 1415, was still not back in the hands of the potentiores, and furthermore that they had given up on the prospect of re-acquiring control of it.

"sworn and known burgesses" burgenses iuratos et cognitos would appear to refer to freemen, rather than the jurats proper; note the seeming identification, in the minds of the potentiores, of this group with the "community", although on the other hand there seems to be a distinction between burgesses and freemen. It is unfortunate the clerk did not record a list of attendees, as it seems very likely that they would have been predominantly the potentiores and such of the townsmen who were not allied with the Petypas faction.

i.e. with cap in hand, as a mark of humility and respect.

"this book"

Likely a reference to fourteenth-century constitutional ordinances in the Red Parchment Book.

"John Bryghtzeve"

A chamberlain during the Petypas administration, he shows no other signs of affiliation with that party, and was quickly (1418) accepted into the ranks of the jurats once the political conflict was over; he remained a jurat until his death in 1439 or 1440 and served as one of the borough constables for much of that period, but never reached the mayoralty. A merchant, he had become a freeman in 1405/06 and may have immigrated from Suffolk: a man of that name, possibly a Bury St. Edmunds' resident, is found exporting cloth from Ipswich in 1386 and as master of a ship operating out of Ipswich 1388-1402, and Bryghtzeve went by the alias of Bury. Although several of his apprentices entered the franchise during his life, or just after his death, there is little evidence what the focus of his business was. In 1414 he was seized in Brittany, despoiled of a shipment of wine, and held for ransome; and in 1426 he was fined for regrating wine. Around 1429 he is also seen involved in trade with Norway.

"John Broun"

A merchant who served, via nomination of the jurats, as chamberlain during Lakinghithe's administration in 1414/15, and then as councillor from 1418 (and constable from 1419) until his death in 1421.

"John Maupas"

Like Bryghtzeve, he was one of the mediocres who, on behalf of the community, ratified the decisions of the "greater part of the 18", but this designation does not reveal to us which (if any) faction he supported. The fact that he was a scabin of the merchant gild in 1411/12 is the only other clue to his loyalties.

"William Spyr"

A mercer, he purchased the franchise in 1402 (already having been living in the town for a while, since fined for a purpresture in 1400), served as chamberlain in 1413/14, again in 1418/19, and scabin in the merchant gild from 1421-24. He became a jurat in 1420 and remained so until his death in 1427. He was an executor of John Bukworth (ca.1421), but since this was after the period of political conflict, it is weak evidence from which to draw any conclusions of political sympathies.

"bound red book"

Probably the Red Parchment Book. The oath that Ashebourne recited was essentially the version contained in that book; although not a verbatim reading, it was the same style as had been administered Robert Brunham earlier in the year, when he had (under the constitution, as alderman of the merchant gild) assumed the mayoralty upon the death in office of John Lakinghithe.

"Thomas Groute"

In subsequent years he also served as superintendent of the marketplaces, and this may have been ex officio keeper of the north gate.

"Hanaper"

The financial department of the Exchequer.

"Thomas Feltwell"

One of the inferiores who had been brought into the franchise in 1412 to pack the electorate in favour of the reform party. He was one of 38 men named, in December 1415 when the king appointed a commission of enquiry, as participants with others unknown in created disturbances to disrupt Hunte's administration; Thomas Enmeth was also named, as was John Wardeyn.

"Thomas Hardell, Thomas Enemethe"

Neither appears particularly prominent among the supporters of the reform party in the early phase of the conflict. Enmeth, a sherman, and Hardell, a scrivener, were among of the large group of non-burgesses to whom the reformers gave the franchise in 1412 in order to pack the electorate with their supporters; this procedure was investigated in March 1415, under Lakinghithe's mayoralty, but most entrances confirmed upon the entrants putting up bonds to guarantee they would pay the 40s. entrance fee. But in March 1416, the mayor in a letter to the bishop asked him to agree to Petypas and 11 supporters, Hardell and Enmeth among them, remaining exiled from Lynn while the potentiores met with him to argue their case; they claimed that the town had been more peaceful since the twelve men had been absent.

"[...] beer"

I cannot determine what the word is preceding beer. Dorothy Owen rendered it as "horsbeer" and certainly the first letter is an "h", but what follows appears to be two letters. I can find no reference to a word "horsbeer" and so cannot accept that hypothesis.

"seven lesser townsmen"

None were among the populist leaders of a few years later, but two were among the inferiores made freemen in 1412, one of them also serving on the investigative committee re-auditing the chamberlains' accounts.

"traditional fee"

The reformers however had no qualms about keeping Roger Galyon on board in 1413 by paying him £20 as his fee and £6 as expenses.

"husbandman"

There is no reason to think the term is being used here in its most common way, a small-scale farmer one level in socio-economic status below the yeoman. It could also be used to mean householder; but in this instance is most likely used with its third meaning of someone making a living from being in holy orders, which was the case with Tilney.

"identification with the Magna Jurata"

Memberships of the two bodies appears not to have been identical through most of the 14th century. It may be that the identification was a fiction intended to deceive the king, from whom in November 1411 permission was obtained for the mayor alone (rather than acting with the jurats) to appoint to vacancies in jurat ranks; this change worked to the advantage of the reformers, notably in the case of Bilney's promotion to jurat ranks.

Concerning disturbances. How to take precautions against turbulent behaviour during the elections of mayor and sheriffs

At the time of the elections of the mayor and the sheriffs, since it has been the custom of old for a large mob to gather at the Guildhall, and since a gathering of the populace (as Solomon noted in Ecclesiastes, chapter 26) is a cause for concern for the reason that it can easily give rise to protests and disturbances, the mayor and aldermen have been accustomed for several days prior to the day of mayoral election (and likewise that of the sheriffs), and it continues to be their habit, to meet and consider together how to make the election proceed peacefully, without any popular protests or disturbances. To which end they nominated from each ward the more judicious and more reliable citizens, up to a number which they saw as sufficient, who were summoned expressly to attend the mayoral election on 13 October.

Because on election day a multitude of people who had not been summoned would throng into the Guildhall, the mayor and aldermen – sometimes by the authority of their offices (as appears in ordinances on the last folio of [Letter] Book F), sometimes by king's writ – would have it proclaimed throughout the city on 12 October that, under [threat of] severe punishment, no-one should come to the Guildhall the following day while the election was underway, other than those who had been specifically summoned; as appears on [Letter] Book D folio 3, [Letter] Book E folio 41, and [Letter] Book G folio 254. It is also found, as per [Letter] Book F folio 191, that on 11 October 1350 each alderman was sent a certain note by the mayor, ordering them, upon the loyalty they owed the king, to be at the Guildhall on the day set for the mayoral election, to summon 4 of the better men of their ward for the same business, and then to endorse the note with the names of those same.

Note that in ancient times the mayor was elected on 28 October. This was the case with the election of Thomas Romayn to the mayoralty in 1309; he was elected by the aldermen and by 12 persons from each ward summoned for that purpose. On the day after he was presented to and accepted by the barons of the Exchequer at Westminster, as appears in [Letter] Book D folio 2. The reason why the election was altered to another date is because of rising expenses and other factors, as appears in the next chapter.

How at some point the commonalty claimed the sole right to name the mayor

In mayoral elections in this city often there arose disputes between the aldermen and the commonalty. In which the commonalty maintained that it belonged to them alone to nominate or elect the mayor, and thereby [play] a very important role in the city, after they had reached agreement in the east end of the Guildhall (that is, in the place where the sheriffs customarily hold their courts, the mayor and aldermen being seated at the west end, which is the location of the husting) as to whom they wished to put forward for election as mayor for the year coming. The aldermen however argued against this, pointing out that they were also citizens and [members] of the community of the city, so it would not be fair if, because of their special position that qualified them for their offices, they should be denied having a voice in the election of the principal lieutenant of the king in the city. Therefore it became the custom, by joint agreement of the aldermen and commonalty, that those commoners summoned for the election, after the recorder had on behalf of the mayor and aldermen declared to them the reason for their summons, would move to the other end of the hall (as mentioned above) and there nominate two aldermen who had already served as sheriff and who were fit to hold mayoral office. Having done so, they returned and, using their common narrator as spokesperson, delivered the two names to the mayor and aldermen, asking them to appoint to the mayoralty whichever of them they wished. The mayor and aldermen then, as one body, going up into the upper chamber, made the election by majority decision, under the supervision of the recorder and with the common clerk as scrutineer keeping a tally. Coming back down again to the populace in the Guildhall, they had their recorder make a public announcement who had been elected mayor for the coming year.

But it very often happened that when the mayor had governed well the commonalty willingly had him continue in the office [for a further term]. As evidenced by mayors who continuously occupied the mayoralty, such as: Andrew le Bukerell, seven years; Thomas fitz Thomas, four years; Gregory de Rokesley, seven years (that is, from 1274 to 1281 inclusive – i.e. counting both the first and last); also John le Blount continued as mayor for 6 years, as is fully set out in [Letter] Book F at the end, where the [names of] mayors and sheriffs are listed. But note that in ancient times the mayors spent little or nothing, more for things related directly to the mayoralty than for other circumstances, [such as] for one or at most two sergeants-at-arms accompanying them in their retinues. To be precise, they did not then supply liveries, [and] on the day of their election they either walked through the streets or went by boat on the Thames to Westminster or the Tower, where they were charged and admitted.

As the costs and expenses associated with the mayoralty rose considerably, the citizens obtained upon request from King Edward II in 1319 [a grant] that the city mayor should not remain in the mayoralty more than a single year consecutively – as appears in Liber Custumarum folio 201, and the chirographed charter [copied] in [to Letter] Book E folio 90. That clause also, some believe, which was petitioned for in view of the fact that previously some mayors held royal commissions that put them in office for an indefinite period, during the king's pleasure (which caused the people displeasure!); such was the case with Nicholas Farnedone, as appears in [Letter] Book E folio 146, and likewise Hamo de Chikewelle, as appears in [Letter] Book E folio 148.

As it is therefore not possible for the mayor of one year to continue on as mayor in the following year, unless perhaps he should be most insistently required to do so, and were also agreeable to it (he can by no means be compelled, under the franchise of the city, to thus subject himself to that burden for two years in a row), it has been the custom in the course of peaceful elections for the aldermen and commonalty, before they elect a replacement (while a sense of appreciation is still felt among the citizens), to commend the mayor for his good leadership. And, through their common narrator, to emphatically entreat him to take upon himself for the year following the burdensome office of mayor. When he determinedly refused to do so, the commoners would present the aldermen with two names of aldermen, not including the one then mayor (since they know that he cannot continue to occupy the mayoralty against his will), from which two men they [i.e. the aldermen] decided on the one they wished to have as mayor, as already indicated. Which decision being made, it was the custom for them to leave the Mayor's Chamber and go down into the hall in procession, leading by the hand the mayor for the following year. The mayor and aldermen taking their seats, the recorder would make a public announcement to the populace of the name of the mayor elected for the following year, and notify the people also that they should be prepared to ride with their mayor to Westminster on 29 October following, for the honour of the city. This being done, the mayor and aldermen would rise and leave the hall, with the populace following.

If the elected man was not present, the mayor and aldermen, with the sheriffs, were accustomed to go to his house, to inform him there immediately that it was required of him to prepare to take up the office of mayor, and to be at the Guildhall on 28 October following, for the purpose of taking his oath [of office], as had been the custom since ancient times. After which each of them returned to his own home.

Concerning the mayor. The manner in which it is the custom for the mayor to take his oath at the Guildhall on 28 October

With the arrival of 28 October, the mayor and all the aldermen, dressed in gowns of violet, along with many of the commonalty were accustomed to gather around ten o'clock at the Guildhall. The common crier (that is, the sergeant-at-arms) calling for silence and attention, the recorder, seated on the right of the mayor, would read out to the people the ancient custom of the city, which is that on that day the mayor for the coming year should take his oath. It has then been his custom to praise the mayor for those achievements in which he has shown leadership; and if the mayor also wished to say something, he was heard. When that was done, the mayor would vacate his seat and the mayor-elect would step up to take it over; the former mayor would take the seat on his immediate left. Then the common sergeant-at-arms holding up before him the book with kalendar, marked on the outside with the symbol of a crucifix, the common clerk placing the mayor-elect's hand upon the book, he would read out to him what would serve on the following day as the oath [taken] in the king's Exchequer, in the form it appears in [Letter] Book D, first folio. Once he had promised [to uphold the oath] and had kissed the book, he would receive from the former mayor two pouches containing the seal of the Statute Merchant and the seal of the mayoralty. Attention would then be given to what the new mayor wished to say, asking for the support of his fellow aldermen, as well as the sheriffs and the reputable men of the community, in governing the city during his term of office.

This done, it was their custom to rise and go out, with the people following. A sword would be borne before the outgoing mayor, leading by the hand the incoming mayor, with the aldermen and populace following, until they reached the home of the mayor-elect. And from there the sword was carried before the outgoing mayor as far as his own home. No further public appearances were customarily made the same day by either mayor. However, in the event of an urgent need, the outgoing mayor might be required to exercise his office in public for the rest of the day, since he is not fully released from office until his successor as mayor is accepted in his place by the king, or the barons of the Exchequer, or the constable of the Tower.

[How] the mayor should take his oath on the day after 28 October

On 29 October, so long as it is not a Sunday (if so, then the following Monday), it has been the custom for both the new and old mayors, together with the aldermen, dressed in a uniform style, the sheriffs, as many as are of the mayor's livery, and numerous of the craft guildsmen, in their costumes, to assemble on horseback on the plaza outside the Guildhall, around nine o'clock, a sword being carried point-erect before the mayoral nominee. From there they would ride together along Cheap, exit through Newgate gate, head down to Fleet Street, and from it come to Westminster.

When they arrived, the mayor, aldermen and sheriffs dismounted and, with the mace-bearers and the mayor's sword-bearer leading the way, went up into the place where the Exchequer is held, where there would be the chancellor, treasurer, keeper of the king's privy seal, and the barons of the Exchequer. With the mayor, aldermen and sheriffs standing at the bar, the recorder would announce that the city of London, based on ancient custom and its franchises, had elected N. as mayor for the year to come, and on behalf of the city would request the barons to accept [into office] the one thus elected, who was present in person. The chief baron, or his lieutenant (if preferred), would respond by putting in front of the mayor a book on which the latter placed his hand and repeated the oath he had sworn in the Guildhall. Following this, it has been the custom of the chief baron of the Exchequer, on behalf of the king and the lords, to charge the mayor to take the lead in preserving peace and tranquillity in the city, and also [in ensuring] to the best of his ability that in whatever places the sale of victuals occurs the people not suffer from excessive prices. After that it has been the custom for the outgoing mayor to present himself there to render account for his office of escheator; he too would take an oath, to render an accurate and honest account of [receipts and expenditures relating to] his office, and he would appoint whomever he wished to act as his attorney in rendering account.

Likewise, the mayor and aldermen, on behalf of the city, would appoint someone of the Exchequer as the city's attorney to claim and defend their franchises, if and when it became necessary. And so, having received approval from the lords, they would depart. The same thing was done for the Common Bench, appointing someone from that place as attorney of the city. At the King's Bench it has been the custom to appoint two attorneys, [to act] together or separately in claiming the franchises and ancient customs of the city, if and when necessary. All this being accomplished, they would return, preceded by the commonalty on horseback, organized in groups according to their craft guilds. Those who were of the same guild as the mayor, or who were of his livery, would ride immediately ahead of the mayor. The mayor himself would proceed separated from others by sufficient space; but ahead of him [would go] his sergeants-at-arms, mace-bearers, and his sword-bearer, while one sheriff [would ride] to his right and the other to his left, with white rods in their hands, and the recorder and other aldermen following immediately behind him. [The parade made its way] through the middle of the marketplace of West Cheap as far as his house; then all those not invited to the banquet went home.

That same day, after lunch, it has been the custom for the new mayor to go from his house to the church of St. [Thomas] of Acon, with those of his livery leading the way. The aldermen having gathered there, they would all go together to St. Paul's. After arriving, (specifically, at a point near the middle of church building, between the two lesser entrances) it has been their custom to pray for the soul of Bishop William – who, it is said, at the request of the citizens of London obtained from William the Conqueror important franchises – while a priest recites De profundis. From there they would cross into the cemetery, where lie the bodies of the parents of Thomas, one-time archbishop of Canterbury; and there, next to the parents' tomb, they would recite another De profundis for all faithful Christians deceased. From there they would return via Cheap marketplace, (sometimes carrying lighted candles, if the hour is late), to the same church [from which they departed], where the mayor and aldermen would each make an offering of a single penny. This being done, each of them would return home. And so the first day was completed, morning and evening.

Let it be known that if the king's Exchequer is not in London, or if the court is not in session, the mayor is to be presented to the constable of the Tower of London or his lieutenant. He is to be accepted and sworn outside the first gate. As was done in the case of Sir Nicholas Brembre, elected mayor on the day before Palm Sunday, 1376.

Similarly, John le Blount was presented, accepted and sworn as mayor on [Sunday] 29 October 1357 by John de Blakbrok, lieutenant of Sir John de Sandwik, constable of the Tower, as appears in [Letter] Book C folio 112. This franchise is embodied in the king's charter.

[2. Restrictions on community participation at elections, 1404]

On Tuesday, the 23rd day of September in the 5th year etc., seeing that on the Day of St. Matthew the Apostle [21 September] last past, at the congregation of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council, in the Guildhall, for the election of Sheriffs for the coming year, such an exceeding number of apprentices and serving-men, belonging to citizens of the said city, as well as of other men, strangers to the freedom of the City, was, without any summons, assembled together in the said Guildhall; and so loud and so clamorous was their shouting, that the Mayor and Aldermen were unable to understand the reason for their noise; to the manifest troubling and disturbance of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council, there summoned; it was ordained and established that in future, as well at the election of the Mayor as of the Sheriffs, or other officers of the said city to be elected, no person, of whatsoever estate or condition he may be, shall presume to enter the Guildhall for the purpose of taking part in any election therein, unless he shall have been especially summoned and chosen to make such election, by the serjeants of the Mayor, Sheriffs, or Chamber, for the time being; on the pain that attaches thereto etc.

On the understanding also, that no one shall be summoned to any election hereafter, unless he be one of the more substantial men of the city, or one of the Common Council thereof.

[3. Mayoral election in 1406]

On Wednesday, the Feast of the Translation of St. Edward the King and Confessor [13 October], in the 8th year etc., John Wodecok, Mayor of the City of London, considering that upon the same day he and all the Aldermen of the said city, and as many as possible of the wealthier and more substantial Commoners of the same city, ought to meet at the Guildhall, as the usage is, to elect a new Mayor for the ensuing year, ordered that a Mass of the Holy Spirit should be celebrated, with solemn music, in the Chapel annexed to the said Guildhall; to the end that the same Commonalty, by the grace of the Holy Spirit, might be able peacefully and amicably to nominate two able and proper persons to be Mayor of the said city for the ensuing year, by favour of the clemency of Our Saviour, according to the customs of the said city.

Which Mass having in the said Chapel been solemnly celebrated, there being present thereat the said John Wodecok, the Mayor, John Prestone, Recorder, Nicholas Wottone and Geoffrey Broke, Sheriffs, the Prior of the Holy Trinity, John Hadlee, William Staundone, Richard Whytyngtone, Drew Barentyn, Thomas Knolles, John Shadworth, William Askham, Willam Bramptone, John Warner, William Walderne, William Venour, Robert Chychely, Thomas Fauconer, Thomas Polle, William Louthe, William Crowmere, Henry Bartone, and Henry Pountfreyt, Aldermen, and many reputable Commoners of the City aforesaid; the same Mayor, Recorder, Sheriffs, Aldermen, and Commoners, entered the Guildhall, where the precept of the said Mayor and Aldermen, as the cause of the said congregation, was becomingly set forth and declared by the said Recorder to the Commoners aforesaid; to the end that such Commoners should nominate unto the said Mayor and Aldermen such able and proper persons as had before filled the office of Sheriff in the City aforesaid; it being for the said Commoners to take no care which one of the persons so to be nominated should be chosen by the Mayor and Aldermen to be Mayor for the ensuing year. Which being done, the said Mayor, Recorder, Sheriffs, and Aldermen, went up into the Chamber of the Mayor's Court, within the Guildhall aforesaid, there to await the nomination of such two persons. Whereupon, the Commoners peacefully and amicably, without any clamour or discussion, did becomingly nominate Richad Whytyngtone, mercer, and Drew Barentyn, goldsmith, through John Westone, Common Countor of the said city, and presented the same.

And hereupon, the Mayor and Aldermen, with closed doors, in the said Chamber chose Richard Whytyngtone aforesaid, by guidance of the Holy Spirit, to be Mayor of the City for the ensuing year; after which, the Mayor and Aldermen, coming down from the Chamber into the Hall, to the Commoners there assembled, as the custom is, notified by the Recorder unto the same Commoners, how that, by Divine inspiration, the lot had fallen upon the said Richard Whytyngtone, as above stated.

And further, the said Commoners unanimously entreated the Mayor and Aldermen, that they would ordain that in every future year, on the Day of the Translation of St. Edward, a Mass of the Holy Spirit, for the reasons before stated, should be celebrated, before the election of the Mayor, in the Chapel aforesaid. And hereupon, the Mayor and Aldermen, considering the entreaty of the said Commoners to be fair, reasonable, and consonant with right, and especially to the glory and laud of God, and to the honour of the city, by assent and consent of the said Commoners, did ordain and decree that every year in future a solemn Mass with music shall be celebrated in presence of the Mayor and Aldermen; the same Mass, by ordinance of the Chamberlain for the time being, to be solemnly chaunted by the finest singers in the Chapel aforesaid, and upon that Feast.

DISCUSSION

The method of mayoral election at London was the reverse of that at York, where it was the mayor who nominated candidates and the commons who made the final selection from the nominees. But the effect was probably pretty much the same in either case, with the ruling elite exercising a significant degree of control over the choice of mayors. Although the document of 1406 indicates that the commons were not expected to argue with the decision of the mayor and aldermen, this did not always prove to be the case. For example, at the 1441 mayoral election in London the commons nominated aldermen Ralph Holland, a tailor, and draper Robert Clopton. Holland had already been associated with popular opposition to the status quo and had in 1426, some years before becoming an alderman, been imprisoned for criticizing electoral procedures. This fact, perhaps complicated by a conflict between tailors and drapers crafts over supervision of the cloth trade, likely influenced the presentation by the mayor of Clopton as the mayor-elect; at which some of the commons (notably the tailors), dismayed, cried out: "Nay, nay, not this man but Raulyn Holland." [C.L. Kingsford, Prejudice and Promise in XVth Century England, Oxford, 1925, 108]. They were ignored, and their protest only resulted in the city authorities obtaining royal sanction for future elections being strictly closed to all but those who were summoned by name – names were checked at the door.

The manner of conducting elections and the question of who had a right to participate directly in them had been a matter of dispute – indeed the subject of political conflict – throughout the fourteenth century in London. Such participation was either broad or narrow, depending on which political party was in power at a given time. But a common problem faced by all was the conduct of elections in an orderly fashion. The political conflict of the early 1380s provides an instance of the concerns that may have given rise to the specifications above.

It was a common practice in many towns, particularly as the fourteenth century wore on and indirect election became increasingly common, for popular attendance at elections to be confined to representatives of the community. This was partly because of the impracticability of having all townspeople present once elections were moved into an indoors setting, but more as a guard against disorder, clamour or disruption of the elections. It also reflected a growing distaste among the ruling class for having the common people determine the outcome of elections. The language of the above passages itself betrays the writer's distaste for the lower class.

Various approaches were taken to restricting participation in elections. The type of solution chosen at London, of first selecting a limited number of representatives of the "common people", and secondly having them nominate two or more candidates from which the borough rulers would make the final choice, was one adopted in a number of towns, often with the London model in mind. Another option was to have the borough rulers nominate a limited number of candidates, with the commonalty making the final selection.

In 1385 it was enacted that nominees for the mayoralty could only be chosen from those who had already served as sheriff, on the grounds that this office provided an initiation into city government and tested an individual's administrative abilities. Those who did not acquit themselves satisfactorily could, even if chosen alderman by a ward's residents and then nominated as mayor, be prevented from achieving the mayoralty by the final selection that mayor and aldermen had from the nominees. An underlying motivation for the qualification may also have been to discourage resistance to holding the shrievalty, a burdensome obligation that a citizen was not called upon to perform more than once. The mayoralty could also be a costly office, and those who were elected more than once tended to be the wealthier aldermen. In 1435 the requirement was added that nominees be aldermen.

The emphasis on experience is reflected also in the listing of the aldermen in the account of the 1406 election. We clearly see here an intentional cursus honorum such as is visible at Lynn and other towns: following the Prior (whose status warrants him the courtesy of being first-named), the aldermen who had previously been mayors are named, in chronological order of when they first held the mayoralty; then come those who had served as sheriff but not yet as mayor, again in chronological order of when they held that office; and finally, an alderman who had not yet held the shrievalty. The character of the aldermannic group is suggested through the biographies in the notes, below [most are based primarily on J.S. Roskell et al., eds. History of Parliament: The House of Commons 1386-1421, Stroud: Alan Sutton, 1992].

In the early period of the mayoralty, the change of regime – election and installation in office – occurred on the same day, October 28. This would have been no problem for mayors re-elected to subsequent terms, but the lessening of that tendency may have been one factor in the need for an interval between election and taking up office, to allow the mayor-elect time to prepare and for an orderly transfer of duties. So in 1346 the election was moved to two weeks prior to assumption of office; not until the reign of Henry VIII was it changed to Michaelmas (September 29).

We can see a developed ceremonial built into the election, public presentation, and oath-takings of the mayor. The introduction of a mass into the proceedings from 1406 was in line with this trend. Ceremony was designed in part to demonstrate social hierarchy while at the same time cementing social solidarity. At the same time, there was concern about the burgeoning costs of ceremonies surrounding the elections. In 1389 the city authorities agreed that, when the sheriffs went in procession to the Exchequer for their swearing-in, they should go on foot or by water, so that the men of the craft guilds who accompanied them did not have to bear the cost of hiring horses; it was further agreed that new liveries need not be bought for the occasion. In 1397 the Grocer's Company, which had several of its members among the aldermen and was one of the principal sources for sheriffs and mayors, decided to cut back on feasts celebrating such elections; it set a limit of 12s. expenditure, confining the fare to bread, apples, beer and wine.

NOTES

"Ecclesiastes"

Riley identifies the reference as verse 5. However, neither the Book of Wisdom nor Ecclesiastes, both attributed to Solomon's authorship, has a chapter 26. Wisdom, chapter 16 (assuming transcription error), verse 5 states "For when the fierce rage of beasts came upon these, they were destroyed with the bitings of crooked serpents", which could be applicable, although taken slightly out of context – the scribe would have conveniently ignored the politically-charged verse 4: "For it was requisite that inevitable destruction should come upon them that exercised tyranny"!. However, the reference may perhaps be to Psalms 26, verse 5 "I have hated the congregation of evil doers; and will not sit with the wicked." Some psalms and proverbs were popularly attributed to Solomon.

"commonalty"

In this context (compare with the use of the term in the late 13th century) the term communarii is being used to refer to the lower classes of Londoners, perhaps even to the lower (common) council supposed to represent the interests of the lower classes. Those classes – the mass of the enfranchised populace – had won a formal place within the constitution in the early 14th century, and such is the sense of "commonalty", as opposed to "commoners".

"recorder"

The chief legal expert retained by the city, whose social status was at least equal to that of the aldermen.

"common narrator"

This officer is elsewhere identified as the common serjeant-at-law, or common countor (a name given to a type of barrister), one of the officers elected by and answerable to the Common Council. In this context his role was to act as go-between for the commonalty.

"charged and admitted"

I.e. took their oaths to the king's representatives and were approved by the same in the mayoralty. This whole paragraph seems rather to lack coherence. The original scribe, or the later transcriber, does not complete a train of thought begun in the first sentence, while the last few sentences about the mayoral expenses also seem disorganized; these I have tried to work around in my translation by surmising what points the scribe was trying to make (that the mayoralty incurred few expenses, and those were household expenses, rather than expenditures related to city costs).

"chirographed charter"

The explanation of rising costs ascribed to the royal charter of 1319 is hardly sufficient. This charter was part of a lengthy struggle for power between various political factions representing the interests of patricians, professional administrators, or the populace, which has been eloquently described – in far more detail than can be presented here – by Gwyn Williams [Medieval London: From Commune to Capital (London, 1963), chapters 10-11]; Professor Williams characterized the charter as "the highest peak of achievement that a popular movement ever attained in medieval London" [p.282]. Obligatory annual re-election was a feature of reforms earlier in the decade, and the 1319 charter was preceded by a 3-year term of office of professional administrator John de Wengrave, re-elected by the aldermen each year without any involvement of, and in the face of hostility from, the commonalty. This was the immediate impetus for restricting the mayoral term of office.

"Hamo de Chikewelle"

Hamo de Chigwell led the resistance to Wengrave's party and the efforts to obtain the June 1319 charter, under which Chigwell captured the mayoralty in October of that year. He was succeeded the following year by Nicholas Farndon, whose government was however disrupted, and he deposed, by the royal eyre of 1321.

"book with kalendar"

Riley suggested this was a martyrology. One might expect the oath to be taken on some kind of holy book, and it is likely enough the book was indeed of some religious content and kept exclusively for oath-taking. However the term "kalendar" was applied more generally to registers of important documents, and it is not inconceivable this book may have been one of the city volumes recording constitutional customs and ordinances.

"A sword"

Probably not just any sword, but a particular ceremonial sword dedicated to being borne before the mayor, as a symbol of authority.

"went up"

The Exchequer was divided into two areas, upper and lower, probably reflecting a physical separation in the building in which housed. The upper Exchequer acted as a court, used to manage affairs related to revenues due the king; hence the reference to the "bar". Note that although the Exchequer was by this time normally fixed in Westminster, in special circumstances it might accompany the king on his travels.

"lords"

The barons of the Exchequer were originally made up of the king's tenants-in-chief, but in the 13th century were reduced to a handful of specialised officers, still technically representing the aristocracy.

"escheator"

A royal officer whose duty was to uphold the king's ultimate title in lands over which lordship otherwise became vacant, through the failure of heirs or the loss of rights of the tenant due to conviction (or outlawry) for a crime; the duty involved the collection of revenues.

"someone of the Exchequer"

That is, an attorney who was officially recognized by the Exchequer; larger towns came, in the late 14th and 15th centuries, to retain their own special attorneys to act for them at Westminster. A city as wealthy as London could afford separate attorneys for each of the courts.

"Common Bench" "King's Bench"

The two Benches were the principal courts of the realm, two arms of a court over which the king himself had once presided. The Court of Common Pleas originally had a wide jurisdiction, although in the late 13th century this became limited to civil actions. The King's Bench dealt with criminal actions, notably infringements of the king's peace or other matters in which the king's interests were directly involved.

"sufficient space"

I.e. so that he could be clearly seen by onlookers, he was not hemmed in by his entourage.

"important franchises"

The charter of William I, granted soon after he captured the throne and intended to help him quell any opposition from the Londoners, was addressed to the bishop, to the portreeve (like the bishop, apparently a Norman), and to all the burgesses, is very brief; it essentially confirms to Londoners their legal customs held before the Conquest, acknowledges that sons will be allowed to inherit from their fathers, and implies that the king will do justice to the Londoners should anyone cause them harm.

"first day"

This sentence is based on Genesis, chapter 1, verse 5.

"solemn music"

Notated music.

"John Wodecok"

Alderman of Cripplegate ward from 1402 up to his death (1409), having previously held the Coleman Street aldermanry 1397-1402, and earlier having been a common councillor for Cripplegate (1388/89). He served as sheriff in 1397/98 and mayor 1405/06. He came from Doncaster (where he continued to hold some property) and had set up in London as a mercer by 1382; he serving as warden of the Mercers' Company 1390/91, 1397/98, and 1407/08. By 1391 he had married Felicity Austyn, the daughter of a wealthy mercer, which brought him property interests in London and Middlesex. He became one of the wealthiest Londoners of his time, his clients including John of Gaunt and his son Henry Bolingbroke, and the household of Richard II (despite Woodcock having, in 1398, to obtain a pardon for supporting the Appellants); upon Henry IV's accession, Woodcock had to petition for repayment of a debt of £1,250 still owed him by the king's wardrobe, and his petition was successful. Henry's favour also translated into a life annuity of £26.13s.4d, granted Woodcock in 1401, and he continued to be a major supplier of the wardrobe, as well as a source of loans to the king. He had already held the post of collector of wool customs at London (1397-1400), and in 1402 obtained that post at Ipswich, where he was authorized to keep all proceeds to repay debts owed him by the king – he remained in that post until 1405, in which year he was also permitted to export wool free of customs, again as repayment of a large royal debt. His clientele included other members of the nobility and gentry. He invested much of his money in estates in several home counties, as well as the city. Strong religious beliefs are suggested not only by his institution of the ceremony of a mass before mayoral elections, but also by a vigorous campaign as mayor against immoral conduct by priests. At his death he left two underage sons (the eldest reached his majority in 1413) and two underage daughters, while his widow remarried a Durham knight the following year. His monetary bequests totalled close to £3500, while he also left a large collection of gold and silver plate, and a complete set of jousting armour.

"Prior of the Holy Trinity"

He was ex officio the alderman of Portsoken Ward.

"John Hadlee"

Alderman of Tower ward at this time, he being first found in that post in 1375 and then sporadically up to 1381. From 1384 until 1392 he was alderman of Lime Street ward; he returned to Tower ward in 1394 and remained there until his death in 1410. He was sheriff 1375/76, mayor 1379/80 and 1393/94, and represented the city in 11 parliaments between 1369 and 1402. Hadley's family was from a Suffolk village of that name, but his father had the same surname and was evidently an emigrée; John Hadley appears in London by 1366 and two years later was trading as a grocer; he was a company warden in 1383/84. Despite a setback in 1370 when ships of a London consortium of which he was a part were plundered off the Calais coast, his business gradually prospered and on several occasions he contributed to loans to the king; he also loaned money to others, perhaps on a usurious basis. In 1371 he was one of a dozen citizens imprisoned by the king for a few months, because of violent disputes occurring in the city, in which Northampton and his followers were involved, although Hadley does not seem to have been associated with that faction; at the outbreak of political conflict in the early '80s, he at first tried to reconcile the factions, but Northampton's extremism alienated him and he thereafter supported the attempts to bring down Northampton and later execute him. If Hadley's early imprisonment hurt his reputation, it was not for long; in 1374 he was acting as an auditor of city accounts and supervisor of expenditures. At the end of 1390 he was made mayor of the staple of Westminster; and, in June 1392, mayor of the staple of Calais. The latter appointment came immediately after Richard II, furious with the Londoners for having refused him a loan, suspended city government; it may have been a form of punishment, since it entailed the loss of his post with the Westminster staple, while at the same time he and his fellow aldermen lost those positions. A few weeks later he was replaced as collector of wool customs at London, a post he had been in for just over half a year. Loss of favour with the king did not prevent him being elected to a second term as mayor in the year following Richard's issue of a pardon to the citizens (in which Hadley was among those named). In March 1404 he was one of four men selected by parliament to act as "war treasurers" in controlling the funds from a subsidy, but was replaced later in the year when men more favourable to the king were put in the positions. Although he remained in his aldermanry, he ceased to be active in the Grocers' Company after 1408. As was common with wealthy merchants, he had invested heavily in real estate both inside and outside the city. At his death he left two daughters, by his first wife Margaret, to whom he was married by 1368; after her death he remarried (by 1400) Thomasina Goodlake, granddaughter of a wealthy vintner and former mayor, and this marriage brought him additional properties in the city. His daughters had been married to gentry and inherited most of his property outside London, while his widow was left with the city property.

"William Staundone"

Alderman of Cheap ward since 1393 (until his death), he had previously held aldermannic office in Aldgate (1383-90) and Dowgate (1392-93). He was sheriff in 1386/87, and mayor 1392/93 and 1407/08; he represented the city in parliament on five occasions between 1391 and 1406, and Cambridgeshire in 1404. His roots, however, lay in Hertfordshire, he bequeathing money for a family chantry at Standon there, and he held land at nearby Sawbridgeworth. If an immigrant, he had come to London by 1374, when he purchased membership in the Grocers' Company; he was active in the company until 1408, although he never served as one of the wardens. From 1378 he acted, sporadically over the next eighteen years, as a purveyor of victuals for Richard II's household, for which he was granted a life annuity of £6.13s.4d in 1385, which Henry IV continued to respect. He was also involved in the wool trade – not unusual for wealthy grocers – and was for a year (1406/07) collector of the wool customs in London; towards the end of his life he was active in the cloth trade. In business ventures he was often associated with John Shadworth, later one of his executors along with Thomas Knolles. He invested heavily in real estate not only in the city but further afield, at first in Kent but later sold his manor in order to buy another at Wimpole, Cambridgeshire, and he subsequently built up an estate around that; the income from this sufficed to qualify him for election to parliament as a knight for the shire. His third marriage (by 1403) to Agnes, coheirress of Sir Adam Francis and widow of a Kentish gentleman, brought him more property in Cambridgeshire and London as well as the dower property in Kent, but not the large inheritance from Sir Adam, who outlived Staundone. His association with the faction opposing John Northampton in the 1380s left him vulnerable after Brembre's fall from power, and to protect himself he purchased a royal pardon in 1388 for any felonious or treasonable acts he might have committed since 1382. Not being in office when Richard II and the London authorities fell out in 1392, he avoided royal disfavour and was a natural choice for mayor once Richard had restored city government. He died in 1410, and was buried in Wimpole next to his first wife; he left an underage daughter (by Agnes), who became the ward of the widow's new husband, but did not live long into adulthood.

"Richard Whytyngtone"

A detailed biography of Whittington is given under the account of his charitable foundation.

"Drew Barentyn"

Alderman of Aldersgate at this time. He served in that ward 1392-93, was sheriff the following year, became alderman of Farringdon Within 1394, then transferred back to Aldersgate in 1397, and finally to Bishopsgate for his final year as alderman in 1414-15. He died in December 1415. His family seems to have been based in Oxfordshire, but he was apprenticed to a London goldsmith in 1363; he graduated in 1370, when he took up the franchise. His first known role in city government was as a common councillor, in 1381/82, representing the goldsmiths' craft. He was warden of the craft in 1380 and 1385. His business flourished – like many entrepreneurial businessmen of the time, he did not restrict himself exclusively to the trade in which he was trained, but also engaged in import/export ventures – and he became one of the wealthiest members of his craft, almost at a par with Whittington. His clientele included Henry IV, and the favour he won for services to the king (particularly loans of cash) brought him grants to his financial benefit. His first mayoralty came in 1398/99, and a second in 1408/09. He did not marry until the early 1390s, when the widow of goldsmith and former mayor Sir Nicholas Twyford (of whom Barentyn was an executor) became available. This was at least partly a strategic alliance, and the marriage allowed him to build up existing Twyford estates in East Anglia and the home counties. After Margery died, he remarried shortly before his own death. He left no children and his heir was a nephew. His will included bequests to Twyford's poor relatives and two chantries to celebrate for Twyford's soul, as well as his own and that of Margery.

"Thomas Knolles"

Alderman of Dowgate ward from 1393 until 1397, when he transferred to Cordwainer ward, remaining its alderman until his death in 1435. Sheriff 1394/95, mayor 1399/1400 and 1410/11; his second mayoralty saw the initiation of the rebuilding of the Guildhall. A grocer, he served as the company warden in 1387 and 1431. On several occasions he supported Henry IV with loans, and was one of five "war treasurers" appointed by the king in 1404. By 1428 he had acquired a manor in Hertfordshire. His epitaph in the church of St. Anthony's stated that he had 19 children by his wife Joan, buried beside him, to whom he was married for some 60 years; he was survived by two sons – one a London grocer (who had ten children), the other a Bristol grocer – and three daughters. He bequeathed his Watling Street residence to the Grocers' Company, to be used for relief of the poor, and provided for a water-supply for the prisoners of Ludgate and Newgate. A more detailed biography is given elsewhere.

"John Shadworth"

Alderman of Bassishaw ward from 1386 to ca.1415, having previously held the aldermanries of Tower (1383-84) and Coleman Street (1385-86), and in the interim (1384/85) having been common councillor for Cheap ward. He was sheriff 1391/92, mayor 1401/02. He was apprenticed as a mercer, and served as a warden of the Mercers' Company in 1396/97, 1403/04, and 1409/10; he was on good terms in particular with Woodcock and Whittington, his wealth and influence being comparable with theirs. His earliest appearance in the records was, however, in 1371 in the role of executor. In 1378 he and John More, one of the principal adherents of John Northampton, purchased from the Exchequer the farm of collecting the subsidy on poundage between Dover and Gravesend; despite a continued close association with More and possible initial sympathy with Northampton's efforts to weaken the victualling guilds, Shadworth supported the Brembre faction against Northampton, probably alienated by the latter's extremism. Like not a few mercers, Shadworth's actual business was diversified; he was particularly involved in the wool trade, but is also found importing iron in 1390. In 1399 he was given a life grant of tronage in London, the administration of which was based at his own warehouse, the "wool wharf", on the Thames in Tower ward; however, he later turned over this post to someone else. His clients, either for merchandize or for loans, included the earl of Oxford and the king's wardrobe; in the later part of his life he claimed that the government owed him £1,515 – a figure perhaps equivalent to about £3,600,000 in today's currency. Being one of the sheriffs at the time that Richard II fell out with the Londoners, he was on 25 June 1392 along with his fellow sheriff and the mayor removed from office (as well as his aldermanry), on the pretext of maladministration, and thrown into prison. Four weeks later they all submitted to the king and agreed to pay a joint fine of –2,000, and Shadworth was restored to his aldermanry. They received a royal pardon two months after, and Shadworth was one of 15 city rulers who each contributed £11 towards a gift to thank the king. He again fell foul of Richard II during the latter's despotic period: in 1398 he was one of 28 persons, including several Londoners, forced to seal a blank charter guaranteeing he would supply the king with money whenever needed; an extension of this practice to the ruling group in London (as well as in other towns) helped lose Richard the city's support during Bolingbroke's rebellion. Shadworth certainly appears to have been Lancastrian in his sympathy, for he was one of three Londoners appointed to the king's council in 1399, although the appointment lasted only a few months. In May 1401, he obtained an exemption from holding any royal office, although we should not read too much into this. He continued active in city administration, and it was not until 1415 that he seems to have retired from public life. Despite which, he lived on until 1430. Two years before his death a Lollard priest was accused of being active in Shadworth's home and of communicating with Shadworth's own chaplain, who was subsequently imprisoned when he confessed to being a Lollard. If Shadworth was a Lollard sympathiser, however, no sign of it can be seen in his will, which is entirely conventional. Most of his estate was assigned to pious and charitable works, for he left no heirs and is not known to have been married.

"William Askham"

Alderman of Dowgate ward at this time, he having begun in the aldermanry of Castle Baynard (ca.1395-ca.1399), then moving in that or the following year to Dowgate; later in 1406 or perhaps in 1407 he transferred to Bridge ward, remaining alderman there until his death. He served as sheriff 1397/98 and as mayor 1403/04 (the sole fishmonger to attain that office between 1388 and 1411, and despite the unpopularity of the fishmonger's gild in that period). Son of a Londoner of the same name, he became an apprentice fishmonger under the William Walworth, at some point between the latter's two mayoralties and before the decisive action against Wat Tyler that won him renown and a knighthood. The relationship with Walworth was evidently a good one, as he bequeathed Askham £40 and entrusted him with the disposal of part of his real estate; Walworth's widow showed the same trust, appointing him her executor. Upon her death in 1399, Askham purchased a sizable Thameside tenement with a quay, which Walworth had acquired from his master's widow; the property sold after Askham's death for £533.6s.8d and the site would later be used for the new fishmongers' hall. A neighbouring property was used as residence and place of business by William Bramptone, who was both his business partner and friend. Askham built up extensive property in several other parishes, although relatively little outside the city, and his marriage likely helped in this. The first to the widow of fishmonger William Wyght, who had the reversion (and therefore the revenues) from a number of properties, as well as the guardianship of Wyght's children and their cash inheritance; Margaret bore him a son, who seems to have predeceased him, and a daughter. She died in 1393, and by 1398 he had remarried; a third marriage was necessary less than a decade later. Although a fishmonger, like most men involved in mercantile activities, he engaged in whatever seemed likely to produce a profit at any given time. Thus he is found importing wine, cloth and woad (1390-91), and exporting large shipments of wool in the late '90s and first decade of the next century. For a few months in 1401 he was engaged as a buyer of victuals for the royal household. He was mayor of the staple of Westminster from 1402 to 1405, and mayor of the staple of Calais from 1403 to 1406, useful posts for someone engaging in commerce. Death came in 1414 or early 1415; no children are mentioned in his will and much of his wealth was spent on pious and charitable uses.

"Willam Bramptone"

Alderman of Bridge ward since 1390, holding the post until his death. He had been common councillor representing the Fishmongers' Mystery, in 1381/82, and was sheriff of London (and Middlesex) in 1394/95, as well as representing the city at five parliaments between 1390 and 1404. His bequest to the parish church of Brampton, Huntingdonshire, is suggestive of his origins. He appears in London by 1364, when involved with a fellow fishmonger in moneylending. That he acquired considerable wealth is indicated by the large number and amounts of debts for which he sued. In addition to the fishmonger's trade, Bramptone was also involved in exporting wool. He was closely associated with William Askham (see above). His term as governor of the staple of Middelburg, 1384-89, helped him build the right connections for the wool trade – in the early 1400s he was on several occasions an official agent involved in negotiations with merchants and authorities of the Hanseatic league. From 1397 to 1402 he was mayor of the staple of Westminster, and it was in that period that he was exporting large quantities of wool. He also dealt a little in cloth and wine. He also had, from an earlier period, connections in the Low Countries, and was consequently also engaged in other official activities in those parts. He acquired property not only in London, but also in Southwark (a landing point for much of the fish brought to the city), and in the last decade of his life his landed interests extended into Kent. He had been bailiff of Southwark from an unknown date but in 1382 was removed from office for having tried to monopolize the market in fish there – although this charge came in the context of Northampton's general assault on the fishmongers. Conversely, Carole Rawcliffe [History of Parliament: The House of Commons 1386-1421, II, 333] has suggested it may be significant his appointment as governor of the Middelburg staple came during Brembre's mayoralty, and that the patronage of Brembre could explain why Bramptone was ordered arrested in February 1388, two days after the Merciless Parliament condemned Brembre to death. Brampton evidently cleared himself of any suspicion, and in September was part of an embassy to treat with the count of Holland. As alderman he was among the city rulers to incur Richard II's displeasure in 1392, and among the contributors to a cash gift, after Richard restored city government and pardoned a £2,000 fine. He was one of three Londoners appointed, for a few months, to Henry IV's council in 1399. He died in 1406, leaving a widow Alice and a son by a previous marriage.

"John Warner"

Alderman 1397-1412. Sheriff 1398/99. Ironmonger. Died 1413, leaving a widow, several sons and a daughter, and an estate in Buckinghamshire.

"William Walderne"

Alderman of Bread Street ward ca. 1399 to 1415, when he transferred to Bassishaw, remaining in that aldermanry until his death. He was sheriff 1399/1400, mayor 1412/13 and 1422/23. He was the son of Geoffrey Waldern of Waldron, Sussex; it is not known if that was the same Geoffrey who was a supporter of the Northampton faction. His first appearance is in 1388, during his apprenticeship to mercer John Frosh. He completed his apprenticeship in 1395, became a full member of the Mercers' Company in 1398, and served as a company warden 1398/99, 1404/05, 1410/11, and 1418/19. Loans he made to Henry IV, along with often large debts due him from other clients or businessmen, are indicative of his substantial wealth. In 1416 he, William Crowmere and Richard Whittington were associates in receiving from nine foreign merchants recognizances of a debt of £2,666.13s.4d; the following year that trio and three other of the wealthiest alderman were acting as go-betweens in the financing of the king's French expedition. He was part of a consortium of English merchants trying to break into the Mediterranean trade, but encountered opposition from the Genoese. Walderne counterbalanced that risky venture by exporting through the established channel, the Calais staple, and bringing back cloth through London. He was chosen as mayor of the Calais staple in April 1423, just one month after being made mayor of the Westminster staple; both posts were held until his death, but that was not far off. During his first marriage he did not accumulate much property, but his second marriage (by 1413) to the daughter of chandler John Clerk brought with it her inheritance of eleven shops and a number of other buildings and lands in the city, and during the years that followed he purchased more properties, both in London and in Essex and Hertfordshire. He died in 1424, survived by his widow Margaret, who survived him only by two years, and five underage children.

"William Venour"

Alderman from 1397. Sheriff 1401/02. He had entered the Grocers' Company by 1383. His father, a grocer of the same name, had been an alderman, sheriff 1387/88, mayor 1389/90, and died in 1395, William junior being an executor. In 1392/93, father and son had been prominent among the group of twenty citizens (also including William Brampton, see above) who owed John of Gaunt money, perhaps for his intercession with Richard II to obtain a pardon for the city after the falling out of 1392; the pair owed Gaunt £1,000. Such financial pressures on the city leaders made it difficult to find men willing to take on the job at this period; during the 1380s the grocers had seven or eight of their number among the aldermen, but in the 1390s only half that number – and this included older men of Brembre's generation (Hadley and Staundone, see above). William Venour senior had represented the grocers in the aldermannic body since 1363, but upon his death no other grocer was willing to take on the office, until William junior was persuaded in 1397. William's uncle, vintner Henry Vanner (himself the son of a prominent vintner), had also been an alderman for much of the 1380s and '90s (until his death in 1395), and was a brother-in-law, business partner and political adherent of Nicholas Brembre, aiding in the arrest of John Northampton. With a depression in the wool and cloth trades around the turn of the century, many grocers struggled to diversify. Venour is found in 1407 earning money as an intermediary in a sale of tin to a Florentine mercantile company, and this appears to have been the last year he served as an alderman. In 1414 three prominent mercers complained to parliament that he owed them £411.10s.10d., but that he had evaded repayment by fraudulently turning over his property to feoffees, yet still enjoying their proceeds over the last five years while living abroad. William's son, of the same name, entered the Grocer's Company in the 1430s at a reduced fee (perhaps in acknowledgement of his father's role therein); at that time he was serving as warden of Fleet prison. But he preferred to call himself a gentleman rather than a grocer, living off the revenues from the property he had inherited; in a tax assessed on real estate in 1436, he had the highest assessment of any Londoner.

"Robert Chychely"

Alderman of Aldgate ward from 1402, switching to Vintry ward in 1407. Sheriff 1402/03 and mayor 1411/12. Grocer. His nephew married the daughter of Thomas Knolles, Robert's sometime business partner. Died 1439. A more detailed biography will be provided elsewhere.

"Thomas Fauconer"

Alderman of Coleman Street ward 1402-14, and subsequently of Cheap ward 1415-34. He was sheriff 1403/04, mayor 1414/15, and represented the city at six parliaments between 1411 and 1423. His family roots lay one generation back in Norfolk. He entered the Mercer's Company in 1391, acting as a company warden 1398/99, 1405/06, 1411/12, 1417/18, and 1423/24. His focus was on the wool and cloth trades, and he had close business ties with merchants of Florence, from whom he could have obtained high quality cloth and other luxury goods, as well as connections in various English ports. Posts in the customs collection service – at Southampton (1405-07), Boston (1407-09), and London (1412-16) would likely have helped his business. He owned more than one ship. His clientele in the 1390s appears to have included an earl of Gloucester, while in the early fifteenth century he loaned money to Henry IV and Henry V on various occasions. He invested part of his fortune in real estate, including at Coventry (perhaps a reflection of his involvement in the Warwickshire wool trade) and in Kent, near Maidstone and Faversham (where he kept a large flock of sheep), while his widow is later found in possession of lands in Berkshire. His role in London administration was not free of scandal. Shortly after the end of his term as sheriff, he and colleague Thomas Polle were accused of false arrest of a weaver (see below). In 1413 and 1416 Londoners were accused of slandering him, in the latter case it was claimed Fauconer had been imprisoned in the Tower for prosecuting a Lollard despite the latter having the king's pardon; although the slanderer renounced the claim publicly, the Lollard in question had been burnt during Fauconer's mayoralty, while a second was also burnt after Fauconer's apprentice alerted the authorities to him and Fauconer himself worked hard for his condemnation. Again, in 1417, a draper was fined £40 for spreading the slander that Fauconer had falsified legal records; perhaps this too was associated with his campaign against the Lollards. He died in 1434, survived by a widow and daughter (a second, married daughter having predeceased him).

"Thomas Polle"

Alderman of Farringdon Within, a post held from 1397 to his death in 1413. He served as sheriff in 1403/04, but was never mayor. A goldsmith, he entered his apprenticeship in 1359 and had graduated before 1370, when he took his own first apprentice; he was warden of the craft in 1378, 1388, and 1395. He was one of the goldsmith representatives on the common council in 1381/82, and represented Farringdon ward there in 1384, 1386, and 1388. Along with Thomas Fauconer he was accused of having, when sheriff, wrongfully arrested a weaver, confiscated his possessions, and illegally demanded sureties; the case went to arbitration in 1406. Twice married, he was predeceased by both wives, and left no children.

"William Louthe"

Alderman of Castle Baynard ward; he was a newcomer to the aldermannic group, having joined them earlier in 1406. In 1413 he transferred to Farringdon Within ward (for which he had earlier served as common councillor, 1385/86), replacing Thomas Polle, and remained there until his death ca.1419. He had been sheriff in 1404/05, but was never mayor. A goldsmith, he was active in that craft by 1372, when he went to Winchester fair, and the following year took on the first known of a series of apprentices. He was warden of the craft in 1397 and 1402. He occasionally provided service to Henry IV and his successor as tax collector and source of loans to support military expeditions in France.

"William Crowmere"

Alderman of Billingsgate ward 1403-1420, then of Candlewick ward from 1420 until his death. He was sheriff 1405/06, mayor 1413/14 and 1423/24. He was said to be popular because a fair-minded man who could not be bribed – at least the brewers found him so, although the Lollards may have had different ideas, for he was active in putting down Oldcastle's rebellion and in implementing measures leading to the arrest of several Lollards. Crowmer's bequests to Cromer's parish church and his poor relations there, as well as his Norfolk estate, indicate that his surname points to his place of family origin. He first appears in London in 1390, when importing wine there, and later in the year importing drapery. His official trade was as a draper, and he was warden of the Drapers' Company in 1394 and in 1428/29. Henry Bolingbroke was one of his early clients, and put more substantial business Crowmer's way after becoming king. By the time of his successor's reign Crowmer had become very wealthy (of which the two terms as mayor is a reflection) and was one of the foremost aldermen in helping finance Henry V's French expeditions, while in the next reign he appears to have been making money from victualling the army; he likewise contributed in 1419 an unusually high sum towards the building of a new hall for the drapers. During the reign of Henry VI his clients included the duke of Gloucester and countess of Stafford. He was, at least in one venture, a business associate of William Walderne (see above) and Richard Whittington. By the time of his death, he held property in at least five London parishes and had over the course of many years built up an estate in Kent, part of it possibly through his second marriage (by 1428) to Margaret the coheiress of Sir Thomas Squiry of that county. His administrative and commercial abilities led to him being chosen as an arbitrator in various disputes brought before the mayor's court, and in 1425 the Hanse merchants chose him as one of three aldermen to judge law merchant cases involving their members. From about 1428 we see him moving towards retirement. He died in January 1434, leaving an underage son in the care of his executor Henry Barton; the son became a member of the Kent gentry and incurred sufficient unpopularity to be murdered during Cade's rebellion. Crowmer bequeathed almost £500 for charitable and pious works, and other monetary sums to friends and family totalling about £1,250; today those amounts would be the equivalent of over £4 million. Later that year his widow married Lord Poynings.

"Henry Bartone"

A recent addition to the aldermannic group, he took the post for Farringdon Without ward, in early 1406; in 1412 he moved into the Cornhill aldermanry where he remained to his death. He was sheriff 1405/06, Mayor 1416/17 and 1428/29. He appears to have been a member of a family with long-standing landed interests in the Buckinghamshire manor from which he took his surname. A branch of the family may already have been established in the city, a stimulus for Henry and his brother Ralph to pursue their careers there, Henry as a skinner (a mercantile rather than craft occupation); Ralph was also an alderman from 1416. Although Henry is first heard of in 1391, when he stood surety in Chancery for a Londoner, part of his early career was as an official in the household of Richard II's first queen; after her death (1394) Richard II confirmed a £5 annuity to Barton, as did Henry VI later. He had also been employed by John of Gaunt as a skinner, and Henry IV continued to make use of him, as a yeoman of the king's chamber from 1400, and from 1405 as the first skinner officially retained by the king's wardrobe (which brought the wage of 1s. a day for almost the rest of his life), overseeing the preparation, storage and transport of furred clothing worn by members of the royal household, which enabled him to put business for furs in his own direction. Payment was, typically, less easy to obtain, and by 1423 the crown owed him £2,100. His roles in the customs service at London, as collector of tunnage and poundage (1408-10) and collector of wool customs (1410-16) were in part to provide him with opportunities to recoup some of the royal debt. With his profits he built up extensive property in several city parishes, including a purchase in 1419 of the late Drew Barentyn's house in St. John Zachary parish. He had estates in Buckinghamshire, Hertfordshire, and apparently East Anglia, as well as joint interest in lands in Middlesex, Norfolk, and Berkshire (the last with his brother). He died in 1435, leaving no children although married twice. Much of his wealth went towards pious or charitable uses, although his widow Joan was left very well off. In 1425 he had assisted John Carpenter in the foundation of Whittington's college and almshouse; in his own will, Barton bequeathed a generous number of city properties to the Skinners' Company to be turned into homes for citizens who had fallen into poverty.

"Henry Pountfreyt"

Sheriff 1407/08. Collector of tunnage and poundage at London in 1398. The surname was common in London, so it is not clear if he was the saddler of that name. Several men of that surname were involved in the leather trades. ?A William de Pountfret skinner was an alderman during the 1340s, but left only a nephew John as his heir.

"by Divine inspiration"

Riley suggests this is an allusion to Acts 1, 24-26, in which the selection of a disciple to replace Judas is made from two candidates: "And they prayed, and said, Thou, Lord, which knowest the hearts of all men, shew whether of these two thou hast chosen, that he may take part of this ministry and apostleship, from which Judas by transgression fell, that he might go to his own place. And they gave forth their lots; and the lot fell upon Matthias; and he was numbered with the eleven apostles."

TRANSLATION

To all true Christians who see or hear read these letters, John Ingler, mayor of the city of New Salisbury commends you to our Lord God everlasting. Because it is necessary and meritorious for every true Christian man to bear witness to the truth, so that truth is always to be preferred and all that is untrue set aside, let it be known and shown to, and understood by, all who are sober and wise that one Thomas Pyrie, our faithful brother, a fellow citizen of the city mentioned above, who is among us a man of good reputation and standing and well thought of, and is trustworthy, creditable, and well behaved, came in person before me, the mayor, and others – that is, William Rokat merchant, William Shirwode mercer, John Gamelyn mercer, and William Wynne notary imperial, fellow citizens of the city – in my residence in the city. At that time and place, this Thomas Pyrie of his own free will before us reported and stated what is related hereafter.

First, that he was a servant of William Nicoll, sometime burgess and merchant of the town of Southampton, at the time of William's death and a long time prior to that. And that this William, while in good health and of sound mind, ordered Thomas to bring to him in his parlour in Southampton blank paper and pen and ink, and to begin to write the formalities of the opening of a testament; which Thomas did. He then instructed him to write down specific legacies, both to churches and other religious institutions and to private individuals, servants and others named by William. And after that to write down the arrangements for disposing of the residue of his possessions, not previously bequeathed: to be divided equally between his wife Juliana and his kinsman Richard Thomas, who was then his factor and purser of his ship named the Marie of Hampton, then at sea. That being done, he instructed Thomas to write his arrangements for disposing of all the lands and tenements etc. that he held at that date within the town and suburbs of Southampton and elsewhere in England. These lands and tenements he intended to be divided, as soon after his death as could reasonably be done, into two equal portions. Of which he left the one half to his wife Juliana, for the term of her life, paying the rents and services due from the same, and also bearing half the annual costs of a priest's wages and an anniversary or obit in the parish church of Holy Rood in Southampton, while she lived. After her death, that half of the lands and tenements were to go forever to Richard and the lawfully begotten heirs of his body, paying the rents and services due from the same, and bearing in perpetuity half the annual costs mentioned above of the priest and the anniversary or obit in the church. The other half of all the lands and tenements William Nicoll left to Richard, he and his lawfully begotten heirs to have and to hold forever, paying the rents and services due from the same, and bearing the other half of the annual costs of the priest and obit or anniversary in the church in perpetuity. Should it happen that Richard die without leaving such an heir, then the half of the lands and tenements left to Richard, along with the other half of the lands and tenements left to Juliana, when they fell to him after her death, should go to Joan the wife of Thomas Payne of Looe in Cornwall, sister to Richard, and the lawfully begotten heirs of her body forever, paying the rents and services due from the same, and bearing the entire annual costs of the priest and obit or anniversary in the church, as set out above, in perpetuity. Should it happen that Richard and his heirs as well as Joan and her heirs fail to support the annual costs of the priest or the anniversary or obit in the church for an entire year, then all the lands and tenements with their appurtenances should go to the mayor and burgesses of the town of Southampton, and their successors forever. Or should it happen that Joan die without lawfully begotten heir, then all the lands and tenements with their appurtenances should go to the mayor and burgesses of the town of Southampton, and their successors forever, paying the rents and services due from the same by ancient custom, and bearing the entire costs of the priest and anniversary or obit in the church in perpetuity. Should it happen that the mayor and burgesses fail for an entire year to support the costs of the priest and anniversary or obit in the church, then all the lands and tenements with their appurtenances shall go to the Prior and Convent of the monastery of St. Denys neighbouring Southampton, and to their successors forever, paying the rents and services due from the same etc., and bearing the costs of the priest and anniversary or obit in Holy Rood church in perpetuity. He made Juliana and Richard the executors of his testament.

After this had been done, William Nicoll became so seriously ill that his physicians were certain he would die. It was then recalled by dom. John Serteyn and others who were with William Nicoll that his manor of South Stonham with its appurtenances lay outside the city or borough, in the county proper, and if William Nicoll died in possession of it then his brother's daughter, Alice, who had married a bondman of Twyford, would be heir to it. Consequently they thought it advisable for them to draw up a deed of enfeoffment and transfer all the lands and tenements to certain persons. And so Thomas was ordered by Juliana, dom. John Serteyn, and William Stone to write a deed to that effect [enfeoffing] Master Thomas Forest, Walter Fetplace, Robert Aylward, William Stone and dom. John Serteyn priest, as well as a letter of attorney appointing Thomas Pyrie to deliver possession, in the name of William Nicoll, to the feoffees of and in all those lands and tenements. When Thomas Pyrie had written out these documents and put wax on them, and brought them to William Nicoll's bedside and read them out loud to him, William Nicoll's mind had already deteriorated to the point where he had lost awareness, so that he said nothing nor gave any sign or indication that he had heard or understood. But Thomas Pyrie took William Nicoll's hand from beneath the bedcovers and sealed the documents with the seal[-ring?] of William Nicoll, then reinserted his hand under the covers. Immediately William Stone and Thomas Pirie went to South Stonham and there Thomas put William in possession of the manor and its appurtenances, by authority of the said document, and then returned to Southampton, where he put William Stone and the other co-feoffees in possession of the tenement of William Nicoll in which John Flecher was then residing, on behalf of all the lands and tenements subject to that deed within thw town and suburbs of Southampton. On the same day that those documents were drawn up and sealed, and possession was transferred as described above, William Nicoll died and departed from this world.

In witness that all this was related as is set out above, Thomas Pyrie put his seal to this evidential letter, in the presence of myself, the mayor. And to reinforce the credibility of this information, at the request of Thomas Pyrie, I have appended my seal of the office of the mayoralty of the city of New Salisbury. Drawn up at Salisbury on 2 December 1478.

DISCUSSION

Deeds and wills were all too often subject to challenge, or the grounds of forgery, and death-bed acts were particularly open to suspicion. In this case, the will itself was not tampered with, but additional action was required to avoid the will's provisions being superseded by county custom. Those gathered around Nicholl's death-bed may have felt, as Pyrie probably did, that the action they were taking would represent Nicholl's wishes, to ensure – through a trusteeship – that his widow had access to all the properties required to support the obit which appears to have been Nicholl's primary preoccupation. The wish to prevent inheritance by a niece who had evidently incurred disgrace, by marrying beneath herself, was presumably secondary.

It appears that some legal difficulty had arisen in Southampton with regard to the property bequeathed by William Nicholl, since Pyrie found it necessary to obtain the above evidential letter and present it to the Southampton authorities (whereby it found a place in the borough archives). Possibly the requirement was simply to clarify the rights of Nicholl's trustees to dispose of the property, for in 1480 they – Walter Fetplace and four others who must have succeeded the original feoffees – quitclaimed their rights to the manor of South Stonham to William Langherne.

The events recounted by Pyrie must have taken place over thirty-six years earlier; in the 1470s he is found at Salisbury, perhaps in the service of the borough government, for in 1471 he was chosen by the city council to state its grievances before arbitrators in a dispute with the bishop. There were at least two men named William Nicholl in Southampton in the fifteenth century, and they were among the most prominent townsmen of the time; they are difficult to disentangle, one from the other, and their relationship to each other is not certain. One of them, a goldsmith and merchant, was elected bailiff of Southampton in 1401 and 1407, and mayor in 1411, 1417, 1422, and 1427; he is known to have had two wives, Elena and Catherine. Another of the name, possibly his son, was also a merchant – both men apparently active in commerce in the 1420s and '30s – and is felt to be the more likely candidate for the William elected mayor in 1438; it was probably he who is seen in 1422 with wife Alice. Which of these two was subsequently married to Juliana is unclear, but probably the latter, who is found associated with a chantry at St. Mary's and an obit at Holy Rood, in his name and the names of wives Agnes and Alice. Juliana had married Richard Thomas by 1442, so whichever William had been her former husband must have died before then.

It may be that Richard Thomas also died without direct heirs, for records of the Nicholl obit in 1495/96 show that it had been merged with obits for Richard Thomas and Thomas Payne, suggesting that the heirs of Joan Payne may eventually have inherited some of the property. Apart from the religious services, the obit was then being celebrated by a feast to which the poor of the town were invited (assuming they also attended the memorial mass). Provisions for the feast were: 400 plain buns, 300 spiced buns; butter, cheese, and saffron; a quantity of ale for the poor, and a small amount of wine for the priests and borough officials paid to attend the memorial.

NOTES

"William Wynne"

He was the town clerk at this time (appointed 1474).

"factor"

Business representative.

"rents and services due"

These were generally small but inescapable payments to the lord of the land.

"monastery of St. Denys"

The Augustinian priory, which held the advowson of Holy Rood church, lay two miles north-east of the town.

"Walter Fetplace"

It could have been Walter Fetplace senior who is meant; he was a merchant and parishioner of Holy Rood, who served as mayor of Southampton on five occasions between 1419 and 1444, and died in 1449. However, his kinsman (but not son) Walter Fetplace junior, who also served as mayor in the 1460s, was in 1454 living in Holy Rood parish in a tenement formerly of William Nicoll, and was one of the co-foffees of the manor in 1480; so it is possible that he was the Walter here referred to, at an early point in his career.

"Robert Aylward"

A merchant who associated with Walter Fetplace in some trading ventures. He is seen dealing particularly in wine, soap, and dyes, but occasionally in cloth and iron. In 1448 he was suing, in the king's court, John Shepard (referred to as both husbandman and chapman) of Ringwood, Hampshire, for a debt of £4.2s.2d. In 1449 and 1450 he was commissioned to investigate mercantile complaints: one concerning the seizure of a cargo by pirates, the other by Cologne merchants, despoiled of a cargo at Plymouth and suspecting that some of it had found its way to Southampton. In 1451 he is seen as an appraiser of linen cloth seized by the sheriff, and in the same year we learn that he owned two ships, the Nicholas and the Margaret. He served as steward of Southampton in 1430/31, as bailiff 1433/34 and was elected as mayor in 1436, 1441, 1449 and 1453. He died ca.1454.

"heirs of Joan Payne"

A John Payne, who had a brother called Thomas, was elected mayor in 1450, 1451 and 1462; a member of a later generation, also called Thomas Payne, was mayor in 1472/73 and it was he who founded a chantry in Holy Rood church.

TRANSLATION

[1. Settlement of 1254]

This is the final settlement made in the king's court at Westminster, on 3 February 1254, before Henry de Bathonia, Henry de la Mare, Henry de Bratton, and Nicholas de Turry, justices, Ralph fitz Nicholas and Bertram de Curiel, then stewards, and others loyal to the king then being present there; between Henry Wille and Daniel W [o]lveseie, then stewards of the Gild of Reading, and the burgesses of that town, plaintiffs, and Richard, Abbot of Reading, deforciant, concerning the customs and services which the abbot has been demanding from the burgesses. In regard to which the burgesses have complained that the abbot distraigned them to answer to justice elsewhere than in their communal gild, and that he deprived them of their merchant gild with its appurtenances. Moreover, that the abbot moved the market of the town of Reading from the place where it had customarily been held since ancient times. And, what is more, he demanded from the burgesses other customs and other services than those they ought to give, or had been accustomed to give in the time of the previous kings of England. Which customs and services the burgesses did not concede to the abbot, with the result of this plea between them in the present court.

Let it be known that the abbot has granted, on behalf of himself, his successors, and his church of Reading, to the burgesses and their heirs that the corn market in the town of Reading is to be held in perpetuity in the location where it previously used to be, and that all other things are to be sold in those locations where they have customarily been sold previously. And that the burgesses may have a hall for their merchant gild in the town of Reading, along with twelve tenements that belong to the gild, together with the meadow called Portmanbrook, for an annual rent of 6s.8d payable to the abbot and his successors and his church at Michaelmas – for which previously it was their custom to pay no more than 1d. And that they may have their gild merchant with all its appurtenances in perpetuity.

For this concession, settlement, and agreement, the burgesses have granted for themselves and their heirs that the abbot and his successors may henceforth appoint, from those burgesses who are in the merchant gild, one burgess satisfactory to the burgesses; who is to be the warden of the merchant gild and take oath before the abbot and the burgesses to faithfully administer all matters within the merchant gild's jurisdiction. He is to be removed on an annual basis and someone else put in his place, through the method described above. The burgesses have also granted for themselves and their heirs that the abbot and his successors may henceforth have from each legitimately-born son of a burgess, when he enters the merchant gild, four shillings; and from each foreign man, half the fee that he ought to pay to the warden. [These payments to be made] under the supervision of a monk assigned to witness these [entrances] by the abbot and his successors; on the understanding that if the fee is declared by six reliable gildsmen to be reasonable, the monk may not reject [the amount of] the fee.

Furthermore, the burgesses have granted for themselves and their heirs that the abbot and his successors may henceforth have, each year on 1 August, 5d. from each burgess in the merchant gild, by way of chepingavel. Moreover, they have granted for themselves and their heirs that it is perfectly permissible for the abbot and his successors to levy tallages in the town of Reading whenever the king taxes the lands over which he is lord. The burgesses have also granted for themselves and their heirs that it is perfectly permissible for the abbot and his successors, or their bailiffs, to preside in the gildhall over all pleas which can rightfully be tried in the town of Reading, and that they may have all [money from] fines, whether from gildsmen or others; and that the keys of the gildhall shall be in the custody of the gild warden, who is to hand them over to the abbot or his bailiffs without demur whenever they wish to hold pleas there. Should it happen that any burgesses of the merchant gild incur ameracements for any offence, they are to be amerced according to the gravity of the offence and their ability to pay.

Furthermore, the burgesses acknowledge that the meadow which lies at the head of that meadow called Portmanbrook belongs to the abbot and his church of Reading. They have in this same court restored it to them and released and quitclaimed [their right therein], on behalf of themselves and their successors, to the abbot and his successors and the church of Reading, in perpetuity.

This is the complaint of the warden and burgesses of the merchant gild of Reading.

The warden and burgesses state that the town of Reading is an ancient borough and that they have been, and are, a corporation under the name of "warden and burgesses of the merchant gild of Reading" from time immemorial. In that regard they were, from the same period, in possession of certain stalls and shops called the out-butchery or the out-fleshshambles in the town of Reading, as part of their demesne as a fief belonging to the merchant gild. Until they were dispossessed by Thomas Hendley, abbot there, one of the present abbot's predecessors. The which wrong the present abbot continues.

Memorandum that the warden and burgesses of Reading claim that the borough is corporate on the grounds that Abbot Richard, one of the present abbot's predecessors, moved the market of the gild merchant there from the place it was customarily held since ancient times, and caused many other injuries and wrongs to the borough of Reading. For which reason the burgesses, in the name of the whole community of the borough, brought a complaint in the king's court at Westminster. Against which complaint, legal action and suit, Abbot Richard presented a defence, as if against a corporate personality, as is shown and set out more fully in a fine of record between the abbot and the burgesses.

These are the arguments presented to prove the borough of Reading is a corporation.

First, the mayor of the borough of Reading and the burgesses of the same, their ancestors and predecessors, from time immemorial had possession in their demesne, as a fief belonging to their gild, of a gildhall with stables, gardens, and other buildings with their appurtenances, to the value of £4.19s.6d in annual income.

Item, the mayor ut supra before this time have had possession of 12 tenements with appurtenances, together with a meadow called Portmanbrook, in their demesne, as a fief belonging etc., to the value of £3.6.8d and more in annual income.

Item, the mayor ut supra have had possession of a wharf and an adjoining tenement assigned to it with the common beam and weights to the value of 8s.4d and better.

Item, of an inn called the Fish Shambles, which attains an annual value of 32s.10d.

Item, the mayor and burgesses have had possession of the flesh shambles called the out-butchery – until recently, when they were wrongfully and without just cause dispossessed – which had an annual value of 26s.8d.

Item, the mayor ut supra have from time immemorial had the advowson, nomination and patronage of a chantry there, at some time granted to the mayor and his successors there by one Sir John de Colley, a knight, and amortized by the king's letters patent.

Item, the mayor and burgesses have always been tasked [with providing], and have provided, 2 parliamentary burgesses, as often as a parliament is held.

Item, the noble progenitors of our sovereign lord the king have by their letters patent under their Great Seal granted, ratified, and confirmed to the burgesses of the gild of Reading and to their successors forever that they be free of toll throughout England and discharged from [summonses to the courts of] all shires and hundreds.

Item, the burgesses have from time immemorial kept within their gildhall a common seal, and have held and possessed it without challenge, and have used the same for sealing [documents] as often as required, without hindrance, etc.

Item, the mayor and burgesses have charge of repairs to the stocks within the borough, as often as need requires.

Item the warden and burgesses ut supra state that they and their ancestors, burgesses of the borough, had possession of the [above] premises belonging to their merchant gild by the service of one penny due to the king, long before the monastery of Reading was founded and built. In proof of which they argue that if the merchant gild, tenements, stables, gardens and other buildings and their appurtenances had remained in the hands of the king at the time the monastery was endowed, that same king as founder of the monastery would have given and granted as endowment the entire town of Reading with its appurtenances. Which merchant gild, tenements, gardens, stables and other premises with their appurtenances the warden and burgesses and their ancestors had, held, occupied and enjoyed peacefully, by the service mentioned above, without counterclaim, challenge, interruption or demand on it, up to the date and time of the making of the fine mentioned above; which according to the terms, force and effect of that fine was then altered and changed to the sum of 6s.8d, as is shown and set out more fully in that fine.

This is the response to the complaints of the so-called warden and burgesses of the merchant gild of Reading.

First, whereas the warden and burgesses pretend that they have been incorporate under the name of warden and burgesses of the gild of Reading from time immemorial, this is the response: that there is no formal record nor any other evidence sufficient in law to prove them to be a corporation in any regard. Whereas the warden and burgesses put forward in evidence a fine made, as proof of their corporateness, that fine in no way shows them to have been a corporation at the time the fine was made nor at any time previous. Further to this response, there is no formal record in which it is evidenced that Abbot Richard, [our] predecessor, affirmed that the warden and burgesses are a corporation under the title they have submitted.

The fine, as can be seen, was made between the steward and the burgesses of Reading, plaintiff, and the abbot, deforciant. At which time the town was not incorporated under the name of warden and burgesses; for, were that so, the fine would be invalid, insofar as the warden is not a party to that fine. Also, by the fine that was made the grant is stated to be to the burgesses and their heirs, and not to their successors; therefore these who are burgesses by succession may claim no rights therein.

Item, the phrases in the fine which are claimed as making the warden and burgesses a corporation exist by initiative of the burgesses, and not the initiative of the predecessors of the abbot, through any words spoken or written by them.

Also, whereas the mayor of the borough of Reading and the burgesses of the same pretend that they and their ancestors and predecessors from time immemorial had possession through their gild in a gildhall with stables, gardens and other buildings with appurtenances, to the annual value of £3 and more, and also of 12 tenements and a meadow called Portmanbrook, this is the response to the same: that the titles of the pretended corporations, before and in the article of this claim, are not in accord, and so neither is valid. Furthermore, so that the truth be known, the burgesses have held and occupied the gildhall and the other premises specified in the article for a long time and up to the present day at the indulgence of the abbot and his predecessors, without the mayor and burgesses having any other satisfactory legal title to the premises they have identified.

Item, as to the wharf and tenements, the mayor and burgesses have had no legal possession thereof, but have held and occupied them without any lawful title.

Item, as to the fish shambles, they have been and are placed on the land and freehold of the abbot; and so rightfully the shambles and revenues therefrom belong to him and his predecessors. Albeit that he and his predecessors have allowed, out of their goodwill, the burgesses to receive the revenues from the same.

Item, as to the flesh shambles called the out-butchery, they were and are placed on the land and freehold of the abbot, and have been constructed, maintained and repaired by him and his predecessors. The mayor and burgesses have never had possession of the same, except with the indulgence of the abbot, and they were never dispossessed thereof by his predecessors.

Item, as to the advowson, nomination and patronage of the chantry, it was founded long ago at a date now forgotten, and there is no indication that the mayor and burgesses ever had possession of it, as they claim, except at the indulgence of the abbot.

Item, as to the provision of 2 burgesses for parliament, this is no basis for proof of corporateness, for various boroughs and towns in England which are not corporations do the same, such as "Downton in Suth' and Ludyarsale" and various others.

Item, as for the burgesses having a common seal, that is no proof of corporateness, for various other towns not corporate have the same.

Item, as for the burgesses alleging themselves to be exempt from suit [of court] to shire and hundreds by right of letters patent etc., the abbot responds to that by saying that long before these letters patent the king's progenitors granted to his predecessors the hundred in question, with all things belonging to the same.

The title of the warden and burgesses of the free merchant gild of Reading to certain stalls and shops called the out-butchery, also known as the flesh shambles, located in the borough of Reading.

The warden and burgesses say that in the 38th year of the reign of King Henry III there was a fine made before the king's justices at Westminster between one Richard, then abbot of the monastery of Our Lady at Reading and predecessor of the present abbot, plaintiff, and one Henry Wall and Daniel Wolvesey, then wardens of the free merchant gild, and the burgesses of the same, deforciant, concerning certain tenements with appurtenances and other free liberties and customs, the subject of the action; of which the warden and burgesses were possessors, by right of their merchant gild, a long time before the fine, and were accustomed to hold as possessions of the merchant gild. Upon the plea and action of the fine that abbot, predecessor of the present abbot, acknowledged in that court on behalf of himself, his church of Reading, and his successors in the same, that among other liberties and free customs the warden and burgesses and their successors should forever have and enjoy without challenge the 12 tenements with appurtenances; and in the same court he turned them over to the warden and burgesses, in return for an annual payment on 1 August to the abbot and his successors, for the tenements and customs, of one penny in place of suits [of court] and customary payments of whatever kind due the abbot and his successors for the same – as in that fine is more fully set out. As a result of which fine and agreement on that matter, the warden and burgesses and their predecessors since the time of the making of the fine have had uninterrupted possession and tenure of the 12 tenements with appurtenances, among other of their liberties and customs, on the basis of that fine.

The present warden and burgesses of the free gild now state that the stalls and shops called the out-butchery are a part of those 12 tenements covered by the fine and are appurtenances of the same; and that their predecessors, as warden and burgesses of the gild, had uninterrupted possession of the same and received the rents, outgoing, and revenues thereof, as the right of the gild and by virtue of the fine, until in the time of Henry VI their predecessors were wrongfully dispossessed by force of the same by one Thomas Hendley, predecessor of the present abbot. In which wrong and illegal possession the present abbot wrongfully persists, maintaining it by force to this day. As proof of the continuous possession of the warden and burgesses therein, they say that in the time of King Edward I, which was that immediately following [the reign] in which the fine was made, their predecessors the warden and burgesses of the merchant gild were in possession and receiving 62d. of rent from certain parts of the tenements with appurtenances, including the flesh shambles. This is set down in a book of accounts made in the 30th year of that King Edward's reign, which they are ready to present [in evidence]. The warden and burgesses add as clarification that the tenements with appurtenances are now of greater value than they were at the time when the fine was made, or for a long time after, because their predecessors as wardens and burgesses of the gild in past times renovated, rebuilt and repaired them at great cost and expense to the gild, something important to consider.

Item, it is evident from various letters and account books from the first to the ninth years of the reign of King Henry V that the warden and burgesses of the gild have, by the hands of their officers, annually collected and paid out the rents and revenues of the flesh shambles or out-butchedy, under the name of "the shops of foreign butchers there" (which is the flesh shambles and out-butchedy); and no-one else has. These various account books can be presented in evidence.

Item, it is evident from various account books drawn up in various years of the reign of King Henry VI – that is, first to twelfth, fourteenth, eighteenth, twenty-first, twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth, and twenty-eighth – that the warden and burgesses collected and received the rents and revenues from the flesh shambles or out-butchedy, under the name of "foreign butchedy", without interruption by the predecessors of the abbot, until they were wrongfully dispossessed thereof by Thomas Hendley, predecessor to the present abbot. The warden and burgesses say that it is evident from various of those account books that the shops or out-butchedy had been renovated and repaired by the predecessors of the warden and burgesses, [under the section] in the account books called "New rents from the new butchedy"; which books they are ready to present in evidence.

Item, the warden and burgesses state that it is evident from old book belonging to the gild, in which is recorded many and various of their constitutions and ordinances – compiled in the [missing] year of King Henry VI in the presence of the then warden (otherwise called mayor) of the gild, William Huntynford, and with the unanimous consent of the warden and burgesses – among other [things] it was agreed that the mayor then in office should each year collect and receive the rents and revenues of the flesh shambles or butchery to help cover the expenses and costs he incurred in executing his duties; paying [from the same] each year to the warden's officers called the cofferers 2s. for the repair and maintenance of the flesh shambles or out-butchery. Which book they are ready to present in evidence. They further state that there was a time when no accounts were made of the rents and revenues of the same, because the mayors then in office received those revenues in consequence of the grant mentioned above, until Thomas Hendley wrongfully dispossessed them.

The response of the Abbot of Reading to the bill of complaint drawn up against him by certain persons who call themselves the mayor, burgesses, and commoners of the borough of Reading, although they are not incorporated by that name, nor any other.

The abbot states that because there were various issues and court cases pending between him and the so-called mayor, burgesses and community, and for other reasons prompting the king's attention, it was commanded by the king that a friendly discussion be held between the two parties concerning the issues pending in the courts. Accordingly, a discussion was held and, by agreement of the parties and their counsel, they [undertook] to submit to arbitration and settlement of the matters by Sir William Hussy and Sir William Fey, as specified in the bill. At the end of last Easter term, those judges, having spent a great deal of time and effort and having frequently called both parties before them to hear their claims, after much deliberation gave notice to the council of the abbot, wishing the counsel to find out from the abbot whether he would be prepared to accept the so-called mayor having possession of certain fish stalls and other things in Reading. They also said that if the corporation showed determination, the abbot would face a law-suit brought against him by the so-called mayor. Because the abbot was not then in London, the judges wanted his counsel to respond to this in the present Trinity term. The abbot, intending to have further discussions in the presence of the judges, therewith came to London in the present term. But before the judges could arrange a day for further discussion [between the parties], the so-called mayor had initiated a lawsuit with his bill of complaint, thereby refusing further negotiation on the issues pending between the parties or their further consideration by the judges. This without the abbot having gone against the instructions given by the king, or the justices issuing any further recommendations, or the abbot having rejected their recommendations in the way that is claimed in the bill of complaint. The abbot trusts that, if the judges are summoned on this matter, they will confirm the same. Furthermore, [the question of] the corporation and the other matters addressed in the bill are matters in the jurisdiction of the Court of Common Pleas, not this court. The abbot requests this court dismiss the case, awarding him reasonable costs for him having been wrongly harassed.

[The mayor and burgesses responded to the above that they have no objection to the arbitrators conducting a further session between the parties and trying to bring the parties to a final settlement. However, they affirm the accuracy of the information presented in their bill of complaint, which was intended to have the matter settled according to the Common Law.]

The response of the abbot of Reading to the bill of complaint made by certain persons calling themselves burgesses etc.

The abbot states that, to the contrary [of the bill], he and his predecessors from time immemorial are and have been the lords of the town of Reading immediately under the king. Throughout that time the abbot and his predecessors have been accustomed, at their discretion, to nominate and appoint each year one of the inhabitants of the town as keeper of the gild within the town. Which person so named must always take oath to uphold and administer all things within the gild's jurisdiction. He shall be removed on an annual basis and someone else elected and chosen in his place, taking oath in the manner indicated above.

In addition, the abbot states that he and his predecessors have throughout that time always had a day [assigned] for the keeping of the king's peace within the town. So that the town may be well-governed, he and his predecessors and their stewards have appointed as constables such persons as seemed most suitable to them, and have similarly appointed all wardens of the wards and all other officers in the town; and the persons thus appointed have throughout that time been accustomed to take their oath before the abbot's steward. Throughout that time the abbot and his predecessors and their stewards or other officers have been accustomed to remove such persons from their offices of constable, warden, or other offices, at any time if there was reasonable cause, and to substitute others at their discretion, as required, regardless of:

- whether the town of Reading was incorporated under the name of burgesses and community of the borough and town of Reading, or some other name;
- whether there was within the town a mayor from time immemorial or that any such mayor had authority to punish those breaking the peace, vagabonds, or other persons misbehaving within the town;
- whether the burgesses of the town from time immemorial used to nominate or have the right to nominate 3 of the burgesses whom they think best suited to occupy the mayoralty, or that the abbot should nominate, or is obliged to nominate any of those three persons for the mayoralty;
- whether the burgesses have from time immemorial been accustomed at the annual great leet of the abbot to elect and nominate 2 of the burgesses or anyone else to be constables of the town;
- whether the abbot has nominated or appointed as constables any persons who were not able to occupy the office;
- whether the wardens of the town have customarily been chosen or nominated by the mayor or burgesses in their gildhall;
- whether those wardens have by custom always been chosen from the burgesses of the town or whether the abbot and his officers have appointed any wardens of other officers or persons unable, or that there has been a decline in the good government of the town or misbehaving persons increase, due to any reason such as is proposed in the bill.

All of which matters the abbot is ready to prove in whatever way the court should decide, etc.

This is the reply to the response made by the abbot of Reading against the burgesses of Reading.

Whereas the abbot says that he and his predecessors have been accustomed every year at their discretion to choose one of the inhabitants of the town to be named and accepted as keeper of the gild, the burgesses say that the abbot ought not appoint such an officer in that way. For it is indicated in the fine of record that he should choose a burgess belonging to the gild, with whom we should be satisfied; if the burgesses are not satisfied with that one, the abbot should choose another, and so on until the burgesses are satisfied. It was subsequently decided by the abbot and the burgesses, to reduce the power of the burgesses, that 3 of the most capable burgesses be elected and chosen by the burgesses in their gildhall on the Friday preceding Michaelmas; and on Michaelmas itself they were to be presented by the burgesses to the abbot, in his monastery at Reading, and he was to name one of those 3 to occupy the office for the coming year. And twelve months later another would be chosen and sworn into office, and the incumbent discharged.

Whereas the abbot says in his response that he and his officers have had the administration and keeping of the king's peace in the town, the burgesses say that the mayor and constable along with the wardens associated with the 5 wards within the borough have always had jurisdiction over offenders and punishment of the same, such as [putting them] in the stocks. Which stocks belong to their [gild]hall, and they have made and repaired them at their own cost whenever this was required; the abbot had nothing whatever to do with it, nor did his steward or bailiff, for neither he nor his predecessors were ever asked to pay a single penny for the repairs. If any offender should be taken by them, then they are supposed to deliver the same to the constable or wardens of the borough, to be punished by the mayor and constables as they think appropriate.

Whereas the abbot says that his steward should be able to dismiss and appoint officers as he pleases, they say it is not so, not without the consent of the burgesses. Such are to be presented by them to the steward and he is to administer to each the corresponding oath of office; and none is to hold office unless he takes oath before the master of the gild.

The abbot is empowered to appoint constables.

The king to the sheriff of Berkshire, greetings. If John, Abbot of the monastery of Our Lady of Reading and, on behalf of the monastery, lord of the town of Reading provides sureties for pursuing his legal action, then require that Richard Clech, Cristin Nicholas, John Baxter, William Linacre, Thomas Bye, Richard Lech, Thomas Carpenter, William Lendall and William Baker provide sureties in the form of pledges that they will appear before the King's Bench a fortnight after 24 June, to respond to [\[the following accusation\]](#). That whereas the abbot, on behalf of the monastery, among other monastery privileges and liberties granted to the abbot and his predecessors, has the right and has been accustomed since time immemorial to appoint a burgess of the town as warden or keeper of the merchant gild in that town, which warden should not be (or have been) removed from office. And whereas the abbot, according to those same liberties and privileges, appointed and decreed the aforementioned Cristin to be warden or keeper of the gild for a year at Reading, and Cristin entered into the office and remained therein for a year. That despite this, Richard Clech, Cristin, William, Thomas, Richard, Thomas, William and William, immediately after that year wrongfully chosen John Baxter as warden of the gild for the year to follow; and John Baxter entered into that office through usurpation, and through that usurpation occupied and exercised the office for a long period, against the will of the abbot and contrary to the liberties and privileges mentioned above, to the abbot's damages of £40 etc.

Another action was brought by the abbot against Richard Clech, Cristin Nicholas, John Norfolk, Thomas Bye, William Lendall, Thomas Carpenter and William Baker. In that the abbot, on behalf of his monastery, among other monastery liberties and privileges granted to the abbot and his predecessors, has the right to appoint and has been accustomed to appoint from time immemorial, at will and whenever it suited him throughout that time, bailiffs, wardens of the 7 wards, constables and all other officers in the town, in order to uphold and maintain peace and tranquillity, good government, and stability in the town, according to the liberties and privileges of the monastery used and accepted throughout that time. The bailiffs, wardens and constables of the town, thus appointed by the abbot and his predecessors, made all kinds of attachments on each and every person breaking the peace, thieves, vagabonds, and others committing offences in the town; and they also had, and were accustomed to have, the custody and keeping of such offenders. And the abbot and his predecessors had, and were accustomed to have, the punishment and correction of the same, on behalf of the monastery, throughout that time; and have had and received all kinds of fines, ransomes, and amercements from each and every disturber, petty thieves, vagabonds, and offenders, on behalf of the monastery according to its liberties and privileges applied from time immemorial. On the basis of those liberties and privileges, the abbot appointed certain persons – that is, Robert Benett and John Baker – as constables at Reading.

Notwithstanding that Robert and John had taken possession of the offices, it was against the wishes of Richard Clech, Cristin Nicholas, John Norfolk, Thomas Bye, William Lendall, Thomas Carpenter, and William Baker, who – against the wishes of the abbot and contrary to the liberties and privileges mentioned – wrongfully removed and expelled Robert and John; and, at the instigation of Richard, Cristin, John Norfolk, Thomas Bye and William Lendall, the office of constable of the town was taken over by Thomas Carpenter and William Netter; they usurped this office for a long time, exercising it and wrongfully occupying it to the abbot's damages of £40 etc.

Another action has been brought by the abbot against respondents Richard Clech, Thomas Carpenter and William Baker. The abbot, on behalf of the monastery, among other monastery liberties and privileges used from time immemorial, has appointed at will as often as it suited him a clerk of the market and other officers and ministers of the town to supervise weights and measures and to correct and punish [infringing] victuallers in the town, and [undertake] such other tasks as fall to the clerk of the market, according to the liberties and privileges of the monastery. On the basis of these liberties and privileges, the abbot appointed certain persons – that is, Walter Barton and John Cokkes – to the office of clerks of the market in the town and all powers that belong to that office at Reading. Notwithstanding that Walter and John had taken up and entered into the office and had exercised it for a long time, Richard Clech, Thomas Carpenter, and William Baker, wrongfully expelled and removed Walter and John from their office, against their will and against that of the abbot, and contrary to the liberties and privileges mentioned. Then for a long time in the town they usurped the office of clerk of the market, wrongfully occupied it for a long time, and exercised the powers that belong to it, against the wishes of the abbot and contrary to the liberties and privileges mentioned, to the abbot's damages of £40 etc.

[The response of] Richard Clech to the abbot of Reading.

[...] whereas the abbot states in his bill [of complaint that] Richard Clech has for a long time borne a grudge against and felt malice towards the abbot and his monastery, Richard affirms that he never worked against the liberties and franchises of the monastery, but [...] has been as pleased to hear good news about it as any tenant of the abbot's.

The abbot complains that Richard Clech lately called an assembly of certain persons of your lordship's town of Reading, and took it upon himself to assume the mayoralty of the town, and to dismiss the town constables who were appointed by the abbot and his officers and to appoint others, from among his supporters, to occupy that office of constable contrary to the liberties of the monastery [...]. To that, Richard replies that from time immemorial there has been accustomed to be in the town an officer called the master of the gild, also called the mayor, whose purpose has been to assure the good government of the town. Which office known as master of the gild has been vacant for the last 3 or 4 years, in default of the abbot, to the great harm and damage of the residents. Because of that, based on the custom of the town used from time immemorial, on the Friday before last Michaelmas the burgesses in the gildhall elected and named Richard Clech to occupy that office; for which reason Richard took it upon himself to occupy the office, according to that same custom. Also because in the period just before last Christmas the number of offenders was increasing daily – cardplayers, diceplayers, gamblers, vagabonds, with many illegal games taking place both by night and by day – and the constable of the town, who from time immemorial was customarily nominated by the mayor then in office and the burgesses of the town, could not be admitted to the constabulary because the abbot had taken it upon him (contrary to custom) to admit unqualified and deceitful persons to the office of constable, thus disregarding the need for good government of the town. In consequence of which Richard Clech and other burgesses of the town requested certain of the burgesses – that is, Thomas Carpenter and William Netter – to help ensure such offenders were punished during the Christmas season, and until such time as there was a better understanding between the abbot and the burgesses. Richard did not take it upon himself to dismiss any constable made by the abbot, nor did he appoint any constable by his own authority, other than in the circumstances described above.

The abbot states that Richard Clech along with certain of his supporters riotously broke the town stocks and had new keys made for them, and handed over those keys to the constables Richard had appointed. To that, Richard replies that the burgesses of the town had the stocks made at their own expense and thereafter would repair them whenever necessary. Insofar as the stocks and also their fasteners, such as locks and other things, were not adequate for the task, Richard and other burgesses sent a message to those persons appointed by the abbot as keepers of the keys, asking them to bring or send the keys; which they refused to do at that time. Therefore Richard and other burgesses of the town removed the inadequate locks and bolts, and made others that were more secure and keys for the same, as they could lawfully do. They did not riotously break the stocks, as the bill alleges.

DISCUSSION

The settlement of 1254 represents the culmination of the first (known) phase of struggle of the townspeople of Reading to assert their independence from the control of the abbot of the monastery established there over a century earlier. Its founder, Henry I, had delegated his lordship over the town, which had been a military base of some significance during the wars between the Danes and the English from ninth to eleventh centuries, to the abbey, without any acknowledgement of any earlier liberties or customs of the burgesses; his successors confirmed and expanded the abbot's jurisdiction.

By the time that Henry III came to the throne, the town was very much under the thumb of the abbot and his bailiffs. The community's vehicle for self-assertion was a gild to which the more important tradesmen belonged. Its control of the Portmanbrook meadow, whose name reflects an ancient designation for townsmen (still used in the early thirteenth century, although the use of "port" for market town disappeared quickly after the Conquest), is suggestive of it being more than just a merchant gild. The term "burgess" was normally used to refer to gildsmen, although the references to officers having to be chosen from burgesses who were members of the gild indicates recognition that the two terms were not synonymous at first; by the end of the Middle Ages they were.

The earliest references we have to the gild come shortly before the settlement of 1254. In one the gildsmen of Reading were granted an island near their hall. A second emerged in the context of the dispute with the abbot. The townsmen were resisting the authority of the abbot's bailiffs, and using force and even violence to do so, it was charged. This resistance was defended with the claim that the burgesses had liberties contrary to those of the abbey that were of older lineage (from Edward the Confessor). The claim was improbable, and had been prompted by the acquisition at great expense in 1252 of a royal writ acknowledging that the townsmen held the same liberties they had enjoyed in the time of the king's predecessors; since the townsmen, when summoned before the king, were unable to produce documentary evidence of what the pre-Conquest liberties were, the king ordered the sheriff to ensure the abbot's rights were upheld. Soon after, the king unwittingly issued a charter in July 1253 granting the gildsmen freedom from all tolls throughout England and exemption from subjection to external courts; what the gildsmen had in mind may have been particularly the abbot's court and tolls he imposed on commercial activities. The charter was perhaps as important for its recognition, in the addressing clause, of the merchant gild as a vehicle for local government.

The gildsmen quickly took advantage of this grant to lay the complaints documented in the settlement of 1254, including that the abbot obliged them to answer to justice elsewhere than in the gildhall. In the autumn of 1253, the abbot made his own complaint: that the burgesses were refusing to allow him access to the gildhall (presumably for the purpose of holding a court). However, a separate issue of the location of the market was settled between the parties around that time, and the more comprehensive settlement, as above, followed not long after. The settlement appears at first glance to favour the abbot, by acknowledging his lordship; but this was a sine qua non throughout the Middle Ages, and the gildsmen's intent was rather to whittle away at his scope of jurisdiction rather than to overthrow it entirely. Besides the practical matter of the location of the market, the settlement won from the abbot formal recognition of the gild, as an organization representing the community, and as a body with the right to its own sources of revenue – rents and membership fees (revenues from legal jurisdiction not being available to the gild); such were two indispensable foundations for the development of urban self-government. The charter of 1253 may have been instrumental in giving the gild an advantage that enabled it to negotiate the settlement with the abbot.

Nonetheless, the gild's position was precarious. It had to concede to the abbot the right to make the final choice of its warden, although with the important proviso that the person chosen must be satisfactory to the gildsmen; this became one of the foci of the struggle thereafter. The further clause that the warden be changed annually probably worked more in favour of the gildsmen than the abbot. More serious, however, was the acknowledgement of the abbot's right to a number of revenues, including local taxation, court perquisites, and even a portion of gild membership fees. These entrance fines were a core revenue for borough governments; although not large, they normally represented a source of income exclusively the community's, which did not need to be purchased or wrested away from any other authority. To find part of this income being ceded to the abbot is suggestive of the corner in which the gildsmen found themselves, although they obtained a proviso which ensured that the abbot could not undermine the gild by raising entrance fees to the point where no-one would join. However, throughout the Middle Ages, the gild's limited revenues must have made it harder to fight the abbot; for the gildsmen needed support from the king, and there was generally a price for that.

The efforts of the gild over the next century and a half are not well documented, which we could interpret as an indication of peaceful relations; but it seems likely the events of mid-thirteenth century were only the opening salvo. It may be no coincidence that the title of mayor, for the head of the gild, appears to have been introduced in Reading ca.1301, at a period when the abbey was having financial difficulties and may have been less able to resist encroachment on its jurisdiction. That the first known incumbent, Walter Gerard, was said in 1302 to have been elected by community assent may be indicative of an attempt to bypass the abbot; on the other hand, we cannot rule out that it may have been the practice earlier for the gildsmen to choose a warden and simply present him to the abbot for approval. The same year saw the burgesses resisting the abbot's right to tax the community, and obtaining some support from the Prince of Wales on the question. Although when this was resisted again in 1309, the king (pointing to the 1254 settlement) ordered the burgesses to comply.

Edward III's exclusion, from his confirmation (1344) of the 1253 charter to the burgesses, of the clause freeing them from external courts may also point to a reversal instigated by the abbot in the context of further disputes. The next confirmation came in 1379, a year after the cofferers first appear among borough officers – the introduction of such financial officers often being an indicator of political upheaval or reform. It could also point to an increase in revenues or their sources; possibly the fish and meat shambles were involved here, and/or the communal wharf with its weighing beam (and associated fees), which would explain why they started to become a target of contention. However, the revenues only amounted to a few pounds a year – very modest compared to many other towns – and there was little if any surplus after what was due the abbot, salaries of borough officers, and cost of repairs to gild property. Who would choose the constables, first seen in 1368, became a bone of contention from at least the 1390s; again the gildsmen tried to base their claim on the town having been a royal borough prior to the foundation of the abbey.

From the reign of Henry VI things began to heat up again. The abbey found itself some assertive champions in Thomas Henley and the second of two successive abbots named John Thorne (the first of the pair the townsmen having tried to discredit to Edward IV). It was during John Thorne II's tenure that the second group of texts above illustrate the areas of contention. These texts are undated and appear to be a compilation of elements from various legal cases between abbot and gild, possibly noted down for reference as the conflict moved on to future court battles. The compilation was, however, made in association with that phase of the struggle that took place around 1499. [N.B. these passages are given here in the order presented by Slade, who aimed to arrange them more logically, not that in which they appear in the original source.]

By 1491, the relationship between gild and abbot was under particular strain. Richard Clech was playing a leading role in the town and, during an earlier mayoralty, had been promised by the abbot concessions that were not forthcoming; he intended not to be fooled again. That September the burgesses nominated Richard Cleche, Thomas Bye, and John Langham for the mayoralty; the abbot liked none of these, and Cristin Nicholas ended up being appointed, although he remained in office only for half a year – this probably being the usurpation complained of by the abbot when John Baxter was chosen to replace Nicholas. In September 1492 the burgesses presented the same three choices to the abbot, who refused to accept any of them. The same trio was likewise presented and rejected in 1493. In 1494 and 1495 the burgesses tried a variant set: Bye, John Baxter, and Thomas Pokeruge, but still without result; the 1496 nominees (Clech, Bye and Baxter) likewise failed to tempt the abbot, but the burgesses finally took the initiative into their own hands and elected Baxter themselves. He was succeeded by Cristin Nicholas, apparently in 1497, although the dating of the town diary is a little confused at this point; it is not stated by whose choice, but probably again the burgesses'.

With the 1499 election, and thereafter, relations with the abbot had been restored to some semblance of co-existence, and he was once more choosing the mayor from the three candidates. But by 1507 frustration had again reached boiling point, and mayor Cristin Nicholas, Richard Clech and Thomas Carpenter took the lead in complaining to the Lord Privy Seal and Lord Chamberlain about disputes said to have been going on for 19 years. They referred the matter to two justices of the Common Bench who, after having examined the evidence, ruled that Reading's merchant gild was a corporate body. The four dignitaries arbitrated a new settlement [J.M. Guilding, ed. Reading Records: Diary of the Corporation, (London, 1892), vol.1, 105-08] with the following points:

- The keeper of the gild was to be chosen as per tradition, with the gildsmen nominating each year three of their number, from whom the abbot would choose one and administer his oath of office; provision was made for a backup plan should the abbot be absent for more than a week after the nominees were chosen.
- All other articles of the 1254 settlement were reaffirmed.
- Election of other disputed officers was allowed to the town, but with provisos to assure that the gild interests did not dominate:

"the abbot is to allow the keeper of the gild and those of the town community who are householders, or the majority of the same, to choose one capable and judicious person from the burgesses of the gild to be one constable, and 5 honest burgesses to be 5 of the wardmen of the 5 wards. Also the keeper, burgesses and those of the town community who are householders are to choose another capable person from the community at large, who is not a burges of the gild, to be the other town constable, and 5 other capable persons of the community at large [to be chosen] by the 5 burgesses of the gild; and those other 5 wardmen are not to include any burgesses. All these elections are to be held at the leet and lawday of the abbot" with the officers oaths administered before the abbot's steward.

- Concerning burges entrances to the gild, whenever the keeper and gildsmen decided to admit a new member, the abbot was to be given a fortnight's advance notice, to ensure that a monk be assigned to be present when it was decided how much the entrant should pay as admission fee, half of which was to be paid to the abbot and the other half to the gild, with the same stipulations as in 1254 as to 6 burgesses having the final say on the fee, and with regard to what sons of gildsmen should pay.
- Chepinggavel was confirmed, as an annual payment from each gildsman of 5d, with the additional specification that widows of gildsmen paid 2½d., and the arbitrators thought it advisable to be more specific that the purpose of this licence was so that purchasers

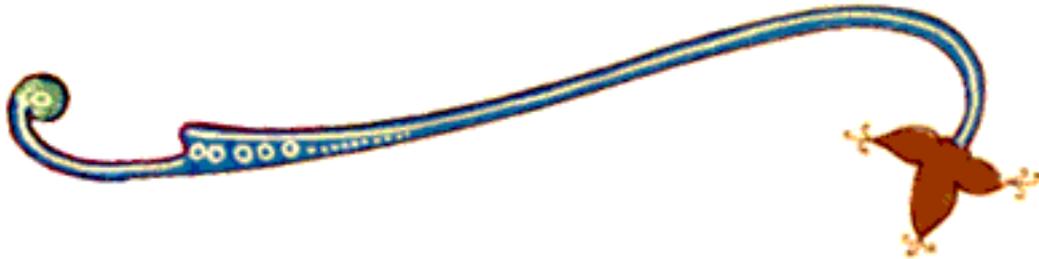

"may freely buy and sell all kinds of merchandize in their houses and shops in the town, and also buy and sell out of their houses and shops all kinds of merchandize and items saleable at fairs and markets of the town."

Gildsmen were to be allowed to set up stalls on vacant land in the town (so long as they did not cause a nuisance to neighbours or block any streets), without paying anything beyond the chepinggavel. However, from residents who were not members of the gild, the abbot could continue to take the traditional fees and tolls on any merchandize they bought or sold.

- Resolution of the dispute over the out-butchery was deferred until further evidence had been examined.

For the next year or two following the implementation of this agreement, we see relatively large numbers of townsmen joining the gild. This was an indication of the gains the gild had made, and strengthened the gild's position further. Although the principle of the abbot's lordship was intact, the gild had continued to succeed in undermining the extent of the abbot's control. The next generation of townsmen would see the end of ecclesiastical overlordship, at the Dissolution.

NOTES

"Henry de Bratton"

Or Bracton, i.e. the justice of the royal court, later known as King's Bench, to whom was (probably erroneously) attributed the legal treatise De legibus et consuetudinibus Angliae.

"deforciant"

The party in a fine (final concord or settlement) who is said to be keeping the rightful possessor of property (i.e. real estate and its related jurisdiction) out of possession, hence the action for recovery; this party was thus the defendant.

"appurtenances"

Easements, rights and privileges; the term could also be used to encompass physical attributes of a piece of real estate.

"Portmanbrook"

One is reminded of Portman Meadow at Ipswich.

"foreign man"

This probably means anyone not entering the gild by right of birth; although it could refer, as at some towns, to non-resident burgesses. Later reference to "foreign butchers" again could refer to townsmen who were not in the gild, or to butchers from outside the town bringing animals into town to slaughter and sell the meat.

"chepinggavel"

A licence fee for the right to buy and sell in market.

"Legal battle"

A variant of this document, from a different folio of the same original source, is transcribed (with minor imperfections) in N.M. Trenholme, The English Monastic Boroughs, University of Missouri Studies, vol.2, no.3 (July 1927), 105, and I have also made use of this in my modernization.

"out-fleshshambles"

For the significance of shambles, see York. The "out" refers to the butchers being outsiders (i.e. non-gildsmen or non-residents). Reading's shambles had been set up in the early 1420s, with a view to controlling the trade better and providing additional revenue, from rents, for the gild.

"Thomas Hendley"

He was abbot from 1430 to 1445.

"corporate personality"

That is, instead of arguing that the burgesses as a group had no standing before the law and could not sue him, the abbot by offering a defence implicitly accepted the burgesses as a corporate body.

"fine of record"

I.e. the final concord of 1254, set down in the court records.

"annual income"

The version given in Trenholme has "£3 and more".

"common beam"

Equipment for weighing cargoes being brought in or taken out of town.

"26s.8d"

The version given in Trenholme has 36s.10d.

"amortized"

The medieval term has not quite the same application as the modern use; it refers to the granting of a licence for alienation in mortmain – the connection with the modern meaning being that by such a licence the king wrote off certain income he would otherwise have obtained from such property.

"granted, ratified and confirmed"

The charter grants of 1253 to the burgesses were confirmed by subsequent monarchs in 1344, 1379, and 1427.

"service of one penny"

I.e. a seignorial due; this would appear to have its basis in a hawgable payment for a single property, which was then subdivided over time. However, we have no evidence to indicate whether the burgesses' claim was justified.

"Downton in Suth' and Ludyarsale"

Slade suggests the former may refer to Downton in Wiltshire; Trenholme read it as Rowton in Suffolk, although I can find no reference to any such place, and Tudgorsall in Wiltshire (in the variant he transcribed, Wiltshire was specified). It is true that Downton was returning parliamentary burgesses in the late fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries, but Suth' can hardly refer to Wiltshire, although it might by slight stretch of imagination have been meant for Hampshire. The second location is evidently Ludgershall, which was a parliamentary borough.

"suit of court"

The obligation of a tenant to be answerable in the court of the lord of the property, on any legal matter related to the tenure, and to seek justice for any such matters in that same court; the obligation involved compulsory attendance, at least once a year, at a general court session at which broader legal administration (e.g. leet) was undertaken by the lord over his areas of jurisdiction, and at which each suitor might be called upon to play the role of juror.

"paid out"

Probably referring to rents resolute.

"fourteenth"

The interruptions in the sequence after 1434 presumably reflect the struggle between Abbot Hendley and the gild for control of the butchery.

"William Huntynford"

A William Hunte was mayor on more than one occasion in the 1430s and '40s, but I doubt this is the man intended. The ordinance referred to must have been from the early years of Henry VI's reign.

"among other"

This may possibly belong to the previous phrase "warden and burgesses", in which case it would suggest that communal meetings dealing with important issues were not restricted to guildsmen but non-guildsmen had the right to participate.

"cofferers"

I.e. the financial officers (more usually known as treasurers or chamberlains).

"friendly discussion"

I.e. that the parties try to settle the matter amicably outside the court.

"Trinity term"

Essentially, the latter part of June and early part of July.

"a day assigned"

This probably refers to a set date for an annual general court session at which presentments were made, by the constables or by capital pledges, of offences against the community.

"persons unable"

Probably this means persons unsuited for the office.

"Richard Clech"

He purchased membership in the gild in 1475, on the same day as Thomas Bye, and John Baxter was one of his pledges. The following year he was made a warden of High Ward, and in 1478 a constable (replacing Thomas Bye), surrendering his wardenship a few months later. He was a mayoral candidate first in 1483, again in 1484, 1485, and 1487 when chosen mayor. He was again a candidate in 1489, and on several occasion during the political impasse of the 1490s, and became mayor once more in 1498. He was mayor again in 1505, and his final roles of responsibility were to represent the borough in Henry VIII's first parliaments (1509 and 1510). He appears less frequently in the records thereafter, and although he and Thomas Carpenter were both mayoral candidates in 1518, Abbot Thorne by-passed them in favour of the third nominee, who had not been implicated in the earlier disputes. We last hear of him in 1520. In the latter part of his career he was described as a draper.

"Cristin Nicholas"

He entered the gild by purchase in 1488, his pledges being William Lynacre and John Baxter. In 1491 the abbot chose him as mayor, although his name was not among the three nominees put forward by the burgesses; he held office only for half a year, before relations between abbot and gild broke down, creating a political impasse. In 1497 he entered a second term as mayor and his third term in 1499, having on both occasions been one of the nominees, and on the latter again selected by the abbot. He was again mayor in 1507. He died ca.1510.

"John Baxter"

He was a member of the gild by 1473, when he stood pledge for another entrant. In 1474 he was elected one of the constables. He was first a mayoral candidate in 1476, again in 1478 and 1479, being chosen mayor on both occasions – consecutive terms being unusual – and again in 1482 and 1483, going to his third term on the latter occasion; again in 1487, 1490 (fourth mayoral term), on several occasions during the '90s and was mayor again in 1496.

"William Linacre"

An elder statesman of Reading's ruling class, he entered the gild in 1449, as the son of a burgess – presumably the Edward Linacre who acted as his pledge; having cut his teeth in the role of tax-collector the following year, he was elected as cofferer in 1451/52, during the mayoralty of Edward Linacre. He was a mayoral candidate himself as early as 1462 and, although not elected, was called on a few months later to serve as a member of the committee negotiating matters with Abbot John Thorne I (1445-86). The following year he was again a candidate and this time the abbot chose him as mayor. His importance in the community is reflected in that he was again a candidate in 1466, 1467, 1468 (when appointed to his second term), 1470, 1471, 1472 (third term), 1474, 1475, 1476, 1477 (fourth term), (i.e. every year eligible between 1468-77). In 1480 he was chosen to his fifth term as mayor. During almost all of his mayoralties we have evidence of his assertive actions in furthering the interests of the gild. In October 1482 he leased from the gild for three years the wharf and wharffhouse, and during this period made improvements by installing a bell and firehooks. He is less in evidence during the later '80s and the '90s, but was identified among gild members in 1497.

"Thomas Bye"

He entered the gild in 1475, a couple of weeks later was chosen as one of the assessors of a parliamentary tax (and again the following year), and towards the end of the year was made a warden of London Ward. In 1477/78 he served as constable. He was a mayoral candidate in 1482, 1483, and 1484, being chosen mayor on that last occasion. Again a candidate in 1488, 1489, 1490, and on several occasions during the political impasse of the '90s. His son Thomas junior was a fuller, so Thomas senior may have been the same.

"Richard Lech"

He purchased membership in the gild in 1477, his pledges being John Baxter and Thomas Bye, and replaced Bye as warden of London Ward a few months later. In 1478 he served as one of the town cofferers. He was a mayoral candidate first in 1497 and again in 1499 and 1500. He attained the mayoralty in 1502. Possibly a dyer.

"Thomas Carpenter"

He entered the gild by purchase in 1488, Richard Cleche being one of his pledges. A few weeks later he was elected a warden of New Ward, and in 1490 chamberlain. In 1494 he was elected a constable, and in 1497 again served both as warden of New Ward and as chamberlain, repeating the latter office the following year as well as being elected constable. He served as mayor in 1504, 1506, 1508, and 1510. In that last year he was described as a mercer. He died ca.1519.

"William Lendall"

He purchased entrance to the gild in 1496, which probably made him the youngest of the group later being sued by the abbot. In 1497 he was a tax assessor, and a few months later was elected a constable, in which office he continued the following year; he is found in the same office in 1508; he appears not to have been considered mayoralty material. Possibly a dyer, if the man of the same name in the next generation was his son.

"William Baker"

He entered the gild by purchase in 1488, at the same time as Carpenter and Nicholas, and a few weeks later was elected both as warden of High Ward and as cofferer (or chamberlain as the post was now to be called). As one of the "usurping" constables of 1498, he was referred to by the abbot as William Netter, Baker being a netter by trade.

"John Norfolk"

I do not find this name in the borough records; possibly an alias for John Baxter.

"John Cokkes"

A John Cox was listed among the gildsmen in 1498, and was serving in 1509 as clerk of the gildhall, when described as a notary.

"unqualified and deceitful"

The terminology in the original is "simple and perjured", the former term referring to intelligence level, and the latter perhaps to deceit in the form of betraying the gild by siding with the abbot.

"leet and lawday"

A general court session, probably held annually (although at some places more frequently) and encompassing presentments of offences against the community, possibly administration of the assizes, and other business.

On 7 ... 1384, I, Thomas Usk, in the presence of John [Charneye coroner] of London wrote this statement with my own hand and vouched for its accuracy. To ... [give coun]sel during the term of John Norhampton mayor there should [come] ... to ... that is, in John Willyngham's tavern in the Bow ... of twenty of the crafts that support him, one or two men who are chosen to be common councillors for this year, and ... John More mercer, Richard Norbury mercer, and William Essex draper, together with myself, Thomas Usk, to write down their petitions ... so that those who were present might, at [the next session of] the common council be unanimous in their position on these matters, and vote in accord on the day of that common council ... and be ... to accomplish what John Norhampton, John More, Richard Norbury and William Essex purposed at, whether honest or dishonest, and did ... because Sir William Walworth and other persons of status, as aldermen and common councillors, were opposed to the ord[inances of John] Norhampton, it was decided by John More, Richard Norbury and William Essex that the mayor should take as his councillors whomever he wished during his term of office, and have nothing to do with those who opposed him. And that those crafts antagonistic towards him should be represented only by the number [traditional] chosen by each craft, and no more; whereas those crafts that sided with him should be represented by as many as they wished. Thus he planned to have so many supporters that the opposing side would be powerless. Of this I accuse John Norhampton, John More, Richard Norbury, and William Essex.

It was the full intention of John Norhampton and his advisors – that is, John More, Richard Norbury, and William Essex – and of all the crafts that sided with him that, with whatever support from men of power that they might obtain, four points of law be established and enforced. That is, that the aldermen should be replaced from year to year; that the common council should be selected by the crafts; that no victualler should hold judicial office; and that all non-Londoner victuallers should be free to bring their victuals to the city to sell, by retail as much as by any other method, without having to pay for the franchise. His intent was indeed that all the ordinances that were made during his term of office, no matter how bad, should be maintained forever after, through the power of the people, against any mayor that would overturn them. To this end, once the most respectable and wisest townsmen had dissociated themselves with such worthless councils, the mayor John Norhampton, John More, Richard Norbury, and William Essex drew to their cause the common people, to give life-or-death support to this programme. At every council meeting was John More, Richard Norbury, and William Essex, and at some Adam Bame. But otherwise the mayor made his own decisions; one Willyngham, a scrivener, and one ... Marchaund clerk made a record of many matters in my absence, and on occasion were more privy [to information] than I. Certainly the overall purpose of those named above was to have the town in their control, and have it governed by their decisions, and to suppress or banish from the town all those powerful enough to resist them; and for the rest who lacked power, to have those under their thumbs forever. Of this I accuse John Norhampton, John More, Richard Norbury, and William Essex.

Because all the long-established officers in the town were no friends to the mayor or his ideas, all those officers were to be removed over time, and replaced by others who agreed with and supported his viewpoint; for they said that such persons as had intentions contrary to his were enemies to good intent. This was increasingly used to stir up the poor people and make them more fervent in their rebelliousness towards the great men of the town and towards its officers. The people were told that the great men wished to keep the people oppressed in their lowly status forever; this notion, continually put forward, caused dissension to arise between the respectable persons and the lesser people of the town. Of this I accuse John Norhampton, John More, Richard Norbury, and William Essex.

In preparation for the day when John Norhampton was elected for a second mayoral term, because Sir John Philpot had opposed the bad things done, as indicated above, John More took the lead in arranging for a petition to be drawn up in the name of the common council, demanding Sir John repay the money he had borrowed during his mayoralty. The plan was for him thereby to be condemned as unsuitable to hold any office in the town in future. Of this I accuse John More.

In preparation for that second election, great arrangements were put in hand by John More, Richard Norbury, Adam Bame, William Essex, and many others, including myself Thomas Usk, to ensure that on that day the commons would choose as mayor John Norhampton, and no-one else. With the intent of obtaining [\[during that term of office\]](#) confirmation by royal statute of all his reforms, so that they would endure perpetually. Thus the reforms would both be fixed by statute and maintained through the power of the people, as mentioned above. Of this I accuse John More, Richard Norbury, Adam Bame, and William Essex.

In preparation for the next parliament following this, mayor John Norhampton made me, Thomas Usk, go to the commons to inform them of the ordinance against the fishmongers, and to gain their support for, among other things, choosing Richard Norbury and William Essex to represent them in the parliament. He in turn was to arrange for the aldermen to choose John More and Thomas Carleton

[as their representatives] for the same. And so it was done, and they pursued matters contrary to the perpetual franchises of London. Of this I accuse John Norhampton.

At that parliament effort was made to obtain an authorization directed to the mayor to punish usurers, whether initiated by a private complaint or by indictment; which letters patent allowed sentence to be passed on any man who had been proven to commit such an act, or had been party thereto. In this regard, many of the most respectable townsmen have, through false schemes and plots planned in advance, been charged with the same and such sentences have been passed on them that they would fall from their position in the town. I now realize that, through those means, it was intended to bring about an evil end: to bring down the respectable citizens who had opposed him; and this writ was purchased not for any well-intended purpose, but only out of malice, to be able to get rid of all the most respectable men. By such false scheming and plotting of their downfall would the respectable people of the town have been banished from the town. In relation to which, it had already been decided who would fill the offices of the mayoralty, aldermanries, shrievalties, and others of similar importance, in the following year; so that John Norhampton's adversaries would not hold any offices thereafter. As a result of which we might well see the destruction of the town within a short time, because of having so many capable men gone from the town. Of this I accuse John Norhampton, John More, Richard Norbury, and William Essex.

At the contrivance of John More were indicted Walter Sybile, John Horn, and Adam Carlell. Although many inquisitions were held, [only] those that best served the king were returned. Indeed, Robert Franceys and others, whose names I no longer recall, wanted to indict Sir Nicholas Brembre of supporting Thomas Farndon; John More at first agreed to this, but afterwards prevented it, so that nothing was done. Of this I accuse John More.

Often, just before the election of Sir Nicholas Brembre as mayor, mayor John Norhampton, John More, and Richard Norbury sent William Essex and me, Thomas Usk, to Goldsmiths' Hall to speak with members of the common council in regard to electing a mayor, and for the same purpose I, Thomas Usk, was to speak to those that I knew of the common councillors about choosing John Norhampton. There at Goldsmiths' Hall it was agreed among those who assembled that certain persons from various crafts other than those who were nominees for the common council should be [summoned] on election day to join the common council, to help [ensure] the election of John Norhampton. The lesser people were to be drawn into this arrangement, so that they should feel committed to John Norhampton; so that if, in the future, someone else chosen as mayor tried to take action against him, they might be ready to support him against any accusation brought against him. If he had become mayor, I know very well that he would either have enforced all his ordinances, or else have set the entire town in an uproar. Of this I accuse John Norhampton, John More, Richard Norbury, and William Essex.

The evening before the day when the mayor was to be elected, John More advised all his servants and his men to carry arms at the Guildhall the following day. For, he let it be known, he and his associates would keep guard at the entrances that day, with the intent that no-one should go in except those who would choose John Norhampton as mayor. Of this I accuse John More.

On the day that Sir Nicholas Brembre was chosen mayor, soon after dinner John Norhampton went to John More's house, and Richard Norbury and William Essex also came there. They agreed there that the mayor, John Norhampton, should send a message to the crafts members of the common council and to the wardens of the crafts, to tell them to come to Goldsmiths' Hall the following day, where the mayor would speak to them, to consider and arrange how to overturn the election of Sir Nicholas Brembre. And were it not for fear of the king, I am certain everyone would have been at each other's throats. Then he sent Richard Norbury, Robert Ryseby and me, Thomas Usk, to the Neyt, to the Duke of Lancaster, to say the following: "Sir, today when we wished to participate in the election of the mayor in the peace of God and the king, there came a dreadful crowd of hecklers whom no-one knew; and they, without any right other than that of force, chose Sir Nicholas Brembre mayor, contrary to the electoral procedures we have used in the past. Consequently we request you to obtain for us a writ from the king to hold a new election." But the duke replied: "No indeed, you shall have no writ. Sort out the matter amongst yourselves." Of this I accuse John Norhampton, John More, Richard Norbury, and William Essex.

When all the people [summoned] had gathered at Goldsmiths' Hall, mayor John Norhampton painted as bad a picture as he could of the election the previous day, and said: "Sirs, this sets the scene for us to be trampled underfoot, and that," said he, "I will not tolerate. Let us rather die here and now than suffer such mischief." These words stirred up the commons, and they said that they would indeed hold another election, and not put up with such a wrong, or else all die together. Then the mayor, John Norhampton, instructed them all to go home, and quickly come back to the Cheap in strength with all their [fellow] craftsmen – I reckon there were about 30 crafts. The intent was for them to assemble in Cheap and proceed to hold a new election. In fact, if the aldermen had not come to negotiate and persuaded John Norhampton to send the people home, they would have held a new election and were so worked up they would have killed anyone who tried to stop them. Of this I accuse John Norhampton.

In regard to all the matters described above, though John Norhampton, who was at that time mayor, John More, Richard Norbury, William Essex, and occasionally Adam Bame, seeing that the most respectable men had dissociated from them because of their uncompromising policies and poor decisions, and had already rejected [working with] them, nonetheless attracted support from many crafts and a multitude of the lesser people who have no understanding of government or how to make good decisions. And through confederacy, [illegal] assemblies, and conspiracy, planned and brought about as indicated above, they intended to uphold by force their false and wicked notions, under the pretext of communal benefit exhorting the people to be ready from day to day to support them in what they were evilly planning. In this way, as much after he ceased being mayor as before, all those who were on his side stirred up trouble, held meetings, and plotted what has been described above – except for Adam Bame who, as far as I know, since he [i.e. Northampton] ceased being mayor, has not been involved with him. Also, John Norhampton, John More, Richard Norbury, and William Essex would so greatly slander the respectable men of the town that the people were, and are, sufficiently emboldened to rebel against those who govern them, now and in the future, as a result of lies and agitation, conspiracies, assemblies, and confederacies made then and continued ever since, as described above. All this has come about – the confederacies, the stirring up, the debates, and the great strife that is still dominating the city – principally through John Norhampton, John More, Richard Norbury, and William Essex, and what they have had done. It is on the point of bringing trouble down on the whole kingdom. The city has been tottering on the brink, and still is. Which evil intentions I aided and abetted in whatever ways I could, for which I beg grace and mercy of my liege-lord the king, and secondly of the mayor and all the respectable aldermen, and of all the good commons of the town, as one who will never again offend against the town in any way. And to tell truth, Adam Bame was not so frequently nor so heavily involved in these matters as were the others. Of this I accuse John Norhampton, Richard Norbury, John More, and William Essex.

Ever since he ceased being mayor, John Norhampton, John More, Richard Norbury, and William Essex have busied themselves ... in winning the backing of the populace, and has put his own efforts into convening assemblies and gatherings of companies, [to urge them] to stand by him ... and he instructed me, Thomas Usk, to [go to] the Bow to meet with other folk he had gathered, and there he showed a petition that had been drawn up against him and he obtained assurance from that group that they would stand by him [only fragments of the remainder of the text could be read; they suggest that Northampton's supporters (Usk and two goldsmiths) were making a further effort to win support from the Duke of Lancaster, and they close with Usk reiterating his repentance for his part in the affair and appealing for mercy].

[2. Findings of an inquisition into the actions of John Northampton]

[N.B. The transcript omits parts of the text, as indicated by the ellipses.]

At an earlier date before Nicholas Brembre mayor it was presented that John Norhampton, recently mayor of the city of London (that is, in 1381 and 1382) held meetings on various occasions at the tavern of John Willyngham in the Bow involving one or two men from some twenty craft guilds – that is, the armourers, girdlers, lorimers, pinner, wiredrawers, cardmakers, carriers, horners, tilers, smiths, dyers, fullers, shermen, haberdashers, cordwainers, and whichever of the other of the lesser guilds supported him – who were chosen by John Norhampton to be members of the common council. On any of these occasions the mayor was accompanied there by his advisors John More mercer, Richard Norbury mercer, William Essex draper, and also Thomas Usk, a scribe for writing his documents. At those meetings were debated various matters and proposals for diminishing and subverting the liberties and customs that have previously been used in the city. The aim being that, at any [\[session of the\]](#) common council at which those thus elected were present, they might unanimously agree on the matters or proposals previously dealt with in that way, and thus the common council would present to the public a common face on such matters as indicated above. Following this method, John Norhampton, John More, Richard Norbury, William Essex, and Thomas Usk introduced whatever proposals suited them and had them entered in the [\[Letter\]](#) book of the Guildhall of London as a matter of record. Because Sir William Walworth and others held contrary opinions, it was agreed among John Norhampton, John More, Richard Norbury, William Essex, and Thomas Usk that, during the time he was mayor, John Norhampton should accept onto his council those who suited him, and those who put themselves in opposition to his will should be rejected. And that no-one should come to the common council from a craft that opposed him, except only two presented by the craftsmen and who were approved by John Norhampton; but from other crafts that supported him might come as many as they wished. In this way he arranged to have with him at every common council so many men from those crafts supporting him that the party opposing him, or opposing his proposals, was powerless.

They also present that during the mayoral term of John Norhampton it was ordained by John Norhampton and the others that all alderman should be removed [\[from the office\]](#) on a yearly basis, and others should be elected in their place. That the common council should comprise men from various crafts. That no victualler might hold judicial office within the city, and that victuallers from outside might bring their victuals to the city and freely sell the same by retail or any other method, without being subject to the liberties customarily governing victualling. The intent and plan of John Norhampton being that those articles and all ordinances made by them, whether good or bad, should in the future, through the power of the people that they had harnessed, be observed and maintained against any mayor holding office in future who might wish to act counter to them. Afterwards, once the reputable men forsook such wicked councils, as they had no option but to do, John Norhampton, John More, Richard Norbury, William Essex, and Thomas Usk drew to them the common people of whatever crafts were on their side, to stand with them in upholding, in life and in death, the wicked platform indicated above; at all such councils there were present, alongside John, John More, Richard Norbury, William Essex, Thomas Usk, and sometimes Adam Bamme. Their intent and arrangements were aimed at having the entire city under their rule etc., even if this necessitated getting rid of all the reputable men who had the power to speak out against them.

Also, because the long-standing officers – that is, the recorder, the chamberlain of the Guildhall, the common clerk, and other officers – were unwilling to endorse the ideas of John Norhampton, John More, Richard Norbury, William Essex, and Thomas Usk, but [\[instead\]](#) opposed them, around Easter 1382 John Norhampton, John More, Richard Norbury, William Essex, and Thomas Usk, at the Guildhall and elsewhere, from day to day during John Norhampton's mayoralty, conspired to remove those officers over the course of time and to replace them with such men as were willing to support their ideas. They declared in public that all who held themselves in opposition to their intentions were enemies of all good intentions; this was constantly used to get the poorer of the common people worked up against the reputable men and the city officers. And John Norhampton said to the people that the great men of the city wished to have the people in subjection, oppressed, and at the lowest level they could, forever. By him persisting in saying these things, it promoted discord and dissension between the reputable men and the middling people, to the detriment of the status quo.

Also, they present that on 11 October 1382, prior to the second election of John Norhampton to the mayoralty, because Sir John Philpot was opposing the wicked acts of John Norhampton, John More falsely arranged for a petition to be drawn up and submitted by the common council to the mayor and read out on election day. It sought from John Philpot a certain sum of money that he had borrowed from various persons when he had been mayor; it was then proposed that John Philpot be prohibited from holding any position or office within the city from that time forth.

Also, they present that on that same date certain provisions were made in secret by John Norhampton and others, at the houses of John Norhampton and John More, to do everything they could to have the commons of the city agree to the election of John Norhampton and no-one else as mayor, with the intent that all ordinances previously made by John Norhampton and others might be confirmed by the king in his next parliament.

Also, they present that at that parliament a writ from the king was sought by Richard Norbury, William Essex, John More, and Thomas Carleton, giving the mayor authority to punish all usurers within the city, whether at the suit of some [private] person wishing to lay a complaint or through an indictment. It was afterwards, that same year, in London agreed between the mayor and the others mentioned that by means of this writ they might have the pretext to take action against any person who happened to be found guilty in a public suit. And thus that same year, through scheming and plotting in advance in the parish of St. Mary-le-Bow, John Norhampton would have implemented his plan through attacks on many of the most reputable citizens of good standing, so that thereafter they might be unable to hold any position or office within the city. In this way they intended to put into action all their wicked arrangements and plans which had previously been put in place by John Norhampton, John More, Richard Norbury, William Essex, and Thomas Usk, concerning the offices of mayor, aldermen, sheriffs and other officers in the years following, so that none of John Norhampton's adversaries could hold any office.

Also, they present that at John More's contrivance Walter Sibyle, John Horn, and Adam Karlill were falsely indicted in 1382 by several inquisitions [held] before the sheriffs of London at that time, Adam Bamme and John Sely, on various charges of insurrection and other felonies [committed] at London. Of which [the findings of] the two best inquisitions were returned to the king, and not the others – the remainder of the inquisitions being kept back, at John More's contrivance, in the hands of the sheriffs.

Also, they present that, prior to 13 October 1383, the date when Nicholas Brembre was elected mayor of the city, by the decision of John Norhampton then mayor, John More, Richard Norbury etc. prearranged between them through their deceitful connivance and conspiracy, William Essex and Thomas Usk frequently went to the Goldsmiths' Hall to speak with members of the common council about electing a mayor for the year coming; to which end the names of the councillors were given to Thomas Usk by John Norhampton, with the intention that Thomas communicate to the commons his understanding of the said matter. There an agreement was reached that certain persons of various crafts, whose names had not previously been put forward for the common council, would be required [to come] among the common council on election day to help elect John Norhampton as mayor. And that the middling people were to be placed on the council to provide similar support; with the intent that they stand solidly behind John Norhampton in all actions, and that if in future any other mayor elected in the city was an opponent of John Norhampton and wished to speak out against John concerning what has been mentioned above or any other wicked deeds, John Norhampton might rely on the middling people he had drawn to himself appearing to support him against all things of which he was accused.

Also, they present that on the evening before the day of Nicholas' election as mayor, John More in his house in St. Mary-le-Bow parish forewarned all his servants to be armed the following day at the Guildhall, and he told them that he and his colleague, the other sheriff, wished to stand guard that day at the entrance to the Guildhall, so that no-one should enter unless he was someone willing to elect John Norhampton in the mayoralty.

Also, they present that on the day when Nicholas was elected, John Norhampton, Richard Norbury, William Essex, and Thomas Usk came to John More's house in the Bow immediately after the [main] meal [of the day]. There it was agreed that John Norhampton should send [instructions] to those persons who, at the time of Nicholas' election, were in the common council of the crafts and to the wardens of the crafts, to come to Goldsmiths' Hall the following day, where John Norhampton would talk with them and arrange how the election of Nicholas Brembre might be annulled. And this being done, it was only fear of the king intervening in the city that prevented John Norhampton and the others instigating a public outcry and uprising, at a time when John Norhampton was mayor and keeper of the peace.

Afterwards, John Norhampton sent Richard Norbury ... to the Neyt to inform the Duke of Lancaster that on election day they had expected to proceed with the mayoral election in the peace of God and the king, but there intervened a dreadful crowd of unknown persons making a great clamour; and there, without any precedent in city custom concerning the mayoral election, they used force to elect Nicholas. They begged the duke to let them have a king's writ to proceed with holding a new election. In response to which the duke told them that they could have no writ on the matter, but should sort out the matter amongst themselves.

Also, they present that on the day following that on which Nicholas Brembre was elected mayor, at the Goldsmiths' Hall, when the populace had gathered there at his wishes, John Norhampton painted as bad a picture as he could of Nicholas' election and said to them that it was certain that an effort would be made to crush them if that election were allowed to stand, which he himself was not willing to permit; rather, he said, let us be agreed all to die together at one time than to endure such abuse.... The commons were stirred up and said that they wished to proceed to another election. So John Norhampton ordered them all to hurry home and return with all the men of their crafts to the Cheap, to hold a new election. If many of the aldermen had not intervened and negotiated with John Norhampton for a peaceful resolution, the commons would have fulfilled their wish to proceed with a new election, and they were so stirred up and hot under the collar as to threaten to kill anyone – including Nicholas and the aldermen, among others – who wanted to prevent them.

Also, they present that concerning all these matters described above during John Norhampton's mayoralty, that is during the years 1382 to 1383, John Norhampton, John More, Richard Norbury, William Essex, and Thomas Usk, and on occasion Adam Bamme, subjecting to their bad government and poor decisions the good and reputable people of the city, who dissociated from them because of the abuse they had suffered in the past, [instead] drew to themselves many men of various crafts and many of the middling people who were completely ignorant of good government. Through their premeditated conspiracy and by means of popular assemblies they intended to maintain by force their perverse and wicked notions under the pretext of communal benefit, and were always exhorting the people to be ready to support them. In this way, both after John Norhampton had ceased to be mayor (that is, in 1383) and before, John Norhampton, John More, Richard Norbury, William Essex, and Thomas Usk feloniously conspired and so greatly slandered the good people of the city that the populace was, and still is, sufficiently emboldened to rebel against those who govern them ... And because of them ... great dissension and tumult have arisen among the people, and are still holding sway up to the present, to the point where they threaten to disrupt the whole kingdom of England.

After John Norhampton was no longer mayor, that is immediately after 28 October 1383 and the year that followed, and Nicholas had assumed the mayoralty, John Norhampton, John More, Richard Norbury, William Essex, and Thomas Usk focused their efforts on winning the populace to John Norhampton's side and urging them to stand by them in their wicked acts against Nicholas Brembre. In this regard, on 18 January 1384 John Norhampton sent Thomas Usk to the Bow to meet with men he had gathered there, and there he showed them a certain petition drawn up against him and entreated them all to stand by him ... that they should not be exposed to any injury or oppression that any Londoner sought to inflict on them.

Also, they say that after John Norhampton was arrested in London by Nicholas Brembre, that is on 7 February 1384, Robert Franceys goldsmith, John Lincolle goldsmith, and Thomas Usk at their own deceitful initiative followed up with the Duke of Lancaster, to inform the duke that John Norhampton was the best mayor that had ever been and to criticize Nicholas Brembre and his administration.

Also, they present that on 11 February 1384 John More mercer, Richard Norbury mercer, Robert Franceys goldsmith, and others rose up against mayor Nicholas ... and made illegal assemblies both in the parish of St. Mary-le-Bow and elsewhere in various parts of the city and suburbs, with the result that the doors and windows of many shops in West Cheap, Budge Row, Fleet Street and elsewhere that were previously open quickly closed as soon as they had word of the uprising, and the people gathered together, conspiring to kill mayor Nicholas. Which mayor, hearing of this, gathered around him many of the aldermen and other sensible men and went in armed force to West Cheap to uphold the king's peace.

Also, it was similarly presented by a certain inquisition that John Norhampton citizen and draper, William Essex draper, Richard Norbury mercer, Robert Ryseby draper, Thomas Usk scrivener, John Maudeleyn tailor, Guy Paulyn draper, John Bere haberdasher, John Muntham joiner, and Thomas Kyngesbrigge cordwainer are the leading conspirators behind such illegal assemblies. And that they, out of malice, on 2 November 1383 in the parish of St. Mary-le-Bow in the ward of Cordwainer Street, after the aforementioned mayor had assumed all the powers of the mayoralty of the city by taking his oath, and after that from day to day, both there and at St. Paul's church, the Minorites' friary, and the Augustinian friary ... conspired against the mayor and the aldermen and ... as a result of which a certain part of the populace showed itself through various indications, in looks and in words, to be rebellious and disobedient towards the mayor etc.

They also say that this mayor, on 22 January 1384, before the king's council at Westminster and in the presence of various aldermen, spoke as politely as he could to John Norhampton concerning his misdeeds and other of his malicious acts. Although John Norhampton was unwilling to acknowledge any such misdeeds, he did however in front of the council submit himself entirely to accept whatever judgement the mayor and aldermen reached. Upon which the council ordered John Norhampton to go with the mayor and aldermen back to the city, in their custody, and there to accept and comply with their decision ... if he wished to avoid serious punishment. Which, when there, John Norhampton having agreed to do ... immediately, by the mayor's grace and out of respect for the king's council, he was set at liberty upon reputable men being found as guarantors of John Norhampton's peaceable behaviour and abstention from making any assembly without the mayor's permission ... All of which notwithstanding, over the course of two days preceding Sunday, 7 February 1384, John Norhampton sent his neighbours to summon various men, numbering about 500 in total, who came to John Norhampton at St. Mary-le-Bow church on that Sunday in response to the call. John Norhampton led them through the centre of West Cheap and through the middle of St. Paul's church[yard], and thus beyond Ludgate as far as the church of the Carmelite friars in the suburbs. For which reason the mayor arrested him and he remained under arrest, until by the authority of a royal writ he was sent to Corfe Castle.

[3. Northampton's final resort to armed resistance, as reported by two inquisition juries]

a) Also, they say under oath that John Norhampton and his aforementioned accomplices [Essex and Usk], together with John More and Richard Norbury, whom he permitted to aid and abet him, devised a crafty way to engineer an uprising by the people of the city against the mayor, in a felonious and treasonable effort to overthrow the city, notwithstanding the earlier proclamation of the king's restraining order. To further the wicked plans he had already worked out, during the two days prior to 7 February 1384, without having sought licence from the mayor, they arranged for various messengers to summon men of their and other crafts, under penalty of a monetary fine, that is 6s.8d (even though John Norhampton was not at that time an officer of the king in the city), to gather on the Sunday after midday in the churchyard of St. Mary-le-Bow, London. On which day, shortly after midday in response to the summons, there assembled Geoffrey Waldern, William Hoghton, John Whytyngton, Thomas Noket, Richard Norbury, John Carbonell, John Chedder, and others to the number of about five hundred men, whom John Carpenter led – as if their captain – through West Cheap. The mayor being advised of this was astonished and as fast as may be hurried after them, concerned about the possibility of them causing an affray or a disturbance of the peace. Seeing them as they proceeded on their perambulation, he twice sent ahead to them, through his sergeant John Bothisham, to tell them to wait for him. But John Norhampton and his followers had no inclination to do so at that point, nor until the mayor caught up with them near the bridge over the Fleet. There John Norhampton, openly revealing the animosity towards the mayor he felt in his heart, acted in a rebellious manner to the mayor, organizing his followers by dividing them into two ranks lined up along opposite sides of the street, obliging the mayor with the men who had come with him to make his way down the middle of them, showing no honour or respect for the mayor as they ought to have done because of their oaths [as freemen].

Also, they say under oath that after Nicholas the mayor reached John Norhampton and his followers at the Fleet Bridge and asked him, as well as ordered him in the king's name, to come with him, they refused to heed his warning at first, until at the last John Norhampton ordered his companions to follow him, not the mayor, and they left the latter standing there. Nor was John Norhampton himself willing to go with the mayor, but in defiance of the mayor he and his followers stuck together in their rebellion and he went his own way.

Also, they say under oath that the same Sunday, after the rumour had spread in the city that John Norhampton had gathered a crowd in Fleet Street to put up resistance to the mayor, people of the city who sided with the mayor hurried there to help him. The mayor seeing this and realizing how stirred up the populace was and particularly how rebellious John Norhampton was, in an attempt to calm the crowds, asked and ordered those who sided with John Norhampton to move off with him from the church of the Carmelite friars; this they refused to do, declaring openly to each other that "we didn't come here with him, so we won't leave here with him". Because of John Norhampton's rebelliousness, and in order to protect his life and those of others who were with him, the mayor arrested John Norhampton and took him into custody.

Also, they say under oath that the same Sunday, after John Norhampton was arrested by the mayor in Fleet Street, as mentioned above, a certain Robert Cumberton the brother of John Norhampton and John Blyton a servant of John Norhampton, brandishing their glistening knives and daggers before the mayor, attempted a rescue on John Norhampton near the hostelry there call Topfeld's Inn, feloniously disturbing the king's peace. As a result of which, the mayor subsequently arrested Robert Cumberton and John Blyton.

Also, they say under oath that the same Sunday, shortly after John Norhampton had been placed under arrest, he arrived with the mayor at the street called Cordwainer Street. Seeing his supporters gathered around his house there and hoping that he might be rescued, he arrogantly threatened the mayor with these words, as if rejecting the fact that he was in custody, saying "You have brought me here by force, now shall I go into my house?" To which the mayor replied, "No, you shall come with me." John Norhampton responded, "If you take me any further, I won't be held responsible for any violence that comes of it. Whatever happens, let it be on your head." This was said by John Norhampton because of his intention, with malice aforethought, to benefit from the trouble he had stirred up in his effort to overthrow the city – and indeed the whole kingdom of England.

Also, they say under oath that following John Norhampton's confinement in the house of the mayor, John Remes, Thomas Lincolle, Richard Brendewode, Robert Ryseby, Thomas Depham, and Simon Stratton, along with Robert Chamberleyn a servant of John Norhampton and Robert a former servant of William Essex, came with a huge crowd of people which they had raised and led to the mayor's house. They did the best they could to use force to break down the doors of that house (which had the status of the king's prison) and feloniously and treasonably to remove John Norhampton from the mayor's custody.

Also, they say under oath that Robert Cumberton, John More, John Constantyn, Robert Ryseby, Thomas Usk, William Tyngewyk, and other accomplices and supporters of John Norhampton, on the first count and also on the second one indicated above, with the agreement, arrangement, and instigation of John Norhampton, who was at that time in custody in the mayor's house, as has been said, treacherously, feloniously and treasonably plotted and raised a conspiracy involving the people of the city. That is, in the churchyard of St. Mary's and elsewhere in the city from that Sunday continuously until the Thursday following, they tried to raise the people, carry out a rescue of John Norhampton, and kill the mayor and other reputable men of the city. As a result of which conspiracy and plot, on the morning of that Thursday, Robert Cumberton, John More, John Constantyn, Robert Ryseby, Thomas Usk, and William Tyngewyk, as the principal movers, rose up and incited the people to do the same. Many shops in various streets of the city – that is, in West Cheap, Budge Row, and elsewhere – that were previously open were closed up, and the people who sided with John Norhampton found themselves weapons and rose up, with the result that the city would have been given over to extensive carnage and pillage, to the point of its overthrow, had not the mayor, by the grace of God, quickly brought an opposing armed force to the aid and relief of the populace, stood his ground against the rioters, and forced an end to their activities, pacifying them by encircling their forces.

b) It was presented that John Norhampton draper, Thomas Carleton embroiderer, William Essex, Thomas Usk, and Richard Norbury were the chief conspirators. They also say that John More, Robert Cumberton the brother of John Norhampton, John Constantyn cordwainer, John Doncastre coppersmith, John Muntham joiner ... were their supporters [The document proceeds to describe the events leading up to and of 7 February, with the progress of Northampton's perambulation] beyond Ludgate as far as Fleet Bridge. Without prior warning of this assembly, the mayor was advised of it while at a meal at the house of Sir Richard Waldegrave in Wood Street, St. Michael of Hog Lane parish, with Sir William Walworth, Sir John Philpot, Robert Warbulton, John Shadworth, Adam Bamme, Henry Bamme, and others. Taking with him John Philpot, Henry Vannere, and William Cheyne, along with Simon Wynchecombe one of the city sheriffs ... the mayor hurried to West Cheap, where he caught sight of John Norhampton and his followers heading for the church of St. Michael at Corn[market]. Then the mayor sent John Botkysham, one of his sergeants, to John Norhampton to forbid him, on behalf of the mayor and in the king's name, going any further before the mayor could catch up to him. John Botkysham reached them as they were about to go into St. Paul's churchyard and communicated to them the prohibition as instructed. That notwithstanding, they refused to wait, some of them declaring "Keep marching, keep marching". Seeing this, John Botkysham returned to the mayor and informed him of the situation. The mayor then ordered the same sergent to go back to them again, to get them to wait for the mayor and his associates. The sergent went and, reaching them in St. Paul's churchyard, announced his message to them. But John Norhampton and his lieutenants refused to pay heed, so the sergent went back to the mayor and told him of it. A third time that sergent was instructed by the mayor to go to them to say that, in the name of the mayor and the king, they should halt until the mayor and his associates reached them, or otherwise risk the penalty.

The sergeant ran off a third time and came to John Norhampton at Fleet Bridge, where he communicated his message. At that, John Norhampton and the others, looking back the way they had come and seeing the mayor close at hand and hurrying towards them, called a halt. John Norhampton lined up his followers on either side of the street. When the mayor, with a handful of others, had come up to them they passed through the middle of them, heading towards the Carmelite friary. Then, looking back the way they had come, they saw John and the people with him still standing together assembled in the positions they had held when they passed through them, rather than following the mayor; seeing this, the mayor and all the others [with him] were astonished by it. In this fashion John Norhampton demonstrated his rebelliousness and opposition towards his mayor. Upon which, the mayor then three or four times by words and signals requested and ordered them to come and go with them; but none of them budged until first John Norhampton slowly made a move, and then the others came with him, and they followed the mayor at a distance and defiantly as far as and into the church of the Carmelites ... At which point, in the Carmelite church, the mayor ordered that everyone who belonged to the liberty of the city should withdraw with him, in order to preserve the king's peace. But some declared they would not go off with him. When the mayor left the church, heading in the direction of Fleet Bridge, it was with John Norhampton in his custody ... for the purpose of calming down the folk on either side, for many had gathered together there to take sides in the uprising against the mayor; but, God be thanked, the mayor and alderman then had the more powerful following. With much difficulty, they placed a guard around John Norhampton and his brother Robert and, careful to remain alert, made their way towards the mayor's house.

When they arrived at the end of Cordwainer Street, next to William Kyng's shop and close to the entrance to John Norhampton's house, John made a request to the mayor, saying by way of a threat, "Unless you allow me to go home to my house, I will not be held responsible for any violence that occurs hereafter." This he said in an arrogant and contemptuous manner. Upon which the mayor led John Norhampton to the mayor's house, to make his custody more secure and certain.

And they say that disturbances, rumours, and clashes were instigated and fomented on a daily basis in the city and suburbs, particularly on Thursday, 11 February, when huge gatherings took place and the windows, doors, and shops in West Cheap, Budge Row and elsewhere were closed in anticipation of an uprising ... And certain troublemakers and disturbers of the king's peace – that is, John More, Robert Cumberton, and John Constantyn – caused an uprising ...

[4. The mayoral election of 1384]

It being the case that each 12 October the senior and more important citizens of London were accustomed to proceed with the election of a new mayor, Sir Nicholas Brembre, who had been mayor over the past year, wanted to take precautions against any disputes or disturbances being stirred up during this election. Acting secretly, he concealed armed men in rooms of the Guildhall, with the intent that, should any disagreement or dispute occur at this election, they would at once appear to subdue the rebels and troublemakers; so that fear of being punished with imprisonment, at the least, would discourage them from their disruptive behaviour and heckling, and they would immediately revert to a harmonious and communal frame of mind. What more need be said? [When] the important townsmen assembled at the Guildhall to elect a new mayor, one part of the citizenry raised loud cries of "Twyford! Twyford!", disposed to have him as their mayor, while another part had other loyalties and shouted even more loudly "Brembre! Brembre!" This division of opinion having thus arisen, Sir Nicholas Brembre gave a signal and at once the armed men emerged to confront the assembly and quell those acting seditiously. When they saw this, those who were shouting "Twyford!" took to flight. Once order had been restored, those of the important citizens who remained were united in acclaiming Sir Nicholas Brembre to the mayoralty for another term. This being achieved, Brembre with his armed troops made their way along the street called Cheap, on the lookout for any disturbers of the peace who might have congregated there, and afterwards paraded through other streets for the same purpose, with the intent that if he found any such troublemakers he would make an example of them to others, by chaining them up in Newgate for a while. In this fashion was the election carried out.

Although there were those who challenged its validity, insofar as they dared, nonetheless [Brembre] remained mayor throughout the rest of the year, with the special approval of the king.

[5. Northampton squarely blamed by his enemies for the disturbances, 1385]

Memorandum that at a congregation of the mayor, alderman and several good men chosen from the wisest and most discreet men of the wards summoned and assembled in the Chamber of the Guildhall on 22 March 1385 there were present Sir Nicholas Brembre mayor, William Cheyne recorder, John Hadle, John Boseham, Robert Warbulton, Henry Vannere, John Hende, Adam de Seint Ive, William More, Nicholas Exston, John Fressh, John Rote, Roger Elys, John Fraunceis, Thomas Welford, William Staundon and Simon Wynchecombe, aldermen, and the following persons from the wards: [70 men are named, per ward].

Whereas there had long been dissension and division in the city between divers men of the same, whereby great evil and peril might arise, to the destruction and loss both of the city and of the whole realm, unless remedy were found by the aid of God, and the said mayor and aldermen and other wise men desiring peace and tranquillity, accord, unity and quiet among the people, and wishing to be informed and certified, as far as possible, as to the cause and root of the said dissension and division and how they might be ousted, and unity and accord be made and kept among the people, demand was made of every person, alderman and commoner, by the faith which he owed to God and our lord the king and the oath which he had made to the city, to declare and say openly on his conscience and as he would answer before God, sparing none, what was the cause and root of such dissension and division, whereupon all said severally that it was the life of John Norhampton, for so long as he remained alive all those that were of his covin hoped that he would return to the city and by this hope they comforted others, whereby dissension arose and would always continue so long as he lived. And further, each of them said on his conscience that the thing which would most easily engender unity and accord, and would oust all dissensions and divisions and, in their opinion, would bring the matter to a good end, would be to require and pray our said lord the king in his high and royal majesty that execution of the judgement of law given on the said John Norhampton in the Tower of London should be done, for so long as he lived the said people of his covin and lovers of his opinions would hope for his return to the city as aforesaid, which would be to the utter confusion and destruction of the city, which God forbid. And upon this, with one accord, it was agreed that it would be well for the mayor to take with him certain aldermen and commoners, such as seemed to him good, and to approach our lord the king, petitioning him in the manner and form aforesaid.

And also because the mayor and commoners were advised that for safeguarding of the city and suburbs against any peril that might arise, it would be necessary that a good ditch and a pale above it should be made around all the suburbs of the city for its defence in case need should arise, which God forbid, and because it would take too long to settle the question as to how and in what manner it should be done, since many matters and arguments would be raised among so many men and peradventure no conclusion would be made, it was agreed by everyone that the mayor and aldermen on the morrow should choose from among themselves twelve aldermen and twelve commoners of the most sufficient and discreet men in the city to ordain and treat by what means and how the said matter should be brought into effect, and in what manner the costs which would be needed might be levied, and to do all other things which appertained to the said matter.

[6. Accusations against Thomas Austin, of complicity in Northampton's cause]

First, the essence of the accusation or appeal [...]

To his worship the mayor of London: please be informed that Thomas Austyn is, and has been, one of the principal supporters of the treason against our liege lord the king; that is, in aiding and abetting John Norhampton and those holding the same views regarding the overthrow of the city of London, and regarding making a false complaint to the Duke of Lancaster that he [i.e. Northampton] was unjustly convicted before the king.

One instance of this is that Thomas Austyn was always ready to contribute to John Norhampton's cause or, personally and with his men, to stand alongside John Norhampton and his supporters against the king, insofar as he was able and dared.

Another instance is that, during Sir Nicholas Brembre's mayoralty, on every occasion that Thomas Austyn was given advance warning by the mayor to [\[join in the\]](#) ride to meet the king, or to participate in maintaining the peace, then Thomas Austyn was scornful and resisted the summonses, and either kept out of the way or had to go out of town on an errand.

Another instance is that two days before the time of Sir Nicholas Brembre's second election, Thomas distributed his principal goods by night to various places, for what purpose we never knew.

Another instance is that Thomas instructed all his men that none should absent themselves from his house on the following morning, at which time they would see men heading toward the Guildhall, but none returning. In the privacy of his own property, Thomas Austin armed himself from head to foot, except for his helmet, and armed the 15 or 16 men who were at hand; in anticipation that if Sir Nicholas Brembre, then mayor, took possession of the Guildhall, they (together with other companies that they expected to be there in defiance of the king's peace) would attack him, planning to have completely destroyed those who were in the right. In addition, his brother Roger Austyn went to and fro between [\[Thomas' group and the others\]](#), to keep them informed about what was to be attempted at the election of Brembre. Upon which Thomas Austin sent [\[a message\]](#) to Wigmours, where an illegal common council was held that night by the supporters of John Norhampton, that they should be ready to pursue their aims. The following morning, at the time of the election of Brembre as mayor, he went out into Cheapside and then, seeing the strength [\[of the opposing forces\]](#), Thomas Austyn threw off his armour and declared "All we have been trying to achieve is lost!" He quietly instructed his men to return to his shop and open it, as if nothing had happened; and so they did.

Also, another instance is that on the same day his servant, Hochon of Liverpool, was keeping watch from his room when along came Hugh Fastolf and urinated against the wall of St. Laurence's church.

Hochon of Liverpool said, "There's one of those thieves," and continued, "Watch how I nail him to the wall with an arrow." Then he pulled back on his bowstring with the intent of killing him and I, John Hore, said, "Leave it out, you'll do for us all." And so it was stopped.

Another instance is that Thomas Austyn saw that other dishonest men were punished for their lies and was afraid that his deceit would be revealed. So soon after he sent to his man overseas, telling him not to mark his wares with his own [\[merchant's\]](#) mark, so that it might be arrested upon arrival in England; he abandoned his true mark and took this mark [\[illustration\]](#). This was done for fear that his dishonesty might be revealed.

Another instance is that Thomas Austyn has said on several occasions, with forethought, that things would never be well in England while this king were king.

Another instance is that on several occasions, in his presence, his wife has said that certainly the king was never the [\[Black\]](#) Prince's son; she also said that his mother was never any more than a whore, through and through. Thomas never once showed any inclination to tell her to hold her tongue, but indulged her malice.

And another instance is that when Thomas Austyn realized that the Duke could not get his way with our liege lord, he said, "There is nothing for it now, but that someone arranges for two men to run Brembre through and skedaddle."

Also, another instance is that when the Duke was staying at Hertford while there was a quarrel between him and our liege lord, he [\[i.e. Austin\]](#) sent me, John Banham, to Hertford as quick as I could, so that I could find out when he intended to come to London and whether he would come in strength or not. The man from whom I, John Banham, should have learned this was not there, but was out delivering a message from the Duke.

Also, another instance is that on the same day as the election Thomas Austyn told me, John Banham, to go into Cheapside and spy if I could see any companies heading for the Guildhall – that is, goldsmiths, tailors, cordwainers – and come home and tell him.

Another instance is that on various occasions Thomas Austyn has said that things would never be right until the lying whores who controlled our liege lord the king &150; namely, Brembre – were hung.

Another instance is that four days before the same election took place, Thomas Austyn [\[said\]](#) to a Kidderminster man: "Right now, the mayor imagines he won't face much opposition on that day. Well, he'll have more than a thousand against him, so let him enjoy himself while he can."

Another instance is that he has stolen a thousand pounds from our liege lord the king.

Another instance is that on several occasions he said he didn't care who was king, so long as he were left in peace.

Another instance is that while Norhampton's brother was in prison, all that he could find out came by word of mouth through me, John Banham. And I, John Banham, stand by [\[these accusations, affirming\]](#) that they are honest and truthful, without deceit or evil motive.

As regards the essence of any of these indictments, we do not have nor have we sought any other indictment regarding persons named in the king's writ, nor anyone else, other than on the articles and accusations in the document specified above; from which inquisition, recently held before Nicholas Exton mayor of the city of London, William More and William Staundon then sheriffs, and John Charneye the city coroner, we attach for you the tenor of the indictment, as follows:

Inquisition taken at the Guildhall of London on 16 September 1387, before Nicholas Exton mayor of the city of London, William More and William Staundon sheriffs, and John Charneye coroner of that city, by the oath of reputable and law-abiding men of the city, to enquire into articles and accusations contained and specified in the aforesaid document. The inquisition jurors present under their oath, saying that everything contained in the document is true, except the article stating that "he has stolen a thousand pounds from our liege lord the king." And that Thomas Austyn is guilty of all the other articles and accusations contained and specified in the document, except that in which it claims that Thomas Austyn stole a thousand pounds from the king. Those jurors say that they know nothing about that, but that Thomas at various times concealed [his obligation to pay] the king's customs and withheld them, that is the subsidies on cloth, linen, canvas and other of his merchandize imported into the city of London, to the value of one hundred and twenty-five pounds. The jurors say that all other offences contained in the document were committed mostly prior to the election of Sir Nicholas Brembre as mayor of the city of London – that is, before 13 October 1384 – and from there up to about 1 May following; they cannot discover among themselves that anything happened in these regards afterwards. But, the jurors say, it is their understanding that Thomas Austyn has continued up to the present to hold in his heart these evil intentions towards the city government.

We, William Venour and Hugh Fastolf, sheriffs of London, have no other indictments, appeals or accusations such as are mentioned in the writ, that were in any way received or tried during the time that we have been sheriffs of the city.

Further to this, I Nicholas Exton, mayor, am advising you that a certain extremely serious accusation was made before me and the former sheriffs, William More and William Staundon, against Roger Austyn in regard to the person of the king. Into which we have not dared enquire without special orders from the king; nor are we prepared to report on it in writing or orally, except in private. The king is fully informed on this matter.

[7. Burning of the documentary evidence of reforms, 1387]

Be it remembered, that on the Saturday next after the Feast of St. Gregory [12 March], in the 10th year etc., by precept of Nicholas Extone, the then Mayor, a Common Council of the City of London was summoned, as well of those chosen for the Common Council by each Ward of the said city, as of other the more reputable and more substantial men of the same; who assembled in such great numbers, that the Upper Chamber would not hold them; wherefore, they removed to the Guildhall below, and the Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs, being seated there in the place for the Husting assigned, because that by reason of certain new oaths of the officers of the said city, and certain new ordinances, repugnant to the old and approved customs of the same, which were written down in a certain quire, or book, called "Jubile", great controversies, dissensions, and disputes were often caused among the citizens; and that therefore it had oftentimes been asked in divers Common Councils of the said city that the said quire, or book, should be burnt; – it was now, by assent of the said Mayor and Aldermen, and the whole of the Common Council, and of the other reputable men aforesaid, agreed and adjudged, that the said quire, or book, should be burnt on that same day in the place without the Guildhall.

Whereas many dissensions, quarrels, and false reports have prevailed in the city of London, as between trade and trade, person and person, because of divers controversies lately moved between Nicholas Brembre, Knight, and John Norhampton, of late Mayors of the same city, who were men of great power and estate, and had many friendships and friends within the same; to the great peril of the same city, and, maybe, of all the realm; to the displeasure also of God, and of every good man: and by reason thereof, if some remedy, with the Almighty aid, be not applied thereunto, destruction and annihilation to the said city may readily ensue, and peril and damage to all the realm, – the which may God avert; – therefore, by assent of Adam Bamme, the Mayor, and the Aldermen of the said city, considering the mischief and great damage that from this cause has ensued, and desiring to maintain the peace of our Lord the King, and of all the realm; for the common profit, they have ordained and established, that no man, great or small, or whatsoever estate or condition he be, shall speak from henceforth, or agitate upon any of the opinions, as to either of them, the said Nicholas and John, or shall by sign, or in any other manner, shew that such person is of the one opinion or the other. But let the folks of the same city be of one accord in good love, without speaking, any person to another, on the said matter, in manner of reproof or of hatred; on pain, if any one shall speak or do against any of the points aforesaid, of imprisonment in Newgate for a year and a day, without redemption; and of being subject to other penalty and ordinance in the Guildhall for the like cause made and ordained.

DISCUSSION

The setting and the principal characters | The contest | Thomas Usk
The trial | The aftermath | An assessment

The political unrest in London during the 1370s and '80s has been characterized in various ways: as a struggle between poor and rich; as a class conflict of artisans and merchants; and as factionalism between different mercantile interests, whether victuallers versus non-victuallers or simply those in power against those wanting power. There is some measure of truth in all of these interpretations. The complexity of the situation and of the motivations of the people involved does not admit of a simple explanation. Party politics, in terms of a contest for power between relatively well-defined groups with variant and sometimes conflicting interests, appears to have been more developed in London than in most English towns, simply because socio-economic structure in London was more complex and more differentiated. Furthermore, London was inevitably caught up to some degree to the political rivalries and conflicts occurring at the national level, and these too complicate the local situation.

At the same time, we should not ignore the importance, in the timing of such political conflicts, of "the man of the moment": that is, the emergence of a determined individual willing and able – regardless of whether for ideological or selfish reasons – to lead a movement seeking political change. John Northampton was "essentially leader of that party in London which wished to break down the monopoly of power possessed by the merchant capitalists both of the victualling and the non-victualling misteries" [Bird, op.cit., 81] although by making the victuallers and especially the fishmongers his particular targets, he was initially able to win support from non-victualling crafts, notably his own craft, the drapers, the mercers, and also the goldsmiths, who were jealous of the power of other guilds.

The setting and the principal characters

This was by no means the first such division to engender constitutional reform and political conflict in London. At the earlier end of the fourteenth century the less prominent guilds, both of crafts and victuallers, were asserting themselves more strongly, their members taking up citizenship in greater numbers, and so creating an enfranchised power-base in search of constitutional changes that would increase the representation of their interests in city government – changes that included making the guilds, rather than the aldermannic wards, the basic unit of government. In resisting this development, the patriciate laid complaints of conspiracies, illegal meetings, heckling and other methods to unduly influence elections, and disturbances of the peace; but the guilds' real tactic seems simply to have been to pack communal assemblies with their members and influence matters through voting power. At this period the ruling class was itself weakened by factionalism, and some of the factions were prepared to placate popular feeling with cautious reforms.

This only whetted the appetite, however, and in 1311, with the local power-struggle going on against the backdrop of a national contest (distracting the monarchy, while also making the parties inclined to curry favour with the Londoners), a set of constitutional reforms were put in place. Among other things, they made all important officers subject to popular election, and on an annual basis; and they enforced greater fiscal accountability, through comptrollers and auditors. Yet the craft guilds' attempt to dominate city government made other elements of the community nervous, furnishing the support to allow the aldermannic elite to reassert itself and restore the previous constitution. This set the scene for a contest between the reactionaries and the victualling interests, led by the fishmongers. It culminated in a forceful expression of community authority in 1319, producing fresh constitutional reform that has been described as "the highest peak of achievement that a popular movement ever attained in medieval London," despite the fact that the new provisions were dampened or ignored in the years that followed, as the national power-struggle encouraged greater division and factionalism in London.

These events are not of direct consequence to the contest for power between the parties of John Northampton and Nicholas Brembre, but to some extent they show parallels. Such waters are muddied, however, by the characters of the principals in the affair, particularly that of Northampton. At the close of Edward III's reign, London's society, economy and government was dominated by a small number of guilds – mercers, grocers, fishmongers, vintners, and goldsmiths – whose line of work naturally brought successful practitioners considerable wealth and real estate, and thereby influence. These were the groups who supplied most of the city's mayors and aldermen, and who have been characterized as a capitalist elite, of which Brembre was one of the wealthiest members.

A merchant heavily but not exclusively involved in the wool trade, he like others who made a successful career in London (e.g. Whittington), had no established city family on which to rely. However, he married one of the heiresses of wealthy city vintner John Stodeye (mayor 1357/58), an alliance that added to his already extensive city real estate when his father-in-law died in 1376. Through marriage, business, and property-holding, he was associated with other leading or up-and-coming Londoners, such as William Walworth and John Philpot. Brembre appears to have entered the grocers' gild around the time it was reorganizing itself as the Company of Grocers, in 1372, and Philpot shortly after. It may have been the expanding influence of the company that resulted in Brembre and Philpot both being elected both as aldermen and sheriffs in September 1372.

Compared to Brembre, John Northampton was of relatively modest means and associations. He and his family were involved with the cloth and leather-working crafts; his own gild, the drapers, was during the late 1360s and '70s, losing ground to the grocers, in terms of access to positions in city government. Yet he and his brothers were not the kind of men to submit to the authority of others, if we may judge from what are scattered pieces of evidence. The cause they appear to have espoused was opposition to the king's policy of war with France, in regard to its side-effects: turning over a large share of control of the wool trade to foreign merchants, who counter-balanced this by importing larger amounts of foreign products, such as cloth, that hurt the trade of Londoners. The drapers' underlying aim, it has been suggested, was to increase their numbers among the aldermen, thereby influencing city policies related to controlling the local market for English cloth and their rivals in that trade, the fullers and dyers. In 1368 the king temporarily restored the citizens' monopoly of the retail trade in London, abolished by the Statute of York in 1351. But the restoration was in regard to victuals, and cloth, leather, and goods sold by avoirdupois were excluded; this may have been what fostered an alliance of interests among the drapers, skimmers, mercers, and to an extent the grocers.

Telltale signs of the coming storm can be seen years in advance. John Northampton had been bound over to keep the peace in 1365, in the context of some personal quarrel. In 1369 he and John More, along with other drapers and mercers, were required to put up bonds to guarantee they would not initiate any violence or hold assemblies; this may have been prompted by an attack on foreign merchants. In 1371 the renewal of taxation to support the war led to resistance to tax-collection by Northampton's brother William, who himself had already run into trouble with city authorities in 1365, when arrested for trade abuses; he foolishly started a brawl outside the mayor's house and was again arrested. That same year, after the king had lectured the mayor and aldermen about keeping the peace in London, John Northampton, John More, and William Essex were among a group of twelve men arrested and imprisoned for a few months, being released upon providing assurances that they would make no more assemblies and would behave peaceably. It appears as though a party intent on agitation was already forming around Northampton. In the early 1370s, Northampton and Essex were members of a commission investigating cases involving usurious loans made by foreign merchants.

Although his commercial activities have left only a few traces and do not come close to the level of activity of Brembre's, John Northampton was fairly prosperous and likely to have been one of the leading members of his craft guild; certainly the men who were his principal supporters in the coming political struggle were essentially those who served as masters of the smaller craft guilds; such men wanted to rise in London society and were in a position to harness the underlying discontent among the crafts. Much of his landed property came, however, through his second marriage, at some point in the early 1370s, to a co-heiress of the Preston family. His and his wife's properties were concentrated in Dowgate and Cordwainer Street Wards, the latter being where his drapery business was located. The grocers were also based in Cordwainer Ward and Northampton's wife's grandfather, John de Preston, had been an important corder – a group that had a long-standing working relationship with the grocers.

The contest

Northampton's property in Cordwainer Ward gave him both the financial qualifications and local influence that made him a potential choice for alderman. With perhaps the sponsorship, or at least the acquiescence, of the grocers influential in that ward, Northampton was elected its alderman in 1375. The following year he was one of a group, which included several of his subsequent followers, who advised the mayor to summon an assembly to deal with charges that the city government had been run for some years in an oppressive and self-interested manner – this was fallout from the 'Good' Parliament's purge in mid-1376 of persons influential at the royal court, in the circle surrounding John of Gaunt, and including London vintner and financier Richard Lyons and two other aldermen. Other London victuallers among the aldermen, including Brembre, may have been under suspicion too, as they absented themselves from the assembly that had been summoned. Although there is no direct evidence Northampton was leading a specific party at this point, his enemies subsequently accused him of being behind the constitutional reforms of that came out of the assembly of 1 August 1376.

Certainly those reforms headed in the direction that Northampton wanted: to reduce and eventually break the power of the aldermen, the city's most powerful officials who represented the interests of the city capitalists. One reform subjected the posts of aldermen to annual election, no-one being eligible for re-election to the same position until a year's interval. This had been one of the reforms of 1319, confirmed by royal charter, but was ignored once the mercantile patriciate regained power. It was in effect for a few years after 1376, but the stipulation about the interval was abolished in 1384, and annual election in 1394. Further changes in 1376 transferred the election of the common council from the wards to the craft guilds, made the council a fixed body that had to be consulted at least twice a quarter, and required that no measures put forward by mayor and aldermen could become a local by-law unless approved by the majority of the common councillors. It was from this group, rather than from the aldermen, that Northampton was expecting to find his main support for his broader aims of unseating the capitalists from power, for a ward-elected council likely made the choice of members more susceptible to aldermannic influence. However, the reform seems to have had little impact on the composition of the council, forcing Northampton to take other measures to stack the council when he himself became mayor. Nor did annual election impact greatly on the composition of the court of aldermen, which continued to be dominated by grocers and fishmongers. Another reform made the common council the agency for electing mayor and sheriffs, rather than electors chosen by mayor and aldermen. These changes in electoral procedures were also reversed in 1384.

Only twelve of the twenty-four aldermen gave their assent to these reforms, and six of those were grocers; these assenters perhaps felt it better to acquiesce in the reforms than provoke a struggle that might bring the king's intervention – a prospect highly feared by the aldermen, even though Edward III had limited the circumstances under which the monarchy would seize the city liberties into its own hands. The reforms may have been assisted by indirect support from John of Gaunt, who had similar underlying interests to Northampton's; this would help explain why Northampton later turned (unsuccessfully) to Gaunt for aid in crucial moments. Brembre, Philpot and Walworth were among those who were absent from the proceedings; they presumably represented a more militant viewpoint, but not yet inclined to open resistance. A committee of eight was formed to review the city ordinances; it included Northampton and several of his known supporters. The constitutional reforms, along with re-written oaths of office which probably emphasised the accountability of officials to the community, were embodied in a new edition of the city customal, selecting for inclusion only those earlier ordinances considered good by those now in power. It was called the Jubilee Book.

The jubilation of the reformers was short-lived. In 1377 Brembre, Walworth and Philpot came to the fore as the leaders of the capitalist party and re-united it in the face of Gaunt's efforts to extend the authority of the marshalsea court into the city. They proposed to support the young Richard II (with money) against Gaunt's influence. They were able to have the mayor then in office deposed and replaced by Brembre; and a regulation, agreed to by a special common council elected only by a select number of the more important guilds, provided that any common councillor removed from office for good cause could never be re-elected or serve as alderman. The same year Northampton lost his aldermanry, and his supporters on the common council were deposed on the charge of betraying city secrets and not supporting the resistance to marshalsea jurisdiction.

His party crippled and Gaunt's influence superseded by the courtiers surrounding Richard II, Northampton began to rebuild. He decided to extend his powerbase into Dowgate Ward, where his wife's grandfather, John de Preston, had once been alderman for an eighteen-year stretch. An intensive period of buying property in that ward in 1381 and 1382, including property owned by the man who had succeeded Preston as alderman, was followed by Northampton's election as alderman in March 1382.

But by that time he had already secured the mayoralty at the election of October 1381. How he managed this is not clear, but he evidently found support from some quarters and, with the city still recuperating from the effects of the Peasants' Revolt and probably not relishing any internal disputes that might excite the populace, the capitalists appear to have acquiesced in his election. Perhaps the grocers were still interested in using Northampton's supposed influence with Gaunt. As yet they had no inkling of the revolution he was contemplating.

The policies Northampton pursued at first were not such as to cause great alarm among the capitalist party. His various actions, taken together, have been described as a campaign against immorality: reiterating earlier ordinances regulating the dress of prostitutes; establishing punishments for prostitutes, adulterers, and lascivious priests; and restricting the amounts of money to be given as offerings at mass, baptism, or weddings (it being claimed that the wealthy, by offering large sums, had established expectations that the poor could not meet). He also moved, in February 1382, to have revoked the 1377 ban from office on his supporters; it was immediately after the revocation that John More was made an alderman. Northampton's principal goal of undermining and displacing the existing London elite began in the early summer. He attacked the trade monopoly of the fishmongers; since the monopoly was a source of general resentment in the city, it was not going to arouse widespread opposition among the elite. This policy was pursued by the city's parliamentary representatives – all Northampton supporters – in October; when the fishmongers objected, More discredited them by accusing two of their number of complicity with the rebels of 1381. The popularity of this attack on the fishmongers may have been what enabled him to obtain from the king letters recommending Northampton's re-election that same month.

But in his second year of office, the broadening of his efforts to undermine the power-base of the capitalists – beginning by forcing Philpot out of aldermannic office – made it evident to them that they had to have him removed from the mayoralty. The grocers finally were prepared to join forces with the fishmongers in this; Brembre led the way. Northampton was unable to get any support from the king or Gaunt that might have countered this. With the success of the capitalists' resurgence, through Brembre's election, Northampton felt forced to more drastic measures to ensure what he had achieved was not overthrown – measures, described in the documents above, extreme enough to stimulate at least one key defection from his party. His resentment immediately after the election was palpable, and although he soon after made a show of peace and reconciliation with Brembre, this was just to win himself a little time in which to gather his thoughts. For a man with the extreme views of John Northampton, there really was no middle ground. He was determined and inflexible.

It is not clear what Northampton's intent was with the protest march of 7 February 1384. If to provoke a showdown with the mayor, then it is strange he surrendered himself at the crucial moment. Perhaps he was simply trying to demonstrate his level of support in the city. Or perhaps he had some idea of marching well beyond Fleet, to Westminster, to put his case to the king – a ploy dangerous and unlikely of success, with the events of 1381 still resonating. Northampton may simply have been uncertain how to proceed, now that Lancaster had refused to support him, and perhaps hoped to stir up enough popular support to intimidate Brembre into giving way – another slim hope, given Brembre's strength of character.

Thomas Usk

At this point, Thomas Usk becomes a pivotal player in events, providing a tool to assist Brembre in acting against Northampton. A Londoner by birth, the son of a craftsman, Usk is little in evidence before the 1380s. He had been trained as a scribe, a training that would have involved acquiring some understanding of the law. It is possible that Usk was recruited late in the day, well after Northampton had come to power, although the sources are not so explicit as to rule out Usk having done work for Northampton at an earlier period. When subsequently trying to dissociate himself from the guilt of Northampton and his lieutenants, he portrays his role as strictly that of employee: clerk, messenger, publicist, perhaps even legal advisor. As an employee, it does not follow that he espoused the political philosophy of Northampton, any more than Cratchit had the same outlook on life as Scrooge. However, upon taking up the mayoralty, Northampton realized he could not rely on the city bureaucrats, whose loyalties lay with those they had been accustomed to serve. He may have found a sympathiser in one of the clerks of the bureaucracy, John Marchaunt, but more likely used Marchaunt for official documentation, and for that relating to his behind-scenes machinations made use of private sector secretaries.

If Northampton felt he could trust Usk – and trust him with some fairly important tasks – he must have believed Usk was a sympathiser with his aims. Usk himself admitted to being sufficiently comfortable with his role in Northampton's circle, involving himself in governmental policies that he believed initially at least would be good for the community, that he did not care if this incurred him the enmity of the aldermannic class. But later, he claimed, he came to see Northampton's aims in a different light.

Interestingly, Usk is seen in 1376 in the role of attorney successfully suing someone who had assaulted John Bere, one of Northampton's more prominent and unwavering supporters. Although we cannot safely draw conclusions from such isolated evidence, it may be Usk had some peripheral involvement with the Northampton faction prior to 1383; Northampton must have had some reason to select and place his trust in Usk.

Usk's change of heart came while he was suffering imprisonment, a traumatic experience especially for someone of learning and artistic sensibility. Following Northampton's arrest, his lieutenants continued to agitate, in the hopes of obtaining his release or, if necessary, rescuing him by force. More and Norbury were therefore also arrested; Essex had already gone into hiding, perhaps abroad. Usk himself was under arrest by early August 1384. Whether through pressure from Brembre's people, as Usk himself later claimed, or concern about his future, or out of genuine distaste for what Northampton's movement had become, Usk decided to make a confession. Brembre had Usk transferred to his own house, a less uncomfortable form of detention. Usk composed the appeal (set of accusations) given above and, as the process of law required, delivered it to the coroner.

This is not the only example of Usk's writing that has come down to us. He is in fact better known as the author of The Testament of Love, a work that survives to us only in a sixteenth-century rewrite and was for some centuries mistakenly attributed to Chaucer. The idiosyncratic work has elements of philosophy and allegory, touches on a range of subjects, and was in part an apologia for his seeming betrayal of Northampton and a consolation for the hatred this brought him. It reveals a familiarity – sometimes apparently secondhand – with the writings of some key Christian philosophers, such as Boethius and St. Augustine, as well as those of his far better-known contemporaries, Chaucer and Gower. It is believed to have been written between the time of Northampton's fall and Usk's own, probably closer to the former event. Since Usk places the narrator in prison, it is possible he conceived the work during his imprisonment following Northampton's arrest – an imprisonment that caused him to be resentful, for there he felt abandoned by his allies, and that they had used rather than valued him. But the main purpose of the work seems to be to justify his confession and portray himself as a man of integrity, who could be trusted with further positions of responsibility; the work was probably written following Northampton's conviction, when neither faction had confidence in him. A portion of his text presents his own perspective on the affair, reiterating positions taken in his appeal against Northampton, and also reflecting conventional political philosophies of that time; whether those philosophies were always his or represent a realignment (or even brainwashing) as the result of his imprisonment, cannot be said.

Given the evidently autobiographical nature of parts of his text, but bearing in mind that Usk tends to talk in general terms rather than specifics (Northampton not being mentioned by name), that Testament of Love is couched in a form that is literary rather than historical, and that it was written after his transfer of loyalties and the collapse of the party he originally supported, we are offered what may be some insights into his motivations. He was evidently deeply perturbed by the fact that his former allies who previously (apparently in his role of messenger) had commended him as one to be believed, now condemned him as a liar and a betrayer of his master, while those who had branded him as a villain subsequently relied on portraying him as credible. He is therefore at pains to defend his integrity as one dedicated to the truth.

Usk explains his involvement with Northampton as commitment to what he had initially believed a meritorious cause, but observes that "common profit in the community does not obtain unless peace and tranquility through just governance proceed from that profit." Consequently his conscience later told him he had deluded himself, that Northampton was motivated by malice and envy, and that the cause he was aiding would produce not benefit to the community, but tyranny. Despite this change of heart, those he had opposed ("the mighty senators") imprisoned him and pressured him, with threats of life imprisonment or execution, to make a confession that would lead to the defeat of Northampton. He persuaded himself therefore that it was his duty to make a statement in order to rescue the community – "the commonalty being above all things else what I am bound to maintain and defend" – from the risk of a disruption of peace, the attribute "most necessary to commonalties and cities."

This statement begins with a more literary rendering of several of the points covered in his appeal:

First, those persons who had induced me to serve their purposes, I not knowing the secret intent of their meaning, drew also the feeble-witted people, who have no insight of governmental prudence, to clamor and cry out on matters that they themselves directed; and under the pretence of the common advantage, they emboldened the ruled to take on the actions of the rulers, and they also directed people innocent of political cunning to cry after things which 'may not,' they said, 'stand unless we serve as the executors of those matters, and unless authority of execution is handed over to us by common election. And that must come by strength of your maintenance, for we, expelled from such degree of power, the oppressiveness of these old hinderers shall again rise up and put you in subjection such that you will complain in endless woe. The government,' they said, 'of your city, left in the hands of extortionate citizens, shall bring in pestilence and destruction to you, good men; and therefore, let us have the common administration of government to lessen such evils. Also,' they said, 'it is proper to commend the good and punish the guilty as they deserve. There are many citizens who are afraid of actions that will be taken, because the extortions they have committed are continually against these purposes and all other good intentions.'

Usk goes on to describe the failed attempt by Northampton and his associates to win at all costs the election of 1383, followed by the effort to have the election annulled, leading in due course to their trial before the king.

The trial

It seems to have been Northampton himself who sought to have his case heard by the king, but this may well have suited Brembre, who seems to have aimed to have Northampton tried for treason or sedition, by emphasising the conspiratorial character of the Northampton faction and its intent to provoke social disorder; a conviction for treason would allow for Northampton's execution. Usk's appeal was invaluable in this, in that it was tantamount to the confession/accusation of an approver: a convicted criminal who turned king's evidence on his fellows and validated his accusations by acknowledging his own complicity. The trial took place at Reading in mid-August. Usk's appeal was presented and apparently accepted as if that of an approver, even though Usk had not himself been convicted or even charged. In Testament of Love Usk claims that, true to approver's tradition, he had offered to prove his accusations through combat, but that the accused disdained that offer, preferring to confess and throw themselves on the mercy of the court. However, this was part of Usk's effort to assert the truthfulness of his accusations against Northampton. Independent evidence indicates rather that Northampton, after denying Usk's charges, offered to put his fate in the hands of God via a judicial combat. The court was not interested in the outdated tradition of combat, which was also repugnant to London custom; nor was it in Brembre's interests to have matters decided in that way. Usk was shuffled off, and the king – provoked by Northampton's lack of deference, particularly his demand to have Gaunt present to speak for him – sentenced Northampton to be hung. At the queen's intercession, this was commuted to life imprisonment. Both he and Usk were returned to custody.

Northampton was able to raise jurisdictional uncertainties and claim a new trial, which took place in London before justices of the King's Bench in September. Brembre decided on a different tack, not involving Usk directly but making use of his confession. An inquisition was held in St. Mary-le-Bow parish to pronounce on the evidence against Northampton. It may have been one of several inquisitions, for it was not unusual in the case of serious offences to widen the range of public opinion consulted, by holding multiple inquisitions; an example is mentioned above regarding the inquisitions into citizens' involvement in the Peasants' Revolt, of which only the findings most suitable to the results desired by those in power were then forwarded to a court which had the authority to convict and punish the offenders. The findings of the St. Mary-le-Bow jury are so similar in content and structure as to be clearly an edited version of Usk's script, in which the terminology of the charges is now recast as inquisition jury presentments, omitting the personalized elements – Usk's own opinions or readings of situations – altering Usk's personal admissions of complicity into simply the inclusion of his name among the list of offenders, and adding some fine details and a couple of additional, minor charges. Of these new charges, the matter of influencing the choice of the parliamentary representatives does not seem anything especially beyond normal political machinations; similarly, the charge that More contemplated accusing Brembre of supporting Farndon, although not implausible, appears equally insubstantial.

We should not think of the inquisition presentments as a balanced statement of evidence presented by hostile and friendly "witnesses" but rather as a list of charges against the accused whose validity the jury, by reiterating, was affirming. Usk's appeal was clearly the basis for the charges on which this jury was asked to pronounce; we see, for example, the same political perspective of the patriciate reflected, characterizing the players in the piece as the "good men" who have been injured, the "wicked" conspirators of the Northampton party, and the lower class of townsmen who were not fit to have a say in government. The jury's restatement of the charges emerged again in 1388, along with other inquisition findings on the events of the early 1380s, when Northampton's followers were seeking pardon or compensation for convictions or oppressions suffered at the hands of Brembre. The text was again altered, further depersonalizing it; this is the version given above from the Coram Rege roll.

The aftermath

At the trial in London Northampton was again convicted. The city authorities urged his execution. Along with More and Norbury he was imprisoned for a while; but, through the intercession either of Gaunt or the chancellor, Michael de la Pole, this was commuted to a sentence of exile from London. Due to the objections of the Brembre party, Northampton was not allowed to come any closer to the city than 100 miles; in 1386, Gaunt obtained a reduction of this to 80 miles. After Gaunt's return in 1390 from his Spanish adventure his influence was sufficient to obtain a pardon for the trio. Northampton returned to the city, but almost everything he had tried to achieve had been dismantled and the old patriciate was even more strongly entrenched in power than ever.

Removal of the leaders did not immediately quell the struggle between the factions; underlying grievances continued to bubble to the surface for several years. Just two months after his election, Brembre found it necessary to prohibit any public assemblies and encourage citizens' arrests of anyone found engaging in such gatherings. As he approached the next election, a sign of his continued anxiety are the ordinances reiterating the illegality of conspiratorial gatherings, forbidding any citizen from bringing a petition before parliament on the subject of the government of the city, and restricting attendance at the election to the "senior, good and important men" of the city. He evidently anticipated opposition at the election to his own plans of having himself re-elected. Among the accounts we have of that election is the one given above, in a continuation of the chronicle of Ralph Higden (which originally went up to 1327); of several continuators, including Higden himself, the writer of the events from 1383 is believed to have been monk of Westminster abbey – the strong interest in London affairs being one of the arguments for this. As a member of a community in which conformity, harmony and obedience was expected, the monk was naturally more sympathetic to Brembre than to Northampton.

To contest the 1384 mayoral election, the Northampton party found a figurehead in goldsmith Nicholas Twyford; although not really a supporter of Northampton, Twyford had been one of the aldermen acquiescing in the constitutional reforms of 1376, and was an enemy of Brembre for his own reasons. The crafts that had supported Northampton turned out in force on election day, some of them armed, to exert influence on behalf of Twyford. Brembre, not foolish enough to rely on the public proclamation made just before election day forbidding anyone to bear arms or armour or to come to the election unless specifically summoned, was ready for them. He had brought in a force of his own, some probably tenants of his estates outside London, had equipped them with arms he had smuggled into the Guildhall, and had posted his men both there and in ambush along Cheapside; when the pro-Twyford demonstrators gathered at the Guildhall, they were dispersed by an aggressive charge of Brembre's men, and sent fleeing home. Brembre was re-elected, as he was again in 1385, and at the following two elections his close supporter, Nicholas Exton, followed him in office; they ensured that members of their faction held other key offices. After the collapse of that party's fortunes, however, Twyford won the mayoralty in 1388 as a moderate candidate, yet one whose sympathies by now lay more with the patriciate's constitutional views.

Throughout his period in power, Brembre continued to take legal action against individual supporters of the Northampton faction, on any pretext he could find, leading to imprisonments and even executions. He is likely behind the further petition in 1385 to have Northampton executed, on grounds of the continued disruptions occurring in the city.

Opportunities were also taken by others to settle personal scores by accusing their enemies of affiliation with the Northampton faction. The example given above is a set of accusations made, in early September 1387, against mercer Thomas Austin by his former apprentice John Banham, backed by fellow apprentice John Hore. Whether any of these accusations, which are reminiscent in type to those penned by Usk, have substance is uncertain. Although Austin was a member of the mercer's guild that backed Northampton, and as such he sat on the common council during Northampton's first mayoralty, his name is not among the sometimes long lists of those singled out for mention as Northampton supporters; and, in the late '80s when the patriciate was allowing access to power by others than Brembre factionalists, he was made common councillor, alderman, and sheriff in quick succession. This suggests he was a moderate – quite different from the picture painted by Banham. Furthermore, the motivation for the accusations was less than public-spirited: earlier in the year Banham was sued by Austin to account for revenues from merchandize he had sold on Austin's behalf from 1382 to 1385, and was imprisoned in consequence of the charge (and later convicted in part). The counter-accusations may be seen as an attempt to discredit Austin and pre-empt his suit. Although there is no smoke without fire, some of those accusations are so vague, circumstantial, or difficult to corroborate, that a jury should have had a hard time pronouncing with confidence on them.

Nonetheless, in the highly-charged political atmosphere, the accusations were credible enough and were designed to arouse fear in those then in power. They responded by arresting Thomas, his wife, his brother Roger, and Hochon (elsewhere called Hugh), and putting together a jury to rubber-stamp the charges. It is not impossible that the Austins – perhaps Roger in particular – were already suspect and the Brembre party had been looking for an opportunity to act against them; Banham's predicament could have provided that opportunity, to find another tool to be used as Usk had been, to bring treason charges. Most likely the accusations are a mix of truths, exaggerations, and fabrications, but they nonetheless illustrate the kind of attitudes and behaviours that were expected in the context of the factional animosities of the time. They also show how the focus of grievances was on the key personalities, rather than on underlying issues of governance. Furthermore they reflect the resentment towards the way in which power struggles at the national level were intertwined with those internal to London. The document translated here is a response to a demand by Chancery for copies of all the evidence; the ensuing review of the case by Chancery resulted in the release of Thomas and the others in February 1388. The shift in political power at the national level may have been responsible for the London authorities' decision not to pursue the matter further.

Brembre's vacation of the mayoralty in 1386 was taken as an opportunity by several of the non-victualling guilds to complain to parliament about his behaviour while he was in office. The mercers, for example, began their petition with a description of how Brembre had used force to win the 1383 election, and continued by telling how he persecuted his enemies thereafter, how he manipulated the 1384 elections first by summoning only his supporters to vote, and then violently intimidated any others who came to the Guildhall; after which he continued to bring false charges (the mercers claimed) against their members. The petition also dwells on Brembre's close relationship with Richard II, which he was able to use to prevent his enemies appealing to the king.

In 1387 the cordwainers complained to parliament about the burning of the Jubilee Book; later that year Exton charged them under the terms of Brembre's prohibition of assemblies. That same year Lord de la Zouche was lobbying at court for a pardon for Northampton, prompting Exton's administration to send him a blunt letter advising him to mind his own business. In 1388 it was the turn of the cutlers, complaining to parliament that Exton was continuing Brembre's extortionate policies, and asking for the permanent removal from office of his cronies, recorder William Cheyne and sheriff Hugh Fastolf. Northampton's return to the city in 1390 sparked fresh fears among authorities of a re-opening of old wounds, and led eventually to mayor Bamme's proclamation against public discussion of Northampton or Brembre. But to regain power would have been more of an uphill battle than it was in the 1370s, and Northampton perhaps now lacked the will or the energy. He played no further role in city politics.

Brembre's pre-eminence, achieved in 1383, lasted little longer than had Northampton's. He had already earned unpopularity among some of the London guilds during an earlier mayoralty and, following his displacement of Northampton, ruled with an iron hand and used force to maintain himself in power, in a London still unsettled. More significantly, he was too closely linked to national politics; having loaned large sums to Richard II, he had too much invested in the status quo. He tried unsuccessfully to persuade the Londoners to fight for Richard against the Lords Appellant. The latter, at the Merciless Parliament in 1388, included Brembre in the list of impeachments. He was tried, obtained no support from mayor Exton or any other fellow Londoners, who mostly preferred to stay out of national conflicts, was convicted and hanged.

As for Usk, his transfer of loyalties did him little good. Willing to be used, perhaps looking for a cause, he had become a tool to help the Northampton faction achieve its ends, then received the same treatment by Brembre's faction. Once Brembre had Usk's appeal, its author's use to him was limited. He was rewarded for his contribution to Northampton's downfall with a pardon for his part in the affair. Eventually, he won the confidence of the royalist party sufficiently that he gained appointment as under-sheriff of Middlesex (1387); whether Testament of Love was any help there we cannot say, for it is not clear whether Usk's contemporaries read it. His rehabilitation was to prove his downfall: he was caught up in the charges of maladministration brought against Brembre and others of the king's faction; in particular he was accused of having drawn up false charges against some of the Appellants. Still the target for resentment in the city over his betrayal of Northampton, two weeks after Brembre's execution he too ended up at Tyburn, drawn, hanged, then (still alive) slowly beheaded. He went to his death asserting the truth of his appeal against Northampton. By contrast, Brembre had, at the gallows, admitted to Northampton's son that he had wronged his father – a confession we can attribute to Brembre's preoccupation with his afterlife destiny rather than guilt about his past.

An assessment

The charges laid against Northampton, although engineered by his opponents, are in broad terms credible; some points are corroborated by other sources. But they are also in part a case of the victors rewriting history from their own perspective. Northampton's own account of affairs would have been somewhat different, if not in substance, then in perspective. At the same time, the Usk appeal must necessarily have been a selective version of events, in that it focused on the actions of only one faction. For example, in preparation for the 1383 mayoral election Northampton had packed the common council with his supporters, had installed a few supporters among the aldermen (although only a small number can be unequivocally identified with his party), had guards posted to turn away any hostile voters, and should have been in a position to intimidate hostile aldermen against voting for any alternate candidate. Given all this, it is hard to imagine that Brembre could have emerged victorious in the election without having been able to bring to bear greater force than that provided for by Northampton; certainly at his re-election in 1384 he premeditatedly used armed force to frustrate the hopes of an opposing candidate. Yet that aspect is not dwelt on in Usk's appeal or the inquisition presentments, other than as an uncorroborated claim used by Northampton to try to obtain the intervention of Lancaster in city affairs; this piece of "evidence" was important not only for condemning Northampton in many eyes for his disloyalty to the city, but also because Lancaster's rejection provided grounds to dismiss a claim that was otherwise broadly credible. But we should not expect Brembre's actions to come under question; the presentments, we must remember, were charges not evidence, and Brembre was not the one on trial.

Northampton has been described by Pamela Nightingale as an astute, calculating politician, using radicalism only as a tool to achieve an essentially reactionary goal of supplanting the guilds then dominating city government with others, notably his own. Although the element of self-interestedness is undoubtedly present, it is hard not to see Northampton as a radical in some regards. A capable politician is able to reconcile interests and find the path of compromise. This was not Northampton. The extreme measures to which he resorted during his second mayoralty, perhaps partly out of desperation as he sensed a resistance against him crystallizing, had him increasingly working outside of the system. Northampton might perhaps have accomplished some enduring reforms had he chosen to work within the system. There was widespread sympathy for some of his aims. But if his principal aim was to replace one set of power-holders with another, then we may concede he was astute enough to know that this could not be done without radical changes; the events of 1376-77 having shown that changes within the system could easily be reversed once power changed hands.

In this sense, we should not imagine that Northampton's political convictions were democratic in a way that we might understand them in a modern context. Although he appears to have put more faith in the "power of the people" than was warranted (just as he seems to have overestimated his relationship with Gaunt), it may be doubted whether Northampton truly had any more confidence in popular decision-making than did the ruling class, which was contemptuous of the idea that such ignorant persons were qualified to have a significant say in government. On the other hand, we should not represent Northampton's faction merely as Northampton and a group of followers. The continued agitation of his party, after he himself was removed from the game, indicates that the underlying dissatisfaction with the almost monopolistic hold a few of the leading guilds had on government was real enough and not Northampton's invention.

Nonetheless, a leaderless party could not keep itself afloat for long. No political perspective in medieval English towns favoured a form of democratic government in which there was sustained and meaningful popular participation. Then, as today, good leadership was seen as the key to good government. Northampton's aim, to overthrow the ruling elite, was acceptable insofar as it meant replacing the distrusted rulers with others that the populace hoped, perhaps even expected, would rule better. He knew such aims could not be achieved simply by legislating constitutional changes. It was necessary to ensure that his followers continued to hold power, in order to maintain a reformed constitution, and that other measures be put in place to secure what he had accomplished: obtaining statutory recognition of the reforms, and using annual election to ensure that those in office were supporters of a reformed constitution. And it was necessary to remove the leaders of the elite from access to power, whether by disqualification, exile, or death; Brembre saw the same approach as necessary to defeat Northampton's party.

Such measures would never have allowed for the "power to the people" approach that Northampton exploited to win office temporarily. Nor would the dictator/mob style of democracy that Northampton was prepared to install have found approval with the central government, since it would not well have served two fundamental requirements that government had of urban administrations: law and order, and revenues. None of this mattered. Northampton's intent to break the hold of the wealthy on government was a non-starter. That hold was too strong, too long-standing, and a leaderless populace was unable to mount real opposition to the elite regaining control of government, without the significant violence for which it had no stomach. The live-and-die together bond, which hearkens back to the roots of the communal movement when the townspeople were not so divided by class consciousness, was still fine for mob mentality, but no more maintainable when the Londoners' fiery leader was out of the picture than for the peasant army when Wat Tyler lay dying.

Northampton's failure could be ascribed to his own uncompromising nature. Brembre was little better, and such success as he achieved was because he had the status quo on his side. On a personal level, both men ultimately paid for their sins. London was caught up at this time in factionalism, just as England was embroiled in factionalism in national politics. Not until more moderate leaders took the helm were London affairs able to settle down. For both Northampton and Brembre, politics proved a fickle mistress. As Usk wrote, "Fortune sheweth her fayrest whan she thynketh to begyle."

NOTES

"the Bow"

I.e. the parish of St. Mary-le-Bow. This was within Cordwainer Ward, where More was alderman and had his residence, and where Northampton and some of his lieutenants held property.

"John More"

One of Northampton's principal and long-time supporters. When Northampton was elected alderman of Dowgate Ward in March 1381, More was elected alderman of Cordwainer Street Ward (Northampton's earlier powerbase, of which he had been alderman 1375-77). After Northampton became mayor in October 1381, he, probably with Northampton's connivance, brought accusations against five aldermen from the victualling trades that Northampton hated of aiding and abetting the rebellious peasants in their assault on London earlier in the year [see note below on Sibille etc.]. More went to trial with Northampton.

"Richard Norbury"

A prominent supporter of Northampton, under whose regime he was an alderman and a parliamentary representative for the city. Also a prominent mercer, having served as warden of the gild. He went to trial with Northampton.

"William Essex"

Another of Northampton's closest supporters and possibly a one-time business partner. He was one of the leading drapers, having served as gild warden. He had served the city as one of its parliamentary representatives in 1370 and 1376, and again during Northampton's mayoral terms. After Northampton's arrest, he escaped trial himself through flight.

"William Walworth"

A wealthy fishmonger who was one of the principal leaders of the group of merchant capitalists against whom Northampton's efforts were directed; an alderman since 1368, and mayor in 1374/75 (just prior to the constitutional reforms of 1376) and again in 1380/81 (immediately preceding Northampton's term), in the latter term he having attempted to reverse the reforms of 1376. His death in 1385 pre-empted the possibility he would be involved in the fall of Northampton.

"judicial office"

I.e. offices in city government involving presidency of a court, such as mayor or sheriff.

"any other method"

I.e. wholesale, leaving retail a prerogative of freemen.

"Adam Bame"

As a leading goldsmith (warden of the gild in 1377) Adam Bamme was wealthier and more prominent than most of Northampton's supporters. He had been an opponent of the "capitalist" party in the 1370s, despite a family connection to Brembre through their wives, and initially backed Northampton's reform effort, ; he served as sheriff during Northampton's second term, although technically (but not insignificantly) elected towards the close of Northampton's first term. But when Northampton failed in his bid for re-election in 1383, Bamme switched to the opposing side. He was presumably more moderate than Northampton, although this did not save him from a temporary disgrace, in exclusion from the aldermannic ranks, during Brembre's mayoralty. Nonetheless he had obtained an aldermanry again before the close of the decade. It was during Bamme's mayoralty of 1396/97 that the proclamation was made forbidding anyone to discuss the Brembre/ Northampton matter because it only led to dissension; Bamme died during his mayoralty.

"Willyngham"

Possibly the same tavern-owner at which Northampton's party held meetings, or a relative.

"Marchaund"

Probably John Marchaunt, one of the clerks of the chamber at this time; his association with Northampton did not wreck his career prospects, for he became London's town clerk ca.1400, serving it well and training an even greater successor, John Carpenter.

"John Philpot"

One of the merchant capitalists against whom Northampton aimed his reforms, grocer John Philpot became an alderman in 1372, and mayor in 1378. He was a business partner and political ally of fellow-grocer Nicholas Brembre, as well as husband (by the mid-1370s) of a sister of Brembre's wife. He was also a leader of the anti-Gaunt party in the city. By 1377, he, Brembre and Walworth were the leaders of the party opposed by Northampton; at the same time Brembre and Philpot held the two posts of collector of customs in the port of London. Philpot loaned large sums of money to the king, to support the war against France, and even financed entire expeditions against the French or French pirates operating in the Channel. He was involved in raising loans for the king throughout the city, which were to be repaid from customs proceeds, which Philpot himself co-managed. However, there is no independent evidence of any embezzlement here, and the timing of the accusations laid at More's instigation were clearly an attempt to discredit or disqualify a potential opponent in the election; the terminology of the documents implies that the proposal to make him ineligible did not succeed. Philpot, who was knighted in 1381, was favoured not only by the king but also by the citizens, and may have been the only member of the capitalist party that could have wrested the mayoralty away from Northampton. In the event, since Northampton's attack, as mayor, on the fishmongers was no particular threat to Philpot's mercantile activities, he (unlike Brembre) was prepared to acquiesce in Northampton's election to a second term; he also attempted, unsuccessfully, conciliation when Northampton actively opposed Brembre's mayoralty. He died before Brembre's ultimate fall from power.

"commons"

What is being referred to here is the common council, rather than the community per se.

"ordinance against the fishmongers"

These ordinances of June 1382 in essence prohibited London fishmongers from buying up stocks of fish brought into the city by outsiders, or from making partnership arrangements for such purchase in advance of the fish arriving, so as to sell them with an added profit margin tacked on. As the price of such a staple as fish was a matter of general resentment in the city, blamed on the monopolistic practices of the London fishmongers, Northampton's measures found support, or at least acceptance, among most Londoners including other victuallers. But when the next parliament (October 1382) expanded the attack to the victualling trades generally, and particularly tried to exclude victuallers from "judicial office", London's merchant class recognized the need to oust Northampton from the mayoralty.

"to represent them"

London was represented in parliaments by four citizens; at this period, two were chosen by the common council, two by mayor and aldermen.

"Thomas Carleton"

An embroiderer who had at an earlier date (1364) been bound over to keep the peace, he owed his improvement in wealth and status partly to being given the post of king's armourer in 1368. After being superseded therein at Richard II's accession, he turned more of his attention to local politics and built up his property in Cripplegate ward, for which he was elected alderman during Northampton's mayoralty of 1381/82. By this time he had some affiliation with the tailors' gild, from which Northampton was receiving support. Carleton was one of Northampton's more prosperous supporters, and perhaps one of the most active, depending on to which evidence one pays attention. He was doubtless attracted to Northampton's party, as many were, by the prospect of breaking the power of the victuallers, and may have been among those who became alarmed by the subsequent extremism of Northampton's policies. Although named among the leaders of that party in the indictments, he did not suffer as dreadful a fate as the others, although he lost his alderman's post (in fact due to Northampton's prohibition of re-elections to the aldermanries) and did not regain it until after Brembre's administration had fallen, but then held it only for a short while before his death in 1388. He left behind a widow and a daughter; some of his property had to be sold to pay his debts, although his estate was still able to fund a chantry and pay for a marble tomb slab, into which was carved a cross, his coat of arms, and the date of his death. He also bequeathed two books – a bible and stories of the saints' lives – but there is no mention of a common-place book (extant) believed to have been compiled for him, containing copies of national and civic laws, some extracts from chronicles, and a few documents related to his private business.

"an authorization"

The original has a patent, the inquisition presentment shows that this was not letters patent but a breve domini Regis patens.

"to punish usurers"

This was one part of Northampton's programme against immorality. Usk's concern with the move, however, was because he felt it would provide Northampton with more power to use the offence as a stick against his political opponents. Chambers and Daunt state that the petition was refused on the grounds that it would prejudice the jurisdiction of the Church in such matters, and that city custom and common law already gave the London authorities some powers in policing this offence. The two sets of accusations seem to suggest that the writ was obtained and acted upon, unless Northampton was jumping the gun.

"Walter Sybille, John Horn, and Adam Carlille"

Fishmongers Sibille and Horn, and grocer Carlille, were among 5 aldermen – all victuallers – accused of complicity in the Peasant's Revolt. The evidence is not solid enough to know if there was any basis to this; possibly some victualling elements took advantage of the situation to act against the interests of Northampton's party (none of whom was ever accused of supporting the rebels). The accusations against Sibille, Horn and Carlille were made by More before the parliament of October 1382, after Sibille had protested the petition that resulted in anti-fishmonger ordinances, and were essentially that the three obstructed official efforts to prevent the rebels from entering the city. If the inquisitions sent to the king's justices were biased we cannot rely on their detailing of the charges, but it does seem likely that Horn at least offered the rebels some encouragement, with a view to taking advantage of the tense situation to take some legal matters into his own hand. The charges were partly politically motivated, but the accused were eventually acquitted once Northampton's opponents had regained control of city government.

"best served the king"

That is, only the findings that supported the prosecution position were sent to King's Bench for follow-up.

"Robert Franceys"

One of the goldsmith supporters of Northampton, but not politically prominent; in 1378 he obtained, through the intervention of Lancaster, a pardon for a homicide, and in 1395 was again tied up in a murder.

"Thomas Farndon"

Goldsmith Thomas Farndon is one of the few citizens to have clearly supported the rebellious peasants; or rather, to have taken advantage of the havoc to settle scores against personal enemies, having supported the execution of a Prior who had had him evicted at an earlier date, having (it was claimed) compiled a list of citizens to be executed, and being in the process of wrecking one Londoner's house when he was arrested.

"the mayor would speak"

Northampton was still mayor until Brembre would take his oath of office on 28 October.

"the Neyt"

An estate to the west of Westminster, belonging to the abbey, where John of Gaunt would stay occasionally; the name survives in the modern Knightsbridge.

"Cheap"

Cheapside was the city centre in medieval times.

"it was presented"

That is, as the findings of the inquisition jury.

"Easter 1382"

Although Powell and Trevelyan interpret this as 22 March, Pasche usually refers to Easter Sunday, which fell on April 6, or to Easter Week following that date. Lent ended on 22 March. A precise date may not be intended by the document.

"11 October 1382"

Powell and Trevelyan interpret die sabbati proximo ante festum translationis sancti Edwardi anno Ric. II 6 as 13 June 1383, but since the text goes on to identify the date as prior to the election of Northampton to a second term, the date must be before 13 October 1382. Powell and Trevelyan selected the wrong St. Edward in interpreting this date.

"election of John Northampton"

Some writers have suggested that it was unconstitutional for Northampton to be elected for a second, consecutive term. In fact, although not the normal situation, it was recognized that if a mayor had served particularly well and there was strong public demand for him to continue in office, a second term was permissible. Northampton's party probably aimed at arranging for the commoners at the election to nominate only him, instead of the usual two candidates from whom mayor and alderman would choose one. (On this see "Mayoral and shrieval elections at London".)

"placed on the council"

The original positi fuerunt in dicto consilio may perhaps mean "made privy to these deliberations".

"other sheriff"

More had been elected in September as sheriff, and thus served out most of his term under Brembre. The other sheriff, Simon Wynchecombe, was an armourer; it is difficult to imagine Northampton did not see him as a supporter, or at least not an enemy, although Wynchecombe was later one of the signatories to the petition demanding Northampton be executed.

"uphold the king's peace"

At West Cheap they arrested one of the insurgents, John Constantyn, a cordwainer and a relative of Northampton's wife, and executed him as a warning to the other rioters.

"guarantors"

Northampton was required to put up a bond of £5,000 to keep the peace, a transaction that took place in the Guildhall, where a record was made of it.

"Geoffrey Waldern"

A draper, not one of the wealthiest citizens, but among the more affluent of Northampton's supporters. He was a common councillor from 1382 to 1385, surviving the fall of Northampton's faction, thanks to a political about-face. Although he participated in the gathering Northampton summoned in February 1384, and subsequently stood as surety for one of the more violent partisans arrested on that occasion, in June he was at the council meeting where it was agreed to blame Northampton for the recent disturbances in the city, he was shortly after put on the committee to revise the Jubilee Book, and his name was among those who petitioned in March 1385 for Northampton's immediate execution. This was political expediency; that some sympathies still lay with the reform movement (if not with Northampton personally) are suggested by his willingness to act as surety for a Londoner accused in 1386 of having attempted to disrupt the re-election of Brembre as mayor. Such sympathies, if perceived, did not prevent his business prospering up to his death ca.1396; he never entered the ranks of the aldermannic elite, but was sufficiently trusted to send as a city representative to the parliament of 1395.

"Robert Cumberton"

Northampton was occasionally referred to by this surname, and it was the surname commonly used by other members of his family.

"Thomas Lincolle"

Although a supporter of Northampton, and one of his common councillors, he was a fishmonger, one example of how the victuallers vs. non-victuallers characterization of the conflict is not clear-cut.

"encircling their forces"

Given the fate of John Constantyn, it is possible that potencius coartasset might mean by depriving them of their leaders.

"The document proceeds"

Powell and Trevelyan do not transcribe this part of the text.

"St. Michael of Hog Lane"

More commonly known as St. Michael Wood Street.

"Henry Vannere"

A common councillor and a vintner (his family having a pedigree in the city wine trade), and later alderman under Brembre's administration, he was also Brembre's brother-in-law (by marriage to another daughter of John Stodeye) and business partner. During Brembre's ascendancy he served on a committee to dismantle the reforms Northampton had put in place. He was serving as sheriff when Richard II and the Londoners fell out over their refusal to loan the king money, and was imprisoned with other city officials on the pretext of maladministration, but released within a few weeks and later pardoned. He died without direct heir in 1395.

"William Cheyne"

The city's recorder (legal expert).

"senior"

This could refer to the aldermen, or perhaps just the aldermannic class.

"a harmonious and communal frame of mind"

The original expresses it as ad concordiam ac unitatem; Brembre's wish must have been to suppress any opinions contrary to his own, but the chronicler is unlikely to have been aware of that and would simply have perceived it as desirable that the electorate act in a peaceful manner to arrive at a decision beneficial to the community and in which all acquiesced – the concept, so often expressed in medieval writings regardless of the reality, of communal unanimity. Concordia could imply a spirit of compromise: the democratic principle of accepting a decision reached through due process.

"quell those"

One source claims that the armed men advanced on the Twyford faction, crying "Slay! Slay!".

"Newgate"

One of the most unpleasant of the city prisons.

"whereby dissension arose"

As examples of the continuing problems Brembre's government was facing while the hope of the reformers remained alive: between late 1383 and spring 1385 securities were taken to pressure numerous citizens to keep the peace and obey city officers; most ranged from £40 to £300, but that from Northampton himself was for £5,000 and More's was for £4,000. This was quite apart from the arrests and mainprises following the armed battle at the mayoral election of 1384. In May 1384 grocer William Mayhew was condemned to a year's imprisonment, to be followed by an unspecified fine, for having publicly criticized the government, accusing it of maladministration and injustice, including describing the recent execution of John Constantyn as unjust; Mayhew was released upon surety for future good behaviour. Bail was given in March 1385 to cordwainer John Remes, who had confessed to having publicly said before the last parliament that there would be no peace in the city until Brembre was done away with. In September of that year a barber was thrown in gaol for spreading the rumour that Northampton had returned to London.

"principal goods"

While the insinuation here seems very vague, in the context of the times it was possibly understood as implying that Austin had secreted weapons in various locations.

"Wigmours"

A Roger Wygemor was among 139 persons accused of disturbing the peace around the time of Brembre's electoral defeat of Northampton.

"Hugh Fastolf"

Fastolf was a wealthy member of one of the leading Yarmouth families and began his career as a fishmonger at Yarmouth, where he served numerous terms as its chief executive officer, showed his martial abilities by serving as an admiral in the war against France, and was a prominent player in local vendettas – being accused of homicide as early as 1355. With years of service to the Crown already under his belt, shortly after the accession of Richard II he moved his base of operations to London, and transferred from fishmongering to the more powerful grocers' gild, after marrying Joan Hanhamstead, the widow of a grocer and granddaughter of a former mayor. He served as a London alderman in 1381 and from 1384 until shortly before his death in 1392. His political affiliations brought him widespread unpopularity; during the Peasants' Revolt there were attacks on his property in Yarmouth, at Caister (by the Norfolk rebels), on his manor at Bradwell (looted by the Suffolk rebels), and at London although this was due to a private quarrel. During the first phase of his career he seems to have links to Gaunt, but during the second he was associated with the Ricardian party, serving as a royal commissioner and acting as deputy of Simon Burley in the latter's office of constable of Dover Castle and warden of the Cinque Ports, although he later had a run-in with Ralph Ramsey, a Yarmouth man with London interests who was another of Burley's followers (but later switched allegiance to Henry Bolingbroke). It is not surprising to find him associated with the Brembre faction; he was in fact elected sheriff a couple of weeks after Banham stated his accusations against Austin, and so was responsible for follow-up.

"St. Laurence's"

The church stood at the southwest corner of the Guildhall complex, from which Strohm concludes that Hochon, Banham and Hore had been posted in the room facing it so as to lie in ambush. Assuming the action that follows actually did occur, it is assumed to have taken place after Brembre's forces had routed his opponents and taken control of the Guildhall; after all that tension, Fastolf needed to relieve himself.

"I, John Hore"

Possibly a scribal error, confusing John Banham with his colleague Hore, or an indication that Hore was joining Banham in making the accusations.

"stolen a thousand pounds"

The implication is presumably one of customs avoidance.

"everything contained in the document is true"

This was not a conviction, but simply a statement by the jury that the evidence (or presumption) was sufficient to warrant bringing the case to court – although the jury does not address what the nature of the crime(s) might be, other than the felony in concealment of customs.

"Nicholas Extone"

The successor to Brembre in the mayoralty and a continuator of his policies, fishmonger Nicholas Exton nonetheless found it politic to sacrifice Brembre to his enemies and to the scaffold, rather than risk drawing the attention of those enemies towards the city and himself.

"motivations of the people"

Bird, The Turbulent London of Richard II is the principal study of this part of London history and gives a detailed analysis of the background of Northampton's supporters and opponents, to show that a victualling vs. non-victualling classification is useful only as a generalization. A re-interpretation is provided by Pamela Nightingale, "Capitalists, crafts and constitutional change in late fourteenth-century London," Past and Present, no.124 (August 1989), 3-35; for her (p.33), "Northampton was not a radical leader fighting for the destruction of the merchant oligarchy and for its replacement by a more broadly based civic government. He was a member of that oligarchy pursuing, first, the narrow sectional interests of his mystery, and secondly, his own personal power." Although parts of her argument are unconvincing, she offers important new insights, particularly in regard to the complexity of and shifts in the local political situation, and in the effect of national economic policies on the motivations of the various London interest groups. Two papers by Paul Strohm, particularly the latter, clarify the process by which Northampton's conviction was obtained: "Politics and Poetics: Usk and Chaucer in the 1380s," pp.83-112 in Literary Practice and Social Change in Britain, 1380-1530, ed. Lee Patterson, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990; "The Textual Vicissitudes of Usk's 'Appeal'," ch.7 in Hochon's Arrow: The Social Imagination of Fourteenth-Century Texts (by Strohm), Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1992. The text of Usk's writings have been made available in an online edition produced by R. Allen Shoaf, Thomas Usk, The Testament of Love, Kalamazoo (Mich.): TEAMS, 1998, <http://www.lib.rochester.edu/camelot/teams/uskintro.htm>

"earlier end of the fourteenth century"

The key account is in Gwyn Williams, Medieval London, from Commune to Capital, London: Athlone Press, 1963, although it has not been free of criticism.

"described as"

Ibid., 282.

"has been suggested"

Nightingale, op.cit., 17.

"reforms of 1319"

Nightingale, op.cit., 20, sees Gaunt's hand here, in Northampton being able to obtain a royal inspeximus of the 1319 ordinance; she argues that Gaunt saw the opportunity to get rid of his opponents among the aldermen and install instead a group obliged to him.

"committee of eight"

One cannot help but be reminded here of the early role of Stace and le Rente in compiling an new custumal for Ipswich, the prelude to their rise to power in that town.

"popularity of this attack"

Members of the patriciate had their own reason for approving of the assault on the fishmongers, whose gild had obtained for its own court an extraordinary level of jurisdiction over legal cases involving fishmongers, to the detriment of the authority of the city courts.

"resentful"

There is also some indication that Usk had other grudges concerning money owed him, either stretching back to an earlier period of involvement in Northampton's business affairs, or related to efforts in assisting fellow rebels (Essex?) avoid capture.

"observes"

This translation and others here are by Shoaf, op.cit., <http://web.clas.ufl.edu/users/rashoaf/modusk/musk/one/6.htm>

"uncertain"

An interesting analysis of the accusations is given by Paul Strohm in chapter 1 of his Hochon's Arrow, as well as by Prescott in his introduction to the transcription he offers in the same book.

TRANSLATION

[1. Testament of Alan de Bannebury]

In the name of God, Amen. I, Alan de Bannebury, have set out my testament on 4 November 1311. First, I bequeath my soul to Almighty God, the Blessed Mary, and all the saints, and my body to be buried in the cemetery of St. Laurence, Reading. I bequeath 6d. to the fabric of Salisbury [cathedral]. To the hospital of Crowmarsh, 6d. For bread to be distributed to poor people at my burial, 10s. I bequeath 12s. for the performance of funeral services. For the purchase of ale to be given out on the night of the vigil around my corpse, 12d. For the use of the Friars Minor of Reading, 5s. To the two boys of my brother Elias, 2s. To Alice, daughter of Alan's wife, 12d. To Joan, wife of Robert de Hampton, 12d. To Robert de Hampton, 12d. To Richard de Asheburn, 2s. To John le Cave, 2s. To the vicar of St. Laurence, 2s. To each altar in the church of St. Laurence, 3d. To the altar of the Blessed Mary in the church of St. Laurence, 12d.

I bequeath my wife Christine five shillings in annual rent received at two terms in the year from a certain tenement in London Street, which tenement Thomas Hubert formerly held of Alan. To John le Cave of Blewbury, my entire hat-shop located at Tothill, in perpetuity. I bequeath to my wife Christine and my daughter Margery all my goods that are in that hat-shop on the day I die. I bequeath my daughter Margery 3s.4d in annual rent that I am accustomed to receive from Richard de Stratfeld at Michaelmas [for a tenement] in the high street of Reading. I bequeath the same Margery 4 acres of arable land in the field called Northfield; which 4 acres I took by way of dowry when I married her mother. I bequeath the entire tenement in which I reside with appurtenances to my wife Christine for all the days of her life; once Christine is dead, I wish the entire tenement with its appurtenances to revert to my daughter Margery. I bequeath half of my money to my wife Christine and the other half to my daughter Margery. If anything else remains among my goods that is not bequeathed, I wish and grant that it go in its entirety to my wife Christine and my daughter Margery.

I designate and appoint as my executors Richard de Asheburn and John le Cave of Blewbury, to bring about the execution of this testament faithfully and without delays, as seems to them most expedient for [the good of] my soul. I also bequeath 12d to my servant Agnes. It is my wish and provision that after my time is up the aforementioned John of Blewbury have custody of my daughter Margery, along with all her possessions and all rents that come to her by right of heredity and through the legacy of her father Alan, as well as with the other goods belonging to her, until she reaches marriageable age; and afterwards, let her marry by the advice and with the support of that John, [taking] with her all her own belongings, as soon as John sees it to be advantageous for her. In testimony to which, I have validated this my testament with an impression of my seal, on the date indicated above. Also, I bequeath to my wife Christine our servant Robert with his service, while the terms agreed between he and I remain in force.

[2. Testament of John Lambert]

In the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, Amen. I, John

Lambert, burgess of Lynn have set out my testament on 30 November 1312 in the following manner. First, I commend my soul to Almighty God and my body to be buried within the Friars Preacher at Lynn. I bequeath 20s. to the high altar of the church of St. Margaret, Lynn, for offences concerning my tithes. Towards the fabric of that church, 40d. Towards its charnel, 40d. To the principal chaplain of the same, 2s. To dom. Gilbert de Hauld, chaplain, 6s.8d. Towards the fabric of the chapel of St. James, Lynn, 12d. To dom. Thomas Pleindamour, chaplain, 12d. To dom. Walter de Dudlington, chaplain, 12d. I bequeath 40s. to the Friars Preacher at Lynn. To the Friars Minor, Lynn, 6s.8d. To the Carmelite Friars of Lynn, 2s. To the Augustinian Friars of Lynn, 2s. I bequeath to the poor [residents] of the hospital of St. John, Lynn, 12d. I bequeath 6d. to the lepers of St. Mary Magdalene on the Causeway. To the lepers of Hardwick, 6d. To each chaplain who comes to my funeral service, 2d. I bequeath £10 to cover the expenses of carrying out my funeral services, on the day of my burial, on the seventh day, and on the thirtieth day.

I bequeath to my son Robert and his legitimate heirs my messuage in Wingate, Lynn with its buildings and appurtenances, which is flanked by the messuage of Peter Lomb on the west side and the messuage of dom. Alexander Sefoul chaplain on the east side, and extends [in length] from the public road on the north as far as the communal channel on the south; together with the large solar at the front of the messuage, extending from the aforementioned land of Peter Lomb to the messuage of dom. Alexander the chaplain. Excluding a certain plot of land which I leased to my sister Isabelle for her lifetime; after her death I wish that plot of land revert to my son Robert. I bequeath to the same Robert, my son, and his legitimate heirs 20s. in annual rent received each year from the messuage of Philip Tubbesye, in St. James Street, Lynn, at the corner of Finnes Lane, with the homage and service pertaining thereto. I bequeath to my son Robert and his legitimate heirs 5s. in annual rent received each year from the entire messuage in the said St. James Street at the corner of Finnes Lane, with homage and service pertaining, which the heirs or assigns of William Wrongnose hold of me. I bequeath to my son Robert, in the form specified above, 8d. in annual rent received each year from the messuage that Robert de Walsingham holds in St. James Street, Lynn; which rent I acquired from Thomas de Ridon. I bequeath to my son Robert, in the form specified above, 2d. in annual rent received each year from a message next to Purfleet that once belonged to William de Massingham, with the homage and service pertaining thereto. I bequeath to my son Robert, in the form specified above, one penny in annual rent received each year from the tenement in Wingate formerly of Humphrey Aurifaber, with the homage and service pertaining thereto. I bequeath to my son Robert, in the form specified above, my three new shops with solars in Briggate, Lynn, which lie between the messuage of dom. Ralph Sefoul on the north and the land of John de Thorndeyn on the south, and extend from the street of Briggate on the west as far as the land of John de Thorndeyn on the east. My son Robert and his legitimate heirs are to have and hold in perpetuity those tenements, rents, and shops, with all appurtenances, homages, services, and escheats, of whatever kind belong to them.

If Robert should die without producing legitimate heirs, I wish that those tenements, rents, and shops, with all their appurtenances, be sold by my executors (if they be alive), and the proceeds be distributed in alms of various kinds in the town of Lynn, as seems to my executors most effective for my soul, the soul of my wife Matilda, the soul of Muriel de Ispania, and the souls of all the faithful deceased. If my executors are not alive at that time, or if only one of them survives, then the tenements, rents, and shops, with all their appurtenances, are to be sold by the mayor and aldermen of Lynn who are in office at that time, by my two closest blood relatives, and by my surviving executor, and the proceeds distributed in the fashion specified above. In that event, in order that the mayor and aldermen and my two nearest blood relatives have clear authority to sell my tenements, rents, and shops, I wish that my executors arrange for a copy of this clause concerning them in this matter to be delivered to them under the seal of the commissary of Lynn, for safekeeping in the common chest of the mayor and community of Lynn.

I bequeath to my son Alexander, for life, after the death of my wife Matilda, 40s. in annual rents received each year from the tenements and shops mentioned above. I bequeath my son Nicholas, a member of the order of Friars Preacher at Lynn, for life, [to pay] for his habit and other necessaries, 20s. in annual rent received each year at Michaelmas, beginning with that following my death, by the agency of my son Robert. Should it happen that Robert fail to pay that rent, in whole or in part, in the fashion specified above, or in any way refuses to pay the same, then I wish that the executor of the Holy Land bring an action seeking the annual rent of 20s., whenever and as often as Robert stops paying Friar Nicholas the 20s. annual rent. However, I wish and require that the said executor not bring any action concerning the 20s. annual rent other than for the period during which Robert ceased to pay Friar Nicholas the rent in the way and at the time mentioned above.

It is my wish that Robert and his legitimate heirs maintain in perpetuity a two-pound wax candle at Christ's sepulchre in St. Margaret's church from Good Friday until High Mass has been celebrated on Easter Day. So that this never be forgotten, I wish my executors arrange for a copy of this clause to be delivered, under the seal of the commissary of Lynn, to the prior or warden of St. Margaret's, Lynn. I wish Robert or his legitimate heirs to pay the prior and convent of Castle Acre £8 within four years following my death and the death of my wife Matilda. If Robert dies without legitimate heirs before paying that money, I wish and charge my executors to make prompt payment of the £8 to the prior and convent.

My three shops with solars in Briggate, Lynn, which lie between the tenement of John de Thorndeyn to the south and the land of Robert de Walton to the north, and extend from the messuage of Robert de Walton on the west as far as the public road on the east, I bequeath to be sold by my executors after the death of my wife Matilda. From the proceeds of the sale of those shops, £10 are to be given and paid to my daughter Matilda and her sons and daughters, and the rest of the money on masses to be celebrated by the Friars Preacher for my soul and the souls of all the faithful. In particular, the Friars are to celebrate an anniversary mass for the souls of chaplains dom. Henry de Dunham and dom. Alan de Oxheburgh.

I bequeath my daughter Matilda and her daughter Margaret a messuage, with its buildings and appurtenances, in Lynn, between the messuage of Walter de Acre to the east and the messuage of Walter de Bredenham to the west, extending from the public road on the north as far as the land of John de Gernemuta to the south. Matilda and her daughter Margaret, and Margaret's legitimate heirs, are to have and hold in perpetuity; if Margaret dies without legitimate heirs, then the messuage with its appurtenances is to revert to her brother John and his heirs.

I wish my wife Matilda to have all these tenements for as long as she lives, in fulfillment of her dower right, as well as [my] goods, moveable and immovable. I bequeath to my son Robert all my vessels and utensils, of whatever kind and wherever they may be, after the death of my wife Matilda; and it is my wish that my wife Matilda, while she is alive, provide my son Robert each year with a linen gown and give ... Robert whenever Robert may give way to the wishes of his mother, showing her honour, reverence, and obedience, as a son is obliged to act towards his mother.

I bequeath my daughter Matilda, for life, my curtilage with dovecote on the near side of Swaggess Mill, Lynn. On condition that she maintains the curtilage walls and dovecote in as good a condition as when she receives them. After her death it is to revert to my son Robert, in the manner as mentioned above. I bequeath my daughter Matilda my stone called a diamond.

I bequeath 20s. in support of the Holy Land, to be put in the hands of the monk of the church of St. Margaret the Virgin, Lynn, assigned to custody of Holy Land money. The rest of my goods, as well as debts [due me] and other things, wherever they are found, after my debts are paid, I wish to be distributed in Lynn by my executors as alms of various kinds, for my soul, as seems most expedient to them for my soul. I appoint these as my executors: that is, my wife Matilda, Thomas de Ridon, mag. Gilbert de Geywode, and my son Robert. I bequeath the same Thomas de Ridon 20s. for his labour, and 20s. to master Gilbert. In testimony to which, I have set to my seal to this document. Drawn up at Lynn on the above date.

On 14 December 1312 I, John Lambert of Lynn, being of sound mind, bequeath to my son Alexander £6.13s.4d, as part of my testamentary wishes concerning Alexander, which remain valid. It is also my wish that the tenement bequeathed in my original testament to my daughter Matilda and the heirs of her body remain valid, and that she receive the entire £10 bequeathed her in my testament, provided however that my other testamentary wishes can be fulfilled and my debts paid. On the other hand, if the testament cannot be fulfilled and my debts cannot be paid, so that the bequest to Matilda not have to be abandoned, I wish that then the tenement be sold by my executors and £10 received from the sale of that tenement, together with the sale of my shops in Briggate (bequeathed to be sold in my original testament), be paid to Matilda and her daughter Margaret, and that together they receive the whole £10. I forgive Friar Nicholas, my son, the 20s. he owes me. I bequeath 40d. to John Skirbek. To the son of John de Salle, 40d. I bequeath my son Alexander my overcoat, my tabard, and a russet tunic; to Benedict le Fitheler, my striped tunic; to John Leverich my gown, my striped tabard, and my perse-coloured gown. To my servant John I bequeath 40d. [and] my fur-lined tabard. I appoint as executors of this codicil the same as named in the original testament.

On 16 January 1313 this testament was proven before the official of the Bishop of Norwich, the commissary general, in Lynn, through the agency of trustworthy men under oath, viz. Ralph de Egemere, Thomas Hauteyn, Richard le Taverner, John son of Alan Sefoul, and John Clerk. The codicil annexed to the testament was proven the same day and place by trustworthy men, viz. Ralph de Egemere, William Madame, Richard de Gernemuta, and John Leverich. Administration of all the property of the deceased was handed over, via the taking of an oath, to those named executors in the testament: Thomas de Ridon, mag. Gilbert de Geywode, and Robert the son of the deceased. Matilda, the wife of the deceased, named an executor in the testament, explicitly and in due form declined to take on the responsibility of administration.

DISCUSSION

[I have divided the documents into paragraphs to make for easier reading.]

Probate of wills and testaments was recognized as being within the jurisdiction of the Church. Registers of the archiepiscopal prerogative courts, episcopal consistory courts, and commissary or archdeaconry courts are the principal source of wills from medieval England. But these provide relatively few wills of townspeople prior to the fifteenth century. Before that time, we must rely more on local records.

Early charters of liberties to some towns (e.g. Northampton) imply that borough courts they authorized had jurisdiction over legal matters concerning urban real estate owned by townspeople. Some borough customals include numerous clauses regulating property transactions (e.g. Norwich, Ipswich). During the second half of the thirteenth century, when our earliest records from these courts survive, property transfers were being documented in those records in a few towns, such as London and Ipswich. Since the purpose of wills was to transfer property at death, extracts or abstracts of their content were copied into the record. The intent was to focus on the clauses relating to urban property. However, as time went on it became more common, or more expedient, to simply copy the whole into the court record.

A second source of early wills of townspeople were the cartularies of religious houses in the towns, or their vicinity. When those houses had, or came to acquire, interests in property transferred by townspeople, their deeds, quitclaims and wills were copied into the records of the institution. Bequests with other implications for religious houses might also warrant copying. Again, sometimes only the relevant parts of wills and testaments were transcribed, but more or less complete copies also can be found.

The two examples given above are among the earliest of the fuller transcriptions that found their way into borough or ecclesiastical records. In the case of Lynn, the borough court and its claim to probate were in the hands of the Bishop of Norwich, but the more indépendantiste townsmen resisted this. What little survives of the hustings rolls of the court of the bishop's steward shows no indication of any enrolments of wills or testaments, whereas from the early fourteenth century the assembly presided over by the mayor was having such documents presented before it, and copied into the Red Register and, later, a more formal, register, now lost.

Not surprisingly, these testaments are much the same in shape and in the type of information they provide as their counterparts that survive to us in greater numbers for the late fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Which is to say that they make some provision for the funeral, they make pious and charitable bequests, they remember relatives, friends and servants through small bequests of cash or personal items, they make the necessary provisions for widow and children, and they leave instructions for the disposal of real estate, while at the same time leaving us largely in the dark regarding issues of patrimony – that property which, because itself inherited, descended automatically to the principal heir and was not bequeathable. If there is a notable difference between testaments of this period and the later, it is perhaps that the concern for having prayers said for the soul, while not absent in the former, is less of a preoccupation; for worries about Purgatory weighed more heavily upon the mind of town dwellers as time went on.

The first document translated above appears, at first glance, slightly conflicted in that it is, typically, drafted as though dictated by the testator, but occasionally lapses into referring to the testator in the third person. However, these shifts appear to be deliberate clarifications by the scribe of what the testator dictated.

The testator was perhaps a hat-maker, judging from his legacy of a "capella" in Tothill. On 14 August 1314, one John son of Thomas le Cave of Blewbury and his wife obtained a life lease from the abbot of Reading on a corner shop (seld) in the Drapery at Reading, opposite Tothill, formerly held by Alan de Bannebury. The abbot's lordship over this property probably explains why Alan's testament was copied into abbey records. The records of a taxation imposed on the borough in 1297 include an assessment on Alan which, however, throws little light on his occupation, for it mentions only grain, hay, firewood, a pig, a cow, and unspecified utensils.

Rather more is known about John Lambert. The surname is in evidence at Lynn for much of the thirteenth century; although we cannot be sure all the holders were related, it is not unlikely. A Richard Lambert and a John Lambert, along with several others of this surname, appear in a bede roll of the merchant gild whose compilation was begun during the term of Lynn's first mayor (ca.1217) and continued throughout the century. Richard Lambert appears to date from the earlier part of this period, and was a member of the merchant gild. Peter Lambert, listed adjacent to John, was perhaps the same who was defendant in a plea of novel disseisin in 1229. Hugh Lambert served as one of the gild merchant scabins in the early 1260s, and at the same period Alan Lambert was a member of the gild, while a (presumably later) Richard Lambert held the influential post of gild alderman ca.1271. The last was a prominent player in the local factionalism of the 1260s, which may have owed something to the civil war and/or to the struggle between pro- and anti-episcopal interests in the town. It was probably his wife, Matilda, who was listed in the obit roll of the hospital of St. Mary Magdalene (pre-1296). He was likely the father of the testator of 1312, for in 1289 John son of Richard Lambert was fined by the merchant gild for some unspecified but minor offence. It would appear that this family (if family it was) was among the more important mercantile families of Lynn.

John Lambert's own importance is evidenced in several ways. Such as his frequent appearance in witness lists to deeds where those deeds are witnessed by the mayor, other officials of Lynn, and men who were probably serving on the town council. And by the valuations of his goods for purposes of assessments of local taxes. His name appears in several assessments between 1292 and 1305 and his valuations are well above the average; in 1298 for example, his goods were assessed at £50, when the average assessment was £11. In 1300 and 1301 his taxes were remitted after he took an oath that he owned nothing by way of merchandize. Perhaps this reflects a bad patch in his business operations; but it is difficult to read it as meaning he was not involved in commerce, for other evidence contradicts that. As noted above, he had become a member of the merchant gild before 1289, and a Richard son of John Lambert took out membership in 1294. John served as a scabin of the merchant gild from 1295 to 1299. In 1293 he was suing Peter de Thurendine (a former mayor) and Richard de Gervestone for his share of profits from the sale of Norwegian herring. Two years later an inquisition into debts owed by Lynn merchants to Frenchmen found that Lambert owed £12.10s. to Peter Reymund of Vindymes. In 1305 he was allowed to deduct from his tax assessment of that year 9s., as the cost of wine bought from him by borough government. Furthermore, he held office as a customs collector at Lynn from 1305 to about September 1312; most local men in these offices also engaged in commerce. He may have engaged in retail from one or more of the shops he owned, although one suspects some of these were intended to give him income from rents.

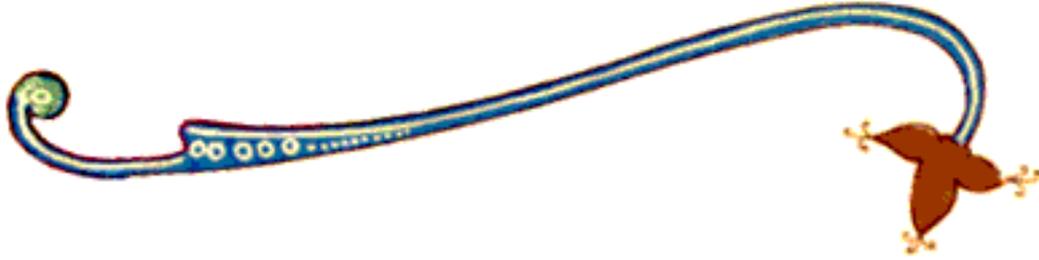

Although he is not known to have risen to the mayoralty, and our knowledge of membership of the town council at this period is almost non-existent, John Lambert held the post of constable ca.1299-1305. This post, giving responsibility for one of the wards of the town, was later associated with aldermannic status, and other constables of the period included leading townsmen. Lambert also represented the borough at the parliament of 1312.

He was associated, in 1309, with the faction in Lynn trying to resist the bishop's jurisdiction. The naming of Muriel de Ispania alongside his wife as someone for whose soul prayers were especially to be said may indicate a relationship with this powerful family – John de Hispania served several terms as mayor between 1279 and 1292. Perhaps Matilda Lambert had been born into that family; in this regard, we may note the uncommon name of Alexander given to one of John and Matilda's sons, and that Alexander de Hispania (killed by John de Hispania prior to 1307) was a constable 1295-98.

The relationship with the Ridon family was also a close one, although whether of kinship, marriage, or friendship cannot be said. They have a prominent role in the testament of John Lambert's son Robert, in January 1323. The testament was drawn up at Beverley, and it seems that Robert may have moved there, for he asked to be buried there, had debts there, and bequeathed some personalia to a Beverley apothecary and his wife. On the other hand, he had retained in Lynn the Wingate property inherited from his father (although his name is otherwise absent from borough records); this he wanted sold, with part of the money used for two chaplains to celebrate masses for him, his parents and his wife for one year, and most of the remainder given to his brother Nicholas and the Friars Preacher in Lynn generally. The rents he held in Lynn were likewise to be sold, with half the proceeds distributed among the poor and the other half among his kin. Some of his personal possessions, including precious jewellery, were being kept safe for him, in a strongbox and a cloth sack (? clotsok), by Emma the wife of Thomas de Ridon; most of these, along with a separate cash bequest, he left to Emma and her two daughters. Thomas was named one of Robert's executors. Robert Lambert also had landed interests in Lincolnshire: he was leasing lands at Skendleby from Sir Peter de Maule and Alice de Furnival (the latter another recipient of a personalia legacy). In addition we hear that Robert had debts in Norwich.

Robert's name is absent from borough records, apart from his will being copied there. His interests were evidently wide-ranging, and it is not clear if his pursuits were primarily mercantile. His will gives more the impression of someone aspiring to rise higher in social standing, perhaps partly through military service. He aspired to go on a pilgrimage to St. James of Compostella. The personalia he bequeathed reflect a taste for finery: several gold rings, a gold necklace, a pearl-studded belt, silk purses, a chain bearing his silver seal, silver spoons, maplewood goblets, and a primer with an ivory cover. On the other hand, we also hear of his armour, sword and dagger, all then in the custody of another executor, and two horses: one a black hackney (a riding horse), the second being of such an estimated value that one suspects it may have been a charger. These things are not incompatible with the lifestyle of leading merchants at this time, but somehow Robert appears more than that.

NOTES

"Crowmarsh"

The village lay about 10 miles north-northwest of Reading, near Wallingford.

"Elias"

An Elias de Bannebyr was one of the tax assessors at Reading in 1297.

"daughter of Alan's wife"

Presumably the testator's step-daughter.

"Blewbury"

The village lies about 11 miles northwest of Reading. Both it and Crowmarsh lay roughly between Reading and Banbury.

"hat-shop"

The original has capella, but "chapel" (or "chapel fittings") seems an unlikely translation here.

"money"

I am uncertain how to translate the original, eris; it might refer to coin, to household utensils, perhaps to debts owed the testator, or simply to moveables generally.

"our servant"

It appears that an apprentice (the servant of our business?) is meant; it was the term of service, not the individual, that was being bequeathed.

"offences"

I.e. defaults in paying tithes (a one-tenth share of income expected to be paid to the Church by laymen to support its religious activities).

"charnel"

A special chapel built to house skeletal remains removed from the cemetery to make room for fresh graves (i.e. an ossuary).

"St. Mary Magdalene"

This hospital was on the road (raised, because of marshy ground) to Gaywood.

"Hardwick"

A village to the south of South Lynn.

"seventh day" "thirtieth day"

Commemorative services a week after the burial (not including the day of the burial) and, more common, a month after were often held where money permitted, as it was felt that in this early period following death the soul could benefit more from prayers said.

"Peter Lomb"

It would appear from the will of Robert Lambert, that Peter Lomb was the husband of John Lambert's daughter Matilda. Margaret, daughter of Peter and Matilda, was not yet married when Robert died.

"communal channel"

Presumably some kind of ditch; Purfleet cannot be intended, for it lay to the north.

"commissary"

Refers to the episcopal official with the authority to grant probate, mentioned at the close of the record.

"executor of the Holy Land"

Evidently an official of the Order, but I do not know the correct title and so have made a literal translation.

"Christ's sepulchre"

The Easter Sepulchre was a model representative of Christ's tomb; it might be a wooden construction or a more permanent architectural feature of a church, such as a recess; the moveable models might also be placed in a recess or on top of another tomb. They were usually in the chancel or sanctuary. During Easter, the entombment and resurrection of Christ were commemorated by placing a crucifix by the sepulchre and the consecrated elements of communion inside it.

"Castle Acre"

13 miles west-southwest of Lynn.

"curtilage"

Derived from a French word roughly meaning "courtyard", the term is used today primarily in legal contexts and normally refers to that part of an enclosed residential property which is not built on. Enclosure and clear association with a home (geographically and functionally) are elements of the modern legal definition, insofar as one has been established by the courts. As can be seen from the case of Lambert's curtilage, enclosure is one of its characteristics, but there is no evident association with any of the houses he owned. Use of the term in the Middle Ages seems to have been loose, and all we can say is that it referred to an area of private land not built on, with boundaries probably defined by some kind of enclosure, and function varying from a domestic yard to an area where cultivation might take place (although not strictly a garden), or animals be kept, or possibly even industrial activities take place.

Like the overcoat (supertunica), the tabard was a tunic worn atop other clothing.

"striped"

The first instance is in the original stragulatam, while the second is de raye, so there was a difference in the way the cloth was striped.

"perse-coloured"

A dark blue cloth.

DISCUSSION

There were a number of dedications to St. Mary in the city. St. Mary at Hill stood in the southeast quarter of London, the parish stretching down to the Thames, but the church itself was located upslope: London's walls enclosed two low hills rising from the river's edge and separated by the Walbrook, and it was possibly the eastern rise that gave the church its name.

England is not rich in medieval records from parish churches, but a volume of church records from the fifteenth century has survived for St. Mary at Hill. It contains documents related to properties held by the church and the several chantries founded there, inventories of church goods, and accounts of the churchwardens. The last type of document is represented by several accounts, or extracts therefrom, from the 1420s and then, after a hiatus, a fairly good series from 1477 through to the end of the century. These accounts focus heavily, but not exclusively, on revenues and expenditures related to the maintenance of the chantries and the properties whose rents supported the chantries; it is notable that, although we hear of numerous of the chantry priests and the parish clerk and sexton are well in evidence, William Wyld, the parson of the church at this time, does not figure in the accounts at all. The accounts from the 1420s are relatively unorganized itemizations of either receipts or expenditures, but not both. Those from the 1470s are more closely organized and represent fair copies of rougher lists, probably recorded as items occurred, and possibly with separate records for receipts and for outgoings; they suggest greater attention to the accounting process. Whereas the accounts for 1477-79 are organized mainly by chantry, those for 1479-81 were organized by type of expenditure, with the chantries being integrated except as regards repairs to their properties. Later accounts were variations on one or both of these themes.

The types of expenditure in 1479-81 were, however, much the same as in the preceding two years. Various locks needed attention, the candlesticks and other metal furnishings of the church needed cleaning, and the church linen and priestly vestments required further mending, while the best cope was decorated with gold, silk, pearls, buckram and ribbons. The procession churchyard was refreshed with new gravel; church and vestry windows were in need of repairs, and a major job of retiling the church roof was undertaken, while there were also significant renovations to the steeple. The construction of a new pew was commissioned, and a table acquired for the vestry, on which to lay out the copes on festival days. Holy water sprinklers were purchased, and a new quire inserted into the antiphoner. A substantial part of the expenditures continued to be in repairs to the chantry properties, and it becomes evident that some expenditures at least were being cleared with the parish community before bills were paid.

Other than minor items of receipt, such as donations towards the cost of painting a image of the Virgin Mary inside the church and 1d. paid by an unidentified woman for her being allocated a place in the pews, the revenues differed in the 1479-81 accounts only in that we hear of two further chantries. Their absence from the 1477-79 accounts is strange because both were testamentary foundations of the fourteenth century, by John Nasing and Rose Wrytell. Wrytell had bequeathed in 1323 property in Thames Street that is referred to in 1485 as one large tenement (rented as a whole by a single individual, an ironmonger); it was then called the "old Swan" and elsewhere the "Swan on the Hoop", and may have been a tavern or inn when Wrytell owned it, as she refers to her brewing equipment therein. The property assigned to Nasing's chantry (founded ca.1361) was a tenement incorporating shops; by 1483 there were ten tenants, most of them occupying individual chambers, so it is unlikely that all these would have been vacant for several years. The lack of reference to these chantry properties in the 1477-79 accounts is therefore difficult to understand; and yet even in the 1479-81 accounts neither chantry's properties were furnishing rents for the entire two years. There is some small indication, however, that Nasing's chantry may have earlier been combined with Weston's or perhaps that of Bedeham (whose will made provision for prayers to be said for Nasing). Some kind of transition may have been taking place; it may be noted that the 1479-81 accounts make no reference to obits for Wrytell or Nasing, although these become items of expenditure in later accounts.

With the several chantries active in the church, services must have been going on there throughout much of the day. The church would normally be locked up at night, but opened just before dawn by the morrow-mass priest who said the first mass. Later in the morning would arrive the chantry priests to sing their matins and masses at one or other of the several altars in the church. Various other services were conducted by these priests during the day and into the early evening. Obits, diriges, special services at the frequent festivals – at the most important of which the church would be decked out with flora and/or banners – as well as funerals, weddings and other such ceremonies would have made a city church a more lively place than most parish churches are today.

NOTES

"chantry of John Weston"

Weston, a merchant who made his will in 1407, sought burial in St. Mary at Hill and bequeathed to the parson and churchwardens a property he and his wife had purchased in the same parish, to furnish £4 to hire a priest to celebrate daily for his soul and that of his widow, to pay the parson a fee for conducting divine services on Weston's anniversary, and to pay other minor costs, to a grand total of £4.15s.2d; with any surplus from the rent to be distributed among poor parishioners. By 1477 the chantry had assigned to it 9 tenements in the parish – possibly reflecting subdivision of the original property, or perhaps the addition of property as other chantries were amalgamated with Weston's; the rents of these 9 tenements ranged from 8s. to £4, and several were being paid by priests. Two other properties, one in the neighbouring parish of St. Botolph and the other also nearby in St. Leonard's, were also providing rents, while smaller quitrents were coming from two further properties.

"chantry of John Causton"

Causton was a prominent mercer who served as alderman between 1323 and 1350. His residence was adjacent to St. Mary's churchyard, although he chose to be buried in St. Pancras'. He died in 1353, bequeathing his residence and several shops – some on the banks of the Thames at Billingsgate, and others in East

Cheap (St. Andrew's parish) and parishes in the vicinity – to the Benedictine convent of St. Helen's Bishopgate. With an obligation to the prioress to use some of the revenues to pay: £6.13s.4d annual salary to a priest to celebrate in St. Mary at Hill for the testator, his two wives, and various members of the Causton, Abingdon and Langton families; 4s.10d in fees to the parson, parish clerk and his assistant for celebrating Causton's anniversary; and 20s. to pay for candles to burn before various altars in the church at specific times. Causton also bequeathed to St. Mary's his brewery in that parish, to support a priest to celebrate for the soul of Henry Barnard. In 1477 we hear of 4 tenements in St. Mary at Hill parish, 2 tenements in St. Andrew's parish, 3 tenements and 5 gardens in St. Botolph's, and 1 in Gracechurch Street assigned to the chantry.

"chantry of Richard Gosselyn"

Gosselyn was an ironmonger who served as alderman 1423-29; he made his will in 1428 and died three years later. His widow was to fund from the properties her husband left her a chantry within St. Katherine's chapel in St. Mary at Hill; to be continued after her death, when the property passed into the hands of parson and churchwardens. The revenues were also to cover the cost of a 5 lb. candle burning before St. Katherine's altar every Sunday and festival day, and 6d. a week given to the 2 of the neediest poor men and 2 of the neediest poor women in the parish, to pray for Gosselyn's soul; there is no indication from the accounts that these alms were being paid. From any surplus, the churchwardens might take 3s.4d for their labour, and the rest was to go to maintenance of the church. The property bequeathed to support the chantry was in St. Leonard's parish, and in 1477 the church's rental listed 6 tenements there from which rents were paid, along with a very small sum paid by a tailor without further explanation. Gosselyn's widow Beatrice married fishmonger John Bedeham.

"chantry of John Bedeham"

A fishmonger (presumably descended from the man who married Gosselyn's widow) who died ca.1472. He bequeathed to St. Mary at Hill a tenement in the neighbouring parish of St. George, to support: a chantry in St. Katherine's chapel in St. Mary at Hill; an oil lamp to be kept alight perpetually; celebration of the testator's anniversary; and 4d. a week in alms to 3 of the most needy poor parishioners. With any surplus going towards maintenance and renovations of the church. Bedeham also bequeathed the church a large garden just outside the walls, near Tower Hill, to pay for a priest to celebrate morning mass and remembers in his prayers the soul of John Nasing. The 1477 rental, registered immediately before the churchwardens' accounts, mentions only the St. George's property.

"William Cambridge"

Cambridge began his career as an ironmonger, but later advanced to the status of grocer; he was a city alderman 1415-32. His will was made at the close of 1431, and he died the following year. He desired burial in St. Stephen's chapel in St. Mary at Hill, to which (along with the wardens of the Grocers' Company) he bequeathed an unspecified number of tenements – although the 1477 rental and account refer only to one – to support a priest to celebrate for his soul in the same chapel, to provide candles for a candelabrum he had earlier given to the church, to cover costs of the celebration of his anniversary, and to pay annual fees to the mayor, sheriffs, and the mayor's swordbearer as incentive for them to ensure the terms of Cambridge's foundation were carried out. With any remainder going to the use of the church. Although not specified in the will, it also became the custom during Evensong on Christmas day for the parson, parish clerk and choirboys to make a procession to Cambridge's tomb, carrying candles and singing hymns dedicated to St. Stephen.

"arrears"

The first three were from rents assigned to Weston's chantry, and the fourth to a rent assigned to Causton's chantry.

"beam light"

Candlesticks that were attached to the rood-beam; the amounts received were probably donations or bequests to purchase candles.

"taper" "prickets"

Tapers were long, slender candles placed in holders, as opposed to short thick candles that might be put on plates; prickets were candles that were stuck on spikes, rather than being placed in candlesticks.

"melted wax"

Referred to in the original as the wast; the meltdown would be used to make new candles.

"hogshead"

A cask used to contain wine, ale or beer (or other liquid items such as oil or honey). It was not necessarily of any consistent fixed capacity during the Middle Ages, but varied according to the contents. In later times it has been used to refer to measures ranging between 50 and 140 gallons; a wine hogshead was probably closer to 63 gallons (two barrels) in the late medieval period, for in 1423 a statute defined a pipe of wine as 126 gallons, and two hogsheads made a pipe.

"Proyne" "Prune"

Possibly the same man.

"Crulle"

The deaths of several members of the family probably evidence the outbreak of plague around this time, as may the reference (at the close of the account) to the fate of the Vavaseres.

"pardon churchyard"

The east and west ends of the church faced directly onto streets, and there were therefore separate churchyards on the north and south side. The latter appears to have been the pardon churchyard; it more private and more commonly used for burials and storage. The former would have been the procession churchyard; it was also occasionally used for cheaper burials.

"quitrent"

Earlier known as a rent resolute, it was a financial charge on a property that was passed along when the property changed ownership.

"2 years ending at Christmas 1479"

This entry seems to be in error, and perhaps should say: for 1 year ending at Christmas 1478.

"John Philippe" "John Colyns" "Philip Norton"

They were also tenants of some of the rental properties assigned to the chantries they served.

"serving the choir"

This would appear to mean looking after (i.e. cleaning etc.) the choir. Modley, the tenant of one of the properties assigned to Causton's chantry, was apparently the sexton; during the period covered by this account he took over the post of parish clerk, at a doubling of his wages. But this was apparently only an acting assignment, until Thomas Warwyk was appointed; Modley again stepped in when Warwyk left (1480/81), until Saunder Clerke was appointed.

"William Paris"

He appears to have been used by the church as an odd-job man; in 1490 he is referred to as one of the poor men receiving alms from Bedeham's chantry. In the 1479-81 accounts, we find a John Paris similarly employed: sweeping out the church and the parsonage, mending the church window, and other tasks.

"a baldrick and a new buckle"

In this context a baldrick was a strap from which the clapper was hung inside the bell, and used to control how the clapper will strike the bell; the buckle was presumably to attach the baldrick to the bell.

"fathoms"

A measure applied to ropes, equivalent to 6 feet.

"albs, amices"

An alb is the long white linen robe worn by a priest, and an amice is the piece of white linen worn around the neck and over the shoulders of a priest during mass.

"watching the church"

Usually a church was locked up at night; but there were some circumstances in which it was left open, and a nightwatch was required to protect the valuables (including the sacrament).

"oil"

Oil lamps were becoming more common at this time, as the whaling industry grew and furnished a more abundant supply; during the 1479-81 accounting period, the church purchased 34 gallons (compared to 16 gallons in 1428-29), as well as a pot in which to store oil, while in 1487-88 12 gallons were purchased just for Wrytell's chantry alone.

"antiphonary"

A liturgical book containing the psalm verses or sections of holy scripture chanted by the choir during services (notably, Matins and Vespers).

"birch"

Used to decorate the church at this festival.

"bread, ale and wine"

It was common for medieval officials, ecclesiastical or secular, to take some refreshment after the conduct of business.

"pax"

A small tablet bearing an image of the crucifixion, the Blessed Virgin or some other religious symbol, kissed during mass by the priest and others (instead of kissing each other) as an indication of being at peace with God and with fellow celebrants.

"Michael Gloctir"

Later referred to as an organ-maker.

"capis"

Possibly the keys or the organ covers?

"loads"

The pricing here and in other items makes it evident that a load comprised 6 sacks.

"laths"

Thin planks used for walls and ceilings in building construction.

"sixpenny nails"

Nails of a certain size, so that a hundred cost 6d.

"spriggs"

Small headless nails.

"quarterons"

An uncertain weight, and perhaps one varying according to context; the term could be similarly used for a quantity.

"wainscot"

A wooden panel usually used in walls; here it appears that some kind of moveable screen was being constructed.

"ties"

A measure representing 6 ft. if linear, or about 4.5 sq.yds if area.

"plate"

A term used to refer to horizontal timber beams of various kinds.

"binding joist"

A term applied to tie-beams that were part of a house frame, connecting the outer horizontal beams, so as to prevent the frame from spreading.

"quarters"

Smaller pieces of timber, equivalent to today's 2"-by-4" or 4"-by-4".

"Foster Lane"

The name had been corrupted from Vaast, a French bishop of the 6th century whose cult had been brought to England by the Normans.

"William Dighton"

Clerical error; the rental gives John Dighen as the tenant, as does the arrears section of the account.

"lire board"

Littlehales suggests this may mean edge boards.

"bast rope"

A rope made from tough fibres, such as obtained from flax, hemp, or some inner barks.

"privies"

This seems to be what is intended by Sege holis (seat holes).

"scavagers"

One of the duties of this minor civil official was to patrol the streets to look out for public nuisances (e.g. broken pavement, for which the tenant in front of whose house the pavement lay could be held responsible).

"6 February 1480"

This date would suggest the account was rendered well after the termination of the period it was supposed to cover.

"kilderkin"

A measure equivalent to 18 gallons (half a barrel).

"action of debt"

Stevyns is listed in the rental as tenant of a garden (associated with Causton's chantry) but may also have held a house associated with Cambridge's chantry, as the rental does not identify the tenants. As the list of arrears at the end of the account confirms, he owed a sizable amount in back-rent and the churchwardens had pressured him to pay up by having a legal action brought and Stevyns arrested. However, the parishioners decided that there were mitigating circumstances and waived part of the arrears; the case against him was dropped, perhaps on assurance by Stevyns that he would pay the rest. Whether those circumstances were personal hardship, or old age or illness, cannot be said, but Stevyns does not appear as a tenant in the following year – he may have been evicted or died.

"Richard Cyrik"

In the 1483-85 accounts referred to as Richard Crick upholsterer.

"money owing him"

Warwyk was the parish clerk, lasting in that office until about 1480. The wages of the parish clerks seem to have been paid by a levy on householding parishioners, although some parishioners were often in arrears. The 1483-85 accounts include a list of 76 parishioners contributing amounts, varying from 1d. to 16d., towards "the clerk's wages".

"Potations"

A drink between parties following business – whether the payment of a rent, or the completion of some repair job – was a way of keeping relations on a friendly level.

"Thomas Breteyn and John Smert"

Contrary to what one might expect, these were not the churchwardens for the succeeding term of office. They were probably parishioners who acted as auditors.

"box"

Probably the treasury chest in the vestry.

"William Wyld"

He is referred to as parson in John Bedeham's will (1472), again in 1492, and appears to have retired from the living or died ca.1503; a man of the same name, likely a relative, was sexton in the 1520s. Much of the parish work may have been carried out by his deputy, the parish priest.

"a place in the pews"

Seating in medieval churches was segregated: men sat apart from women, rich sat apart from poor.

1. [Election of the mayor]

In the name of the Trinity – Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, three persons and one God in Majesty – the principal and special patron of the city of Norwich and its entire community, in honour of whom our mother church was founded and dedicated, on St. Valentine's day, when (it is said) people are moved by love to choose their mates, in the second year of King Henry V [14 February 1415], in the time of John Biskele, mayor, and Henry Rafman and Thomas Cok, sheriffs, with the consent of the good commonalty of the city of Norwich. Which city has been divided, disturbed and brought to the point of destruction by disputes, controversies, changes in direction, and discord concerning various matters that have for some time remained unsettled. Now, thanks to the mediation and prayers of St. Valentine, the city is prompted out of love to bring about peace, unity and one accord, [so that] poor and rich shall be united in their hearts, love and charitable feelings, never again from this time forward to be torn asunder, through the help and grace of their special patron the Holy Trinity, but rather to stand wholly united and in agreement as to the articles written below, in the following tenor, that is, in this form:

The mayor of the city of Norwich shall be chosen annually on May 1, in the Guildhall. To which election the mayor and the 24 co-citizens shall come – every one of them, except he who has a valid reason for being excused, upon penalty of 2s. [for default], to be levied by the sergeant and paid to the use of the commonalty. In addition, all those persons chosen for the Common Council for that year are to attend the election, every one of them, except he who has a valid reason for being excused, upon penalty of 12d. Also, all citizens who are residents of the city shall be free to attend the election, as they ought to do; the doors of the hall are to be open to all citizens who wish to enter, without hindrance, and none shut out or prevented from coming in, except for outsiders.

Then the mayor and the 24 are to go up to the bench, and shortly thereafter the recorder of the city then in office, or (when he is absent) someone in his place designated by the mayor or his lieutenant, is to announce the reason for the gathering at the election. Following the making of this announcement, the mayor and the 24 shall remove into the chamber of the hall and wait there. Then the common speaker is to stand up and say as follows to all the members of the community there assembled:

"Sirs and friends, for the love of our lord Jesus Christ, in proceeding with the election at hand, acting well and honestly and without favouritism, hate or fear, do not fail to select and nominate two qualified persons for the office of mayor, such as will bring honour and profit to the city, and who each have [already] been mayor or sheriff of the city, but neither have been mayor during the previous three years."

Which aforesaid two persons are to be chosen in the following manner. That is, that he who has the greatest support of the people in the hall is to be received and accepted as one of the pair; and he who has the next greatest support of the people in the hall is to be taken as the other of the pair. The names of those two thus chosen are to be written down on a bill, and communicated by the common speaker and six members of the Common Council to the mayor and 24 in the chamber of the hall. After giving this notification, those six shall go back into the hall. At that point the common clerk, under the supervision of the recorder and the common speaker, is to have the bill in his custody. The mayor, in person and alone, is to approach those three persons in the part of the chamber where they are, and to each of them separately and secretly shall name which one of the two nominees he wishes to have as mayor; and in the same fashion each of the 24 then present is to go to those three persons and separately and secretly and name which one of the two nominees he wishes to have as mayor. The one of the pair who has the largest number of votes as a result of this scrutinized tally is to be admitted to the mayoralty for the coming year; if there is a deadlock, the mayor's vote shall count for two votes.

Should controversy arise due to disagreement among the commons in the hall upon the nomination of the two persons, so that the common speaker cannot find any way of determining clearly which two have the greatest support, then the common speaker and the common clerk are to go to the mayor and advise him of the division among the people in the hall. The mayor is then to give the common speaker a command to gather together the 60 members of the Common Council of the city – or as many as are then present – in a room by themselves. There they shall try to settle the differences of opinion in the same way that has been, and still is, used in the city of London.

Shortly after the election of the mayor for the coming year, the mayor then in office, along with the sheriffs and the 24, shall come back into the hall among the commons and take the dais. The mayor having taken his seat, the recorder (or, in his absence, another designated by the mayor or his lieutenant) is to announce to those of the commonalty then present the name of he who has been chosen as the new mayor. If he so chosen as mayor is then present, the mayor shall bring him honourably to sit beside him, on his right side.

2. [Election of the sheriffs]

It is also agreed that each of the sheriffs are to be chosen on September 8, in the following manner. That is, the mayor, sheriffs, 24, and the 60 members of the Common Council are to come to the election, upon the same penalty set in the case of the mayoral election, unless any has a valid reason for being excused. All other citizens may freely attend the election, in the same way as set out for attending the mayoral election. Then the mayor, sheriffs, and the 24 are to go into the mayor's chamber. There the mayor, with the advice and agreement of his 24 counsellors, or the greater part of them, are to choose one sheriff for whom they shall be answerable, the mayor's vote counting double if deadlock should arise. Then the mayor, sheriffs, and 24 are to go back into the hall, and take [\[their seats on\]](#) the bench, and there a public announcement is to be made by the recorder, or someone in his place designated by the mayor or his lieutenant, to the commons then present of the sheriff thus chosen by the mayor and the 24 (or greater part of the same). Upon which, the mayor is to command the commonalty to gather together and choose a co-citizen resident in the city for the other sheriff – such a one for whom they will be answerable during the year to come. Then the mayor, sheriffs, and 24 are to go into the chamber of the hall, and the commons in the hall are duly to proceed with the election of the other sheriff. When the commons have chosen a sheriff they are to convey to the mayor, sheriffs, and 24, through the common speaker, the name of him they have chosen. If any disagreement divides the people and the commons, concerning the election of a sheriff, then this disagreement is to be settled through the 60 members of the common council, just as set out in the case of disagreement over the mayoral election. He who serves once as sheriff of the city shall never thereafter be chosen again to the same office in the city.

3. [\[Election of the 24\]](#)

The election of the 24 is to taken place annually during the same four days that the Common Council are chosen, by each ward individually, in the following manner. The mayor is to say:

"Sirs, it is stated by charter that you shall each year choose 24 co-citizens for the mayor's council.

Notwithstanding which, it has been agreed and consented to, through the composition made, that the names of the 24 should be read out to you on this day. That is to say, six qualified men for Conesford (if there are that many qualified in the ward) to be members of the 24; and if there are not that many qualified, it is allowed for the ward [constituents] to make up the number by choosing from qualified men in any other ward of the city."

And in the same way, 6 for Mancroft ward, 6 for Wymer ward, and 6 for the Ward over the Water. Who are to be freely chosen during the 4 days when the Common Council is chosen, as is more fully set out below.

Those 24 thus chosen are to remain in office in perpetuity, as is done in London by ordinance, unless [removed] for reasonable cause.

Should it happen that any reasonable cause is found for any of the 24 persons on the aforementioned day, then the mayor is to be notified of such reasonable cause for changing a member. Then the mayor is to instruct the ward in question not to fail or neglect to gather together to choose another qualified person to be a member of the 24, in place of such person to be changed. If there is any controversy among the people of the ward concerning a reasonable cause for changing any of the members of the 24, it is to be decided by the majority vote of those assembled that day whether there is reasonable cause or not to change one and nominate another. The reasonable causes for accusation and discharge brought against a member of the 24 in the city of Norwich are to be the same as the reasonable causes for accusation and discharge regarding the 24 in the city of London. Once the 24 is chosen, if it seems to the mayor that any of the members is not qualified, then the mayor has [the power] to challenge and veto, just as the mayor of London does, according to the ordinances of the city of London.

It is also agreed, concerning the charter article about the 24, that they shall do or make nothing that binds or commits the city, without the consent of the commonalty. In that regard the article concerning the 24 is to be amended in a [new] charter article corresponding to that in the London charter concerning the 24.

Also, no mayor, or sheriff, or any member of the 24 is to receive or wear the livery of any lord while he holds the office of mayor, sheriff, or member of the 24, upon penalty of disfranchisement – that is, whoever does the contrary shall be deprived of his freedom of the city. Nor is any man to be chosen as a member of the 24 who keeps a common hostelry or common alehouse.

4. [Election of the Common Council]

It is also agreed that the election of the 60 citizens for the Common Council is to be made annually by the 4 wards, in the following manner. That [it be held] on Monday following Passion Sunday, except when it falls on Lady Day [the Annunciation of the B.V.M., March 25], in which case the election is to be held on the next working day. On the Sunday preceding that Monday the mayor is to instruct his officers that they must, upon penalty of losing their office, duly forewarn the ward of Conesford that all enfranchised male householders of that ward should come to the Guildhall on that Monday at 8 o'clock, unless Lady Day falls on that day – in which case, the next working day.

When they are assembled, the mayor and one of the 24 chosen for that ward shall announce, or have announced, the reason for coming and then command them to get together to choose 12 qualified men from the ward to sit on the Common Council for the year to come; that is, 6 in Conesford and 6 in Berstrete. The names of those so chosen are to be presented forthwith to the mayor, by 4 persons assigned [to that task] by the entire ward. These being presented, the mayor is then to administer to them their oath to give good and true counsel, to the best of their knowledge, for the benefit of the city, and to be ready to attend the Common Council whenever summoned, upon the penalty set in that regard, unless any has a valid reason for being excused. Also, in Mancroft ward on the day following (unless Lady Day falls thereon) they are to choose in the manner mentioned above 16 men; that is, 7 from St. Peter Mancroft, 5 in St. Stephen's, and 4 in St. Giles. In Wymer ward, on the next day following, they are to choose in the same manner 20 men for the Common Council; that is, 7 in St. Gregory's, 7 in St. Andrew's, and 6 in St. George's. The Ward over the Water, on the next day following, is to choose in the same manner 12 men for the Common Council; that is, 6 for Coslany and 6 for Fybriggate.

In the above manner is the Common Council to be chosen annually. And the persons thus chosen for the Common Council in Norwich are to have the same power as have those persons chosen for the Common Council in London. It is the responsibility of the mayor or his lieutenant to uphold the manner of the election of the 24 and of the members of the Common Council on the aforementioned ward days, by virtue of the oath he makes for his mayoral office, before the mayor [then in office] in a communal assembly, after the form of the oath taken in London.

All ordinances and regulations that seem to the mayor and 24 to be useful and desirable for the needs and welfare of the city, the mayor then in office is to read out, or have read out by the recorder (or, in his absence, some other person designated by the mayor), to the Common Council. Following which promulgation, if it seems to the 60 members of the Common Council that those matters put before them require more discussion and deliberation before they can respond, they are to request a respite for deliberation and more discussion and whatever else seems expedient, through the common speaker, of the mayor and [those of] his council then sitting. By command of the mayor, a bill containing the matters in question is to be delivered to them, for response at the next assembly or at some other time, sooner or later, as seems [best] to them regarding the matters of concern. The mayor has the obligation to permit without any refusal, as often as they request it, that they may gather together privately in another room, no-one else with them except the common speaker; if they wish others to join them, as often as they request this the mayor is obliged to send for those others without argument. Concerning matters that the 60 members of the Common Council do not feel needs detailed or lengthy discussion, it is [nonetheless] allowable if they wish to withdraw to a private location with their common speaker to accomplish their task without too much delay – whatever seems to them necessary to a successful outcome – and come back with their answer.

5. [Judicial jurisdiction]

It is also agreed that the mayor is to hold a court of jurisdiction and correction once a week, or more often if it seems necessary and advantageous, to hear and determine before himself in his court all kinds of [complaints of] extortion, oppression, injury, excess, ignorance, false arrest, or negligence committed by any lesser officer; to examine, correct, redress, and reform such complaints and award compensation to aggrieved parties, according to the seriousness of the offence. And, as the one who is the principal Justice of the Peace in the city, he is to entertain in his court, before himself, all cases concerning apprentices and apprenticeships, servants and their service, according to the Statute of Labourers; also: cases of fine and ransome [to be paid] by prisoners taken and not acquitted of the same by their fellows; cases concerning debt, letters of payment, and of all other contracts drawn up or put in place between merchant and merchant, or any person from overseas; and all other cases and matters that fall to the mayoralty, except where they concern revenues that pertain by right to the sheriffs. The mayor is not to bring to trial before himself in his court any cases without there being a bill of complaint from the plaintiff's party, setting out the grievances of the complainant. The recorder who is assigned to the mayor is to take oath, before the mayor and his council in a common assembly, that he shall give him good and true counsel regarding the governance of the common people's communal rights. And the communal treasury shall not pay for any negligence or offence committed by the sheriffs or their officers. Nor shall the recorder act as judge in the sheriffs' court, or give counsel to anything that may be to the hindrance of the mayor's court, in contravention of the oath mentioned above.

It is also agreed that all cases involving rents, lands and tenements, or registrations, enrolments, and recognizances are to be held before the mayor and sheriffs in the mayor's court, with the revenues therefrom going to the sheriffs and fees for recording enrolments to the mayor's clerk.

Also that whatever man brings a complaint before the mayor or the sheriffs, seeking a surety of the peace, then the mayor or sheriffs have the obligation to see that he has surety as the law requires. And that person who provides surety in the town court is not to find surety, on the same matter, in any other. He who on a matter of surety of the peace (or for any other cause) is at the mayor's command committed to prison, the sheriffs may not set free without specific instructions from the mayor.

As regards the assize of bread, the mayor, the sheriffs, or one of the sheriffs together with the mayor, are to hold the assize and identify the infringements, and the fine is to be assessed by the mayor and the sheriffs according to the extent of the offence. The fines for which adjudged infringements shall go to the sheriffs. He who is found in infringement twice, the fine therefrom shall be put towards the sheriffs' [payment of the farm]. At the third infringement he is to receive punishment as the law requires; and if he is shown the mercy of allowing him to pay a fine for his infringement, then that fine is to be assessed by the mayor and the sheriffs, three of the 24, and 6 commoners chosen for the Common Council – which 6 persons are to be chosen by the 60 members of the Common Council; and the fine that he pays shall be put to the common profit. The mayor is to have the [power of] search and correction over all other victuals within the city, with the revenues going to the sheriffs.

6. [Liveries]

It is also agreed, and incorporated in the composition, that the mayor and the 24 are to be clothed in a costume suitable to their status. That is, that all those who have served as mayor of this city are to wear fur-lined cloaks, according to what is required by the season of the year. Those of the status of the 24 have the obligation of accompanying the mayor, dressed in their best suit of clothes, on the principal [saints] days to Christ Church, to assemblies and to other places within the city. When the mayor rides, all those who have served as mayor are to ride in their cloaks, and the other peers in their suits of livery. Every man who has been mayor has the duty to uphold this ordinance, upon penalty of £20, and every one of the remaining members of the 24 upon penalty of 100s.; which penalty is to be levied by the mayor, for the common profit.

No man who is a bondman is hereafter to be chosen for the office of mayor or sheriff. The commonalty is to have the same access to information about the communal goods, and the same level of safekeeping of the same, as the commons have of the communal goods in London.

7. [Legislative authority]

It is also agreed that even if at the renewal of the charter the article about the 24 that follows is enshrined in the charter, as mentioned above, that the 24 are to be nominated and elected annually to administer and legislate for the city, as is specified in the article, nonetheless it is agreed and consented to that they shall remain permanently in office, except for reasonable cause, based on this ordinance and not on point of charter on the matter.

Furthermore, we have granted for ourselves and our heirs, and by this our charter have confirmed to our citizens, that should any customs of the city previously in force and used in the city in any regard become problematic or unsatisfactory, so that – because of new situations arising in the city, for which no remedy has previously been available – what has been ordained requires adjustment; then the mayor of the city then in office and the 24 co-citizens of the city elected each year by the community have the power and authority to ordain and implement, with the consent of the community, a remedy congruent with good faith and consonant with reason, for the common utility of the citizens of the city and others of our faithful [subjects] who visit the same. And to put into execution such ordinances, as the situation demands, as often and whenever as is needed or as seems advisable to them. On condition that these ordinances are useful to us and our people, in good faith, and consonant with reason, as already mentioned.

8. [Election of mayor's assistants]

Also, every year at the mayor's convocation on May 3 is to be held a common assembly, at which the mayor newly elected on the preceding May 1 is to nominate two persons to bear the [mayor's] sword; from which pair the assembly shall select one by majority decision of those present. At the same assembly the [mayor]-elect is to nominate 4 persons for his two sergeants; from whom the common assembly, or the majority thereof, shall select two to attend upon the mayor for the year, in the office of sergeant.

9. [Annual review of by-laws]

It is also ordained and agreed, by the consent of the common assembly, that following the election of the 24 and the 60 members of the Common Council all ordinances and regulations that have been made and been in force prior to that date, but are not covered by this agreement, shall be put before the mayor, the sheriffs, the 24, and the 60 members of the Common Council. Those that are good and beneficial are to be kept, and those no longer suitable are, by [the authority of] this agreement, to be set aside. All other issues that may need to be addressed for the welfare of the city, but which are not thought of at present, lie within the power of the entire assembly to address and remedy through ordinance, with the consent of the entire community, for the benefit of the whole city.

10. [Election of other bureaucratic officers]

It is also ordained that once the newly-elected mayor has thus chosen his officers, forthwith the same day at that assembly the entire assembly is to choose the recorder, bellman, and dykekeeper. Next the mayor and the 24, by themselves, are to choose a common clerk, a coroner, two clavigers, and 8 constables. Then the 60 members of the Common Council, by themselves, are to choose a common speaker, a coroner, two clavigers, and 8 constables. On September 21 following in an annual assembly convoked by the mayor are to be chosen, for the year to come, by the mayor and the 24 one chamberlain, one treasurer, two auditors ([from those] who are not accountable for communal goods), and three commoners to act as advisors to the chamberlains for that year. And the 60 members of the Common Council chosen for that year are, by and for themselves, also to choose from their own number one chamberlain, one treasurer, one common sergeant, two auditors (who are not accountable for communal goods), and three commoners to act as advisors to the city chamberlains. Which officers chosen for the year have the obligation [to be present] at a common assembly following the end of their year in office, convoked by the mayor between Michaelmas [29 September] and Hallowmas [1 November]. At which assembly statements are to be made of what goods the community possesses, in debts and ready cash, and the names of the debtors; notwithstanding which [declaration] the treasurers shall remain obligated to the community for the same debt and debtors, and be accountable to the community for the debts due, unless those treasurers have a valid cause to be excused of the same.

11. [Supervision of craft work]

It is also ordained that each craft in the city is to choose annually and freely, from the craft membership, two masters for the year to come. [The names of] which 2 masters are to be presented by men of that craft in a written bill to the mayor. On a certain day of the year fixed in advance by ordinance – that is, the Monday following the mayor's riding – those masters have the duty (under the oath to that effect made before the mayor) of carrying out a thorough and honest survey throughout their craft of all defects in the craft. All notable defects that they discover in their craft are to be faithfully reported to the mayor, without any concealment. The mayor and the masters reporting the defects, along with other of the more prominent men of the same craft, shall judge the faults and assess fines according to the gravity of the offence; of which fines, half shall go to the sheriffs and half to the masters of the crafts.

Should it be found that the masters conceal any notable defects, then the masters are to be punished for the concealment, according to the gravity of the offence, by decision of the mayor and the more prominent men of that craft. Or if there is any craft that needs to be surveyed but will not have a survey conducted, then the mayor is to send for the craft and order them to choose 2 masters from their number; and if they will not choose and present the names within 8 days following, then the mayor is allowed, in default of the craft that refuses to choose anyone, to choose for the craft 2 members of that craft and to instruct them to carry out a thorough and honest survey, in the manner mentioned above. Those crafts subject to searches in the city of London are to be subject to searches in the city of Norwich, and in the same fashion as applied at London, except for those crafts that are privileged to have [letters] patent granted by the king, in the form of a charter. If there is any craft in Norwich that does not exist in London, they are to choose masters of the craft annually and act in the same manner as do other crafts in the city of Norwich.

[Cap.12 to 14 are concerned with limitations on the rights of non-freemen residents and are not of immediate concern here. Non-freemen could follow a trade for a temporary period, under licence, but at the end of that period had to enter the franchise. Similarly, they might not have apprentices or employees, except in specific circumstances. Apprenticeships were to be registered officially, and all entering the franchise had to do so as a member of a specific craft. This section of the composition will be presented under the category "Community - Membership". The following extracts are pertinent to constitutional matters:]

... Six men are to be chosen to act as the chamberlain's committee for the admission of burgesses.

... No alien of any kind may hold community office within the city. Burgesses who are chosen to be knights of the shire for the city are to be chosen by the common assembly and the names of the persons so chosen are to be presented and made public in full shire [court] within the city, to the mayor, sheriffs, and the councillors then present in the Guildhall.

15. [Gild liveries]

It is also agreed and ordained, and by this composition established and confirmed, that the costumes and headgear used in the past by all gilds and companies in the city of Norwich, as well as the names and privileges of those gilds and companies relating to the livery and costume of the gilds and companies, are from this time forward to be put aside and left aside. All crafts that wish to costume themselves are to do so after the fashion in London. That clothing is to bear the name of the craft in question, and not of any other; no craft is to be fitted out in the colours of another affiliated craft. If [members of] any craft gild or company pursue [their past practice] or appear contrary to the above requirement – excepting only crafts that are self-contained and have no affiliation with other crafts – then they are to be arrested as rebels against the peace and the terms of agreement in the city, and committed to prison, there to remain until they have paid a fine and ransome, as determined by the mayor and the entire assembly, for their offence.

If any man brings legal proceedings, on the basis of [royal letters] patent, to obtain any office in the city, he that does so may not hold any kind of office in the city. [This] in protection of the liberties of the city, which the king has granted by charter. Whoever acts so is to be disfranchised.

16. [Taxation]

Concerning the king's tax, when the time comes for it to be collected in the city, it is agreed that the common assembly is to choose, for each of the 4 wards of the city, 4 men to assess the tax and 2 men to collect it. That is, from Conesford ward 4 men to assess the tax in that ward. Those persons thus chosen by the assembly are to take oath before the mayor that they will properly and correctly assess every man of the ward, according to the extent of his goods. The other 2 men who are to be chosen to collect the tax in that ward are to take oath to collect it properly and honestly, based on documentation provided them by the assessors, and shall not at their own initiative or authority, out of friendship, enmity or fear, increase or reduce [the assessment] contrary to their oath. So that those 4 persons of each ward and the 2 of the same ward, chosen by the assembly for that ward – that is to say, 4 to assess and 2 to collect – shall correctly and honestly carry out their duty according to their oath, as indicated above.

In witness of all things stated above, the mayor, sheriffs, and commonalty, by the unanimous consent of the entire city, have as an indication that they will respect this agreement in its entirety appended the common seal and the mayor and sheriffs their seals.
Made at Norwich on 14 February 1415.

DISCUSSION

I have elsewhere provided background to and assessment of the political struggle that gave rise to the Composition of 1415, in The Men Behind the Masque and in the History of medieval Norwich, and will not repeat the details of events here. I have only a few, mostly general, observations to add.

Unlike most constitutional settlements of which record has survived to us from the Middle Ages, that of Norwich is relatively detailed in some of its provisions. The specifications for the elaborate conduct of elections evidently had in mind concerns, justified or not, about how a fair election might be subverted. The document's purpose is, however, not to state those concerns but to present solutions; we are left to speculate about the underlying problems.

In this regard, we must suspect that most provisions will have been included because of specific instances of difficulty that have arisen in the past. Hence, for example, that the document containing the names of candidates was held by the town clerk, with the recorder and common speaker (in effect, representatives of patriciate and commonalty) looking on, was probably to ensure it was not tampered with. And that the vote of mayor and 24 was tallied by each of those three officials was presumably to avoid fraud in recording the votes. The secret ballot was intended to reduce the prospect of collusion or undue influence in the voting – in an open discussion, the more senior members of the group would likely have been able to direct the result. On the other hand, avoidance of open discussion may have been intended to prevent serious argument and division within council ranks.

A secondary preoccupation of the composition, which appears when taken at face value as fairly broad-ranging, is with crafts-related matters. It suggests that part of the disputes necessitating a settlement revolved around the making of freemen, and involved alliances of crafts in the political conflict.

The Composition of 1415 brought almost to a conclusion a protracted struggle within the community of Norwich over issues of governance; I say "almost" because the accord was itself intended to be the template for negotiating the terms of a new royal charter, and was inevitably fragile until that charter was obtained in 1417 (the delay occasioned, Hudson argues, by the absence of the king and of Norwich's arbitrator, Sir Thomas Erpingham, in France). The only significant deviation from the original of the charter section authorizing the stipulations of the accord is that it gives the more prestigious title of "aldermen" to the 24 co-citizens. Henceforth it was no longer pretended that this upper council was the instrument representing the community in government; that role fell to the 60 townsmen of the Common Council.

The constitutional composition suggests the same kinds of popular concerns seen in other towns at this period and at other times: electoral rights, participation in government, rule by law, fiscal accountability, equitable taxation and justice, access to the franchise, and reaffirmation of the concept that government was intended to be for the equal benefit of all. At the same time, as an instrument of compromise, it reflects issues of concern to the ruling class, at Norwich and elsewhere:

- ensuring orderly, controllable proceedings at communal meetings;
- having the ability to react to changing circumstances by shifting from reliance on a set of customs (relatively fixed) to a situation where by-laws could be made and changed at need;
- assuring stability in government and governmental policy, by according the key decision-makers – the upper council of 24 – life tenure (an earlier effort at constitutional reform, in 1414, having insisted the 24 be subject to annual election);
- bringing the principle and the practice of government into better alignment, in terms of representative institutions substituting for the theoretical participation of the community;
- placing restrictions on eligibility for office, to avoid undesirables entering their ranks;
- avoiding divisive factionalism, both within the community and within its own ranks;
- reducing the risks of external interference in internal politics;
- bringing the craft guilds within the system of governance in a more structured, and thereby controlled, fashion;
- promoting a system which fostered harmonious political relations while at the same time acknowledging political hierarchy and corresponding levels of legitimated authority.

It should not come as a surprise then, that London was looked to as the model, as some measure of compromise between populist and patrician ambitions had been attained there that kept London politics relatively quiet for much of the fifteenth century. Exhausted by years of disruption, the majority of Norwich's townsmen were probably as eager for a restoration of peace and quiet as were those of London (or would be those of Lynn just a couple of years later, itself looking to Norwich for inspiration on constitutional compromise).

At Norwich, however, there were other complications, and continuing nervousness among the authorities about a lack of solidarity within its ranks gave rise to a "code of conduct" in December 1424, called the Tripartite Indenture (because there were three parties to it: mayor, sheriffs, and aldermen), for which royal approval was obtained in 1429. It is worth closing with a few extracts, for the light they throw on difficulties in maintaining discipline and loyalty within the patriciate:

Because the city of Norwich is, in various parts of the English realm, heavily criticized for lack of good and virtuous government ... the mayor and aldermen wishing and desiring to provide to the commons of the city a good example of proper and peaceable behaviour among themselves The aldermen of the aforementioned city of Norwich, and each of them, are to come to the mayor at the Guildhall or at any other location within the boundaries of the city of Norwich where the mayor wishes to discuss or speak about matters important to the city and its good government ... and they are to be on time.... The 24 aldermen, and each of them, are to keep to themselves all discussions and information communicated to them on all matters ... until such time that they are made public in a common assembly Any alderman doing the contrary ... is to be deprived of the status of alderman and expelled from the council by the mayor and aldermen (or the majority of the same) once his fault has been proved.... All the 24 aldermen, and each of them, to the best of his ability and wisdom is to support the mayor then in office, in attending upon him, giving advice, accompanying him in walking on festival days and in processions or to any lord or lady or honorable person in any location within the city.... None of the 24 aldermen is to bring any kind of lawsuit or complaint against any of his fellow aldermen unless he has first stated his complaint and grievance to the mayor and various aldermen of the mayor's council ... and has failed to obtain a remedy.... None of the 24 aldermen is to be a party to any matter brought against any fellow alderman involving a loveday, or agree to be chosen or act as arbitrator on behalf of any other individual against any of the 24 aldermen; he may on behalf of a friend encourage all matters to a peaceful resolution, but in no way should act for a party in arbitration or any other kind of cause whatsoever against any of his fellow aldermen, without the consent of that member of the 24 aldermen against whom he is chosen, unless it is for a close relative or in-law.... None of the 24 aldermen is to encourage, support, or commiserate with any person whatsoever who utters slanderous words, or works against, any of the other aldermen; but on any occasion when any of them hears such a person say anything slanderous or [discovers them] in any way acting maliciously against any of those 24 aldermen, then he is to contradict or restrain that person thus speaking or acting ... and furthermore to warn the member of the 24 aldermen who is the target of the slander or act.... None of the 24 aldermen is from henceforth is to be active, in person or through any other persons in his name, among the common people of the city, stirring or arousing sentiment so that he be chosen to any office relating to the government of the city, nor concerning any other matters relating to communal government to the benefit of himself or any other person, unless it be with the prior consent of the mayor then in office and the majority of the 24 aldermen, so that the office in question may be filled peaceably without any taint of maintenance.... In respect of the oath that he took, none of the 24 aldermen is to utter slanderous words about any fellow alderman, nor wish him harm, discomfort, or unhappiness, nor rejoice at any setback, loss, or discomfort experienced by any of his fellow aldermen. If it so happens that any such member of the 24 aldermen acts viciously or is accused of being a liar and will not correct his faults, so that his guilt may be known, it is permissible under this ordinance for any of the 24 aldermen to inform the mayor then in office and the aldermen, or the majority thereof, of those faults.... That each of the 24 aldermen is each year to take, use and wear the livery that is prescribed by the mayor and the aldermen, or the majority thereof, and honestly pay the price for it set by the mayor and the majority of the aldermen; whoever refuses it and will not buy it, receive it, and wear it shall, by authority of this ordinance, pay 10s. for his fault in the year that he refuses it. Any member of the 24 found and proved to be in default, in contravening any of the above points, or in any way acting contrary to these matters, and refusing to be ruled or governed by the ordinances of the mayor and the 24 aldermen, or the majority thereof ... is to be deprived of the livery and advice of the 24 aldermen and, from that time forward, to be deposed of the status of aldermen and expelled from the city council.

NOTES

"principal and special patron"

This was because the dedication of Norwich cathedral was to the Holy Trinity.

"John Biskele"

Mercer John Bixley had been mayor since May 1414; he had served as one of the sheriffs of Norwich in 1408/09. He had taken up the franchise in 1400/01. Another merchant of this name who, having become a freeman in 1374, is in evidence in the latter years of Richard II's reign, may have been his father. The mayor owned a number of properties in the parish of St. Gregory, but is not known to have had significant property interests outside the city. He died in 1425, leaving a daughter as his heir.

"Henry Rafman"

Believed to have been born in Wymondham, Norfolk, Rafman (who also went, less frequently, by the surname Alcock, rafman being an occupational surname meaning a chandler) built his early career in Yarmouth. He held several posts there in the customs service, as controller and collector, between 1399 and 1409. They may have been a reward for his support of Bolingbroke and the other lords opposed to Richard II, for in 1398 he had been obliged to obtain a royal pardon for his political activity; the pardon perhaps also helped him evade legal actions brought against him by a number of creditors. During his time as customs collector, he is also seen exporting large quantities of cloth and woolfells, importing wine and foodstuffs in return. He was also chosen as one of Yarmouth's representatives to the 1406 parliament; during its sitting he was elected one of the borough bailiffs, the first to two terms – the second coming in 1409/10. During his first ballival term he took out another pardon, this time for outlawry, consequent to his failure to appear in court to defend in an action of debt brought against him during the reign of Richard II. Around the same time he was also in trouble in the admiral's court, where a Flemish merchant had complained that his merchandize had been spoiled while in Rafman's custody; in 1408 Rafman was appealing his conviction. In December he (along with other officials in the customs service) received a further pardon, covering offences such as that for which he had been convicted. It may not be coincidence that his customs career came to an end at the same time, and that this was also about the time he quit Yarmouth, and purchased the franchise at Norwich. The change of residence did not cure his perpetual indebtedness: in 1413 he was again pardoned outlawry for failing to respond to actions of debt. Despite this he was chosen as sheriff in 1414, as a parliamentary representative of the city in March 1416, and then elected mayor in May 1416. Not long after the end of his term he was again in hot water, accused (with his son) of having murdered John Caley of Norwich; although the court decided that the widow's accusation was malicious and not supported by the evidence, for technical reasons Rafman was unable to obtain a pardon until 1423. He is little in evidence otherwise in this period, and it has been suggested he was slipping into poverty [History of Parliament: The House of Commons 1386-1421, vol.4 (1992), 171]. At some point he was put in the debtors prison (Fleet) in London, and the last we hear of him, in 1435, is still in connection with legal trouble over debts.

"commonalty"

The term seems to have been increasingly used in this period to refer to the community as a constitutional entity.

"24 co-citizens"

The city council; concitezeyns reflects that members were all peers (equals), while the number of members was often used as a name for the body as a whole.

"citizens who are residents"

This must mean intrinsic freemen; assumption of the franchise brought benefits and obligations, such as participation in the political process.

"outsiders"

foreyns is probably intended to include non-citizens and forensic citizens (those residing outside the city who purchased the franchise for its commercial benefits).

"go up to"

The bench – the seating for mayor and council – would have been on a dais.

"recorder"

A legal advisor employed by the city. As a lawyer he might occasionally be absent, either on city or other business.

"greatest support"

The original has most voys. Whether this implies loudest shout, or whether individual votes were tallied, is not clear; but the same term is later used to refer to the individual votes for the nominees.

"bill"

The term was used primarily for relatively informal documents of various formats, particularly petitions, but also letters, not necessarily intended for archival retention as legal record. Here a note is doubtless what is meant.

"go back into"

Although the original document talks about the mayor and 24 withdrawing by passen up in to the chamber, and the six councillors go down in to the hall after communicating the names of the nominees, the private chamber was on the same level as the main assembly room with which associated. If it were accessed via the dais, this could explain the terminology, but the description of the post-election return of mayor and 24 to the hall suggests otherwise. More likely there were a couple of steps leading into the private chamber.

"separately and secretly"

In other words, a secret ballot, with each of the three officials keeping a separate tally of the vote.

"used in the city of London"

This would appear to be addressed in Liber Albus, book1, pt.1, cap.13, which states in regard to matters to be determined by the Common Council: "If there should arise matters of great controversy or doubt, on which they cannot agree, they are to be separately examined, under the oath to which they are bound to the city, by the sergeant-at-law, the common clerk, and the common sergeant-at-arms." [my translation]

"answerable"

The 24 were bound to make good any failure of their sheriff to pay his share of the fee farm, whose collection and payment fell to the sheriffs; the commonalty likewise for the behaviour and accomplishment of theirs.

"charter"

Hudson thought this was the charter of 1404, giving the city county status and replacing the bailiffs with mayor and sheriff; however, it makes no direct reference to the upper council of 24, so it is more likely the charter of 1380 – which does refer to (though not grant) the annual election of 24 co-citizens to represent the community – that is meant.

"reasonable causes"

Liber Albus states that to be discharged an alderman must be found guilty of some grave offence or enormity.

"charter article"

Again, the charter of 1380 is intended.

"London charter"

This would be the charter of 1341 (reissued in Richard II's inspeximus and confirmation of 1377), granting legislative power to the mayor and aldermen with the consent of the commonalty.

"Monday following Passion Sunday"

Hudson speculated that the timing may either have been in imitation of London, where an ordinance of 1384 specified the election of common councillors there, per ward, within the latter half of March; or may have had something to do with the timing of Norwich's leet court sessions (held per ward), which required popular attendance and would have been completed just before the election of councillors.

"Conesford" "Berstrete"

The wards were divided into smaller administrative units for purposes of leet jurisdiction, and this now served to establish proportional representation on the lower council. Mancroft, as the commercial focus of the city, and Wymer as a trades and quayside area, had the largest concentrations of population, and so larger representation on council than the other wards.

"ordinances and regulations"

Given the context, this must refer to draft legislation. The passage is evidently defining what constitutes communal consent to enactments formulated by the mayor and upper council; it was to be more than just a yea-or-nay.

"cases of fine and ransome"

The sense of this sentence is obscure and interpretation difficult; it seems to refer to those arrested for an offence and unable to find guarantors to bail them out or to pay their fines for them.

"Christ Church"

Norwich cathedral.

"Furthermore, we have granted..."

This quotation, in Latin, appears to be from the royal charter of 1380, with several alterations: insertion of the phrase de assensu communitatis; substitution of the term "mayor" for "bailiffs"; omission of the stipulation that a majority vote withn the 24 is sufficient to effect a decision.

"bellman"

An official responsible for making announcements around the town. In late fourteenth-century Beverley the bellman made a daily trek through the town, ringing one of his handbells (he being issued with four) at various points to mark the time when trading could begin; he also informed members of the council when meetings were to be held and may have rung the communal bell to summon participants to guildhall meetings. Similar duties may have been performed by bellmen of other towns.

"dykekeeper"

An official responsible for supervising the defensive ditch surrounding the city walls, to ensure they were kept in good condition and were not put to inappropriate uses (e.g. grazing of livestock).

"clavigers"

Persons assigned to have custody of the keys of communal chests containing the common seal and treasury. This type of officer was often introduced in the context of reforms, stemming from distrust between rulers and ruled as to how community money was being expended.

"chamberlain"

Although not explicitly stated in surviving city records, it appears that the chamberlains were responsible for overall fiscal management, while the treasurers were the men who actually doled out money and received it into the treasury.

"not accountable"

That is, those chosen as auditors of the financial accounts of city officers were not themselves to be men bearing an office whereby they had to render account.

"statements"

The process described here is the annual accounting of financial officers, at which a fair copy of revenues and expenditures needed to be presented and reviewed by the auditors. The officers could be held personally accountable for any revenues due that had not found their way into the treasury; however, if there was a valid reason why revenues could not be collected, the auditors might exonerate the officers from such amounts.

"the mayor's riding"

This took place on the Tuesday after Trinity Sunday.

"defects in the craft"

Such as products of sub-standard quality, inappropriate processes, or excessive prices.

"alien"

The term was used to refer to outsiders who had not become foreign burgesses (those who purchased the franchise for its benefits, without becoming permanent residents).

"knights of the shire"

Parliamentary representatives (bearing in mind that Norwich now had county status, and its court was the equivalent of a shire court).

"costumes"

In the sense of a uniform style of clothing, i.e. a livery.

"affiliated craft"

The original has Craft of Coillet, which Hudson suggests derives from the French cueillir (to collect). It presumably refers to the tendency for lesser, poorer crafts of small membership to affiliate with larger crafts usually (but not exclusively) operating in a similar field. See for instance the association of crafts at Coventry and Beverley to mount the annual pageants, or the groupings at Bristol to receive doles of wine for ceremonial drinkings.

"their seals"

I.e. their seals of office, not their personal seals.

"loveday"

A day of reconciliation between disputing parties.

"maintenance"

The term was used in regard to support given to sustain or increase the power (political or otherwise) of an individual.

The testament of Nicholas Blakburn senior, citizen and merchant of York. [\[extracts only given by the transcriber\]](#)

20 February 1432. I, Nicholas Blakburn senior, citizen and merchant of York [...] to be buried in the cathedral church of St. Peter, York, on the south side, before the image of Our Lord there, under my marble stone which has been prepared on that spot for the purpose. [...] To Brian Sandford esq. and his wife Isabelle, my daughter, all gifts, collations and presentments to the four chantries that I have in the city of York, of which one is in the chapel of St. William on the Ouse Bridge in York, another in the church of St. John the Evangelist at the end of the Ouse Bridge, and two chantries in the church of St. Martin Micklegate, York. [...] To the sons and daughters of the same Brian and Isabelle, £66.13s.4d. [...] To my wife Margaret, my entire capital messuage in North Street etc. for her lifetime; after her death, to my son Nicholas Blakburn, for his lifetime, and after his death to his son Christopher Blakburn [...] then to his sister Agnes Blakburn [...] then to his sister Alice Blakburn. [...] To dom. Robert Semerr, also called dom. Robert de Revestre, £3.6s.8d. [...] To Nicholas Wyspyngton and William Blakburn my son, the entire debt owed me by Cowpyn cooper of Aldwark and John Cotell of the same. [...] To my daughter Alice Bolton, wife of John Bolton, and their daughters Margaret, Joan, Agnes, Isabelle, and Elena, £66.13s.4d. [...] I bequeath 40s. towards the tax that has been granted to the king, to help out with the levy on the entire community of citizens of the city of York, to be paid between now and Easter next, in praise and honour of the glorious resurrection of Our Lord Jesus Christ. I bequeath £100 for giving firewood, linen and woollen cloth, boots and shoes to poor men and women at Easter, for [the benefit of] my soul. I bequeath £100 for the same thing at All Saints. I bequeath £60 for the same at the Purification of the Blessed Virgin Mary. I bequeath £10 to be distributed to poor men of the town of Richmond, for them to pay their tax granted to the king, payable between now and Easter, and £10 towards the fabric of the parish church there. To John Walton mercer of Richmond, £5, which William Bedford, receiver of my lord the Duke of Bedford, is holding as my fee. I bequeath to my executors the reversion of all tenements in the Flesh Shambles, also called Needlergate, in York, following the death of Joan Blakburn, widow of my son John Blakburn; to be sold, and the money thereby received disposed of to bring praise to God and his Son and in pious works. [...] I appoint as my executors my wife Margaret, mag. John Carleton canon of the cathedral church of St. Peter, York, Richard Russell, William Ormeshede, John Aldstanemore, my son Nicholas Blakburn, John Bolton citizen and merchant of York, and William Revetor chaplain, and I bequeath to each of them £10. Drawn up at York.

[Codicil:]

In the name of God, Amen. I, Nicholas Blakburn senior, citizen and merchant of York, beseech Almighty God, as any earthly man can or may, in soul and mind, to grant me the strength and grace to arrange the disposition of the residue of the possessions that he has given me here in this world, in a way that will above all be pleasing to and show my love towards him, his blessed mother Saint Mary, and her blessed mother Saint Anne, and all the saints in Heaven, and will afford help and relief to the health of my soul, [those of] my wife Margaret, our fathers and mothers, our brothers and sisters, our children and all our friends, and all the souls of those from whom I have undeserving received anything in this world, and all Christian souls. First, I wish and provide that, should Catterick Bridge, Kexby Bridge, Thornton Bridge, or Skip Bridge suffer from any misfortune or faulty workmanship during the four years after my death, which God forbid, my executors shall sue those [who have taken responsibility], by recognisance or bond, for maintaining them. If those responsible for the same strive to the best of their ability to repair defects in the bridges, insofar as their means allow, rather than letting the bridges collapse, I wish my executors of the goods of God and myself to make the repairs, acting under the best advise and recommendations they can obtain; so that, with God's grace, those bridges will not in any way deteriorate. I wish my wife Margaret, quite apart from what I advised her in my testament, have [provision] for the livelihood of a gentlewoman, while she lives – for her, and a priest, and a servant. I wish my executors to send for Sir Gilbert Gyghlay, knight, to be present at my burial; for his efforts, I wish him to have a pipe of wine, or its equivalent in monetary value. I assign £40 to Christopher Blakburn and his sisters Agnes and Alison for their marriage, so that they can make good ones. To my son Nicholas Blakburn, £40 to spend on his three sons – that is, Robert, Thomas and Henry – and they will be false to find them with "bonn by ye wall", while it will last. I assign 40s. to dom. Nicholas Clyffe priest. And 26s.8d to the wife of Kendall the lister. I assign 20s. to each of my son Nicholas' servants; that is, John, Richard and Isabel. To dom. John Chalkar priest, 40s. To Agnes Salkan, 40s. To Simkin, Watkin, and Alison Meyke, servants of John Bolton, 26.8d each. To the nurses of John Bolton, 20s. To Margaret Horsley, 20s. To my servant Sissota, if she remains with me after her term is up, I wish her to have her wages and 20s. To Alison of the kitchen, 6s.8d. I assign to Alison Strynger, my cousin, who lives in Blackburn parish, 100s. To Richard Stowe vintner, 26s.8d. I assign to my chantry in the chapel of St. Anne on Foss Bridge, York, my best vestment, my best missal, and my best chalice, for the use of that chantry in perpetuity. I assign 20s. to William Glover. To Alison Walker, my sister, 100s. I assign 20s. to John Robynson my former servant. I assign [...] to William Revetor priest for the good work he has done and will do in my behalf.

The testament of Margaret, widow of Nicholas Blakburn, one-time citizen and merchant of York, deceased.

In the name of God, Amen. On 10 March 1433, I, Margaret Blakburn, widow of Nicholas Blakburn citizen and merchant of York, sound in body and mind, have made and set out my testament in the following manner. First, I give, bequeath, and commend my soul to Almighty God, the most Blessed Virgin Mary, her holy mother Anne, and all saints; and my body to be buried in the cathedral church of St. Peter, York, there to lie next to the body of my late husband Nicholas Blakburn, under the marble stone before the image of Our Lord on the south side. I bequeath to the rector of the church in whatever parish I die, the best cut of cloth from my body, with hood, by way of mortuary payment. I bequeath eight wax torches, each weighing 16lb., to burn around my body during my exequies and mass on the day of my funeral. Of [\[the remains of\]](#) which eight torches, I wish two to go to All Saints parish church in North Street, York, to be lit there each year (as long as they last) on Easter Day during [\[the services commemorating\]](#) the resurrection of Our Lord Jesus Christ. Two other of those torches are to be placed in St. John the Evangelist parish church, at the end of Ouse Bridge, York, to be lit there each year (as long as they last) on Easter Day during the resurrection of Our Lord Jesus Christ. Another pair of those torches are to be placed in Holy Trinity parish church in King's Square, York, to burn there on the same terms. And the final pair of those torches are to be placed in St. Mary Virgin parish church in Richmond, to be lit there on Easter Day during the resurrection of Our Lord Jesus Christ, for as long as they last. I bequeath £20 to pay for funeral expenses at the time of my exequies. I bequeath £10 to be distributed among paupers, at the disposition of my executors, on the day of my burial.

To each chaplain who regularly celebrates divine services in All Saints church, North Street, 12d. To the parish clerk there, 8d. And to the sub-clerk, 4d. To each chaplain who regularly celebrates in the church of St. John the Evangelist, 12d. I bequeath 10s. to the prior and convent of the Abbey of Holy Trinity in Micklegate, York. I bequeath 10s. to the house of the Friars Preacher, York. And to the other three orders of mendicant friars in York, 20s., divided equally between them. I bequeath 10s. to the three recluses of York, divided equally. I give and bequeath £9.6s.8d for a suitable and respectable chaplain to celebrate for the soul of my late husband, Nicholas Blakburn, my soul, the souls of our parents, as well as the souls of those to whom we are obliged, and the souls of the the faithful deceased, in the church of St. John the Evangelist for two whole years.

I bequeath to William Ormeshede, my brother, a silver ewer with a spout, gilded in parts. And to Elena Ormeshede, his wife, a flat piece of gilded silver plate, pounced, with cover. I bequeath to my son, Nicholas Blakburn, a silver pot of any size under a pottle. To his wife Margaret, a piece of silver plate, "swared", marked under its base with an "K". I bequeath Isabelle Sandford, my daughter, a silver pot called "the quart". I bequeath Alice Bolton, my daughter, a silver spice-plate and two silver pots called pottle-pots – of which one is marked with a shield of seven bars, a dog, and "N" and "B", and the other is marked under its base with a sign like an "M" – and one piece of gilded silver plate, covered, with a knop and a lion on the top. I bequeath to John Wyspyngton a flat piece of silver, covered, with a hawthorn chaplet and its knop gilded. I bequeath to Friar Nicholas Watre a standing-cup called "the nut", covered, with silver base. I bequeath to my son, Nicholas Blakburn, the £10 which he owes me as per his bond. And to Robert Blakburn, his son, £6.13s.4d. To Thomas Blakburn, £6.13s.4d and a red coverlet with valance, embroidered with chaplets and stars; a pair of new linens. To Henry Blakburn, £6.13s.4d. To Christopher Blakburn, £6.13s.4d. To Agnes Blakburn, £6.13s.4d and a girdle decorated with 8 bars and three "teryngbarres" of gilded silver and white swans in the tissue; a feather bed with bolster, a pair of new linens and a bed – that is, a coverlet with valance of red say embroidered with popinjays, and red curtains, and a tester of the same colour. To Alice Blakburn, her sister, £6.13s.4d, a flat piece of silver, covered, with a round knop, a feather bed with bolster, one pair of new linens.

I bequeath Isabelle Sandford, my daughter, the £6.13s.4d she owes me. And to John Sandford, her son, £6.13s.4d. And to Katherine, his wife, a flat piece of silver, covered, [engraved] with a motto scroll "Bien venir". To Edmund Sandford, £6.13s.4d and a silver goblet. To Nicholas Sandford, £6.13s.4d and a silver goblet. To Henry Sandford, £6.13s.4d and a silver goblet. To Richard Sandford, £6.13s.4d. To William Sandford, £6.13s.4d. To John Sandford, £6.13s.4d. and a flat piece of silver, covered, pounced, [engraved] with the twelve months of the year. To Elizabeth Sandford, £6.13s.4d, [and] a silver candelabrum. To Agnes Sandford, £6.13s.4d and a small girdle with six enamelled and gilded silver bars. To Isabelle Sandford, £6.13s.4d and a necklace called "Lamb of God".

I bequeath to Alice Bolton, my daughter, £6.13s.4d. To her son, John Bolton, £10 and 12 silver spoons marked with "R" and "K". To Margaret Bolton, £10 and a flat piece of silver without cover; a blue coverlet of arras-work with images [woven] into it, with the valance belonging to the same; and a pair of linens of triple-weave. To John Bolton, £10 and six silver spoons with gilded acorns. To Agnes Bolton, a silver powder-box and a gold necklace in the style of a rose. To Isabelle Bolton, £10 and a flat mazer with a single band of gilded silver, and a girdle with eight bars of gilded silver and the image of Our Lord in its pendant. To Elena Bolton, £10, a mazer with the image of St. Katherine called "Fronnce" at the bottom, and a small girdle with six bars of gilded silver and the pendant likewise a rose.

I bequeath to John Esyngwald a flat piece of silver without a cover. To his son, John Esyngwald, 13s.4d. And to his brother, William Esyngwald, 13s.4d. To Elena Wyspyngton, 13s.4d. To her sister, Elizabeth Wyspyngton, 20s. I bequeath to John Ormeshede, the son of my brother William Ormeshede, £6.13s.4d towards his marriage. To the two sons of Thomas Blakburn, 40s. divided equally between them. To Lady Joan Sponyngthorn, 6s.8d, a black cloak lined with buckram, a black hood, and a set of jet beads. To William Blakburn, 26s.8d. I bequeath to John Brandesby, my son, 13s.4d. To the nuns of St. Clement's in the suburbs of York, 6s.8d. To the nuns of Essholt, 10s. As for the residue of all my goods and utensils, I give and bequeath them to be disposed of, at the disposition of my executors, as is more fully specified in a certain schedule.

[Codicil:]

In the name of God, Amen. I, Margaret Blakburn, widow of Nicholas Blakburn senior, one-time citizen and merchant of York, concerning my utensils not bequeathed in my testament. First, I give and bequeath to my son, Nicholas Blakburn, a chest banded with iron in which there used to be my silver vessels, and one of the best quilts. I bequeath to Brian Sandford a large, flat chest painted red. And to his wife Isabelle: another, smaller chest, carved on the outside in the shape of windows; a spruce coffer; one of the best tablecloths, diapered with roses; one wide towel of "amys" work; six new gryphon cushions; one large, round bowl. I bequeath to John Sandford a small chest painted green, and a bowl called "counterfeit" with laver. And to his wife Katherine a twill towel with black borders, four and a quarter ells long, and a pair of double-weave linens. To John Sandford, a tablecloth of Flemish work, two towels 18 ells long, a pair of linens, and a coffer with two iron clasps. To Edmund Sandford, a counterfeit bowl with laver. To Nicholas Sandford, a counterfeit bowl with laver. To Elizabeth Sandford, a twill tablecloth five and a quarter ells long, and a towel four ells long (less the "nale").

I bequeath to Agnes Blakburn, daughter of my son Nicholas Blakburn, a plain tablecloth four and a half ells long, and two towels with plain edges. To Alice Blakburn, her sister, a twill tablecloth four and a half ells long, one towel five and a half ells long, and another towel three ells long. To Christopher Blakburn, a bowl with laver.

I bequeath to John Bolton senior a chest banded with iron, standing on four iron wheels. To his wife, Alice Bolton: a Flemish chest whose exterior is carved with images; a small chafing-dish for water; a brass mortar; six new gryphon cushions; six cushion covers of Arras work. I bequeath to dom. John Fox chaplain a red-and-white coverlet with three curtains and testers belonging to the same, a small round bowl, and a pair of linens. I bequeath to Agnes Gudeale a black gown with grey fur. To Alice Kirkeby, daughter of the late Thomas Kirkeby mason of York: another black gown, furred with lamb-shanks wool; a kirtle; a blue coverlet with trees, lions and birds woven into it, with a valance; and a pair of blankets. I bequeath to my servant Joan Escrik: a short black tunic, lined; a blue and grey coverlet; a pair of new linens; a pair of blankets; two bronze pots, one larger and one smaller; a "kilped" pan; a bowl with laver, and two small round bowls for the [bed]chamber; six "gaitez" cushions; one of the best kirtles; a "frende" with grey fur; two crape kerchiefs; and two bronze candelabra. I bequeath to John Geddesson: a coverlet with valance, with red and blue border; a pair of linens; and a pair of blankets. I bequeath to dom. John Fox two bronze candelabra. To William Revetour chaplain a large chafing-dish for water, and a small round bowl. I bequeath to Alice Kirkeby a pair of second-quality linens. To Margaret Wilson a red and blue coverlet spangled with roses, with valance, and a pair of linens. To Alice Meke, a coverlet of murrey and grey, and another coverlet, red, embroidered with a hawk. To Joan Usburn, a red and blue coverlet with roses woven in.

I bequeath to the chantry in the chapel of St. Anne on Foss Bridge, York, founded by my late husband Nicholas Blakburn, a green vestment, two painted cloths with the Salutation and the curtains belonging to them, and two other cloths [hung] next to each other there above the high altar. I bequeath to John Fox and Joan Escrik three blue and green painted cloths with depictions of birds and roses, to be equally divided between them. 10 March 1433.

[Another codicil, 5 April 1435:]

[Drawn up] in a certain inner chamber at the upper end of the hall of the residence of John Bolton, citizen and merchant of York, in Skeldergate. I wish my executors, in order to fulfill my husband's will, pay £100 towards the fabric of Kexby Bridge and £100 towards the fabric of Catterick Bridge, under the following conditions. Viz. that those responsible for administration of those bridges are willing to provide my executors with satisfactory guarantees that thereby the bridges will be fully and satisfactorily built within four years after my death; and on condition that, at my wish, my executors pay annually towards the fabric of each bridge, during those four years, £25 of the £100. Always with the proviso that my husband's goods suffice to see the bridge works carried out. My daughters Isabelle Sandford and Alice Bolton [to be] my executors.

DISCUSSION

[I have divided the second will into paragraphs to make for easier reading.]

The Blackburns were one of the more prominent York families in the opening decades of the fifteenth century, and their lifestyle a cut above even the average city merchant. Nicholas senior served as mayor in 1412 and his son Nicholas junior in 1429; a second son, John, who was one of the city's aldermen by 1419, having represented it in parliament two years earlier, and who took as his second wife a daughter of William Bowes (mayor 1417), might also have risen to the mayoralty had he not died prematurely in 1426. Nicholas senior drew up his will at a time when he probably sensed his end approaching, for it received probate on 10 April 1432.

Nicholas migrated from Richmond (although the family had its roots in Blackburn, Lancashire) to York in the late fourteenth century, becoming a freeman there in 1396, when already referred to as "senior". His wife Margaret was from a family that also had its roots in Richmond: her brother William Ormeshead, who became a colleague of Nicholas in York's government, also entered the franchise (1404) as "of Richmond". Possibly Nicholas had made his marriage before moving to York; his elder sons John and Nicholas, also merchants, were old enough to take up the franchise themselves in 1403, suggesting a possible birth date for Nicholas of ca.1365/70.

He was probably prospering in business before making the move to York. In his will Nicholas did not forget the home town that was his stepping-stone to success. Surviving records sample his mercantile activities between 1395 and 1431 and suggest a pattern that was fairly typical: wool, sheepskins, and cloth were his major exports, although he dabbled in other goods (e.g. coal) when there looked to be a profit in it; his imports were likely even more varied, and included iron. He is also seen active in the victualling trade, notably the opportunities to serve the frontier garrisons and the king's household. Like many leading merchants of that period, he is found making sizable loans of money to Henry V; this was part of doing business with the king.

His quick rise into the ranks of York's mercantile leadership – he being one of the few men not called on to serve as chamberlain before reaching higher office – is reflected by a couple of things. First, he and his wife together, and apparently at the same time as William Ormeshead and his wife, became members of the Corpus Christi Gild at York in 1414. This influential, cleric-run, socio-religious gild, which had been in existence for perhaps only a few years, associated many of the city's leading churchmen with the leading citizens, as well as with members of the country gentry. Women were prominent among the secular members and it may have been Margaret Blackburn's influence that prompted her husband to join; or perhaps that of their son John, who had become a member two years earlier. The gild's register of obituaries lists both Nicholas and Margaret in the appropriate years, and indicates that the gild had received from Nicholas an extraordinarily large legacy of £15.

Second, Nicholas was appointed the king's Admiral of the North in 1406. He is not known to have held the post for long, yet it was remembered as significant as late as 1432, when he was described in a completely unrelated context as a former mayor of the city and former admiral of the king. Other royal commissions regularly came his way in that early phase of his career, notably involving investigations to be made in Yorkshire – many of which related, directly or indirectly, to commerce, which was why Nicholas was qualified for such duties.

The context in which he was remembered as admiral was the foundation by Nicholas and Margaret on 2 February, just a couple of weeks before the former drew up his will, of two perpetual chantries (at different altars) in the house of the Friars Preacher of York. The Blackburns made some significant donation to the Dominicans, although whether in cash or property is not stated. Detailed instructions [see the abstract in J. Percy, ed. York Memorandum Book, Surtees Society, vol.186 (1973), 155-56] were given regarding those foundations:

- A qualified friar was to celebrate daily at each altar.
- The friary was to supply the celebrants' needs (chalice, book, bread, wine, wax).
- At the altar of St. Mary Magdalene the celebrant was to begin the chantry service by ringing the chapter bell, just as was done for high mass. A daily mass of the Holy Spirit was to be said for Nicholas while he lived, and a Requiem mass for his soul, and that of Margaret, after their death. However, on Sundays and festival days (with named exceptions when masses were not to be celebrated at any but the high altar of the church) a slightly different service was prescribed. These services were not to be omitted except in special, specified circumstances, e.g. epidemic, fire, general interdict, etc.
- At the high altar of the friary church a mass of the Blessed Virgin Mary was to be celebrated daily – again with differing specifications for the service before and after Nicholas' death – followed by specified psalms and prayers to be said by all the brethren.

- After the deaths of Nicholas and Margaret, an obit was to be celebrated annually, by the choir wearing their copes, with specified offices being performed on the feast of St. James (25 July), and a Requiem mass on the feast of St. Anne (26 July). The obit was not to be omitted unless unavoidable, such as in the case of a general interdict. The holding of the obit was to be announced publicly by the city bellman.
- Each new prior was to take oath, on his first day in office, to uphold this agreement, and was to ensure that all those under his authority did the same, with any brother who failed to do so being punished by excommunication. Failure to meet the above conditions in any year incurred a fine of 40s., distrainable, to be equally divided between the mayor and community and the estate of Nicholas Blackburn.

It would appear that the Corporation was made a party to this agreement, which resulted in it surviving to us through the copy in a city register.

Blackburn's foundation of a chantry in the chapel of St. Anne was a natural follow-up to the major renovation of the Foss Bridge, with the building of the chapel probably an integral part of that initiative; this had taken place while Blackburn was involved in city government. It is the establishment of Blackburn's chantry, in 1424, that lets us know that the chapel (administered by the corporation) was completed and in operation. It represents therefore, from one perspective, an investment to assure the continuation of an institution Blackburn had a hand in creating. The chantry was still in existence in 1534 when its owner (by purchase) was still paying attention to Nicholas' prescription for how the chantry would be run; but York's chantries were dissolved not long after.

The administration of Nicholas' will evidently proved demanding. His monetary bequests amounted to over £600, half of which was to be expended on provisions for the testator's soul, and raising this money from the estate (including debts due, themselves possibly requiring litigation) would have been onerous. Margaret Blackburn had to follow up, in her will's codicil made less than a month before her death in April 1435, on her late husband's open-ended request regarding the support of local bridges – bridges on which merchants such as Nicholas depended for their businesses. Margaret provided clearer specification of how the bridge bequest was to be handled. The ongoing demands of fulfilling Nicholas' will are indicated by the fact that his executor and brother-in-law, William Ormeshead, in a codicil (1437) to his own will asked one of his own executors, Nicholas Wyspington, to take over his remaining obligations regarding Blackburn's will. Perhaps one of the reasons why Margaret Blackburn did not include her brother among her executors, apart from his advanced age, was a feeling that he had been burdened enough by her late husband's will. However, it seems that Margaret's confidence lay more in the female members of her family; women's wills often appear more female-oriented than men's wills.

Administration of Nicholas senior's will could not have been made easier by a quarrel among the executors: Nicholas Blackburn junior accused Revetour, Carleton, Bolton and Aldstanemore of having influenced his father's wishes, so as to defraud the son of property in York. Where the other executors, not accused, stood in this dispute is unknown. As the split must have taken place before Aldstanemore's death in early 1435, it is not clear if it has any relation to the reversion of the Needlergate property, which the executors transferred (September 1436) to Nicholas Wyspington and other York men. Surprisingly, the will mentions relatively little property. Possibly other property had been held but provision made for it prior to drafting the will; this might have been transferred directly to one or more of the sons, or put in the hands of trustees – likely some of the executors-to-be. Another possible bone of contention was a debt for £400 that Margaret Blackburn claimed John Bolton had owed her husband; she gave Bolton two years grace after her death to repay the amount to the heirs; whether he did so is unknown, but Nicholas junior left only a small amount of cash in his will. The administration of his will presented sufficient problems, or was so singularly unattractive, that the two men designated his executors refused to take on the task, leaving it to Nicholas' widow, who procrastinated and eventually passed along the challenge to her own executor.

Nicholas and his wife lived in North Street. We can well imagine the colourful and, for a merchant household, sumptuous rooms of Margaret Blackburn's home. Along with silverware and other tableware, table linens, bed furnishings and linens, and wall coverings were among the kinds of valued items – reflecting wealth and social status – that were considered bequest-worthy. Margaret herself left monetary bequests of over £500, indicative of a level of wealth few widows could match, although of course there had been relatively little time since her husband's death to drain the money supply. Nicholas junior inherited the North Street property after his mother's death but, dying (1448) without sons, it passed to his brother Christopher. The latter, described as "late of Sandwich" (Kent), in 1453 transferred his rights to his sister Agnes and her husband; Agnes had at some time between 1433 and 1436 married Thomas Wandesford (possibly the man who served as mayor's esquire-at-mace 1454-80).

The Blackburns' parish church was All Saints, also in North Street. Although they sought and obtained burial in the cathedral, this does not reflect any alienation from the parish church. On the contrary, the family were important benefactors of All Saints, endowing it with two stained-glass windows; these still survive, now known as the Blackburn window and the Corporal Acts of Mercy window. To what extent this was the initiative of Nicholas senior and his wife Margaret, or that of Nicholas junior and his wife (another Margaret), is uncertain; both couples are depicted, as donors, in the Blackburn window – Nicholas senior in armour, perhaps as a reference to his military role as admiral. But the devotion to St. Anne, reflected in the wills of the older couple – such mention being unusual – is also evident in the choice of the imagery in the windows. The central of the three main lights of the Blackburn window (dated between 1417 and 1427) is a depiction of St. Anne teaching Mary to read. The cult of Mary's mother was growing stronger in the early fifteenth century and may be reflective of a renewed piety among the urban elite; we may note the growth in popularity of Agnes (Anne) as a Christian name. One analysis of the content of the windows has led to the conclusion about the Blackburns that:

"their choice of iconographic material and the act of donating the windows were part of the donors' larger concern for maintaining the social fabric.... such donations form part of a new and internalized piety and thoughtful charity inspired by more than the customs of the day."

[Sarah Pedersen, "Piety and charity in the painted glass of late medieval York," Northern History, vol.36 (2000), 35.]

Whether we see a woman's hand in the choice of St. Anne as the central figure of the Blackburn window, perhaps even reflecting an interest in female literacy [Pedersen, p.36], it is hard to say. It is the female donors, rather than the males, depicted in the window who are holding books with legible texts. It is not inconceivable that the female members of mercantile families – with the wealth and connections that could provide access to education, yet not as preoccupied as the males with mundane matters – may often have taken the lead in setting the standards for piety in a household.

Another key figure in the Blackburn window is St. Christopher. He was the patron saint of travellers, and merchants were some of England's most regular travellers. In 1416 Nicholas had donated £10 to erect in Durham cathedral a statue to St. Christopher, St. Anne, or St. John the Baptist.

Possibly the interest of the Blackburns in that saint reflects a mercantile preoccupation, just as the concern with maintenance of local bridges in a fit state of repairs was also a matter of business sense. Blackburn's interest in bridges preceded his will. His name is the first in a list of those contracting for the construction of Catterick Bridge – which stood on the road between York and Richmond – in 1421; interestingly, a chapel dedicated to St. Anne was built on the bridge at date unknown, but before 1474. As mentioned, the rebuilding of the Foss Bridge had been a programme of a city government of which Nicholas was a member. Kexby Bridge lay on the route between York and the port of Kingston-upon-Hull, through which much of York's overseas commerce was conducted, and so was important to Nicholas' personal interests, not just his pious intentions. The Blackburn obit at the Dominican friary was to begin on St. James' day, which also happens to be the festival of St. Christopher, although this may be coincidence. We may also note that there was a socio-religious gild in York dedicated to St. Christopher and this, like the Corpus Christi Gild, became increasingly associated with the city corporation, helping pay for rebuilding of the city guildhall in 1444 and maintaining a chapel in the cathedral that served particularly the civic elite. Whether Nicholas Blackburn was a member of this gild is unknown, but the association of St. Christopher with the pious dimension of city government is not insignificant.

The other window donated by the Blackburns depicts six of the seven acts of mercy prescribed for those who wished to be win favour at the Final Judgement. In each, a wealthy man is shown performing the acts, such as visiting prisoners to give them a charitable dole. It has been suggested that the wealthy man is Nicholas Blackburn; clearly it is not intended as an accurate depiction of him, being dissimilar to the donor's portrait of him and far more comparable to the saints portrayed in other windows, but it may be intended to reflect Blackburn as a performer of these charitable acts. In a parish such as All Saints where many of York's well-to-do merchants lived, the window's depiction of exemplary behaviours for merchants hoping for salvation may have been particularly à propos. Whether this moral lesson is in fact intended to point to moral leadership through the example of the Blackburns during life (as opposed to in their last wills) we cannot know for certain.

It is easy to read into the pious and charitable provisions of what are often formulaic testamentary documents a conventionalism and a selfish concern for saving one's own soul, and doubt whether the those provisions represent charitable outlooks and actions during life. However, we should not brush aside the possibility that in at least some cases, the piety was genuine and death-bed charity provides a final instance of a concern during life for the well-being of one's community, including the less fortunate members. We should not forget that religion was more pervasive then than it is today. The influence of Christian mores is suggested, for example, by the number of churchmen shown, by the wills of Nicholas and Margaret Blackburn, to have been within their circle of close acquaintances. These included:

- Robert Semer, who had become a freeman of York in 1425/26, as a "vicar", and by the time of his death in 1432/33 was sub-treasurer of the cathedral.
- John Carleton, who was either the cathedral prebendary who had joined the Corpus Christi Guild at around the same time as John Blackburn, or the doctor of laws who acted as an advocate in York's consistory court (also a member of the guild).
- William Revetour, a cleric when he became a freeman of York in 1420 (the son of a riveter originally from Swinton). By 1423 he was acting in the capacity of chantry priest in the chapel of St. William on Ouse Bridge, and by 1424 had a post as a deputy clerk in the city bureaucracy. By August 1428, he was associated with the chantry in St. William's chapel that Nicholas Blackburn had purchased from the descendants of the founder, Richard Toller; Nicholas had presented Revetour to the post of chantry chaplain. Revetour is suspected of being the author of the Creed Play, the manuscript of which he bequeathed to the Corpus Christi Guild (of which he had been one of the custodians in 1440/41) on condition it saw the play performed, apparently among the other Corpus Christi pageants, each year for ten years. His will of 1446 also bequeathed a second play to the guild of St. Christopher, and props for a third play to the girdlers guild, as well as numerous other books, including an English translation of De Oracione Dominica et Stimulus Conscientiae to Blackburn's daughter, Alice Bolton, and an illustrated Primer to Alice's daughter Isabelle, who was Revetour's god-daughter. In 1434 he was also, along with cleric John Carleton junior, a trustee of manors of Roger Salvayn, husband to Alice's other daughter, Margaret. Here was evidently an educated and cultured man close within the Blackburn circle.
- Nicholas Wartre, a Franciscan friar who had been Bishop of Dromore (Ireland) 1419-27, but had returned to York – possibly his home town (goldsmith Richard Wartre being sheriff in 1429/30 and elected to his first of two mayoralties in 1436) – by 1429, when he became a member of the Corpus Christi Guild. Ca.1437 he was presented to the rectory of St. Mary's, Castlegate. Nicholas had bequeathed him (in part of the will omitted by Raine) £3.6.8d on condition he celebrate the mass at Nicholas' funeral.

- John Fox, who went on to an appointment in 1439 as master of Trinity hospital, Fossgate, remaining in that post for 40 years; he also served the Corpus Christi gild as a custodian (1453/54) and later as master (1470/71).

Such men – along with some of the ecclesiastics with whom the Blackburns rubbed shoulders in the Corpus Christi Gild – may have encouraged and fostered pious and charitable behaviours on the part of the Blackburns.

NOTES

"Brian Sandford"

According to Raine, the Sandford family was based at Thorpe Salvin (thereby making a connection with the Salvayn family into which a Blackburn granddaughter married) , in South Yorkshire, some distance south of York. The family had no evident connections with, or interests in, York.

"one is in the chapel of St. William"

Nicholas had founded (or rather re-founded) this chantry in 1425, giving the city corporation at the end of the previous year the sum of £226.13s.4d to support the chantry in perpetuity, and reserving for himself the presentment to the post of chantry chaplain.

"Nicholas Wyspyngton"

A merchant, he entered the franchise in 1425, was sheriff in 1433/34, and still in aldermannic ranks in 1442.

"John Bolton"

The son of John Bolton senior, who had been active in city government since the mid-1380s and became mayor in 1410; probably himself the son of another John Bolton who had been a city chamberlain in 1380. John Bolton junior and his brother William entered the franchise (by patrimony) in the year of their father's mayoralty. He went on to pursue a career as a mercer, and served as sheriff (1420) and mayor (1431), and by the time of Margaret's will was himself the "senior" John Bolton (his father having died ca.1426). He and his wife Alice joined the Corpus Christi Gild in 1430. He held several manors outside York. He died in 1445.

"Joan Blakburn"

She lived, still in possession of the Flesh Shambles property, until 1446. The daughter of William Bowes (mayor 1417), she had no children by John Blackburn, and his sons by his first wife had predeceased him.

"Richard Russell"

One of York's merchant mayors, and a business partner of Nicholas Blackburn. He died 1435, bequeathing £13.6.8d towards the repair of bridges and causeways in the neighbourhood of York, and provided for several chantries in his will. Further information may be found in the discussion of his own will.

"William Ormeshede"

Active as a merchant when he became a freeman at York in 1404, William Ormeshede served the city as chamberlain in 1411/12 and as sheriff in 1415/6, and was elected to two mayoralties in 1425 and 1433. He was one of the city councillors by mid-1417, and promoted to the upper circle within the council by 1425. He also represented York in parliaments of 1421, 1426, and 1431. Like Nicholas Blackburn, his main interest was the wool trade. He and partners lost a cargo to pirates off Dover in 1426. At a later date he acted as an arbitrator in a mercantile dispute involving the business of John Aldstanemore. His connection to Blackburn was not only by marriage, but also through business: the pair, along with Richard Russell acquired Cumberland property from the earl of Northumberland. William may have had interests in that part of the country, for he is also found prosecuting a Penrith barber for a large debt. In 1430 he acquired papal licence for a portable altar, an indication of his wealth and of a non-sedentary lifestyle. He also served as a trustee of property that Blackburn's widowed daughter-in-law held for life. He had married three times, but only three children are known: two daughters, and a son who predeceased him, possibly a minor. William's will of 1435 included bequests to John and Alice Bolton and to Nicholas Wyspington and his wife Joan, as well as members of the Blackburn family.

"John Aldstanemore"

A merchant, he entered the franchise in 1412, was sheriff in 1421/22 and became mayor in 1427; died January or February 1435. In 1410 he was charged, along with associate Nicholas Blackburn (described on this occasion as "of Richmond") of smuggling wool out of Newcastle.

"Sir Gilbert Gyghlay"

Member of a rural gentry family, who himself died around October 1432. A Richard Kyghlay was chaplain of the Holme chantry in St. Anne's chapel from the 1430s to '60s.

"pipe of wine"

A quantity equivalent to 126 gallons at this period.

"they will be false ..."

I am not sure of the meaning of this phrase; possibly "bonn by ye wall" is idiomatic or metaphoric.

"Nicholas Clyffe"

A chaplain, possibly serving the chapel of St. William, to which he made bequests, or the church of All Saints, North Street, which is where he sought burial (1456). The city chamberlains accounts mention John Clyffe as, in the 1440s and '50s, chaplain of a chantry in All Saints, North Street.

"nurses"

Presumably servants looking after Bolton's children.

"torches"

Large candles.

"Abbey of Holy Trinity"

In fact, a Benedictine priory belonging to a foreign abbey, yet retaining parochial functions from a period prior to its attachment to the abbey.

"pounced"

The term refers to a kind of ornamentation involving dots or perforations made in metal by a punch or die.

"pottle"

Half a gallon (two quarts).

"knop"

An ornamental knob, presumably atop the cover and surmounted by the lion.

"coverlet with valance"

The original is coopertorium cum tapete. Tapeta normally refers to a tapestry, but if coopertorium is translated as coverlet (referring to a bed-cover) the interpretation of valance would seem to make sense. However the phrase might alternatively refer to an awning with valance, or to a wall-hanging (the large number of these items bequeathed, and the kinds of decoration or colouring, leads me to suspect the latter may be correct – except that references in the codicil to "painted cloths" are likely wall-hangings, which suggests that coopertorium refers to something else).

"say"

A fine cloth with a worsted warp and a woollen weft.

"motto scroll"

This is my guess as to what is intended by rotulo scripto.

"bars"

Girdles of wealthier women were often decorated with sculpted bars, mounted at spaced intervals, made of precious metal.

"arras-work"

Woven with decorations, like a Flemish tapestry.

"linens"

Linthiaminum could refer to a variety of cloths, from napkins to sheets. The latter seems likely in the present context.

"mazer"

A cup originally made of maple-wood, although precious metals came to be introduced into the construction, initially in the form of metal bands or hoops running around the rim and/or side of the cup; this was more a display than a utilitarian item.

"St. Clement's"

The Benedictine priory, founded in the first half of the twelfth century, lay in the area known as Clementhorpe.

"schedule"

A subsidiary document attached to the main one; in this case, the codicil.

"diapered"

The verb could refer either to drawing flowers (or other motifs) on cloth, or weaving that cloth in such shapes (which was later done particularly with towels and napkins, from which our modern use of "diaper" arises).

"amys work"

Possibly referring to a style originating from Amiens (at that time known as Amyas).

"laver"

Or "lotorio" may refer to a ewer.

"ells"

A measure a little longer than a yard; the length of the towels here suggests they may have been some kind of winding towel, while the tablecloths would have been for long tables.

"wheels"

Or possibly rotas may refer to roundels.

"Flemish chest"

The term archam is used here, in distinction from cistam used in previous references to chests.

"testers"

Parts of a bed canopy.

"grey fur"

"Greywork" is probably intended: the winter fur of squirrels.

"murrey and grey"

Murrey was a purple-red colour; glauco refers to a grey of a yellow or green tinge.

"Salutation"

Possibly referring to a quotation from the Salve Regina, a popular anthem widely used in evening services attended by socio-religious fraternities.

"Nicholas junior in 1429"

Nicholas junior had held the shrievalty just the previous year. There remains to be accounted for the Nicholas Blackburn who became a freeman in 1422, was chamberlain in 1433/34, and sheriff in 1437/38. References to Nicholas Blackburn junior, merchant and alderman, in 1437 and Nicholas Blackburn senior, alderman, in 1442 may indicate two men of the name were then living. Perhaps the junior may have been a son of William, son of Nicholas Blackburn senior, or of Edward Blackburn (dead by 1432), for whose widow William Revetour was an executor.

"associated with the chantry"

The transaction, involving the assignment of a rent to the chantry, was witnessed by the two city sheriffs (who included Nicholas Blackburn junior), four aldermen who also would be Nicholas senior's executors – Russell, Ormeshead, Aldstanemore, and Bolton – John Lofthouse (with whom Nicholas senior was, in 1416, co-owner of a fishing-boat supplying fish to the royal household) and others unnamed; Blackburn had the mayor William Bowes – the father-in-law of his late son John – append the mayoral seal to the document.

TRANSLATION

To all faithful Christians to whose attention this document comes, eternal greetings in God from all the burgesses and the community of the borough of Bridgwater.

In order to promote amity and good feelings among our own number, and quell discord and rancour, by our common agreement and assent we have ordained all that follows.

First, we ordain and wish to have among ourselves two stewards of our gild, elected annually by us from our number; and, to assist those stewards, one bailiff elected from our number for the same term.

Also, we ordain, wish and grant that those stewards who are elected for a particular term may have the power to punish every individual among us who commits an offence against the ordinances that follow.

We also wish that if one of us maliciously imputes that any of his peers is a thief, deceiver, villein, homicide, adulterer, or excommunicate, and is convicted of the same before the stewards, he is to be amerced and obligated to our community in [the amount of] twelve pence, and should satisfy the [falsely accused] party according to what his peers consider appropriate.

We also wish and grant that if one of us impleads outside the borough any of his peers for any cause – unless first having the case tried by his peers in the borough (as justice requires for the sake of goodwill) is denied him by an opposing party – he is to be amerced and obligated to the community in [the amount of] twelve pence.

We also wish and grant that if one of us is summoned by the bailiff, at the orders of the steward, to come before them and he does not come, he is to be amerced and obligated to the community in [the amount of] six pence; and at any repetition of such disobedience the penalty is to be doubled.

We also wish and grant that if any of us opposes or obstructs the bailiff from executing [his duties] or a distrain which the stewards have ordered him to carry out, he is to be amerced and obligated to the community in [the amount of] forty pence.

We also wish and grant that if any of us in any way refuses to cooperate with the bailiff in the performance of his duties, he is to be amerced and obligated to the community in [the amount of] twelve pence and, notwithstanding, should [also] make amends according to what his peers consider appropriate.

We also wish and grant that none of us is to buy meat or fresh fish in the town before the third hour, for purposes of reselling by retail. If any of us does so, he is to be obligated to the community for the value of the fish or meat thus bought or sold.

We also wish and grant that is any of us accepts election to the office of steward of St. Mary's or of the [Holy] Cross of the town church, or of keeper of the town bridge, or bailiff serving the stewards, they are to render a satisfactory account of all revenues from the same to the stewards of the gild, whenever and as often as they are forewarned to do so.

We also wish and grant that the aforesaid fines and penalties incurred or due are to be levied by the bailiff at the orders of the stewards and handed over to those stewards.

We also wish and grant that if any of us accepts the office of steward, he is to take responsibility for those revenues of fines and amercements received by him from the said officials, and is to render a satisfactory account of the same to the community each year on 2 January.

And we have made a commitment on behalf of every one of our number and our heirs and successors forever to observe among ourselves and to conserve in perpetuity, resolutely and faithfully, each and every of these [\[ordinances\]](#).

In witness of which, our common seal has been appended to this document.

DISCUSSION

In Domesday, Bridgwater has the appearance of an agricultural settlement. But, as its name indicates (believed derived from a term either meaning "quay" or "gangplank"), its location on the River Parrett, at a point where that tidal river could still be crossed before widening and flowing into the Bristol Channel, was allowing the location to act as an informal port. Bridgwater was probably the demesne land of a larger manor. The bridge that existed in medieval times, however, may not have been built until borough status was acquired for Bridgwater in 1200.

This was the initiative of William Brewer who, in 1199, had acquired Bridgwater through an exchange. The following year, he obtained from King John permission to build a castle there, and also a royal charter giving the status of liber burgus to Bridgwater; it was in fact the second place in England to obtain that status by explicit charter grant. The grant enabled Brewer to endow Bridgwater with privileges of his choice (as far as was within his power) associated with established boroughs; it explicitly included the rights to a market and a fair, to collect tolls and for the burgesses to be free of tolls elsewhere (such being rights only the king could grant). It did not however alter the fact that Brewer and his heirs remained lords of the borough, controlling the courts – although the gild appears to have had its own court to deal with internal matters. The burgesses did not hold the town at fee farm until the fifteenth century; the town was incorporated in 1468, when the gild and borough courts were probably integrated and a mayor became the executive officer.

The nucleus of the settlement lay on the west bank of the river; there were probably only a few hundred inhabitants (313 burgages in 1257). Brewer built his castle in the north-east corner and the topography of the town suggests that some new streets may have been laid out between the parish church and the waterfront, including a marketplace. A bridge across the river – its building associated by local tradition with Brewer – led to the development of an eastern section of the town; the bridge would have been one point for toll-collection, which is the main reason it required a "keeper". Some kind of fortifications were added in the late thirteenth century, but perhaps not beyond stone gates at the main entrances.

Brewer went on, in 1204, to a second "free borough" foundation, at Chesterfield in Derbyshire, part of a royal manor granted him by John, along with licence for a market and fair. Several years prior to obtaining lordship he had already been active in acquiring property that was on the edge of the settled area and on which a new marketplace had been established, larger than the cramped original of the manor. Whether this new marketplace was an initiative of Brewer or local residents, possibly as far back as the 1160s, is not certain; similarly, since 1195 the king had been paid an annual fee for the right for a fair to be held at Chesterfield. At the least Brewer, who after John's abortive rebellion in 1194 had come into temporary possession of Chesterfield along with Prince John's other Midland estates and the shrievalty of Derbyshire, was capitalizing on what he perceived as a growth in trade. But it seems likely he was fostering that growth from about 1194, expanding the new marketplace and perhaps initiating the fair. The Pipe Rolls following that year show an increase in the revenue expected by the king from Chesterfield, and by 1198 it was being described as a burgus in the rolls. The 1204 charter was simply the culmination of Chesterfield's evolution from village to town.

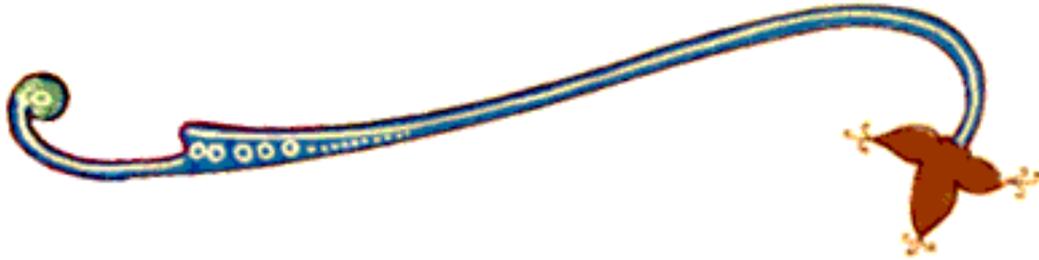

The motivation for such foundations was financial: to stimulate the commercial development of a settlement, and take a cut of the profits, e.g. through tolls from visiting traders, rents from settlers attracted to a free borough, and larger numbers of court fines or administrative fees that growth in commerce and industry brought with it. In Brewer's case, he may also have had in mind the provisioning of his castle at Bridgwater, whose presence also provided a special clientele for goods and services. But his actual vision appears broader; Brewer seems in fact to have been something of a speculator in commercial growth, and might be considered the most important founder of boroughs during John's reign, which saw the peak for grants of liberties to boroughs. That Brewer witnessed 44 of the 98 such charters has led to speculation [R.V. Turner, Men Raised from the Dust: Administrative Service and Upward Mobility in Angevin England, Philadelphia, 1988] that he may have served as the king's negotiator with urban representatives in such matters. As early as 1190 he had ensure a weekly market was among the rights when Richard I granted him the royal manor of Somborne in Hampshire. In 1199 he was granted Bakewell in Derbyshire, but surrendered it a few years later; it did not develop into a market town until the latter half of the next century. In 1209 he obtained a royal charter giving Axminster, Devon, borough status, along with a market and fair, and a few years later was protecting his investment by suing Sidmouth (some 15 miles distant) and Lyme Regis (5 miles away) for having established markets that he considered unfairly competitive. In 1221 he acquired a 3-year lease of the borough and fair of Great Torrington, Devon, and in the year of his death (1226) the king granted him a market at Newton Poppleford, Devon.

By the mid-fourteenth century Bridgwater was Somerset's most prosperous town. Goods such as wine were being shipped between Bridgwater and France (notably Bordeaux), Spain, Wales and Ireland, and the Bardi were using it as one shipping point for their wool exports. Although there was some economic decline towards the end of that century, in the next the town benefited from a steady trade in cloth and from being made a separate port, for purposes of customs collection, from Bristol.

Once the foundations of self-government had been acquired from the lord of a community, local authorities felt themselves empowered and obliged to begin shaping the details of the local constitution. The set of ordinances above, undated but probably from the first half of Henry III's reign, clearly does not represent the initial constitution, for the community already had a fundamental institution of self-government in its gild, and possessed a communal seal. The preamble suggests the document to be more of a constitutional retooling consequent to political disagreements within the community. Perhaps differences of policy between the mercantile interests and those of the rest of the community: the provision for two elected stewards may have superseded a single gild leader, with this duality reflected in two gilds serving the parish church, one for merchants and one for other townspeople (a duality seen at Chesterfield). The constitutional adjustments are typical in their concern for defining town officials and the scope of their responsibilities, enforcing obedience to those officials, requiring accountability for borough revenues, and addressing abuses contrary to the interests of the community.

NOTES

"imputes"

I.e. slanders.

"peers"

Fellow townsmen.

"deceiver"

Possibly refers specifically to forgery, or more generally to any action involving fraud.

"disobedience"

Literally, contumacy: an arrogant resistance to authority.

"refuses to cooperate"

The original is contempserit, hence contempt of court: refusal to cooperate with (by inference, show respect for) legitimate authority. Insulting a town officer was one of the more common ways of offending under this category, hence the need to compensate the officer.

"third hour"

The third hour after daybreak.

"of St. Mary's or of the Cross"

There were apparently two gilds associated with the parish church, presumably serving two different altars in the church. Interestingly, two gilds of the same names were found in the parish church of Chesterfield; that of St. Mary's at least claimed to have been founded in 1218, and its purposes included to protect the rights of the church, to protect the rights of the lord of the borough, and "to guard all their liberties, within town and without town, and to give trusty help thereto whenever it may be needed". It seems likely these gilds associated with the parish church were the socio-religious face of the town gild, perhaps explaining why the latter required two stewards. At Chesterfield, at least by the late 14th century, the Holy Cross gild was for the merchants of the town. Perhaps at Bridgwater the two gilds had memberships that were socially or economically distinct – however, we must beware of inferring too much.

"William Brewer"

A man of ambition and capability, Brewer progressed from modest beginnings, as a royal forester in Hampshire, an office that was hereditary in his family, to the role of one of the leading administrators and counsellors serving four of England's kings. Although often thought of primarily as a member of the Angevin judiciary (e. g. Dictionary of National Biography), in an age before the judiciary was fully professionalized, he was one of many men who were all-round administrators and took on judicial roles as part of their wide-ranging duties. He is first seen in direct association with the king when witnessing one of his charters in 1175. In the last decade of Henry II's reign he was a local administrative agent based in the southwest; a variety of roles led him to the shrievalty of Devon, where he already had acquired a small estate. Although there is no sign of an initial close association with Richard I, someone must have recommended his talents for, when Richard set off for crusade in 1189, he left the kingdom in the care of two senior and four assistant justiciars; Brewer was one of the latter group. He continued to fill shrieval posts, in Oxfordshire and Berkshire. He stood by Richard during the difficult times of his imprisonment in Germany and the rebellion by his brother John and, after Richard's return, was transferred to the shrievalties of Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire and made one of the ambassadors to negotiate peace with Philip of France. John bore no grudge, however, and in fact placed more reliance on him than had Richard; Brewer was even more of a familiar of John than of Richard, spending large amounts of time in his retinue and urging him to courses of action that won him criticism from the Church. He remained supportive of John during the interdict and the baronial rebellion. John showed his gratitude by giving him many grants of lands, and allowing him to serve at different times as sheriff of almost a dozen counties in the south, southwest and Midlands. In 1209 his multiple shrievalties essentially gave him responsibility for the south coast, an area that John wished to protect against attack from France. During Henry III's minority, Brewer continued to act as a leading advisor of the monarchy against its enemies. Brewer's landholdings were, like his shrievalties, scattered throughout several counties, collectively equalling a baronial honor in their quantity, although Brewer was never given an aristocratic title. Devon was his main base until he acquired Bridgwater, where he financed the building of a castle and residence on a baronial scale. He was evidently a skilled acquirer, exploiter and manager of estates, quite capable of using the law to defend the privileges of his holdings, and was also a businessman with some minor involvements in commerce. His financial acumen had led to his appointment as a baron of the Exchequer under Richard I, and he became one of the senior barons under John. His efforts to secure borough status and/or markets and fairs for his manors reflect his business sense of how economic conditions in England were changing, with the growth of trade offering prospects of greater revenues from well-placed and well-endowed market centres.

He used some of the great wealth he accumulated to found: Torre Abbey, which became the richest Premonstratensian house in England; the hospital of St. John at Bridgwater, which was to look after 13 poor sick persons; Mottisfont, an Augustinian house in Hampshire which thereafter served as his treasury and archives; and Dunkeswell, a Cistercian abbey in Devon, to which he and his wife retired shortly before his death in 1226.

TRANSLATION

In the name of God, Amen. In the name of the Highest and Indivisible Trinity, Father, Son and Holy Ghost, Amen. On 9 July, 1444, I, John Brompton merchant of Beverley, being sound in mind and memory, make, ordain and provide for my testament in the following way. First, being about to depart from this world, Father, into your hands I commend my soul, that I may be redeemed, Lord God of truth, if not through my own merits – I who am a sinner – I nonetheless hope that the Bosom of Abraham will receive me in redemption through the Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ, and the merits and intercession of the exalted Mary, Mother of God, Saints Michael, Gabriel, Raphael and all the angels and archangels, St. John the Baptist and all the Patriarchs, SS. Peter and Paul, Andrew, James, John and the Apostles, All Saints, SS. George, Denis, Thomas, Alban and All Holy Martyrs, SS. Edward, Remigius, Nicholas, John de Beverley, John de Bridlington and all Confessors, SS. Anne, [Mary] Magdalene, and Brigid, the matrons Winifred, Katherine, Barbara, Etheldreda, Ursula and the Eleven Thousand, with all Holy Virgins, and the entire heavenly court. Also, through faith, hope and charity, I devoutly trust in the highest clemency of the Great Saviour.

I leave my body to be buried in the collegial church of St. John of Beverley, next to the body of my wife Elena. I bequeath 20s. to the fabric of that church. To the fabric of the [cathedral] church of St. Peter at York, 5s. To the fabric of the chapel of the Blessed Mary at Beverley, 10s. I bequeath 6s.8d to mag. Henry Bowett, formerly my rector and [now] prebendary in the prebend of St. Martin in the collegiate church of St. John of Beverley. To each of the friaries at Kingston-upon-Hull, 3s.4d. To every friary at Scarborough, 3s.4d. I bequeath to the convent of nuns and sisters at Watton, 20s. for a pittance. I bequeath 3s.4d to the Prioress of Swine, 2s. to each nun of that house, and 3s.4d to the vicar there. And 12d. to each chaplain celebrating divine service in the churches of that village. To Hamond the servant there, 12d.; and to each female servant of the nuns within that abbey, 6d. To the nuns of Keeling, 10s. To the nuns of Burnham, 5s.

I bequeath £3.6s.8d for wax [candles] to be burned at the time of my exequies. I bequeath 36s. to clothe in russet cloth thirteen poor men carrying candles [at the funeral]. I bequeath £10 to clothe, in cloth called "walshefresed" Coventry russet, 60 paupers of either sex. I bequeath £18 to be distributed among the poor at the time of my obit. To the lepers outside the north gates of Beverley, 2s. and half a cauldon of coal. I bequeath to the paupers of the almshouse outside the same gates 4d. every week for three years, as a pittance. Also, 6d. to each of them at the time of my obit and a cauldron of coal. To the paupers of Holy Trinity on the Cross bridge, 4d. every week for three years, as a pittance. Also, 6d. to each of them on the day of my burial, and a cauldron of coal between them. To the paupers of St. John in Lathgate, 2d. a week for three years. To each sister of the house of St. Giles, 6d. and half a cauldron of coal between them. To each poor person, up to the number of 15, 1d. each week for four years. To the hermit next to St. Giles' church, 3s.4d. To the anchorite at the friary of St. Nicholas in Beverley, 18d.

I bequeath 3s.4d to my parish vicar. I bequeath 12d. to my parish clerk. I bequeath 4d. to each chaplain who is at my exequies and mass. I bequeath £12 in food for paupers and other of my friends and in clothing for my brethren and my friends [for the funeral]. I bequeath [blank] to pay the king his tax, or two half-taxes, on behalf of the inhabitants of Langtoft and Cottam. I bequeath 10s. to the fabric of the church of Langtoft. I bequeath 12d. to each poor person, of either sex, in the villages of Langtoft and Cottam. I bequeath £4.13s.4d to be taken annually [as salary] by each of two chaplains, for celebrating divine services for me for three years in the Charnell. I bequeath £4.13s.4d per year to John Burnard chaplain, for celebrating divine services for me for three years in the church called Holmekirke. I give and bequeath 40s. to the same John Burnard. I bequeath £4.6s.8d per year to a chaplain celebrating for a year in Langtoft church for the souls of my parents and all my benefactors.

DISCUSSION

John Brompton was one of Beverley's wealthiest merchants, and a name of influence in the town, having served as one of the keepers of the town first in 1407/08 and on 6 further occasions up to 1440/41. Since Brompton died in July 1444, just three weeks after drawing up his will, the man of this name who was a keeper in 1453/54 must have been one of his grandsons of the name. The relatively luxurious lifestyle revealed by his will makes him exceptional among his peers, and the amount he was able to give to charitable and pious uses, upon turning his mind to death and the afterlife, was correspondingly greater. Brompton was himself the founder of three almshouses for housing the poor; they do not, however, appear to have lasted for many years.

The lavish expressions in the preamble are unusual, perhaps reflecting personal preferences in the selection of the saints, and contrast with the much briefer self-commendation in Whittington's will. The testament of John Baret of Bury St. Edmund's (to come) paints yet another picture, for Baret – Brompton's counterpart in wealth and taste for luxury – focused his attention on funeral arrangements. It would be tempting to give in to modern cynicism and ascribe Brompton's apparent piety to the conscience of a politician and merchant who might have acted in self-interest, to the detriment of others, many times during his career. However, we should not dismiss the possibility that it reflects a sincerely devout and pious mentality.

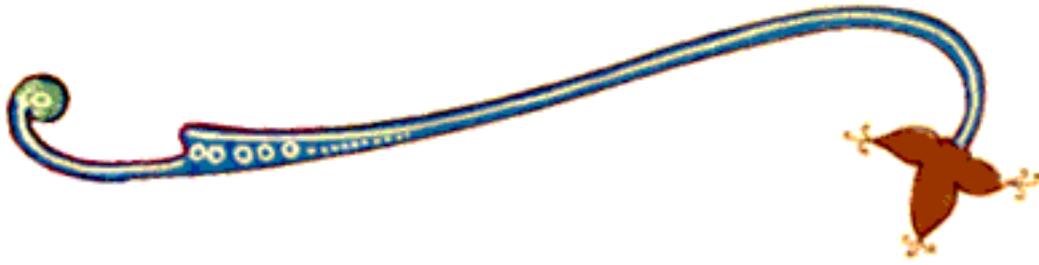

Nor are the two interpretations necessarily incompatible.

Nonetheless, it is a risky business taking the evidence of the last will and testament and trying to reconstruct from it a sense of the religiosity of the testator. Does the will reflect the testator as he or she was, and behaved, during life? Or does it attempt to make amends for failings? To what extent are the provisions of a will motivated by desire to make provision for heirs and dependants? To wrap up unfinished business and personal matters? To make a final display of socio-economic status? Or to arrange for the fate of one's soul? Some wills were drawn up hastily, as death approached, giving the testator little time for self-expression and obliging him or her to rely on the executors or heirs to deal with spiritual investments; others were evidently drawn up with considerable forethought, and possibly under the influence of others, notably the principal heirs. A will may tell us something of the testator's state of mind at death, but not so much about attitudes during life. Furthermore, we cannot generalize from one testator to the class as a whole, and the testament of such a wealthy man as John Brompton should not be taken as typifying the merchant class of late medieval Beverley.

The large sums assigned to pious and charitable purposes, including his own funeral, were of course not affordable for most townsmen. Handouts to the poor on the day of the funeral or obit were probably fairly common, at least in the case of wealthy testators; the aim being to attract to the event the attendance and prayers of those on whom God was believed to look in favour. Brompton made little attempt to identify which poor might benefit – his munificence needed no provisos; less wealthy testators might limit the dole to poor persons in their own parish or neighbourhood.

In the codicil to his will he left amounts ranging from 3s.4d to 10s. to the fabric and decoration of parish churches of various villages in the immediate vicinity of Beverley and Kingston-upon-Hull: Etton, Cherry Burton, Bishop Burton, Walkington, Rowley, Cottingham, Hessele, Swanland, North Ferriby, Melton, Elloughton, Brantingham, Ellerker, South Cave, North Cave, Hotham, Sancton, etc.. These were perhaps places he held land, although the careful sequence in which the places are named – beginning northwest of Beverley, then heading south to the west side of Hull, and then proceeding along the road west out of Hull for a few miles, before veering north again, may have some other significance, such as a route for collecting the wool on which Brompton's mercantile fortune was based. Such gifts to churches, possibly excepting those specified as recompense for forgotten tithes, were likely understood as eliciting prayers of thanks from parish clergy and parishioners, which would benefit the testator's soul.

NOTES

"Bosom of Abraham"

A term deriving from ancient Jewish beliefs and reflected in the gospels only in St. Luke, in a parable in which a rich man, selfishly ignoring the needs of the leprous beggar lying helpless outside his door, after death suffers the fate of an outcast from Heaven, while the beggar banquets, his head resting on the bosom of Abraham. The term became a medieval metaphor for a place of comfort for the righteous after death (in effect, Heaven itself). The mention is pertinent to the testator's charitable motivations.

"John de Beverley"

An eighth-century Bishop of Hexham and York, who founded a monastery at the site of what developed into the town of Beverley, and later retired and died there.

"John de Bridlington"

St. John Twenge, the last Englishman made a saint. In the 14th century he was Prior of St. Mary's at Bridlington, and had a reputation for great holiness and miraculous powers.

"pittance"

handout to be divided among the nuns (as opposed to a contribution to the house itself).

"Swine"

A village lying roughly between Beverley and Kingston-upon-Hull; the several bequests to the abbey there suggests that Brompton had more than once enjoyed abbey hospitality.

"Keeling"

Now Nunkeeling.

"cauldron"

There was a specific measure of this name.

"almshouse"

This probably refers to St. Mary's hospital, which stood immediately outside the north gates. The leper house is thought to have been a few hundred yards further north.

"anchorite"

A hermit, probably female, since the term is distinguished from the previous bequest to a "recluse".

"brethren"

The reference here may be to the testator's fellow town rulers, rather than to siblings.

"Langtoft and Cottam"

Villages about 15 miles north of Beverley. It appears Langtoft may have been Brompton's birthplace, and possibly other kin lived in nearby Cottam.

TRANSLATION

The jurors state that John Bruyn esq. of Bridgnorth, Shropshire, during the time when he was bailiff of Bridgnorth – that is, on 8 March 1413 – invited William Beckebury chaplain to dine with him at his house in Bridgnorth. While William was eating, John asked him to return a chaplet decorated with various items of silver, which John's mother had previously put up as a pledge for 6s.8d he had loaned her. The chaplain declared that he was prepared to do so, and after dinner offered it to John in return for being satisfied for his money. This angering John, on that same day at Bridgnorth he beat and ill-treated the chaplain, using force and arms. As a result, the chaplain, for fear of a worse beating, handed over the chaplet to him and gave up dropped all claim to the money, reluctantly and under coercion that was contrary to the king's peace.

And that John, while bailiff of Bridgnorth, on 6 July 1409 at Bridgnorth assaulted a certain burgess, David Balle, with [the assistance of] armed men, and beat and ill-treated him in infringement of the king's peace. And he took from him, by extortion, fourteen shillings and fourpence, contrary to the king's peace.

And that John, while bailiff of the town, that is on 11 November 1410 in the house of Henry Cardemakere at Bridgnorth assaulted Henry Meose, the town's communal bellman and someone of little consequence, in infringement of the peace, and punched him in the mouth so that he lost his two front teeth, harming and maiming Henry contrary to the king's peace.

And that John Bruyn, while bailiff of the town, that is on 22 September 1408, with force and arms seized Geoffrey Taillour of Bridgnorth and imprisoned him in the king's gaol there, maliciously and without just cause holding him for ten weeks, until he offered to pay a fine of forty shillings, which payment was extorted from him before John would release him from gaol, in infringement of the king's peace.

And that John Bruyn, while bailiff of the town, that is on 4 May 1408, went to chaplain Richard Yreland's residence in the churchyard of St. Leonard at Bridgnorth, entered his room without the chaplain's permission, and with the assistance of armed men feloniously and in infringement of the king's peace took, carried off, and robbed Richard of various goods and possessions, viz.: a baselard decorated with silver worth 20s., and woollen and linen cloth found there worth 40s.

And that John Bruyn, while bailiff of the town, that is on 8 May 1409 at Bridgnorth, made such serious threats against Roger Bakere of Bridgnorth, concerning life and limb, that Roger was intimidated out of fear of John's ill-will into paying him 26s.8d against Roger's will and by extortion, and for the same reason he left town and has not returned since.

And that John Bruyn, while bailiff of the town, that is on 8 September 1410 at Bridgnorth, made such threats of violence against William Brugge clerk that William, out of fear of greater harm and in order to be left in peace, paid him twenty shillings, taken extortionately and contrary to the king's peace.

And that John Bruyn, while bailiff of the town of Bridgnorth, made such threats of violence and so verbally abused Robert Castell and his wife, on 29 September 1410 at Bridgnorth, that Robert and his wife were intimidated into paying John 13s.4d, out of fear of John and [being done] greater harm and in order to be left in peace. In this way, John Bruyn took the money by extortion and contrary to the king's peace.

And that John Bruyn, while bailiff of the town, that is on 4 April 1413, sent to the house of Henry Cardemakere in Bridgnorth to summon William Ryndelford, and thereafter John so forcefully beat William on the head with the handle of a dagger that William's knees buckled under him, and he mistreated him, and afterwards imprisoned him without just cause in the king's gaol at Bridgnorth, and extortionately refused to set him free until William provided surety for paying 13s.4d, in infringement of the king's peace.

And that John Bruyn, while bailiff of the town of Bridgnorth, on 2 May 1410, as a disturber of the peace, assaulted by force Richard Cressege smith while he was at the house of Henry Cardemakere at Bridgnorth; he kicked his legs out from under him, trampled on him, and beat him. Afterwards he put him into the king's gaol at Bridgnorth, without just cause, and took 20s. from him by extortion to let him out and give him his release, in infringement of the king's peace.

And that John Bruyn, while bailiff of the town of Bridgnorth, that is in 1411/12, in many places and on many occasions that year ordered the bakers of the town not to buy grain in the communal marketplace except from himself. To which bakers he sold over a hundred bushels of corn at 10d. a bushel, the bailiff assuring the bakers that throughout the year they might bake bread using a standard of 10d.; thereby profiting both the bailiff and the bakers. Whereas in the town market a bushel of grain was commonly and usually sold for 6d. Thereby he caused harm to the community, deceived the town and countryside, and infringed the established standard of 6d.

And that John Bruyn, on 18 October 1404, in the time when William Palmere and William Goldsmyth were bailiffs of Bridgnorth, a certain brass plate worth 40d. having been seized and arrested in the town by those bailiffs by reason of a just and rightful distraint, along came John with an armed band and used force to rescue and carry off the distrained item, removing it from the bailiffs' custody against their will, in contempt of the king and the bailiffs. Not only that, but at the time of the fair held the same day, the bailiffs having as customary assigned a certain plot of ground on a decent site to a certain merchant, for a stall on which he could display brass pots for sale, John and his armed men vexatiously overturned the canopy and knocked down the stall, against the will of the bailiffs and the merchant, in contempt of the king and in infringement of his peace.

And that while John Bruyn esq. of Bridgnorth, Shropshire, was bailiff of the town, on 12 March 1413, John Dawes chaplain of the parish church of St. Leonard, Bridgnorth, fearful because of the threats and ill-will of John Bruyn, sent a large chest of his containing his goods and possessions worth 40s. out of Bridgnorth by boat along the river Severn to the village of Cressage, up Shrewsbury way. Thereupon, John Bruyn, having learned about the despatch of the chest with its contents, straightaway sent his men in pursuit, to have the chest brought back to Bridgnorth again by threatening the boatman with beheading. The boatman, reluctantly but fearful of being harmed, brought back the chest to Bridgnorth. Then John Bruyn seized and held the chest and its contents by force, and he still has and detains it, extortionately and in infringement of the king's peace.

And that the same John, while he was bailiff of Bridgnorth, on 17 November 1408, went with armed men to the house of Margaret the wife of William Lode of Bridgnorth, where he assaulted and beat a certain John Pynte chaplain, who was sitting down to dinner, and mistreated him by twisting his genitals. He took him off and imprisoned him without cause, keeping him in prison at Bridgnorth until he had extorted from him a payment of a hundred shillings. Not only that but he, feloniously and in infringement of the king's peace, despoiled and robbed a certain Margaret Wawne, who was there at the time, of a strong-box containing her kerchiefs worth 40d. and other of her adornments (that is, rings, brooches, and other jewelry) worth 40d., together with 14s.8d in cash contained in the same coffer belonging to Margaret.

And that on 8 October 1410, during the time that John was bailiff of the town, Griffith, a Welshman who was the servant of John Bruyn of Bridgnorth, at John's orders infringed the peace by going to the house of widow Margaret Lye in Bridgnorth and, she being in her room, he came into the room without her leave and feloniously raped her, despite the fact that she raised the hue. For John Bruyn kept guard at the entrance, so that no-one could go in. And so John was an accessory to the rape and the felony perpetrated, in infringement of the king's peace.

The jurors say that John Bruyn esq. of Bridgnorth, Shropshire, on 13 November 1413 came to Oldbury with force and arms, in infringement of the king's peace, and there assaulted Richard Horde who had been commissioned by the king to arrest John, and took from Richard the writ the king had addressed to him. On the same day and in the same place, John wounded William Skrevener and John Adames, who were there with Richard to carry out the king's orders and commission.

DISCUSSION

The above sixteen charges laid at the door of John Bruyn are the record of a session of the peace held at Shrewsbury on 6 March 1414, before a group of justices headed by the earl of Arundel, a magnate with strong landed interests in Shropshire. They, together with reports of other disturbances and lawlessness in the region, were sufficiently disturbing that in June, justices of the King's Bench arrived at Shrewsbury to review and remedy the situation. These charges individually provide indications of the kinds of abuses to which local offices gave scope; together they present a picture of the opportunity for an unscrupulous individual to manipulate a position of authority in his self-interest.

However, Dr. Powell warns that the charges against Bruyn must be seen in the context of wider political factionalism, and suspects the charges may have been trumped-up by rivals. Arundel appears to have perceived his influence in the county to be at risk from John Talbot, lord Furnival, who had some years earlier acquired a landed interest in Shropshire, via his wife. Furthermore, Talbot and Arundel were in 1413 in direct dispute over a parcel of land, and in May John Bruyn led a group of Talbot supporters to defend the property against Arundel's supporters.

The origins of Bruyn's family may have lay in Cheshire, but in the fourteenth century the family established a foothold in Bridgnorth; it also had county interests. John's influence there is indicated by the seven terms he served as bailiff (1403/04, 1405/06, 1407-09, 1410-13 – the indictments above being evidence for the last two), his first term having been preceded by his representation of the borough at parliament in 1402. Even before the Arundel/Talbot quarrel was fully underway, John was in embroiled in trouble. He was indicted before justices of the peace of having, in June 1408, extorted a payment of £2 from a churchman to allow him to take up his appointment as the new prior of the hospital of St. John in Bridgnorth, as well as other minor extortions from local men, including a pipe of wine from Richard Selman. At the proceedings before King's Bench in 1414 were added the accusations, not in the list above, that Bruyn had in 1408 allowed a felon to escape from his custody, and in the following year unwarrantedly confiscated a pack of wool. Whatever the suspicions of him, he was able to gain re-election to the ballivalty, and in December 1408 obtain appointment as the county escheator, a post he held for almost a year; this post, with some authority over matters of land inheritances, could have made him very useful to the Talbot interest. He had been ordered to appear before Chancery to answer such charges and, when he failed to do so, his arrest was ordered in February 1409; however, the orders were cancelled in May when the steward of the king's household, a Cheshire landowner, stood surety for John answering to Chancery and not pursuing any hostility to Selman. We do not know what may have been the outcome.

We must assume factionalism within the borough to explain how Bruyn was able to maintain himself in office for most of the next few years. The tide turned in autumn 1413 when, for whatever reason, Bruyn was not re-elected to the ballivalty; instead his old enemy Selman, along with Richard Horde, were elected. At some point in that year, perhaps after departing office, Bruyn decided it was politic to buy a royal pardon. The parliament of 1413, at which Shropshire was represented by two Arundel supporters, Richard Lacon (Arundel's military lieutenant in the region) and Robert Corbet, nominated for the unpopular job of collecting the parliamentary subsidy Bruyn and four other Talbot supporters, including Robert Lyney of Newport and Robert Swynnerton of Poynton. When they came to carry out their duties, however, Arundel's supporters – particularly Lacon, Corbet and his brother Roger – offered a good deal of resistance and harassment.

In late 1413 a petition to Chancery, purportedly from the burgesses of Bridgnorth (but presumably from the faction opposing Bruyn), asked that John Wynnesbury, a Shropshire J.P. who also happened to be one of Arundel's affinity, be commissioned to assist the town bailiffs in arresting John Bruyn and his supporters, complaining that the sheriff had failed to do so, despite John's many offences; the complainants declared that the Bruyn gang was inhibiting them from leaving the town to conduct trade. A further petition, under the name of the king's tenants at Bridgnorth, likewise complained of Bruyn's oppressions and malicious acts. A petition from chaplain John Dawes declared that Bruyn had threatened him with violence. Together with the complaints made before King's Bench, which include additional charges (assault, unlawful imprisonment, and extortion), to those listed above one has the impression that the Bruyn party was terrorizing both the town and the surrounding hamlets, right up to the time that the king's justices sat down at Shrewsbury in 1414.

The attempt to arrest Bruyn, along with Lyney and others, at Oldbury proved abortive, despite that, as the collectors of the subsidy complained, a large group of about 120 men, including Horde, had attacked them there, stolen their goods, and killed their horses. The collectors continued to pursue this complaint before the parliaments of 1414 and 1415. Meanwhile, Arundel had gained the upper hand. Just a few days after the conflict at Oldbury, the king required Arundel and Talbot to give guarantees they would maintain the peace; Arundel having the ear of the king, Talbot was temporarily taken into custody and early in the following year shipped off to Ireland as king's lieutenant there. At the same time Arundel obtained a commission of the peace to investigate accusations against Bruyn and Robert Swynnerton (extortion), as well as supporters of another lord with whom Arundel was in contention; his fellow justices included Robert Corbet, John Wynnesbury, and other of his known supporters. It was not uncommon in this period for judicial commissioners to take advantage of their positions of authority to further the interests of themselves or the faction they supported. A jury of Bridgnorth men presented fifteen of the accusations, while the sixteenth was presented by a jury of county men who included Richard Lacon and John Corbet.

Although Arundel tried to obtain a swift royal confirmation of the convictions, the king preferred to send his justices of King's Bench into the region to make their own investigations. The concern about disarray of administration in Shropshire had prompted a complaint by parliament, and the king was doubtless concerned about the resistance to the subsidy collectors. The king's justices not only paid attention to Bruyn but also to Arundel's leading cronies. Wynnesbury was investigated for plundering and setting afire the house of the prioress of Brewood; he, Corbet and a third Arundel supporter were dropped from the county bench in 1416, after the earl of Arundel's death, when John Talbot's influence in the county was on the rise (he later became earl of Shrewsbury). Of Bruyn's immediate fate we are uncertain; he was said in summer of 1416 to be in prison, but was able to make use of the pardon obtained three years earlier to win his release.

With the shift in power towards the Talbots, Bruyn's fortunes rebounded. He was appointed county sheriff in 1420, remaining such for three consecutive years, and was immediately thereafter made escheator again for a further year, following which he served as a county J.P. until 1432, again holding the shrievalty in 1431/32. In 1423 he was granted the wardenship of the forests of Morville and Shirlett (just north-east of Bridgnorth); the grant of that to someone else in 1437 is indicative of his death.

Was Bruyn an abuser of his position as bailiff, or was he simply a target as a leader of the pro-Talbot faction that was trying to protect Shropshire from the depredations of Arundel's lieutenants, as Dr. Powell proposes? Our concern here is less with Bruyn's guilt or innocence than with the plausibility of the charges. Were I to make public accusations against my hometown mayor that he had been running a protection racket targeting small businesses, had systematically blackmailed or bribed political opponents and even had one murdered, was heavily involved in drug-smuggling, and had introduced hallucinogenic drugs into the local water-supply, I should be considered a lunatic or a troublemaker. I ought instead to fabricate accusations that I expect to be, at first glance, credible in the context of existing public opinion concerning political corruption; I might for instance claim that he had received kickbacks from contractors. The charges against Bruyn needed to be compatible with the worldview of politics at that time, notwithstanding that the lengthy list of charges presented in total a picture of a wholly corrupt administrator.

To some extent Arundel's influence over the initial hearings in March 1414, both in packing the bench and perhaps the juries, might be thought to mitigate the need for credibility. But he then faced the challenge of convincing higher authorities, up to the level of the king. Despite the fact that the king was not prepared to take his word for it, on the whole we have to accept that the accusations laid against Bruyn had to be credible to stick, and were the sorts of crimes or abuses of power that the community, the courts, and the king could believe possible for someone in a position of power at that time.

It is not unlikely that real events lay behind some or all of the charges, but that the interpretation given them was skewed. Several of the actions taken by Bruyn might, for example, have been related to official distrains, while others are indicative of political factionalism in the town. Whether such were the case and Bruyn's perhaps heavy-handed actions were necessitated by political opposition, or whether Bruyn was an unscrupulous man ruling the town by intimidation in his own self-interest, as his enemies charged, we see here an indication of the types of abuses of power which might arise, in extreme cases.

NOTES

"David Balle"

He was one of the jurors presenting the charges against Bruyn.

"baselard"

A type of dagger, sufficiently long and wide-bladed to serve as a short sword, carried both by soldiers and civilians.

"John Dawes"

A William Dawes was one of the jurors presenting the charges against Bruyn.

"Oldbury"

This lay immediately south of the town.

"Richard Horde"

Possibly a political rival of Bruyn. He served as bailiff of Bridgnorth for nine terms between 1413 and 1446, as well as two terms as Shrewsbury's bailiff (having married an heiress there) during Henry VI's reign, and had county interests. In 1440 he was among commissioners instructed to investigate what estates belonging to the late earl of Arundel had not been reported at the original inquisition post mortem; when they failed to act on this, the sheriff was ordered to seize certain of their properties.

"jury of Bridgnorth men"

In addition to the jurors mentioned above, who may be suspected of having an interest in the case, another was Hugh Green, who became bailiff in 1415/16; he was a member of a family that had supplied bailiffs over three generations: two in 1328/29 and 1374/75, while in the same generation as Hugh (possibly his brothers) were Walter Green, bailiff in 1405/06 and 1417/18, and Thomas Green who held the ballivalty five times between 1414 and 1427. Thomas was among the accused parties summoned, along with Bruyn, to appear before the King's Bench at Shrewsbury in 1414, but he failed to obey the summons.

TRANSLATION

In the same year [1231] ... on 13 January, it came about that Robert de Kingestone, a servant of Andrew Bukerel, struck Alice's son Adam on the head with an axe, resulting in his death the following day. Coming to the place where Adam had been attacked, Alice seized Robert and she and her neighbours brought him to the house of John, beadle of the ward at that time, so that he could be kept in custody until the following day. She delivered him to the beadle, who received him but afterwards allowed him to escape. Because this took place during the day, and hue-and-cry was raised so that all the neighbours and everyone living in the ward of Joce fitz Peter, alderman at that time, were made fully aware of what had gone on, yet the wrongdoer was not detained after his capture, they are to be subject to judgement. When the beadle comes [before the justices] he is committed into the sheriffs' custody. Robert was in frankpledge in St. Pancras' parish, in the county of Middlesex. So the sheriff of Middlesex is instructed to make enquiry among his frankpledge and concerning his possessions, and to arrange to have him exacted and outlawed in the county court. Since the mayor and citizens testify that Robert was captured and taken to John the beadle's house at a time when he was not there, John is exonerated. Robert had no belongings. The chamberlain, the sheriffs, and the [ward] alderman knew nothing of this affair, nor was Robert in frankpledge or [resident] of the ward, for he was an outsider; therefore nothing [is due from them by way of fine]. Nothing from Andrew Bukerel, to whose household he belonged, since Andrew is dead.

DISCUSSION

This was one of a number of old crimes reviewed by the king's justices in eyre, authorized to examine various types of offences infringing royal laws. There had been no previous eyre in London since 1226. Consequently, in the case of the older crimes, many of the accused were no longer to be found, or had died in prison, while many of the witnesses (including neighbours, who were expected to be in the know) had likewise died. The account of the case is a summary of key developments in the proceedings. These accounts, and possibly the proceedings themselves, showed far less interest in the motives for crimes – something hard to arrive at anyway in the frequent absence of victim (usually dead) and accused (usually disappeared) – than in which parties could be fined or what possessions of the accused or deodands (instruments by which a crime was committed, forfeit to the crown) could be confiscated.

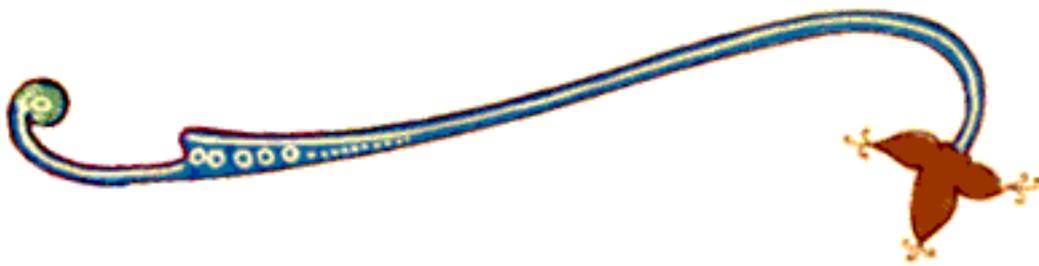

There are several instances here indicative of the important role of private citizens, individually or collectively, in bringing wrongdoers to justice. Alice attempts a citizen's arrest on the attacker of her son, and summons the neighbourhood to her assistance – and to witness the results of the crime (so that later in court they can assist with Robert's conviction) – by raising hue-and-cry. This was probably an obligation at first, although subject to abuse – some citizens raising the hue at the slightest provocation; at the 1276 eyre, the London authorities were claiming that raising hue-and-cry and pursuing criminals was optional for a neighbourhood, and failure to do so should not result in a fine.

In 1231, however, the neighbours take responsibility for escorting Robert to where he can be secured until Adam's fate is determined. The inhabitants of the ward are collectively blamed for Robert's escape – since they cannot claim ignorance, they must accept responsibility and face a fine. There are numerous other cases among the London eyre records of the 13th century in which the community of a ward is fined for failing to report something suspicious or being ignorant of activities within ward boundaries.

Finally, reference is made to Robert's frankpledge, a group of friends or neighbours which has some responsibility for knowing the whereabouts of its members and providing mutual guarantees of good behaviour. Frankpledges were often fined by the 1244 eyre for failing in their duty. In this case Robert must have been associated with extra-mural property held by Bukerel since he belonged to Bukerel's household but was not a London resident.

By contrast, the city authorities take care to avoid any risk of being fined themselves, by arguing that Robert was not a citizen and therefore they could not be held responsible for his actions.

NOTES

"Andrew Bukerel"

A member of one of the most prominent merchant families of the city, specializing in the pepper trade. His father had served as sheriff, and Andrew and two brothers held aldermannic office in the city. This crime of his servant, in which Bukerel seems in no way implicated did not hurt his social status, for he was elected mayor soon after and held the office for several years until his death in 1237.

"allowed him to escape"

The Latin literally reads "permitted him to depart". Dr. Chew's translation "let him go" would suggest a deliberate act on the beadle's part, but his subsequent exoneration (together with Robert's apparent disappearance) suggests more that Robert was not properly secured in the beadle's absence.

"Joce fitz Peter"

Alderman of Farringdon ward.

"exacted"

Exaction, or exigent, was a preliminary to outlawry: in cases where the accused could not be found, proclamation had to be made in court ordering the accused to surrender to justice. In London such proclamation had to be made at three successive husting sessions before (assuming failure to appear) the accused could be outlawed at the folkmoot; unless the accused were a non-Londoner, in which case the exaction took place at four sessions, to give more time for the accused to turn himself in.

[Parts of this document were illegible to the transcriber]

To all true Christian people by whom this document is seen, we Thomas Cristmasse senior and Nicholas Clare, bailiffs of the town of Colchester, give greetings in the name of the Lord, and all reverence and due honour to those who merit it. Since it is well known to be meritorious and necessary to testify and bear witness to the truth in all matters, so that any intrigue and fraud may be averted and suppressed, and what is right and fair applied without bias, we the bailiffs certify and assure you, and every one of you, that on 3 April 1492, at Colchester, John Dixwell gentleman and his wife Katherine, daughter and heir of the late William Bury gentleman of Colchester, came before us, the bailiffs, to complain that they had for a long time been suffering from a great wrong, causing them much damage, and that they and their lawfully begotten children, the rightful future heirs of William Bury, were likely to suffer being wrongfully disinherited of the manors, lands and tenements [...] of William Bury, whose heir Katherine [was ...] in the matter of the truth concerning [...] the form and making of the last will of the same [William] ... to the utter misfortune of them and their [...]. As a consequence of which John Dixwell and Katherine [...] requested us, the bailiffs, that we should [...] the statements of the persons named below, who, according to John and Katherine, were willing to take an oath on their Holy Doom to declare and affirm the truth in that regard. To which [request] we, the bailiffs, being unbiased and fair-minded, not motivated by malice or favouritism towards any person in this matter, agreed to allocate time and effort to hearing all such statements and depositions as should be impartially given and declared before us regarding this affair.

Whereupon, on that same day, John Dixwell and Katherine brought before us, the bailiffs, those persons named hereafter; that is:

Edmund Martyn fletcher, William Bloy, and John Algood, our fellow residents and burgesses. Which persons then and there, of their own free will, each individually took a solemn oath upon the Holy Evangels to testify and bear witness as to the truth in this matter.

Then Edmund Martyn, who was about 70 years old, took oath (as described above), stated and affirmed that about 20 years previous – whether a little more or less he could not remember – he was a tenant of William Bury in a rental property in Colchester situated next to the residence of William Bury, on the day that William Bury departed this world. And that he was, among various other persons, in William Bury's chamber in the quarter of an hour immediately before he died. Then and there he saw one Benet Popy, an educated man who was regarded with particular favour by William Bury, enter bringing with him pen, ink and paper, and ask William Bury [...] with making his last will, and then [...] Bury, noticing his daughter Jane [...] the wife of Thomas Chevyng, coming towards [...] William said to Benet that the same [...] over-hastily, because it was not William's intention that Jane should be involved in and privy to the making of the will. Yet nonetheless, Benet began to draw up a section of the will, viz. that William Bury gave and bequeathed his soul to Almighty God and his body to be buried in the Abbey of St. John, Colchester, beside the grave of his second wife. Then Edmund left to return to his shop, which was adjacent to William Bury's house. Fairly soon afterwards various women, who were then gathered around William Bury (his caregivers, servants, and others), loudly cried out to Edmund begging him to come to them and saying that William Bury had departed this world. As soon as Edmund could return, he found William Bury dead there. Then Edmund asked Benet Popy, who was present, how much more he had drafted or heard of the last will of William Bury; and Benet answered that there had been nothing more of the will drafted or declared in any particular or in any regard, other than what he had drafted at the beginning.

Immediately afterwards William Bloy similarly took oath and deposed and affirmed that at the time of William Bury's death, and prior to that time, he was a servant in attendance on William Bury, and a son of the caregiver for the illness of which he died; and he was present at William Bury's death. He went on to state and declare, concerning the last will [...] everything that Edmund Martyn had just before testified and deposed.

[John Algood] also took oath, and testified and deposed that at the time [of the death of] William Bury, before and afterwards, John was one of [...] the court of Colchester. Also how within [...] following the death of William Bury, Jane [daughter ...] of the late William Bury, sent for John Algood to come to her [...] residence, formerly belonging to William Bury; and once John Algood had come before her, Jane showed John Algood a paper document and then told John that it was the last will of William Bury, concerning the disposition of and arrangements for his lands and tenements, and she wished John Algood to write out a copy of the same on parchment. So John Algood, as he was requested, wrote a copy of the same on parchment and subsequently delivered it to Jane. John further stated and deposed that in the paper it was included that Jane should have various lands and tenements of William Bury, for her lifetime, with the remainder after her death going to the rightful heirs of William Bury; he added that the paper document Jane showed him contained or specified nothing about any manors, lands, or tenements to be had by Jane in fee simple. Furthermore, he said that the matters he copied from the paper to the parchment and those contained in what is called the last will of William Bury, registered in the court rolls of the Colchester moothall, are contradictory and incompatible in every clause, because the so-called will, as enrolled, purports that Jane should have various manors, lands, and tenements in fee simple.

Subsequently, on 5 April, John Dixwell and Katherine advised us, the bailiffs, that one Agnes Bloy, widow, who at the time of the death of William Bury was William's caregiver and very close to him, could give more reliable testimony on these matters than most others, because she was associated with William Bury long before his death. As that widow was then bedridden, John Dixwell and Katherine requested us to [... go to] the widow and [hear] her statement [...] say on these matters.

Agnes, after she had that same day been administered an oath upon [... for which] she would be answerable before God at Judgement Day [...] time of the death of William Bury and earlier, she [...] William Bury, and that she saw [...] William shortly before his death intended to have his last [will] drawn up [...] and how William Bury could not be persuaded to proceed with making the will because Jane was present and close at hand. She also said that William, immediately after Benet Popy had begun to draft the will, died; Agnes Bloy and various others standing beside and at the head of the bed having expected that William would have lived longer. Furthermore, she had never heard of William Bury having made any will.

Not long afterwards, on 16 May, John Dixwell and Katherine brought before us, the bailiffs, Richard Sabern, and Alice Lenynton and Alice Garsey, widows. Who, as John and Katherine said, were prepared of their own free will to testifying and make a statement of their knowledge as to the truth concerning the drafting or dictating of the last will of William Bury.

Whereupon, that same day, Richard Sabern, after taking oath upon the Holy Evangels that he would say or affirm nothing but what he knew to be the truth in this matter, immediately deposed that when William Bury had reached a critical point in his illness, Jane sent for Richard Sabern, who was then the sacristan of the church of St. Runwald, Colchester, in which parish stood William Bury's residence; Jane requested Richard Sabern to arrange for William Bury to have the holy sacraments administered to him as soon as possible. At Jane's summons, Richard came as quickly as he could to the residence of William Bury, where he then lay ill, and there he saw (among others) Benet Popy, an educated man, with pen and ink.

DISCUSSION

The surviving copy of the record of this investigation ends abruptly and incomplete as above.

If the accusation made by William Bury's daughter Katherine and her husband has any foundation, then the implication is not merely that a will was forged, to fill the void left by Bury's death before he could carry out his intent to dictate a will on his death-bed, but that the beneficiaries of this forged document – Bury's other daughter Jane and her husband – subsequently had a second forgery made to improve the terms of the original. Whether the absence of further record of the depositions implies, as Benham thought, that the bailiffs were not convinced of the truth of the accusation and never completed their investigation, or whether due to some defect in the register in which a copy was made – or perhaps the whole was never even copied into the register – we cannot say. But the fact that the bailiffs felt it appropriate to draw up a testimonial letter documenting the evidence is suggestive that they felt the accusation was not groundless. Their concern may have been prompted by the possible compromise of the official borough record as much as anything else.

A few scattered points can be added that corroborate more than elucidate. Although the court roll for the administrative year 1471/72 has not survived to us, a calendar of selected features of the court rolls includes the fact that the testament of William Bury was indeed registered in that roll, roughly 20 years prior to the investigation, as Edmund Martyn correctly remembered.

We do not know much about William Bury. He was already resident in Colchester in 1445 when he obtained, without fee, citizenship at Ipswich; that act was probably prompted by family reasons (inheritance), his lawyer father having served as Ipswich's town clerk and later, in the 1420s, as coroner and parliamentary representative. The testator of ca.1472 was alive, but probably underage, when his father had become a freeman of Ipswich in 1421. William Bury junior played no similar role at Colchester to that his father had at Ipswich, not being seen involved in any way in affairs of local government, and his business is unknown, although he may have been the William Bury who was licenced in 1439 to ship 500qt. of barley from Yarmouth to Colchester.

Whether the thrust of Katherine's challenge to the purportedly false will was intended to nullify it and thereby ensure herself of an immediate share in the properties then in Jane's hands, or whether the concern was rather with the issue of the nature of Jane's rights in those properties (for life vs. unfettered ownership) is not clear, as we do not know for certain which daughter was elder; however, when Bury had entered the franchise at Ipswich the only of his children mentioned were Nicholas, Katherine, and Margaret, and this list would likely have been complete for that date (but Jane might not have been mentioned if already married). The long delay between the death and the challenge to the will is mystifying, if Katherine was suspicious about the terms of the will. But perhaps the purpose of the version drafted by Algood was for Jane to show Katherine, a more plausible version that might pacify the latter and avert any legal challenge until too late. Possibly Jane's own death, and a consequent revelation that the property would not revert to her older sister, occasioned the challenge. As is too often the case with medieval legal battles, we see only part of the evidence and cannot surely decide where lies the truth.

That something may have come of the investigation is suggested in that ca.1493-95 Dixwell and his wife were involved in granting or releasing their rights to Bury's property to others. There is no evidence Dixwell was a Colchester resident himself; referred to as "esquire", it is likely he was a country gentleman and only interested in the Bury inheritance in order to sell it.

Other records of disputes over wills, some complaining disinheritance as a result of fraud or forgery, make it plausible that Katherine's accusation had merit. A testator relied on his executors to fulfill his last wishes properly; the appointment of supervisors of wills was intended to keep the executors honest, and the payment of executors "for their labour" may have been as much to discourage embezzlement as to thank them. Even so, executors (including widows and sons) did not always respect the letter of the law when administering bequests. Sometimes it was a matter of convenience to do otherwise that the testator wished; sometimes changes may have been forced on them when the testator's assets did not prove equal to his or her ambitions. An executor of Simon Mate of Colchester (d. ca.1439) complained that property Simon had bequeathed to his widow, for life, and afterwards to their children; but the widow, also executrix, had – in order to fulfill testamentary bequests and pay Simon's debts – mortgaged some of this property to William Barker for far less than their worth, and Barker had subsequently sold them at a sizable profit, so that Simon's daughter was disinherited, she was evicted from the property, and ended up in prison where she died. The complainant argued that Barker had arranged for forgery of deeds whereby the widow granted him the property; the town clerk was named as co-feoffee with Barker and might perhaps have been the forger, if the accusation were true.

Executors had some leeway in interpreting the broad wishes of testators. But there was always that risk that an executor might try to defraud the heirs. For example, ca.1456 the widow of John Syffe of Lynn complained to Chancery that her late husband's sole surviving executor, also the feoffee-to-use in one of Syffe's tenements, was refusing to recognize the widow's life tenure of the property.

Often it was one or more of the feoffees-to-use of a testator's property, or those trustees and executors in cahoots, who blocked the claims of the heirs. For instance, John Fyllebregge, the son of Johanna the late wife of John Caldwell of Ipswich (whose own will is elsewhere given here), complained in 1454 that his mother had held by dower right a property in Bury St. Edmunds; following her death, one of the feoffees was refusing to hand it over to Fyllebregge. The reverse problem could also occur: at some point in the 1430s, the executors of John Joye of Ipswich complained that his widow had persuaded Joye's feoffees-to-use that a particular tenement had been bequeathed to her and her heirs, whereas it was only to go to her for life and after that to Joye's children; now the widow had obtained access to the property and the executors could not ensure Joye's testament would be upheld.

On the other hand, disputes between the heirs were equally problematic. One of the sons of John Spryngwell of Lynn (d.1439) complained that his father had bequeathed his property to be shared between all his children, but that the eldest son, Edmund, by domineering his mother, into whose hands the estate initially came, had controlled the total inheritance; with the mother now dead, Edmund was only allowing the complainant a token share of his inheritance, and the only surviving executor was being allowed no say in the matter. The complainant had originally brought his case before the mayor, who appointed arbitrators who failed to bring the parties to a settlement; so an external arbitrator was brought in, and Edmund promised to deliver the inheritance, but subsequently reneged; recourse was consequently had to the king's court.

Quite a few of the class of records called Early Chancery Proceedings in fact stem from disputes over testamentary bequests, failures to pay debts owed to or by testators, or problems in obtaining a claimed inheritance.

With the onus on documentary proof of claims, it is no surprise that some parties resorted to forgery. Fraud was made that much easier by adversities such as the fire of 1421 in Lynn's guildhall, through which many registered copies of wills and deeds were destroyed, as the heirs of Geoffrey Tolbooth discovered to their dismay.

NOTES

"Edmund Martyn"

Probably the man of that name who entered the franchise at Colchester ca.1465.

"Holy Evangels"

Books containing portions of the Gospels that were read during divine services.

"caregivers"

The original has "kepers". Benham thought this referred to a housekeeper, in the case of Agnes Bloy; but the use of the plural and the reference to "his kepare in his siknes whereof he died" suggests instead women who were tending to Bury during his final illness (which is not to preclude Bloy also having been his housekeeper).

[1. The testament of Robert Drye, presented in the borough court 11 February 1451]

In the name of God, Amen. On 11 January 1450, I, Robert Drye of the parish of St. Mary Tower in Ipswich set out my testament in the following manner. First, I commend my soul to Almighty God, the glorious Virgin Mary, and all the saints, and my body to be buried in the cemetery of St. Mary Tower, next to the tomb of my wife Matilda. I bequeath 3s.4d to the high altar of that church, in recompense for forgotten tithes. I bequeath 12d. to the parish clerk of the same.

I give and bequeath to my son John Drye my tenement situated in the Old Fishmarket, together with a curtilage and house built thereon on the west side of the cemetery of the aforesaid church of St. Mary; he, his heirs and assigns to have and to hold in perpetuity. I bequeath to the same John Drye, to repair the buildings of that tenement, £13.13s.4d to be received from the sale of my goods and chattels. I bequeath to the same John 12 silver spoons and two silver bowls, one with a cover and the other without. I bequeath to my wife Margaret my other two silver bowls with covers, one [decorated] with vine leaves and the other with an eagle standing upright, which formerly belonged to my wife Matilda.

I bequeath to the church of St. Mary Tower a censer with a gilded incense-boat, worth £10.13s.4d; it is my wish that it be used exclusively in divine services. I bequeath to the same church £2.13s.4d to buy a font for christenings. I bequeath to the Corpus Christi gild 10s. and a large gold ring. To mag. William Gosselyn, my large chest, for his labour in the execution of this my testament.

I bequeath 4d. to each chaplain who attends my funeral services, 2d. to each clerk, and 2d. to each pauper. I wish two priests to be found to celebrate in St. Mary Tower for the souls of myself, Henry V king of England and his queen Katherine, as well as [other] kings and queens of England, and particularly for the souls of Robert Drye and his wife Alice, Robert Drye and his wife Matilda, [their children?] Elizabeth, William, William, William, William, Roger, Matilda, John and Margery, and all others for whom Robert Drye is bound to pray, and all the faithful deceased.

I bequeath 2s. to my domestic John Burton. As for the residue of all my goods, I leave them to the disposition of William Harleston esq. of Wenham and mag. William Gosselyn, whom I make and appoint my faithful executors, so that they may pay my debts, distributed my legacies, and make arrangements for my soul, disposing of the same as seems to them most likely to please God and benefit my soul. I bequeath to mag. William Gosselyn, official of Suffolk, my gold signet ring. In testimony to which, I have set my seal to this document. Drawn up on the date and at the place mentioned above.

[2. The testament of John Caldwell, proved 19 June 1461]

In the name of God, Amen. On 9 November 1460, I, John Caldewall merchant of Ipswich, being of sound mind and good memory, make my testament in this manner. First, I bequeath my soul to Almighty God, to his blessed mother Mary, and to all the holy company of Heaven, and my body to be buried in the churchyard of St. Laurence, Ipswich, by my wife's grave, if it is Christ's will that I die here. I bequeath 6s.8d to the high altar there, for forgotten tithes and offerings.

I wish my son Benet to have the manor of Blomviles with its appurtenances, located in Monk Soham, he and his heirs to have [and hold] in fee in perpetuity, paying therefrom an annuity of 40s. to his brother, dom. Robert, my son, during the lifetime of dom. Robert, if he is well-behaved. I wish all my feoffees-to-use in that manor of Blomviles with all its appurtenances to transfer their estate and enfeoff Benet in that manor with all appurtenances, or such persons as Benet wishes to enfeoff therein, at whatever time Benet requests them to.

I wish my son Edmund to have the place at the quay in which Herman lives, to him and his heirs in fee in perpetuity, under the following specifications and conditions: that if my son Benet, [as] one of my executors, pays out of my goods to settle the finances of my son Edmund – that is £53.5s.6d – and have him released from prison (Benet taking the rent, service and profit from the aforementioned place during the year after he is out of prison), then the place is to remain and stay in Benet's hands to his own use for 8 years after he is out of prison, Benet taking the rent, service and profit from that place during that period, until the £53.5s.6d has been completely repaid to Benet. Should my son Edmund die, which God forbid, within that 8-year period, then the place is to be sold by my executors or executor and [the proceeds] disposed of in alms and [charitable] works for my soul and the souls of my friends. By this my last will, I pray and request all my feoffees-to-use in that place to transfer their estate when they are requested.

I wish that after my death my son Thomas have the place in which I live, with garden and stables, located by the wall-ditches belonging thereto, to him and his heirs in fee in perpetuity. If Thomas is well-behaved, he is to have the rental property in which Roger Talbot lives.

I wish to have a priest for 12 years in St. Laurence's church to sing for my soul, for the souls of my father and mother, for the souls of my 3 wives – that is, for Cicely's soul, Margaret's soul, and Joan's soul – for the soul of my grandfather William Debynham, for all my friends' souls, and for all Christian souls.

The residue of all my goods not bequeathed, I give and bequeath to my executors, as whom I appoint and make Benet Caldewell and Edmund Caldewell, my sons, to fulfill my wishes and to pay all my debts as they think most pleasing to God and profitable for my soul. I wish John Drayll to be supervisor of this testament; for his labour, and for all sorts of matters between him and me, he is to have £3. In testimony to which, I have set my seal to this present testament. Drawn up on the date mentioned above.

[3. The testament of William Style, proved 21 July 1475]

In honour of the blessed Trinity – Father, Son, and Holy Ghost – and in honour of our blessed Lady Mother and Virgin and of St. Nicholas, on the 28th day of the month of April, in the year of our Lord Jesus Christ 1463, at Ipswich in the county of Suffolk and diocese of Norwich, I, William Style of Ipswich, being of sound mind, make my testament in the following manner. That is, first I commit and give my soul to Almighty God, our lady St. Mary – the intermediary and go-between for me and for all creatures to our Lord Jesus Christ, Redeemer of all mankind – and to all the holy saints of Heaven. And my body to be buried in the church of St. Nicholas, before the image of the St. Saviour, if it is agreeable to the parishioners of the parish. Giving and bequeathing 6s.8d to the high altar of that church, in compensation and satisfaction for my tithes that I was negligent in giving.

I bequeath to the repair and leading of that church half a fother of lead. I bequeath 10s. to the house and brethren of the order of St. Dominic in the town of Ipswich, to pray for me. To the house and brethren of the order of Carmelites in the town of Ipswich, 10s. I bequeath 6s.8d towards making a door into the choir of St. Peter's priory, Ipswich. Towards the construction of the steeple of the parish church of St. Peter, Ipswich, 10s.

I bequeath to my wife Isabelle my residence and all my other tenements, with all the goods, moveable and unmoveable, along with all manner of stuff and necessaries, with all appurtenances therein and belonging to the same; to her and her assigns, to dispose of freely, at will or pleasure, saving only as much as is required to fulfill my will. If my son William is obedient to and loving towards his mother while she is alive, I give and bequeath to that William and his heirs and assigns, after the death of his mother, my residence, in the state it is presently. I wish that my son John Style, if he is obedient to and loving towards his mother while she is alive, receive and enjoy after her death Sprott's Place, with all the tenantries belonging to the same, as is presently the case. I wish my daughter Amy to have £20 for her marriage, if she gives her hand according to the advice and recommendations of her mother and her friends. I bequeath 10s. to Isabelle Dow, if she remains in my service until I die.

To ensure this will is carried out and fulfilled in every respect, I make and appoint my wife Isabelle to be my true and faithful attorney.

DISCUSSION

Two generations are represented in the three testators here. Robert Drye and John Caldwell were contemporaries. After one of them had departed the scene, and the other was about to, William Stile appears on stage.

Not a great deal is known about Robert Drye beyond the evidence from his will. The list therein of souls to be prayed would suggest his parents were Robert and Alice Drye. This was most likely the Robert Dreye who entered the franchise at Ipswich in 1374 and who, with wife Alice, acquired property in St. Laurence parish in 1382. The testator of 1450 had served three terms as one of Ipswich's bailiffs (1429/30, 1432/33, 1436/37), and one as its treasurer in 1431/32, as well as being seen in the ranks of the portmen several times between 1429 and 1442. He was a royal commissioner of the peace in Ipswich in July 1433, and in Suffolk in July 1434. He was fined for breaking the assize of ale in 1436, '37, and '38. In 1432 or '33 he was a feoffee-to-use for a fellow member of the ruling elite, William Wallworth (later to partner Drye during his last ballivalty). This is all we have to say of him.

The sequence of Christian names included in the list of those for whose souls Drye's chantry was to pray may represent his children: the multiple Williams perhaps reflecting a sequence of male children who died soon after birth or in infancy, with the name being then given to the next male child born. On the other hand, "John and Margery" in that list may represent the John Drye who was treasurer of Ipswich in 1430/31, and was more likely a brother to the testator. There is no sign of any of Drye's children active in Ipswich after his death.

John Caldwell has left a better imprint on surviving records than Drye, although his parentage is far less certain. The only candidate I can offer for his father is a Thomas Caldwell who was a customs collector at Ipswich 1393-94. Most of John's earliest appearances show him running into trouble: in 1423 he was fined for breaking the assize of ale; he was condemned for the same the following year, when also fined for selling food in his hostelry at an excessive profit margin. Yet these were minor offences in the scheme of things, and he was clearly already one of the leading men of the town, for he had been a portman from May 1420 and his first ballivalty came in 1425/26. It may have been excessive zeal in that role that brought him into hot water with Chancery; but he weathered the teacup-tempest. He remained in portman ranks probably continuously up to his death, other than those years in which bailiff – he serving seven other ballival terms between 1431 and 1459. He was given the added duties of the post of claviger 1442-47, 1448-58, and 1459-61, and his seniority among the portmen is evidenced in him being one of the Justices of the Peace chosen from portmen ranks 1449-60, he having previously served on royal commissions of the peace in 1433 and 1434. Furthermore, besides being sent as a borough representative to the parliament of 1427, he is found in the rarely seen post of merchant gild alderman in 1446.

That last office is indicative of his prominence in the mercantile community. His early offences regarding the retail of victuals is a pointer to his mercantile activities, but we do not know a great deal about his business. He took on apprentices and employed factors, and co-owned a ship, the "Trinity", which in 1436 he was equipping for military service. Ca.1446 Hans Stendell, a Gdansk merchant, was suing one of those apprentices, Thomas Bradde, for repayment of a £138.6s.8d, which Thomas claimed had been to pay debts incurred by him on John Caldwell's behalf. In April of that year John found it necessary to obtain a testimonial letter from the Ipswich authorities certifying that he had never constituted Bradde as his factor, or authorized him to deal with Stendell. Bradde's apprenticeship, it was stated, had ended in 1443 (Bradde still being in Prussia) and John had sent him a letter discharging him; then, after Bradde had returned to Ipswich in 1445 and rendered an account of John's goods, he was found to owe £138.10s., and was imprisoned until he made out a recognizance of the debt to John. Around the same time John successfully sued, in the court of admiralty, a Norwich alderman for a debt of £13.13s.4d. This was not the only occasion when John took exception to the initiatives of his employees: at a date unknown he complained that William Baldry, a younger merchant of the town (a bailiff and portman of the 1450s), had as his factor been given 4 packs of woollen cloth, worth £200, to trade with in Prussia on John's behalf; but William, so John complained, had used the goods to trade with on his own behalf and shared none of the profit with John.

On the other hand, John's public-spiritedness (tempered by self-interest) is seen in his offer, in January 1435, to build a new bridge at his own expense between Ipswich and Stoke, if the borough would pay for construction of the end-posts; we may note that John owned land in Stoke, so a safe bridge was to his benefit. That same month he was appointed a member of a committee supervising the rebuilding of a house at the end of the guildhall, and in 1448 was in a similar role concerning the "new work" at the end of the borough plea hall. Later that year, after re-election to the ballivalty, he undertook to have a gaol built for the town in the Barre Gate, probably from his own capital, but equally probably on the expectation of being repaid. In June 1459 he was granted the communal marsh for three years, until the debts owed him by the community were recouped from its revenues.

It may be that John's fears about two of his sons' unruly or irresponsible behaviour were realized, for nothing further is heard of Robert, Edmund, or even Thomas (who had entered the franchise at Ipswich in 1455, probably as soon as he was of age). However, Benedict Caldwell, who had entered the franchise in 1450 (again probably at the age of majority), lived up to his father's standards: he served as bailiff four times between 1473 and 1483, and is found as a local Clerk of the Peace and subsequently Justice of the Peace. He had also been undersheriff of Suffolk in 1463/64. At his death (1487/88) he left two manors, one being Blomviles, and lands in six Suffolk hamlets, as well as in Ipswich; his will makes it clear that brothers Robert and Edmund were already dead. As well it indicates close connections with the Debenham family.

William Style has left a will that is out of the ordinary in its terminology, and appears to reflect a little more than conventional religiosity. It was drawn up when he had barely embarked on that part of his career that has left documentary evidence. There is no other evidence surviving that might let us speculate further on his religious attitudes. William first appears in 1453, as an elected assessor of a royal tax. In 1455, 1458 and 1459 he was performing similar duties in regard to borough taxations. By this time he had embarked on a role in borough government proper: as chamberlain 1459-61 (and probably a common councillor 1459/60), and as bailiff in 1467/68, a role he reprised for a few months in 1472, as a replacement. He too was chosen one of the local Justices of the Peace (1467-69, 1472/73).

Like those of Drye and Caldwell, Style's business is obscure. He was repeatedly fined for infringing the assize of ale between 1466 and 1475, as was his widow in 1481, but this evidence is not even sufficient to let us know if Style could be categorized as a merchant. His widow Isabelle drew up her own will in 1487 and died in 1491, requesting burial beside her husband in St. Nicholas'. She respected her late husband's last wishes by leaving her residence to her son William, and Sprott's Place to son John. Another tenement was left to the son of William Style junior.

"chest"

Or possibly bookcase.

"Wenham"

Little Wenham lay a few miles south-west of Ipswich.

"Monk Soham"

Some twelve miles north of Ipswich.

"well-behaved"

Well ruled and governed, in the original. It would appear that some of Caldwell's sons were still young enough that he could not be sure how they would turn out. Edmund had evidently run up debts, and perhaps John was afraid that Robert and Thomas might get into similar trouble.

"Benet taking...out of prison"

This clause has been crossed out; it was not in the original will, preserved as IC/AA1/1/7/4.

"to his own use"

The enregistered copy has "to myn use", suggesting that Benet himself was dictating these conditions; the original will has the same terminology.

"William Debynham"

One of the most prominent Ipswich men of the first half of the fifteenth century, during which he served 10 terms as bailiff, the last being cut short by his death in March 1445. He also represented the borough in five parliaments. A vintner, like most entrepreneurial merchants of his time, he was prepared to trade in other commodities (such as salt, iron, grain, candles, fish) as well; but his main business was exporting cloth and importing wine. He held lands in the Suffolk countryside, on some of which he raised sheep. He served brief stints in national trade administration: as deputy butler (1397-1401) and tronager and pesager (1420-21). But he is mainly in evidence in the customs accounts as a merchant, and in borough records as a plaintiff suing for debts owed him for goods he had sold or for rents due from his properties.

"John Drayll"

He served side by side with Caldwell in borough government and, like Caldwell, had some association with the Debenham family: with Caldwell he was executor of Margaret Debenham (who bequeathed Drayll's wife a dress), and he desired burial beside William Debenham in the Carmelite friary. A portman throughout the 1440s and '50s, senior enough to be one of the Justices of the Peace drawn from the portmen from 1448 on, he also served as Ipswich's bailiff in 1449/50 and 1457/58. We do not know his business, but it was likely mercantile; he had entered the franchise (1432) through apprenticeship. His wealth is evident from the several properties and the precious possessions listed in his lengthy will, recorded in a dogget roll. So too is his ego (or his desire to be remembered): he requested a marble tombstone with his name and an image of himself carved therein, and bequeathed to St. Mary Tower an altar-cloth inscribed with his name. He set up two chantries: one for 30 years in the Carmelite friary, and the other for 6 years in St. Mary Tower. his son dom. John Drayll chaplain being given first refusal of the latter post.

TRANSLATION

[1. Last will and testament].

The testament of Richard Whittington. In the name of God and the Holy and Indivisible Trinity, Father, Son and Holy Ghost, amen. On 5 September 1421, in the ninth year of the reign of Henry V, I, Richard Whittington, citizen and alderman of London, being sound in mind and memory, make this my testament in the following manner. First, I leave my soul to almighty God, the Blessed Virgin Mary, and all the saints, and my body to be buried in the church of St. Michael Paternoster Royal in London, that is, on the north side of the high altar of that church. It is my first and foremost wish that, before anything else, all the debts that I rightfully owe, to whomever I owe them, be paid in full. I bequeath £100 to cover the costs of my funeral expenses and for saying vespers after my death, the Placebo and Dirige, and on the following day a requiem mass; together with a monthly remembrance for my soul, the souls of my father, my mother, my wife Alice, and all those to whom I owe a debt of gratitude. I bequeath 1d. for every poor man, woman and child, to be distributed on the day of my funeral. I bequeath 100s. to the high altar of the aforementioned church for tithes or offerings unpaid due to forgetfulness or negligence; also, 6s.8d to each chaplain of that church, to pray for my soul and those of the others mentioned and to say the Placebo and Dirige every day for a month after my death. I bequeath 40s. to Thomas the present [parish] clerk of that church, if he is still its clerk at the time I die. I bequeath 100s. to be distributed in alms, at the discretion of my executors, among poor parishioners known to that church, so that they may pray for my soul and those of the others mentioned. I bequeath 40s. to dom. Thomas Kirton, lately rector of the aforementioned church, to pray for my soul and those of the others mentioned. I bequeath 100s. to John White, master of St. Bartholomew's hospital in the London suburb of West Smithfield, so that he may pray for my soul and the souls of the others mentioned. Also, 100s. to be distributed, at the discretion of my executors, among poor persons who are in that hospital. I bequeath 40s. towards the structural fabric of All Hallows church in Honey Lane and to the repair of the church ornaments, that they may pray for my soul and the souls of the others mentioned. I leave 100s. towards the structural fabric of the church of St. Margaret Lothbury and the repair of ornaments of that church, that they may pray for the soul of Roger one-time rector there, and my soul and the other souls mentioned. I bequeath 53s.4d towards the structural fabric of the church of St. Pancras, London, and the repair of ornaments of that church, that they may pray for my soul and the souls of the others mentioned. I bequeath £13.6s.8d for the alms [fund] of my craft gild of the mercers of London. I bequeath 100s. to each order of friars in London, to pray for my soul and the souls of the others mentioned. I bequeath 8d. to each stipendiary chaplain in London and its suburbs, to pray for my soul and the other souls to be remembered. I bequeath 40s. to be distributed, as my executors determine best, among poor people of the parish of St. Stephen Coleman Street, London. I bequeath 40s. [to be distributed], as my executors determine best, among poor people of the parish of St. Michael Bassishaw, London. I bequeath 40s. towards the structural fabric of St. Alphege church, London, that they may pray for my soul and those of the aforementioned. I bequeath 20s. to be distributed, as my executors determine best, among poor people of that parish. I bequeath 40s. towards the structural fabric of the church of St. Mary Staining and the repair of ornaments of that church, that they may pray for my soul and the aforementioned souls; also, £10 to be distributed, as my executors determine best, among poor people in the hospitals of St. Mary without Bishopsgate, St. Mary of Bethlem, and St. Thomas in Southwark, and among the lepers of Lock, Hackney, and St. Giles without Holborn. I bequeath 20s. to be distributed, as my executors determine best, among the poor brothers and sisters of the hospital of Elsing Spital. I bequeath 100s. to the monastic house at Burnham, that they may pray for my soul and the aforementioned souls. I bequeath 40s. to the monastic house at Cheshunt, that they may pray for my soul and the aforementioned souls. I bequeath 40s. to the monastic house at Rouney near Ware, that they may pray for my soul and the aforementioned souls. I bequeath 40s. to the monastic priory at Bromhale near Windsor, that they may pray for my soul and the aforementioned souls. I bequeath £100 for the marriage of virgins, [to be distributed] as my executors determine best. Also, for the repair and improvement of roads in bad condition, £100 [to be distributed] as my executors determine best, where the necessity is most felt. I bequeath for distribution among those imprisoned in Newgate, Ludgate, Fleet, Marshalsea, and the King's Bench 40s. each week for as long as £500 holds out. I leave to my executors named below the entire tenement in which I live in the parish of St. Michael Paternoster Royal, London, and all lands and tenements that I hold in the parish of St. Andrew, near Castle Baynard, London, and in the parish of St. Michael Bassishaw, as well as in the parish of St. Botolph outside Bishopsgate, in the same city; so that after my death they may sell them as soon as they may conveniently do so and distribute the proceeds for [the good of] my soul and the souls already mentioned, when they see a good opportunity to benefit my soul and please God – that is in the celebration of masses and other works of charity, and to fulfill this my testament. The remainder of all my possessions, wherever they may be, after the payment of my debts has been given priority and my bequests have been fulfilled, I leave to my executors to dispose of in works of charity for [the good of] my soul, such as they would wish me to do for their souls if our situation were reversed. I appoint as my executors of this my testament John Coventre, John White clerk, John Carpenter, and William Grove, and as their supervisor William Babyngton; and I bequeath to the same John Coventre £20 for his labour, to John White £13.6s.8d for his labour, to John Carpenter £40 for his labour, to William Grove £10 for his labour, and to the supervisor £20 for his labour. I do not wish any of my executors to have any administration or involvement whatsoever in anything concerning this my testament or my last will without all my executors approving, or three of them being present, or which three or four it is my wish that John Carpenter be one. I wish that my executors have in their custody a chest, secured with three locks, containing my goods and jewels, to be distributed for [the good of] my soul; and that none of those who are my executors remove anything from the same except in the presence or with the consent of all as a group. I further wish that my executors maintain and support my household together with meals for my personal servants for one year following my death, as they determine best. Also, I bequeath to the house of the Carthusians 100s., that they may pray for my soul and the other souls mentioned. In testimony to which matters I have set my seal to this testament. Drawn up at London, on the day and year indicated above.

[2. Ordinances for the almshouse].

To all true Christians who witness or hear about matters covered by these documents, John Coventre, John Carpenter, and William Grove, executors of the testament of the respectable and famous merchant Richard Whittington, late citizen and mercer of the city of London and sometime mayor of that city, send greetings in our Lord God everlasting. The strongest desire and greatest preoccupation of a prudent, wise, and devout man should be to plan ahead and make provision for the state [of his soul] and the termination of his short life, through acts of compassion and benevolence. In particular, to provide for those poor people who have been crushed by severe hardship and cruel misfortune and who do not have the means to earn a living through a craft or manual labour. So that, at the day of the Last Judgement, he will find a place with those who are saved. Having given serious consideration to this, that respectable and famous merchant Richard Whittington, who while he was alive gave large handouts liberally to people who were poor and in need, gave strict instructions on his deathbed for we, his executors, to establish after his death an almshouse for the perpetual support of the type of poor people indicated above. He fully expounded to us his wishes in this regard; and we wish to do whatever we can to fulfill the commendable intent and beneficial wishes expressed in his will, as is our duty. First, we have founded with official approval, in the church of St. Michael Royal in London where are buried Richard and Lady Alice his wife, a college of priests and clerics to perform divine services there daily for [the souls of] Richard and Alice. We have also founded, in response to his wishes, an almshouse for 13 poor people as a perpetual residence and place of sustenance for them and their successors. This house has been built upon land that we recently bought for the purpose in St. Michael's parish; that is, situated between that church and the wall enclosing a vacant plot to the rear of the high altar of the church, on the south side, and our great tenement that was until recently the home of Richard Whittington, on the north side, and stretching [westwards] from the residence of the master and priests of the college mentioned above. Which [residence] we had built recently on the east side, on a large empty plot of our land; from which we intend, with God's help, to have within a short time a churchyard lawfully consecrated to serve the church, on the west side [of the college]. Calling to our aid the power of the Father, the wisdom of his Son, and the goodness of the Holy Ghost, we have next set out ordinances giving specifications for the foundation and establishment of the almshouse and its poor men.

First, as a result of a licence granted by the authority of the noble and powerful prince and present lord king of England and France, Henry VI, and by the consent and wish of the reverend lord and father in Christ Henry, by the grace of God Archbishop of Canterbury, primate of England, and legate of Rome, under whose immediate jurisdiction are the church and parish mentioned above, and after obtaining the necessary agreement of each and every man who had any title or interest in the property, we wish and ordain that from this time forward there be admitted to reside and obtain sustenance in the almshouse 13 poor people, either men alone or men and women together, according to the best judgement and decision of the overseers identified below and conservators of that house. Who shall every day forevermore at a proper and convenient time pray for all those who are now living and for those who have gone to God, particularly those whose names are identified in the statutes written below.

Of which poor people we wish that there always be one who is the principal, given more authority and respect than the others, and called the tutor. The responsibility and duties of that tutor shall be to administer well and truly the goods of the almshouse that come into his hands, gathering together again any goods that are dispersed. And to take care of those goods which, through his efforts, are gathered together, for the use and support of the almshouse. All almshouse-related matters that he is in a position to oversee he is to manage through decisions and actions, taking care to foster and build charitable and peaceful relations among his fellows, and in all matters to set an example of cleanliness and virtuous behaviour, both in word and deed.

We wish and ordain that the poor people of the almshouse, present and future, are to be upright in their intentions and obedient to the tutor in all matters in which he has authority or that concern the good reputation or benefit of the house.

We wishing to realize the intent of the foundation and above ordinances providing for the almshouse and the 13 needy and devout poor people, well-behaved and of honest character, have now put into operation that intent by designating the poor people who are to be maintained in the almshouse. Of whom one that we consider most suitable and capable to be in authority, by the name of Robert Chesterton, we have appointed and ordain to be tutor of the poor people and the almshouse, as mentioned.

And we have granted and by the tenor of this present document, thanks to the aforementioned licence and grant of the king, handed over to the tutor and the poor people of the almshouse that same almshouse which we founded and recently had built; with all free entrances and exits to the house via the street and the church adjacent, together with the openings, windows, gutters, eavestroughing, chimneys, privies, well and each and every other appurtenance, convenience and easement whatever, as fully and completely as they existed and were built at this present time, even though they open onto our great tenement, lately the residence of Richard Whittington, or in whatever manner they have been built on or overhang any part of that residential property. To have and to hold the entire almshouse, together with the free entrances and exits of the house, the openings, windows, gutters, waterfalls, chimneys, privies, well, and each and every other appurtenance, convenience and easement, by the tutor and poor people and their successors as their residence in perpetuity, without any reclaiming or hindrance from ourselves, our heirs, or our assigns, no matter whoever they be of the chief lords of the fee, in regard to the services due therefrom or the customary rights therein.

We wish and ordain that this house be forever known as God's House, or Almshouse, or the Hospital of Richard Whittington, and that Richard and his wife Alice be considered and credited by everyone forevermore as the true principal founders of that house and hospital.

Furthermore, we wish and ordain that the present mayor of the city of London and his successors who are mayors or wardens of the city are to be overseers of the [\[administration of\]](#) the almshouse; and that the present wardens of the community of the craft of mercery in London, and their successors as wardens of that craft, shall forever be and be known as conservators of that almshouse.

We wish and ordain that each one of the tutors and poor people, and their successors, should have within the almshouse a place to himself. That is, a cell or little house with a chimney, a privy and other necessaries, in which he shall lodge. So that he may in solitude, without the interference of anyone else, give himself over to the contemplation of God, if he wishes. And we wish that the present and future tutors and and poor people, when they are in their houses or cells as well as in the cloisters and other parts of the almshouse, behave in a quiet and peaceable manner so as not to disturb their fellows with noise, and that they occupy themselves in prayer, or reading, or manual labour, or some other respectable activity.

We ordain that every tutor of the house, within a month of having been appointed to take charge of the administration of the almshouse, is to associate with 2 of the most sensible of his fellows (appointed by nomination of the conservators) to make an honest and accurate inventory of all the communal goods of the house. This inventory, to be made without dawdling or delaying, is to be delivered to the then conservators and fellows of the almshouse. At the end of every year, or whenever a tutor is about to resign his post, he is to do the same and render an honest account for the entire period of his administration, before the overseer and one of the conservators and the fellows of the house at that time, so that all men are fully informed in what condition the tutor received, maintained, and left the house during his term.

We have ordained, and ordain, that henceforth within 20 days immediately following a vacancy at the almshouse in the office of tutor, due to a death or any other reason, a member of that house who is suitable and qualified – or someone from outside the almshouse, if one capable of governance cannot be found inside the almshouse at that time – is to be selected and appointed as tutor of the house by we the executors, for as long as we live or the longest-lived among us. After our deaths, [the tutor] is to be appointed by the conservators of the almshouse; that is, the wardens of the craft of mercery in London then in office. If after our deaths the conservators are negligent in choosing and appointing such a tutor, as indicated above, within the deadline set them of 20 days as mentioned, then we wish and ordain that whenever the 20 days have passed the selection and appointment of the tutor [fall] to the overseer of the house – that is, the mayor or warden of London then in office – but only in the event of those special cases, with the proviso that this provision in no way prejudice any rights of the conservators in other selections and appointments of such tutors on future occasions. The provision and appointment of other poor people to places in the almshouse, as often and under whatever circumstances that they become vacant henceforward, we the executors reserve particularly to ourselves, for as long as we live or the longest-lived among us. We wish and ordain that after our deaths the specified provision and appointment belong to the conservators and the master of the college mentioned above, and their successors in perpetuity, in the following form. That is, that on the first occasion after our deaths of a vacancy in the almshouse the master of the college shall provide and appoint a suitable poor man to the vacant place; and in the same way the conservators of the house, on the next 6 occasions when there are vacancies, shall provide and appoint 6 other poor people to fill the vacancies. Thereafter, [the selection] reverts again to the master of the college, and then the next 6 times the selection belongs to the conservators, as indicated previously. And so on in this way we wish that it be done by, and between, the master and the conservators and their successors whenever there are vacancies. With the sole, perpetual exception of the place and office of the tutor. For fear that the place of any such poor man of the almshouse be vacant for a long time – which God forbid – we wish and ordain for perpetuity that he or they to whom after our deaths the provision and appointment, in the form written above, belongs or shall belong be obligated to provide and appoint a suitable poor man to that place within 15 days from the time that any such vacancy becomes common knowledge. If at any future point the master, when it is his turn, or the conservators, when their turn, fail to make the provision within the 15 day deadline assigned them, then we wish and ordain that every time when such a default occurs the provision and appointment of poor people to such vacancies be devolved to the overseer of the house then in office, as often as this situation shall arise, in perpetuity. Reserving to the master and conservators and their successors their right to make the provision and appointment at other times of vacancy thereafter, according to the specifications given above.

We wish and ordain that every poor person who shall be provided, appointed, and admitted to the almshouse, or any place therein, is to be a man mild in manners, destitute of worldly goods in other locations (from which he might be able to make a satisfactory living even if he were not of the fellowship of the almshouse), physically chaste, and known to be of good character. All those to whom, by these our ordinances, it shall after our deaths fall to provide any poor man to the almshouse, or any place in that house, we humbly and earnestly beg and also direct, as respectfully as we can – as they will answer for it to God at the dreadful day of judgement – that they ignore any especial friendships, or influential requests, or gifts made to them, and do not in any way provide or appoint anyone other than suitable and dutiful poor men to vacancies, as indicated above.

We also ordain and forbid that the conservators of the almshouse provide and admit as a fellow of that house any man who is, has been, or shall be of the livery of the mercers' craft, or the livery of any other craft of the city; for which poor men of such liveries the wardens and community of the craft should find sustenance, from lands and tenements given and bequeathed them, under special licence from our sovereign lord the king, or in other ways. Should it happen otherwise than we wish and ordain, then all such provisions and admissions are to be completely invalid. In such a circumstance it is permitted to the mayor or warden of the city of London then in office, as overseer of the house, to remove completely and expel from the house any such man so provided and admitted, and to provide and appoint another poor person in the place of he who is expelled from the house.

Nevertheless, we intend and so ordain that it henceforth be established and respected that poor citizens of London – notably poor infirm men of the mercers' craft who have not been of the livery of the mercers and for whom the community of mercers is not obligated to provide [support], as well as poor and infirm clerics and lower ministers of the college mentioned above who have given long, faithful and commendable service in the college – are to receive preferential treatment in provisions and appointments to any vacancies among the fellows of the almshouse. The present tutor of the almshouse and his successors as tutor are likewise obligated by their duty, through the authority of this document, to admit all types of suitable poor people, as specified above, who are provided and appointed to each of the places of the house when they are vacant, after a certain period (to be set by decision of the conservators) of probation and trial of the suitability and character of those men, if they prove suitable.

Furthermore, we wish and ordain that the present tutor and poor people and their successors in perpetuity shall have and hold in peace and may have and hold without harassment or hindrance from any man the seats that we have assigned for them in the church and college mentioned above. In which college and church it is our wish that the tutor and the poor people be obliged to be in attendance to hear matins, mass, evensong, compline and the recital of other divine offices there, and to give prayers to God there for all those whose names are written next in the statutes. That is, first and foremost for the souls of Richard and Alice Whittington, the founders. Also for the souls of Sir William Whittington knight and Lady Joan his wife, and the souls of Sir Ivo FitzWaren and Lady Maud his wife, the parents of Richard Whittington and his wife Alice. Next, for the souls of the worthy princes King Richard II, king of England and France, and Sir Thomas of Woodstock, late Duke of Gloucester, the particular lords and patrons of Richard Whittington, and for Anne and Eleanor the wives of that king and duke. Furthermore [they are to pray] for the good health and prosperity of the present lord king and lord archbishop, and the conservators and benefactors of the house, while they are alive, and for our prosperity while we live and for their and our souls when they and we have departed this world. And generally for those to whom Richard Whittington and Alice were indebted in any way during their lifetimes, and for all Christian souls.

Furthermore, we ordain that each of the tutor and poor people and their successors, every day – first when they get out of bed, and secondly when they are about to go to bed – kneeling on their knees say a paternoster and an Ave Maria, with particular and heartfelt commendation of Richard Whittington and Alice to God and our blessed lady the Virgin Mary. Also that each of the tutor and poor people, at other times of day when each is most likely to have a moment of leisure or when it is the most convenient time, is to say two or three prayer rounds to Our Lady for the well-being of all the souls mentioned above – that is, at least three times an Ave Maria with 15 Paternosters and 3 Creeds – unless he is excused by reason of infirmity or some other reasonable cause.

We wish and ordain that the present tutor and poor people and their successors shall whenever possible at least once a day – that is, after mass or when compline is over – gather together in the college around the tomb of Richard Whittington and Alice; and those who can shall recite, for the souls of all Christian people, the psalm De profundis with the versicles and orisons that are part of the same. Those unable to shall say three Paternosters, three Ave Marias, and one Creed. After this is done, the tutor or one of the eldest of the men shall say in English for all to hear "God have mercy on our founders' souls and all Christians"; and the other standing around shall respond "Amen".

We wish and ordain that the present tutor and poor people and their successors in the future, each and every one of them, be obliged to live and to stay continually within the almshouse and its boundaries, just as other poor people in similar almshouses or hospitals typically reside or are obliged to stay. And that every day, both at dinner and supper, they take their meals within the almshouse, unless they are excused for a good reason.

While they are at dinner or supper, we wish that they will avoid idle and self-centered conversation as much as they can; if they want to talk about any subject it should be one serious and productive.

Moreover, we ordain that the outer garments of the tutor and poor people of the almshouse be of a dark brown colour, not a bright one that will attract attention, and of modestly-priced cloth commensurate with their station.

Furthermore, we wish and ordain that neither the present tutor nor any of his successors as tutors of the almshouse for any reason absent themselves from the house in the future for more than 12 days, whether consecutively or discontinuously, without permission from us or from one of us, while we live, or without permission from the overseer or one of the conservators of the house, after our deaths. [The travel] should then be for some necessary cause and to some reputable destination. Nor should any of the other poor people of the house be absent from the house for any reason for a whole day, or go beyond the parish boundaries, without permission from the then tutor of the almshouse, if he is present, or in his absence the permission of his substitute or deputy; [and then] not unless there is a very pressing reason that demands it, or there is some other good reason which is enquired into and approved by the tutor or his deputy. We also wish that the tutor, whenever he goes out into the town or anywhere else, appoint one of his fellows to take over his responsibilities until his return.

Furthermore, we wish and ordain that those of the almshouse who have their strength and health – especially of the women, if there are any – take care of the residents who are sick or feeble and help them with their basic needs, as often as they are in need of help and support.

We wish and ordain that the tutor and poor people have a communal chest and a common seal. In which chest they are to keep the seal, along with their charters, letters, grants, writings, and valuables of their house, and any other things which seem to the tutor and poor people advisable, for the benefit of the community. Which chest we wish to be placed in a secret and secure location within the boundaries of the almshouse. This chest is to have 3 different locks, with 3 different keys; of which one shall always remain in the possession of the tutor, another be kept by the oldest resident, and the third be kept by one of the other residents, chosen anew each year by us, while we live, and after our deaths by the masters of the mercers mentioned above. No man is to presume to have possession or keeping of all three keys under his control at once; nor is anything to be sealed with the common seal without permission and consent of the overseer and conservators of the house at that time. We also wish and ordain that every year all the remaining money and revenues from rents and their communal goods, after the accounting given by the tutor for the expenses of the house, are to be kept in that chest, along with the precious objects belonging to the house that are not for everyday use.

Moreover, we wish and ordain that none of the present or future tutors or poor people dare in any way to waste, use up, give away, or pawn unnecessarily the possessions, or any part of the possessions, belonging to the house. But that all of them do their utmost to devote their thoughts and energies towards preserving and increasing those possessions. When one departs this world, he is to give or bequeath all his personal possessions – or a significant part thereof – to the almshouse.

We wish and ordain that the tutor and poor people of the house, and their successors, are to receive in perpetuity from the rents and funds of the house certain weekly pensions or allowances for their food, drink, and other necessaries, as follows. That is, the tutor shall have every week for his allowance, 16d. And each of the other 12 poor people shall receive weekly as their portion 14d. They are to be satisfied with those amounts, and are not to beg in that location or elsewhere – those who are incorrigible in doing so will suffer the penalty determined and written below.

We wish and ordain that no leper or lunatic, nor anyone else who is constantly plagued by an incurable illness, be admitted into the almshouse. Should it happen in the future that any person who is admitted to the house goes mad or crazy, or becomes infected with leprosy or any other such incurable illness, then we wish and ordain that each such person be expelled from the house, to avoid him infecting his fellows. He is to go to some other place where he can be admitted; where, it is our wish, he be given the same 14d. for his livelihood and necessities that he would have in the almshouse and that he be counted as one of the house and of the number of the 13 poor people, throughout his lifetime.

We ordain also that in the event that any of the poor people, after their admittance to the house, happens to prosper or have his situation improved through an inheritance or some other means by an income to the value of £3.6s.8d annually, that person is to be expelled from the house and the number of the 13 poor people, and another is to be received and admitted in his place. If anyone of the house, after his admission, prospers likewise through an inheritance or other incidental income to an annual value of less than £3.6s.8d, then we wish and ordain that an even half of that sum every year (without fraud or deceit) be deposited and kept in the communal chest for the profit of the community; and the other half shall be received by the person so fortunate, along with his own allowance from the house – with which it is our wish that he be satisfied. In the event that he does not comply but acts contrary to this ordinance, then we wish that he be permanently expelled from the house, and someone else be chosen to take his place.

Furthermore we wish and ordain that all statutes and ordinances that are made for the improvement of the house and the welfare of the poor people, after our deaths, by the conservators with the agreement of the overseer, be upheld and observed by the tutor and poor people; so long as those statutes and ordinances are reasonable and not in conflict with the statutes and ordinances that we have made. In the event that any uncertainty or disagreement arises through misunderstanding of the statutes, then we wish that the statutes that are misunderstood be clarified, revised and reformed by the mayor or keeper of the city of London then in office.

We also wish and ordain that none of the poor people of the house who are of lesser status than the tutor should sleep overnight outside the house, in the city or its suburbs, without a good reason to be discussed with and ruled upon by the tutor. We also wish that none of the poor folk be habitually drunk, gluttonous, or quarrelsome with his fellows, haunting taverns, indulging in lechery, or wandering the streets of the city or suburbs by day or by night without a good reason, to be discussed with and a wise decision made by the tutor or conservators of the house. Whoever among the poor people is well known or commonly believed to be guilty of such faults or other similar vices is to be pointed out by the tutor or one of the fellows and punished, on the first two occasions, by withholding part or all of his allowance (according to the judgement of the tutor); which withheld allowance is to go [\[back\]](#) into the communal chest of the house. If any of the poor people who has been thus twice warned, reprimanded, and punished for such vices and faults as indicated above, or others similar, is found by ourselves while we live or by the tutor and conservators of the almshouse after our death, to be at fault a third time, then we wish and ordain that every such misbehaving person be considered incorrigible and insufferable, and be utterly expelled from the house and from any benefits or advantages he would have therein, by us, while we live, and by the tutor and conservators after our deaths. And another suitable person is to be chosen to take his place. Moreover, if any of the poor people is, in our presence while we live or that of the conservators of the house after our deaths, openly accused of despoiling or wasting excessively the possessions of the house, or of being a lecher or a fewterer or worse, and by our or their judgement is found guilty of the same, then we wish and ordain that upon the first conviction of each such person he be utterly expelled from the house. In the event that such a person wishes to protest or appeal [\[the decision\]](#), after our deaths this is to be done to the overseer of the house only, not to anyone else.

We wish and ordain that any faults or offences of the tutor of the house then in office be subject to correction and punishment by ourselves, while we live, and whichever of us lives longest, and after our deaths by the conservators and overseer of the house, in the following manner. That is, one option is to withhold the tutor's allowance to an extent commensurate with the gravity of his offence, to be assessed by the judgement of ourselves or he of us who lives longest, and after our deaths by the determination of the conservators and overseer mentioned. Another is to deprive the tutor of his post, his pension, and his place in this almshouse, should he be guilty of an offence that warrants it.

Furthermore, we wish and ordain that this foundation document, and each and every chapter and statute of its ordinances, be read out and explained in the presence of the tutor and poor people of the house at least once every quarter of the year. And that the tutor and the poor people have available to them in their house a copy of the statutes, in order that they can read the chapters of the ordinances when they wish and so better keep them in mind.

Finally, we urge and earnestly entreat the tutor and poor people, present and future, to live together in harmony with each other, serving God, and praying devoutly for the souls mentioned, as this document intends. They are to be upright in behaviour and live together in this poor house in such a manner that, at the close of their lives, they may attain the kingdom of heaven, which God by his own words has promised to poor people. We reserve to ourselves, under the force of this document, full power over all matters relating to the almshouse for as long as any of us shall live; that is, to change the ordinances, should there be any need to reform, clarify, or suspend them, to make new statutes, or to revoke those that we have now made, in the event that we consider this advisable, the present document notwithstanding, for as long as we are alive. In witness to which, we have put our seals on this document, drawn up at London on December 21, 1424, in the third year of [the reign of] King Henry VI.

DISCUSSION

No other medieval townspeople has attained in the English-speaking world the legendary proportions of Dick Whittington. The legend is based upon the accumulation of wealth and status, and upon the subsequent application of that wealth to benefit society. In the former case, Whittington's level of accomplishment made him one of an elite, but not so exceptional as to warrant remembrance where others have been forgotten by the general public. It is in the latter that Whittington's name was made, for his philanthropy and in particular his almshouse.

If the story of his generosity was kept alive through later centuries, when works of charity were considered de rigueur for wealthy merchants, it was in part due to the continued presence of the almshouses as a reminder of Whittington's example. Those almshouses, which have become confused in name with the college founded at his bequest at the same time, have been relocated more than once, but still thrive now at a rural Sussex location, where 60 homes for elderly residents are supported; Whittington's endowment also provides hundreds of other pensioners with an income supplement, and additional funding for other charities. In 1996, over £2 million was put into charitable works. His name has continued to resonate in popular culture throughout the twentieth century, thanks in part to pantomimes; and in 2000 a plan was put forward to create The Dick Whittington Family Leisure Park in the county of his birth, with exhibits on both his history and his legend.

Let us be immediately clear that cats have no known part of the historical facts behind the legend. Nor did Richard Whittington rise to riches from rags, although the landed Gloucestershire family into which he was born, probably in the late 1340s or early 1350s (his father having died in 1358), had some financial difficulties. As a younger son in such circumstances, he chose or was obliged to pursue a career in commerce, for he had no prospect of inheriting landed estates. He presumably underwent an apprenticeship to a mercer, although by the time he is first seen in London, in 1379, he was already established in business. In the years that followed, his clientele included nobles and courtiers closest to the young Richard II as well as the future Henry IV, perhaps particularly the duke of Gloucester; by 1389 he could add the king himself to the list of clients. Richard had a taste for finery and during the period 1392-94 (from which records survive) 27% of the total expenditures of his Great Wardrobe department went to Whittington for mercery. At Richard's deposition, Whittington was still owed a large sum, which Henry IV conceded should be repaid through an exemption from customs on wool exports.

Despite Whittington's attachment to Richard II, as evidenced in the almshouse ordinances, the new king continued to purchase from Whittington, on a more frugal scale. But we see a gradual decline in his sales to the royal court, and perhaps in his own interest in the mercery trade – for he seems to have given up taking on apprentices early in the fifteenth century. The death of his wife in the early fifteenth century may have contributed to his demotivation; his attachment to Alice is reflected in that, when she was mortally ill in 1410, he obtained special licence from the king to bring a renowned doctor over from the continent to treat her.

Having built up a small fortune, he put it to use as a royal financier, a practice he had begun in Richard II's reign, although not significantly until 1397. We cannot tell whether this was directly profitable financially (usury being illegal), but if nothing else it brought indirect rewards in terms of royal favour and influence. Just a few months after Whittington's first large loan, the king appointed him mayor of London when the incumbent died in office, and shortly after we find the city government making a huge loan to the king, part of which may have been used to pay debts owed Whittington for mercery supplied to the king's favourites. The loan was in fact a gift, intended to encourage the king to restore the city liberties, which he had suspended.

Despite the king's interference in London affairs and general unpopularity in the city, Whittington's close connection to him appears to have had no adverse effects on his own importance in the city. He had been serving, on and off, as a member of the city's common council from 1384 until his appointment as an alderman in 1393. His royal appointment as mayor in 1397 was probably not distasteful to the citizens, who would have appreciated the benefit of a mayor having influence with the king; that fact, together with his firm administration of law and order at a troubled time, led to the citizens electing him to continue in office for the 1397/98 term. His mayoralty saw an ordinance restricting the market for woollen cloth, brought into the city by outsiders, to a particular building near the Guildhall and to particular days and times; in part to ensure that cloth sales were conducted in public, and in part to ensure the collection of the king's customs thereon could be more effectively administered. Whittington was again elected mayor in 1406, during which term of office he successfully campaigned against fish weirs illegally placed in the Thames. His third and final term was in 1419/20, when he took action to reassert and strengthen regulations controlling the brewing industry, a matter with which he continued to show concern in the years following. He also encouraged town clerk John Carpenter in an initiative to compile the customs and by-laws of the city into a reference work, which has left historians the single most important record of medieval London in the Liber Albus. Whittington served as a master of the Mercers' Company in 1395/96, 1401/02, and 1408/09; although less active in the company in later years, his continued association is shown in the bequest towards the company's alms fund and the trust he showed by giving the company an important role in the administration of his almshouse.

Nor did Whittington's association with Richard II, whom he viewed as his patron and possibly even as a friend, put him out of favour with the new king, even though he had continued to loan money to Richard in his final years on the throne, when other Londoners had all but abandoned the king. He secured his position by providing Henry with cash on a larger scale and more regularly than he had his predecessor. Repayments were made usually by assigning to him revenues from subsidies on wool exports levied at London and several other ports, or occasionally through customs exemptions on his own wool exports; this was typical practice by the king (although Richard II, perhaps as a special mark of favour, had repaid Whittington in cash). He was even, during the first year of Henry's reign, one of three Londoners appointed to the king's council. Nor did Henry or his son have any qualms about using a man of Whittington's experience and capabilities to undertake various administrative/judicial commissions, as was done with many leading townsmen.

Whittington was thus drawn both into the wool trade and into the customs collection service. He became a moderately heavy exporter of wool, perhaps sometimes as part of a consortium of mercers. Between 1401-03 and 1407-10 he served as collector of the customs and subsidies on wool at London. And for several years during Henry IV's reign he held the post of mayor of the Calais staple. This diversification of activities and business was typical of medieval merchants.

Not typical was the fact that Whittington did not invest much of his wealth in real estate. His landed interests outside of London were mostly temporary, of a trustee nature and perhaps the source of some modest income. He did acquire a small manor in his home county of Gloucestershire. His marriage to Alice FitzWaryn brought the prospect of a landed inheritance in Somerset and Wiltshire, but Alice predeceased her father, and there is some indication that the couple had already sold their interest to Alice's sister and her husband. On the other hand, Whittington did possess a few properties, including shops, in several London parishes, besides his large holding in St. Michael Paternoster Royal, where he had his own residence (purchased in 1402, the last of his personal real estate acquisitions) and where the almshouse and college were later established. But even his London holdings were not exceptional, considering the wealth he could have invested therein. Whittington was also atypical in that he appears to have been less litigious than most of the contemporaries of his class; he appears as principal in very few lawsuits. Possibly his reputation and influence made it too risky for anyone to try to defraud or slander him, or withhold a debt, gambling to win any legal battle that ensued.

Having chosen to put the money he had made from commerce to use as a financier, Whittington needed liquidity and so preferred to have his wealth ready to hand, or invested (as was the custom) in precious items – plate and jewellery – rather than tied up in real estate. The number and size of his bequests indicate that, in modern terms, he would have been a multi-millionaire. His will mentions no family to whom he wished to leave some of his fortune. He left no (or no surviving) children; after his wife died, he never remarried. Although respected for his moral rectitude during the latter part of his life, he may not have been very approachable; he seems not to have made any close friends after Richard II's fall. His Gloucestershire manor, but nothing else, passed to his only surviving brother, apparently as a nuncupative bequest on his death-bed; perhaps they were not close. Nor does his will suggest a close attachment to any of his personal servants or any of his executors, in whom he was careful not to place unreserved trust, with the possible exception of John Carpenter, with whom he had had at least a close working relationship. He was wealthy, but empty.

The deposition of his royal patron, preceded by the disgrace and deaths of other of his clients at court (first the earl of Oxford and later the duke of Gloucester), and followed within a few years by the death of his wife, at a time when he was no longer young, seems to have marked a turning-point in his life. As one of his biographers has noted,

"the fire had gone out of his life, the thrust of a man on the make had given way to the calm of a made man.... He buys very little property after 1402; he becomes correct and formal; he is rigid in his treatment of the brewers, correct in his attitude to usurers, formal and cold in his will. He appears to have been an upright and judicious man, not one who was quickly or intemperately roused."

[Caroline Barron, "Richard Whittington: the man behind the myth", Studies in London History presented to Philip Edmund Jones, ed. A.E.J. Hollaender and William Kellaway, London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1969, p.254. (Dr. Barron's study is the principal source for the biographical information summarized here.)]

By the 1420s, all that was left to him in life was to prepare himself for death. Although the amount of money bequeathed in Whittington's will is exceptional, the types of pious and charitable bequests are conventional and exemplify the range of opportunities open to a wealthy townsman turning his mind to the afterlife:

- to provide for his funeral;
- to arrange for prayers to be said for him and for those to whom he owed debts of gratitude, by both men of God and by laymen;
- to contribute to the fabric of society (churches and roads);
- to provide relief to the least fortunate members of society: the poor, the sick, lepers, and prisoners.

That the destination of some of his bequests were to institutions outside London in part reflects his dealings with the royal court – for instance, he probably lodged at the monastic house near Windsor when he had business with the king – or commercial travel destinations.

Whittington's preparations for death were a case of prudent planning. Although old, he was remaining active in his civic duties. He probably died shortly before March 8, 1423, when the probate of his will took place in the London husting. If he suffered a lingering final illness, as an illustration of him on his death-bed hints, it was not devastating enough to keep him from attending a session of the aldermen's court in February.

In fact the will is a litany of works intended to benefit Whittington's soul in preparation for the Last Judgement. Was it then insincere from a charitable perspective? We may throw a little light on this by looking at charitable works he performed during his life. The preamble to the almshouse ordinances states that Whittington, during his lifetime, gave generously to help the needy and the poor. While this is not well-documented, we do know of a few instances of his public-spirited efforts:

- In 1401/02 he donated a small sum towards the building of a new nave at Westminster Abbey, probably because it was a project of his late patron, Richard II.
- In 1409 he purchased land next to his parish church and then acquired licence to give it in mortmain to the rector, to allow the church to be rebuilt and a cemetery added. The task of rebuilding was completed by his executors. Since his wife had died not long before, it may be that his underlying intention was to make the church a more fitting site for his and his wife's tombs.
- In 1411 he contributed most of the funds for building and outfitting a library at the London Greyfriars.
- He was said to have funded a refuge for unmarried mothers at St. Thomas' Hospital, Southwark.

His major good works were posthumous. A good deal of leeway was left to his executors in how to apply the funds realized from the sale of his property, and certainly they acted as they thought best, not always within the strictest wishes of the testator. Where they chose to spend Whittington's money was on the rebuilding of Newgate prison, the construction of a gate to St. Bartholomew's hospital, the creation of a library at the Guildhall, paving of the Guildhall (then undergoing massive rebuilding) with marble, the foundation of a college of priests associated with St. Michael Paternoster, and the almshouse. Since there is no evidence that Whittington himself possessed any books or was intellectually inclined, it is possible that John Carpenter, inspired by the precedent of the Greyfriars library and Whittington's prominence in local government, settled on this as a worthy cause, to which Carpenter later bequeathed much of his own extensive personal library. As for the Newgate project, the executors intimated that it had been Whittington's wish to remedy the unwholesome conditions that prisoners suffered in the existing gaol.

Although the will does not specifically mention founding an almshouse, Whittington's executors ascribed the idea to him. The text of the ordinances for Whittington's Charity is immediately preceded by an illustration showing an emaciated Whittington propped up in his canopied bed, naked except for his nightcap (to protect from lice) as was the medieval sleeping habit, and apparently giving instructions to his executors – Carpenter, Coventry and Grove – who, along with a priest (possibly, but not necessarily, White), stand immediately beside his bed; while, in the background, a physician holds up to the light a flask of Whittington's urine – the chief method in this period of diagnosing illnesses. At the foot of the bed stand thirteen men, evidently representing the twelve initial residents of the almshouse, headed by their tutor. This element indicates that the illustration was not intended to document authentically the scene; the primary intent was to indicate, as the preamble to the ordinances states, that Whittington gave deathbed instructions as to the almshouse; we cannot rule out that this was not to justify a post-mortem decision by the executors, but there is no reason to think that Whittington may not have been the originator. Unless copied from an earlier source, the illustration would have been made around the time of Carpenter's death, two decades after Whittington's; the distinctive appearance of Grove suggests some attempt to portray the principals accurately. It is as close to documentary as most medieval illustrations of historical events come.

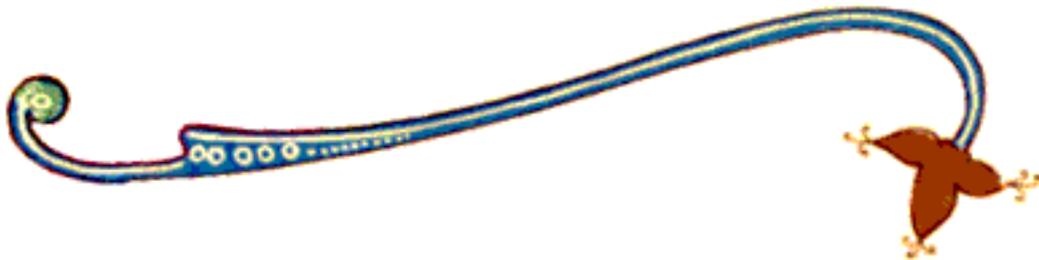

The ordinances for the almshouse probably owe much to John Carpenter's organizational abilities, perhaps fleshing out wishes expressed by Whittington before he died. They were finalized in December 1424, by which point the buildings were probably ready for occupation. The earliest surviving version is in the foundation charter of 1432. The text above is based on the earliest English translation, made in the 1440s. Additions to the ordinances had been made in 1425, to make provision for the endowment of £40 annually, establish an infirmary for sick residents, and designate an adjacent plot of land for the residents to use for recreational purposes.

Immediately after setting up the community of poor residents, the executors proceeded to ensure its viability through an endowment. They had already sold Whittington's own residence and set up the college and almshouse on properties adjacent. But, instead of selling his other properties as he had directed, they used them, along with other properties which they acquired with some of the money realized from the sale of Whittington's valuables, to provide an annual income (rents) to support the college and almshouse. This work was completed, by Carpenter, in 1431, and he then proceeded to transfer the ownership of the endowment property to the Mercers' Company, conditional on the company applying them to its trusteeship of the college and almshouse. Carpenter's meticulous work in arranging the endowment, placing the almshouse under the supervision of secular authorities, and ensuring official authorization of all that was done, assured the survival of the almshouse.

We cannot escape the fact that the college of priests was fundamentally self-interested. Although it provided employment for clergymen, its main aim was to ensure the continuing prayers for the souls of Whittington and others for whom he felt a particular affection or gratitude. Nor was the almshouse free of the same self-interestedness, since part of the rationale for supporting the poor residents was that they would offer prayers daily for Whittington's soul. In fact, the regime prescribed for the residents restricted their mobility and placed heavy demands on their time. In return for accommodation, food and clothing, they became servants to the founders' spiritual needs.

On the other hand, we should not discount the genuinely charitable dimension of such a foundation. In line with medieval political thought, Whittington must have felt it incumbent on him, because of his wealth, social status, and political influence, to justify his fortune by protecting and aiding those less fortunate. An example is in his attempts to keep the price of ale down, even to the point of insisting on what was unrealistic. We should bear in mind that he came from a gentry family and probably felt that social superiority even when making his life among urban merchants, many of whom aspired to rise to the ranks of the gentry. His affinity with king and courtiers may have stemmed in part from a shared aesthetic sensibility, he married into the gentry rather than the class with which he rubbed shoulders (although his knightly father-in-law also engaged in mercery), and the house he chose as his residence from 1402 had previously been owned by a knight. Whittington in some regards strove, at least in the latter part of his life, to be that good ruler Latini had described in an earlier century: just but tough-minded, committed to the welfare of the community, known and respected for acts of virtue and nobility, uncorrupted by bribes or love of money, manifestly devout. Whittington's financial success, influence at court, integrity, and civic-mindedness gained him the respect of most of his fellow Londoners during his lifetime. His posthumous philanthropy ensured that he remained highly regarded throughout the centuries that followed.

NOTES

"Whittington"

There are a number of villages of this name spread across England, including one in Gloucestershire, in which county Richard's immediate family was based. However, the actual spelling in the testament, Whidyngton means that we cannot entirely rule out Widdington in Essex as the source of the family roots.

"St. Michael Paternoster Royal"

It was in this parish, which once stretched to the river's edge (hence Royal, deriving from the Latin riolus, applied to the street La Rirole on the west side of the church), that Whittington had his personal residence, on a large block of property immediately north or northeast of the church.

"Placebo and Dirige"

The former was the evensong on the day beginning the funeral services, and the latter the matins and lauds sung the morning after; a mass often followed, only after which was the body interred.

"every poor man..."

This likely referred to every pauper who attended the funeral.

"they"

I.e. the clerics associated with the church.

"St. Mary without Bishopsgate"

Founded in the late twelfth or early thirteenth century by citizen Walter Brown and his wife, on land donated by an alderman, and staffed by Augustinians and lay helpers. It was known at that time as the New Hospital, and became a substantial institution, with 180 beds by the time of the Dissolution.

"St. Mary of Bethlem"

Later infamous as the mental hospital known as Bedlam, it was founded in 1247 in the northeastern suburb (again, outside Bishopgate) through a gift of land from London merchant and alderman Simon Fitz Mary to the monks of St. Mary of Bethlehem, to build a priory. By 1330 the monks had established a hospital for the sick poor there and obtained royal licence to collect alms to support it. The city seems to have taken it over in the 1340s, but in 1375 the king took it into his hand, on the grounds of it being an alien priory. We hear of mentally disturbed persons being cared for there as early as 1377, and in 1403 when the king appointed a commission to investigate the hospital, its inmates comprised 6 lunatics and 3 other sick persons.

"St. Giles"

The hospital of St. Giles in the Fields was founded, beside the road entering London via Holborn, by Queen Matilda; as possibly the earliest leper hospital, it represents an awakening in English society of the importance of social benefaction.

"Elsing Spital"

Also known as St. Mary within Cripplegate, it was founded by mercer William Elsing in 1329, to look after 100 poor men and women, but specialized in caring for the blind and for disabled priests.

"Burnham"

Possibly Burnham Green in Hertfordshire, since Ware and Cheshunt are in that county. However, there is also a Burnham just north of Windsor.

"marriage of virgins"

I.e. as dowries to enable young women to make good marriages.

"Newgate" "Ludgate" "Fleet" "Marshalsea" "King's Bench"

Newgate was the largest of several prisons; set up in one of the city gates on the western side of the fortifications surrounding London, it was administered by the city. Ludgate was a later foundation, again city-administered, intended for freemen and designated, during Whittington's 1419 mayoralty for housing debtors and those convicted of other civil offences, rather than criminals. The Fleet had also originally been a gaol for citizens, but by this time was also being used for offenders convicted by the king's courts. Marshalsea and the King's Bench were likewise for those convicted, or awaiting trial, by the royal courts, and were both in Southwark.

"John Coventre"

Like Whittington, a mercer and a member of the city administration, sheriff 1416-17, alderman from 1420, and mayor a few year's after Whittington's death. Whittington was involved in exporting wool in the latter part of his life, and Coventry may have been one of his associates in such ventures. Both men and their wives were members of the Holy Trinity Guild at Coventry, a reflection of London mercers' interest in a city that was an important market for the wool of central England. As a prominent member of both the Mercers' Company, having served as its master in 1417, and of the city administration, John Coventry was well-placed to advocate the support of both groups for Whittington's plans. He died in 1429.

"John White"

In 1409 he had been rector of the church of St. Michael Paternoster, and had a relationship with Whittington in the capacity of his parish priest. Perhaps thanks to Whittington's influence, he became master of St. Bartholomew's hospital in 1417, resigning on 18 February 1423 (possibly suggesting the time of Whittington's death) to take up residence in Whittington's house, where he died in January of the following year. It was not uncommon for testators to select a cleric as one of their executors, and White's probably close personal relationship with Whittington made him a logical choice.

"John Carpenter"

Town clerk of London from 1417 to 1438, having been promoted through the city bureaucracy; as town clerk, he would have had a good knowledge of the law, if not some formal legal training. Other evidence indicates him a man of capability, intellect, and initiative, with his own charitable bent; he might be considered England's most famous town clerk, the only one to my knowledge to have a book dedicated to his biography, a statue made of him, and a road named after him. He was evidently the person in whom Whittington had most confidence of the ability to fulfill and expand on his final wishes. That trust was repaid by considerable effort in interpreting and realizing the terms of the will in the years that followed; Carpenter, who was the longest-lived of the executors, is believed to have played the principal role here and supervised the administration of the almshouses until his death, when the Mercers' Company took over responsibility.

"William Grove"

A scrivener, perhaps chosen precisely because of his professional skills, and an elderly man judging from the long beard in the illustration of Whittington's death-bed.

"William Babyngton"

One of the king's justices, who went on to become a Chief Justice. In the event, thanks in part to Carpenter's assiduous attention to his duties, Babyngton had little need to involve himself in the administration of the testament.

"severe hardship and cruel misfortune"

This to distinguish worthy recipients of charity from those unworthy, whose poverty was the result of their own folly, negligence, or vices.

"licence"

Obtained November 18, 1424. In 1432, the executors (notably Carpenter, the only survivor by this date) made sure of all their efforts by obtaining from the king letters patent inspecting and ratifying the earlier licences, the ordinances (with subsequent amendments), endowment documents, and the executors' grants of the college and almshouse to their residents; on the same day as the letters patent were issued, an Act of Parliament confirmed what the executors had put in place.

Obtained November 24, 1424.

"overseers" "conservators"

Imray explains the decision to make, as the ultimate authority over the almshouse (and therefore responsible for its continuance and adherence to purpose), the Mercers' Company and the city government as due in part to lack of confidence in this period in the Church's ability to care for the poor, and in part a natural tendency to trust in like-minded colleagues, as well as the fact that both guilds and urban authorities by now had some history of involvement of in poor relief and were beginning to acquire the ability to act as trustees of endowments for such purposes.

In 1394, when Whittington must already have been one of the more influential members of the Mercers' Company, it obtained permission from the king to hold land in mortmain to fund the support of impoverished members. Imray believed that this prior provision for this class of impoverished person, not inconceivably the initiative of Whittington himself, is what persuaded Whittington (or his executors) to exclude them from fellowship in the almshouse.

"compline"

The service at the end of the day (about 9 p.m.).

"De profundis"

Psalm 129, recited principally at funerals or during prayers for the dead.

"versicles and orisons"

The back-and-forth recitation and response of priest and congregation in chanting brief sections of a prayer.

"chest"

Perhaps the same chest in which Whittington had secured his valuables.

"fewterer"

The original is voultrier, which I suspect may derive from the Latin veutrarius meaning fewterer (a keeper of dogs, possibly greyhounds, or a kennel owner). The term is apparently being used here in some metaphorical sense, undoubtedly unflattering and possibly refers to pimping.

"other medieval townsman"

With the arguable exception of Thomas Becket, whose urban origins are, however, not part of his claim to fame. If any other medieval townsman is remembered today outside of historians' circles it is perhaps Whittington's friend and colleague John Carpenter, and largely for the same reason of an endowment.

"staple"

A town designated by the king as having a regional commercial monopoly, in terms of being the required centre through which goods had to be exported or imported. Several towns in England had the status at one time or other, and for the king's French territories, Calais held that role.

"duke of Gloucester"

Noting that there is no evidence beyond the mention in the almshouse ordinances of any connection between Whittington and Duke Thomas, Dr. Barron suggests that Whittington may have known of Richard II's plans to murder him and later felt a prick of conscience over the matter. However, as Whittington clearly identified the duke as a patron, the simpler answer is that he was a client during the 1390s when he was powerful at court. The two hypotheses are not incompatible.

[1. The last will and testament of Thomas Knolles]

In the name of God, Amen. I, Thomas Knolles senior, citizen and grocer of London, being of sound mind and body and with good memory, on 20 May 1435 in the 13th year of the reign of King Henry VI, make and set out this my testament in the following manner. First, I leave and commend my soul to almighty God, my creator and my saviour, to the Blessed Virgin Mary his mother, and to all the saints, and my body to be buried in the church of St. Antholin, London. I bequeath to the high altar of that church, [\[in recompense\]](#) for forgotten offerings, ten pounds. To each stipendiary chaplain of the church, 6s.8d to pray for my soul. I bequeath 13s.4d to the principal cleric of that church and 6s.8d to his assistant there. I bequeath £20 to be spent on repairs to the fabric of the church, on whatever is of greatest need or most appropriate. I bequeath to each of the four orders of friars in London – that is, the Friars Preacher, the Minorites, the Carmelites, and the Augustinians – 40s. to pray for my soul. I bequeath to the hospital of St. Mary of Bethlem outside Bishopsgate, London, 20s. to be distributed among the infirm residents. For the same purpose, I bequeath 20s. to the hospital of St. Mary without Bishopsgate.

I bequeath to my son Thomas Knolles each and all household items, decorations, utensils, cloths, bed fittings, table linens, precious objects and vessels of gold and silver, whether gilded or not, that are part of my residence – that is, in the hall, the chamber, the storeroom, the kitchen, and other parts of my house. I bequeath to my son William Knolles £66.13s.4d, wishing that this sum be in the safekeeping of my son Thomas, who is to use his good discretion in paying it out to my son William. I bequeath £66.13s.4d to each of Robert and Richard, sons of my son Thomas Knolles, and to Beatrice his daughter; it is my wish that all those children of my son Thomas, while they are in their minority and until they are married, together with the £200 I have bequeathed them, be and remain in the custody, under the control, and at the disposition of the children's father Thomas Knolles, under guarantees made in relation to the same before the mayor and aldermen of London, without any interest being due thereon. If any of the children of my son Thomas should die before reaching the age of majority or before getting married, then I wish and bequeath that the share of the deceased individual be turned over and remain to he or they of the surviving children; this to apply to each of them. If all the children of my son Thomas should die before reaching the age of majority or before getting married, then I leave the above bequest of £200 for my son Thomas or his executors to put towards, dispose of, and distribute for [\[the benefit of\]](#) my soul and the souls of my late wife Joan, my parents, our benefactors and all those to whom we are obliged, and all the faithful deceased; such as through the celebration of masses, hand-outs to the poor, road repairs, dowries for poor girls of good reputation, discharge of the debts of those imprisoned as debtors, and other works of charity and compassion such as seem best to Thomas or his executors, with the intent of pleasing God and furthering the salvation of my soul and the other souls mentioned.

I bequeath to my daughters Beatrice, Margery, and Margaret – that is, to each of them – a gold ring worth a hundred shillings. I bequeath to Joan the wife of Robert Shelley esq. a gold ring worth a hundred shillings. I bequeath twenty pounds to the fabric of North Mymms church. I bequeath 6s.8d to each of my poor tenants at North Mymms. I bequeath £5 to Thomas Bryght; and £6.13s.4d to my servant John Helder. I bequeath £3.6s.8d to my servant Alice Geret. I bequeath 40s. to my servant Alice Haukyns. I bequeath 40s. to the nuns of Sopwell, to pray for my soul. I bequeath 40s. to the nuns of Pray, to intercede for my soul. I bequeath £13.6s.8d to my servant William Harry, on condition that William shows diligence in supporting and helping my executors to collect all my debts.

I bequeath twenty pounds to be distributed and disposed of among poor London householders, wherever it can be applied to most effect, at the best judgement of my executors. I bequeath £10 to be disposed of among the poor and the needy residing in the parish of St. Antholin. I bequeath £10 to be disposed of among poor men of my mystery in London, applied wherever it seems to my executors needed and appropriate. I bequeath 4d. to each person incarcerated in the prisons of Newgate, Ludgate, Fleet, Marshalsea, and King's Bench, to pray for my soul. I wish my executors to reward all my other servants whom I have not named in this testament; that is, to each of them according to the good service they have given me, according to the best judgement of my executors. I bequeath one hundred pounds to dispose of in discharging those held in the prisons of Ludgate and Newgate for debts of forty pounds and more, giving to those imprisoned a hundred shillings in each case where having it will bring about their release, without any deceit, fraud or deception.

I bequeath twenty pounds to each of my executors for willingly shouldering the burden of fulfilling this my testament. As for the residue of all my goods, chattels, and debts [owed me], wherever they may be (after my own debts have been paid, my burial has been duly and properly taken care of, and this my testament has been fulfilled) I give and bequeath them in their entirety to be put towards, distributed, and disposed of for my soul and the other souls mentioned, by my executors – especially, chiefly, and principally by my son Thomas Knolles my chief executor – both through the celebration of masses, hand-outs to the poor, road repairs, dowries for poor girls of good reputation, and discharge of the debts of those imprisoned as debtors, and through the purchase of russet cloth to be made into gowns to clothe and attire poor and needy men and women; [this to be done] to [my] best advantage, whether in the city of London or in the countryside, along with other charitable works such as seems to my son Thomas most likely to please God and further the salvation of my soul and the other souls mentioned.

Of this my testament I make, designate and appoint my son Thomas Knolles as my chief executor and Richard Hakedy citizen and grocer of London as his co-executor and assistant, to carry out truly and faithfully each and every thing specified above. In testimony to which, I have set to my seal to this document. Drawn up at London on the above date.

In the name of God, Amen. I, Thomas Knolles senior, citizen and grocer of London, being of sound mind and memory, have on 12 July 1432, in the tenth year of the reign of King Henry VI, made and set out my testament in the following manner concerning one of my tenements with appurtenances that once belonged to Richard Odyham senior, once a citizen and grocer of London, in the parish of St. Antholin in London.

First, I leave and commend my soul to almighty God, my creator and my saviour, to the Blessed Virgin Mary his mother, and to all the saints, and my body to be buried wherever God decides it should be. By this my testament I, Thomas Knolles, I give and bequeath to Robert Wydyton, citizen and grocer of London, and his wife Elizabeth, daughter of the late Richard Odyham and widow of John Oxneye, once a citizen and grocer of London, all that tenement with its appurtenances which is situated between the tenement once of John Haddele on the west side, the tenement of the rector of the church of St. Antholin on the east side, and the cemetery of the church of St. Antholin on the south side. Which tenement with appurtenances I,

Thomas, together with dom. John Snell clerk (who released his right and claim therein to me, Thomas Knolles, and my heirs and assigns in perpetuity) once had to myself, my heirs and assigns in perpetuity through the grant and feoffment of Elizabeth during her first widowhood; as is more fully set out in a certain deed thereof made out to John Snell and myself, the said Thomas Knolles, and read out and enrolled in London's husting session of pleas of land held on 28 July 1410. Robert Wydyton and his wife Elizabeth and their assigns are, for the lifetime of whichever of them lives longer, to have and to hold the entire tenement with its appurtenances of the chief lords of that fee by the services due therefrom and customarily owed by right.

I give and bequeath to Lady Joan Welles, nun in Sopwell nunnery near the town of St. Albans, daughter of that same Elizabeth an annual rent of thirteen shillings and fourpence, to be received by Lady Joan Welles after the deaths of Robert and Elizabeth from that tenement with appurtenances each year at the four principal terms in equal portions, throughout the entire natural lifespan of Lady Joan Welles, together with the power to distrain on the tenement and its appurtenances for the rent as often as may be necessary.

I wish and bequeath that the entire tenement with its appurtenances, immediately following the death of whichever of Robert or Elizabeth is last to die, shall remain in its entirety to Joan Saundres, widow of Thomas Saundres and sister of Elizabeth. Joan Saundres is to have and to hold for life the tenement with appurtenances of the chief lords of that fee by the services due therefrom and customarily owed by right, except for the right of Lady Joan Welles in and to the aforementioned annual rent of thirteen shillings and fourpence for the term of her natural life.

I wish, bequeath and provide that after the deaths of Robert and Elizabeth and the death of Joan Saundres the entire tenement with its appurtenances remain in its entirety to Stephen Broun, Nicholas Wyfold, and Ralph Say, presently the wardens of the Grocers Company of the city of London and to the community of that mystery. The wardens and community of the Grocers Company and those who succeed them at any given time are to have and to hold in perpetuity in pure and perpetual almoign for the support and relief of poor members of their community in perpetuity of the chief lords of that fee by the services due therefrom and customarily owed by right, except for the right of Lady Joan Welles in and to the aforementioned annual rent of thirteen shillings and fourpence during her natural life, as specified above. Of this my testament I make, designate and appoint as my executors my son Thomas Knolles, citizen and grocer of the city of London, John Snell clerk, and Richard Hakedy, citizen and grocer of the same city. In testimony to which, I have set to my seal to this document. Drawn up at London on the above date.

[Codicil 2:]

In the name of God, Amen. I, Thomas Knolles senior, citizen and grocer of London, being of sound mind and memory, have on 29 June 1435 in the thirteenth year of the reign of King Henry VI made and set out my testament in the following manner with regard both to my brewhouse called the Crane on the Hoop with its appurtenances in Fleet Street in St. Dunstan's parish in the suburbs of London, which once was Thomas Duke's, and to my shop with dwellings built above it and their appurtenances situated in the parish of St. Michael Cornmarket in West Cheap, London.

First, I leave and commend my soul to almighty God, my creator and my saviour, to the Blessed Virgin Mary his mother, and to all the saints, and my body to be buried in the church of St. Antholin, London.

I give and bequeath by this my testament to mag. Reginald Kentwode, dean of the cathedral church of St. Paul of the city of London and to the chapter of that place and their successors the entire house that is my brewery called the Crane, with all vessels and utensils (moveable and immoveable) that belong to the brewhouse, and all other of its appurtenances. Which brewhouse with appurtenances I, Thomas Knolles senior, lately had for myself, my heirs and assigns in perpetuity, by the demise and feoffment of Thomas Pulter clerk. The which brewhouse, called the Crane, with appurtenances is situated beside the tenement once held by William Yeman, belonging to the church of St. Dunstan, Fleet Street, to the west, and the tenement of the said dean and chapter to the east; and it extends in length from that tenement of dean and chapter at the north end, as far as the highway of Fleet Street at the south end.

I also give and bequeath by this my testament to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's church and their successors my entire shop with dwellings built above and its appurtenances in the parish of St. Michael Cornmarket. Which shop with dwellings built above and appurtenances I, Thomas Knolles, lately had for myself, my heirs and assigns in perpetuity, by the demise and feoffment of Thomas Pulter and John Fuller clerks. And which shop with dwellings built above and appurtenances is situated between tenements that belong to St. Paul's church on the east and west sides, the highway of West Cheap on the north side, and the great belltower of the church of St. Paul on the south side.

The dean and chapter and their successors are to have and to hold in perpetuity the brewhouse called the Crane in Fleet Street together with all vessels and utensils (moveable and immoveable) that belong to the brewhouse, and its other appurtenances, as well as the shop with dwellings built above and its appurtenances in the parish of St. Michael Cornmarket, in pure and perpetual alms, of the chief lords of that fee by the services due therefrom and customarily owed by right; [in return] for praying during all future time for my soul, the souls of all to whom I am obliged, and those of all the faithful deceased. Of this my testament I make, designate and appoint as my executors my son Thomas Knolles, Richard Hungate, William Aston, and John Stafford. In testimony to which, I have set to my seal to this document. Drawn up at London on the above date.

[Codicil 3:]

In the name of God Amen. I, Thomas Knolles senior, citizen and grocer of London, being of sound mind and body and my memory good, on 26 May 1432 in the tenth year of the reign of King Henry VI have made and set out my testament in the following manner.

First I leave and commend my soul to almighty God, my creator and my saviour, to the Blessed Virgin Mary his mother, and to all the saints, and my body to be buried in a tomb in church as is specified in more detail in my other testament concerning my moveable goods.

I give and bequeath to brother John Snell, warden, preceptor or master of the house or hospital of St. Antholin of London my entire shop with a solar built above it and its other appurtenances, located in the parish of St. Benet Fink in Bread Street ward in the city of London. That is, between the tenement belonging to the house or hospital of St. Antholin on the south side, and the tenement of the abbot and convent of St. Mary Graces by the Tower of London (which was formerly [the property] of Richard de Plessis, archdeacon of Colchester) on the north side; and it extends from the highway leading to the church of the Augustinian friars of the city of London at the west end, as far as the building of the house or hospital of St. Antholin at the east end. Which shop with solar above and appurtenances I, Thomas Knolles senior, recently acquired with Thomas Knolles junior my son, for myself, my heirs and assigns in perpetuity, by the grant and enfeoffment of John Tunbyk, alias Petresfeld, ironmonger, Richard Lyndesay scribe, and Thomas Balle ironmonger, citizens of the city of London, as is more fully set out in a certain deed made to that effect and read out and enrolled in the London husting session for pleas of land on 28 January 1432; and in which Thomas Knolles junior, by his document dated 2 March of the same year, turned over, released and quitclaimed to me, Thomas Knolles senior, and my heirs and assigns in perpetuity all right or claim he had in that shop with solar above and its other appurtenances, as is more clearly specified in the said document. John Snell warden, preceptor or master and the brethren of the house or hospital of St. Antholin of London and their successors are to have and to hold in perpetuity the shop with solar above and its other appurtenances of the chief lords of that fee by the services due therefrom and customarily owed by right, in the following manner and under the following conditions.

Viz. that the warden, preceptor or master and the brethren of the house or hospital, and their successors at any given time, shall provide and support in perpetuity a lamp continually burning in the chancel of the church or chapel of the house or hospital of St. Antholin. Also, that the warden, preceptor or master and the brethren at any given time of the house or hospital, and their successors in later times, shall every year in perpetuity celebrate or have celebrated publicly, solemnly, and devoutly full services for the dead for the oft-mentioned brother John Snell, warden, preceptor or master of the house or hospital of St. Antholin on the Friday after the festival of St. Gregory the pope next following the anniversary of the death of that brother John Snell, warden, preceptor or master, in the church or chapel of the aforementioned house or hospital of St. Antholin; [this for the benefit] of the soul of brother John Snell, warden, preceptor or master of the said house or hospital and the souls of his parents and benefactors and all the faithful deceased. Moreover, it is my wish and provision that the warden, preceptor or master of the house or hospital then in office, and his successors in later times, shall each year have and receive 12d. for his labour in arranging the anniversary, that each brother or other priest of the house officiating there at that time shall have and receive 6d. for his labour, and as well that each clergyman of the house or hospital for his solemn intercession and other efforts on this matter shall have and receive 4d. What is more, I wish that the warden, preceptor or master of the house or hospital and its brethren, and their successors in later times, each year in perpetuity on the day of the anniversary in memory of brother John Snell warden, preceptor or master of the hospital, following the celebration of a requiem mass, have the obligation to give out 13d. in alms to 13 needy paupers, and in fact do so, for the soul of brother John Snell warden, preceptor or master of the house or hospital of St. Antholin and for the souls mentioned above.

If the warden, preceptor or master of the house or hospital and the brethren, or their successors in later times, do not provide the burning lamp as specified above or in any way through negligence default in the commemoration on the date indicated above of the anniversary of brother John Snell, warden, preceptor or master of the house or hospital of St. Antholin, or if they fail to pay the money to the brethren, clergymen, or paupers, as specified to be paid as alms by my above bequest, in part or wholly, contrary to the intent of this my testament, and this should be proved convincingly and with due process by [the witness of] two or three reputable and respectable men before the mayor and sheriffs of London, or some other judge with jurisdiction in such matters; then, it is my wish and bequest that, because of the default and negligence, it be permissible for the heirs of myself, Thomas Knolles senior, to have and receive an annual compensation of 6s.8d from the shops with solar above and appurtenances. And, if necessary, to distrain on the shop with solar above and appurtenances for that annual payment of 6s.8d., and to carry off the items taken as distraint and keep them in their possession until they have been fully and legally satisfied for the annual payment of 6s.8d, together with all arrears built up to that time. This to be so as often and whenever default or negligence occurs in these or any other matters. Of this my testament I make, designate and appoint as my executor my son Thomas Knolles junior. In testimony to which, I have set to my seal to this document. Drawn up at London on the above date.

Also I, Thomas Knolles senior, have the following wish: that those who are my co-feoffees in trust of and in all my lands and tenements, rents and services, reversions, [with] houses, shops, buildings, cellars, solars, and all their other appurtenances in the London parishes of St. Antholin, St. Thomas the Apostle, St. Martin in the Vintry, All Hallows Honey Lane, All Hallows on the Wall, and anywhere else in the city, together with the advowson of the church of All Hallows Honey Lane, London, immediately after my death enfeoff my son Thomas of and in each and every of those lands, tenements, rents, services, and reversions, with houses, buildings, shops, cellars, solars and their other appurtenances together with the advowson of the church of All Hallows Honey Lane. My son Thomas, his heirs and assigns to have and to hold in perpetuity. I also wish that those who are my co-feoffees in trust of and in all my manor of North Mymms with its appurtenances, in Hertfordshire, and of and in all my other lands and tenements, rents and services with appurtenances in Hertfordshire, as well as of and in my lands and meadows with appurtenances in Lambeth in Surrey, immediately after my death enfeoff my son Thomas in and of the manor, lands and tenements, rents and services with their appurtenances in Hertfordshire and in and of the lands and meadows with appurtenances in the parish of Lambeth. My son Thomas, his heirs and assigns to have and to hold in perpetuity.

[2. The last will and testament of Robert Chichele]

In the name of God, Amen. On 5 June 1439, in the 17th year of the reign of Henry VI, king of England, I, Robert Chichele, citizen and grocer of the city of London, being of sound mind and memory, make and set out my testament concerning my moveable possessions, in the following manner. First, I leave and commend my soul to almighty God, my creator and my saviour, to the Blessed Virgin Mary his mother, and to all the saints, and my body to be buried in the nave of the parish church of St. James Garlickhithe, London, of which I am presently a parishioner.

I bequeath to the reverend lord Henry, by the grace of God archbishop of Canterbury, my brother, each and every pearl that I own, or whatever sort it may be, large or small. I bequeath to the rector of the church of St. James 40s., that the rector may say special prayers for my soul. I bequeath to each chaplain of that church who celebrates there and undertakes services to pray especially for my soul, 13s.4d. I bequeath to each of the parish clerks of that church 6s.8d, also to pray for my soul. I bequeath towards the structural fabric of that church, for my burial as pre-arranged, £10. I bequeath to each of the four orders of mendicant friars in the city of London (that is, the Augustinians, the Minorites, the Preachers, and the Carmelites) 40s., that the brothers specially commend my soul to God. I leave 20s. to the friars of the order of the Holy Cross next to the Tower of London, on the same condition. I leave £10 to be expended on and distributed among chaplains who celebrate services within the city of London and its suburbs; each chaplain to receive 4d. for as long as the £10 holds out, so that they may pray for my soul.

I bequeath £20 to be distributed in the same fashion among prisoners held in the gaols of the city of London and its suburbs or persons laid up in hospitals within the city and suburbs, each prisoner or patient to receive 4d. while the £20 lasts. I bequeath to the convent of Tandridge £6.13s.4d to pray specially for my soul. I bequeath £60 for the marriage of thirty girls of good reputation; that is, 40s. to each of the thirty girls as her dowry. I bequeath £60 towards acquitting and freeing from gaol various prisoners detained in the gaols within the city of London and its suburbs, or in the King's Bench and Marshalsea; to go as far as it will stretch, on the understanding that no more than 20s. maximum be paid for the acquittance and freeing of any single prisoner. I leave £133.13s.4d to be distributed among prisoners held in the gaols within the city of London and its suburbs, as well as in the King's Bench, Marshalsea, and the gaol of the abbot of Westminster; that is, each week for the two years following my death, 26s.8d for the purchase of bread to be distributed among those prisoners, so that the prisoners in those gaols receive weekly a loaf worth a halfpenny, throughout those two years. I bequeath £20 to be distributed among poor householders in the Vintry and Queenhithe wards, at the discretion of my executors identified below. I bequeath my nephew, John Chichele, £20. I bequeath £20 to have twenty trentals celebrated in St. Gregory's for the souls of myself, my wives Elizabeth, Agnes, and Agnes, as well as those of my parents, friends, and benefactors, together with all deceased Christians. I bequeath to John Stystede, my servant, and his wife £10. I bequeath £20 to be distributed, at the discretion of my executors, among my other servants who are in my service in London on the day I die. I bequeath £20 to be distributed among the parish churches of Higham Ferrers, for their fabric. I bequeath to Thomas Spytele £5. I bequeath £20 to support poor brethren of the London grocers' company. I bequeath £5 to Anthony Astell, fishmonger of London. I bequeath £5 to his brother, John Astell, saddler of London. I bequeath to Lady Florence, the widow of John Darell and daughter of William Chichele, my brother, £10. I bequeath £10 to Thomas Knolles, citizen and grocer of London. I bequeath £10 to the master of the college of Higham Ferrers and his colleagues of that place, to pray specially for my soul. I bequeath 100s. towards the structural fabric of the parish church of Tandridge. I bequeath £5 to be distributed, at the discretion of William Warbylton esq., amongst the poor of Tandridge parish. I bequeath 40s. towards the structural fabric of the parish church of Sherfield. I bequeath £10 to William Warbylton.

I bequeath to each of my executors identified below, for undertaking the task of executing this my testament, £10. The remainder of all my moveable goods and chattels whatsoever, after my debts have been paid and my testament fulfilled, I wish and bequeath to be entirely disposed of by my executors in works of charity for [the good of] my soul and the souls of those mentioned above; such as in the celebration of masses, distribution to poor people, repairs to bridges and roads, and other pious uses, just as their good judgement leads them to think will be most pleasing to God and most profitable for the salvation of my soul and the other souls mentioned. I appoint as executors of my testament John Lorchyn grocer, John Broddsworth mercer, John Wyverton fishmonger, and Styfford the draper, citizens of the city of London. In testimony to which matters I have put my seal to this testament. Drawn up at London, on the day and year

In the name of God, Amen. Memorandum that the present codicil, made on 17 December 1438 in the 17th year of the reign of Henry VI, king of England, contains the last will of me, Robert Chichele, citizen and grocer of London, in regard to the disposition of my lands and tenements described below in the city of London, in which various persons in whom I have highest confidence are feoffees to my use. That is:

First I wish and require that my executors, as soon after my death as they are able, by the best means that they know, and without any fraud, sell all the lands and tenements described below. That is, all of my lands and tenements in the parish of St. Michael Queenhithe, London, and my great tenement of which Sir Ralph Botiller is at present the tenant in the Vintry, in the parish of St. James Garlickhithe, London, as well as the whole of the great tenement or lodging-house in which I am now living in the same parish of St. James, together with a certain other tenement in which William Abraham is at present the tenant in that parish of St. James and which is situated next to and adjoined to the great tenement in which I live. And that my executors dispose of the money received from the sale in the following way, that is:

First, to the boys or children of John Chichele, my nephew, £133.13s.4d to be divided equally among them; if any of John Chichele's children should die [before coming of age] then his portion passes to the other, surviving children of John Chichele, and so with each of them.

Towards the structural fabric of the church of Romford, so that the rectors or vicars, the wardens, and the parishioners of Romford church hold in that church each year in perpetuity a celebration of the anniversary of my death, for my soul and the souls of my wives Agnes, Elizabeth, and Agnes: £20.

Towards the structural fabric of the parish church of St. Antholin, London, so that special prayers be said for my soul and the souls mentioned: £10.

Towards the structural fabric of the parish church of St. Michael Queenhithe, London, on condition that special prayers be said for my soul and the souls mentioned, £10. Towards the structural fabric of the church of St. Dunstan in the East towards the Tower of London, so that prayers be said for my soul and the souls of William Baret and his wife Eleanor: £10.

Towards the structural fabric of the parish church of Wimpole, so that prayers be said for my souls and the souls of William Staundon and his wife Agnes, £10. Towards the maintenance of the bridge at Rochester, Kent, £20. Towards the maintenance of London bridge, £20. Towards the maintenance of the Guildhall of the city of London: £20.

Towards work on the bridges at Higham Ferrers and Hartlebury – that is, for work on each of the bridges – £10. To my poor relations in the parishes of Higham Ferrers and Souldrop, as well as other poor people in those same parishes, £20. To lepers, the poor infirm, and lunatics in the following hospitals: St. Giles outside Holborne gate, London, the New Hospital of St. Mary outside Bishopsgate, London, St. Mary of Bethlehem outside Bishopsgate, London, Saint Bartholomew of West Smithfield, London, and St. Thomas the Martyr in Southwark; £100 to be distributed in the following manner: bread and ale bought for and delivered to the lepers, poor infirm, and lunatics every week, that is 2s. per hospital per week for as long as the £100 lasts.

The remainder of the proceeds from the sales of the aforementioned lands and tenements I wish my executors to dispose of in its entirety by spending it on dowries for poor maids of good reputation, on repairs to the king's highways, on the relief of those poor persons in greatest need (whether in London or in the countryside), on handouts to poor prisoners, and on other works of charity, according to the best judgement of my executors, for my soul, the souls of my parents, and the souls of William More, my wives Elizabeth, Agnes and Agnes, Richard Merlawe, all others who merit it, and all deceased Christians.

I also wish and require my feoffees to turn over their rights and tenancy of the aforementioned tenements, which I have assigned to be sold, to him or them to whom my executors shall sell them.

I wish and require that immediately after my death my feoffees of and in my tenement with appurtenances located in the parish of St. Laurence Pountney, London, surrender their rights and tenancy to my servant Simon Pynkeherst, for him and his heirs and assigns to hold in perpetuity. In testimony to which matters, I have put my seal to this codicil, being my last will. Drawn up at London, on the day and year indicated above.

In the name of God, Amen. On 17 December 1438, the 17th year of the reign of Henry VI, king of England, I, Robert Chichele, citizen and grocer of the city of London, being of sound mind and memory, make and set out my testament concerning my tenements located in the parish of St. Antholin, London – that is, between the tenement formerly of John Hadle on the east side, the highway called Soper Lane on the west side, the tenement of the prior and convent of the hospital of St. Mary outside Bishopsgate to the north, and the highway called Watling Street to the south – in the following manner. That is, by this my testament I give and bequeath each and every tenement with appurtenances to the master or warden of the College of the Blessed [Virgin] Mary, St. Thomas the Martyr, and St. Edward the Confessor of Higham Ferrers, lately founded by my brother, the right reverend father in Christ, dom. Henry, archbishop of Canterbury by divine permission, and to the chaplains and their colleagues of that place. The present master or warden, chaplains, and fellows of the college, and their successors as masters or wardens, chaplains and fellows of the college, to have and to hold in perpetuity all those tenements with appurtenances of the chief lords of the fees by the services due therefrom and the customary rights, to assist with the support of poor people duly living in the hospital lately founded and built there by the lord archbishop, my brother; for the purpose of carrying out and fulfilling in perpetuity all my wishes and requirements written below. That is, first that the master or warden, chaplains and poor people make special mention in their prayers, masses, and devotions of my soul, the souls of my parents Thomas and Agnes, William More, my wives Elizabeth, Agnes and Agnes, my brother William Chichele, and his wife Beatrice, as well as my friends and benefactors, and all faithful Christians deceased. I further wish and require that the master or warden, the chaplains and their fellows of the college, and their successors in perpetuity, each year observe and celebrate in the parish church of Higham Ferrers divine offices [... the medieval clerk has not finished transcribing the will].

[3. The last will and testament of John Welles]

In the name of God, Amen. On 7 June 1442 in the 20th year of the reign of King Henry VI, I John Welles, citizen, grocer and alderman of the city of London, being of good and sound memory, make and set out in the following manner this my testament containing my last will. First, I leave and commend my soul to almighty God, my creator, saviour and redeemer, to the Blessed Virgin Mary the glorious mother of God, and to all the saints, and my body to be buried in the chapel of St. John the Baptist and St. John the Evangelist which I provided for and built on south side of the church of St. Antholin, London.

It is my first and foremost wish and bequest, before all other things, that each and every of my debts be faithfully paid. After which, I bequeath twenty shillings to the high altar of St. Antholin's church, to relieve my soul of the burden of tithes and offerings I have forgotten or failed to give. I bequeath £13.6s.8d to the making of a new canopy with fittings for hanging the body of Christ above the high altar of the church, as per the instructions of Thomas Knolles, John Chichele or mag. William Cleve clerk – and not to be put to any other use. I bequeath £200 to provide for a suitable and respectable chaplain to celebrate divine services for the 30 years following my death in that chapel of St. John the Baptist and St. John the Evangelist, for the souls of myself, my late wife Margery, as well as the souls of my father John and mother Isabelle, the father John and mother Marion of my late wife Margery, and also for the souls of our friends and benefactors and all the faithful deceased. I wish that the chaplain who shall thus celebrate of my soul and the souls of the others shall be present in his own surplice and participate every day in each and every of the canonical hours and masses in the choir of the church of St. Antholin – singing, reading, reciting psalms and versicles, praying and interceding – as he should wish to answer for (that he has nothing failed to do) before the highest authority on Judgement Day.

Also, I bequeath £60 to support the holding and observance of the obit or anniversary of myself and my wife Margery, as well as our fathers and mothers, each year for the 30 years following my death; that is, during the night [to chant] the Placebo and Dirige by note and on the following day a requiem mass by note in the church of St. Antholin. It is my wish that, each year during the period of 30 years when the obit or anniversary is thus held, 40s. of the sixty pounds be spent, laid out and disposed of by the wardens of the Grocers Company of the city of London in the following manner. Viz. 3s.4d to the mayor of the city of London then in office, as long as he attends my exequies; 20d. to either city sheriff then in office who is present; 12d. to he who bears the sword before the mayor, for being there; 3s.4d to each of the three wardens of the city grocers for being present there. Also, 11s.8d on wax, spices, bread, wine and ale; 6s.8d to priests, clerks, and bell-ringers; and 4s. to the most needy poor people of the parish of St. Antholin.

It is my wish that the £200 to provide chaplains and the sixty pounds to support my obit or anniversary, bequeathed by me as specified above, be delivered by my executors to the wardens of the mystery and community of city grocers by means of indentures between the rector and churchwardens of St. Antholin then in office and the wardens of the Grocers Company then in office, for execution by the hands of the successive wardens of the Company for the duration of the 30 years. On the understanding that each year the newly elected and instituted wardens of the Grocers' Company provide security to those who had been Company wardens in the previous year for whatever remains of the aforementioned sums.

I bequeath to Thomas Knolles, citizen and grocer of London, my psalter written in Latin, my best gold chain with a cross hanging from it [decorated] with diamonds and balases, my rosary with the Lord's Prayer, ten Ave Marias, and the Apostles Creed in gold, and my cypress chest. I bequeath to John Chichele a cup called "Standingcup" of gilded silver and my gold ring called "Mase" and £10. I bequeath to clerk William Clyve clerk my ... , £10, and a chest. I bequeath to John Routhe my best furred gown and £10.

I bequeath to William Osbarn, the son of my late wife Margery, two cups; that is, one called "Pear" and the other called "Apple", my silver balance called "goldbalance", my sword, my baselard, all my harness and equipment required for a horse, and all my armour, as well as my bed with an arras tester, curtains, and valance belonging to that bed. I bequeath £20 to Walter Hunte grocer. I bequeath to Robert Gayton grocer a cup called "Standingcup" of gilded silver. I forgive my servant Henry Archer the entire debt he owes me, and I bequeath the same Henry Archer £10. I bequeath £6.13s.4d to Robert Loumour. I bequeath £3.6s.8d to little John, my boy[-servant]. I bequeath £3.6s.8d to John Portour. I bequeath £6.13s.4d to Thomas Howerwode. I bequeath £3.6s.8d to my kinsman Thomas Fastolf. I bequeath 40s. to little Oliver. I bequeath 20s. to John Martyn. I bequeath £20 to Margaret Cartmell, on condition that if she should happen to marry hereafter, she do it with the consent and approval of my executors named below. It is my wish and bequest that the £20 I leave to Margaret, as indicated above, be and remain in the safekeeping and under the control of my executors until Margaret comes of legal age or is married with the consent of my executors. Should Margaret die before coming of age or marrying with my executors' consent, then it is my wish that my bequest of £20 be faithfully distributed by my executors, at their discretion, in pious works of charity for my soul and the other souls already mentioned. I bequeath 20s. to Agnes Russell. I bequeath £10 to my servant John. I bequeath £10 to my servant Alice Pankbourne. I bequeath 40s. to my servant Anne. I wish that each and every of my servants not named above, who serve or have served me, receive a reasonable reward at the discretion of Thomas Knolles. I bequeath 20s. to John Stede of Lewisham. I bequeath my best primer to Elizabeth Marchall. I bequeath my second best primer to Beatrice Knolles. I bequeath twelve pounds of "Malik" silk to the wife of John Routhe.

I bequeath one hundred shillings towards work on the parish church of St. George Muspole in the city of Norwich, in whose holy font I was baptized. I bequeath to each order of mendicant friars in the city of London – that is Carmelite, Augustinian, Preacher, and Minor – on condition they devoutly pray for my soul, 40s. at the discretion of my executors. I bequeath to the friary of the order of Holy Cross next to the Tower, 40s. at the discretion of my executors. I bequeath to poor prisoners in the gaols of Marshalsea, King's Bench, Fleet, the two counters of the London sheriffs, Ludgate and Newgate, 40s. per gaol at the discretion of my executors. Also, 40s. to the lepers in St.

Giles hospital. I bequeath 40s. to the lepers at the "lokes" outside St. George's gate, and 40s. to the lepers at Hackney, at the discretion of my executors. I bequeath 20s. to each anchorite within the city of London and its suburbs. It is my wish that the two chalices, four sets of priestly robes, one pair of silver cruets, and two pairs of latten candelabra currently in my chapel shall remain in that chapel for the future, to be used for the worship of God for as long as they are serviceable.

I bequeath £33.6s.8d towards the construction and erection of a new boundary marker for my ward of West Cheap, under the supervision of John Chichele, Thomas Knolles and William Clyve. I bequeath £20 towards upgrading the water supply by provision of a conduit, paid out at the discretion of my executors. I bequeath £20 towards the repair of London Bridge, to be paid out at the discretion of my executors. I bequeath £6.13s.4d towards the repair of the highway between Sydenham and London, at the discretion of my executors. I bequeath £10 to poor householders within Cordwainer ward, especially those in the parish of St. Antholin, to be distributed at the discretion of my executors. I bequeath five pounds to Joan the widow of John Kyngescote.

It is my wish that after my death my feoffees of and in all my lands and tenements with appurtenances situated in Tower Street, London, which I acquired from William Burton citizen and grocer of London, transfer possession of all those lands, tenements and appurtenances to the wardens of the mystery and community of grocers of the city of London. The wardens, and their successors as wardens of the company, are to have and to hold in perpetuity, for providing relief and help to poor members of the company residing, or to reside in future, in the newly-constructed tenements next to the grocers' hall in the parish of St. Mildred Poultry, London. On the conditions that: for all future time those poor people say special prayers for the souls of myself and my late wife Margery, the souls of our fathers and mothers, and the souls of all the faithful deceased; the company wardens hold and observe annually, throughout the thirty years mentioned above as following immediately after my death, my obit or anniversary in a decent fashion, as described above.

It is my wish that all my lands and tenements with appurtenances situated in the parishes of St. Mary Magdalene Old Fish Market, St. Peter Paul's Wharf, St. Michael Paternoster Royal, and St. Swithin Candlewick Street in the city of London be sold by my executors or their executors as quickly after my death as they may and for as good a price as they know how. And that the money received by those vendors from such sale of my lands and tenements with appurtenances be faithfully disposed of and distributed through charitable works, as they judge best for my soul and the other souls mentioned above. I wish, entreat, and require each and every of those who are my feoffees to use in all my aforesaid lands and tenements with appurtenances in those parishes of St. Mary Magdalene, St. Peter, St. Michael and St. Swithin, on the basis of the great trust I place in them, to transfer possession of all those lands and tenements with appurtenances to him or them to whom my executors (or their executors) shall sell those lands and tenements with appurtenances, when they are required to do so by my executors (or their executors).

It is my wish that as soon as possible after my death my manor of Sydenham, in the parish of Lewisham, in the county of Kent, along with its appurtenances and all other lands, tenements, rents and services with their appurtenances that I had or have in that parish be sold by my executors. And that the money received therefrom be disposed of by my executors to carry out my will, as set out in this testament, and on charitable works for my soul and the soul of my late wife Margery, as they think best pleasing to God. Provided always that prior to the sale or in [the terms of] the sale they make good and sufficient provision for William Osbarn to have and receive for life from that manor with appurtenances an annual rent of forty shillings, [payable] at the usual two terms during the year, with power to distrain on the manor with appurtenances for the rent and its arrears, whenever during William's lifetime that rent might happen to be partly or wholly in arrears. I wish, entreat and require that all my feoffees in that manor, lands and tenements with appurtenances, on the basis of the great trust [I place in them], transfer possession therein to him or them to whom my executors shall make the sale, when reasonably required, without any delay or refusal whatever, as they shall wish to answer for before God.

It is my wish that after my death my executors transfer the years remaining on my lease of a mansion with shop and garden attached in the parish of St. Antholin, London, to some particularly respectable member of my own mystery in the city of London, as suits them and is considered expedient. And that the money received by my executors from the sale of the lease be disposed of for my soul and the souls mentioned above in whatever way they anticipate may please God and benefit the salvation of my soul.

It is my wish that if the aforementioned William Osbarn is not content with what I have bequeathed him above, but instead harasses in any way my executors indicated below, or if William or anyone else on his behalf or in his name through any wiles, fraud, or trickery disturbs my feoffees in my above-mentioned manor, lands and tenements with appurtenances, or makes any legal claim to the manor, lands and tenements with appurtenances (or any portion thereof), contrary to what is set down in my last will, then I wish that each and every of the above legacies that I have made to William be considered null and void.

As for all the rest of my goods and chattels, whatever and wherever they may be, after my debts are paid, my testament is fulfilled, and my funeral expenses fully dealt with, I give, bequeath and assign them to be distributed and disposed of by my executors in pious uses and charitable works for my soul and the souls mentioned above, in whatever ways my executors anticipate may best please God and benefit the salvation of my soul. As executors of this my testament, I make, designate and appoint Thomas Knolles, John Chichele, mag. William Clyve, and John Routhe. In testimony to which, I have set to my seal to this testament. Drawn up at London on the above date.

DISCUSSION

Thomas Knolles | Robert Chichele | John Welles

These three documents – which I have broken up into paragraphs to make for easier reading – embody to some degree the thoughts and preoccupations of three contemporaries as they approached death, although it is difficult to know how much the terminology of testamentary instruments reflect the character of the testator and how much that of the scribe who drafted them. Knolles, Chichele and Welles must have known each other quite well, from being in the same business, from social interaction (particularly in the case of the pair living in the same parish), and from service together in London's government. The three documents show differences and similarities, the latter above all in the provision for pious and charitable works, supporting the interpretation that some historians favour of wills and testaments being primarily tools to provide for the health of the soul in the afterlife, by arranging for proper funeral ceremonies and prayers to be said in the years that followed. This interpretation seems more supportable for testators who were as wealthy, powerful and influential as the three men here; those leaving briefer and terser wills are not so focused on this aspect of testamentary provision.

Thomas Knolles

The family of Thomas Knolles, or Knollys, believed itself related to Sir Robert Knolles, who had been a military commander of Edward III's forces in France and later helped protect London during the Peasants Revolt; Thomas acted as one of his executors in 1389, although it is not known what their relationship was, and Thomas' father was probably a Richard Knolles. Thomas had no less a distinguished career than Sir Robert, in his way, through service to his community. He was on a par in terms of his influence and wealth with contemporaries Richard Whittington and Robert Chichele, and – like them – a long-liver. Knolles seems to have had a close association with Chichele, both in business and in private life; Chichele's nephew John had married Margery, one of Knolles' daughters.

His first known position of responsibility was as warden of the grocers company in 1387/88, an office he held once more at the further end of his career (1431/32). By the time of his first tenure he was probably already in his mid to late 30s, and his business must have been doing well. Although his commercial activities are not much evidenced, the debts for which he sued indicate that he could invest sizable amounts of money in his business ventures. His parish church, St. Antholin's, was closely associated with the grocers.

His election as alderman of Dowgate ward in 1393 was preceded by him acting as auditor of accounts of the city guardian of orphans on two occasions, and his status is also seen in him being among 24 commoners chosen to accompany city dignitaries to Nottingham to meet with the king in 1392. In 1397 he transferred from Dowgate to Cordwainer ward, remaining its alderman until his death in 1435. Soon after being made an alderman, he was elected a city sheriff (1394/95) and subsequently served two mayoral terms, in 1399/1400 and 1410/11. His second mayoralty saw the start of the project to rebuild the Guildhall on a grand scale; he also contributed a large sum towards the construction of a new hall for the Grocers Company. He represented the city at the parliament of 1416.

On several occasions he supported Henry IV with loans, and was one of five "war treasurers" appointed by the king in 1404. Despite the king being constantly in debt to him, he was willing to continue the loans to Henry V and Henry VI. On the other hand, he is not known to have been heavily involved in supplying the court with its necessaries, nor was he especially active in royal administration. He was briefly a collector of customs at London (1400-01) and served on a number of judicial commissions between 1400 and 1418, but this can hardly be said to have been a major aspect of his career.

With the profits from his business, which he continued to manage up until the end of his life, he gradually acquired properties in several London parishes, providing another form of steady income. Just as friends and colleagues obliged him by acting as trustee or feoffee to use in his property transactions, he too was often called upon to do the same for them – among the number were fellow grocer John Welles. Outside London his landed interests focused on Hertfordshire, where he started to build up an estate in 1391, with the purchase of one-quarter of North Mymms manor; the remainder he purchased in 1428. He also held lands in Essex (apparently disposed of before he drew up his will) and just across the river from the City, in Surrey. Stow assumed Knolles had a knighthood, probably on the grounds of his mayoralty, but this does not seem to have been the case.

Probate of the several wills of Thomas Knolles took place before the prerogative court of the archbishop on 11 July 1435, with administration committed to Thomas junior and Richard Hakedy. Although some of its provisions had been drawn up in earlier years, the final form of the will was evidently put together at Knolles' death-bed. It was not until the following February that the document also received probate and registration in London's husting court.

Thomas was buried next to his wife Joan, who had died in 1431. The epitaph on their tomb read:

*Here lyeth graven undyr this ston
Thomas Knolles, both flesh and bon,
Grocer and Alderman yeres fortye,
Sheriff, and twis Maior truly:
And for he should not ly alone,
here lyeth wyth him his good wyff Jone:
They weren togeder sixty yere,
And nineteen children they had in feer;
Now ben they gon wee them miss:
Christ have there Sowlys to heven bliss. Amen.*

Of their 19 children, only two sons and three daughters appear to have survived. If we may trust the number in the epitaph, it is probable testimony to the high infant mortality rate even towards the close of the Middle Ages.

Knolles' younger surviving son, William, established himself at Bristol in a grocery business. It is not clear why the father seems to have had some concerns about William, requiring his legacy to be doled out at the discretion of the elder son. Perhaps William brought financial difficulties on himself when young, his relocation to Bristol might be suggestive of the need to leave a past behind. William died without heirs in 1442. Thomas junior took over his father's business and, although he did not achieve the same prominence in community affairs as his father, ran an even more prosperous business. He was buried near his father's tomb in St. Antholin's. His epitaph, destroyed by fire along with that of his father and the church as a whole in 1666, read:

*Thomas Knolles lyeth undre this ston
And his wyff Isabell, flesh and bone;
They weren togeder nyntene yere,
And x chyldren they had in fere.
His Fader and he to this Chyrch
Many good dedys they did wyrch.
Example by him ye may see
That this world is but vanitie;
For, wheder he be smal or gret,
All sall turne to wormy mete.*

*This seyde Thomas was leyd on Bere
The eighth day the moneth Fevrer,
The date of Jesu Crist truly
An Mcccc five and forty.
Wee may not prey, hertely prey ye
For owr Soulys, Pater Noster and Ave,
The sooner of owr peyne lessid to be,
Grant us the holy trinite. Amen.*

Again, only four of his many children are known to have outlived him. The descendant of one rose to an earldom.

At the time of Stow, Thomas Knolles senior was remembered for his part in initiating the rebuilding of the Guildhall, and for his charitable benefactions resulting in the renovation of St. Antholin's, the provision of fresh water supplies for Newgate and Ludgate prisoners, and the poor relief provided through the bequest of his house in Watling Street to the Grocers' Company. The last, next to the churchyard, was still providing a rent of almost £126 in 1863, with the proceeds still being distributed to poor members (or their widows) of the Company. He is also credited with having built the west tower of St Mary's, North Mymms, ca.1428; his arms are displayed in one of the church windows.

That, despite having no shortage of heirs to whom to leave his fortune, Knolles assigned a large part of it to charitable works is partly a facet of this type of document: there were laws in place to assure that the heir and the widow were provided for from a man's estate, so testaments of wealthy men often show a preoccupation with means to ease the burden on the soul after death. Historians debate whether such provisions may reflect a guilty conscience of men who likely had built their wealth by means sometimes not entirely scrupulous. Some of the debtors whose plight Knolles wished to alleviate may have found their way into prison through his own legal actions. His attention to returning to Elizabeth Oxneye the property that had been her inheritance, but which as a widow she had sold to Knolles, may reflect him having taken advantage of her widowhood to acquire the property at less than its true value; on the other hand, this provision of his will may alternatively mask past friendships or other social obligations. His provision for his manorial tenants at North Mymms may owe a little to their past mistreatment, in terms of extortionate rent increases; but to give Knolles his due, he had left the running of the manor to his wife and a kinsman and was mortified when informed of the state of affairs by one of the angry tenants.

Robert Chichele

Robert Chichele was one of three brothers who all achieved positions of importance in society. The family was based in Northamptonshire, and this particular line, in the person of Robert's father Thomas, was established by the beginning of the 1360s in Higham, a small Northamptonshire town on the Ferrers estates although after the battle of Evesham it passed into the hands of what later became the duchy of Lancaster. Thomas appears in various roles in the court records of Higham Ferrers from 1363 on, and his prominence in the town is evidenced by his election as its mayor in 1381, and again in 1383; in 1386 he was a collector of a tax in the county. He is little seen after 1391, although he lived to 1400. He had married, probably ca.1350, Agnes Pynchon, believed to have been the daughter of William Pynchon esq.. The Pynchons were a gentry family whose roots were in Essex, although there were branches in other counties. One branch was in London, where John and Walter Pynchon were influential members of the Drapers' Company, and John was alderman of Cornhill Ward by 1389 (dying 1392). It has been suggested that Thomas Chichele may also have been a draper, which could explain the original connection between the families, although no concrete evidence survives.

At any rate, the connection with the Pynchons may explain why and how Thomas' two eldest sons, William and Robert, chose to pursue careers in commerce in London, and were able to rise to prominence in that city. Their younger brother Henry, born ca.1362, settled on a career in the Church and was fortunate to come to the notice of William de Wykeham, Bishop and Chancellor, who had founded a school at Winchester; from Winchester, Henry, progressed to Oxford where he studied civil law. His abilities as a lawyer led to the Bishop of Salisbury taking him into his service in 1396 and he rose to become chancellor of the cathedral in 1404. Whether the Lancastrian connection or his now-wealthy London brothers' influence were a factor or not, he came into the employ of Henry IV, who used him as a diplomat; he was made Bishop of St. David's in 1407. Having served on the king's council, he was chosen Archbishop of Canterbury in 1414, dying in that office in 1443.

Meanwhile, the eldest brother William had become a member of the Grocers' Company by 1373 and served as its warden in 1385/86 and again in 1405/06. One of his clients was Henry Bolingbroke, and this patronage continued after Henry became king. William served the city as warden of London Bridge from 1401 to 1404, as a common councillor representing the grocers in 1402, and had become alderman of Aldgate ward by 1408 in which office he remained to 1420, when he seems to have retired, dying in 1426. After his brother had become archbishop, William benefited by being appointed (1416) steward of the archbishop's liberty. After his death the post was given to his son John Chichele, who married the daughter of wealthy grocer Thomas Knolles – they were said to have had 24 children, although several probably died in childbirth. As an earlier instance of Henry's influence, William's elder son, also William, had been made chancellor of Salisbury cathedral shortly after Henry resigned the post in 1409, despite the fact that William junior was a minor; he later became archdeacon of Canterbury in 1420 (dying in 1424). A Thomas Chichele was archdeacon of Canterbury and an executor of the archbishop in 1443; if this was the son of John, then he too must have received the archdeaconry at an early age.

William senior died in 1426 and chose to be buried in Higham Ferrers, next to his parents, to whom he had already set up a monument there. He returned the favours shown his family by the archbishop by bequeathing him the reversion, following his widow's death, of much of his London real estate; the property became part of the endowment of a college of priests Henry had founded in Higham Ferrers. William's bequests included £10 to buy books for the library recently set up (thanks to funding bequeathed by fellow alderman Whittington) in the Guildhall, to help buy a new hall for the Grocers' Company, and for repairs to London Bridge, as well as smaller amounts towards the upkeep of two parish churches. He possessed his own bible and primer, which he bequeathed to his children.

Robert Chichele may well have been introduced into the city by his elder brother. He was certainly in London by 1390. Thomas Knolles was his partner in at least some business dealings. Like his brother, a Lancastrian, he is found lending money to Henry IV and Henry V; he and the archbishop were both supervisors of Henry V's will. His first marriage, ca.1403, was to Elizabeth the widow of wealthy vintner William More; she brought to the marriage property in several parishes, including St. James Garlickhithe, St. Antholin, and St. Michael Queenhithe – prior to his marriage, Robert appears to have been living in a rented house. After Elizabeth's death ca.1421, Robert married Agnes Faryngton, the widow of his friend Richard Marlow, who died about the same time as Elizabeth; this marriage brought him further property both inside and outside the city. He had interests in his own right in other property in Essex, Cambridgeshire, and Surrey, although it is not certain he was the outright owner. He did, however, own a house and agricultural land in Romford, Essex. At an unknown date, Robert married his third wife, Agnes Apulderfield, daughter of a Kentish gentleman. Despite three marriages, Robert gives no indication in his will of any children to inherit his wealth.

Robert served as sheriff of London in 1402/03, and was made alderman of Aldgate ward that same year, switching to Vintry ward in 1407, in which aldermanry he remained to 1425. He was elected mayor in 1411 and again in 1421. He represented the city at parliaments of 1414 and 1415, and perhaps earlier in 1397, standing in for his brother who had the election. Robert also served as warden of the Grocers' Company in 1413/14 and 1417/18. Like his brothers he showed some signs of interest in learning: he commissioned poet Thomas Hoccleve to translate into English at least one ballad, and it was during his second term as warden of the Grocers' Company that its ordinances were translated into English.

The generous bequests made in his will were preceded by gifts during his lifetime. In 1428 he bought from the Grocers' Company a plot of land which he gave to the church of St. Stephen Walbrook, where his brother had once been rector, as a rebuilding site; he then proceeded to finance the rebuilding, personally laying the foundation stone the following year. He was reputed a benefactor to many London churches. His will, made shortly before his death (he being dead by November 1439), left almost £700 for charitable and pious works. The money raised by his executors from sale of his property was largely put towards schemes to help the London poor. The generosity he showed towards prisoners was not atypical, and may reflect some measure of conscience about being a litigator whose actions resulted in the imprisonment of others. Bequests might seek to relieve prisoners of the debts keeping them imprisoned, or to improve prison conditions by providing prisoners money with which they could buy food. The pursuit of wealth and status might lead men of business to act ruthlessly towards their fellows; at death, they tried to lighten the burdens on their souls by compensating for such deeds.

John Welles

John Welles was born in Norwich, his father John de Welles already being of some prominence there by the 1360s and chosen as a city representative to the parliament of 1381; his will of 1384 indicates that his son and namesake was not yet 20. The son may well have been apprenticed in London and, although promised an inheritance of property in Norwich, chose to pursue his career as a grocer in the capital. He was already doing well, having acquired property in London and being a supplier of cloth for Henry V's French expedition, by early 1416 when he married Margery, the widow of Welles' fellow grocer Henry Halton (died between October 1415 and January 1416); Margery had previously been married to wealthy fishmonger John Osborn, and she brought to the marriage land in Lewisham as well as a life interest in Halton's property. A few years later Welles became the legal custodian of Halton's children; because they all died without heirs, Welles was able to profit from what they would have inherited.

He had been called to the service of his community by 1417, when seen in the role of a common councillor; that same year he was chosen as one of the city's parliamentary representatives, a duty he repeated on five later occasions. He was made alderman of Langbourn ward at the end of 1420, remaining therein until 1436 when he transferred to Cheap ward for the last years of his life. A few months before becoming alderman he was elected to a term as a city sheriff. During that term the victorious Henry V came to London with his queen and the Grocers' Company spent a large sum to provide and clothe a large retinue to escort Welles (who had loaned the king a modest sum to support the costs of the recent French expedition) when he participated in greeting the royal entourage. The confidence his fellow citizens had in him is evidenced in him being on a number of occasions called upon to act in roles such as trustee, auditor, or arbitrator, while the Hanseatic merchants active in England chose him, in 1425, as one of the men they would prefer to have act as a judge in mercantile disputes involving them. In 1431 he was elected to a term as mayor of London.

Welles was also very active in the Grocers' Company, serving as its master for six terms between 1426/27 and 1441/42. Although he doubtless built much of his wealth from his mercantile business, he also profited from playing a kind of banker's role for commanders of the English forces fighting in France, who would send him booty and money acquired through ransomes to hold for them (at 5% interest p.a.); while in possession of the money he could invest it in mercantile ventures. Among those for whom he acted as a financial agent was Sir John Fastolf, a Norfolk man who about the time of Welles' death acquired a moated manor house in Lambeth. Welles had some kinship with the Fastolfs; the Thomas Fastolf mentioned in his will may have been the Suffolk gentleman and lawyer who also had interests in Ipswich (although not taking up citizenship there until 1447) and served as its bailiff in 1451/52. Sir John placed a great deal of confidence in Welles and deposited large sums of money in his keeping during the 1420s and '30s; he complained after Welles' death that he was still owed some of this – but Fastolf was suspicious by nature and, although he demanded an inquiry, could never prove anything. Fastolf had also chosen Welles as one of his feoffees-to-use in some of his Norfolk manors, along with Sir Henry Inglose, another distant relation of Welles; and that trio, along with others, were associated in a rent-collecting scheme in London's Dowgate ward. Welles similarly made Fastolf one of his feoffees in his Lewisham manor.

His family and possibly property interests in Norwich, his connections with county gentry, and his experience in London government all help explain why Welles was appointed keeper of Norwich in the summer of 1437, after the king had suspended the city liberties (including local self-government) because of political factionalism there. The task must have been demanding for a man then around 70 years of age. Welles continued to allow some of the mechanisms of government to operate during his custodianship, while at the same time trying to bring the parties to a peaceful resolution of differences. The costs of this work proved high, and in November Welles had to have a local tax levied to cover his expenses, ordering that the doors or gates of anyone refusing to contribute be sealed shut. Welles also took advantage of his London connections: it was doubtless at his instructions that John Carpenter, London's experienced town clerk, was kept informed of developments and presumably consulted on constitutional matters. By November the Privy Council was also arguing about the expense of a warden, and it was decided to restore mayoral government provisionally, with Welles staying on to supervise and ensure matters did not deteriorate again. By the following spring, Welles had apparently brokered a settlement and Carpenter was being asked to act as Norwich's agent to request the king restore the city liberties. That restoration came in July, although peace in local politics proved shortlived.

Without his own heirs and evidently not having any high opinion of his stepson, William Osborn, Welles could afford in his last will to direct his wealth to the needs of his soul. His sense of civic responsibility led him to assign unusually large sums towards repairs or improvements of public amenities, while at the same time the bequests to friends and servants seem to reflect the value he placed in human relations. The administration of such bequests must have been onerous for the executors. They had to find buyers for much of his property in order to finance the bequests. They had to face pressure from Fastolf, as well as a complaint before Chancery by a disgruntled servant of Welles. In the months following Welles' death, his executors entered into a written agreement to construct a large window in the Guildhall chapel, a presbytery and other additions, and obtained royal permission and a parliamentary confirmation for construction of the standard and conduit in West Cheap. Welles had helped supervise the construction of the new Guildhall chapel, and his association with the project was close enough that his executors apparently ignored his wish to lie in St. Antholin's and had a tomb erected for him in the Guildhall chapel, bearing the device of two wells that Welles had used on his personal seal. As with Whittington, it was thanks largely to his executors' efforts that Welles was remembered as a great benefactor of the city.

NOTES

"St. Antholin"

The parish church was closely associated with the grocers.

"North Mymms"

A Hertfordshire village about 16 miles north of London and a few miles east of St. Albans; Knolles was its manorial lord.

"Sopwell"

The priory of St. Mary Sopwell lay immediately southeast of St. Albans and was a daughter house of the abbey there.

"Pray"

Could refer to Bray in Berkshire. But given the bequest to Sopwell and Knolles landed interests in North Mymms, it is more likely the reference is to the Hospital of St. Mary de Prae on the northwestern outskirts of St. Albans. Originally founded by the abbey, in meadows it owned, for the care of leprous nuns, the hospital had transformed into an ordinary priory by mid-fourteenth century.

"mystery"

Craft guild, or company as they were known in London.

"Marshalsea, and King's Bench"

Prisons for those convicted, or awaiting trial, by the royal courts; both were in Southwark.

"Richard Odyham"

He died ca. 1407, leaving his wife his tenement in St. Antholin's parish, with remainder to his daughter Elizabeth. Elizabeth's then husband, John Oxneye, died in 1409.

"John Oxneye"

Knolles acted as one of his executors, and took his son as his ward and apprentice.

"almoign"

Frank almoign, or free alms, was a form of tenure in which the tenant was granted property for the purpose of performing spiritual/charitable services, usually in lieu of such other services due the lords of the fee as could be dispensed with. The tenant was normally a religious institution, although the same type of tenure gradually came to be applicable to other perpetual corporations, being effectively a tenure in mortmain.

"St. Mary Graces"

This was in East Smithfield; it was a Cistercian abbey founded by the king in 1350.

"Tandridge"

In Surrey.

"acquitting and freeing"

I.e. payment of their debts, damages, or fines.

"Vintry and Queenhithe"

Chichele's parish lay in the Vintry ward; Queenhithe was the adjacent ward to the west.

"trentals"

In the context of the one month (30 day) anniversary of the funeral, the term could be applied to masses for the deceased generally, or to a particular service in which thirty masses were celebrated, over the course of a number of days.

"Lady Florence"

Previously married to Sir Nicholas Pecke. John Darell esq. was the third husband she had outlived; Darell, who had died in 1438, had been steward of Archbishop Henry Chichele, sheriff of Kent, and had served the king in numerous roles.

"Thomas Knolles"

This would have been the son of the mayor whose testament is given above.

"Sherfield"

Presumably one of the Sherfields in Hampshire.

"feoffees to my use"

A legal device in which a property holder appears to surrender ownership to others, but in fact they serve as trustees allowing the holder to continue to use the property and/or to redeliver the property at some point in the future, to the real holder or his heirs or assigns. The purpose of "the use" was circumvent obligations or legal entanglements associated with property ownership, and was prevented by a statute in 1535.

"children of John Chichele"

The larger bequest to the children than to John himself may owe something to the nephew's past history as a spendthrift.

"William Baret"

A prominent Londoner. Erroneously believed to have been the father of William Chichele senior's wife. His mention here, combined with the fact that Robert was one of Baret's executors, may indicate a business partnership.

"William Staundon"

Another prominent Londoner for whom Robert served as executor. See his biography.

"Hartlebury"

A small town in Worcestershire.

"Souldrop"

A village a few miles southeast of Higham Ferrers.

"following hospitals"

Information may be found elsewhere about the hospitals of St. Mary's and St. Giles, and St. Bartholomew's. The hospital of St. Thomas in Southwark, for the poor sick, was said to have been founded by Becket, but more likely was founded in his memory a few years after his death.

"lately founded by my brother"

Archbishop Chichele founded the college in 1422, to celebrate for the souls of Henry V, his queen, the archbishop himself, his parents, and others.

"tithes and offerings"

Tithes were a one-tenth share of income (profits from commerce, labour, or agriculture) expected to be paid to the Church by laymen to support its religious activities. This payment was promoted by the Church as a divine law, and gradually enforced by secular law, in contrast to an "offering" which was theoretically voluntary.

"canonical hours"

The regular services taking place at Prime, Terce, Sext, None etc.

"Placebo and Dirige"

These were services for the souls of the dead, said, respectively, at vespers and matins.

"by note"

Musically notated: that is, sung rather than said.

"Grocers Company"

Grocers Company: The terminology used in the testament translates more literally as "the mystery [i.e. gild] and community of grocers".

"provide security"

I.e. guarantees or guarantors of their proper management of the fund.

"psalter"

A book of the psalms, usually supplemented by other pious texts, used by lay persons as a manual for private devotions.

"balases"

A type of ruby.

"baselard"

A long knife, or short sword. It is often seen in illustrations of men of the late fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, hanging from the girdle (belt) in front of the body.

"arras tester"

A tester was a canopy, sometimes specifically the part placed vertically at the head of the bed; the qualifier arras means that the tester was woven with decorations, like a Flemish tapestry (Arras being a location in Flanders).

"valance"

The drapery fringes around the tester and head of a bed.

"primer"

A book of devotions, used by lay persons as their prayer-book for various services (including Placebo and Dirige).

"Beatrice Knolles"

Sister of Welles' executor.

"silk"

The original has duodecim libras cerici de Malik. Silk would seem a likely material to bequeath to a woman (and there was a fortified settlement called Malik located on the Great Silk Road), but would not normally be measured by weight. There was a red, arsenic-bearing dye called sericum, and this would be an alternate, if improbable, translation.

"St. George Muspole"

Better known as St. George Colegate (the pond Muspool and adjacent street Muspolegate being nearby).

"at the discretion of my executors"

This probably meant that the way in which the money was divided and distributed was left to the executors.

"order of Holy Cross"

I.e. the Crutched (or Trinitarian) Friars.

"St. Giles hospital"

The hospital of St. Giles in the Fields, in the suburb of Holborn, one of the first leper hospitals in England and, thereby, an early indicator of lay benefactors starting to take responsibility for social welfare.

"anchorite"

A hermit or religious recluse; sometimes female hermits were meant, but that distinction is not clear here.

"cruets"

In this context, the reference is to small containers used to hold wine and water using during Mass.

"latten"

Although today mainly used to refer to a man-made alloy of iron plate covered with tin, the term is and was also used to refer to any metal, precious or otherwise, thinly sheeted.

"boundary marker"

Known as a "standard" and made of stone (at least after the rebuilding financed by Welles – possibly wood before). They were apparently in every ward, although that at Cheap is best known: "famous as the site of rabble-rousing speeches and summary executions" [Timothy Baker, Medieval London, New York: Praeger, 1970, 248]. They also served as conduit destination points, where the public could collect water.

"upgrading"

Again this was presumably for West Cheap ward.

"Sydenham"

Or Sippenham as called in this will and until the 18th century, this village lay a few miles south of London (just beyond Lewisham, of which borough it is now a part).

"mystery and community"

I.e. company; mystery was the term for a craft guild.

"Lewisham"

As the association of "Sippenham" and "Levesham" indicates, the location meant by "Levesham" is Lewisham, which lies south-east of the city (then Kent).

London alderman Robert Clopton
Original in the Guildhall Print Room

There exists a set of twenty-six colour portraits, carried out in the late 1440s, probably by a royal herald (hence the heraldic style). The subjects, all similarly posed, are dressed in their aldermannic liveries and each proudly displays his heraldic arms. The standardized portraiture gives a homogenizing effect, and this symbolizes the character of the aldermannic body at that period: a social group of peers, without the standouts of the fourteenth or even early fifteenth century. These were all individuals of course, with different occupations, personalities, interests. And yet there were none who stood head-and-should above their peers in the way that men such as Fitz Ailwyn, Waleys, Rokesley, Wengrave, Walworth, Brembre, or Whittington did, in terms of wealth, authority, influence at court, leadership, or notoriety.

Perhaps this was because urban government in the fifteenth century has more the appearance of rule by a group, headed by one of their members, rather than of a leader assisted by his fellows. This is partly due to the changed economy, which gave less scope for the meteoric rise of men accumulating great wealth, and partly due to London politics from the 1430s having been less turbulent – and so less demanding of forceful and strong-willed men at the helm – than for much of its earlier history.

Robert Clopton, alderman of Lime Street ward (as inscribed at bottom of the placard bearing the blank shields), was one of the London rulers of that period. He was an alderman from 1434 to 1448, although his last known attendance of a meeting of the court of aldermen was in October 1446. His earliest documented position of responsibility was as commissioner to collect a parliamentary subsidy in 1434. In 1435 he was elected one of London's sheriffs and from 1437 to 1439 acted as a city auditor; he represented the city at the parliament of 1439/40.

By 1441 he was prominent enough to be elected mayor, but there are indications his mayoralty ran into problems. It began inauspiciously with a disturbance at his election, caused by some of the skinners and tailors, who had wanted another alderman to be chosen. In November 1442, after the end of his term, he found it advisable to obtain a pardon for all trespasses and contempts committed as mayor between 28 October 1441 and the same date the following year, and of any legal actions that might be brought against him in the king's name, stemming from his activities as mayor. In April 1445 he, described as king's serjeant and alderman, obtained a royal exemption from being obliged to serve in any office, although whether this is connected with his difficulties as mayor or with the onset of old age is unknown.

Like many of his fellows, Robert Clopton was a relative newcomer to London, the son of a Cambridgeshire man. In 1445 he was clearing his title to a manor at Clopton – by obtaining a waiver of any claim on the part of the son and heir of its previous owner – with associated lands at Croydon and East Hatley; the latter were in Cambridgeshire and there may also have been a Clopton in that vicinity, or otherwise it was likely the village in Suffolk. As well he held property in Middlesex and Kent, in addition of course to London itself; these were estimated in 1436 as having an annual value of £83. His landed interests in Cambridgeshire are also reflected in his service as a Justice of the Peace for that county from 1443 until his death, and possibly in his latter years he increasingly turned his attention away from London to his rural estates.

Robert Clopton had pursued in London the trade of draper, which meant he was active in the international cloth trade. His first wife, Clarissa, the widow of a salter, predeceased him (1436). They had a daughter, Alice, who married Henry Chichele, scion of a family that had been powerful in London a generation earlier. Robert's second wife, Margery, was left a widow when Robert himself died in early 1448. The Hugh Clopton who was an alderman and mayor during the reign of Henry VII was no relation, as far as we can tell.

TRANSLATION

[1. Petition, 1321]

To our lord king, Thomas de la Rente his burgess of his town of Ipswich complains that on the night of 16 January [1321] there came John Halteby, who is called "the king of Ipswich" throughout the region, Geoffrey Costyn the common clerk of the town, [and] William Devenish the common sergeant of the town, [with] a large force of up to 200 men of the community, armed as if for war, and they forced their way into Thomas' hall while he was out of town. Not satisfied with committing hamsoken by night, with swords drawn they beat and roughed up his wife, tore off her dress leaving her naked, and so feloniously mistreated her that her life is despaired of. They also beat and roughed up his other people in his houses, broke down the doors of his rooms and his other houses, and entered and searched them, as if soldiers. They carried off a large part of his possessions. Thereby they committed a night-time infringement of the king's peace, against the law and without just cause. This despite the fact that the king, by his special grace, has placed Thomas and what belongs to him under his protection; the offence related above was made during the term of this protection, so that the king ought to associate himself with the complaint. Thomas begs that, if it please the king, he grant and order that suitable and quick redress be arranged for him, and for upholding the peace against so powerful a conspiracy within the town – of people who have allied themselves by an oath to live or die together and to destroy many of their neighbours by means of that conspiracy – that the like has never before been seen in any county of England. Should our lord king fail to arrange for that conspiracy to be broken and done away with, his town is as good as lost, and many peaceable townspeople will be undone forever by those who behave as if they are kings and sovereign lords of the town.

[2. Proceedings in the king's court, Michaelmas term 1344]

Memorandum that in Michaelmas term 1344 when the King's Bench sat at Ipswich, many wrongdoers were indicted before it for the death of John de Halteby, who was feloniously killed there for pursuing the king's business before William de Shareshull and his colleagues, royal justices currently assigned to hear and determine various felonies and trespasses in the county of Suffolk. The king then being present, he was given to understand that immediately following the commission of the felony many of the townspeople – as much the greater of them as the middling and lesser folk – bolstered the spirits, morale, and courage of those wrongdoers and of others who have misbehaved in infringement of the king's peace and terrorized all those who respect the king's peace (thereby undermining the peace and the king's authority in that regard), by bringing the felons gifts such as food, drink, silver and gold, and by singing to them such songs of rejoicing that you would have thought God had come down from heaven.

The king was also given to understand that after William de Shareshull and his colleagues had concluded their session in the town, according to the terms of their commission from the king, and had left town, the wrongdoers and many of their supporters in the town went to the plea hall in the town where, sitting on the staircase leading up to the hall, they had it proclaimed that William de Shareshull should appear before them under penalty [for default] of one hundred pounds and William de Notton under penalty of forty pounds. The like was done in regard to many others who took the king's part in the judicial session; that is, some under penalty of twenty pounds, others under penalty of ten pounds, some more and some less. This in contempt of the king and in ridicule of the justices and officials in the king's service.

For which reason, on 29 November 1344 John Irp and John de Preston, then bailiffs of the town, appearing in person before the king in the king's court, the court interrogated them as to whether they themselves had been in the town when such outrageous and improper acts had been carried out there; and, if so, whether or not they had arrested any of the offenders or those who supported any of their acts. Also, by what person or persons they had been made bailiffs of the town. They replied that they had been elected as bailiffs of the town by the whole town community and that they could not deny having been in town at the time the offences were committed; but they had not arrested any of the offenders because, immediately after committing their felony, they placed themselves in a church, into which holy place they [i.e. the bailiffs] had no right of entry. It was then enquired of the bailiffs why they did not have arrested those who brought them gifts such as food, drink and other necessaries, and who encouraged them and kept their morale up. They replied that so large was the crowd of townspeople who celebrated the death that they could not have quelled or arrested them, because being now old men they lacked the strength. The bailiffs were then asked why, if they are in their later years yet had been elected bailiffs by the whole community of the town, they did not take that community with them to arrest the offenders and their supporters, as they ought to do in such a case. They replied that the relatives of the same were some of the most high-ranking, powerful, forceful, and influential men of the community, so that they dared not arrest the felons. The bailiffs were then asked whether, if the wrongdoers and their sympathisers who had fled were to return to town, they as bailiffs would have the courage to arrest them and attach them to stand trial, as ought to happen. They replied that they would not dare take on such a challenge by themselves, but only if a dozen or half a dozen of the higher-ranking men of the town proved willing to undertake it with them.

The court's decision was that the custody of the town be taken into the king's hand and that some other representative of the king with the courage to maintain the king's peace be installed in the town to keep the peace there, as ought to be done, until the king shall think fit to make other arrangements; for the following reasons. Responsibility for keeping the king's peace in the town was at an earlier time, by the king and his predecessors, turned over to the community of the town, and (as the bailiffs admitted above) that community elected the bailiffs on their behalf to take responsibility for the king's peace in the town – the purpose of which is to sustain good, peaceable people in peace and quiet, and to threaten the wicked and the reprobate with the rigour of the law of the land, so that they are deterred from acts of malice. And now those bailiffs, who were by the community of their town elected and delegated with preserving the king's peace therein, have expressly stated that they would not dare to take it upon themselves to attach or arrest the offenders, in the event they should return to the town. Therefore the king's peace has not been upheld as it ought and the town has been virtually deprived of good peacekeeping. Such circumstances could cause very great harm to befall men staying in the town, set a dangerous example for those inclined to disturb the king's peace, there or elsewhere in his kingdom, and maybe even undermine respect for king and Crown in that regard.

Upon which [\[judgement\]](#), the bailiffs surrendered their rods [\[of office\]](#) to the court. The king's court turned over custody of the town to the sheriff, John Haward, who was administered an oath to administer the town well and truly, to the benefit of the king, and to uphold the king's peace there in the way required.

DISCUSSION

We have here two chapters in a story that spans almost half a century; one chapter is from the earlier half of the story, one from its closing stages. The story is one of a struggle for power and for access to sources of illicit wealth and is to some degree tied up with the disturbed politics of Edward II's reign and the fiscal crisis of Edward III's. Parts of this story I have told elsewhere, and will not repeat all the same details here. John de Halteby is the central, although not the only, character linking the different stages and to some extent the story is that of his rise and fall. The records of medieval England, local and national, being what they are, show us only extracts from that story and then the glimpses they provide are of violence, corruption, and shifting alliances; we should not suppose that the history of Ipswich in this period is all such.

By the close of the thirteenth century, the power of the families who had led Ipswich through its first century of self-government was waning. At the risk of overgeneralizing, it may be suggested that the wealth and influence of those leading families, during that initial century when the foundations of local government were built, owed much to land-holding; marketing the produce from their lands and livestock naturally drew them into regional and international commerce, while their role as landlords correspondingly supported their socio-economic superiority. To some extent during the reign of Henry III, but even more pronouncedly during that of his son, new families gradually moved to the fore, their initial success based upon trade; as they prospered, they invested profits in real estate, in part to produce the raw materials they needed for their craft and/or commercial occupations, as well as to diversify their economic activities. These nouveaux riches took their share in administrative responsibilities and political power, shaping the future direction of the town, whose special privileges and advantages were instrumental in determining the personal and family fortunes.

In particular, two men came to act as leaders of the new men dominating local government: Thomas Stace and Thomas le Rente. Following a suspension of the borough liberties and the seizure of the reins of local government into the hands of a royal keeper (1285-90, for reasons unknown, although there is some hint of maladministration, a probable cause or pretext, and the king called for an eyre there in 1286), Stace and le Rente were among the new men who in 1291 joined with more established members of the local "aristocracy" to restore mechanisms of self-government, including redrafting the borough custumal, whose original had been stolen. Stace rose to the highest local office of bailiff in 1295 and le Rente in 1297 and they became the dominant figures in local government, particularly from the accession of Edward II – most notably, the pair were partners in the two ballival offices during 8 terms (1307-12 and 1318-21). They, together with Richard Leu, likewise dominated local posts in the royal customs service: le Rente as collector of the Ancient Custom from 1304 to 1320, and of the New Custom from 1304 probably until 1319 (when he retired because too busy to perform his duties), as well as being responsible for the king's wine prise from 1310; the latter role had been filled previously by Stace since 1305, and he is seen as deputy butler in 1309 and 1315, as well as a customs collector in 1303-04 and a searcher for coin in 1309. Combining ballival and customs offices would give a considerable degree of control over local commerce, and opportunities for unfair advantage.

This firm control of borough government gave them and their close associates the confidence to assert aggressively jurisdiction over neighbouring hamlets that they considered part of borough territory. In 1312, for example, Stace and his son Geoffrey, along with members of the le Rente, Harneys, Robert families and others were accused by Christine de Muse of breaking down the enclosure around her land at Brooks, breaking her dykes there, fishing in her stews, and carrying off the fish – an act of assertion more than theft. Another royal investigation was initiated in 1315 as a result of a complaint by the Bishop of Norwich, who claimed the right to hold an annual leet court at Wicks, that bailiffs Stace and le Rente had (evidently a couple of years earlier) led a large group to his manor where they had assaulted his steward and clerk, prevented them from holding the leet, and had broken into his park from which they led off a horse that the Bishop's officers had arrested as payment of a fine. The 46 men named as accomplices of the bailiffs included other of the most prominent townsmen, such as Laurence Cobbe, John de Whatefeld, Elias le Keu, Gilbert Robert and his sons Richard and John, and several members of the Maister family, as well as the town clerk John Lenebaud and Laurence atte Wentte. Such forceful expressions of jurisdictional claims were not atypical in towns of this period.

Less typical was that Stace, le Rente, and their friends seem to have been using their control of borough government for personal benefit, by applying justice to their own advantage, or not applying it when it came to their own infringements of the law, as well as by pocketing communal revenues. Or so we infer from the issue of a set of reforming ordinances in December 1320. Although promulgated during a Stace/le Rente ballivalty, they only make sense if that administration is seen as the target rather than the source of the reforms, a hypothesis supported by events that preceded and followed. For on 26 October 1320 the king had issued letters granting a two-year royal protection to: Thomas le Rente and his sons Richard and John; Thomas Stace and his sons Geoffrey, Thomas, John, and Henry; known Stace/le Rente associates Richard Robert, Alexander Margaret, Thomas le Maister, and John Lenebaud; Clement Shawe, whose sole known distinction was having been sent to parliament during a Stace/le Rente ballivalty, and Clement le Spicer who appears to have been one of the portmen (town councillors) at this period; as well as to Laurence atte Wente, John del Wente, Alan Davy, William le Fevre taverner, John de Leyham, and John Irp. It may have been that those from whom they were seeking protection had already seized, or were about to seize, control of the borough court; for on 27 November that court issued the order to warn John Irp and Alexander Margaret to answer for some unspecified offence against the community. Since both men were merchants, the offence may have been forestalling, which topped the list of concerns expressed in the reforming ordinances.

Forestalling was prohibited by custom and by the borough charters; it had been the subject of a complaint by the "poor men" of the Ipswich community to the king in 1304. Several of the reforms targeted this and other market offences contrary to communal interests, and threatened disfranchisement for offenders. The reforms were said to have been made by the "alderman, bailiffs and the community" [Black Domesday book, Suffolk Record Office, Ipswich records C4/1 ff.71v, 76v], even though the merchant gild alderman is not known to have played any significant part in local government for decades; possibly the office was here being used as a lever against ballival government, as it would be in similar circumstances at Beverley later in the century [see "Government by council versus government by executive".].

Other grievances addressed through the reforms targeted political and financial maladministration. It was indicated that ballival elections were being held by a select group behind closed doors, rather than on a set date at a public gathering at which communal opinion could be consulted – a complaint that, when taken in conjunction with the timing of the conflict, is suggestive of a contested, or at least disputed, election in September 1320. The "usurpers" thus elected, it was continued, would impose taxes and fines on the community, putting the money to their private use; it was similarly accused that the bailiffs embezzled fees paid by franchise entrants, a charge possibly supported by other evidence. To guard against this, the reforms instituted various mechanisms for accountability and checks on ballival freedom of action. Elections were to be held on the same known date each year (September 8) and the choice of bailiffs required communal assent. The earlier method of election is uncertain, other than for the very first communal election of bailiffs in 1200 and a reference in 1309 to the bailiffs being elected "by the common counsel of the township, just as they have customarily been elected" [British Library, Add.Ms.25012, f50b]. On the latter occasion, on 16 September 1309, it was not the ballival election that was the order of the day, it apparently having taken place at some earlier time, but election of the town council of portmen; a group of 27 townsmen was selected from the various parishes to elect, on behalf of the community, the portmen and the way it is described echoes, probably deliberately, the account of the first election of the "capital portmen" in 1200. Unlike the document describing the events of 1200, however, that of 1309 goes on to define the portmen as a life-membership body, with replacements for those who died in office being chosen by the survivors. This reiterated a stipulation in the borough custumal – a document, let us remember, reconstructed in 1291 by a group of 24 townsmen which appears to include the then-portmen along with the clique that was by 1309 dominating borough government – while omitting the custumal's acknowledgement that portmen failing in their duties might be removed. Of the 12 portmen elected, or perhaps confirmed in office, in 1309, 10 had been among the redrafters of the custumal in 1291; besides Stace and le Rente, the portmen included Richard Leu, John de Whatefeld, Thomas dil Stone (a business partner of le Rente from his early days), John le Maister, Alexander Margaret, and Gilbert Robert.

This then was the group whose sway over Ipswich was opposed in 1320, evidently with some success. How that success was achieved is not clear, but force seems to have been involved and perhaps the opposition seized control of the moothall, along with the borough seal, records and treasury, or perhaps they set up a parallel government at another base. The next glimpse we are given of the disturbed affairs at Ipswich are through the complaints made to the king by Thomas le Rente in early 1321, of which the above petition is one. On February 10 and February 17, the king appointed commissions to investigate the infringement of the royal letters of protection, the forced entry into le Rente's house, the assault on his wife and servants, the theft of his goods; on March 1, following a further complaint, probably from both bailiffs, an investigation was to encompass rioting, resisting the authority of the bailiffs, and preventing them from collecting tolls. Whether any judicial enquiries ever took place is unknown; if so, there is no sign they had any effect, except perhaps to strengthen the reformers' resolve: before the end of April Stace and le Rente had been deposed and Laurence Cobbe and Henry le Rotoun put in their place. Cobbe and Rotoun were both members of the ruling class: le Rotoun had been one of the portmen of 1309 but had never yet held the ballivalty; Cobbe had already served as bailiff on seven occasions between 1298 and 1318, yet was not among the portmen of 1309, although he appears to have been one by about 1315. The choice was doubtless intended to allay local and royal concerns by being seen as conventional, rather than revolutionary. That is, in selecting chief executives from the urban class traditionally considered – both by the community and the king – as best qualified to govern. Although Cobbe appears to have been a close associate of le Rente, he was perhaps not seen as one of the principal enemies of the reformers; and, besides, this ballivalty was his swan-song. The implementation of the December reforms would have created new posts through which the reformers could influence local government from within. At the elections of September 1321, Richard Leu and Walter de Westhale became bailiffs and throughout the rest of the decade the office changed hands every year.

The inability of Stace and le Rente to resist their opponents can be attributed to a number of factors. Since the coercive resources of urban authorities were limited, it was always hard for them to resist the power of the mob, particularly a mob with strong leadership. Le Rente's reference to the town clerk and one of the town sergeants being among his opponents would have facilitated their seizure of the moothall. At this crucial time, le Rente was being sued for the sizable debt of £24 and delayed the trial by staying away from the court (despite efforts by Stace to persuade him otherwise), a tactic he had adopted before but which this time must have worked counter to his political interests. Furthermore, he was embattled from another direction: he and fellow customs-collector Richard Leu were facing a suit before the Exchequer for not accounting for about two-thirds of the money they had collected in customs between 1315 and 1317; each was convicted to repay just over £333. Leu, however, perhaps through his role as a county landholder with the status of a knight, had a friend in Bishop Salmon of Norwich, at whose instance he had been granted by the king (1316) life exemption from county responsibilities, such as the shrievalty, coronership, jury duty, and whose executor he was in 1325; the Bishop's intervention obtained in December 1322 a pardon for Leu of his half of the fine for concealing customs. Le Rente, who was additionally accused of not paying customs on his own wool exports, which may explain why his fine was later stated as being £360, had no protector.

It was in fact John de Halteby who had provided the documentary evidence of the customs fraud, leading to the inclusion of the Ipswich collectors in the broader investigation in 1322 of dishonesty in the customs service [R. Baker, "The English Customs Service, 1307-1341", Journal of the American Philosophical Society, new series, vol.51, pt.6 (1961), 14, 21, 55]. It seems likely that this evidence had been obtained through the raid on le Rente's house that Halteby led in January 1321. Perhaps even one reason for the raid was to obtain such evidence against le Rente and Leu, who may have already been under suspicion since, after being partners in collection of the Ancient Customs on wool since 1307, the pair were replaced on 22 November 1320 by John de Whatefeld and Henry le Rotoun.

The course of national politics also had an impact on the fall of Stace and le Rente. From 1317, Edward II had come under the influence of the Despensers, father and son, whose consequent efforts to further their personal interests in various parts of the country aroused resentment in many quarters and led to a gradual slide into civil war during 1319-20. During the autumn and winter of 1320, the attention of the conflicting parties was focused on tensions building in Wales, and by May 1321 open warfare had broken out. Although the baronial opposition, the Contrarians, succeeded in forcing the exile of the Despensers in the latter half of the year, fortunes reversed and the defeat at Boroughbridge in March 1322, followed by execution or imprisonment of many of the Contrarians, left the Despensers in the ascendant until 1326, their regime characterized by a general breakdown of law and order, banditry, gang warfare, and murder. The preoccupation of the king in 1320/21 may help explain the timing of the upheaval in Ipswich and why nothing material seems to have come of the complaints of Stace and le Rente. It was not uncommon for advantage to be taken of disorder at the national level to pursue local vendettas or express communal discontent: the attack of Cambridge's burgesses on the university in May 1322, and the communal revolts at St. Albans and Bury St. Edmunds in 1326-27 at the time that national revolution was in process of overthrowing Edward II, have been attributed in part to such a context; and urban upheavals in the previous century at the time of the Montfortian civil war and when Henry III was on his last legs could be considered similar situations. As one historian has noted, "Any failure of government could at any moment let loose a terrible flood of anarchy and banditry" [Natalie Fryde, The tyranny and fall of Edward II 1321-1326, Cambridge: University Press, 1979, 194].

Although the younger Despenser had held property across East Anglia since 1310, neither he nor his father paid much direct attention to eastern England, although they likely had agents to further their interests in the region. At an unknown date, le Rente made a recognizance of debt to Hugh le Despenser junior in the sum of £200, of which he still owed £153.6s.8d in May 1322; a petition of later date [PRO SC8/50/2485] associated this with le Rente's fine for customs concealment, and states that John de Halteby had pressured le Rente to make the recognizance. It also appears that Halteby led a second raid on le Rente's property to seize goods in partial repayment of the debt. Now probably in his mid-sixties and weighed down by these misfortunes (admittedly largely of his own making), Thomas le Rente died at some point before Michaelmas 1323. He still owed Despenser £140 and bequeathed him some rents towards gradual repayment. Due to his indebtedness to the Crown, an extent was taken of his property, but much of his moveables were said to be in the hands of Halteby and John Harneys senior. Throughout the rest of the decade le Rente's lands were the subject of legal disputes and division of the spoils among other townsmen, including former enemies.

Before we consider the possibility that Halteby may have been an agent of Despenser interests in East Anglia, we must look at some of the other opponents to the Stace/le Rente faction. The groups against whom accusations were made in early 1321 – the attack on le Rente's residence, and the general resistance to the bailiffs – were both headed by John de Halteby, Geoffrey Costyn, and John de Preston, and these seem to have been the ringleaders. Sixteen men were named in the assault, twenty-two in the resistance; that every member of the first group was also in the second shows the association of the events. Most, but not all, were Ipswich men. Among them were men associated with families that benefitted politically from the overthrow of the dominant group:

- Thomas de Westhale, likely a relative of one of the bailiffs who replaced the deposed Stace and le Rente, and who himself may (to judge from his prominence in witness lists headed by bailiffs) have become a portman ca.1338-40.
- John Cobat, who was a portman ca.1340; his son of the same name built up his local real estate through marriage to the daughter of John Harneys and granddaughter of John de Whatefeld, and served several terms as bailiff between 1349 and 1370 (he will reappear later in the story).
- William de Causton draper, the occupation being given to distinguish him from other residents of the same name; one of them was coroner of Ipswich from 1328 to 1341.

John de Preston was the principal beneficiary of the group, however. He upheld the interests of his faction by serving as chamberlain in 1322/23, coroner the following year and bailiff the next; in all he served 12 terms as bailiff between 1324 and 1352 and 14 as coroner 1323 and 1356, with the 1340s representing the peak of his power when he often improperly held both posts simultaneously. He features little in local affairs prior to 1321, although already a merchant and property-holder. Thereafter he gained not only more political prominence, but more commercial prominence, judging from the fact that he won a post as customs collector in 1323 and remained in that service for most of the period to 1351 (mainly excepting when customs posts at Ipswich were given by the king to non-local men). He also represented Ipswich at eight or nine parliaments, as well as Suffolk at a mercantile assembly in 1338. His son Robert was one of the leading townsmen of the next generation.

While John de Preston came from a family not noticeable in Ipswich before him, Halteby's other close associate, Geoffrey Costyn, came from a family well in evidence, though not prominent, in thirteenth-century Ipswich. A William Costyn was by mid-century a tenant of property owned by the Priory of Holy Trinity; in 1263 he was one of a long list of Ipswich men accused of killing Roger le Chapelman and his son, while two years later William's sons John and Walter were themselves pardoned for a different homicide. That John Costyn may have been the same man who on two occasions in 1292 was partner with Thomas Stace in business ventures. Geoffrey was the son of a John Costyn. Although not politically active prior to his participation in the reform movement, the previous decade had seen him engaging in various property transactions – some of the property in hamlets surrounding the town – so he must have been a man of some means, yet his assessment in the 1327 national taxation was below the average. There is no clue as to what his occupation may have been, except that he presumably had sufficient education to serve as town clerk in 1320/21; perhaps he earned his living from property-holding and/or administration – not long after his death he was described as having the status of a yeoman of the earl of Suffolk. In September 1322 he and John de Halteby were jointly suing an outsider, John de Manitre, for render of account for the period when he was the collector of their money; but the source of such revenues is not specified. After turning over the clerkship to William de Kenebroke, Geoffrey went on to four terms as bailiff of Ipswich, the first in 1326/27 and the last in 1332/33, and represented the borough at four parliaments in the same period. Although briefly a customs collector (1328-29) there is no indication he was personally active in commerce. Like Preston, he seems to have been a beneficiary of the overthrow of the old regime in 1321.

In stark contrast to Preston's almost monopolistic tenure of office, John de Halteby never held one of the leading borough offices, although he may have been among the portmen by the late 1330s, if not before; perhaps he lacked the political inclination or the proper socio-economic status, but more likely he had other fish to fry and preferred to direct from behind the scenes. The impression from the fragments we see of his career is that he was a man who preferred coercion to consensus. The records speak, in turns, of John de Halteby and John son of Richard de Halteby; despite the fact that the latter form is often used to distinguish a man from another of the same Christian and family name, in this case (except for one very uncertain occurrence) the two names do not appear in the same record, and other evidence suggests they were one and the same person. The Halteby family had been in evidence in Ipswich from the 1250s, although we first hear of Richard de Halteby only in 1280, when involved in a legal battle with Wymarc de Halteby over a tenement. Possibly it was a dispute related to inheritance, as after Wymarc's death we hear that he had inherited a share in the property of Gilbert de Halteby; at that time (1303) Gilbert's sons Richard, Roger, and Christopher and his daughter Agnes, along with Richard's wife Mable and their sons William and Thomas, were being sued by Richard's niece Agnes, daughter of Thomas de Haltebe (a man who appears briefly in the records, in the role of attorney, in 1280).

The Halteby family was not one of the more prominent of the town, and not among the newcomers starting to gain a foothold of influence in local affairs towards the close of the thirteenth century. In the national taxation of 1283, Richard de Halteby was the only member of the family to be assessed, and the valuation of his moveables at £3.6s.8d was well below that of the leading townsmen of that time. His assessment was based on a stock of malt and timber and on household goods; inadequate though the assessment is as a guide to wealth or occupation, his does not give the impression of either mercantile activity or extensive holding of agricultural land, which can be inferred for some of the others assessed – Thomas le Rente, his days of power still well ahead of him, had an even smaller assessment and that of his father John was also modest, but both included boats among their goods assessed. On the other hand, Richard was by 1300 in a position to afford a pilgrimage to the tomb of St. Edmund of Pontigny, although he may never have completed it, since he was the victim of an assault outside Calais. Perhaps the Halteby family migrated to Ipswich in the third quarter of the thirteenth century, whether from Holtby in Yorkshire or another village of similar name now disappeared, cannot be said; no-one of the surname is listed at Ipswich in the record of the national taxation of 1228, but we cannot read too much into this. More significantly, no Halteby is listed in the national tax imposed in the first year of Edward III's reign, although 210 Ipswich residents are named; this conspicuous absence seems suspicious. Richard's brother Roger appears frequently as a witness to deeds registered in the borough court during Edward II's reign – a role that was often undertaken by portmen. By contrast, their brother Christopher was one of the town sergeants from 1294 to 1305 – a post that required more brawn than brain and was beneath the dignity of leading townsmen. Christopher's name was linked with that of Agnes Costyn in a rental of the Holy Trinity priory, ca.1283, though whether this implies a relationship or merely co-tenancy is unknown. A further hint at some link, whether blood or marriage, between the Halteby and Costyn families is that one member of the Halteby family, who became a freeman at Ipswich in 1331, bore the uncommon Christian name of Constantine, from which "Costyn" likely derives.

Although attributable partly to the preoccupations of those records that survive to us, the earliest references to John de Halteby do not paint an appealing picture. The first we hear of the name is in 1289 when being sued for debt by Philip Harneys and when suing Richard de Halteby for debt, and again in 1290 when sued for some unspecified trespass by John le Coteler. It is conceivable this might have been a John de Halteby of an earlier generation, but not impossible it was the son of Richard having just reached his age of majority (which would suggest a birth-date of ca.1275). At about the same date, Christopher de Halteby, perhaps already in the post of sergeant, was acting with two of the more prominent townsmen to prosecute a man accused of customs evasion. During the first two decades of the fourteenth century, John de Halteby appears on a number of occasions acting as an attorney, essoining agent, or pledge suggesting that this may have been part of the way he made a living.

Another form of his association with the borough authorities was through their organized aggression against those who defied their jurisdictional claims. He was a named member of the group headed by Thomas Stace and other leading townsmen in 1312 who attacked the property of Christine de Muse, and also – along with his father Richard and his servant Miles – a participant in the bailiff-led force against whom the Bishop of Norwich complained in 1315 (see above). In March 1317 he was the first-named in a group, which also included Geoffrey Stace, accused by miller Roger Bille of having assaulted him at Bramford, a village just west of Ipswich; that this was a similar act of jurisdictional challenge or competitive intimidation is seen from the fact that, a few days after Bille's complaint, his master Thomas de Veer reiterated the charge and added that the accused had prevented his tenants from grinding their grain at his mill in Bramford. The next such charge brought against Halteby came the following year, when he appears to have led a group composed mostly of non-Ipswich men (except for a junior member of the prominent Haraud family) in an attack on the property of Thomas son of Bartholomew de Shaldeford at Rewenhale, Essex, resulting in the theft of timber and legal documents; the investigation seems not to have made much headway, for it was renewed in August 1319 after the death of one of the royal commissioners. Thomas was a minor in the custody of John de Gippewic, who had a connection with Ipswich (other than his surname) since he was its representative to three parliaments between 1324 and 1334, but otherwise features little in town affairs. Gippewic had further cause for complaint when a group, probably led by Thomas' uncle Ralph, abducted the boy from Ipswich in 1318 – although a separate commission of investigation was appointed only days after that set up to look into Halteby's attack on Rewenhale, the second commission was also charged with investigating an attack on Rewenhale, so there may be a connection between the events.

John de Halteby was thus experienced in violence and intimidation when he led the raid on Thomas le Rente's house in early 1321. He was similarly well-qualified to lead the continuing and seemingly back-and-forth struggle between the factions, of which we see glimpses. Thomas Stace's son John was killed in the suburbs in or before August 1321, by persons unknown. Halteby and Geoffrey Costyn found it advisable to acquire, in March 1322, royal letters of protection. In April 1323, Costyn was warned by Thomas Stace, Gilbert Robert and other probi homines to appear in the town court to answer for an offence against the community (breaking a sequestration), and when he failed to show, the summons was repeated under threat of disfranchisement. The following month a series of charges was brought, in the name of the community, against various townsmen:

- John le Man senior was accused of selling beef of bad quality in the market;
- John Irp, William le Fevre and John de Leyham were accused of offences contrary to their freeman's oath – possibly market offences were intended – le Fevre failing to appear to answer the charge, but Leyham throwing himself on the mercy of the court;
- Richard Robert, more specifically accused of forestalling, making mercantile deals in private places, and committing some offence related to aulnage, refused to come and answer the charges and was disfranchised (this did not put an end to him, but in 1326 he was again in trouble with the court);
- perhaps prompted by Robert's fate, Geoffrey Stace threw himself on the mercy of the court for the unspecified trespasses and falsehoods of which he was accused, and he was fined £10, of which half was remitted conditional on future good behaviour.
- William de Causton followed Stace's example in June, offering a £10 fine, of which he later paid 66s.8d and the rest was forgiven him by the bailiffs and community.

In October there was a further prosecution along these lines: John de Whatefeld, Gilbert Robert, Richard Robert, John Blount, and William le Fevre were accused of infringing the "laws and constitution" of the town by buying in a private place – the house of William Malyn – rather than in a public place, as custom required, a ship's cargo of oats. The accused (except for Blunt, who was a no-show) denied the charge, but an inquisition concluded that a cargo of oats had been sold elsewhere than at portside, although it did not name the culprits.

Possibly all this was an effort to follow up on the recent reforms, or perhaps the factions were trying to flex their muscles, to bring opponents in line – several of the accused were among the group that obtained a royal protection in October 1320 (see above). Irp, le Fevre, and Leyham were all merchants and all would later serve at least one term as bailiff. Costyn's inclusion may indicate that the old regime was still trying to fight back; although it is possible that the Costyn-Halteby alliance stood on shaky ground, as the former was suing the latter in March 1322, and we do not know whether Costyn's removal from the office of town clerk was at his own volition.

If the aim was to cow opponents of the reforms, then any success was only temporary. In 1324 the contest was renewed. The king appointed a commission on July 12 to investigate the complaint by "various persons" that bailiffs Gilbert de Burgh and Edmund de Castleacre, coroners John Baude and John de Preston, John de Halteby (named immediately after the officials), 17 named others (Costyn's name being conspicuously absent), and additional unnamed members of the Ipswich community

"presuming upon the liberties and immunities granted to them by the king's progenitors, have made unlawful confederacies and conspiracies by oaths and other means to maintain and defend one another in all plaints, exactions and demands, and under colour of this have put divers injuries and oppressions upon other men of the said town, who refused to join them, and upon merchants and others frequenting there, causing them under pretext of feigned larcenies, robberies and homicides to be indicted and imprisoned, some innocent persons to be convicted thereof, and some notorious malefactors to be acquitted; assessing tallages and exactions upon the said merchants and men as though in the king's name and levying the same to their own use, and concealing felonies, robberies and homicides."

[Calendar of Patent Rolls 1324-27, p.65]

accusations typically levelled against a communal uprising or abuses of local government in order to capture the attention of the king and oblige an investigation, with the hope that the complainants could turn an inquisition to their advantage. On the other hand, some corroboration comes from a complaint that same year, but apparently relating to events of 1323, by John Fairher a burgess of Berwick-on-Tweed (then in Scottish hands), who had under safe-conduct brought a cargo of salmon, deer skins, and tallow to Ipswich. After he sold £12 worth of salmon to John le Keu and Simon Shakelok, they refused to pay, instead threatening him with violence if he pursued his demand for payment. Having proceeded to sell the rest of his cargo and buy grain to take back to Berwick, Fairher found his ship arrested by bailiff Edmund de Castleacre and customs collector Henry le Rotoun; and at the collusion of Castleacre, le Rotoun, le Keu, Shakelok, John le Blount, Thomas de Westhale, John de Melford and others not named, frivolous charges were brought against Fairher in the borough court. That group, together with others including John Irp, John Robert, John and Thomas le Maister, Henry Stace and Miles le Fevre, then divided the return cargo amongst themselves. Upon an earlier complaint the king had ordered the bailiffs to return Fairher's ship and grain and pay him £12 in damages, but they had done nothing. Whatever the truth of the accusations made in July, they at least reflect that factionalism was still lively, that the reformers were continuing to try to suppress opposition through the courts, and that a change in administrative personnel may have not made great changes in the quality of administration.

The impression of continued factionalism is reinforced by a second complaint, leading to a further investigative commission being appointed on 29 August. Again the complainants are not identified, the king is merely 'acting upon information', but a badly damaged petition to the king points to Edmund de Castleacre. The accusation is that Philip Harneys, his brother John and his servant Hugh, Thomas Stace, Geoffrey Stace and his brother Henry, Thomas Leu, John de Grymmesby, Thomas le Maister, Laurence le Clerk (a town sergeant in 1319/20), Simon Shakelok, and others had made a conspiracy, forced yet others through illegal oaths to maintain and defend them in all complaints, and had assaulted bailiffs Castleacre and Burgh, along with John de Halteby constable of the peace at Ipswich, during the execution of their official duties. The officials had taken refuge in the house of John de Preston, where their enemies besieged them and eventually succeeded in breaking down the door, entering and beating those persons along with others who were there in their support. Furthermore, through continued intimidation they were preventing the officials from carrying out their duties. The outcome of these investigations is not known, but on 19 November 1324 Henry Stace, having been convicted before the King's Bench of killing his fellow townsman John Christopher, was hanged at Marshalsea prison in London.

The reference to Halteby as constable of the peace is very interesting. The post is not at any other time documented in medieval Ipswich officialdom, with the exception of 1338 when the holder John Irp was in trouble for obstructing the earl of Northampton in impressing Ipswich ships into royal service. Perhaps it was a position specifically created to give Halteby enforcement powers to further his efforts to control the town. During the following ballival term (1324/25) we find him receiving estreats (fines imposed by the courts), which may indicate continuation in the constableness. It was suggested above that Halteby may have been acting, in part at least, as an agent of Despenser interests. We cannot be certain, but Halteby is found involved in suspicious circumstances. In March 1325 he acknowledged in Chancery a debt of £100 to John de Carleford, and at the same time he, Carleford, and Gilbert de Carleford the parson of Rochford, Essex acknowledged a debt of 100 marks to Hugh le Despenser junior. In an equally surprising association, at the close of Edward II's reign we find John de Halteby in the office of undersheriff of Suffolk and John de Preston in the office of constable of Norwich castle and keeper of the county gaol there. The Mortimer regime sent, in March 1328, an order to the sheriff of Norfolk and Suffolk to remove the pair from the posts, on the grounds that they were not suitable holders and had been improperly appointed, and for the reason that the pair had been accused of the death of mag. Geoffrey de Horewode, parson of Bramford. In February 1330, John Rodlond junior, an Ipswich man, was pardoned for that homicide and released from Marshalsea, on the grounds of self-defence.

Moreover, Halteby was implicated in the misguided plot of Edmund, Earl of Kent in 1329 to rescue his older half-brother Edward II, whom he believed still to be alive, and restore him to the throne. An undated (ca.1330) and only partly legible petition, mentioned above for its reference to le Rente's debt to Despenser, tied Halteby in with some conspiracy by Sir William de Cleydon, John de Cleydon, Bennet de Braham and others unnamed, associating the names of Mortimer and Kent. The petitioner is not identified; but, since the document links two unrelated offences by Halteby, it must have been made by one or more persons hoping to bring him down. A second petition [PRO SC8/172/8555] of about the same time was put forward by William de Melton, Archbishop of York (1316-40), whose career had owed much to Edward II's favour and who was replaced as Treasurer when Edward III was put on the throne. Melton was among those fingered by the Earl of Kent as willing to support his plot. Following Kent's execution in March 1330, Melton was naturally at pains to dissociate himself and, despite having snubbed Edward III's coronation, he was able at his trial to convince the authorities of his innocence. His petition to the Chancellor blamed John de Halteby and Martin Loue for trying to persuade him, at a meeting at Eye in Suffolk, to join Kent's plot. It may also be noted that Gilbert de Burgh of Ipswich was another implicated in that plot and his lands were seized, although in December 1330 the king decided Burgh was innocent and ordered the escheator to restore the lands. Burgh, who like Preston and Halteby had earlier held a county office – in this case that of sub-escheator in Essex – had been a member of the group that Halteby led in 1317 in the assault on Roger Bille. Another link between Burgh and Halteby was that both were included in a set of general pardons issued on 25 April 1327 (in the context of a much larger number of pardons issued in the weeks following Edward III's accession); other Ipswich men were included in that set of pardons: Thomas de Westhale, Thomas de Holebrok and Richard de Holebrok (a Robert de Holebrok having been one of the participants in the raid on le Rente's house in 1321).

Those with whom Halteby was associated in the conspiracies were not Ipswich men. Martin Loue hailed from Westhall in Suffolk; in 1319 he was among a group of men accused of breaking into the Bacons' windmill at Westhall. Bennet de Braham was among 40 persons pardoned, in February 1327, for holding Caerphilly castle – one of the last refuges of Edward II and Hugh le Despenser junior (it being part of the inheritance of Hugh's wife, Eleanor de Clare) – against Mortimer and Queen Isabella; the son of Hugh le Despenser junior was also pardoned in association with the Caerphilly garrison, and the name of Horewode is also found among the defenders. Earlier in that same month, Bennet was described as "of Braham" (possibly referring to Brantham, Suffolk) when he, his wife and brother, Sir William de Braham, and 76 named others were accused by Richard de Holebrok of assaulting him at Tattingstone, Suffolk, binding him to a tree and cutting off his right hand. Braham and Holebrok, the latter of whom had been imprisoned at Newgate in 1321 for the death of Walter de Clist but obtained a pardon in June on the grounds of self-defence, had something of a history: in 1323 Braham was commissioned by the king to arrest Holebrok, and Holebrok had been another of the defenders of Caerphilly castle pardoned in 1327. Among the group associated with the Brahams in the mutilation of Holebrok were William de Cleydon and his brother John, the Thomas de Shaldeford against whom Halteby had acted (see above), and several Ipswich men, including Thomas Leu, Richard de Leyham (elected bailiff later in 1327, brother of the John de Leyham targeted by the reformers), Geoffrey Costyn, William Harneys senior and William Harneys junior, and John Pecke. The Cleydons had landed interests in the Ipswich area, and John de Cleydon held property in town, but the family was not centrally involved in Ipswich affairs.

It appears then that Halteby was somewhat involved in the political machinations going on during the 1320s on the national scene, though whether he was directly affiliated with any lord, or simply gave his allegiance as it suited his own interests in terms of local domination, cannot be said. He seems to have emerged from the troubled times unscathed, however. During the 1330s he came far less to the attention of national authorities. There were troubles at Ipswich in autumn 1335 when, while the king was busy up in Scotland, a band of armed men terrorized the town and surrounding countryside; arriving in four ships, they seized control of the port for several weeks, along with other ships there that had been fitted out for naval service, waylaid local and visiting merchants coming by land and sea, prevented the collection of customs, and interfered with fishermen, not stopping short of murder and arson. But the troublemakers all seem to have been outsiders, and Halteby's name is not mentioned. The trouble may have been associated with deserting soldiers or sailors, or perhaps was one episode in Ipswich's competition with Harwich to win jurisdiction over the stretch of the Orwell between the two. Ipswich's liberties were seized by the king in 1338, but we do not know for what offence. It may have had something to do with a further disturbance around this time, when Sir Thomas de Holebrok led an armed force in an assault on the king's justices of the peace in Suffolk, while holding a session at Ipswich, in order to rescue some who had been arrested for rebellion. In February 1339 the king appointed a commission to enquire whether named men had been participants; these included Thomas Leu, John Harneys, and John Robert, but again Halteby's name is not in evidence. This affair may give significance to an elaboration of the freeman's oath at Ipswich ca.1340, to which was added the requirement that new freemen "shall be obedient to their bailiffs then in office and shall not involve themselves in any protests or confederacies by which the community of the town shall be disturbed." [Great Court Roll, 13-14 Ed.III, m.4r, Suffolk Record Office, Ipswich records, C5/6]

Halteby is mainly visible during the 1330s through his acquisitions of property in Ipswich – an indication of growing wealth and consolidation of his influence. That influence is also reflected in the increasing frequency of his role in court as a reliable witness of property transactions – in fact by the end of the decade he is usually named immediately after the bailiffs in such witness lists, and this indication of his seniority continued up until his death. On the other hand, Halteby had not abandoned his old ways. In 1331 and 1332 there were made in Chancery a series of acknowledgements of large debts owed to Halteby: £20 by William Michel, the parson of Woburn (Buckinghamshire), £120 by Essex men Robert son of Richard de Rivers of East Mersea and Luke son of Henry Lucas of Shalford, and separate recognizances of £26.13s.4d and £40 by the Suffolk knight Sir John Dagworth. We do not know what these were for, but they look suspicious, particularly considering that Halteby shows no sign of mercantile activity or of land-holding that far afield, which might provide reasons for such large debts; as late as 1341 Halteby was seeking repayment of his loans to Dagworth, who had died in 1332. More telling is that in June 1336 an investigative commission was appointed on the complaint that John de Halteby, along with Constantine de Halteby and Ipswich chaplain Albred de Cleye, had broken into the Debenham property of the archdeacon of Suffolk, assaulted his steward, and carried off his goods. Earlier that year, a royal commission had been set up to look into smuggling off the stretch of Suffolk coast between Ipswich and Yarmouth, and in 1337 the investigation was expanded to cover Norfolk and Suffolk as a whole; there is no reason to think Halteby was involved, but this was a harbinger of the final phase of his story.

Another early warning sign was the murder of Geoffrey Costyn. One of Costyn's comrades-in-arms during the revolt against the Stace/le Rente administration was John Baude senior (the surname a patronymic, his father being Baldwin de Ballyol), who served the reform administration as a coroner in 1323/24. He and Costyn may even have been residential neighbours, if their adjacent listing in the 1327 subsidy assessment is a reliable guide. In 1325 a John Baude junior and his wife sued Geoffrey Costyn, his boy-servant, his maid, a chaplain, and Richard dil Market and wife for dispossessing him of a tenement in Ipswich; a jury found in his favour. A little later that year John Baude senior (under his alias of John de Ballyol) was sued for dispossessing Albreda, the daughter of William de Ponte of a property she had inherited from her father; John secured the case's dismissal on a technicality. In November 1331, Costyn – acting on his own behalf and apparently that of neighbours – obtained a writ against John Baude senior, on the complaint that the latter had, contrary to borough custom, on a flat piece of land called Michelheles Down, built up a mound 20 feet high and erected a windmill atop it; this was a nuisance in terms of having damaged a dividing wall, blocking the sunlight, causing flooding, and being noisy. Baude having failed to appear in court to present a defence, a jury was put together to view the land and come to a conclusion; which was that Baude had illegally erected the mill and that it had caused damage to Costyn's property. Baude had to pull down the mill and pay Costyn £10 in damages. This must have caused some bad blood, and been brought back to mind in April 1338, when Geoffrey Costyn and William Malyn junior stood as pledges for the widow of Richard dil Market in suing Roger and Baldwin, sons of John Baude, for dispossessing her of a share of a property in the suburbs. It may be more than coincidence therefore that, after Geoffrey Costyn was found dead in the suburbs on November 8, 1338, the coroner's inquest found that the previous night Geoffrey and Roger, the son of John Baude senior, had emerged from a tavern together; Roger proposing to walk Geoffrey back to his lodgings, an argument had broken out en route and Roger had pulled a dagger and stabbed Geoffrey.

The case is that much more the curious because Roger had already been convicted of a homicide. On the night of 25 January 1337, he had got into an argument with Albreda, the wife of William Malyn senior and cut off her hand with his sword; Albreda had languished until September when she died, and Roger went into hiding to avoid the inevitable findings of the coroner's inquest, which also stated that he had no possessions that could be forfeited for his crime. Whether his reappearance to kill Costyn in an apparent drunken brawl was just that, or perhaps a family vendetta manifesting itself, we shall probably never know. Baude obtained a royal pardon in 1339 for killing Costyn. However, it may be noted that some doubt appears to have been cast on the findings of the Costyn inquest, as in February 1341 the king set up an investigation to re-examine the case; why or with what outcome, we know not.

Having introduced William Malyn, we must now pay that family more attention, for it becomes a key player in events. William was no newcomer to the town, nor was his family. The 1283 taxation list includes a Duce Malyn who appears moderately well off, although it is not clear if this was a man or a woman; the principal item on which he/she was assessed was wine. At about the same date this person was renting from the Holy Trinity priory a tavern formerly held by Robert Taverner and a shop formerly held by Malina de Lundres, from which we may surmise the origin of the surname. An Isabella Malyn who was a contemporary of Duce was the husband of Andrew le Taverner. So we may infer that the family was involved in the retail and probably the wholesale of drink.

There were a series of men named William Malyn and it is not easy to disentangle them. According to local historian Vincent Redstone ["The Chaucer-Malyn family, Ipswich." Proceedings of the Suffolk Institute of Archaeology, vol.12 (1906), 188], Isabella, the widow of Andrew le Taverner, in 1288 mortgaged to William Malyn the tavern once in the hands of Duce Malyn; unfortunately, I have not been able to confirm this, and Redstone's article is riddled with errors and untenable conclusions. It is a fact, however, that in 1305 a William Malyn was being sued by Isabella le Taverner, to oblige him to render account – possibly for revenues from a tavern. In 1309 he was certainly the proprietor of the Holle Tavern, rented from Holy Trinity; this does not appear to be the same one, but rather an adjacent property that Malyn acquired from the widow of Philip Harneys as an expansion of his original tavern. Philip had held it in the 1280s, and the previous tenant had been William Schoop, whose neighbours had been Malina de Lundres on one side and Robert le Taverner on the other; both the neighbouring properties being in the hands of Duce Malyn in Harneys' time. These properties were in St. Laurence parish, in Cook Row. In 1324 William Malyn leased this tavern to William de Wachesam on a commission basis (5s. per tun of wine sold), but two years later had to sue him to account for the proceeds.

This William Malyn must have been born by at least 1285, for in 1308 we hear of his wife Albreda, and their children John, William, Agnes, and Alice. He was likely even older, for he was doing well enough in his career to have built a house by 1312. That he had already established important business connections is seen in that in 1304 he was in partnership with John Thurton, when the pair were sued for debt by, or acknowledged debts to, merchants such as John de Grymmesby and John de Whatefeld, some of which were for freight charges. By the 1320s Whatefeld was probably Ipswich's wealthiest burgess, but Malyn was not so far behind: in the 1327 taxation the former had the highest assessment, while the latter's assessment was the third highest, and he was also taxed on goods in several hamlets in the vicinity of Ipswich. Both Whatefeld and Malyn were among the three greater wool merchants of Ipswich to be summoned by the king to participate in a council of 1322, held concurrently with parliament, to discuss reform of the staple organization.

The continued association of Whatefeld and Malyn was noted above, regarding Malyn having in 1323 allowed his house to be used by Whatefeld, Gilbert Robert and others for secret trading, which however was discovered by the authorities and a prosecution resulted. Whatefeld and Robert had been former business partners of Thomas le Rente and were doubtless, in the minds of the reformers, associated with that clique. Malyn on the other hand, although he had been one of the handful specifically named as participating in the raid on Christine de Muse's estate in 1312, seems not to have been directly involved in the political conflict; this may have made him acceptable, among the candidates from the wealthy upper crust of urban society, to the reformers as a choice for bailiff: his single term in office coming in 1322/23. He had a couple of run-ins, on a private level, with members of the reform faction in later years. In 1331 he came to an agreement with John de Halteby, who had brought a suit of novel disseisin against him, in regard to rent he claimed was due him from Malyn's New Tavern in Cook's Row; Halteby emerged triumphant, and in the following year is seen expanding his holdings in Cook's Row. In January 1336, Malyn and his wife Albreda together sued Roger the son of John Baude for some trespass committed against them. This may have been part of the explanation why, one year later, an argument between Roger and Albreda led to the latter's death. Malyn's last real appearance was in May 1342, when he was being sued by John de Halteby – since the charge was "nuisance" it was likely property-related; we know that Malyn survived until 1349, however.

The son of William and Albreda, William junior, was himself a prosperous and leading citizen by this time. He is not much in evidence until the 1330s, when legal cases in which he was a party reflect his commercial activities; at some point in his career he was able to buy his own ship. He was important enough to be elected bailiff in 1338, and after the end of that term leased the corn market from the borough authorities for a year, to see if he could make some profit there. During the 1340s he was probably one of the portmen, and he represented his borough in parliament in 1348, but held no more ballivalties in that decade. Having been convicted for his participation on a piratic attack on a Flemish ship (1340), he earned a royal pardon in July 1342 after equipping his ship for naval service for a two-month stint.

Not long after he was in even more serious trouble. Not long before May 1344 he was convicted of smuggling wool and other crimes. It appears that this was on evidence gathered by John de Halteby and Geoffrey Stace. In March 1343, Halteby and Stace, along with the king's serjeant-at-arms Ralph de Lillebrok, had been ordered to hurry to Chancery to receive instructions from the king and his council. In the light of what followed, we may suspect that they were being used as agents to inform on, if not infiltrate and bust, a smuggling ring. The general investigation of smuggling in that region a few years earlier has already been noted, and it may be significant that in July 1343 customs collection in the Ipswich region was taken out of the hands of Ipswich men and turned over to the Yarmouth collectors, a situation not reversed until the summer of 1345.

The East Anglian investigation of 1336-37 was itself part of a larger review of the integrity of the customs service, whose principal officers – the customs collectors – received no salary and must have sought other benefit from the posts. The first loyalty of such men was to themselves, the second to their relatives, friends and business associates in the community, and concern for the king's interests ranked only after this. Improper conduct on the part of local customs collectors had been suspected for some time – Thomas le Rente being one of the few victims of the early round of investigations. During the reign of Edward II there began to be appointed in some ports a new officer, the controller; this was a (poorly) salaried official whose duty was to compile a duplicate customs account, as a check on the honesty of the collectors – the introduction of chamberlains in borough government, reflects a similar effort to have a second set of eyes overlooking financial administration. There was no controller at Ipswich until early 1327, when John Irp was given the post. However, collectors Gilbert Robert and John de Preston obstructed his assumption of office, and he had probably only just begun to undertake his duties when the king instituted a general investigation of the performance of controllers, which in June 1331 declared Irp absolved of any suspicion of misconduct or negligence; he continued to hold the post until at least 1343. Based on what appear to be abnormally low wool exports being reported from Ipswich between 1322 and 1331, Robert Baker [op.cit., 21] suspected that Preston and Robert were guilty of embezzlement, which could explain why they wanted no controller. Yet the controller could not be effective if he acted in collusion with corrupt collectors, as was the case at Boston and Hull in 1327. As a merchant himself, Irp would have been exposed to the same temptation as the collectors, his fellow merchants, to doctor customs records for personal benefit. We have no proof that he succumbed; but he cannot be above suspicion, given the market offences with which he was charged at the time of the political struggle in the early 1320s, and his conviction for participating in a piratic attack on a Flemish ship in 1340.

After Edward III assumed personal control of national government in 1331 he instituted reforms in the customs service. His underlying interest was to optimize the customs revenues, which were among those on which he relied to finance his military campaigns, and it was this factor that drove investigations of malpractices or smuggling. Between 1338 and 1343 the same self-interest led him to obtain taxations payable in wool, and then restrict exports to his own wool; or, when private exports were licensed, to impose additional duties. In this environment, it is not surprising that some merchants felt encouraged to smuggle, and that the royal government put more effort into policing. In 1340, Edward was forced to make a truce with France because he had not the money to continue making war; furious, upon returning to England he set in motion a reform of the customs service. John de Preston was one of many replaced (1341) in the overhaul, although Irp managed to buck the trend and remain in the controllership. The increasingly impecunious king seems prepared to take any steps to bring in revenue, and the use of Stace and Halteby to inform on smuggling at Ipswich must be seen in that context.

To return to our main narrative, on 6 February 1344, Halteby, Stace, and Roger de Shribbe obtained general pardons covering the reigns of Edward II and Edward III. On 13 February the king sealed, seemingly with some urgency, pardons for all felonies and trespasses on behalf of Stace, Halteby, Shribbe, and William de Porklee clerk; these were perhaps to exculpate them either from acts which as spies they may have committed in connection with the smuggling ring, or from illegal acts committed in the process of gathering evidence. Rather than face trial, Malyn went into hiding, and was outlawed. On May 6, the king again made use of Halteby and Stace, this time to seize on his behalf, in the presence of the town bailiffs, the real estate and moveables Malyn had held on the day of his conviction, and to assemble a jury to assess the values of those properties, which they did on May 10.

At the risk of another digression, Halteby's association with the son of the man he had overthrown some twenty years earlier need not seem so strange. The passage of time was sufficient to replace old alliances with new ones, and both Geoffrey Stace and John de Halteby were older – they were probably fairly close in age, and may even have been companions in mischief in older days (the event of 1317 mentioned above being slim evidence, however). They pursued their best interests; already by 1340 they had recognized a mutuality of interest, or of style, and were acting together to sue William Maynard regarding some real estate contract. Halteby's interest was perhaps the same as it had ever been: to make trouble in order to assert himself and dominate, and his intimidation activities during the '30s and early '40s – effected partly through the legal system – seem to have had the goal of increasing his property holdings.

Stace's interests are less easy to pinpoint. He had not suffered long from his father's disgrace, having served as bailiff (along with Costyn) in 1326/27, and again in 1333/34 and 1341/42; he was probably one of the portmen by the 1340s. He was also briefly employed in the customs service, in 1328-29, again with Costyn his associate. Like Costyn, however, he does not appear to have been active in commerce, and perhaps lived off real estate and administrative services. By 1327 he had married Agnes the widow of Walter de Westhale; this Agnes was the daughter of Andrew le Taverner and Isabella Malyn, and through that related to the Chaucer family which in a later generation produced the famous poet. Since 1324 Agnes had been in a legal battle with Margaret (or Mary) the widow of Robert le Chaucer, Agnes' brother, over inheritance rights to property. In 1326, Margaret and her new husband, Richard le Chaucer of London, had successfully prosecuted Agnes de Westhale, Geoffrey Stace and his brother Thomas, for abducting John, the underage son and heir of Margaret and Robert le Chaucer. The abduction was for the purpose of getting control of John's inheritance; in 1329 Geoffrey and Agnes sold a house they had "acquired" from John. Geoffrey and Agnes appealed their conviction and petitioned parliament for relief from the ruinous £250 damages they had been ordered to pay, which they argued was greater than the value of John's property. After the appeal failed, at Michaelmas 1329, they were imprisoned in Marshalsea and not released until December 1330, only after paying the damages to John. More of Agnes' property, this time her dower from the Westhale marriage, was sold off in 1332. How long after this Agnes survived is not known, but by March 1342 Geoffrey Stace had remarried, this time the widow of Geoffrey Costyn, another woman of property and possibly an Irp by birth. He may have continued to bear a grudge against the Malyns in association with his previous marriage or his ambition to sell off his Malyn wife's property, or perhaps he thought it to his advantage in some way to bring about the fall of William Malyn junior.

Halteby, however, had overreached himself on this occasion. He had succeeded in building, over a long lifetime of bully-boy behaviour, a good deal of unpopularity. His action against William Malyn and other members of the smuggling ring quickly provoked a backlash, in the form of public ridicule of the spring judicial proceedings after their conclusion, and subsequently a plot against Halteby himself. In July 1344, Stace and Halteby obtained royal letters of protection in view of threats made them by their enemies, because of the evidence they had given to the judges who tried the Malyn case; perhaps Halteby had seen trouble building, for he had drawn up a brief will in January 1344, but this could be coincidence – he was after all a man of advanced years by now.

Some of the threats may have come from Malyn himself, who, having on June 22 purchased a general pardon which covered homicides, had paid a further fine of £200 – representing about a quarter of the assessed value of his moveables – to obtain a more specific pardon on June 25: for embezzling the king's wool and money (this probably relates to his stint as king's commissioner to supervise and enforce the collection of a wool-tax in Suffolk, in 1342), smuggling wool, trading in Scotland, and removing his ship from royal service off the coast of Brittany without the king's permission. William de Kenebroke appears to have been accused before the same judicial session as Malyn; having been town clerk through most of the 1320s and possibly the '30s too, he had served a term as bailiff (1341/42) and had been made coroner in 1343. He was convicted of embezzling a quantity of the sacks of wool he had been commissioned to receive for the king; imprisoned, he is not seen at freedom again, and was dead by mid-1346. John Cobat – either the former member of the Halteby faction or, more likely, his son, the husband of a Harneys daughter – was another convicted of several crimes: arranging for 18 sacks of wool belonging to other men to be transported, in his own cart, to Douneman's Bridge, where it was put aboard a ship and carried overseas without customs having been paid; paying a 40s. bribe to the king's officers on behalf of the master of a Berwick ship to allow it to depart from the port of Orwell without undergoing a search; and having been party to the conspiracy made at the house of William Malyn junior to smuggle various goods out of Ipswich.

As the second document above indicates, those who had been convicted on Halteby's evidence had their revenge through his murder and then took sanctuary; the act probably took place some time between 1 August, when Malyn was at large, and 20 August, when Halteby's will received probate. The community condoned the deed, and bailiffs Preston and Irp seem to have been disinclined to take action against the culprits, so friendless was Halteby – his will makes reference only to his wife. The king took a dimmer view of matters and, following the judicial enquiry in the autumn, Malyn found himself an outlaw again and his lands once more forfeited to the king. Dim enough that the borough charters were suspended and the town was put under a royal governor until about July 1345, when ballival government was restored – at the elections the following year, the community thumbed its nose at the king by re-electing Preston and Irp. Not so dim, however, that King Edward was averse to selling, in July 1346, pardons for the murder to William Malyn, his wife Emma, the widow of William de Kenebroke, and Robert le Smyth an Ipswich seaman. More general pardons were issued in September to Elias Malyn, John Malyn, and Emery Kenebroke; William and Emma Malyn likewise were able to obtain general pardons – for all homicides, felonies, robberies, trespasses, and consequent outlawries – in October. Elias, John and Emery had had to win their pardons through military service in the French war. William had similarly sought redemption, during his outlawry, by service to the king, first in Ireland from February 1345 to April 1346, then in Brittany until June; the general pardon was his reward.

Even then the vendetta between the families seems not to have run its course. For in May 1347 the widow of Roger de Halteby was suing William Malyn and his wife for dispossessing her of dower right in two shops. Meanwhile, John Harneys junior sued Constantine de Halteby, who was married to the widow of a John Harneys of a previous generation; the suit demanded Constantine account for merchandize John had passed along to him in 1343 – via third parties including John de Halteby – to sell on his behalf. Having exhausted his delaying tactics and convicted by a jury in absentia, Constantine disappeared to avoid ruin (as an agent of the king in some unknown regard, he might have headed for London, where one of John de Halteby's daughters had married into the Causton family).

It may have been around the same time that pardons were being issued that John Cobat petitioned the Chancellor, offering to pay a fine for his release from prison, claiming that his conviction on the smuggling and other charges had been the result of malice on the part of certain men, some of whom were outlaws. Perhaps he was hinting at a packed jury, or it may have been an oblique reference to Geoffrey Stace, who had not been targeted by Halteby's killers, even though he was in town during August. Stace had other worries: he was enmeshed in a lawsuit in London's husting, as a result of which he was outlawed (for non-appearance) but pardoned in November 1345 after turning himself in to the Fleet prison. In October 1347 the king granted that Cobat pay his fine and go free. He went on to become a bailiff at Ipswich in 1349, the year when Geoffrey Stace and William Malyn disappear from the records, doubtless the victims of plague.

This story of events at Ipswich in the first half of the fourteenth century is a fascinating one, but we should not look for a hero. If there were one, the scattered documents that allow us only glimpses of the full narrative would not identify him or her; their concern is principally to record wrong-doing, and they are not a solid foundation on which to assess personalities or motives, but they are almost all we have to go on. It is a cloak full of holes. By modern standards none of the principals can be much admired; but we should be hesitant in trying to point the finger at one or more villains of the piece. By their own standards, leading townsmen acted out of self-interest in a society where disregard for the law appears commonplace (although again this is a bias of the records), the national government could not effectively supervise the behaviour of those on whom it depended for local administration but instead relied on after-the-fact intervention, local government was a matter of group interest, politics a matter of harnessing popular discontent, and there was little room for ethics if you wished to avoid ending your days in poverty. What this story illustrates is not a struggle between good and evil, or even the rise and fall of a man whose prominence in urban society appears to have been achieved principally through the application of force and intimidation. It is instead a tale of the twists and turns to which all men, or women, of ambition were subject in a society where family relationships and rivalries were interwoven in complex patterns, and loyalties shifted at need.

"1321"

The regnal year is illegible in the original, but can be determined from external evidence.

"common clerk"

This was a frequent title of town clerks and meant, of course, clerk of the community.

"roughed up"

The term in the original was one usually applied to shipwrecks.

"other people"

The term in the original, "gentz", may apply to servants, family or both.

"as if soldiers"

"Com gentz de guerre" may be intended to connote the roughshod behaviour of soldiers or their plundering.

"Michaelmas term"

On 4 September 1344, the king ordered the Chief Justice, William Scot, to be at Ipswich by 6 October to try the case, bringing with him the court records of the previous session held by William de Shareshull et al., at which Malyn and others had been convicted. It was evidently after that earlier session that the townspeople had performed the mockery of the proceedings, and the murder of Halteby and popular support for his killers came later.

"bringing the felons gifts"

Their appreciation of the enormity of the homicide and their anxiety over the consequences that their act would bring is seen in that they straightaway fled to sanctuary. The duty of the community was to guard sanctuary-seekers, to ensure they could not escape before answering to justice, but here the killing of Halteby was so condoned that instead the killers were supplied with necessaries that would enable them to remain in sanctuary and with money that might allow them to buy a royal pardon.

"plea hall"

I.e. the courthouse; probably the moothall on Cornhill.

"staircase"

The term in the original, super gradus, most probably refers to a narrow external staircase leading to the upper level of the moothall, as opposed to the type of wide ceremonial steps leading to the entrance of many public buildings today. The term might also refer to a raised platform within the hall, but it seems improbable the crowd would have gone so far as to appropriate justice by using the courthouse interior; its act seems one of mockery rather than serious defiance of the law.

"William de Notton"

Another of the king's justices. The Chief Justice, William Scot, had also sat on the session, but Shareshull and Notton may have been singled out because, as justices of oyer and terminer on the Suffolk circuit, they were better known (and correspondingly disliked) by the citizenry.

"could not deny"

It was normally expected that those chosen as executive officers would not absent themselves for any extended periods from the town, but give their first priority to their official duties.

"old men"

Preston's first appearances in the records were in 1315, when acquiring property with his wife and with another merchant being sued for a debt. He was probably in his mid-50s in 1344, but he survived for over a decade more – much of which he spent as bailiff. Irp's first appearance was in 1310, as master of an Ipswich ship sent for service to the Scottish war, and he was married by 1319. He was likely about Preston's age, perhaps a little older, but did not live out his natural lifetime, being felled by plague in 1349. Irp served at least 10 ballival terms at Ipswich, represented the borough at 12 parliaments between 1323 and 1344, was coroner from 1329 to 1343. He held various posts in the customs service, notably as controller.

"elected and delegated"

This phrase provides a nice expression of the concept of the authority of the executive officers deriving from the community, although the king's acknowledgement is not a recognition of an ascending theory, since it is tempered by his previous reference to the duty of keeping the peace being passed down from the Crown to the community (implicitly, by charters granting self-government).

"pardon for Leu"

Richard Leu and Thomas Stace were in trouble again in 1326, when it was ordered they be distraigned to force them to account for counterfeit money arrested at Ipswich; this would suggest they had held the posts of searchers for coin.

"one and the same"

Richard's brother Christopher also had a son by the name of John, but he was much younger than the John son of Richard, and if a distinction were felt needed, we could expect the records to speak of "John son of Christopher" rather than

"John son of Richard"; besides, there were other reasons why a man's patronymic might be brought into play. Christopher's son only seems to appear as a teenager, in the context of quitclaiming his rights to property of his late father (1310); it is unlikely he would have attained the respect or social stature to have been able to lead a popular revolt in 1320, although admittedly John de Halteby seems to have relied on a forceful character, which could have developed quickly in a fatherless boy. However, on the whole it is my feeling that John de Halteby and John son of Richard Halteby display a oneness of character.

The task, assigned beginning in the reign of Edward I to royal officials (known, naturally enough, as aulnagers) of checking the quality and size of wholesale cloth, in particular to ensure that standard lengths (in ells) were being complied with. Like other officials, aulnagers had opportunities for malpractice of their duties, such as embezzlement of the duty imposed on cloth, determined by its length. Whether Robert's offence was associated with the office of aulnage or with evading submitting cloth to aulnage is unknown.

"17 named others"

These included men associated with the Halteby faction in 1321: John Cobat, Thomas de Westhale, Thomas Randolf, Geoffrey Pecke, John Godscalk, Peter le Jaye, William de Brome, Roger le Barker. Along with new faces, some of were coming into more importance in the town: merchant Miles le Fevre, chamberlain of the reform administration in 1322/23 and bailiff in 1332/33; William Ryingild, wool and cloth merchant, who would become bailiff in 1333 after several years in the local customs service; dyer Richard Starling, an early member of a family that would be very prominent in Ipswich in the second half of the fourteenth century.

"undersheriff"

Curiously, but probably coincidentally, a Simon Costyn was shortly afterwards in this post.

"what these were for"

Dagworth, who had lands in both Suffolk and Essex, had held the post of proclaimer of the Marshalsea and usher of the Exchequer (which gave him the right to appoint substitutes to serve as usher in eyres) throughout the reign of Edward II, and in 1322 he was in the retinue of the king and the Despencers as they campaigned in Wales against the Contrarians. He often appears in the Close Rolls during the 1320s making debt recognizances, some to merchants, and towards the end of his life was leasing out his royal post to others, perhaps a reflection of financial difficulties. Sir Richard de Rivers, on the other hand, was one of the most trusted adherents of Henry, earl of Lancaster, supporter of Mortimer and brother of one of the principal opponents of King Edward and the Despencers in 1322; Halteby's association with his son may have had less to do with politics, however, than with the fact that Robert was just in the process of obtaining possession of the estates of his late father, which lay in both the west and east of England, at exactly the same time he became indebted to Halteby. Sir Richard had himself become indebted to a John Michel of Tendring, Essex in 1329, but there may be no connection between that creditor and William Michel.

"famous poet"

Unlike Redstone, however, I see no reason to think that Geoffrey the son of John Chaucer was named after Geoffrey Stace; Stace and his wife were accused of trying to marry off the kidnapped John Chaucer to Agnes de Westhale's own daughter, but on this count were acquitted. Redstone seems to think that the abduction somehow endeared John Chaucer to Geoffrey Stace.

"Yarmouth collectors"

This change could equally have been part of the desperate attempts at this period to find some way to improve the customs service. Faith in Yarmouth townsmen might cause eyebrows to be raised, considering that they were even more unruly than those of Ipswich at this time. For example, in November 1343 an enquiry was launched into Sir Robert de Morley's complaint that 137 named men of Yarmouth attacked his ships anchored at Lowestoft and carried off their cargoes. While in June 1344 a pardon was issued to 314 Yarmouth men for the crimes that they: rode "with banner displayed" (i.e. as if at war) in Suffolk; captured men and held them for ransome; perpetrated homicides, arsons and other infringements of the peace; and supplied arms and victuals to the king's enemies. Explicitly excluded from the pardon were smuggling and the plundering of the ship la Tarite. Customs collector (and town bailiff) Thomas de Drayton was among both groups of accused.

"compile a duplicate"

This needed to be ensured by assigning to the controller one half of the seal applied to cocket letters (receipts for customs paid), so that he had to be present at all transactions; however, the central government was slipshod in ensuring that the collectors turned half of the seal over to the controller.

"royal governor"

Officially Sir John Howard, the county sheriff, although he appointed Edmund Noon to act on his behalf. Howard had his own grievance against the town, for in September 1343 he had complained to the king that a group of men from Ipswich and its neighbourhood (Thomas and Walter Leu being among those named) had broken into his estate at Whitton, just northwest of the town, hunted there and felled trees and carried off their spoils.

TRANSLATION

In the name of God, Amen. On 11 June 1478, in the 18th year of the reign of King Edward IV, I Lady Agnes Say, widow, being of sound mind, make and set out this my testament in the following manner. That is to say, first I bequeath and commend my soul to almighty God, my creator and maker, and to his blessed mother Mary the Virgin, and to all the saints, and my body to be buried within the parish church of St. Bartholomew the Less of London, near the tomb where my late husband, Sir John Fray, is now buried. I bequeath 6s.8d to the high altar of that church. I bequeath 40s. towards the church-works of that church. I bequeath 6s.8d to the high altar of the church of St. Benet Fink, London. I bequeath 20s. towards the church-works of that church of St. Benet. I bequeath 6s.8d to the high altar of the church of St. Christopher near the London stocks. I bequeath 20s. towards the church-works of that church of St. Christopher.

I bequeath £10 to a respectable priest to sing and recite for my soul, the souls of my husbands Lord Wenlock, Sir John Fray, and Sir John Say, the Gregorian trental in such a place as designated by my daughter Lady Margaret Leynham, the wife of Sir John Leynham.

I pardon and forgive my brothers, Thomas Danvers and William Danvers, of all sums of money in which they are indebted to me. On condition they discharge me and my executors of all sums of money in which I was bound, on their behalf, to anyone. I pardon and forgive Agnes Hill, Katherine Humfrey, John Childe, Thomas Wrongey, Agnes Holgill, and Margery Banastre of all sums of money in which they are indebted to me or owe me. I pardon and forgive John Dryland, my former servant, of all sums of money in which he is indebted to me. I pardon and forgive all persons who are indebted to me, if they do not have the means to pay such sums of money as they owe me, at the determination of my executors.

I bequeath to Henry Parson, to pray for my soul, a bed; that is, a mattress, 2 blankets, a coverlet, and two pairs of sheets. I bequeath and wish that John Dye have every year for as long as he lives 20s., to say special prayers for my soul. I bequeath 20s. to Robert Abell to pray for my soul. I bequeath to William Walgrave my best bed; that is, a feather bed, a bolster, a piece of fustian, 2 pairs of sheets, a coverlet, the celour and tester, and 3 curtains.

I bequeath 13s.4d to the 4 orders of friars at Cambridge, to pray for my soul; that is, 3s.4d to each order. It is my wish that, whereas I have advised Master Thomas Asheby and my daughter Lady Margaret Leynham of a matter concerning the sum of £10, if in their opinion it represents a burden on my conscience then it should be given to the church of Syon, or wherever it is best disposed out of conscience, as they think best. I bequeath a gown to each of the wife of John Priour sherman and his daughter Agnes. I bequeath to Emlyn Wellys a gown.

I instruct and require all my feofees who are enfeoffed to my use in all the lands that were Brodgore's in Wenden, in the county of Essex, that immediately following my death they transfer ownership of the same to Lady Elizabeth Walgrave, she and her direct legitimate heirs to have and to hold in perpetuity. In default of such heirs, the remainder to go to the heirs of myself, Lady Agnes Say, in perpetuity.

I give and bequeath, by this my present testament, to Constance Browne, spinster, all my lands and tenements with their appurtenances located in the alleyway called the George Alley in Secol Lane, in the parish of St. Sepulchre outside Newgate, in the suburbs of London in the ward of Faringdon Without; which I recently purchased from Henry Ive. Constance to have and to hold for her lifetime. After her death I wish those lands and tenements to remain to Lady Agnes Gate, widow. Lady Agnes to have and to hold for her lifetime, on condition that Lady Agnes pays and satisfies Constance for £100 within 2 years following my death. After the death of Lady Agnes, or if the £100 is not paid, I wish the lands and tenements to remain to Robert Browne gentleman of Oxfordshire. Robert and his direct legitimate heirs to have and hold in perpetuity. In default of such heirs, the remainder goes to the proper heirs of Lady Agnes Gate in perpetuity.

I give and bequeath to Lady Elizabeth Walgrave and Lady Margaret Leynham all my rights and the remaining term of my lease in the house in which I live at present. It is my wish that all my share in stocked goods worth £400, for which my servant Robert Galyon can account, be evenly divided into 6 parts. Of which I give and bequeath 5 parts of the same to Agnes, Katherine, and Margaret my daughters, to Richard my brother, and to the aforementioned Constance; each of them to have an equal share of the 5 parts. I wish and specify that if Constance dies while her mother, my daughter, is yet alive her mother is to have her share, on condition that Lady Agnes Gate pays and satisfied Constance the £100 already mentioned within 2 years following my death. Similar, if my daughter, the mother of Constance, dies while Constance is yet alive, then I wish Constance to have her mother's share.

I bequeath to Lady Elizabeth Walgrave a standing cup of gilded silver with a cover and a silver basin and ewer, whichever she chooses from among mine. I bequeath to Lady Margaret Leynham another standing cup of gilded silver with a cover and a silver basin and ewer, chosen from mine after Lady Elizabeth has made her choice. In addition, I wish Lady Margaret to have another cup, which was given her by her father, my late husband Sir John Fray. I bequeath to my daughter Katherine Stafford another standing cup of gilded silver with a cover and a silver basin and ewer, chosen from mine after Lady Margaret Leynham has made her choice. I bequeath to my daughter Lady Agnes Gate a standing cup of gilded silver with a cover and a silver basin and ewer, chosen from mine after Katherine Stafford has made her choice. I bequeath to Alice Tracy another of my standing cups of gilded silver with a cover, chosen from mine after Lady Agnes Gate has made her choice.

I wish that the costs and fees related to my burial and month's mind be paid honestly by my executors, without any pomp or display, or putting on any feasts or dinners, but giving food and drink and other charitable hand-outs to poor people, to pray for my soul.

The residue of all my goods, chattels, and debts [due me], whatsoever they be, after my debts are paid and the costs and fees of my burial and month's mind are expended, and my present testament is in all regards fulfilled, I give and bequeath to my executors named below. With the intent that they, using wise judgement, use the same to provide and arrange for the foundation of a perpetual chantry, with a priest singing and praying in the parish church of St. Bartholomew for my soul and for the souls of my late husbands, Lord Wenlock, Sir John Fray, and Sir John Say, for our friends and benefactors, for those for whom I am specially bound to pray, and for all Christian souls. Once that perpetual chantry has been arranged, established, and securely founded, I wish that Lady Elizabeth Walgrave and Lady Margaret Leynham dispose of all remaining unexpended goods and debts for my soul and the other souls mentioned, by distributing them in charitable works, acts of mercy, and other good deeds, as according to their best judgement they consider best pleasing to God and most profitable for my soul and the other souls mentioned. I wish my daughters to have preference, before any others, when it comes to buying any of my possessions, paying for them whatever they have been appraised at.

Of this my present testament I make and appoint as my executors my daughter Lady Elizabeth Walgrave, Henry Danvers, and John Clopton esquire. As their supervisor I make and appoint my especial good lord, William Lord Hastings, the king's chamberlain; and I bequeath to the Lord Chamberlain for his labour £20 and a pyx of gold. I bequeath £20 to each of the Lady Elizabeth and Henry Danvers for their labour, and I bequeath £6.13.4d to John Clopton for his labour.

In witness to this my present testament, I have set my seal; drawn up on the date above.

DISCUSSION

[I have divided the documents into paragraphs to make for easier reading.]

Agnes Say cannot really be considered a townswoman, but at the close of her life she was evidently living there and desired burial there, and her three principal husbands all had London interests.

Agnes was the daughter of John Danvers of Banbury, a member of the minor gentry in Oxfordshire, who represented his shire in several parliaments between 1420 and 1435, and served as the county escheator 1424-26. His own inherited properties were modest, but he was able to build up a large estate in the northern part of the county. He married first Alice, daughter and heir of a Northamptonshire gentleman, William Verney; Agnes was the result of this union, as were three sons: Thomas, Robert and Richard Danvers. Robert studied law at Lincoln's Inn and went on to serve as a lawyer to the London Corporation, first as Common Pleader (1441/42) and then as Recorder (1442-48), before becoming a Justice of Common Pleas (1450-58); after being knighted, he died in 1467. Richard also entered the legal profession, dying in 1489. Alice having died by circa 1420, John Danvers married Joan, the daughter and heir of John Bruley, another Oxfordshire man. By her he had five sons and four daughters. The sons included another Thomas, who also became a lawyer and parliamentarian, and was knighted, dying 1502; and William, yet another lawyer and parliamentarian, who would also serve as Justice of Common Pleas from 1488 until his death in 1504. When John Danvers died in 1449, his property was divided between the several sons.

Agnes had first married Thomas Baldington of Hertfordshire and Oxfordshire, in 1427. Although we hear of both a senior and a junior of that name, he was most likely the Thomas Baldington who, the heir of William Baldington esquire, was a minor in 1420, but in 1425 proved himself of the age of majority and was allowed to come into his inheritance. Perhaps the marriage was no great success, for his name is conspicuously absent from her testament and they are not known to have had any children. He died in August 1435, and in the following year Agnes remarried.

Her new husband, who was clearly to her the most significant of her four spouses, was John Fray; he too had been married before and was about 40 years old when he married Agnes. It may have been no coincidence that he, like some of Agnes' brothers and half-brothers, was a lawyer. He has been described as "a particularly striking example of the 'self-made man' whose success was achieved through a combination of talent, hard work and personal ambition" [Carole Rawcliffe, History of Parliament: The House of Commons 1386-1421, III, 124]. Much of that hard work was related to service to the Crown; between 1408 and 1457 he is known to have served on at least 59 royal commissions. Most of that work came after he had established a clientele for his legal practice in London. He was appointed to the legal staff of the city, as Common Sergeant (1421), but in that year or the next was promoted to the important office of Recorder. In 1426 he quit that office, to move into the royal bureaucracy, as a Baron of the Exchequer, becoming Chief Baron in the same year that he married Agnes. During the Exchequer tenure, which lasted to 1448, he served in various other capacities, such as Justice of the Peace in various counties, Deputy Treasurer of England, and a member of Henry VI's council. Not only did he have the gratitude of the king, which resulted in Fray being knighted prior to 1459, his legal clients included many members of the nobility. Like Baldington he had an estate in Hertfordshire; he had served as the county's parliamentary representative in 1419 and 1420; he also had lesser landed interests in several other counties, as well as in London – at some point prior to 1458 he had lived in a house called "Parker's Place" in the parish of St. Benet Fink, but he had also invested in various other houses and shops in London, which provided him with a source of annual income. Despite his service to the House of Lancaster, towards the end of his life he loaned money to support the Yorkist cause (perhaps no more than political astuteness); it was soon after recouping this from Edward IV that Fray died, in July 1461. It was thanks to Fray's influence and wealth that the daughters Agnes bore him – there being no sons – made good marriages into the gentry: Margaret to Sir John Leynham, Elizabeth to Sir Thomas Walgrave, Katherine to Sir Humphrey Stafford, and Alice to Henry Tracy esquire.

In 1467 Agnes married for a third time; her dower rights in Fray's property must have made her an attractive partner. Her choice on this occasion was Sir John Wenlock, whose own wife (a Bedfordshire heiress) of over thirty years had died in the early 1460s, without leaving any surviving children. Both Agnes and Wenlock would have been in their late 60s when they married, so there was no question of further children from this alliance. The son of a Bedfordshire gentleman, Wenlock was also active in county affairs, representing it in five parliaments between 1433 and 1455, serving a term as escheator of Bedfordshire and Buckinghamshire, and later one as sheriff of the latter county. Wenlock's seat was at Luton, in Bedfordshire, his property there coming through inheritance; in 1462 he acquired Hertfordshire property forfeited by the former Chief Justice, Sir John Fortescue. In his youth he had participated in Henry V's invasion of France, and he later entered the service of Margaret of Anjou, eventually becoming her chamberlain. His service to the Crown is also reflected in his employment as a member of some 18 embassies in the '40s and '50s. He was knighted in 1449. It appears to have been on one such embassy that he came into contact with the Duke of York and Earl of Warwick, and he became a supporter of the latter. Initially fighting on the Lancastrian side in the civil war, his relationship with Warwick led him to change sides, and it was as a Yorkist that he served as Speaker of the House of Commons in the parliament of 1455. Having successfully besieged the Tower of London for Edward of York, he was part of the latter's triumphal entry into London in 1461 and was elected a knight of the garter a few days after. Later in the year he received appointment as Chief Butler of England and was made Baron Wenlock. In 1463 he helped Lord Hastings capture Bamburgh castle. He continued to undertake diplomatic missions for Edward IV, and had command of Calais for him (possibly as deputy of Warwick). Although he did not immediately follow Warwick into the Lancastrian camp, his sympathies clearly remained with his friend, and by 1471 he too had switched sides, accompanying Margaret of Anjou back to England, only to meet his end in the Battle of Tewkesbury that same year. Agnes' association with the Browne family may have come through Fray, who had been friends with John Browne, one of Henry V's esquires of the body, or through Wenlock, who had in 1466 been a trustee of the lands of Sir Thomas Browne. The implication from the will appears to be that her daughter Agnes had been married into that family at one time.

Wenlock having died, in essence, a traitor, the marriage probably did not leave Agnes materially better off. It may have been advisable in those uncertain times for her to form another alliance, or perhaps it was just a matter of preference. At some point between September 1473 and October 1474 she married Sir John Say, another Hertfordshire man, whose seat was the manor of Hoddesdon (Broxbourne), although he also held other estates in the county. Say's parentage is uncertain, but his original name seems to have been John Fiennes. He apparently adopted Say as his surname in order to reinforce his claim to descent (via a female line) from Geoffrey, Baron de Say (d.1359). His first wife, Elizabeth Cheyne, was the daughter of a Cambridgeshire gentleman, and it was likely this family connection that led to him being chosen to represent the borough of Cambridge at parliament in 1447. Two years later he represented the shire itself, and was chosen Speaker of the House of Commons for that parliament. He represented Hertfordshire in at least five parliaments between 1453 and 1478, serving twice again as Speaker, in 1463 and 1467. Much of his energy was expended in the service of the Crown: in numerous commissions, as Justice of the Peace for Cambridgeshire (1448-58) and Hertfordshire (1454 until his death), as Chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster (1449-62, 1466-71, 1477-78), Under Treasurer of England (sporadically from 1455 until his death), and Keeper of the Great Wardrobe (1476-78). As a servant of the house of Lancaster and an associate of Lord Say, he was a target of the rebels during Cade's insurrection; and in the parliament of 1451 a request was made to banish him from the court (because of misconduct), but ignored. He transferred his loyalty to the Yorkists in 1460, and continued to find employment in royal service; one of his roles was, in conjunction with Lord Wenlock and others, to act as custodian of the forfeited estates of the Earl of Oxford. He was made a knight of the Bath in 1465, upon the occasion of Edward IV's marriage. He was able to switch loyalties back to Henry VI at the Readeption, and back again to Edward IV soon after, without apparent adverse effect on his reputation or employability.

Say died on 12 April 1478, requesting burial at Broxbourne beside his first wife, who had given him three sons, the eldest of whom married the widowed Elizabeth Walgrave, daughter of Agnes and John Fray, and produced daughters who would marry Lord Mountjoy and the Earl of Essex. Agnes was acknowledged in Say's will only insofar as he specified that she should retain the possessions she had brought into the marriage, and she was not designated one of his executors; however, these things do not necessarily reflect an unsuccessful marriage, or even constitute a snub – a woman of Agnes' age would not have been a sensible choice as executor. Say's judgement there was sound, for Agnes did not long survive him. Her testament received probate in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury on 16 July 1478, when her daughter Elizabeth was granted administration of Agnes' goods. However, Elizabeth died that same year and in May 1480 it was Robert Browne and Thomas Gate who presented the document before the mayor's court for enrolment in the above form.

Agnes was presumably buried as she requested in St. Bartholomew the Less, London, beside the husband who had meant the most to her, just as Say had sought burial beside the wife with whom he had spent the greater part of his married life. Fray's tomb still survives in that church. Agnes is further commemorated, along with two of her daughters, in the stained glass of a window at the famous Holy Trinity church in Long Melford (Suffolk), whose benefactors were the Cloptons, a family seated in the neighbourhood.

One of Agnes' executors was a leading member of the family. Agnes' associations were clearly more with the lesser nobility than with an urban community, yet in some regards she exemplifies the connections that the gentry had with urban society, particularly that of the capital.

NOTES

"trental" "month's mind"

Both terms were applied to a commemorative service held thirty days after the funeral. The term "trental" was also applied to dirges generally, and in the case of the Gregorian trental referred to 30 masses celebrated over the course of the 30 days following the funeral.

"Margery Banastre"

In 1450, London fishmonger Christopher Banastre granted all his possessions to John Fray, Robert Danvers, Richard Danvers et al.

"coverlet"

I.e. bedspread.

"bolster"

A long flat cushion placed at the head of the bed, across its width, to support the head or a pillow and to serve as a backrest when sitting up in bed.

"fustian"

A heavy-woven fabric of linen warp and cotton weft, likely used as a blanket.

"celour and tester"

Parts of the canopy over the bed. The terms seem sometimes to have been used interchangeably. Where both were used together, one likely refers to the canopy itself and the other to additional cloth hung at the head of the bed.

"church of Syon"

Syon Abbey, originally founded on the Middlesex bank of the Thames near Richmond, but soon after relocated to the site now occupied by Syon House. It became the wealthiest nunnery in England.

"Wenden"

Presumably the modern Wendens Ambo.

"pyx"

A small box.

TRANSLATION

This agreement was made at South Lynn on 29 September, 1377, between the prior and convent of the friars of the order of the Blessed Mary, Mother of God, of Mount Carmel of South Lynn, on the one hand, and Hugh de Ellingham of Lynn and his wife Cecilia, on the other. By unanimous agreement of the chapter, the prior and convent, on behalf of themselves and their successors, grant to Hugh and Cecilia for their entire lifetime a hall with a double chamber – that is, one [chamber] below and one above – and with two fireplaces and two latrines, at the end of their [i.e. the friars'] main hall next to the friars' refectory. Also, at the other end of the hall, a lower chamber for storage and another lower chamber for their food and other supplies [i.e. pantry]; with a chamber above those two lower chambers, containing a small kitchen with fireplace. [This dwelling] to be constructed, entirely at the expense of the prior and convent, at the east end of the second cloister of the friars, extending in length from the friars' communal refectory to their new infirmary; with free access in and out through a gate [leading] towards the Southoken directly opposite the chamber of Hugh and Cecilia, together with free passage on any day at appropriate hours through the middle of the cloister in order to get into the church to attend mass or other divine services. The prior and convent also grant to Hugh and Cecilia a large space for their garden, extending the length of the dwelling of Hugh and Cecilia as well as the width of the infirmary, as far as the great wall enclosing the garden on the Southsoken side. Also, access for Hugh and Cecilia's servants to fetch from the friars' fresh-water supply whenever and as often as they have need.

The prior and convent also grant to Hugh and Cecilia for life (and to whichever of them survives the other), so long as they dwell within the friary and not outside it, each week 18 conventual loaves of white bread and 6 loaves of bran bread weighing 50 shillings, and 16 gallons of the convent's best ale, to be taken from the friary bakery and brewery by their servants before anyone else may receive bread and ale therefrom. On their part, Hugh and Cecilia agree and promise faithfully that they will not (nor will anyone else on their behalf) in any way sell all or any of the bread and ale granted to them; nor will they invite in any guests other than good and honest folk for whom the prior and convent would wish to be answerable before the law. They likewise promise that they will conceal the secrets of the friary, and not divulge any so that the friary's interests are in any way threatened. [Interpolated: Hugh also promises and has given his word that after the death of Cecilia, if he happens to outlive her, he shall not take another wife.]

By this document the prior and convent obligate their house and all their goods to the faithful fulfillment of each and every of these arrangements. In witness to which indenture the seal of the community of the friars together with the seal of Hugh and Cecilia are appended. Dated [as above]. The names of the friars agreeing to [the appending of] to convent's seal to the this indenture are: the prior brother John Honygge, the reverend master brother Peter Wysbech, the baccalaureate brother William Cokesford, and brothers Edmund Barsham, William Spaldyng, Nicholas de Lenne, Thomas Lomb, Robert Swerdestone, John de Lenne, John Fransham, Robert Bilney, William Walton, Robert Walsoken, John Cole, Richard Brethenham, Stephen Worsted, John Tilney, Richard Norehale, Richard Wysbech, John Schipedham, Thomas Castre, Thomas de Lenne, William Babyngle, John Hyndringham, Peter Benet, Thomas Wyssingsete,

DISCUSSION

On the same day that the above contract was agreed to, a second but more modest corrody was granted to another townsman, Thomas Paynot and his wife Joan. They were allocated a plot of land within the friary precinct on which to build a house at their own expense. They were assigned a smaller allowance of bread (14 loaves of white) and ale (10 gallons), but were also to have two dishes of the friars' potage each day, free access to the conventual kitchen to cook their food (presumably they had no servants), and 3,000 peats a year for heating. In addition, the friars were to arrange for a chaplain to celebrate a daily mass for Thomas, Joan and their benefactors. For that last item alone, Thomas was to pay £100 in five annual instalments; the cost of the entire corrody must have been significantly greater. At the bottom end of the scale a corrody granted, in 1367, to John Winston baker, described as a servant of John de Penteney (one of Lynn's jurats) involved assignment of a bedchamber and the same meals as the friars; his payment was: £3.6s.8d; his labour in the friary bakery and brewery (in return for perks, but no wages) until prevented by extreme old age; and a testamentary bequest of all his possessions to the friary.

No terms of payment are recorded for the Ellingham corrody, but we can imagine that it must have been quite considerable, probably involving a lump sum payment or transfer of real estate, as well perhaps as assurance of a sizable bequest. He and his wife had doubtless planned out their retirement carefully. Hugh began life as Hugh de Dudlyngton, entering the franchise under that name in 1360, after having completed an apprenticeship with mercer William de Ellingham. He adopted his master's surname at some point after the mid-1360s, perhaps because of some relationship or perhaps upon becoming one of his master's heirs (William last appearing in the records in 1359): in the early 1380s Hugh is found in possession of a tenement, near St. James' church, formerly owned by William. He followed William into borough government, first as chamberlain in 1364 and later, mostly during the 1370s, as a jurat and constable. He made his living as a mercator and vintner; in 1364, for example, he took cash and cloth across to Gascony to trade for wine. The agreement in 1377 – at which point Hugh would probably only have been in his late 30s, or at most his early 40s – was not put into effect immediately, for time was needed for the house to be built and for Hugh to wrap up his affairs. This apparently took about one and a half years: he was not re-elected jurat after 1378 and in February 1379 a replacement was elected to his constabulary (on the same day Thomas Paynot was likewise replaced in the office of constable he had held), while in the lay subsidy later that year he was listed under the heading for South Lynn. He lived for several more years, but died before 1388/89, when the borough was in possession of a ferry-right he had given (bequeathed?) it. Unfortunately, his will – which might have thrown more light on the terms of his contract with the Carmelites – has not survived. However, there is no evidence he left any direct heirs (a John de Ellingham active in Lynn in the early 15th century was not necessarily related), so it may have been that the attractive terms offered by the Carmelites was on the understanding that they would inherit at least some of his property.

NOTES

"Southsoken"

The "Suthsokene" was simply another name for South Lynn, perhaps restricted to that part in which early settlement had congregated.

"conventual loaves"

A conventual loaf was one of a particular size, intended as the daily allowance of a friar (or monk).

"shillings"

The reference to "shillings" in regard to the bread refers to a unit of weight rather than value, one shilling corresponding to 12 pennyweight; with 20 pennyweight to an ounce, 50 shillings would correspond to 30 ounces.

"the friars"

Many of the names of the friars witnessing the Ellingham corrody, as of those elsewhere recorded in the cartulary, are the names of prominent families of Lynn; although this could be coincidence, based on the general immigration catchment area of Lynn, it would not be unreasonable to theorize that friaries drew many of their recruits from the local community.

Sir Thomas Erpingham, of Erpingham in Norfolk, is most famous as the commander of Henry V's archers at Agincourt. His role in Norwich's affairs was also an important one, however. A member of the local gentry who had been in service to the house of Lancaster since his youth, he was called on by the Norwich authorities on various occasions to assist them in their dealings with the king.

In 1400 for example, when he held the office of king's chamberlain, his advice was sought by the city on some matter, presumably either related to the effort to have the new king approve the existing city charters, or the wish to move beyond that towards a new constitution; whichever, he was asked to put in a good word for the city to the king. For this he was paid £13.6.8d, and when his wife came to the city she was given a gift of wine, oats, capons and swans. His further advice and influence at court, together with a large loan made to Henry IV by the city in 1402, were factors in Norwich's success in winning from the king its important charter of 1404, which brought about the desired constitutional changes, included substituting a mayor for bailiffs; certainly he received gifts of wine from the city at that time. Interestingly, a man of the same name – conceivably a relative – was given the post of mace-bearer to the city's first mayor; perhaps this was another sign of the city's gratitude.

Between 1409 and 1411 Sir Thomas was also involved – through advice, influence, and loan of money – in obtaining for the city a grant from the king of the jurisdiction over alnage of worsted cloth. In 1414 he was called on to arbitrate a very divisive constitutional crisis in Norwich and, after his return from the French war, cemented the settlement he had helped broker by using his influence (he then being steward of the king's household) to obtain a royal charter embodying the new constitution. As late as 1420/21 he was being rewarded with wine for his counsel, in this case with regard to how the city should handle a visit by the king.

Much of the rebuilding of the Dominican friary in Norwich was financed by him and his son Robert, who became a friar there. The family arms were set between each of the clerestory windows of the friary church, and may still be seen there today.

The Erpingham Gate

The gate that bears his name, one of three surviving gateways leading into the cathedral close – in this case on the route leading directly to the main entrance to the cathedral – is thought to have been built at his cost, a gift to the cathedral, ca.1420. The upper portion, surrounding the canopy within which Sir Thomas's statue is recessed, is faced with flint in Norfolk style. Below it, surrounding the Perpendicular arch, the outward face of the gateway is highly decorated with figures of saints. The buttresses at either side also bear sculptures, as well as the heraldic devices of Erpingham and the families of his two wives, and each buttress is topped by the statue of a priest. The word yenk ("think") is engraved at various places on the gateway, and is a request for viewers to remember (and say a prayer for) the donor.

The mouldings around the arch contain a series of 14 female saints in the outer moulding and 12 male saints in the inner. The pedestals of some of the figures emerge from exquisitely carved foliage.

The date of the building of the gate is not known for certain, but it must have taken place after his second marriage (1411). The style suggests the 1420s, and it seems likely the gate would have been given at a time when Erpingham's thoughts were turning to his death and afterlife – by this time he would have been in his sixties (he was born in 1357). There are stories that he built the gate as a penance for a sin he had committed – different versions suggest a homicide or support of heretics – or in gratitude for surviving Agincourt, but there is no real foundation for any of these.

Erpingham died in 1428 and was buried inside Norwich cathedral, in a tomb built in advance, alongside his two wives; a chantry was established there in his name. His testament did not forget the city in whose affairs he had always shown an interest. He left sums of money to the cathedral and the Prior and monks there, as well as to the church of St. Martin at Palace; his armour too he left to the cathedral. He also bequeathed £6.13s.4d each to the sisters and poor inmates of St. Giles' hospital, Bishopgate, and to the same of Normanspitel, and lesser sums to prisoners in the gaols of Norwich castle and the city guildhall, as well as to hermits within the city.

The construction of the gate may have been an act intended to win favour from the cathedral in which he hoped to be buried, to win favour from God, and to establish a memorial to himself. The armour in which he is depicted may have been that which was bequeathed to the cathedral. It is not impossible the gate was begun close to his death and finished posthumously by his executors, or even have been entirely a project of his executors. His testament focused on pious and charitable bequests and left the rest of his worldly goods to his executors' disposition – they may have felt the gateway a suitable application of that wealth, and certainly it has stood the test of time.

TRANSLATION

[1. The testament of Robert Hibburn]

In the name of God, Amen. I, Robert Hibburn, mayor of the town of Newcastle upon Tyne – turning my thoughts to the transitory nature of this world and to the threat of death hanging over me, given that I am sick in body but sound in mind, in which state we cannot cling to our worldly attachments but must look to our future – on 3 August 1415 at the town of Newcastle have set out my testament in the following manner. First, I bequeath my soul to God, the Blessed Mary, and all the saints, and my body to be buried in the church of All Saints of that town, before the altar of the chantry of St. John the Evangelist.

I give and bequeath to my wife Agnes the entire burgage that is my chief tenement with its appurtenances, situated in the town of Newcastle in the street called The Close, on the west side of the tenement of Robert Clyfforth, as per its established boundaries. Agnes is to have and to hold that tenement and appurtenances for the term of her life, from the chief lords of the fee by the services owed therefrom and rightfully due; with the proviso that after Agnes' death, the chief tenement and its appurtenances shall in their entirety remain to my son Thomas and his heirs and assigns in perpetuity, to be held of the chief lords of the fee by the services owed therefrom and rightfully due. I give and bequeath to my son Robert all my lands and tenements (or burgages) with appurtenances that are outside the gate of Sandgate, within the area of jurisdiction and suburbs of that town, as per their established boundaries. My son Robert and the legitimate heirs of his body are to have and to hold of the chief lords of the fee by the services owed therefrom and rightfully due. With the proviso that should it happen that Robert die without legitimate heirs of his body, then all those tenements (or burgages) outside the gate of Sandgate shall in their entirety remain to my son Thomas and his heirs and assigns in perpetuity of the chief lords of the fee by the services owed therefrom and rightfully due. I give and bequeath to my son Roger all my lands and tenements being in the town of Newcastle upon Tyne that I hold in fee from the master and friars of Wall Knoll upon the Quayside or in Pandon, as per their established boundaries. Roger and the legitimate heirs of his body are to have and to hold of the chief lords of the fee by the services owed therefrom and rightfully due. With the proviso that should Roger die without legitimate heirs of his body, then those lands and tenements with appurtenances shall in their entirety remain to my son Thomas and his heirs and assigns in perpetuity of the chief lords of the fee by the services owed therefrom and rightfully due.

I wish that all my goods and moveables, once my debts have been fully paid, be divided. So that one part go to my executors named below, to distribute for my soul, in whatever ways they consider most effective. Another part of the goods is to go to my wife Agnes, as her fair share. And the third part of the goods is to go to all my children named above, as their fair share, the said legacies notwithstanding. I give and bequeath to my daughter Margaret £26.13s.4d in cash, provided however that she follow the advice and counsel of my below-named executors, Richard Dalton, and other of her brothers, as to whom she shall marry. If the above-mentioned fair share of the goods that happens to fall to Margaret exceeds the value of £26.13s.4d, I nevertheless wish that Margaret may have her share, if she marries with the approval of the afore-named; with the proviso that under all circumstances the £26.13s.4d be counted as part of her fair share.

The residue of all my goods I give and bequeath to my wife Agnes and my son Thomas to distribute for my soul and the souls of my parents, as they would wish to answer for it before God and his saints, and I appoint, make and name Agnes and Thomas as my executors, to make provision for my soul, and Richard Dalton to be supervisor of this testament. In testimony to which, I have set my seal to this testamentary document. Witnesses: John de Hall, John de York, Richard Willysby chaplain, John Brompton, John Alnewyk, and others.

[2. The testament of John Stokdale]

In the name of God, Amen. On 6 April 1416 I, John Stokdale, brasier and burgess of the town of Newcastle upon Tyne, being of sound mind and having it in mind to go overseas for purposes of commerce, have set out my testament in the following manner. First, I commend my soul to God, the Blessed Mary, and all the saints, and my body to be buried wherever God sees fit. By this document I wish and direct that my kinsmen, John de Wermouth chaplain and William Cayster, and their heirs and assigns, peacefully enjoy tenure and possession of all my lands, tenements, rents, and services with their appurtenances that are in the towns of Newcastle and Gateshead, and elsewhere within the See of Durham, according to the terms, force and effect of certain of my charters concerning the same, previously made and delivered to them, without any challenge, claim or dispute from me or my heirs; for the purpose of fulfilling my wishes, as stated to them, concerning the lands and tenements. I wish and direct that the aforesaid John de Wermouth and William peacefully hold and possess all my goods and chattels, wherever they may be – whether on this side of the sea or overseas – as per a certain other document bearing my seal which I previously granted and delivered to them, according to the terms and effect of that other sealed document. Because there are various other goods and chattels, as well as debts, acquired by me subsequent to the issue of my said sealed document, and now in my possession, both on this side of the sea and overseas, I give and bequeath to John and William those goods, chattels and all kinds of debts owed to me from anybody whatsoever. Concerning all those goods, chattels, and whatever debts are now owed to me, by this document I make, appoint, and name John and William my executors, to make arrangements for my soul, as they would wish to answer for it before God and his saints. By this my current testament, I ratify and confirm, and for myself and my heirs approve as mentioned above, the right and possession of John de Wermouth and William in all of the aforementioned lands, tenements, rents and services, and all other goods in my possession at present or granted to them by my other sealed writing, taking into account the grants of possessions and the seisin of lands, tenements, rents and services with appurtenances, and the grant of all goods and chattels wherever they may be via my other previous document. In testimony of which I have set my seal to this testament. Witnesses: Emery Heryng, John Barker merchant, John de Moreton merchant, Robert de Wytton clerk, Robert Fletcher, and others.

[3. The testament of William Esyngton of Newcastle]

In the name of God, Amen. On 15 March 1416 I, William de Esyngton, burgess of the town of Newcastle upon Tyne have made and set out my testament in the following manner. First, I give and bequeath my soul to Almighty God, the Blessed Virgin Mary, and all the saints, and my body to be buried wherever God sees fit. I give and bequeath to the high altar of my parish church, for tithes and offerings I neglected, £20. I give and bequeath £30 to the fabric of the church of St. Nicholas in that town. I give and bequeath £3.6s.8d to the fabric of the chapel of St. John in that town. I give and bequeath 13s.4d to each order of friars mendicant. I give and bequeath 6d. to each pauper who is, due to infirmity, confined to bed within the town.

I give and bequeath to my son Nicholas and to the legitimate heirs of Nicholas' body all my lands and tenements, with all their appurtenances, revenues, produce, and easements, however defined, both within the town of Newcastle and outside it. Should it happen that my son Nicholas die without legitimate heirs of his body, then I wish that all those lands and tenements with all appurtenances, revenues, produce, and easements be sold, without any fraud or deceit, and [the proceeds] distributed for my soul and the souls of my wife Alice, our children, and all the faithful deceased, and for the souls of those to whom we owe a special and genuine debt of gratitude – through the performance of both divine services and other pious works, as my executors identified below think most beneficial and effective. I give and bequeath to my son Nicholas all my chief possessions in my chamber, hall, pantry, kitchen, brewhouse, alehouse, and stable, together with all my arms and armour, both offensive and defensive. All the remainder [of my possessions] – that is the utensils – I give and bequeath to my aforementioned son Nicholas, and my alleged sons Henry and William, to be divided equally amongst them. I give and bequeath to my alleged son Henry £40 and to William his brother £40. I give and bequeath to my son Nicholas all my jewels and ornaments for adorning both the head and the body of a woman, together with the bags in which they are kept, which my wife Alice directed should go to our daughters Elizabeth and Ellen in her last will. I give and bequeath £6.13s.4d to my sister Matilda. I give and bequeath £200 for priests to celebrate divine services for the souls of myself, my wife Alice, our children, and all the faithful deceased. As for the residue of all my goods, not otherwise bequeathed above, I give and bequeath it to my son Nicholas, to dispose of for my soul, as seems most effective to him after he has taken good advice.

So that this testament may be faithfully carried out, I make and appoint these as my executors: viz. the aforesaid Nicholas my son, dom. John de Etall chaplain, Richard Forester clerk, and William de Cornford. To which executors, for their labour in seeing the entire testament fulfilled, I give and bequeath £13.6s.8d to be divided equally amongst them, exclusive of all other expenses and costs incurred in carrying out my testament. In testimony to which, I have set my seal to this testamentary document. Witnesses: William Redmershell, John Whyt draper, John Pontfreit cordwainer, John Cosson glover, and others. Drawn up at Newcastle on the date above.

[4. The testament of Roger Thornton senior]

In the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, Amen. On 22 December 1429 I, Roger Thornton senior, have made and set out my last will and testament in the following manner. That is, I commend my soul to God's mercy and my body to be buried beside my wife in All Hallows church, Newcastle. I wish that every secular priest who attends my interment have a noble to pray for my soul and attend my dirge and coming forth. I wish that £100 be spent and distributed at my interment, at the directions of my son Roger. I give 100s. to the vicar of St. Nicholas' church for forgotten tithes. To the church of St. Nicholas for repairs and ornaments, £26.13s.4d. To All Hallows church for the like, £20. To St. John's church, 4 fathers of lead. To St. Andrew's church, 2 fathers of lead. To the chapel of St. Thomas on the Tyne bridge, 6 fathers of lead. Towards the repair of West Spital, 2 fathers of lead. To the Wall Knoll [friars] for the repair of their church, 2 fathers of lead. Towards the repair of the The Nuns of Newcastle, 2 fathers of lead. To the leper-men of Newcastle, 40s. Towards the repair of Newcastle's Tyne bridge, £66.13s.4d, if the mayor and community will agree to release me from any lawsuits – I who never caused them any problems, nor owe them anything as far as I know, but I desire this [commitment] so as to avoid any controversy. To the Maison Dieu dedicated to St. Katherine, which I founded, £20 for its ornaments. To my chantry dedicated to St. Peter in All Hallows church, £10 for its ornaments. To the chapel of Witton by the water, £4. To every almshouse dedicated to the bedridden in Newcastle, 13s.4d; which is to be part of the amount [assigned] to be spent on my interment. Towards the repair of those tenements that I have given to the aforementioned Maison Dieu and chantry, £10. I wish that 30 priests sing for me, for two years following my death; each priest having as his salary £5.6s.8d. I wish that the £266.13s.4d owed me by the prior and convent of Hexham be spent upon the building of their church, if they will put up satisfactory surety that such will be the use made of it. I give to the house of Blanchland 2 fathers of lead. To Brinkburn, 2 fathers of lead. To Coketland, 1 father of lead. Towards the repair of Farnland, 1 father of lead. To the nuns of Holystone, 1 father of lead. To each of the four mendicant orders in Newcastle, to pray for my soul, £6.13s.4d, to be divided among each friar, at the direction of my son. I wish that the hermit of Newcastle and dom. Henry Fenwyk and dom. Henry Lincoln, priests, be among the 30 priests for 2 years; after those two years, I wish the three to sing for me, each of the two secular priests receiving £5.6s.8d annually and the hermit £4. Up to £66.13s.4d is to be spent on this, if they live that long; failing that, it is to be spent for [the good of] my soul, at the direction of my son. I pardon £30 of the debt that the house of Gisburn owes me (besides the £100 that I have given them at an earlier time), on condition they find a priest to sing for me in their house in perpetuity, as we have agreed upon. I wish that my poor tenants – those who have difficulty paying [their rent] – be pardoned £66.13s.4d, at the direction of my son. I give to the convent of Yarm and the convent of Hartlepool £6.13s.4d each to pray for my soul, to be divided among them [i.e. the residents] at the direction of my son. I give 1 fother of lead towards the repair of the steeple of Durham minster. To every monk of Charterhouse at Mountgrace to pray for my soul, 6s.8d. To every monk of Tynemouth, 6s.8d. To every monk of Whitby, 6s.8d. I give 100s. to dom. Thomas Pityngton, vicar of Hartburn. To dom. John Fenwyk, £10. To dom. William Harwod, 20s. To my servant Margaret "in penny and in pennyworth", £86.13s.4d; also, for her lifetime, the house in Broad Chare in which Nicholas Baxster resides. To Roger Corbet, £4; also, for life, the almshouse of the Maison Dieu, on condition he not reside there. To my servant Hawlay, 40s. To John Gofden, 20s. To my servant Robert Hall, 40s. [pardoned] of the debt he owes me. To John Desburgh, £4 of the debt he owes me. To my former servant Thomas, 6s.8d. To Agnes Hume, 20s. To Agnes Ward, 20s. To Ellen Ward, 20s. To Marion Wan, 20s. To old Gillot, 20s. To Janet Pryddowe, 20s. To Sir Henry Lincoln, 13s.4d. To William Mawe, if he renders account honestly, 20s. To Thomas Gentyلمان, 20s. To John Tynmouthe, 20s. To Emery Heryng, 100s. To William Desburgh, 100s. To Henry Thornton, 100s. To John Wharnowe, 50s. out of his debt. To Robert Barker, 13s.4d To Thomas Skynner the skinner, 4s. To John Sharp, 15s. To John Moreton, 20s. To William Walker, 20s. To Chirnsid, 6s.8d. To John Felton, his house free [of rent] for his lifetime (he to keep it in repair) and a corrody in St. Katherine's for his lifetime. I pardon John Whelewryght 20s. of his debt. I give 13s.4d to Thomas Croxton. I wish that £40 be at the disposition of my son for the following purpose: if any poor labourer or other person claim any debt that I owe, he may use his discretion in doling the money out to pay them, to remove the burden from my soul, as he will answer to God for it. I give 100s. to Gerard Mitford. To John Robynson of Thornton, if he renders an honest account, 100s. To young John Robynson, his son, 100s. To John Brompton, 40s. To my servant Cok, 20s. To my servant George, 13s.4d. To Margery Corbet, 40s. To Margaret Dalton, 20s. To my servant Alison, 6s.8d. To Robert Killingworth, 13s.4d. All these bequests I wish my son to fulfill, as he will answer to God for it. All the remainder and residue of my goods, moveable and non-moveable, together with all my lands in which I or anyone else in my name or to my use are enfeoffed (except the lands assigned to my Maison Dieu and my chantry), I give fully, freely, and with clear title to my son Roger and to his heirs and assigns in perpetuity. To fulfill this, my last will and testament, I make and appoint that same Roger my son to be my executor, in the presence of dom. John Fenwyk, Emery Heryng, and my servant Margaret, sealed with my own hand on the day and year indicated above.

DISCUSSION

These several examples of wills of fifteenth century townsmen demonstrate some variety in tone and preoccupation. Hibburn's is formal to the point of coldness. The document was drawn up as he approached death (which took place on 31 August, and probate was completed on 27 September), his mind is focused on the succession to his real estate; while he makes the customary provision for the dower for his wife – but no more – his main concern is that his estate pass only to his legitimate male heirs, particularly the eldest. A stern, paternalistic attitude is conveyed.

Stokdale's will is precautionary: he is prudently making provision as he prepares to make a trip overseas, but only needs to do so in general terms, not with specific bequests; this is not a deathbed will where provision for one's soul becomes a motivator, but more of an insurance policy. He probably drew up similar documents when making other overseas voyages; the reason this one survives is because he did in fact die, although under what circumstances we are ignorant, probate being granted on 13 June.

Provision for the soul is demonstrated most clearly in the will of Roger Thornton, again drawn up as he was approaching death, the probate process having been initiated on 4 January 1430 (the day after he died) and completed on 19 January. It makes only a passing reference to his real estate, focusing firstly on pious bequests and funeral arrangements – his concern with the future of his soul being evidenced not only by his will, but also by the foundation earlier in his life of a hospital and a chantry – and secondly with rewards to his servants and employees, with occasional intimation of genuine gratitude, if not fondness, and a concern for their welfare after his death. His will is otherwise uncomplicated, since his wife had predeceased him, and everything would go to his son.

William Esyngton's will (which, like that of Hibburn, I have divided up into paragraphs, for easier reading) was not drawn up so close to death, but likely as the testator sensed himself going into decline. It is more balanced, making a more conventional provision for his soul, and then proceeding to address the disposition of his estate, both moveable and real, among his heirs; the latter is his principal concern and motivation, provision for his soul being secondary. This otherwise fairly ordinary will is marked by the peculiar references to his filiis putativis, a term I have rendered (hypothetically) as "alleged sons"; whether this implies bastardy, step-sons, alienation from sons of an earlier marriage, or something else, I cannot be sure. But the testator had reservations about Henry and William, and was not prepared to name them among his executors; he perhaps provided for them only in the hope that they would not interfere with the inheritance of his principal heir, Nicholas, who was either underage or incompetent. Probate was granted on 23 February 1417, when John Strothir was appointed guardian of Nicholas Esyngton, who was judged too young to take on the role of executor unaided; Strothir therefore became, in effect, executor along with Richard Forester, John Etall refusing to undertake administration and William Cornford perhaps having died as he is not mentioned.

Although refusals are not so uncommon, in this case it may be a reflection of trouble foreseen in administering the will. On the same date that probate was completed, the executors obtained from Bishop Langley a letter to the parish priests of Gateshead and Newcastle, condemning persons purportedly unknown for having removed from Esyngton's house, before he was even dead, "gold, silver, obligations, contractual documents, papers, tallies, memoranda, letters, financial accounts, and other legal documents... as well as jewellery and other personalia, merchandize, household utensils, and various other goods" [Register, vol.II, 145], and for intentionally obstructing the executors in their work. The parish priests were ordered to denounce and threaten with excommunication anyone so behaving, or assisting or instructing those behaving in that way, and failing to restore the illegally appropriated goods. Possibly it was the elder sons who were considered the culprits, or at least instigators. The outcome is unknown. Nicholas, as an orphan, was not in a position to assert his rights. On 10 March 1417, he was transferred to the guardianship of chaplain John Wermouth, and matters relating to his inheritance had still not been cleared up. Why the wealthy and influential Strothir had relinquished his responsibility is not known; perhaps he did not wish to become embroiled in a legal battle on someone else's behalf at a time when his own career was more demanding: he had just served as sheriff of Newcastle in 1415/16, was elected as its parliamentary representative in 1417, and would be elected to the first of two mayoral terms in 1418. Or perhaps Nicholas' enemies were too powerful to oppose. In this regard we may note that a William Esyngton served as mayor of Newcastle in 1421/22 and possibly in the following year as well.

We should beware of reading too much into these documents, as regards the character of the testators. What appears formal may simply be the style of the clerk or lawyer who drew up the document. Historians have much debated on how reliable testaments – usually the closest we have to a personal document for the vast majority of medieval townspeople – may be in accurately reflecting the psychology or attitudes of testators.

We must also keep in mind that these wills come from the upper crust of urban society; which means that any attitudes we may infer from them would not, even if valid, necessarily represent those of urban society as a whole. Robert Hibburn, for example, was one of the more prominent townsmen of his generation, who served as one of the sheriffs of Newcastle in 1403/04 and again in 1410/11, and was approaching the close of his term as mayor when he died. He on one occasion described himself as having been 30 years old in 1380, which would have made him 65 at the time of his death – a good age, by medieval standards. His father was also a Newcastle man, although less prominent, but the family had its roots among the county gentry; Hebburn lay on the banks of the Tyne a little east of Newcastle, while the family also held land at Newton-by-the-Sea, quite some distance north. John Hibburn's wife was a co-heiress of property in the same areas and others, and in time Robert had the benefit of this. He himself similarly married into an important county family, to Agnes the sister of Sir William Carnaby.

Despite all this, it was as a merchant that he primarily established himself (land-holding being, in northern parts susceptible to Scottish raids, no less precarious a source of income); he is found exporting wool in the 1380s, and later woad, and in 1406 we glimpse him acting as a middleman for a London merchant. His administrative service likewise began, as far as we can see, in the early 1380s, with him serving first as an assessor of taxes in the borough, and a few years later as a tax collector. He was a collector of pontage from 1390 to 1393 and again (when combined with pavage) from 1406-11, and a collector of the king's customs in the port from 1411 until shortly after he had been elected mayor. At his death he left three sons and two daughters, of whom the elder, Agnes, was not mentioned, having received her dowry when she married Richard Dalton ca.1411; Agnes' second husband was the John Strothir who was briefly guardian of Nicholas Esyngton.

Even more prominent in Newcastle was Roger Thornton. The geographical origins of his family are uncertain. According to one tradition he may have come from Hartburn. As he evidently held an estate at Thornton (since a bequest went to someone likely his steward there), his ties to his ancestral home remained strong. But where that home was is not easy to identify. The placename of Thornton is quite common in England, with a particularly large number of villages in Yorkshire bearing the name (most with some qualifier). A second tradition associates him with the Thornton that is near Bradford. There is a Thornton in Northumberland, a few miles southwest of Berwick, which could be a candidate, but one closer to Newcastle is in the North Riding of Yorkshire, just outside Middlesborough; the latter has the attraction of being close to Yarm, which would help explain the bequest to the monastery there.

Like Hibburn, he was not the first generation of his family to settle in Newcastle; a John Thornton was bailiff there (1382/83), customs collector, and an exporter of cloth and leather, dying in 1394. By that time Roger had already become one of the leading merchants and Leland later described him as the richest merchant ever to live in Newcastle; Roger's wealth is reflected through the large number of bequests he could make without impoverishing his heirs. He is seen exporting wool in 1385, lambskins in 1389, and cloth in 1393. In 1400 he was licenced with partners to buy 2,000 sacks of wool to ship to Flanders, and licences on a similar scale were issued again in 1408 and 1410. At the same time he was diversifying his business by moving into the coal and lead trades, as well as by dealing in iron, woad, madder, and wine. Lead eventually became his chief commodity; in 1401 he negotiated a 12-year lease from the Bishop of Durham of mines that produced lead and silver. This explains the numerous bequests of that material; he had also paid the dowry of his daughter Agnes in gold and lead, when she married the son of Sir John Middleton.

With the fortune he made from commerce, he was able to invest in real estate; this included manors at Netherwitton, about 20 miles northwest of Newcastle, and (much closer to home) at Byker, the latter later being the source of endowments of his chantry in All Saints and the poor people's hospital, or Maison Dieu, of St. Katherine, a project he had begun in 1402 and, some years after its completion, turned over to the administration of the borough authorities. He also came to hold several other estates, both in Northumberland and County Durham, some of which were received as a reward from the king for his efforts and expenses in defending Newcastle against the rebellious earl of Northumberland in 1405; as well, he leased the manors settled by the Middletons on their young son, when he married the young Agnes Thornton. Roger held extensive property in Newcastle itself, his own residence being in Broad Chare, and in the later part of his life he even bought property in London, including a business office in Sea-coal Lane. Many of the smaller cash bequests (under 100s.) in Roger Thornton's testament may have been to servants, even where this is not specified, who were needed for the upkeep of his household and his properties across the north-east.

Roger was very active in both local and royal administration. His earliest known position of responsibility was as a borough tax collector in 1385. He served as a bailiff of Newcastle in 1396/97, followed by 9 terms as mayor, the first in 1400/01 and the last in 1425/26. Constable of the Newcastle staple in 1399/1400, he went on to serve briefly as collector of pontage (1406), and more extensively as a customs collector there (1406-13, 1421-25). He had married Agnes Wauton, who bore him seven sons and seven daughters, if we may trust the depiction on the brass covering the couple's tomb, although only two are known to have survived him. His son and heir Roger was, a year before Roger senior's death, betrothed to the daughter of Lord Greystoke; a sizable part of the father's property was settled on the son at that point.

William Esyngton was yet another prominent wool merchant; his surname could refer to one of several villages called Easington, in Yorkshire, Northumberland, or Durham. Henry IV granted licences in 1400, 1408 and 1410 for the purchase and export to friendly countries of large amounts of northern wool, hides and wool-fells by a consortium of Newcastle merchants whose core membership was Esyngton, Roger de Thornton, William Langton, Robert Gobefore, and William Middleton. The purpose of such licences for the merchants was to export directly to the continent instead of having to go through the Calais Staple. After the first licence in 1400, the Staple organization protested this challenge to their monopoly and the king backtracked. Despite the losses they incurred as the result, the Newcastle consortium tried again a few years later, salvaging some of the warehoused wool from their first effort; they met with more success, the Staple offering less resistance now, and went on to a more ambitious venture in 1410.

In 1412 Esyngton placed a claim, in the court of admiralty, on the cargo of a Scottish ship captured at sea and brought into port at Kingston-upon-Hull; it appears that some of the co-owners of the ship owed money to him; the ship's master settled the debt and the king gave permission for the ship to be released from arrest. The following year we hear mention of a ship co-owned by Esyngton and Hugh Byker, the Christopher, which was one of a small fleet that had captured a hulk and a barge on the belief they were transporting a cargo of wine belonging to the French enemy. Esyngton, along with Robert Hibburn, was also associated with Thornton in the latter's acquisition of the manor of Byker in the same reign. He was probably one of the aldermen by 1406, and in 1412 he was one of a delegation of leading townsmen (headed by mayor Langton, and including Hibburn and Thornton) negotiating with Bishop Langley in a dispute between bishop and borough over a tower the latter had erected on the south side of the Tyne bridge.

John Stokdale is much less well-documented both in local and national records, and the absence of immediate family mentioned in his will may indicate he was still relatively young, although he evidently had an active business.

NOTES

"look to our future"

i.e. make provision for the future of the soul.

"3 August"

The date is uncertain, as the document states die veneris tercio mensis Augusti; the 3rd was a Saturday. As Professor Storey noted, the third Friday of the month (16th) may be meant, but a scribal error is just as likely.

"church of All Saints"

Technically All Saints – like St. John's and St. Andrew's – was a chapel, Newcastle only having a single parish church (St. Nicholas') to which tithes were due.

"chief tenement"

A capitale mesuagium generally meant the house in which the owner lived, as opposed to one owned but rented out.

"The Close"

This road ran parallel to the bank of the Tyne, to the west of the bridge; it may be that Hibburn's property was a riverside one, as might be expected of a merchant.

"Sandgate"

Situated at the southeastern corner of the walled town; possibly riverside land.

"Wall Knoll"

A street in the southeastern corner of the town, just within a stretch of the walls that was evidently an afterthought to the original plan of the circuit, apparently intended to circumvent the hill (knoll), and/or take buildings that would otherwise have been suburban (and thereby exposed to Scottish invaders), and/or take in a large stretch of the quayside. The Carmelites had their friary in Wall Knoll until at least the early fourteenth century, although in 1360 the site was taken over by the Trinitarians (an order of friars associated with the Crusades, with only a handful of houses in England).

"Pandon"

The name of the southwestern neighbourhood in which Wall Knoll lay; at its southern end lay part of the quayside.

"fair share"

A third part of the property was often identified by borough custom as the widow's right.

"children named above"

Although the text says filiis meis supradictis, it appears from what follows that the daughter (not "named above") was also to be included in the share-out.

"Emery Heryng"

He served on three occasions in the 1420s as a parliamentary representative for Newcastle, but is not known to have otherwise held any post in local government. He was, however, keeper of the seal of the statute merchant there from 1423 to 1442. His witnessing of the wills of Stokdale and Thornton could be an indication of friendship, business association, legal representation (he is conspicuously not described as a merchant), neighbourliness, or simply social solidarity. Thornton's bequest suggests something more than a casual association.

"John de Moreton"

Probably the merchant who was one of Newcastle's leading exporters of wool, hides and cloth from the 1380s, and a town bailiff in 1393/94; although still alive in 1408, a John Morton junior had appeared from 1394. It is almost certainly the latter who received a bequest from Thornton in 1429.

"tithes and offerings"

Tithes were a one-tenth share of income (profits from commerce, labour, or agriculture) expected to be paid to the Church by laymen to support its religious activities. This payment was promoted by the Church as a divine law, and gradually enforced by secular law, in contrast to an "offering" which was theoretically voluntary.

"friars mendicant"

Orders which, having adopted a vow of poverty, were required to beg. These were the Franciscans (Friars Minor), Dominicans (Friars Preacher), Carmelites, and Augustinians. As distinct from monastic orders such as Benedictines and Cistercians which, although the individual members were not to own significant possessions, the communities as a whole were permitted to amass property. It was partly because the friars depended on public alms that the orders established themselves primarily in towns, where there were relatively dense populations.

"All Hallows church"

I.e. the chapel of All Saints.

"noble"

6s.8d.

"dirge and coming forth"

Typically, a procession would escort the corpse into church, where funeral services would begin that day with the Placebo, followed by an overnight vigil, and the following morning by the Dirige and perhaps one or more masses, after which the body was brought forth for burial.

"fothers"

A measure traditionally applied to lead in England, its weight might vary between 2100 lb and 2600 lb.

"West Spital"

A hospital (alms house) in Westgate Street.

"The Nuns"

St. Bartholomew's Priory, a Benedictine nunnery.

"leper-men"

Possibly referring to the lazar-house in the northern suburb, associated with the hospital of St. Mary Magdalene.

"Witton by the water"

Presumably Netherwitton, situated on the bank of the River Font (although the claim to be beside a water source could of course be made by any number of English settlements).

"dom. John Fenwyk"

Elswhere described as a chaplain, although even without that reference his witnessing of the will would argue in favour of clerical status. Since he and Pityngton were clerics, it is a fair bet that Harwod was too. Bequests to laymen are grouped later in the document, although whether Henry Lincoln was a knight or clergyman is more difficult to say.

"in penny and in pennyworth"

My assumption would be that this means "in cash or goods to the value of".

"Broad Chare"

The name of a street leading from All Saints chapel to the quayside.

"William Langton"

Sheriff of Newcastle 1404-06, mayor 1408-10, 1411/12. Active in commerce from 1386-1410, his mercantile dealings were in a wide range of items, but particularly wool; before the consortium of 1400 formed he usually acted alone in mercantile ventures.

"Robert Gobefore"

Co-owner with Thornton and others of the ship Good Year.

"William Middleton"

Sheriff of Newcastle 1408/09, 1414/15. Perhaps a member of the family into which Roger Thornton's daughter married. He was active in Newcastle's commerce from about 1394.

Drawing based on the monumental brass of Alderman John Feld and his son John from E. Cutts, Scenes and Characters of the Middle Ages. London, 1925

John Feld senior must have been born around the beginning of the fifteenth century. The John Feld of Standon, Hertfordshire who died in 1408, and a John atte Feld brewer of London, whose will was made in 1405, are candidates for his father, and they may even be the same person. The alderman held property at Standon, as well as in Essex and Kent, and was residing in Standon by 1465.

He began his career as a stockfishmonger, and the unfinished inscription on his brass describes him as "a merchant of the staple of Calais"; in 1449 he was one of 15 commissioners appointed to negotiate with the Duke of Burgundy regarding the commercial interests of England and France, particularly the traffic in wool and woollens through the Calais staple. But later in life he seems to have retired to his estates outside the city and in 1470 was described as "late of London, gentleman".

Feld served as sheriff of London in 1454, and two years later became an alderman, remaining such until 1463. In that year he obtained from the mayor a release from all future service to the city, on the grounds of illness. Yet the importance to him of aldermannic status is seen in that his brass depicts him wearing an alderman's gown atop his other clothes; the brass was originally inlaid with colour, traces of the red of the livery and the white of its fur lining still being visible at the time the above illustration was made. From his girdle hangs his purse, the mark of a man of business, and a rosary, to symbolize his piety.

His brass, in Standon church, states that John Feld senior died on 16 August 1474. His son and heir, John junior, was his executor, along with John junior's wife Agnes. This suggests a second son, indicated on the brass, had predeceased him – the risk of a father living to old age. John junior had the status of esquire and probably had chosen to pursue his career among the landed gentry. The contrast between the way he and his father are depicted on the brass is telling. John junior did not long outlive his father, dying in 1477; the brass indicates that he had two sons and two daughters.

The monument to the two Johns symbolizes one characteristic of the urban ruling class of the fifteenth century: that wealthy merchants were inclined to purchase extra-urban land – part investment, part acquisition of productive land to serve or expand their business, and part ambition to raise themselves into the ranks of the gentry. The transition in social status often took place across generations. It meant that the loyalties, interests, and preoccupations of urban leaders did not lay wholly with those they led, driving a wedge into the community, a concept important to the survival and advancement of towns in their early period of self-determination.

The divided loyalties are emblemized on the monumental slab on which the brass of the Felds was mounted. It was ornamented with the arms of the city of London, those of the merchants of the staple, the alderman's own merchant-mark, and the arms that can also be seen on John junior's tabard.

TRANSLATION

Let it be remembered that during the term of John Horn and Walter le Poter as sheriffs (whose names are listed three folios further on in this book), when on 28 October, as customary, the citizens of London gathered in the Guildhall to elect a mayor, the aldermen and the more judicious citizens wanted to elect Philip le Tailleur, but the rabble of the city opposed that choice and made an uproar, crying out "No! No! We won't have anyone as mayor except Walter Hervy!" (who had been mayor on a previous occasion). And, contrary to the wishes of the others, they used their force of numbers to install him in the mayor's seat. The aldermen, along with many of the judicious men who supported them, lacking the power to resist such a large multitude, too many to number, at once took off for Westminster to see the king and his council. Walter Hervy likewise set off for the same destination, taking with him the populace and promising them, as he had done at an earlier time, that he would look after every one of them throughout the term of his mayoralty, keeping them free of any tallages, exactions, or tolls, and that he would acquit the city of all its debts, whether owed to the Queen or to anybody else, as identified in the rolls of the city chamberlains as arrears.

What he referred to as "arrears" related to a major tallage imposed by the assent of all citizens, and were [sums of money] released and remitted, by writ of the king sent to Sir Alan de la Souche at that time warden of the city, to those citizens who had been assessed amounts higher than they had the means to pay towards levies previously made to pay the king to redeem the city. Which release and remission was made by sworn men of the same locality and trades as those to whom the remission was given; as such, it was openly and explicitly recorded in the rolls of the city chamberlains, which rolls are [an official] record. Furthermore the king had recently written to the mayor and sheriffs of London on behalf of some of those [seeking remission], to have the rolls scrutinized and, if their names were included in the enrolment, that they should not be harassed, or be allowed to be harassed, contrary to the tenor of that record.

Notwithstanding these enrolments and the orders of the king, the mayor strove to extort large sums of money from those citizens, consistently making promises to the populace as mentioned above and assuring them that he would keep his word. The people in return, believing that what he promised was the truth, supported him and agreed to whatever he wished of them; so that a great multitude of men, by the hundreds and thousands, too numerous to count, followed him at his command, on foot and on horseback.

To continue what was said above, on 28 October when the aldermen and their supporters came before king and council, they laid before them serious complaints about how the populace had used force to interfere, violently and unjustly, with an election [being carried out] by those to whom the right of electing the city mayor and sheriffs belongs more than to anyone else, and has always belonged according to custom. They respectfully requested the king and his council that the king take matters into his own hands, to prevent these people – who were calling themselves "the commune of the city", and were excluding the aldermen and the more judicious citizens – from an uprising in breach of his peace and jeopardising the peace of the kingdom, just as had come about in the time of the Earl of Leicester.

That is, when Thomas fitz Thomas and Thomas de Pullesdon had so raised [the power of] the city populace above the aldermen and more judicious men of the city that, when occasion required it, the latter were unable to bring people to answer to justice; in consequence of which, as is notorious throughout the whole world, a deadly war came about in England.

The populace, however, offered no rebuttal to this but instead raised a great outcry in the king's hall – so that the noise of it reached the king, who lay in bed suffering from a serious illness – repeatedly chanting "We are the commune of the city! To us belongs the election of the mayor of the city! Our explicit wish is that Walter Hervy, whom we have elected, be mayor!" Against which the aldermen presented many arguments for the election of the mayor belonging to them, both on the grounds that they the aldermen are like the heads while the people are like the limbs, and that it is the aldermen who are the judges of pleas held in the city. Whereas, [they argued,] many members of the populace have no lands, rents, or houses in the city, are the sons of various mothers, are some of them of servile condition, and all of them care little or nothing about the well-being of the city.

The populace, however, still carried on its chanting. The members of the king's council, not wishing to provoke either the aldermannic party or the popular party [to further commotion] that would disturb the king, who was in a weak condition, dismissed them until the following day and told Walter that he should not come to the court with such a great multitude of people, but only with ten or twelve men at most. They having received these instructions, everyone returned to the city.

But Walter, caring nothing for the orders given him by the king's council, immediately after breakfast sent out to everyone in the city, except those who were supporters of the aldermen, a summons in the name of the king – although the latter could have known nothing about it – and on penalty of a heavy fine [for defaulters], for everyone to follow him. And so on that following day a vast number of people accompanied him, on horse and on foot, to Westminster. Entering the king's hall, they offered no arguments but, just as on the previous occasion, raised a chant in the words: "We want Walter Hervy for our mayor, because no-one in the city is so suitable to govern us." The aldermen were also there, hoping for a ruling from the king and his council. The councillors told the aldermen and the others, Walter's supporters, that they themselves ought to have reached a unanimous agreement on who they wanted to be their mayor in the city, and that if they presented such a person to the king, the king would admit him to the mayoralty. The populace maintained its chanting, as described above. But the parties could obtain no other answer from the king or his council for several days.

Nonetheless, the aldermen and their adherents, as well as Walter with the multitude whom he summoned every day under the same penalty and in precisely the same way as was mentioned above, continued to go to Westminster on a daily basis until 11 November.

It should be noted that when Walter realized he was being criticized by some people because of his desire to be mayor of the city – they saying "No-one who covets executive office should be allowed to have it, since such a person focuses only on his own advancement and not at all on the betterment of those he governs" – he defended himself against that charge to those of his people standing around him. With an oath in the name of God and on his own soul, he assured them that he had no desire to be mayor or hold other executive office in the city for his own sake, but that out of love for God and for the benefit of others he was prepared to take on the burden and undertake the work involved, so that he could support the poor people of the city against the rich, who wished to oppress them through tallages and expenditures made by the city.

On 11 November the members of the king's council, seeing that nothing was to be gained by dragging out this matter further, called before them the aldermen and also Walter and his associates, and told them: "The king wishes to preserve intact all your liberties; since you cannot agree together on the election of one person as mayor, it is his wish that both Walter Hervy and Philip le Taillur be removed from the mayoralty and that you have a warden chosen by us, who can on my behalf keep custody of the city for the benefit of myself and that of my son, Edward. From this moment on, Henry de Frowick is appointed warden of the city, to hold that office until 13 January next. Although if at any time the citizens are prepared to reach unanimous agreement on a mayor, they may present him to the king and the king will be pleased to admit him to the office, removing Henry from the wardenship of the city."

Following this, certain members of the king's council – that is, Walter de Merton and others – came into the city and over several days held discussions with the aldermen and Walter, with a view to restoring peace and harmony. As a result of which it was agreed by all parties that five men be chosen on behalf of the aldermen and five on behalf of Walter, and that whomever they elected would be mayor for that year.

The names of those chosen by the aldermen were John Adrian, Walter le Poter, Henry le Waleys, Henry de Coventre, and Thomas de Basinge.

The names of those chosen by Walter Hervy were Robert Gratefige, Robert Hauteyn, Alan le Hurer, Bartholomew le Spicer, and Henry de Wynton.

However, these arrangements agreed upon were not put into effect, as indicated by what is written below.

Let it be noted that certain malicious men, inspired by the Devil it was said, proposed that as soon as the king was dead they should rise up against the aldermen and their supporters, and plunder all their goods and possessions to be found in the city. Their thinking was that they could do this with impunity while the kingdom was without a king. In this they were wrong, for upon the death of the king the kingdom passed to his son, the Lord Edward; and once everyone in the kingdom had pledged their loyalty to him, then (as is well known) anyone under his lordship who in any way might breach the peace would be just as subject to a commensurate punishment as would have been the case had his father still been alive and ruling. However, those evil-minded persons were forestalled from carrying out their evil acts. For, immediately following the king's death, on 17 November the Archbishop of York, the Earl of Gloucester, and many other lords of England who were present [\[at court\]](#), came into the city and had a proclamation of peace made, towards everyone, Jew or Christian.

Afterwards they went to the chamber of the Guildhall, where the aldermen and Walter, along with a vast number of people, had gathered. Learning of the disagreement between the aldermen and Walter, and seeing that Walter had such a large following among the people, the Earl wished to allow Walter to take up the mayoralty, to avoid any disturbance of the peace in the city. But the aldermen told him that the matter had been put to the arbitration of ten men (as mentioned above). However, the Earl, dismissing the arbitration solution, ordered that on the following day, a Friday, the folk moot should assemble in the cemetery of St. Paul's at the cross there, and whomever the majority of citizens agreed to elect should remain as mayor that year.

So that following day everyone in the city came into St. Paul's cemetery. The Archbishop, the Earl, Robert Burnel, Walter de Merton, and many other magnates also came to St. Paul's and, going into its chapter-house with the aldermen, advised them to agree to the election of Walter as mayor, since it was only for a year, to avoid further troubles in the city. The aldermen, seeing that this was the will of those great men, and that there was no alternative for them at that point, agreed to this. Walter was called into their presence and was told what had been decided. Then, under orders from the Archbishop, the Earl, and the other magnates, Walter took an oath that he would not, for the duration of his mayoralty, harass or allow to be harassed anyone who had opposed his election. As a result, Walter de Merton, standing by St. Paul's cross, announced to the entire populace that the aldermen had agreed to Walter being mayor that year.

DISCUSSION

This extract comes from a chronicle suspected to have been written by Arnold fitz Thedmar. The reason for the attribution is because the chronicle incorporates a detailed story of the birth and descent of that man, along with other extracts from his life history, particularly complaints about him being taxed unfairly and rebuttals of various charges brought against him. Fitz Thedmar was a wealthy city alderman, in his 70s by the time of the events surrounding Walter Hervey's mayoralty; the original part of the chronicle extended only to 1274 – fitz Thedmar dying in late 1274 or early 1275 – but was continued by later writers. A brief mention of the fact that he had, during part of his career, custody of city archives has led to speculation that he may have been town clerk at some point – which would support the possibility of his authoring a chronicle; however, custody of archives could also point to a camerarian role. The author of the chronicle is clearly in opposition to Hervey, which would again be consistent with authorship by fitz Thedmar. We probably owe the detailed account of the political struggle between Hervey and the aldermannic party to the fact that Hervey was pursuing tax debtors such as fitz Thedmar.

As one involved in politics and with the wealth to afford books, fitz Thedmar may well have had access to Brunetto Latini's political treatise written just a few years before the events of 1272; extracts from Latini dealing with the appropriate qualities of city governors were, around this time or a little later, inserted into a volume of memoranda that found its way into the city archives. It is possible we see the influence of Latini in the reference to the head/body metaphor and the warning against those who covet office. Certainly the author's political attitudes are strongly reflected in the chronicle, and are probably fairly typical of those of the conservative faction in the city's ruling class. Another example of this is in a passage describing the populist administration of Thomas fitz Thomas in 1262/63:

Let it be noted that this mayor, during the term of his mayoralty, so indulged the city populace that, calling themselves the "commune of the city", they had gained the primary say in city affairs. For all business that this mayor brought to a conclusion was done on their say-so, he asking them, "Do you wish that it be done this way?" and, if they replied "Ya! Ya!", then so it was done. The other side of the coin was that the aldermen or the great men of the city were consulted little, if at all, on such matters – almost as if they didn't even exist. As a result, the populace became so carried away with itself and self-important that, at the time of the national conflicts mentioned above, they formed themselves into companies, of hundreds and thousands, bound by oath to stand together, on the pretext of preserving the peace – although they themselves were clearly the ones disturbing the peace. For whereas the barons had taken up arms only against those who infringed the statutes mentioned above, and plundered their property, but this in full light of day, the others by night broke into the houses of the Cahorsins and others in the city who were no enemies of the statutes, and used violent force to carry off goods they found in those houses, as well as doing many other illegal things. As for the mayor, he gave them a half-hearted slap on the wrist.

[De Antiquis Legibus Liber, 55]

The forceful expression of popular will at the mayoral election of 1272 traces its roots back a decade to precisely the national crisis that gave rise to the chronicler's complaint above, a crisis which led to Simon de Montfort rallying his supporters and, with a large contingent of London infantry in his army, defeated the king's forces at Lewes. The city was divided in its loyalties, with much of the aldermannic class royalist, but the populace along with a few radicals and newcomers among the city patriciate favouring Montfort's rebels; this side-taking in the national contest was complicated by long-established rivalries in local politics. With the Montfortian party dominant in London, the traditional mechanisms of city government – the aldermannic council and the husting court – were displaced by mayor and folkmoot in a revival of old ambitions associated with the commune. Gwyn Williams [Medieval London, from Commune to Capital, University of London, 1963, ch.8] has shown that the backbone of the opposition to the patriciate came from crafts whose social and economic stars were on the rise – such as the fishmongers, cordwainers, and goldsmiths – and who were predisposed to hasten the process (as per Hoffer's theory of revolution) by acquiring similar advance in the political sphere.

Through 1264 the London forces helped de Montfort maintain his party's control in England; his reliance on urban support is reflected in the first invitation to towns to send representatives to parliament the following year. In late summer 1265, de Montfort's defeat and death at Evesham shattered the hopes of the populist party in London. The city surrendered to Henry, who took his vengeful feelings out on friend and foe alike in the city; just to be a Londoner was a crime sufficient to warrant persecution. The city's jurisdiction was also subject to depredations, and the city was placed under the control of a royal warden late in the year, with aldermannic authority re-established. By the beginning of the following year, Henry was satiated and offered the city a pardon, at the huge cost of £13,332. Meanwhile the royalist patricians who had suffered under the commune were pursuing their own revenge. In 1267 social tensions reached a breaking point; a popular rebellion took control of the city for two months, until the king reasserted himself.

The huge fine the city had to pay to regain the king's favour, and free itself from wardenship, began to be raised through local taxations, while Henry took advance payment of more of it in forced loans from individuals, supposed to be repaid by the city from its debt. There were complaints from royalists (including fitz Thedmar) that they were being particularly targeted in the assessments, and being over-assessed; they obtained a commission of enquiry, and some subsequently obtained releases from further payment. Objections by their opponents, who urged that the royalists be obliged to pay their "arrears", resulted in a second commission of enquiry in 1269. This however helped provoke a reaction from the royalists leading to the banishment of many Montfortians from the city; only after which, along with a new gift of money to the king and an increase in the city fee farm, did Henry restore the city liberties in 1270.

This was the backdrop to Walter Hervey's rise to power. His origins are obscure, and he was probably a first-generation immigrant to London. By the 1250s he was mixing with aldermannic society but himself had no prominence. In 1265 he was appointed the king's bailiff to oversee the city (under the constable of the Tower) while local government was suspended; later that year he was made alderman, when the king allowed the aldermen back into power, and from 1267 he served as the king's escheator in the city. The importance thus gained was sufficient to justify his election as mayor in 1271, despite his high-handedness which was making him enemies among his fellow aldermen. A further royal commission to look into the "arrears" was appointed in July 1272, with Hervey a member; he went after the men who had purchased exemptions. The aldermen were therefore not inclined to keep him in the mayoralty, when the 1272 election rolled around.

The aldermannic faction, by raising the spectre of the revolutionary commune that had tended to appear during times of civil war, and ramming this home by the subsequent reference to de Montfort, calculated that fear would incite the king to action; the perspective of the Londoners, part parochialism part self-importance, is evidenced in their preparedness to attribute national civil wars to local factionalism. However, Henry III's health was failing rapidly and his heir was absent abroad; the preoccupation of the court with Henry's health may have inhibited a fast response.

The decision by the king's council to pressure the aldermen into accepting Hervey was motivated by the well-orchestrated campaign that he ran to demonstrate his popular support, itself obtained by his platform of cracking down on the privileges of the established elite (notably their use of influence to avoid the "arrears"), and by the wish to avoid any civic disturbances at the time of transition of power to the new king. Hervey's re-election as mayor represented a revival of the spirit of '63. Rebels banished in 1269 returned to London. Notwithstanding his promise of immunity to his opponents, he proceeded to pursue the matter of the "arrears". He also kept operations of the husting court, the power-base of the aldermen, to a minimum – the chronicler attributing this to the fact that Hervey was himself being sued in that court regarding property acquired during the confiscations that resulted from the national power-struggles. And he strengthened the position of several craft guilds by giving civic authorization to charters they had drawn up to govern their crafts.

His enemies brought charges of bribery, fraud, and misgovernment against him, perhaps not all without foundation, and his popular support waned sufficiently that the aldermen were able, without opposition, to elect Henry le Waleys as his replacement in 1273. Waleys moved against the popular movement: imprisoning returned rebels, charging Hervey's sheriffs with corruption, and – despite rallies organized by Hervey to protest it – having the gild charters annulled. When Waleys moved to clear out of Cheapside the clutter of stalls leased there by butchers and fishmongers, Hervey again organized protest marches and led one to an invasion of the Guildhall. After clearing it with the king, Waleys responded by bringing all sorts of charges of misgovernment against Hervey, from both his mayoralty and his time as king's bailiff. He deposed Hervey from his aldermanry, bringing his political career to a close.

NOTES

"John Horn and Walter le Poter"

They were sheriffs in 1272/73.

"three folios"

In fact two folios as we would count them; three folios including the one on which the note was made.

"Philip le Tailleur"

A mercer, with a lucrative business selling wine in particular to the royal court, he married into the family of London's first mayor. He had been alderman since 1260, and was one of those who benefited from the reductions in taxation assessments. After the failure of his candidacy in 1272, he never held the mayoralty, but continued as alderman until 1292, when he died.

"rabble"

In the original, vulgus, hence disparaging references elsewhere to the "vulgar people". Use of this kind of attitudinal terminology is another reason to suspect that the author is a member of the urban ruling class.

"of the same locality and trades"

The point the chronicler is trying to make here is that the men who recommended the remissions of the taxes were those best qualified to know what were the financial resources of those seeking remissions. The fact that the author is so anxious to justify the exemptions suggests that he was one of the beneficiaries.

"Thomas fitz Thomas"

A draper member of the patriciate, first elected mayor in 1261, despite association with the London administrations that had been in conflict with the king during the '50s. He was re-elected for the subsequent three terms and so was in office when de Montfort returned to raise his banner of revolution in England, in 1263. Fitz Thomas threw his support in with the de Montfortians, leading the populist party against the aldermannic party in London. He was supported by Thomas de Puleston, a newcomer to London who had married into one of the more radical families of the patriciate and probably had direct connections with de Montfort's party. The two men organized the populace into a militia grouped into units of a hundred and a thousand – possibly explaining the chronicler's use of these terms – to hold the city. After the collapse of the rebellion, fitz Thomas was imprisoned briefly and his family impoverished after all his property was forfeit, while Puleston was left in prison until 1275, dying a couple of years after his release.

"heads"

The head/body metaphor was an established political doctrine to rationalize the aristocratic form of national government, in the same way that the Church used a soul/body metaphor to argue for the supremacy of the spiritual over the secular authority.

"sons of various mothers"

I can only assume this is intended to connote bastardy, or insignificant parentage; certainly it is denigrative.

"servile condition"

This would appear to refer to the populace, not the mothers. Again it is not clear whether the reference is to the presence in the mob of household servants, or whether the defamation relates to villein status. Regardless of whether these were actually the arguments used by the aldermen, they reflect the disdain that at least some of the members of the urban upper class felt for the rank-and-file townspeople.

"breakfast"

The original, prandium, was a general term that could refer to breakfast or the midday meal. If we take into account the amount of time taken on the 28th by the election itself, the march to and from Westminster, and the time spent before the council, I am inclined to think that the summons must have been given after breakfast on the 29th, with a view to gathering Hervey's supporters for the march.

"presented such a person"

The Londoners were required to have the mayor-elect ratified by the king, and swear an oath of allegiance. In many other towns something similar was required in regard to the overlord of the city or his representative.

"executive office"

The original is ballivam; it was the mayor and sheriffs who held the equivalent of a ballivalty.

"for the benefit of others"

More literally, "motivated by charity".

"tallages and expenditures"

This was the classic complaint in political conflicts between rulers and ruled in urban settings: that the former incurred excessive expenses without approval of the latter, and covered the costs by taxes on the citizenry.

"Henry de Frowick"

A citizen, later (if not already) an alderman. The appointment of a royal warden was always a slap in the face for the city as it removed a degree of independence of city action, subjecting it instead to closer royal scrutiny. This taking of the city liberties into the king's hand was often used at this period as a way of punishing the citizens for failing to maintain law and order themselves.

"Walter de Merton"

The king's chancellor from 1261 until 1263 (when removed by the rebel barons) and re-appointed upon Edward I's accession in 1272. In 1271 he was described as a "justiciar", which may explain his selection of this mission, although it could also have been related to the fact he held a large estate just north of London (Finsbury).

Best remembered as the founder of Merton College, one of the first colleges of Oxford university.

"chosen by the aldermen"

All these electors were members of the ruling class.

"chosen by Walter Heryv"

His electors included two men who had supported the Montfortian party, and three royalists.

"without a king"

Technically, Prince Edward would become king at the moment of his father's death, but there was usually a gap of a few days before the successor could receive oaths of fealty; in this case Henry III died on 16 November, and Edward's reign commenced on 20 November, when Henry was buried and oaths of fealty were given in Edward's absence (he did not return from the Holy Land for several more weeks).

"folk moot"

This ancient popular assembly traditionally met in St. Paul's churchyard; whether it had met on the same site before St. Paul's was built is unknown. A compilation, made around the time of Magna Carta by unknown author, of national laws and city customs, include a list of proposed reforms of which one was that the mayor should be elected annually by the folk moot; it is not certain whether this was a response to the multi-year term of office of Henry fitz Ailwin, or whether it reflected some more ancient custom of the folk moot choosing local representatives. King John's concessions to the barons were paralleled by grants to the citizens in May 1215 that included the right of annual election of a mayor, on condition each mayor-elect take an oath of loyalty before the king.

"companies"

The original Latin term, conventiculas, has conspiratorial connotations.

"statutes"

The Provisions of Oxford, a set of constitutional and administrative reforms which the baronial party imposed on Henry III in 1258, with a view to giving them greater say in the government of the realm. The king's counter-coup in 1262 freed him from the confines of the Provisions, but de Montfort returned from exile the following year to try to effect the restoration of the Provisions. Eventually the attempted limitations on monarchical initiative failed, but some reforms survived to be incorporated into the Statute of Marlborough (1267).

"Cahorsins"

Foreign residents from Cahors in southern France, their links with that rich trading area had helped them become important financiers in London by this time; but they were becoming increasingly unpopular due to usurious moneylending, in which they would eventually take over the role earlier played by the Jews. Foreigners and Jews were frequently a target when there were outbreaks of mob violence in the city; this occasion provides one instance.

TRANSLATION

Richard Stermesworth of the town of Northampton lays a complaint before our sovereign lord the king and his council against John Fox, mayor of that town of Northampton: that, whereas it is ordained by statute as well as by the laws of Holy Church that Lollards should be punished, etc., the mayor has presumptuously abused his office by using his royally-granted power within the town of Northampton to authorise Lollards to preach, in despite of the Bishop of Lincoln and his curates.

Also, that the mayor is [\[himself\]](#) a Lollard ... supporting within his household one Richard Bullocke, a chaplain who has been convicted of many heretical errors before the Archdeacon of Northampton, and similarly one James Collyn, formerly an apprentice in the mercers' trade in London, who was the first adherent and promoter of Lollardy in Northampton. The mayor also associates with and takes advice from one Thomas Compeworthe of Oxfordshire, who has been convicted before the Chancellor and University there of many [doctrinal] errors and heresies, and one Nicholas Weston, an apostate Carmelite friar who became a Lollard without permission from his order. The mayor has engineered Friar Nicholas becoming chaplain of the parish church of St. Gregory at Northampton, where he may preach Lollardy in comfort and encourage those townspeople who hold false beliefs.

The mayor has drawn into his circle of advisors William Northwold, a Lollard and one who engages in instructing and taking confession from those lay people of the town who are Lollards, without licence from the Bishop. This William, under false credentials, occupied the archdeaconry of Sudbury for some seven years and, upon leaving that post, took with him a huge sum of money made through simony, which he uses to pay for accommodation at the house of St. Andrew in Northampton, where he has brought about such arguments between the Prior and the monks that the house is near ruin, and many of the monks have abandoned it. William caused similar trouble at Mekkesworth, at Osney, in the house of St. John at Bedford, and elsewhere. All his behaviour, both in England and in the court of Rome, has involved simony and underhanded dealings; notwithstanding which, he is still in Northampton among the Lollards and heretics, who look on him as a prophet speaking with an angel's tongue.

Also, the mayor has set the whole town on the path towards become Lollards, so that the town is now wholly governed by them, no one daring to oppose them for fear of being killed. All vulgar persons corrupted by Lollardy who come into the town are received with courtesy and treated better than others, as if they were prophets.

Also, on the day after Christmas last, the mayor brought with him one Robert Braibrok, a chaplain and Lollard deceiver, to preach in All Saints church at Northampton, in despite of the Bishop and contrary to a prohibition issued to him. He preached various falsehoods to strengthen the Lollards. As a result of that sermon, the same day disputes broke out between one man and another throughout the town, thanks to what the mayor had done.

Also, [the day] before the festival of St. Hilary [13 January] last past the mayor brought with him one ... parson of the church of Wynkpole, a Lollard deceiver, to preach etc.; the preacher being supported in this by the mayor and the power of all the Lollards of the town who had assembled by pre-arrangement. This preacher went up into the pulpit to preach, when the vicar of the church, after the Offertory of the parochial mass, returned to the altar to sing his mass; upon which the mayor, highly indignant, went up to the vicar at the high altar and seized him by the back of his robes, to make him stop performing the mass until after the preacher had preached. The vicar responded "I may not". After which, the parson preached falsehoods and heresies to the congregation. That same day, after dinner, the parson, together with the mayor and many of the Lollards, came to preach in the same church. There he preached falsehoods and heresies, condemning the people's devotion to Holy Church, pilgrimage, images, painted tableaux, the Church's display of elaborate and expensive [art]works, and the use of chalices made of gold or silver in divine services; he also condemned statutes both of the king and the Church. ... On which occasion Richard Stermesworth cried out at the preacher, "Now, now!" to try to make him shut up, and ordered him to "come down, false Lollard" without saying anything more or further jeopardising the peace; Richard Stermesworth was not aware that others were in league with the preacher. Upon which the mayor hastily arose, along with many Lollards – both of the town and of the countryside – and with force and arms, in infringement of the peace, and tried to seize Richard and kill him in the church. And some of the armed Lollards prepared an ambush for Richard outside the church, intending to kill him; Richard was escorted out of the church by some of his friends, but they immediately took him back inside, alarmed by the enemies waiting outside. Then the mayor, to please the Lollards, came and arrested him for breach of the peace. The Lollards meanwhile were so infuriated and ill-willed towards Richard that they would have killed him, and he escaped only with difficulty, being secretly conveyed to the vestry, to protect his life, until the uproar had died down. All the other people inside the church, who were not aware of the conspiracy of the Lollards, fled in confusion and for fear of their lives. ... Upon which, William Broughton and John Tony, chaplains, rang the church bells to bring people back to their senses. After that, the mayor went into the pulpit to encourage the preacher to continue with his sermon etc. and ordered the congregation to keep silent and pay attention to the sermon, on penalty of death; the mayor remained in the pulpit, close to the preacher, until he had finished his sermon. After the sermon the mayor and Lollards, with great pride and merriment, escorted the preacher to the mayor's house. The Lollards then returned to the churchyard of that church and, using sharp language, threatened violence to anyone who contradicted any point made in the sermon. Consequently the whole town has become Lollard, because no-one dares speak out against their views, for fear of the mayor and the Lollards.

Also, on 14 January the mayor, fearing to be blamed for what had taken place, called to him eight or nine of the 24 chief men to assist him in preparing an indictment of Richard for the disturbance. ...

Also, Richard declares that the mayor, with the agreement of the Lollards there, sent messengers to Oxford and other places to hire Lollard preachers to come to Northampton every Sunday during Lent last, by the cross in the churchyard next to the marketplace of Northampton. That cross was given added solemnity by the mayor decking it out with tapestries and other decorations during the times when sermons were given. By the instructions and arrangements made by the mayor, those preachers preached there in support of Lollardy, contrary (as already mentioned) to the Bishop's prohibition etc. After arriving in town, several of those preachers were at pains to borrow furred hoods and habits to wear during their sermons, so that the common people would take them for important clergymen, thereby bolstering the credit of Lollardy.

Also, the mayor behaves so high-and-mighty in the town that the commissaries of the Bishop of Lincoln dare not hold court within the town to enquire into Lollardy.

Also, on 23 February last the mayor and others went to the monastery of St. Andrew's in Northampton, to request William Northwold to preach to them. They brought him back with them with great solemnity, he being dressed in a fur-lined cape and coat and with a cap upon his head, as if he were a doctor or master of divinity – whereas he never pursued any degree at school. After the Offertory of the mass, this Master William went up into the pulpit to preach, even though the vicar (under orders from the Bishop) had previously forbidden him, and preached with great pride and daring during the time when the vicar had returned to the altar to sing mass. He paid no attention to the mass or the divine service, nor the elevation of the sacrament, but disturbed the vicar with the loudness of what he was saying. So that, when the vicar made several attempts to begin the opening of the mass by note in a loud voice, not a single chaplain dared make the responses, for fear of the mayor. As a result, the vicar was greatly distressed and with much regret was obliged to complete his mass without note.

Also, on 9 March last William made his way again to the cross, dressed in furs as before, to preach there. Prior to the sermon, William withdrew into the vestry of All Saints church until the congregation assembled. In that place there came to him officers of the Bishop and of the Archdeacon of Northampton, with a special commission and letters from the Bishop to prohibit William from preaching and to summon him before the Bishop to answer certain charges; which command he completely disregarded. Thereupon the mayor arrived with a large crowd of the common people and openly berated the officers for what they had done, and asserted publicly that he and the commons would have William preach that day at the cross, in despite of the Bishop, the Archdeacon, and all their officers. Furthermore, he ordered those officers, because of what they had done, either to leave or to stay at their own risk. And, taking out of the commissioners' hands the Bishop's letters, the mayor escorted William to the cross to preach. The officers remained in the vestry until the mayor returned to order them to come out and listen to the sermon. They having no inclination to do so, asked the mayor for leave to return safely to their inn and from there to ride out of town without any fear of attack; this was allowed them. The mayor then returned to the cross to hear the sermon, which William had delayed until his return. Then he began as best he could, asking the commons to pray for him and to assist him in his case against the Bishop and his officials, whom he described as followers of the devil and disciples of the Antichrist, wrongfully persecuting him contrary to God's laws. All this was done by the mayor and William in support of the Lollards and in contempt of Holy Church.

DISCUSSION

The Midlands were an important source of support for the Lollard uprising led by Oldcastle in 1414, and continued later into the century to be a centre for the heresy despite Oldcastle's failure. Leicester in particular had proved fruitful ground for it; which is not to say the town was taken over by it, but that division in the population led to some disturbances. In Northampton the situation is less well documented, other than for the complaint recorded above, which has always been taken at face value by historians, in the absence of other evidence.

John Fox was evidently, by 1393, one of the more prominent townsmen. Most probably a merchant involved in the wool or cloth trade (although the only clear evidence of commercial activity I have yet uncovered is the debt of £60 he incurred ca.1388 to a London armourer), he had served as one of the town bailiffs in 1379 and had represented the borough in the parliament of late 1381. A further sign that he must already have been among the upper ranks of the local ruling class is that in 1384 was twice called on by the king to serve as a commissioner: first, acting together with the escheator of Northamptonshire, to investigate an intrusion into a property in Braunston in which the king had a temporary interest; and a few months later to work with two other burgesses to organize a group of carpenters, masons and labourers to construct a gaol in Northampton castle; little could Fox have guessed that he would one day become one of its residents. Shortly after these appointments, Fox was elected to his first mayoralty (1384/85). He is found on royal commissions later in the decade. In October 1386 he was investigating extortions and oppressions by the king's ministers of the town, castle, and county; the king's ministers of the town would have included the town bailiffs, and it may be significant that one of the pair then in office was Richard Stormesworth. The second commission, the following year, was to investigate the counterfeiting of seals of the pope, archbishop of Canterbury and other ecclesiastical dignitaries in order to forge papal bulls and episcopal mandates – acts attributed to French spies operating in England.

Richard Stormesworth is even less in evidence prior to the events of 1393. His ballivalty indicates that he, like Fox, was a member of the ruling class, although less experienced and less prominent. In 1391 there is a passing reference to rent due from a tenement and 6 shops of which he had become the owner as a result of his marriage to Katharine. The header of the post-medieval English translation of his complaint identifies him as a "woolman", and the occupation of wool merchant is confirmed by the reference to him in October 1395, when he obtained a pardon from the king for infringement of the wool statute; this event is pertinent to the 1393 affair. An indication further to that of 1386, mentioned above, that Stormesworth may have been involved in a political vendetta, is that in November 1388 the king had sent an order to the county sheriff not to proceed with any arrest of Stormesworth, against whom Simon Daventry had complained of intimidation; Daventry had been mayor in the same year that Stormesworth was bailiff and was, like Fox, a leading citizen (also serving as mayor in 1380/81 and 1390/91).

A further instruction from king to sheriff was issued on 28 March 1393. It ordered the restoration to Stormesworth of his goods seized by mayor John Fox. Fox had acted, according to information earlier returned to the king (via the sheriff) by the Northampton bailiffs of that year, upon a complaint being brought against Stormesworth by William Brace of Northampton (bailiff 1381) and Thomas Wryght of Walgrave (a village a few miles northeast of Northampton) related to a contract concerning a sale to them of wool and weights that proved to be in infringement of the wool statute. The timing is unlikely to be a coincidence, but whether we have the situation here of a trumped-up charge being brought to disable Stormesworth's own complaint of heresy, or whether the latter's complaint was an effort to stymie the charge brought by Brace and Wryght, is difficult to say. On the one hand, doubts about the validity of the latter charge may be suggested by the king's order that Brace and Wryght appear before his council the following month, bringing the contract with them – it appears that the mayor was himself in possession of one of the two copies. On the other hand, Stormesworth had agreed to stand to justice and had found guarantors for that: Thomas Neweton of London and Matthew Swettenham of Northamptonshire; in 1394 Stormesworth witnessed a grant of property by Swettenham, concerning lands in London and Cheshire.

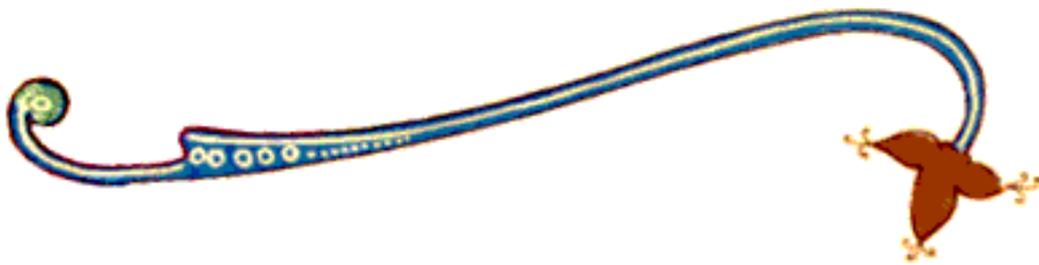

This royal order was in response to a petition from Stormesworth. There is no indication that he brought up the matter of Lollardy, though he might have used that to suggest why the action had been taken against him. Quite possibly there were some grounds to the charge brought against him, and certainly he later felt it necessary to purchase a royal pardon (although this is not necessarily an admission of guilt). Although Stormesworth's petition about Lollardy is undated, presumably it had already been placed before the king. Doubtless there were some grounds to the charges, although it is difficult in the absence of other evidence to know to what degree they may have been exaggerated or dramatised. The section of his petition, omitted by Powell and Trevelyan, dealing with the felony indictment brought against him indicates that Fox tried to pack the jury with Lollards and an enemy of Stormesworth (William Pysford, one of the bailiffs – and as an officer of the court, an inappropriate choice as juror); despite which, one of the jurors so strenuously refused to agree to the jury presentment condemning Stormesworth that he was thrown in prison. It seems likely that Stormesworth had some political rivalry with Fox which could have motivated the accusations; and yet we cannot ignore the possibility that political hostilities were the result of religious differences.

At any rate, the king took the charges seriously – or at least felt it advisable not to dismiss them. He deprived Fox of the mayoralty and on 24 April advised the bailiffs and community of Northampton of the fact, without specifying the reasons, and instructed them to elect a new mayor. On May 4, he advised the constable of Nottingham castle that he would shortly have Fox delivered to him, and was to keep him in custody until further orders. Stormesworth capitalized on the situation by managing to obtain a letter under the king's signet commanding the townsmen to elect him as mayor. This must have met with resistance from Fox's supporters in the borough government, and they appear to have written the king to protest this interference in their electoral process. On September 22 a further royal order was directed to the mayor, bailiffs, and community of Northampton again ordering them to elect a mayor – this time for the coming term (the electoral year began in September), but freely, on the basis of their customary procedures, and to ignore any previous royal order concerning Stormesworth. The king placed one condition on this, which was that they choose "no man impeached or defamed for evil opinions and unsound doctrine, or in any wise suspect" [Cal. Close Rolls, 1391-96, 167], and noted that Fox had been deposed by him because of disputes in the town about unorthodox doctrines. At the same time the king stated that Stormesworth was unqualified to hold office in local government because of the charges pending against him; these charges are not specified, but the terminology used by the king reads as if taken from the counter-complaint by Fox's party, and talks of felonies, deceits and evildoings committed against the king and some of the people of the town, and of Fox's scheming to rid himself of such charges by obtaining the king's support for his election as mayor, contrary to the borough liberties.

This was not quite the end of the affair. How long was Fox's incarceration is not clear, but in 1395 he staged a comeback and won election to a new mayoralty. The opposing party must have complained to the king, who in October sent strongly worded orders to the bailiffs and community of Northampton to arrange for a new election, reminding them that he had previously disqualified Fox from the mayoralty and any role in borough government. It was in the same month that Stormesworth obtained his pardon and thereby removed his former disqualification, although if this was a prelude to a new bid for office it was unsuccessful. Curiously, the same month saw a royal pardon granted to John Fox wool merchant of Benniworth, Lincolnshire, for infringing the wool statute; whether this was the same person as the Northampton man is unknown. Fox, however, persevered in his efforts to regain power and evidently had strong support in the town; following Richard II's fall from power, he was chosen mayor again in 1399 and re-elected in 1400.

NOTES

"William Northwold"

This cleric had already been in and out of hot water several times. In 1380, as parson of Timworth in Suffolk, he found guarantors, in the persons of four London mercers of whom one was a John de Northwold, after the archdeacon of Sudbury had accused him of threatening him and his officers. In December 1384, the king ordered the sheriffs of London to free William Northwold, they having imprisoned him after he had been unable to find guarantors following his arrest on suspicion that he planned to travel abroad on business contrary to the interests of the king and many of his subjects. As indicated in Stormesworth's complaints, Northwold had somehow managed to procure appointment to the archdeaconry of Sudbury before 1386, when he was allied with another cleric, Hugh de Gaudeby; in March the pair were putting up £1000 bonds to one another for some unspecified reason. June 1386 saw orders for Northwold's arrest sent into Suffolk, with instructions he be brought before king and council (although they were cancelled three weeks later), and this may be associated with a chaplain, John Elys, finding guarantors in July that he would neither do, nor procure, harm to the archdeacon. The dispute between them all was to come before the king. In 1390 we hear of him again, this time under the title of parson of West Walton (Norfolk), when he obtained a royal pardon for his outlawry for failing to show up in court to answer a plea of debt of £24 owed to the Bishop of Norwich. Just a couple of months after his involvement in the Northampton affair, he again had to obtain a pardon for outlawry, this time for failing to answer Richard Charman, in Suffolk, concerning a plea of debt of £20.

TRANSLATION

Richard, by the grace of God King of England and France and Lord of Ireland, to his archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, dukes, earls, barons, justices, sheriffs, reeves, officers, and all his bailiffs and loyal subjects, greetings. Know that by our special grace and at the petition of our well-loved subjects, the mayor and citizens of our city of York, we have granted and given licence, on behalf of ourself and our heirs (insofar as we may), to the mayor and citizens that they, their heirs and successors may acquire and hold in their name lands, tenements and rents with appurtenances up to the value of £100 annually, to be held of us in burgage within our city and its suburbs. [The purpose being] for the perpetual maintenance and support of the bridges across the Ouse and Foss within the said city and other bridges in the suburbs of the same, and for the mayor and citizens to find and support various chaplains and other priests to celebrate mass and perform other divine services and charitable acts in the communal chapel on the Ouse bridge, for the worship of God and giving of prayers for ourself, our heirs, and the souls of our ancestors, as well as for the aforesaid mayor and citizens. Notwithstanding the statute of mortmain concerning lands and tenements, nor that the said lands, tenements and rents are held of us in burgage (as it is said). Provided that, however, it is determined, by an inquisition held in due form and [the findings] returned as customary to our Chancery, that this [acquisition of property] can be done without any loss or injury to ourself, our heirs, or anyone else. Also, considering that the mayor and citizens, through grants made by our ancestors and confirmed by us, have jurisdiction over all kinds of pleas related to land within the city and its suburbs – by virtue of which grant, our justices having cognizance of pleas of assize [of land] do not care to make allowance to the mayor and citizens, because in our said grant no express mention of pleas of assize was made, as we are informed – by our special grace and at the petition of the mayor and citizens we have granted, on behalf of ourself and our heirs (insofar as we may), to the mayor and citizens that they, their heirs and successors may have jurisdiction over all pleas of assize, novel disseisin, mort d'ancestor, relating to all lands and tenements within the city and its suburbs, [initiated] either before our justices of either bench, the justices of assize and justices itinerant, or before any other justices and royal officers holding and taking assizes in the presence of the mayor and citizens in the city's Gildhall. We also grant to mayor and citizens in perpetuity that no justices of the peace or justices assigned to try felonies, transgressions and other wrong-doings, nor justices of labourers, servants and craftsmen in the three tithings within the county of York or in any other place, may in any way meddle within our city or its suburbs or liberties, nor outside, concerning anything done or occurring within the city, suburbs or liberties. And that the mayor and twelve aldermen of our city, and their successors [in office] in perpetuity – or four, three or two of them with the mayor – have full power to correct and punish, and the power and authority to take cognizance, enquire, hear and determine all things and matters concerning all kinds of felonies, transgressions, misprisions, and extortions, as well as all kinds of other cases and pleas whatsoever occurring within or pertaining to the city, suburbs and liberties in whatever way, to the full extent that justices of the peace [etc. as above] have or shall in any way have in the future outside the city, suburbs and liberties; reserving to ourself the fines, amerancements, revenues and other profits issuing therefrom in whatever way. Furthermore, considering that the bridge over our fishery the Foss is in a state of some deterioration, so that, as we understand, it cannot last much longer without repairs and renovation, we have granted and given licence, on behalf of ourself and our heirs (insofar as we may), to the mayor and citizens and their heirs and successors that they may construct and place piles and columns of stone in the fishery within the space of one hundred feet over and above the space in the pond occupied by the bridge at present, for the purpose of strengthening and supporting the bridge and houses built or to be built atop the bridge, along with a certain chapel which they propose to build on the bridge in the future, for the celebration therein by certain chaplains [of services] for ourself and our heirs and for the souls of our ancestors and for the mayor and citizens. And that they may transport by boat or by other means, beyond the head of the pond of the fishery, stone, timber and other supplies necessary for this work. Witnesses: the venerable fathers W. Archbishop of Canterbury primate of all England, T. archbishop of York primate of England, our chancellor; W. bishop of Winchester, R. bishop of London, J. bishop of Salisbury, our treasurer; John duke of Aquitaine and Lancaster, Edmund duke of York, T. duke of Gloucester, our dear uncles; Thomas earl of Warwick, William earl of Salisbury, Edward earl of Devon; John Devereux our steward of the household, Edmund de Stafford our keeper of the privy seal, and others. Given by our hand at Winchester, 11 February 1393.

DISCUSSION

In the fourteenth century, royal charters granted to boroughs were more differentiated than those of the twelfth or thirteenth centuries, as local issues came more to the fore. However, common threads can still be identified in the development of local government. York's liberties did not significantly increase during the fourteenth century, until its final decade. Although the charter here only had two concerns to address, they were important ones. The charter of 1393, together with that of 1396, represented a significant change for city government, providing the fullest expression of self-government that was possible under a monarchical regime; just how significant the ramifications would be may not have been fully appreciated at the time.

One of matters addressed by the 1393 charter was a continuation of the expansion of judicial administrative powers that is a feature of urban constitutional development. The particular concern at hand was that the borough authorities were unable to persuade royal justices to relinquish to borough courts the hearing of pleas of assize, because the borough charters did not clearly specify jurisdiction over that kind of case. The solution here was for the judicial authority of mayor and selected aldermen to be explicitly broadened to be the equivalent of royal justices dealing with local cases (petty assizes); for the borough this was part of the long-standing ambition to be independent of external authorities as much as possible, while for the king the change served to integrate boroughs more closely into the national system of administration. In the process of this extension of jurisdiction, the long-standing sphere of jurisdiction of the borough courts was confirmed; perhaps equally important, confirmed without specifying exemptions for the independent liberties within the city, long a thorn in the side of city authorities. The secular jurisdiction of those liberties was henceforth more limited.

The appointment of local officials as commissioners, and later justices, of the peace was not uncommon. But nor was it guaranteed or continuous. Outsiders could continue to be appointed to administer justice in York in certain types of cases. In particular, the Statute of Labourers (promulgated following the labour shortage caused by the Black Death, which enabled survivors to demand higher wages and gave rise to inflation) and the statute instituting searchers of crafts to police shoddy workmanship or monopolistic, price-fixing practices (the searchers themselves policed by royal justices), had introduced additional external intervention in trade matters previously left to local authorities. The 1393 charter transferred this jurisdiction back to them. The 1396 charter, giving York county status (only Bristol having already acquired such status by grant, while London had it as the result of a long development), was a natural extension of what had been started in 1393 and also plugged a few holes in the earlier charter, as well as ensuring that the revenues from the judicial jurisdiction granted went into city coffers. County status was an additional guarantee that officials of the external county could not intervene locally. It became a common feature of fifteenth-century charters, at least in the case of larger cities, for justice of the peace powers to be granted to local authorities and often this was associated with the grant of jurisdiction equivalent to that of a county.

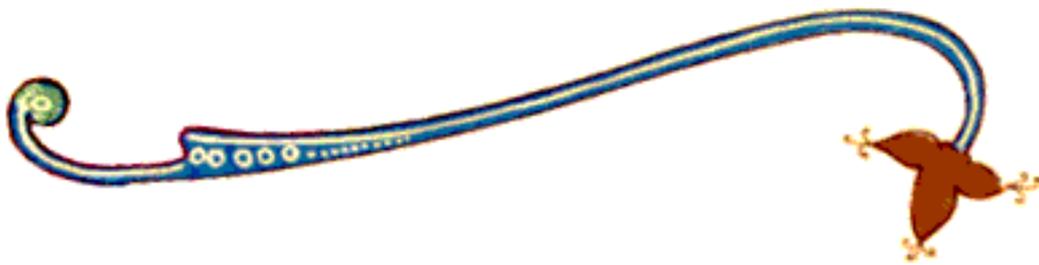

The second concern was to find new or expanded sources of revenue to pay for the increased activities borough governments had assumed over time. In this case the concern was with the city bridges and the communal chapels built thereon. From at least the mid-fourteenth century, York was appointing wardens to be responsible for the bridges and collection of associated revenues. The acquisition of real estate, for purpose of obtaining annual income from rents and leases, was a common solution pursued by boroughs, and was one factor paving the way towards formal incorporation of boroughs. Of the two rivers flowing through York, the Ouse was the major, and the route for commerce. The Foss gradually lost its navigability after William I dammed it just below the castle in order to ensure a supply of water for the castle ditch, and as a result a large pond formed further north, which became a royal fishery; mud and debris from the fishpond clogged the stretch of river to the south. Thus, in the charter (and sometimes in local documents), the Foss is not referred to as a river but by the term vivarium, a fish preserve – not just the pond, which is itself referred to in the charter as stagnum. South of the pond was the Foss Bridge which, by 1376, was encumbered by 23 tenements, 3 shops and a salt fish market; the more important Ouse Bridge held not only St. William's Chapel but also a city prison and its council chamber.

Royal interest in the valuable fishery, on which boats were infrequently allowed to travel, was the reason the city had to seek licence to expand the bridge and use the river for transporting construction materials. Renovation probably began soon after the charter grant and continued for some years – there being grants of pontage for this purpose in 1402, 1406, 1409 and 1411, by the end of which period the bridge had been substantially rebuilt in stone. Construction of the proposed chapel, which was dedicated to St. Anne, near the northern end of the bridge was underway by 1407 and the chapel was certainly in use by 1424. The chapel is an example of the involvement of urban government in administering religious matters, by meeting the pious needs of citizens concerned with their souls.

The charters of 1393 and 1396 were obtained at much effort and expense on the part of the citizens, and the fiscal advantages they gave must have been offset by the increased administrative responsibilities and costs. The citizens of York were able to capitalize on Richard II's quarrel with the Londoners, who had supported the Appellants against him in 1387 and in 1392 refused to loan him money; as a result he briefly moved his court from Westminster to York in the latter year. This proximity made it easier for the citizens to present their petition and follow up with initial negotiations; the king was doubtless inclined to be sympathetic, both to win gratitude and support from the city and to thumb his nose at London. Similarly, the grant of the 1396 charter was facilitated by a visit of Richard to York with much pomp and ceremony. It was probably not uncommon for towns to take advantage of royal visits in that way. It has been estimated that the city spent the equivalent of £1,000,000 in modern value on gaining its end [S.R. Jones, "York's Civic Administration, 1354-1464", The Government of Medieval York, 1997, 115], and details were still being worked out when Richard returned to London, his retinue accompanied by a team of York negotiators, led by mayor William Frost, a man whose past service in royal administration may have helped give the king confidence that new administrative responsibilities could be placed on the shoulders of the York rulers. Richard never returned to York after 1396, and his subsequent financial exactions from some of its leading citizens lost him some of the goodwill his charter grants had presumably won; the citizens were prepared to lend Bolingbroke money to assist his coup in 1399.

NOTES

"burgage"

The 13th-century codification Summa de legibus from Normandy characterized burgage as property: capable of being bought or sold without licence from an overlord or challenge from heirs or relatives of the seller; subject to dower right after the death of the owner; divisible between both male and female heirs; and not subject to feudal reliefs. It contrasted burgage tenure with tenure by homage or by charitable gift (alms).

"mort d'ancestor"

The assize of mort d'ancestor concerned itself with the right of an heir to immediate possession of the property held by a deceased party at death, even if another claimant had better title (that claimant had other legal avenues than asserting his rights upon the death of the tenant).

William Frost

Frost is credited with being the moving force behind the city's efforts to obtain the charter of 1396. A relative newcomer to the city, he was already important enough in county circles to have served as Yorkshire's escheator (1388-90), and he served in this period and later on various royal commissions. He had ties to a family important in Beverley and Kingston-upon-Hull; but, more important, before 1390 he had married the coheiress of the wealthy former mayor John Gisburne. He did not take up citizenship until 1395; but having already succeeded to Gisburne's residence and possibly his business, as well as having connections among the gentry, must have helped catapult him to the mayoralty the following year. His involvement in commerce does not seem to have been great, however, and his own wealth may have been built more from the lands he owned. Frost's success in negotiating the charter (during which process he also obtained royal licence to found his own chantry) helped win him re-election in 1397. Despite favour shown him by Richard II's government, he supported Bolingbroke's coup and in 1404 Henry IV rewarded him with the rank of esquire and a life annuity; this relationship may help explain his repeated elected to York's mayoralty in 1400, 1401, 1402, and 1403 – an extraordinary run, especially given that an ordinance apparently still on the books, though largely disregarded, dictated a long interval between mayoralties. When the city followed Archbishop Scrope into the rebel camp in 1405, Frost (despite being related to Scrope and to other rebels) remained aloof and, after the city surrendered to the king, was made joint keeper during a period of suspension of city liberties. Following their restoration, in June 1406, the citizens thought it politic to again make Frost their mayor. Not long after concluding that term of office, he fell ill and disappears from the record after 1408. He left a widow, but no children.

TRANSLATION

[1. Imprisonment for refusing to serve as alderman, 1415]

Forasmuch as a laudable custom which has hitherto prevailed in the City of London, has so prescribed and ordained, that the inhabitants of each of the Wards of the said city are at liberty to elect an Alderman whensoever they need one, to rule them in their own Ward; provided always, that the person so elected is presented to the Mayor and Aldermen, for the time being, and by them is deemed worthy to be admitted and approved. And whereas, on the 3rd day of January, in the 2nd year of the reign of King Henry etc., one Ralph Lobenham, late Alderman of the Ward of Farndone Without, having voluntarily resigned the rule of that Ward, the inhabitants of the Ward thereupon, according to the usual custom, met together at the usual place within the Ward, for the purpose of electing an Alderman thereof, and there unanimously chose one John Gedeney, citizen and draper, to hold the office of Alderman of the Ward aforesaid, and presented such choice to Thomas Fauconer, the then Mayor, and the Aldermen, in the Chamber of the Guildhall; the said Mayor and Aldermen, holding such election to be good and ratified, confirmed the same, and admitted the said John to the office, and approved of him as sufficient unto the same, and deserving thereof, as well as to the worldly goods as to the requisite discreetness. After which, the said Mayor and Aldermen commanded John Pickard, Common serjeant-at-arms of the said city, whose especial office it is, according to custom, to attend to the performance of duties and services of that nature, to warn the said John Gedeney to appear before the Mayor and Aldermen on the 17th day of January then next ensuing, to take the oath, and to do such other things as upon him on behalf of the Court should then be enjoined.

By virtue of which warning, the said John Gedeney appeared before the Mayor and Aldermen, in the Chamber aforesaid, and after the reason for his being so summoned had been first stated to him, precept was given to him forthwith to take his seat there in Court, that he might take the oath the pertains unto the office and rank of Alderman. Whereupon, the same John Gedeney, after first setting forth his excuses on the ground of his inability, and his insufficiency for the office, wholly refused to accept it: upon which, he was informed by the Court that he could not refuse this office, to which, as being a fit person, he was admitted by the Court, without breach of his freedom, and of the oath which by him, when he was admitted to the freedom of the City, had been made; and this the more especially, as every freeman is bound to be a partaker in Lot, which is liability to hold office, and in Scot, which means contribution to taxes and other charges, by reason of such oath.

But all and singular the matters before stated notwithstanding, he altogether refused to accept the office, like a person who was utterly obdurate. And hereupon, the matter having been considered by the Mayor and Aldermen, because that it appeared to them that if any one, when elected to such office, should be at liberty at his own will and pleasure to refuse the post, and pass it by, not improbably the City before long would be left destitute, as it were, of all rule and governance whatsoever; the same John Gedney was by the said Mayor and Aldermen committed to prison, there to remain until the Court should be better advised what to do as to the matters aforesaid. And in the meantime, precept was given to the Sheriffs of London to shut up the shops and houses of the same John Gedeney, and to sequestrate his goods and chattels, until the Court should be better advised thereon.

And afterwards, on the 18th day, through the mediation of many reputable men of the said city, who intervened, word being brought that the same John Gedeney was willing, if the Court should think proper, to undertake the duties of the office aforesaid; he was therefore brought here on that day before the Mayor and Aldermen, and, having first obtained dispensation for breach of his oath made by him when he was admitted to the freedom of the City, he was admitted and sworn, as the usage is.

[2. Ordinance against efforts to avoid office, 1416]

Forasmuch as it is not consonant with reason that those who for their own purposes dwell within a city, and there enjoy many advantages in so doing, should refuse the charge of the offices of such city when they devolve upon them: and then besides, as it is the fact that many citizens of the City of London, who are blessed with affluence and sufficiency of property and means, not at all bearing in mind the oaths which they have taken in the Chamber of the Guildhall of the said city, with a secret malignity, do not fear at present to infringe upon the good peace and concord of the City; and in this way more particularly, that, whereas according to the custom of the said city, laudably prescribed and followed for the healthful rule thereof, the Mayor and Sheriffs ought each year to be freely and indifferently elected by the more sufficient and more discreet men thereof, in the usual manner specially summoned to Common Council for making such elections, and for treating of other business of the said city; at the present day, a thing to be lamented, some who are citizens thereof, although themselves deemed worthy, upon faithful testimony, to bear the offices aforesaid, still, striving manifestly against the tenor of their said oath, before the time of the election of such officers, as well in their own persons as through others interposed, do diligently go round to many other citizens and other persons in the said city, and influence them, and prevail upon them to come to the Guildhall of the City, together with their apprentices and serving-men, and, there collecting a great crowd, to shout and make an uproar, to the effect that such a one must be Mayor or Sheriff, about whom perhaps there has been but little or no mention before; it being their own end and object that by the prevalence of shouting they may gain exemption from such offices for themselves.

By reason of which crowding also, and division into parties, various dissensions and contumelies are daily occurring and arising; and to a much greater extent in future will arise, unless there be a speedy stop put thereto: in consequence whereof, not only the general peace of the people dwelling within the said city, and the true and free election of the Mayor and Sheriffs, have been oftentimes disturbed, but also, sudden destruction, it is feared, will overtake the same people, a thing that must result in still greater mischief, beyond a doubt; seeing that such partisanships and meetings must tend manifestly as well to the contempt of our Lord the King, as to the desolation, division, and destruction of the said city, if upheld.

Therefore, on Thursday, the 24th day of September, in the 4th year etc., Nicholas Wottone, now Mayor, and the Aldermen, with the assent and consent of very many of the more reputable and more sufficient men of the said city, in Common Council of the same city, in usual manner, for the consideration of these and of other matters, especially assembled, for augmenting the quietude of the said city, which with especial zeal they desire, and in order to defeat the malicious covin of parties and confederacies of this nature, and of the adherents thereof, have ordained and established that no one of the said city in future, upon whom the election to the office of Mayor or Sheriff is likely to fall, shall form any parties or hold any meetings for the purpose of avoiding such office; seeing that through such meetings or parties a real and free election of such officers may be disturbed or impeded; and this, under a penalty of £100, to the use of the Chamber of the Guildhall to be paid, so often as and when any one may be lawfully convicted of the same, etc. And that no other person than a freeman of the City, and one especially summoned to such election by the custom of the said city, of whatsoever estate or condition he may be, shall presume to hold such meetings or to make such parties, or to do other things which redound to the breach or disturbance of the peace, or of the free election of such officers; on pain of imprisonment, and of making fine, at the discretion of the Mayor and Aldermen, so often as and when any such person shall be lawfully convicted of the same.

DISCUSSION

Although we have reason to believe that some men actively pursued aldermannic office, the example of John Gedney in the first document above and the general regulation in the second show that there were also those who did not desire office. The attitude expressed on behalf of London society by a chronicler some 140 years earlier – that anyone who sought power was by that fact unsuited to govern – if not simply a position of political convenience, may well have reflected one perspective of that period. But it is equally clear that some men did then see advantage, to themselves and to the interests they represented, of wielding decision-making authority. This appears even more true by the late fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries. By that time political office had become even more intimately tied with social status. We should not assume that either outlook was dominant; probably there was an attitudinal spectrum much as there is today. We must beware of playing down, or ignoring, the feeling of many that office-holding was burdensome, yet a duty for those best able to shoulder the burden. Few of those who did their duty to the community were professional politicians.

Gedney's reluctance to serve was clearly no feigned modesty; after attempting to escape by excusing himself as unsuitable, and this having no sway with a group that had already examined and approved his qualifications, he flatly refused to take office and was prepared, initially, to suffer imprisonment so strong was his unwillingness. Given this strength of feeling, we must conclude that his initial election by ward residents was contrary to his will or perhaps in his absence; certainly we cannot imagine he had put himself forward as a candidate. This case illustrates how administrative duties were perceived not as a privilege, bringing power (although doubtless some saw them thus), but as a duty, an obligation of citizenship; the reference to scot and lot points back to the concept of citizenship that was already well over two centuries old, though whether the meaning of "lot" has here been interpreted as originally intended, or whether a distortion (or a specific application) of that meaning, is a matter for debate. Indeed the council's deliberation on how to deal with Gedney's refusal suggests, if we can take it at face value, that the majority of those called on to serve in city government did so because it was their obligation.

What Gedney's reasons were for refusing we cannot know. The office of sheriff had long been perceived as burdensome and, to counter reluctance to serve therein, it had been made a pre-requisite for election to the mayoralty. In the 1390s there was increased reluctance to serve as alderman, because of troubles the city was having with Richard II, which made the aldermen a particular target for his wrath and extortions. Perhaps Gedney's reasons were purely personal: he simply did not wish to devote part of his time to political office at this stage in his career, feeling it might adversely affect his business – in this context, we can appreciate the preference to put in office men of a certain affluence, whose livelihood need not be jeopardised by them giving time to political affairs. In this regard we may note that to exert pressure on him, the city authorities closed down his business operations. Or perhaps his objection was to the ward of which he was made alderman: Farringdon Without was by far the largest of the wards – and had been even larger until 1394, when Farringdon Within was split off – and was an area becoming increasingly built-up; so it might have made particularly onerous demands on an alderman's time. The fact that the previous alderman had resigned (whereas, at this time, it was more common to hold the office until death) may indicate something. Possibly these two reasons were interlinked. Two weeks of imprisonment, plus the involvement of arbitrators, was sufficient to change Gedney's mind. Yet Gedney did not long remain alderman of that ward, but early in 1416 transferred to Coleman Street ward, where he remained until 1435, then switching to Cornhill ward, in which he remained until his death in 1449.

Nothing is known for certain of John Gedney's family background. The surname is derived from a group of Lincolnshire villages, but from here migrants had spread out widely. There was a relatively prominent family of that name in Lynn at this period, for example. The draper John has been associated with a Cambridgeshire family and with a Middlesex man of the same name but previous generation who had an interest in the cloth name. In neither case can a relationship be demonstrated, nor between this John and another John Gedney living in London at the same time, a grocer. The draper is first distinguished when purchasing the reversion of a City property in 1407. Between 1412 and 1422 he was the principal supplier of cloth to the Grocer's Company, for members' liveries – possibly suggesting kinship with his namesake who was one of the Company. The royal household was also among his clients, both in the reigns of Henry V and Henry VI. He also dealt in luxury items, obtained from Italian suppliers. His business was doing well enough by 1415 for him to have an apprentice, and clearly the city authorities considered that he possessed the financial means to make him a suitable candidate for an aldermanry. He was sufficiently prominent in the Drapers' Company to serve as a warden (1427/28) and, after it obtained its charter of incorporation, he was the first to be elected to the new position of master of the Company (1439/40 and again in 1447/48). Gedney was twice married, his first wife having borne a son who, however, predeceased him. His second marriage in 1444 was to a woman who had already been widowed three times, Gedney having been a friend and executor of her previous husband, the mercer and ex-mayor Robert Large; she brought additional wealth, in cash and real estate, to Gedney, who already held numerous properties in the city and in Middlesex. Joan had taken a vow to become a nun and Gedney had to do penance for persuading her otherwise. On his manor at Tottenham, Gedney built a fulling mill and set up a brick-making industry. Gedney leaving no heirs of his body at his death, most of his property, held by his widow, passed along to her son by a former marriage.

Whatever the reason for his initial reluctance to become an alderman – this being the first responsible role assigned him in London's administration, except that he had been chosen as a parliamentary representative in 1414 – once he had accepted the inevitable he went on to serve as sheriff (1417/18) and as mayor (1427/28, 1447/48), two terms being unusual and generally a sign of a citizen wealthy enough to bear the extra burden, as well as capable enough to warrant another tour of duty. Other than during his mayoralties, however, his name was not regularly on the attendance lists of aldermannic meetings; Carole Rawcliffe [History of Parliament: The House of Commons 1386-1421, II, 172] estimates he attended only about one-third of the meetings, suggesting his business interests outside the city kept him away.

The ordinance of 1416 suggests that Gedney's case was not isolated, for we can hardly imagine such an ordinance being the consequence of a single problem. It presents the picture, almost alien to modern political perspective, of persons running against office; that is, canvassing 'voters' to participate in elections in a fashion aimed at preventing one from being elected! The document indicates both that informal nominations might be mooted in advance of an election, and that other nominations might come out at the election itself; while neither case rules out an individual engineering his own nomination, the impression given is rather that nominations were proposed independent of what the nominee's wishes in the matter might be. This also follows logically from the official philosophy expressed in the preamble to the ordinance: that bearing office was a duty for those of the wealthier citizens, and part of the obligations of freeman's status: the reciprocity of sharing in common advantages and shouldering one's share of common burdens. The size of the fine is indicative of how seriously the authorities expected this obligation to be taken.

[1. Will and testament of William Soper]

In the name of God, Amen. On 8 November 1458, I William Soper esquire, burgess of the town of Southampton, being of sound mind and memory, have set out my testament in the following manner. First, I bequeath my soul to Almighty God, the Blessed Virgin Mary, and to all the heavenly host, and my body to be interred within a certain marble tomb which, for my burial, I recently had built in the southern part of the nave of the church of the Friars Minor, in the town already mentioned. I wish my executors to have as many masses for my soul celebrated in that church, on the days of my burial and obit day, as they are able to arrange. For [the good of] my soul, I wish that on my burial day, and as promptly as possible following that day, my executors distribute to poor married men and women, as well as to those who are infirm, blind or crippled, alms to the value of £66.13s.4d, in the form of woollen and linen cloth and other necessaries, from my moveable goods; [that is,] up to the value of 6s.8d each, handing out less to some and more to others, as my executors, in their sound judgement, think appropriate to achieve the best results. Furthermore it is my wish that, each day during the thirty days following my burial, in the chapel where my corpse is buried, the warden or his deputy and six of his brethren of the Friars Minor of that town shall chant solemn exequies and requiem masses for my soul. I also wish that my executors (or [at least] one of them) make offerings at all the masses mentioned above as being celebrated during that thirty days, and that they or he pay to each warden on that occasion, or to his deputy, and his six brethren who shall be present at the exequies and masses each of those thirty days, sixteen shillings towards the cost of their vestments.

I bequeath 105s. towards the repair of the church of the Friars Minor in that town. I bequeath 3s.4d to the cathedral church of St. Swithun at Winchester.

I give and bequeath to my wife Joan that tenement situated on the west side of English Street in the parish of St. Laurence. Which tenement extends in length from English Street at its east end, as far as the boundary of the king's castle in the town, at its west end; and it lies between the tenement of Joan Mersh, formerly the wife of Adam Mersh, on the south side, and the tenement of John Stake on the north side. Joan is to have and to hold that tenement with all its appurtenances for the term of her life, under the following condition: that while my wife Joan is alive she provide food and clothing for John Hawyt; should it happen that my wife Joan die before John, then I wish and grant that John receive the rent due from the tenement for the rest of his life. After John's death, I give, bequeath, and grant [it] in perpetuity to Joan the wife of John Heckley junior and the direct and legitimate heirs of the same Joan. Should it happen that Joan die without a direct and legitimate heir, then it is my wish, decision and provision that the tenement be sold by my executors (or their executors) and the money issuing from the sale of the tenement be distributed as alms to the needy, for [the good of] my soul and the souls of my parents.

I give and bequeath to my wife Joan twenty shillings in annual rents, received quarterly in equal payments from my tenement [held by] John Ingoldesby, my fellow burgess of the town of Southampton, out of the rent issuing from two conjoined towers built above the town gate called the Watergate, with all buildings and gardens belonging to those towers; as is set out more fully in a certain agreement made in regard to that between ourselves, William Soper and John Ingoldesby. Which towers the mayor and community of the town of Southampton granted to me, William, and my heirs and assigns for a specific number of years. I also give and bequeath to my wife Joan a shop and a room built above it situated on the east side of those towers; in which shop and room John Draper currently lives. My wife Joan is to have and to hold the aforesaid twenty shillings rent, together with the shop and room mentioned for the term of her life. Immediately after the death of my wife Joan, I wish the annual rent of twenty shillings together with the shop and room to be sold by my executors (or their executors), and the money received from the sale to be received and distributed as soon as possible to poor people and others in charitable works for my soul and for the souls of my parents Robert and Clemency, my wives Isabelle and Joan, and all my benefactors.

I also wish that once all my debts have been paid my wife Joan receive possession of half of all my goods not otherwise bequeathed.

I bequeath my wife Joan, for life, those adjoining messuages, with the cellar atop which they are built, which I recently had put up in the cemetery of the Friars Minor of the town of Southampton. I also give and bequeath my wife Joan my messuage with adjacent garden located in Holy Rood parish in the town of Southampton, on the east side of English Street, between the tenement recently of Richard Holte esq. to the north and the tenement of John Ludlowe to the south. That messuage, cellar, and garden with all its appurtenances, Joan is to have and to hold for life from the chief lords of that fee by the services due and customarily owed by right; and also by finding and providing annually, during Joan's lifetime, two wax candles to burn above the altar in the south chapel next to my tomb, each day during celebration of the morning mass there, as well as by offering one penny daily, or having that offering made daily, at the same morning mass. And also by providing and distributing annually, in perpetuity, thirty-four shillings and eightpence, for my soul and the souls of my parents Robert and Clementia, my late wife Isabelle, and the souls of all my benefactors, divided up and distributed in the following manner. Viz.

- To the warden of the church of the Friars Minor then in office, or to his deputy, with his six brethren, for performing and solemnly chanting the exequies in the south chapel in the nave of the church of the Friars Minor, next to my tomb, and for observing my anniversary with an annual mass there, ten shillings towards their footwear.

- Item, to eighty poor people of the town most in need, 6s.8d to be distributed on the day of my anniversary thus: a penny each.
- Item, to the town crier for proclaiming at the usual places in the town the observance of my anniversary in the above-mentioned fashion, 4d.
- Item, to the parish clerk of Holy Rood church of the town, for ringing the bell called the "assembly bell" on the vigil and on the day of my anniversary, 12d.
- Item, to two poor burgesses or (if there are no such burgesses) two other poor persons who are greatly in need, for holding two torches on my anniversary, ten shillings for two gowns.

It is my wish and provision that immediately after Joan's death, the messuage mentioned above, with cellar and adjacent garden, situated in Holy Rood parish in the town of Southampton shall remain to the mayor then in office and the burgesses of the town of Southampton. The mayor and burgesses, and their successors as mayors and burgesses of the town, are to have and to hold the messuage, cellar and garden in perpetuity. On condition however that the mayors and burgesses, by the hand of the steward of the town then in office (or whoever is performing those duties), out of the revenues and profits of that messuage turn over and distribute annually in perpetuity, for my soul and the souls of Robert and Clemency my parents, Isabelle and Joan my wives, [etc.] 34s.8d divided and distributed as follows. Viz.:

- To the warden [etc. as above]
- Item, to eighty paupers [etc. as above]
- Item, to the town crier [etc. as above]
- Item, to the parish clerk [etc. as above]
- Item, to the mayor of the town of Southampton, or whoever is then exercising his duties, for his diligence in being present at my anniversary and oversees it being carried out properly, 3s.4d.
- Item, to the steward of the town then in office, for his efforts in the same regard, 2s.4d.
- Item, to the common clerk of the town, or whoever is exercising his duties, for reading out this my last will publicly, immediately after my anniversary services, 12d.

- Item, to two poor burgesses [etc. as above]

In addition they are, by the hand of the steward (or whoever is exercising his duties) to turn over and pay annually, in perpetuity, thirty shillings and fivepence out of the revenues and profits of that messuage, in the following manner. Viz. by making an offering on a daily basis, or having it made, of one penny at the morning mass, for my soul [etc.]. On the understanding that, if the rent of my tenement with cellar and adjacent garden and its appurtenances is at any time in the future unable to support the above charges, after necessary repairs [have been paid for], due to lack of tenants or something similar, then the mayor and burgesses and their successors are bound to observe my anniversary and make the daily penny offerings no more than in proportion to the diminished rent and revenues realisable from the property at that time. However, it is my wish that should it happen that the mayor and burgesses default in coming up with and distributing the 34s.8d, to be divided and distributed as already indicated, or in coming up with and paying the thirty shillings and fivepence to be offered as stated above, or in any way fail to carry out what has been specified above, that the estate in and power over the messuage with cellar, garden and appurtenances, on the part of the mayor and burgesses and their successors shall entirely cease. And that thereafter the messuage [etc.] shall remain to the Abbot and Convent of Beaulieu in Hampshire. The Abbot and Convent and their successors to have and to hold of the chief lords of that fee in perpetuity by the services due and customarily owed by right, and by paying, finding, undertaking, and fulfilling each and every charge, offering, and payment specified and stated above using the rents and profits of the messuage, cellar, garden and appurtenances, each year in perpetuity – faithfully, properly and entirely, as set out above.

[Further clauses, set out in much the same terms, provide that: 1) if the Abbey of Beaulieu fails to perform the obligations, then the property is to pass to the Prior and Convent of St. Denys, near Southampton, under the same conditions; 2) if the Priory defaults in those obligations, the property is to be sold by Soper's executors, or their executors, and the proceeds spent on masses, alms and other charitable works, for the benefit of his soul and the souls of all faithful deceased.]

Also, I wish that my wife Joan have possession of all rents and revenues from all my tenements, services, vaults, shops, cellars, bakehouses, empty plots of land, and gardens, with each and every of their appurtenances, which I have within the liberties of the town of Southampton, for the period of five years immediately following my death. Immediately after the five years are up, I wish and instruct my executors to sell all those remaining lands and tenements, rents and services, vaults, shops, bakehouses, empty plots, and gardens with all their appurtenances (such as are not otherwise given or bequeathed above) that I have in the town of Southampton or within the liberties of the town. The same applies to each and every of my rights, title, estate, and claims (not bequeathed above) that I have, whether for a term of years or on any other basis whatsoever, over and in all lands, tenements, cellars, bakehouses, empty plots, gardens, and enclosures, with all their appurtenances within the town of Southampton and within the liberties of that town. All monies arising from the sale of those lands and tenements [etc.], as well as all my rights, title, estate and claims, not given or bequeathed above, my executors are to distribute on a merit basis to poor men and women and on mending the roads around the town of Southampton, which on occasion need repairs and maintenance.

I bequeath to Robert Janyn one hundred shillings. I bequeath 6s.8d to my servant Richard Waryn. I bequeath 40s. to Friar William Chamberleyn. I bequeath a silver platter to the high altar of the Friars Minor in the town of Southampton. I bequeath a silver basin with a silver jug to Hugh Pakenham. I bequeath a charger with a silver platter to Thomas Chamberleyn. I bequeath a silver charger to dom. Thomas Hacker chaplain. As for the residue of all my goods, not otherwise bequeathed above, after my debts have been paid, I give and bequeath them to my wife Joan, Hugh Pakenham, Thomas Chamberleyn and dom. Thomas Hacker chaplain. So that they may dispose of and distribute the goods in alms to those poor people in greatest need, and in other pious uses on the basis of what seems to them most efficacious for the health of my soul, the souls of my parents Robert and Clemency and of my late wife Isabelle, and those of all the faithful deceased, as they would wish to answer for it at the Final Judgement.

For the faithful execution of this testament, by this document I make, designate, and appoint my wife Joan, as my chief executrix, and Hugh Pakenham, Thomas Chamberleyn, and dom. Thomas Hacker chaplain as my true and lawful executors. In testimony to which, I have set to this document the seal I am accustomed to use. Drawn up at Southampton on the above date. Witnesses: Walter Clerk, then mayor of the town, Nicholas Holmage, John Williams, Walter Fetplace, John Donne, burgesses of the same town, and many others.

[2. Will and testament of William Gunter]

In the name of God, Amen. On August 1, 1492, in the seventh year of the reign of King Henry VII, I William Gunter being of sound mind and memory, [but] perceiving my death approaching, have set out my testament in the following manner. First, I bequeath my soul to Almighty God, the Blessed Mary His Mother, and my body to be interred in the church of St. Mary near the town of Southampton, on the right-hand side of the tomb of John Jamys, lately buried in that church – or in some other location my wife Alice sees fit to arrange.

I bequeath 12d. to the cathedral church of St. Swithun at Winchester. I bequeath 6s.8d to the fabric of St. Mary's church, [in appreciation] for my burial. I bequeath 6s.8d to the nave of Holy Rood church in the town of Southampton, for repairs to the church. I bequeath to Joan, the widow of my brother Henry, one of my fur-lined gowns red in colour, called "murrey gown". I bequeath to my kinsman John, son of my brother Henry, one of my fur-lined gowns called "deep sanguine". I bequeath to John's brother William the other of my fur-lined gowns also called "deep sanguine". I bequeath to each daughter of my brother Henry 6s.8d cash, or other of my goods to the same value at the discretion of my wife Alice. I bequeath to William Justice one of my fur-lined gowns crimson in colour, called "wedding gown". I bequeath to Gilbert Mowntegue, recently my servant, one of my fur-lined gowns called "russet gown". I bequeath 40s. to little Margaret my servant for her dowry, if she lives [long enough]. I bequeath 20s. to Margaret's mother Emma, or the same amount in goods at the discretion of my wife Alice. I bequeath 3s.4d to my servant Cecily. I bequeath 4d. to each of my godsons and god-daughters who survives me, to pray for my soul. I bequeath 3s.4d. to Alice Durante, to pray for my soul. I bequeath to my servant John Fynmore a gown or 10s. and a double, at the discretion of my wife Alice.

I bequeath to the altar of the church of St. Mary at Andover, called "Sawnderys wenydd", a silver chalice and paten, [in return] for prayers for my soul, the soul of my late wife Agnes, and the souls of my parents and all the faithful deceased. I wish and bequeath that on the day of my burial money be distributed for the sake of my soul to the most needy poor folk, at a penny a time up to the amount of one hundred shillings; that is, one penny to each poor person, etc.

I give and bequeath to my wife Alice my three tenements. Of which two are situated in English Street in the town of Southampton, on the east side of that street. One being situated there, with gardens and other appurtenances, between the tenement recently of Andrew Jamys, to the north, and the Southampton tenement in which William Dey presently lives, to the south; at its east end it abuts on the stones of the town wall and at its west end on the street, and it is called the Dolphin. The other tenement situated there, with adjoining garden and appurtenances, is between the tenement recently of Thomas Avan, to the north, and the tenement recently of John Williams, to the south; it abuts on the stones of the town wall at the east end and the street at the west end. As for the third tenement, it is located in the city of Salisbury, in a certain street there called Wynman Street, viz. between the tenement of John Curteys to the east and the tenement recently of William Cockys spindler (now of his son John Cockys) to the west; the which I William Gunter recently acquired from Thomas Somer. My wife Alice is to have and to hold these three tenements with gardens and all other appurtenances for her lifetime. After Alice's death, I will, give and bequeath the three tenements with all their appurtenances as indicated above to Thomas Dymmock at this time mayor of the town of Southampton, Thomas Overey, Thomas Reynolde, Vincent Tehy, Thomas Troyes esq., John Feteplace gentleman, Thomas Thomas, John Dawtrey, mag. John Dogode cleric, William Nycollson the rector of St. Laurence, William Heckeley, Masse Salmon, John Godfray, William Justice, Peter Spryng, George Cockys, William Wisham, Thomas Wilson, John Baudewyn, and Gilbert Mowntegue; they, their heirs and assigns to have and to hold the three tenements with all things belonging thereto and indicated above in perpetuity.

To the intent that my wife Alice shall, during her life, arrange for a priest of good judgement and proper qualifications to sing a mass and perform other divine services each day at the Holy Rood altar in Holy Rood church in Southampton, and to be present in the choir on holy days when divine services are performed, for the souls of myself, William Gunter, my father and mother, John Jamys, the souls of all my friends, and all Christian souls. Taking £6 as his annual salary. After her death, [\[the property\]](#) is to remain to Thomas Dymmock, Thomas Overey etc. and to their heirs in fee. To the intent that, with the annual profits and revenues from the 3 tenements following Alice's death, they should and shall find a priest of good judgement [\[to officiate\]](#) in Holy Rood church for my soul and all the souls mentioned above, and all Christian souls, in the same manner that Alice did. Whenever and as soon as any three of my feoffees named above have died, then 3 other persons in possession who are still living should and shall make a further enfeoffment of the 3 tenements and appurtenances to as many other persons as are named by John Adam and Robert Wright, wardens of Holy Rood church, or their successors of that time, to the same use and intent as indicated above. And so continually the estate be renewed every time, forever, that 3 of the feoffees happen to die.

During her lifetime, my wife Alice is to engage, appoint and admit the priest, and to remove and dismiss him if she finds reasonable cause, and then appoint another. My feoffees are to act similarly after her death, in perpetuity. But after her death I give full power and authority, notwithstanding what has already been said, to John Adam and Robert Wright and to their successors as wardens of Holy Rood church, in perpetuity, to enter into the 3 tenements and their appurtenances and to demand, levy and receive the rents of the same, and use them to pay the priest his annual stipend and wages. And with the same revenues and profits that exceed his wages, to properly repair and maintain the 3 tenements forever. After the death of my wife Alice, I wish that the wardens of Holy Rood church and their successors, if they carry out their duties specified above under the supervision of my feoffees, each receive for their labour 3s.4d a year out of the [revenues from] the 3 tenements.

I also wish my wife Alice to hold my obit in Holy Rood church each year on the date of my departure from this life, distributing and disposing of 20s. that same day. That is:

- 20d. to the mayor if he attends – otherwise that sum is to be distributed suitably as alms on that occasion;
- 12d. to each of the then wardens of Holy Rood church, whom I wish to hold my obit each year in perpetuity following the death of my wife;
- 8d. to the vicar or curate of the church;
- 4d. to every priest there;
- 6d. to the clerk of that church;
- 2d. to the bedeman;
- 13s.4d on bread, cheese, ale and wine

The annual value of the 3 tenements, after costs are deducted, is £8.13s.4d. Of which, £6 is to be paid each year to the priest, 20s. for my obit (divided as indicated above), and 6s.8d each year to the churchwardens as mentioned above. There still remains of the £8.13s.4d the annual sum of 26s.8d, which I wish to remain in my wife's hands during her life. And after her death in the hands of the wardens of Holy Rood church and their successors; to the intent that if anything unfortunate happen to the 3 tenements, or any one of them, by way of fire, dilapidation or something similar, they apply it to the repair, upkeep, and maintenance, and in all regards shall protect and look after them. I wish and fully empower my feoffees to see that all these obligations are performed, undertaken, and carried out after my wife's death, according to [the instructions in] this my last will. If no such [misfortunes] befall the 3 tenements, or any of them (which God forbid!), then I wish the remaining 26s.8d of the £8.13s.4d to be expended by the wardens, after my wife's death, under supervision of my feoffees, on ornaments for Holy Rood church, if they are needed, or else on other suitable alms as seems best to them, and so continue in perpetuity. On condition that a priest is constantly provided for.

[The document now reverts to Latin]

As for the residue of all my goods not bequeathed above, my debts having first been paid, I give and bequeath them to my wife Alice, so that she may arrange for their disposal for my soul, as she considers most expedient, pleasing to God, and beneficial for my soul; and as she will be willing to answer for before the highest authority on Judgement Day. For the performance, execution, and fulfilment of this my testament, I make, designate and appoint my wife Alice as my executrix, and Thomas Troyes esq. and William Justice as supervisors. Thomas is to have 40s. for his labour, and William 20s.

In testimony to which, I have set to my seal to this document. Drawn up at Southampton on the above date.

DISCUSSION

[I have divided the documents into paragraphs to make for easier reading. The itemized lists are also my own editorial interpretation.]

William Soper

William Soper was one of the most prominent members of Southampton's community of his generation. Born and raised in Winchester, where his father was a draper, he had moved to Southampton by 1410, when he served a term as its steward – a position that originated as assistant to the alderman (originally the executive officer not only of the merchant guild but of the town), with responsibilities of directing the borough courts and administering public property and finances, although during the fifteenth century it became the low rung on the ladder of political advancement. His high standing by this time is further evidenced by his election as mayor in 1416, a second term coming in 1424/25. Immediately after his first mayoralty he served as alderman, and once more after his second term – this time remaining in office until 1429; he was again alderman from 1430 to 1433 and 1434 to 1437. Between 1413 and 1449 he was chosen to represent Southampton in 13 parliaments, yet another sign of the trust the Corporation had in him.

Greater testimony to his administrative abilities is seen in his frequent employment in the king's service. Much of it was in relation to maritime activities, as suited a merchant engaged in overseas commerce. He had entered the customs service by November 1413, as one of the collectors of tunnage and poundage at Southampton, and then from 1421 as collector of customs on wool; he remained in this branch of the service until at least 1446 – an unusually long tenure, during which he also held the post of deputy butler (supervising the wine trade) from 1418 to 1422.

In 1414, soon after Henry V's accession and as the nation geared up for war, he was set to work constructing ships for the king at Bursledon, on the Hamble River, a few miles southeast of Southampton, as well as renovating captured enemy vessels. It has been suggested that this came about because several Southampton ships, including one of Soper's, had been involved in seizing a Spanish ship under questionable circumstances; and that, to avoid the king's wrath, Soper had (perhaps at his own suggestion) undertaken to convert the prize for use by the king [S. Rose, Southampton and the Navy in the Age of Henry V, Hampshire Papers 14 (1998), 2]. Soper's handling of this task, the close availability of timber from the New Forest, and the convenience of Southampton as a base for pursuing the war in France and in the Channel itself, may all have contributed to the decision to make the area a naval centre.

Soper had two storehouses at Bursledon and in 1418 built a wooden tower to defend the river entrance against French raiders. When a naval dockyard was built at the mouth of the Hamble River, Soper was put in charge of it. He became closely involved in organizing the king's expedition to France in 1415, for which he was rewarded the following year with a lifetime annuity. In this period Southampton became the major base for the royal navy (although of course this did not exist as a formal, permanent force at this time). After a special dock had been built there in 1416, Soper had a role overseeing the construction of the Gracedieu, the largest ship built in England in the Middle Ages. Moved to Hamble for fitting out, launched in 1418, and later laid up at Bursledon, it never saw action in Henry's French war – the success of which outpaced the need to defend the Channel – and is known to have participated only in one expedition to patrol the Channel (1420). In 1439 it was destroyed by fire, its remains still occasionally visible in the Hamble. Soper accounted for thousands of pounds spent on this project, much of it from the customs money he collected. Much of this money went to Soper's associates among the mercantile ruling class of Southampton, who supplied materiel for the ships.

Part of Soper's reward for this work was appointment as a clerk of the king's ships in 1418, which formally made him a supervisor of naval construction, and gave him a daily wage of one shilling (compare to twopence to fourpence for a craftsman). In 1420 his salary was doubled – although not paid regularly – when he was appointed keeper and governor of the king's fleet, a post in which he remained until 1442, after which he served a further ten years as controller of his successor in the post. He was in charge of a fleet of up to 30 vessels. He built a storehouse and forge at Southampton, adjacent to his own property near the Watergate. His duties included organizing royal construction projects in Normandy, and in 1419 he was leasing a house at Harfleur as his base. When the fleet was dismantled after Henry V's death, Soper was instructed to sell many of the ships (to help pay the late king's debts); several local men were able to acquire vessels at bargain prices; Soper was allowed to take some of the profits himself in recompense for expenses and/or wages owed him by the government. He continued to try to keep a few unsold ships seaworthy for the king's use. This demanding work, and the difficulty in recouping his expenses, prompted him to seek release from his post as early as 1436, on the excuse that he wished to make a pilgrimage to Lombardy before he became too old for it; this may, however, have been a pressure tactic to recover his costs. His value to the king is seen in that his successor in the post was offered only the shilling-a-day wage, although admittedly the duties of the officer were by then lighter than they had been during Henry V's wars.

During this period he frequently received other royal commissions in the southern counties, involving equipping ships, mustering troops, arranging for the transport of soldiers to France, raising loans or purchasing wine, investigating smuggling, and other judicial enquiries. In 1445 he was part of the delegation that went to Rouen to escort Margaret of Anjou to England, to meet her future husband Henry VI at Southampton. His naval work also brought him in contact with England's admiral, the Duke of Exeter, for whom he acted as a feoffee of the Duke's property in Southampton. At some point before 1447 Soper was given the rank of royal sergeant-at-arms and granted a further life annuity for his long service. He continued to receive commissions after that, but less frequently.

His mercantile activities are evidenced prior to him entering the king's service. By 1412 he was importing wine from France, partnering with William Nycoll (mayor four times between 1411 and 1427), and in subsequent years was bringing in a range of goods – cloth, grain, hardware – from Spain and Italy, as well as salmon and hides from Ireland. Nycoll had also been one of the larger suppliers of construction materials to Soper in the latter's role as clerk of the king's ships. As mentioned above, in 1414 he had been accused of involvement in a piratical seizure of Castilian cargoes. He was involved in the export of wool, taking advantage of his royal post to obtain related trade licences. He acquired a ship out of the royal fleet; in 1426 it was carrying his grain, coal, fish and cloth to France. In 1429 and 1430 he joined with the existing wine-dealing partnership of Walter Fetplace and Peter James in exporting cloth and other goods to Spain; but, when upon arrival his factor was arrested and held to ransom and the £500 cargo was confiscated, Soper gave up on Spain as a regular market. His association with these men was more than just a matter of business: he acted as an executor of Fetplace's will (d.1449), and as a trustee for the daughter of Peter James (mayor five times between 1428 and 1447), who was Isabelle Soper's god-daughter, although James was subsequently accused of engineering the trusteeship as a way of gaining control over her property. Soper continued to be active in commerce into the 1440s, although perhaps on a lesser scale; the wine and luxury goods he is recorded as sending by cart to London may have been for his own use, as he spent quite a bit of time there on royal business, at parliament, and paying Southampton's fee farm (assigned to Henry IV's widow), he having taken on this responsibility between 1428 and 1437. In 1443 he is recorded as having some kind of lodgings in London; three years earlier he had a feather bed transported there from Southampton, along with supplies of paper.

William Soper's last will and testament only partially reveals the extent of the wealth he must have built up. In 1431 his property within Southampton was assessed at having an annual value (i.e. in actual or potential income generated) of £15, and a few years later his property in Hampshire was assessed at being over £50 a year. The latter included an estate and moated hunting lodge on the edge of the New Forest, possibly at Dibden, a little south of Southampton on the far side of Southampton Water. A record has survived to us describing his hospitality on the festival of the Purification of the Virgin to the captains and owners of Florentine galleys, who joined him at his country house for a good lunch, some hunting in the forest, a large dinner, and a vespers service, the party being so congenial that the guests did not depart until the early hours of the following morning. In relation to this estate, we may note that he held the royal post of verderer of the New Forest from about 1428 to ca.1445, although it is unlikely he saw to the duties in person; and that on one occasion he stood as surety in the Exchequer for the abbey of Beaulieu (just a few miles south of Dibden, within the forest). He also held or co-owned properties in several other villages along the south bank of Southampton Water.

His town property in 1431 lay on English Street (Southampton's high street) and comprised what may have been his early residence, as well as a house and quay (by the town quay) known as "Isabelle's vault", and a nearby property that he held on a long lease and may have used for customs collection – at a later date it became the town's official Customs House. He also held property on the south side of Broad Lane, in the same vicinity, and perhaps all the property stretching from there to the customs house. The Franciscan friary in whose cemetery his will indicates he had built shops was also in the same sector of the town. Towards the end of his life he probably lived in the house in Holy Rood parish that he bequeathed to his second wife. The private chapel for which he received papal licence in 1420 may have been there, or perhaps the one he evidently had at his country house.

Soper's involvement in borough government is reflected in several ways in his will. At his own expense he renovated one of the principal gates through the town wall, the Watergate, which separated the bottom of English Street from the town quay. The borough government rewarded him in 1433 with a 100-year lease on the Watergate towers at a nominal rent and permission to build a shop next to the town wall; "rewarded" may not be the correct word, as he perhaps undertook the renovations on some such understanding. By 1455 Soper had built up a cluster of several tenements around the Watergate. In October 1439, however, Soper had sub-let the towers themselves to John Ingoldesby for £1 a year, in gratitude for "counsel he has given me". Soper likely had occasion to seek the lawyer's advice not only on town matters but also in regard to his pursuit of royal business. Ingoldesby continued in tenancy until 1477, when he turned the towers back to the town.

Soper may have had a similar client-counsel relationship with William Chamberleyn, who also had held the post of recorder in the town (ca.1428 to ca.1439). Soper and Chamberleyn were paired on seven occasions as parliamentary burgesses. Isabelle Soper was related to the Chamberleyn family and William Chamberleyn's young niece Joan came to live with the couple. After Isabelle's death, William married Joan, in 1438 obtaining papal letters to remove any potential obstacle due to family ties. Of the Chamberleyns mentioned in Soper's will, one of them warden of the friary, while Thomas was the son of John, brother of William Chamberleyn; John had held the office of clerk of the king's works at Portsmouth and may have been associated with Soper through those duties.

Soper's involvement with local government is also reflected in his first-choice selection of the Corporation to administer some of his property to maintain an obit; it is probably due to this that his will fortunately survives among borough records. His choice reflects a confidence in his colleagues, although not so great that he neglects to provide for a backup. His mind had turned to the afterlife several years before his death, and possibly the draft of the will that survives to us was not the first. For in 1452 he gave the Franciscans the two houses he had built in their cemetery, in return for provisions for a daily mass to be celebrated in the friary for his soul; the construction project had probably been for that specific purpose, Soper aiming to shore up friary finances in order to ensure his corpse a secure home and his soul perpetual remembrance. In 1454 William Soper esquire granted to Thomas Chamberleyn his property in Eling, Dibden and Fawley; one year later, Thomas conveyed the property back to Soper and his wife, for life, for the annual rent of a rose. This was a legal device to clear the property of inheritance obstructions, thus allowing Soper to bequeath it as he wished. Thomas's involvement with the property would reactivate after the couple's deaths, and his commitment was then to pay out of rents received from the property 40s. each year to Southampton's mayor to support Soper's obit in the Franciscan friary:

"Of those forty shillings, the mayor shall have 6s.8d. And the town clerk shall have 40d. for being there in person and publicly reading out William's testament. And each of four paupers there holding lights shall have 10d. And the warden there shall have 6s.8d. And his brethren of the convent who are present at the exequies and masses celebrated shall have 20s. each year, to be divided equally among them at the disposition of the mayor and the executors of William and Joan, to be in effect for all time."

[Black Book of Southampton, II, 122-24.]

William Soper's will received probate in November 1459. He must have been in his seventies by then. In part because he died childless, provision for his soul is the principal preoccupation of Soper's will. He is less concerned with itemized bequests of property and still less with disposition of his personalia. The will of a later mayor, William Gunter, shows the same preoccupation with easing the suffering of his soul in Purgatory. However, it gives a brief glimpse at his personalia, in the form of the better items from his wardrobe; he bequeaths his nearest blood heirs – his nephews, and their mother – may be considered his "business suits": dark red gowns such as he probably wore when attending Corporation meetings or other formal occasions.

William Gunter

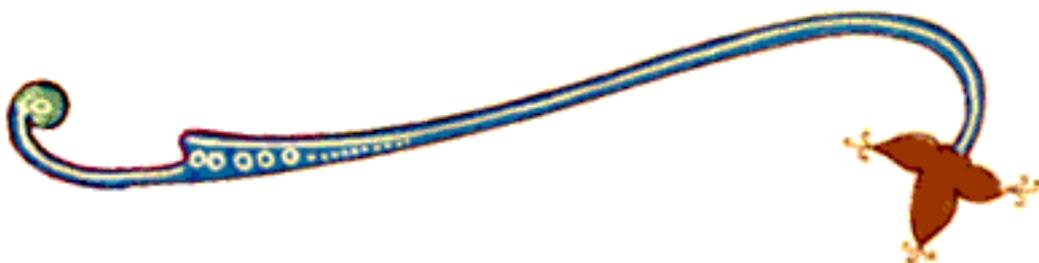

Gunter had been chosen sheriff of Southampton in 1475, and two years later was elected to his first term as mayor, a second coming in 1485. Although he believed he felt the approach of death when he drew up his will, in 1492, this appears to have been a false alarm. Not only did he live into the following year, he was elected to his third term as mayor, and took advantage of the situation to have his will copied into the borough records during his term of office. In fact he was still alive in 1496 and, since we have no probate record, we do not know when he died, but he was dead by 1500.

Like Soper, Gunter had confidence in his peers, with whom he shared political power in late medieval Southampton. It was to the members of borough government that he looked to act as trustees of his property, to ensure after his wife's death that the Holy Rood churchwardens would put the revenues from his properties in Southampton and Salisbury to the pious uses he had prescribed. The group of initial trustees, headed by the mayor of 1492, seems to be dominated by aldermen, with a few clerics and friends or business associates thrown in for good measure; as regards the Corporation members listed, it almost has the appearance of a cursus honorum.

Again like Soper, Gunter had no son to inherit, and was able to dispose of much of his property for the benefit of his soul. He had some association with Andover, perhaps having spent his early career there. In a commission of arrest, issued to him and the sheriff of Southampton in 1467, he was described as William Gunter esq. of Andover; and his first wife Agnes was buried there. On another occasion he was referred to as "merchant". Whether a removal to Southampton or his marriage to John James' widow came first is uncertain; his wish to be buried next to her former husband is curious, but perhaps he looked upon James as an indirect benefactor, since James had died childless and his widow had been left with some of his property in Holy Rood parish. There Gunter settled.

Gunter's chantry was still in operation in the reign of Edward VI, but the revenues assigned it had declined in value to £7 and the obit had been dropped as a result.

NOTES

"best results"

The editor believed, probably correctly, that this meant achieving the best results for Soper's soul, rather than for the recipients.

"exequies"

Funeral rites and memorial services.

"John Ingoldesby"

Recorder (legal advisor) to the borough government from about 1444 to 1459, but perhaps not for the entire period.

"town crier"

The original has preconisator, an uncommon term for this officer.

"Prior and Convent of St. Denys"

The priory was situated within the liberties, to the north-west of the town.

"vaults"

This probably means shops, or possibly taverns, situated in the vaulted lower floors of buildings. An example of a medieval vault, likely used for commercial purposes, still survives in Southampton.

"liberties of the town"

By the town itself, Soper would appear to be referring to the walled borough. The liberties consumed a much larger territory to the east and north, several miles beyond the walls.

"enclosures"

The Latin, purpresteris was normally used to refer to illegal encroachments, usually on public land, which were subject to prosecution as nuisances. But the term can hardly be taken in that sense here, as the testator purports to have a legal claim over the property in question.

"charger"

A large flat dish for serving joints of meat.

"Walter Clerk"

Mayor for two consecutive terms, 1457-59.

"Nicholas Holmage"

Mayor 1443/44 and 1454/55.

"John Williams"

Mayor for two consecutive terms, 1455-57.

"Walter Fetplace"

The heir (but not son) of Soper's former business partner. He was sheriff in 1456/57 and mayor several times in the 1460s.

"John Donne"

Mayor 1461/62.

"lately buried"

James had in fact died more than twenty years earlier, in 1471, an indication of the untrustworthiness of the Latin "nuper".

"St. Mary's church"

Suburban St. Mary's was situated within the liberties, a quarter mile east of the north-east corner of the walls.

"murrey"

A purple-red colour, the colour of mulberry.

"sanguine"

A dark red colour.

"William Justice"

He was later to become mayor himself (1501); possibly Gunter's crimson gown was worn as his mayor's livery. In 1492 he served as senior bailiff of Southampton, having been junior bailiff in 1489, so would have been a colleague of Gunter in borough government. Or his connection to Gunter may have been through Justice being a friend or protege of John James, with whom some association is evidenced. He also served as sheriff in 1495.

"recently my servant"

Chapman plausibly suggests the phrase may point to an apprentice whose term had been completed. Montague was evidently no domestic, for he went on to become mayor himself in 1521, having worked the usual way up the Corporation ladder through steward (1512), junior bailiff (1513), senior bailiff (1516), and sheriff (1517).

"russet"

A type of cloth brown in colour, although the colour could range from a grey-brown to a red-brown.

"chalice and paten"

For holding the wine and bread during mass.

"the Dolphin"

An inn of the same name stood there in the eighteenth century; it must have been of some size, as four tenants were occupying the buildings there in 1455.

"Thomas Dymmock"

He was mayor during the term immediately preceding that of Gunter, and in the year before that (1491 and 1492); he had served as steward in 1483, junior bailiff in 1484, and sheriff in 1486.

"Thomas Overey"

His position second in the list is significant; he had been the mayor preceding Dymmock, and in fact had served three consecutive terms beginning in 1488. Overey, himself likely the son of William Overey (mayor 1474), had served as junior bailiff during Gunter's second mayoralty and had been elected sheriff two years later in 1487.

"Thomas Reynolde"

Steward in 1461, bailiff 1465, sheriff 1469, mayor 1476.

"Vincent Tehy"

Bailiff in 1470, sheriff 1474, mayor 1484 (and again in 1498).

"Thomas Troyes"

A county gentleman active in royal service, including the post of pesager at Southampton in 1485.

"John Feteplace"

Doubtless a member of the family that had furnished Southampton with two fifteenth century mayors.

"Thomas Thomas"

A Welsh supporter of Henry Tudor, after whose victory he settled in Southampton, serving as customs controller there from 1486 to ca.1499; he never acted as mayor (although his son did), but represented the town at parliament in 1495.

"John Dawtrej"

He was the second parliamentary representative in 1495 (having already acted in that capacity in 1491/92), and succeeded Thomas as controller of customs by 1500. He had already been a customs collector there, since before 1490 when he became a burgess of Southampton.

"William Heckeley"

A man of this name had been steward from 1453-55, but must have been an earlier generation. Our man is doubtless the steward of 1481, senior bailiff 1486, and sheriff 1488.

"Masse Salmon"

Steward in 1480, junior bailiff 1483, senior bailiff 1485, sheriff 1489, mayor 1494.

"John Godfray"

Steward in 1485, junior bailiff 1487, senior bailiff 1489, sheriff 1492, mayor 1496

and 1505.

"Peter Spryng"

Steward in 1486, junior bailiff 1488, senior bailiff 1490, sheriff 1494, mayor 1499.

"George Cockys"

Steward in 1492, junior bailiff 1502.

"Thomas Wilson"

He acted as the borough's broker from 1502 to 1510, but evidently was not a prominent member of the ruling class and his inclusion in the list may have been due to some personal connection with Gunter. During Gunter's second mayoralty, Wilson stood with men like Dymmock and Reynolde as witnesses on behalf of Richard Tehy in a recognizance of debt made before the mayor, so he was not unknown to authority.

"John Baudewyn"

Steward in 1490, junior bailiff 1492, senior bailiff 1495, sheriff 1500, mayor 1506 and 1513.

"bedeman"

An official who made public announcements of the death of a towns person.

TRANSLATION

Memorandum that on 2 June 1281 Jakemin de Lede was accused by William Lengleys, mayor of Leicester, and the community of that town that Jakemin travelled through the countryside in the county of Leicester, taking with him foreign merchants and with the money of those merchants buying wool wherever he might find it, to the serious damage and in contravention of the liberty of the gild of the town.

And this Jakemin came to an open court session and could not deny the thing. Therefore it was decided that no-one who is within the liberty of the merchant gild may be involved with Jakemin in the town of Leicester henceforth. If anyone who belongs to the gild is found to associate with Jakemin, he is to lose the gild and the liberty of the town in all regards, until Jakemin has made satisfaction to the community for the damage mentioned.

On 28 June 1289, Jakemin de Lede was accused of having taken merchants outside the fixed boundaries of the town of Leicester as far as the vill of Tilton and elsewhere; and there they bought wool by the fleece and by the sack, in contravention of the liberty of the town and gild, and to the serious damage of the entire community and its gild.

Jakemin comes and says that it seems to him that he has done nothing wrong, because a certain chaplain by the name of William came to his house and there sold to his master Peregrine eight and a half sacks of wool. Subsequently, Jakemin journeyed with Peregrine to that vill, and there they put the wool into packs and carried it off, and paid neither tronage nor toll on the wool. From there they travelled to Garthorpe, where they bought 23 sacks of wool and likewise carried it off [without paying] tronage and toll. And it seems to him that he is able to do this fairly, since he is an outsider and not a member of the liberty of the town and its gild. If he had not taken Peregrine, some other outsider (such as Michael Frothe or others) would have taken him.

The same Jakemin was accused, based on him not being in the liberty of the town or its gild, regarding the way in which he buys his malt in the lord's market, and makes ale from it, and has it sold by measure in his house to anyone who wishes to buy, in contravention of the liberty of the town and to the serious damage of the entire community.

Similarly, he was charged, on the same grounds, that he bought wine at Boston and sold in in his house in large and small measures that were not certified, and he arranged for coal, oats, hay, and various other items intended for the market to be regrated. And Jakemin comes and says that it seems to him that he has done nothing wrong in this regard, because he is a stall-holder and pays "cannemol" annually, at the sum assessed by the jurors, for [the right] to sell ale.

The same Jakemin was accused of having taken the same merchants to Dalby, and there he bought the lord of Dalby's wool, viz. 8½ sacks, in contravention of the liberty of the town. And Jakemin comes and says that a certain clerk of the lord of Dalby came to his house while his master Peregrine was counting the money and sold Peregrine the wool; and Peregrine took one penny from the money and gave it to the clerk by way of arrears. After which Peregrine and Jakemin travelled to Dalby together and put the wool into packs and carried it to Leicester, and paid the bailiffs tronage and toll on that wool.

DISCUSSION

Jakemin's surname, referring to Liège, implies he was from Flanders; neither he nor his master's Christian names are English in origin and, as he himself stated, he was not a citizen of Leicester. We may surmise Jakemin was a factor residing in Leicester in order to do business there for his master. His defence to one of the charges, that if he hadn't guided the merchants someone else would, has a touch of the flippancy of a young man, and factors were often newly-graduated apprentices; although if the date of the first entry is correct, Jakemin had been in the town for several years – he is listed amount residents taxed in 1286.

The method of carrying out Peregrine's business, which was the export of wool (complaints about Jakemin's brewing and retailing activities probably reflecting a side-business to help Jakemin support himself), was to make deals inside Leicester, at Jakemin's residence there, but to collect the goods outside the town, thus making it difficult for toll to be collected on it, the loss of such revenue being part of the damage done the community. The authorities would have preferred for the wool to be brought into the town market.

In early 1290, Jakemin took out membership in the merchant guild. Possibly this was necessitated by a decision of the court, or possibly he thought it the safest course to reconcile himself with the community. Two years later we again find him in trouble, fined for selling wine contrary to the terms of the assize; however, this was a common enough offence, 15 other townsmen being fined for it on the same occasion. He appears to have put down some roots, if he is the same as the Jacob of Liège, merchant of Douai, who with his wife Ellen in 1298/99 sold a house in the High Street worth £20, and a nearby piece of property in 1306, when his son William was old enough to quitclaim his rights in the same.

NOTES

"foreign merchants"

The term extraneos could apply to anyone outside of Leicester; but in this context it is likely to mean foreigners as we would understand the term.

"within the liberty of the merchant gild"

I.e. a member in possession of the privileges of gildsmen.

"Tilton"

Tilton-on-the-Hill lies a few miles east of Leicester.

"tronage"

A fee payable for weighing of merchandize, named for the tron, or large beam (to distinguish it from the small beam used for goods measured in avoirdupois).

"Garthorpe"

A village to the northeast of Leicester.

"by measure"

Probably referring to retail sales in smaller amounts than the law allowed.

"certified"

In the original sine signo posito, lacking the mark that measures had to bear to show they had been examined by the authorities and certified as corresponding to standards.

"stall-holder"

I.e. he pays a licence fee for the right to have a stall in the market.

"cannemol"

An annual levy collected, more in the manner of a tax than a toll, from brewers, and probably assessed on an estimation of quantities brewed.

"same merchants"

Presumably Peregrine; it is not clear who else is intended, unless the merchants from the charge of 1281, but perhaps foreign merchants in general are meant.

"Dalby"

Great Dalby lies about halfway between Leicester and Garthorpe.

"lord"

The original has "master", perhaps because reflecting the terminology used by Jakemin who, as a foreigner may not have had the best grasp of English; the reference is likely to the lord of the manor, on whose estate the wool would have been produced.

"arrears"

Jakemin probably means "God's penny", a token given in earnest of sealing a bargain, and which might be accepted by the courts as proof of a contract.

Date: 1335

TRANSLATION

Enquiry and probate conducted before William de Secheford, then mayor of Lynn, on 22 September 1335, concerning the sex and kin of Katherine, daughter and heir of William de Lyndeseye, former burgess of Lynn, deceased, and late wife of Nicholas son of John Page of Norwich; in relation to tenements in the town of Lynn which Nicholas holds for his lifetime, together with other tenements elsewhere regarding which a fine was levied between them in the king's court, and concerning who may be the nearest heir or heirs of that Katherine, so that each and every of these matters may be determined before the law.

Thomas de Lyndeseye, aged eighty, took oath of his own free will and, upon examination, stated under oath that John de Lyndeseye and Robert de Lyndeseye were brothers with the same father and mother, and from them issued the heirs that appear below.

- John de Lyndeseye, Robert de Lyndeseye } brothers
- From John de Lyndeseye issued William, his son and heir.
From William, Katherine, who was the last owner [of the property], and who died without direct heirs.

- From Robert, a son and heir Geoffrey. From Geoffrey, co-heirs Alice, Katherine, and Joan.
- From Alice, Alan the son of John de Colne, who now lays a claim.
- From Katherine, Joan the wife of John Gillyng of Wisbech, who now lays a claim.
- From Joan, Katherine, who now (along with Alan and Joan) now lays a claim.

Thomas de Lyndeseye was further interrogated concerning how old Alan, Joan and Katherine were at present; he said that they were of the age of majority. Queried how and by what means he knew that Alan, Joan and Katherine were really the true heirs of Katherine, he said that a certain Cecilia, Thomas' grandmother, was sister to John and Robert de Lyndeseye; they were born in Sutton Mareys in Lindsey, and John made his home in Lynn. From whom, as already noted, William; and from William, Katherine. The other brother, Robert, made his home in Wisbech; from whom issued Alan, Joan, and Katherine, as stated above. Queried if any other heirs had a rightful claim, by reason of heredity, to the tenements of which Katherine was in possession when she died, he said simply "No".

Another witness, John de Colne of Wisbech, father of Alan, took oath of his own free will and, under careful examination, said the same as Thomas in each and every regard, concerning kinships and heredity. Queried how he knew this, he said that he had married a certain Alice, the daughter of Geoffrey son of Robert de Lyndeseye, who told him all the above. He was also queried whether anyone else might be an heir of Katherine, other than Alan, Joan, and Katherine; he said simply "No".

DISCUSSION

Most records of probate are straightforward statements that probate was made and administration of the will was granted to the executors. Complications did sometimes occur, however, particularly where a testator had no direct heirs. It may be in this case that Katherine Page died intestate; her husband would have been able to lay claim to a lifetime interest in at least some of her property. Possibly more distant relatives subsequently heard of her death and put in a claim to her property, or possibly what we have here is Nicholas Page seeking to obtain more than a life interest in his late wife's property.

For on folios adjacent to the transcript of the probate session five related documents are copied. These are in the form of quitclaims (releases of right) to the Lynn property of Katherine Page. On the day immediately proceeding the probate hearing, after the claimants had arrived in Lynn, Nicholas obtained – probably by purchase – quitclaims from John Gilling of Wisbech and his wife Joan, Alan de Colne of Wisbech, and Katherine the daughter of Simon fitz Theobald of Ashby near Horncastle. These legal transactions were all witnessed by essentially the same group of prominent townsmen, along with Thomas de Lindesey and in at least one case by some men from surrounding villages – for the properties in question, described only in broad terms as encompassing tenements, houses, gardens, quays, rents, arable land, meadows, pastures, fields of rushes, lanes and footpaths, were located not only in the town of Bishop's Lynn, but also in South Lynn, North Lynn, North Clenchwarnton, and other villages in the locality. It is evident these transactions were all effected at the same time in the same place.

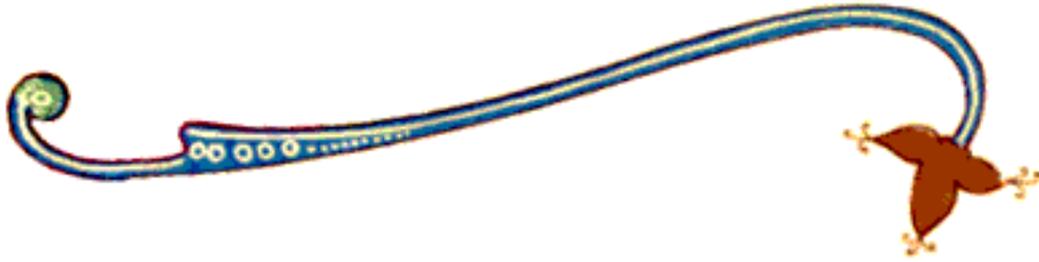

Although none of the witnesses participated in any official capacity, the transactions seem to have taken place in the gildhall at an assembly meeting. For accompanying these entries in the Red Register is a note stating that Peter, the son of Robert de Walton (died 1316), appeared before mayor and community the same day and put in a claim to one of the properties. Peter's claim was as a grandson of Katherine de Lindesey, by her marriage to William de Walton (dead by 1313), father of Robert. This puts in question the testimony the following day that Katherine died with direct heirs. That Peter's claim was not without foundation is indicated by a quitclaim purchased by Nicholas Page and his wife Katherine in 1331 from Robert's widow Alice, concerning one of the Lindesey properties in Lynn. Nicholas Page thought it best to buy Peter off too, and did so in a quitclaim dated 25 October 1335, which Peter followed up with a public statement before the assembly confirming that he had surrendered his claim. At the same time, Nicholas obtained a quitclaim from Simon fitz Theobald. Much the same group of witnesses was used for this second set of transactions as was used for the first.

The probate proceedings may therefore have served, from Nicholas' point of view, to confirm before the law that he had obtained his quitclaims from the right people. The significance of these events is reinforced by the fact that Nicholas' testament later underwent probate before the borough authorities at Lynn. The testament was drawn up in 1341 but did not receive probate until 1345. The exceptional nature of this situation is reflected in that 8 days was allocated for anyone with claims to any of the property devised to come forward, whereas 3 days was the normal period.

Although Nicholas was in Norwich when the testament was drafted, and requested burial next to his late wife Katherine in the church of St. Julian, Conesford Street, Norwich, much of the document concerns itself with the properties in Lynn. With the exception of a property called "Grymestonestede" in Brigate and a meadow called "Feggishil", the real estate was to be sold by his executors within a year of his death, and the money put towards pious uses and commemorative services for the souls of himself, his wife and their parents. He also made provision for services for a few others, including Robert de Walton, his wife, and son. The two excepted properties he left to a household servant, Elena atte Chirche, who was important enough in Nicholas' life also to be designated one of his executors; she was to hold for life, with the option of purchasing permanently, failing which the properties were after her death to be sold and the proceeds put towards the benefit of the souls of Nicholas and Katherine. The testament gives no indication that Nicholas held any significant property in Norwich; such clauses could have been omitted by the Lynn clerk, but the inclusion of other irrelevant clauses makes it unlikely.

This document may also be taken as an illustration of the "failure of male heirs" phenomenon. The Lindesey male line had died out both in its Lynn and Wisbech branches, with the sole exception of Thomas, who is not known to have had any children; the name does not appear in Lynn records after this time. The Page family had similarly died out; Nicholas left no children, and his siblings were one or possibly two sisters and a brother who was a clergyman.

NOTES

"William de Lyndeseye"

A merchant important enough in the community to be elected mayor in 1280; a survey of properties in the northern section of the borough (ca.1267/1283) includes several held by him. His father John had come to Lynn before 1263, by which year he had already joined the merchant gild. Several other gildsmen of the period bore this surname; one, an Alan de Lindesey, appears to have been the wealthiest man in Lynn, judging from the valuation of his goods for local taxation purposes in the 1290s. Perhaps he was a brother to William, the two holding adjacent properties in the Tuesday Market.

"fine"

A final agreement, i.e. concerning the transfer of property, in effect a registration of an agreement reached outside the court.

"Sutton Mareys"

Perhaps Sutton on Sea? now in East Lindsey (although in the Middle Ages, Lindsey as a whole was an administrative region of Lincolnshire). Although Mareys normally refers to marshland, it may also have referred to the marshy coast.

"Robert de Walton"

A wealthy wool merchant, almost on a par with Alan de Lindeseye. His father, of whom little is known, was probably a natural marriage partner for a daughter of the upper crust Lindesey family. Robert held the posts of constable and chamberlain in local government during the 1290s and the subsequent decade. He was very much involved in local political struggles, siding with those seeking independence from the town's lords, and had consequent run-ins with other members of the borough elite who preferred not to antagonize those lords. Stemming from this, a vendetta with the Lomb family led to the murders of William de Walton (ca.1313) and Robert (1316).

That same day it was agreed that the Creed play shall be performed before our sovereign lord the king next Sunday, at the cost of the most honest men of every parish in the city.

[spring 1486]

It has been decided by the mayor, his fellow aldermen, and others of the common council of the city that – they being hopeful of finding the king prepared to be a gracious lord to the city as the result of intercession by the most reverend father, the archbishop of York, and other lords spiritual and temporal of his most noble council, and they and all the inhabitants displaying how happy and overjoyed they are about his most royal person coming to the city, with other of his lords – they are to make arrangements and preparations to greet his grace the king in the following manner. That is to say:

First, whereas it has been the custom for the two city sheriffs then in office, with 20 horse, to meet previous kings coming to the city at Tadcaster bridge, since that is at the boundary of the franchise, it is now decided that not only the two sheriffs but also two of the aldermen, accompanied by 40 horse, are to pay their respects to his grace there.

Second, whereas it has been the custom for the mayor and aldermen, dressed in long scarlet gowns, and others of the council, accompanied by the inhabitants of the city, on horseback, to pay their respects to kings coming to the city about two miles from the city, they have decided that the mayor and aldermen in the scarlet costume mentioned, the common councillors and the [city] clerk in violet, the chamberlains in murrey, and many of the inhabitants in red, shall meet the king on horseback at Bilbrough cross, about 5 miles from the city. Other inhabitants lacking horses or unable to provide themselves with red gowns are to wait for the king on foot between Dringhouses and the city, apart from a certain number of children who are to be gathered together beside St. James chapel, crying out "King Henry!" in the way that children do.

Third, at the entrance and first bar of the city is to be cleverly crafted a scene incorporating a heaven characterized by great joy and angelic harmony; underneath the heaven is to be an unpopulated world, full of trees and flowers, where springs up a pure red royal rose (moved by some device). Before which rose is to appear another rose, of pure white. Towards which, once the pair have come together, all other flowers shall show clear deference and recognition of sovereignty, showing that the rose is the foremost of all flowers, as Bartholomew states. And next is to appear out of a cloud a crown that will descend over the roses. After which is to appear a city with citizens, with its founder called Ebrauk, who is to give salutations to the king with the following words in prose, and afterwards present the king with the keys of the city, representing Ebrauk surrendering his inheritance – his title and his crown – to the king, as if pleased with him above all other men.

[There follow four seven-line stanzas of poetry, as Ebrauke's speech, in essence requesting him to be a good lord to the city].

Fourth, when the king progresses along the streets he is to see them decorated with the best cloths that can be obtained with the city, for its honour. When he arrives at Ouse Bridge, at the corners of Skeldergate and North Street, because no gaps should appear, cloths are to be hung and some viable method devised so that, if the weather is fine, rose water shall rain down on the lords preceding and following the king.

Fifth, on the crest of Ouse Bridge is to be a royal train in which will suddenly appear sitting together in council six crowned kings – representing the six Henries – who, after the king has had a leisurely chance in which to view them, shall commit a sceptre to Solomon (dressed as a king). Solomon is to accept the sceptre and recite the following words in prose to the king, yielding the sceptre to him, as a symbol that he is the possessor of wisdom and justice.

[There follow three seven-line stanzas of poetry, as Solomon's speech, in essence flattering the king, acknowledging him as the legitimate successor to the throne, and exhorting him to wise and just rule].

Sixth, there is to appear at the end of the street (which later becomes Coney Street) running into Ousegate a presentation in which hailstones are to be made, by some device, to fall upon the lords and others preceding the king – hailstones to be made by the comfitters craft.

Seventh, at the common hall is to be [erected] what appears to be a mighty castle, in which David is seen as the leader [of the inhabitants]. Reciting the following words, he is to surrender to the king his sword of victory. In the castle are to be citizens dressed in white and grey who, after the king has viewed and acknowledged them, are with a cheerful disposition to show their true and heartfelt affection for the king.

[There follow three seven-line stanzas of poetry, as David's speech, in essence flattering the king and praising the city].

Eighth, at the end of Swinegate, where it meets Stonegate, Our Lady is to appear [as if] from heaven and welcome the king the following words. After which she is to ascend back into heaven, with angels singing, and with snow falling (to be made by craftsmen from wafers, so as to appear like snow).

[The record concludes with three stanzas of varying length, as the Blessed Virgin's speech].

DISCUSSION

It became increasingly common as the fourteenth century wore on for royal visits to English towns to receive ceremonial welcomes, some more elaborate and showy than others. Such displays were an attempt to win royal favour by flattering the king, and to show unity and harmony among the residents, as an indication the town was well governed. In addition, such welcomes represented an acknowledgement of the visitor's legitimacy as the ultimate lord of the town, and indicated to the king that he could rely on the town's support.

The first set of extracts above deal with the visit of Richard of Gloucester to the city only a few weeks after he had taken the throne, part of his inaugural tour of his realm. Since Richard had previously been a champion of city interests – part of a policy to win friends in the north – his accession was welcomed by the city. The contributions towards a monetary gift by the mayor, aldermen and councillors reflect that support. The intent to welcome Richard royally was encouraged by the king, who wished to show the southerners in his entourage his popularity in the north; his secretary wrote to York Corporation on 23 August, encouraging a reception with pageants, speeches and the streets hung with decorations.

An account of the royal visit itself, which began with a state entry on 29 August, the king and queen accompanied by numerous bishops, earls, lords and leading officers of state, is not recorded in the House Books. But other evidence suggests lavish pageantry that included the investiture of Richard's son as Prince of Wales.

The initial enthusiasm of the citizens for Richard was not unanimously maintained over time, although the city continued to support him during Buckingham's rebellion, and sent troops to help him at Bosworth (they arriving too late). Henry VII's accession was greeted with mixed feelings and some trepidation. Nonetheless, the Corporation was wise enough to know its best interests lay with another splendid welcome when Henry prepared to visit the city, and the preparations for this one were recorded in more detail. There was a great deal of emphasis on flattering the king, while yet at the same time asserting the city's expectations that Henry would treat them fairly and justly. The king's procession through the city, replete with ambitious special effects, was to follow the same route as the Corpus Christi pageants.

Henry's visit was part of his first major progress through the kingdom after winning the crown. His visit to York, which took place in June, is the best documented of the welcomes he received at various towns. Arrangements reflected the socio-political hierarchy in the town. The chamberlains' account for that year recorded expenditures of £35.18s.6d on miscellaneous related expenses, such as: carpentry for scaffolding and other structures probably associated with pageants; the purchase or fabrication of props, costumes, and backdrops; fees of a choir of clerics. Another £30.3s.4d was spent on items given to the king, but the details were recorded in a book that has not survived to us.

NOTES

"the 24"

The city councillors.

"musterdevillers"

A grey cloth, named after a town in Normandy.

"dom. Henry Hudson"

A chaplain, rector of All Saints; he, along with three other unnamed clerics, was again involved in organizing the pageants during the 1486 visit, at which time Hudson was parish priest at Spofford.

"the chamber"

I.e. city government; or, more specifically, its financial arm.

"Master Metcalfe"

Miles Metcalfe was a member of a gentry family of the county and a Yorkist. It is suspected to have been Richard of Gloucester who had persuaded his brother, Edward IV, to recommend Metcalfe for the post of recorder (legal expert) of York in 1477; the incumbent Guy Fairfax, a supporter of the Earl of Northumberland, whose influence in the north Richard was trying to supersede, was resigning because of his appointment as justice of the King's Bench. Certainly Richard in April 1483, as Regent, appointed Metcalfe – by then a member of his ducal council – as justice of the county palatine of Lancaster. Metcalfe's strong support for Richard and his personal wealth explain why his contribution to the gift was so much higher than of the mayor and aldermen. That very support led the newly-enthroned Henry VII to demand that York replace Metcalfe with his own nominee, on the grounds that Metcalfe had been working against him, and to exclude Metcalfe from a list of northerners pardoned for their Yorkist sympathies. The city's own sympathies and determination not to come under Henry's thumb are shown by its stalling tactics – accepting Henry's nominee only on a stand-in basis, while Metcalfe worked to obtain a return to grace. Metcalfe's influence in the north may have been part of the reason Henry waited until spring 1486 – some three months after Metcalfe's death – to make his first visit there.

"Creed play"

In 1446, chaplain William Revetour (who had also held a minor post in the city bureaucracy) had bequeathed a copy of the text of the play to York's influential Corpus Christi gild, along with some props, on condition it be performed annually for the following ten years; the gild was still using a copy of that text over a century later. Possibly this was the text used for the play to be presented to Henry VII. Revetour also bequeathed a copy of a play about St. James to the gild of St. Christopher, and other props to the York girdlers for their Corpus Christi play.

"cost of the most honest men"

I.e. a collection would be taken up.

"Tadcaster"

Tadcaster is just under 10 miles southwest of York.

"murrey"

Cloth of a purple-red colour (the colour of mulberry).

"first bar"

The gateway into the city: Micklegate bar, the entrance from the south.

"red royal rose"

Symbolizing Henry Tudor, as the Lancastrian heir, while the white rose was his Yorkist wife.

"Ebrauk"

The legendary founder of York (Eboracum), from what little is revealed of him in his speech and from other sources, his pretensions were Arthurian. He was one of the line of successors of Brutus, the fugitive from Troy and thereby connected to the New Trojan claims of London; York would have been able to claim a status second only to that of London, on the basis of this legend (other cities, such as Canterbury, Winchester, Leicester, were said to have been founded by later kings).

"prose"

The term could be applied, in the Middle Ages, to rhyming verse.

"the street"

This would have been Spurriergate.

"confitters"

The producers of confectionery (i.e. sweetmeats, known today as candies).

"common hall"

The city guildhall.

"meets Stonegate"

This was halfway up Stonegate.

"Our Lady"

I.e. the Holy Virgin.

TRANSLATION

I, Richard Russell, citizen and merchant of York [...] my body to be buried in my parish church of St. John the Baptist in Hungate, York. [I bequeath] to the rector of my parish church the best cut of cloth from my body, with hood, by way of mortuary payment. And to the same rector, 100s. to pray for my soul.

It is my wish that the belfry of the church of St. John the Baptist be completed, along the lines already begun, at my expense, under the supervision of mason John Cotom. And I wish that carpenter John Bolron construct the door, the ladder, and all the beams from which to hang the bells in the belfry. Also that the church interior be decorated during the following summer, when convenient for the church. Also that a good and useable altar be made out of boards for the north side of the church, before the images of the Blessed Mary and St. Anne, and underneath that altar a cupboard for safekeeping of books and vestments belonging to the altar. And that another suitable altar be made for the south side of the church, before the images of Ss.

Katherine and Mary Magdalene, along the same lines as the other altar. Also that three new stone windows in the church be glazed and filled in, during the following summer, in the best fashion possible, at the discretion of my executors.

I bequeath to the wardens of the church fabric, and their successors, for use in the church of St. John the Baptist in perpetuity:

- a chasuble; an alb of grey fustian with a pattern dyed in and a chasuble;
- two tunics of black arras spangled with Luca gold, and a suit [to go] with the tunics;
- two chasubles, and a cope spangled with golden stars, with a frontal and cloth for the altar in the same style;
- two other altar-cloths and two of my "corpraxis";
- another set of black vestments with strands of Cyprus gold, viz. a chasuble, two tunics, and a cope, with their accessories;
- a large antiphonary, notated, which begins on the third folio with Seph nuncia;
- a legendary in two books, based on the rites and ordinals of the cathedral church of St. Peter of York, of which the first book begins on the second folio with per aliter fieri, and the second book begins on the third folio with mittit servicio;
- two graduals, notated, of which the principal begins on the third folio with Quem Joseph, and the lesser begins on the third folio with Intende qui;
- another new gradual, notated, which begins on the third folio with potenciam;
- a book, notated, containing invitatories with responsories, and collects with processions, for the principal festivals;
- a large missal for the high altar, which begins on the second folio following the table of contents with meus egressus;
- a chalice with paten, and one gilded silver spoon with two silver cruets

On this condition, that the chaplain of the parish then in office shall, from the pulpit of the church, say a special prayer and, at the time for prayer, require all the parishioners who are there each Sunday to say a special prayer, for my soul and the souls of my late wife Petronilla, my parents, my benefactors, and all the faithful deceased, in perpetuity. I bequeath 100s. to the wardens of the fabric of the parish church of St. Saviour in the same city.

I bequeath 40 lb. of wax, in three wax candles to burn around my body at the time of the exequies on my burial day. And 48s. to buy twelve torches, at 4s.each, to burn during those exequies. I wish that eight of them (what remains to burn down) be given to the high altar, two to the altar of the Blessed Mary, and two to the altar of St. Katherine in my parish church, to burn their at the time of the elevation of the Host. Also, 60s. to buy clothing for the paupers who hold the torches during my exequies. To distribute to the poor and needy between the time of my death and the putting of my body into the ground, £13.6s.8d. To distribute to poor folk of the city and suburbs of York who are blind or ill, bed-ridden and not healthy enough to go out, £10. To distribute to poor men and women who are householders in the parishes of St. John the Baptist, St. Saviour, and All Saints in the Marsh, £13.6s.8d, wherever the alms are most needed, according to the discretion of my executors. To distribute to poor men and women, householders or residents of all the other parishes in the city and suburbs of York, at the discretion of my executors, £20.

For my funeral expenses – both my burial and my eighth day [\[commemorative service\]](#) – £50. To each chaplain who celebrates regularly in my parish church, 2s. for being at my funeral. To my parish clerk, 3s.4d. To Thomas, my former parish clerk, 3s.4d. To each chaplain who celebrates in the parish churches and chapels in the city of York and its suburbs, 12d.; of which 4d. is paid to each. To each parish clerk of the same, 6d. To each sub-clerk, 4d. On condition those chaplains and clerks earnestly sing or say the offices for the dead in their parish churches and chapels, with ringing of their bells, for the souls of myself and my late wife Petronilla, our parents, benefactors, and all the faithful deceased.

To each leper in the four leper-houses in the suburbs of York, 5s. To each Maison Dieu in the city and suburbs of York, 10s. To distribute to poor people resident – that is, staying overnight – in the infirmary of St. Leonard's hospital, £3.6s.8d. To each order of mendicant friars of York, to celebrate and say special prayers for my soul, the soul of my late wife Petronilla, and all the souls mentioned above, £10.

Towards the fabrication of new glazed windows above the entrance to the vestry of the monastery of St. Peter, York, £8.

To the nuns of Marrick, to pray for my soul, the soul of my late wife Petronilla, and all the souls mentioned above, £6.13s.4d. To the Prior and convent of Durham, to pray for my soul, the soul of my late wife Petronilla, and all the souls mentioned above, and to repay them fully for the board and lodging I had there in my youth, £6.13s.4d. To the Abbot and convent of Newsham, to celebrate the offices of the dead in their church for my soul, the soul of my late wife Petronilla, and all the souls mentioned above, 40s. To the convent of Holystone, 100s., on the same condition. To friar mag. John Rikall, of the Friars Minor of York, 40s. To friar mag. William Neseham, 6s.8d. To each other master friar of the four orders in the city of York, 6s.8d.

It is my wish that my brother Henry have £3.6s.8d annually for the rest of his life. To Euphemia Russell, daughter of my brother Henry, £40. To each other child of my brother Henry, 100s. I wish for his son Henry junior to receive support from my executors until he is eighteen, if he is willing to be governed by the sensible advice of John Threske. To Robert Russell, the son of my brother John Russell, £30 to provide for his education at Oxford University. To Robert's sister, Elizabeth Russell, £20. Towards the marriage of Petronilla, daughter of John Threske, £20. To Elizabeth, the sister of Christine, late wife of John Threske, £13.6s.8d. To Robert, the brother of Christine, late wife of John Threske, £10. To my sister Joan, 40s.

To be distributed among the husbandmen of the Yorkshire Wolds from whom I have bought wool, £20. Similarly, among the husbandmen of Lindsey, £10. To Lady Agnes Wensley, nun of Marrick, 40s. To William Driffeld, knight, lately tailor of York, 40s. For the repair of bridges and causeways within ten leagues around the city of York, wherever the charity is most needful, £13.6s.8d. To John Matester chaplain of York, 40s. To William Horseley, £10. To the recluse [\[living\]](#) in the cemetery of St. Margaret's church, York, £3.6s.8d, and to the recluse in the cemetery of St. Helen in Fishergate, York, £3.6s.8d. To the recluse in the cemetery of All Saints in North Street, York, 40s. To the Prioress and convent of St. Clement's, York, £3.6s.8d. To the Prior and convent of St. Andrew's, York, 100s. To the cloistered monks of Hull, £3.6s.8d. To the cloistered monks at Mount Grace [Priory], £3.6s.8d. To each order of mendicant friars within Yorkshire, 26s.8d. To each head of a nunnery in Yorkshire, 20s.

To John Turnor chaplain, £46.13s.4d, to pray and celebrate for my soul, the soul of my late wife Petronilla, and the souls of our parents and benefactors and of all the faithful deceased for the full ten years following my death, in my parish church. Furthermore, I wish and prescribe that John Turnor – if he acts well and with propriety in time to come – have the appointment to any chantry that I have established, whenever the occasion may arise. To William Yorke of Berwick and his wife, the daughter of John Barker, £10.

It is my wish that all the lands and tenements that I lately received by the grant and feoffment of John Newland, citizen and goldsmith of York, along Davygate and at its corner opposite Stonegate, be granted in mortmain for a chantry established by him in my parish church, to which chantry my chaplain the aforementioned John is to be appointed. I wish my executors to buy on my behalf certain lands and tenements to the value of eleven or twelve marks a year, with which to establish a chantry – as always, dom. John is to be chosen for these chantries, and he is to celebrate at the altar of the Blessed Mary and Saint Anne in my parish church.

To the Corpus Christi Gild at York, 40s. To Elizabeth Russell my title in four tenements in Walmgate. To John Threske my entire capital messuage.

[Codicil, 1 December 1435:]

To Ellen, the wife of John Threske, a piece of silver with gilded cover, made in the shape of a chalice. I wish my executors to buy a marble slab to place above my body and the body of my late wife Petronilla in my parish church, where our bodies are buried. It is my wish that out of the annual revenues from my capital messuage a suitable and respectable chaplain be found to celebrate divine services continuously in my parish church for thirty years after my death, for my soul, the soul of my late wife Petronilla, and the souls of all the faithful deceased.

DISCUSSION

[I have divided the documents into paragraphs to make for easier reading.]

Rarely does one see in the will of even a wealthy townsman such lavish and detailed attention to funeral arrangements and those pious and charitable gifts that were, to a degree, associated with the funeral and the post-mortem fate of the soul. The preoccupation with this side of things is that much more pronounced when compared to the short shrift given to disposal of realty, and the almost complete absence of any gifts of household valuables or personalia to friends and family. Whether the extent of this testator's investment reflects a deep religiosity or a guilty conscience is not easy to say, but certainly it shows a strong belief in the efficacy of death-bed charitable acts and of the prayers of the poor to ease the burden of the soul in Purgatory. In considering the sincerity of the testator's bequests to the Church and the poor, we may keep in mind that he received his education at the hands of monks at Durham; although he chose not to pursue a career in the Church, the values he learned from the monks may have stayed with him.

Richard Russell lived in the parish of St. John the Baptist, ground reclaimed from the low-lying marshy area around the Foss. By his time it was attracting a few wealthy merchants and appeared to be becoming one of the preferred neighbourhoods of that class, but this did not last and the parish had declined by the late fifteenth century. The parish church no longer survives; Russell's will (of which Raine's transcription is not complete) is one of a relatively small number of sources that provides some documentation about it. The nearby church of St. Saviour, also on formerly marshy ground, likewise served a parochial community that included many merchants and was consequently the recipient of much benefaction.

Russell was a successful vintner who also was much involved in the wool trade. His education at Durham may indicate origins in that part of the country. He had entered the franchise at York in 1396, and two years later we have record of him importing 6 tuns of wine. His wool dealings drew him into the affairs of the Calais stapler community; in April 1407 he was associated with other staplers (such as Richard Whittington) in a loan to the king of £4,000 to pay the wages of the Calais garrison; it was of course in his own interest to ensure the security of the town. Religious he may have been, but the wealth he could bequeath to pious and charitable works – his monetary bequests being well over £600 – was built over a lifetime of shrewd business dealings.

His status and abilities are evidenced by the duties the community assigned him. He was chosen as a city chamberlain in 1409, served as sheriff in 1412/13, and was elected to the mayoralty in 1421 and again in 1430. He also represented the city at two, or possibly three, parliaments, and was present at eleven of the parliamentary elections held there between 1417 and 1435. In January 1425 he is found as mayor of the Calais wool staple, a post more commonly held by wealthy London merchants; but by June 1426 is referred to as "recently" mayor of the staple. In that latter year two ships carrying cargoes of his wool from Hull to Calais were lost at sea. Despite this, he was still in a position to contribute towards another large staple loan to the king in 1433, to support the costs of national defence. Further indication that his mercantile ventures extended beyond wine is seen in his partnership with another leading merchant, Nicholas Blackburn, in a wool export venture. On another occasion he partnered with Blackburn's son-in-law, John Bolton, as did Richard's brother John. Colleagues also in local government, on a par in terms of socio-economic status, and perhaps sharing very similar religious beliefs, Russell and Blackburn may have been quite close. They and William Ormeshede partnered in acquiring, from the earl of Northumberland, property in Cumberland. In 1432 Blackburn chose Russell as one of his executors, along with Ormeshede. Richard is also found exporting cloth and calf skins. Like many other of the leading merchants of the city, he became a member of the Corpus Christi Guild, along with his wife, although not until in 1426.

His wife Petronilla died not long before him; her will was drawn up in March 1434 and received probate in June 1435. Richard had already lost his sister, Alice (widow of York merchant Peter Upstall) in 1431, his friend and associate Nicholas Blackburn, and one daughter, Joan, was also to die before him. Richard's own will was drawn up on 1 December 1435 and received probate on 10 December. His other daughter Ellen had married John Thirsk, another parishioner of St. John's, Hungate, although only a short time before Richard's death, for Thirsk's previous wife, Christine, had died around June 1435. Thirsk, a merchant, went on to serve as mayor of York, and also follow in Richard's footsteps as a mayor of the Calais staple. It is evident from Richard's will that he placed much store by his new son-in-law, whom he had doubtless known for some years and had probably probably carefully chosen as husband for his daughter. An excellent marriage, from the economic perspective, it explains why Richard felt no need to provide directly for Ellen in his will; the bequest to the marriage of his residence may have been part of the marriage settlement. In 1460 Thirsk set up a chantry to celebrate for the soul of Richard and Petronilla Russell, among others; this in fact appears to have been associated with the alienation in mortmain of Russell property for a chantry, which had taken Thirsk 25 years to complete, and it worked to the benefit of Thirsk, who ensured he was among those for whom prayers would be said.

Apart from his married daughter, who received a bequest of property indirectly, via her husband, Richard's nearest blood relatives were his brothers John (died 1443) and Henry and sister Joan. The sister receives cursory mention in the will; probably because her needs were taken care of through marriage. Nor was Henry's benefit from the will great, and one suspects Henry may have been perceived as a failure by Richard, who also had some doubts about Henry's heir. In the children of his brother John – who was like him an industrious wool merchant – he placed, it seems, greater hope; although since John's daughter received real estate, and Robert only money for education, one suspects that Robert was headed for a career in the Church.

NOTES

"John Cotom" "John Bolron"

Bolron was employed by the city at this period as its official carpenter. The city was also doing occasional business with Cotom (it purchased a quantity of parchment from him in 1433/34).

"decorated"

This probably refers to repainting, which is why the work needed to be undertaken in the warmer months and at suitable times (i.e. outside of the hours of service).

"following summer"

Whether. the summer following the death of the testator, or following the completion of the belfry (it being sensible to wait until the dust had settled) is not evident.

"chasuble"

The principal and most visible vestment worn by the priest celebrating Mass.

"alb"

A long white linen tunic, worn under the chasuble.

"fustian"

A heavy-woven fabric.

"tunics"

More strictly, tunicles: the upper vestment worn by subdeacons during celebration of Mass.

"arras"

A term meaning that the cloth had decorations woven in (presumably the spangles).

"Luca gold"

The original has "auro de Luka", which might mean bright gold, but the subsequent reference to Cyprus gold suggests Luka is also a place-name.

"cope"

A vestment similar to a chasuble.

"corpraxis"

Possibly meaning the corporal, a cloth (distinct from an altar-cloth) on which the host and chalice were placed during celebration of Mass, or the cases in which such clothes were stored. Two such cloths might be used at the same time, with one of them used to cover the top of the chalice.

"antiphonary"

A liturgical book containing the chants sung at Mass and other divine services.

"legendary"

A book of readings (lessons) for divine services, perhaps particularly stories about the lives and miracles of the saints.

"gradual"

A book containing liturgical texts (psalms, readings, etc.) used during Mass.

"notated"

I.e. scored musically.

"missal"

A book containing prayers and other devotions said or sung during Mass.

"paten"

A shallow plate on which the consecrated Host (bread) was placed during the Eucharist.

"cruets"

Small containers, one for the sacramental wine and a second for the water used (poured into the chalice) during Mass.

"exequies"

Funeral rites.

"husbandmen"

I.e. those raising sheep.

"Lindsey"

A region of Lincolnshire.

"John Matester"

Possibly a chaplain serving St. Saviour's, as his will (1446) requested burial there.

"John Turnor"

It seems likely that Turnor may have been Russell's private chaplain; the amount of paraphernalia associated with divine services that Russell owned surely point to him having had a private chapel in his capital messuage.

"John Thirsk"

Raine thought that Thirsk's previous wife, Christine, was the link to the Russell family, suggesting she may have been Richard Russell's sister; the hypothesis was adopted by Wedgwood and Holt in History of Parliament: Biographies of the Members of the Commons House, 1439-1509. However, Jenny Kermode [Medieval Merchants: York, Beverley and Hull in the Later Middle Ages, Cambridge: University Press, 1998, 79] identifies Ellen Thirsk as Russell's daughter. Ellen apparently predeceased John, for we hear of two other of his wives. John had become a freeman at York in 1427, was chosen as a city chamberlain in 1433, as sheriff in 1435, and served two mayoral terms in 1442/43 and 1462/63. The latter despite the fact that in 1445 he purchased an exemption from serving on juries and from holding civic office (such exemptions were cards only to be played at need). He also represented York at parliaments of 1445/6, 1449, 1450/1, and 1467/8, and was a frequent participant in other parliamentary elections in the city between 1442 and 1460. He had joined the ranks of the aldermen by 1453. Like many merchants, he dealt in whatever might offer a profit: mainly wool, but also items such as iron, lead, woad, and grain. Thirsk's standing in the mercantile community is evidenced in 1449, when he was appointed to negotiate a trade treaty between England and Flanders; in 1458 he participated in an embassy to Burgundy, which he also helped finance through a loan by the staplers. In 1450 he contributed money, as a loan, towards the defence of Calais (an indication of his own interests there), and was involved in raising other loans in 1454 as a royal commissioner and as a merchant of the staple. Two years later he is found in the office of mayor of the Calais staple, and in 1464 added the duties of treasurer to those of mayor. In 1467 he established the dual role of mayor and treasurer as a permanent feature of the staple administration, seeing this as needed to facilitate repayment to the Staple of a loan of £20,000; he appears to have remained in the office up to his death. That office, together with his involvement in various commissions of enquiry in Picardy, suggest he must have spent a good deal of his time in France, and presumably had some kind of residence in Calais. It must have been demanding to divide his time between there and York, for even after his second mayoralty he remained involved with York's affairs. In 1458 he had co-founded, with William Holbeck, a religious gild there, and in the same year set up a chantry for the soul of Petronilla Russell. In 1466 he endowed another chantry, to pray for the souls of his wives Ellen, Alice and Agnes. In November 1464 he became the new partner of John Ferriby (a yeoman of the Crown, and older brother to a later York mayor of the same name) in custodianship of the Foss Water at York. The last of several royal pardons – not uncommon during the period of national political upheaval – was granted him at the beginning of 1472, when he was described as mayor of the staple, alias mayor of York, alias of Burton by Lincoln, merchant. He was dead by September 1473, when the king consequently took back into his own hands the Foss Water.

After Ralph Segrym's death a memorial brass effigy of he and his wife was placed above their tomb in the church of St. John Maddermarket, Norwich. The replica above was displayed in a museum once housed in St. Peter Hungate. He is depicted wearing a long tunic with baggy sleeves, high-standing collar, and a full-length cloak and mantle.

Segrym had become a freeman of Norwich in 1426/27 as a mercer. He served as chamberlain of the city from 1437 to 1439, as sheriff in 1442/43 and, unusually, again for part of 1447/48 (after city government was restored, following a royal wardenship), and – after representing the city at one of the parliaments of 1449 – as mayor in 1451/52. He participated in four other parliamentary elections at Norwich between 1442 and 1453, on the last occasion being described as an alderman.

Segrym was a benefactor to the city. In 1454 he, in the role of executor of John Wilbeye, used money allocated by Wilbeye to charitable works to construct a separate prison for women in the city guildhall; it was said that he did this out of community-spiritedness. From his own resources he also funded the creation of a chapel inside the guildhall; this may have been to serve prisoners there, for the dedication was to St. Barbara, the patron saint of prisoners, but it could also have been used for chantries.

Segrym himself died ca.1455/56 – another former mayor, Richard Brown, when given a royal pardon (April 1456) was described as his executor – and his bequests included £10 to clean up the river running through Norwich. The following year his executors allocated £133.6s.8d from Segrym's estate towards repairing the city walls, on condition that if the work cost more, the city would pay the remainder. These initiatives were perhaps in response to a complaint from the king ca.1452, addressed to mayor, sheriffs, and the principal aldermen (Segrym among them), that the river passage was obstructed by weeds and the dumping of muck therein, and that the city walls and towers were in so ruinous condition they could not withstand a siege.

Brasses were expensive and it is unlikely that the tombs of many townsmen were thus memorialized. For the majority, buried in a churchyard rather than inside a church, a gravestone would have been their memorial. But few of these have survived and so we have little evidence of the ways in which they may have remembered the deceased.

TRANSLATION

[1. Bailiff convicted of extorting licence fees from butchers]

Goscelin le Serjaunt, an officer of the sheriffs of London and their farmer for collecting tolls on grain and poultry in the city, was attached to answer a charge brought by Henry Rous, butcher of East Cheap, as to why on 4 October 1316, at Henry's shop in East Cheap, London, he used the authority and excuse of his office to take two shillings from Henry, by extortion and distrain. Afterwards, Goscelin levied from Henry two shillings every year, so that he has levied six shillings [altogether] prior to the present. Concerning which he says that he has suffered damages to the value of ten shillings. For that reason he has brought this action etc.

[There follow a series of like charges brought by other East Cheap butchers, 5 for exactions beginning on the same date, 12 for exactions beginning in 1304 (with a total over the years of 36s., and claim of 100s. damages), 3 for exactions beginning in 1314 (16s. levied, damages claimed 40s.), and 2 for exactions beginning in 1315 (12s. levied, damages claimed 20s.).]

Goscelin comes and denies the force and injury in each case of these several offences. He says that Henry and the others have unjustly laid all these accusations. For, he says, he was appointed by the sheriffs of London to collect certain tolls belonging to the farm of the London shrievalty; and because of that office Goscelin, and others who held the office before him, from the time that the shrieval revenues were granted to the community of the city by John former king of England, the great-grandfather of the present king, have taken two shillings annually from each butcher who wishes to have a stall outside his house from which to display and sell meat, for the city sheriffs to put towards the farm of the shrievalty. He says that the sheriffs of London similarly, in the same way, took two shillings annually from each butcher's stall at the time when the shrievalty was in the hands of King John and his predecessors who were kings of England. He also says that because Henry and each of the others had a stall outside their houses for selling meat displayed there, he took from each of them 2 shillings annually for the use of the sheriffs of the city, just as other sheriffs' bailiffs before him took and were accustomed to levy from that time. And this he is ready to prove.

Henry and each of the others individually say that the two shillings levied from each of them by Goscelin was something new, and that Goscelin levied those two shillings from Henry and each of the others by his own wrongful action and under guise of his office. Each of them individually requests a public enquiry, and Goscelin makes the same request. Therefore a jury is to be convened etc.

The jurors – that is, Thomas de Wyntone, Roger Sterre, Robert Austin, Robert Swote, William de Braie stockfishmonger, Geoffrey Beauflur, Walter de Mor, William Haunsard, John Freishfish, John de Mockynge, Adam Inthelane, Walter de Stebenhithe, say under oath that the bailiffs and officers appointed by the sheriffs of their time first began to levy and take two shillings from each butcher of London about 24 years ago. They add that prior to that period it was never the custom to levy 2 shillings in that way from each butcher, as Goscelin claims etc.

Upon this the king sent an order to his justices, by a writ, in the following words:

Edward, by the grace of God etc. to his justices in eyre at the Tower of London, greetings. The mayor, sheriffs and community of our city of London have informed us that they and their ancestors, citizens of that city, have previously always received and had as part of [the revenues towards] the farm of their city, paid by them to us and our ancestors, 2 shillings annually from every butcher of the city for each stall set up in our streets outside those butchers' shops, to be levied by the city sheriffs. But that a certain Goscelin le Serjaunt, who was farming from the sheriffs the two shillings annual toll, has recently submitted himself to an inquest on the matter, [having been accused] before you in eyre by Henry le Rous of East Cheap and other butchers of the city of unjustly and extortionately levying from each of them that two shillings, at his own initiative; he not having called in his defence the mayor, sheriffs and community (who are particularly capable of defending those tolls), but having entirely ignored them. By which inquest, it is said, Goscelin has been convicted. So that, if this goes further, it clearly may be to the permanent detriment of the mayor, sheriffs and community and to the rights that they claim belong to them in this matter. Because we do not wish it to be prejudicial against the mayor, sheriffs and community in that way, we command you to suspend passing judgement on this case, and to send the documentation of the legal process before our council at Westminster on 13 October next, arranging with the parties to be there on the same date to hear and obey whatever decision our council might reach on this matter. You are also to have this writ there. Witnessed by myself at Westminster, 3 July 1321.

[2. Sergeants prohibited from demanding gratuities from city businesses]

Forasmuch as it is not becoming or agreeable to propriety that those who are in the service of reverend men, and from them or through them have the advantage of befitting food and raiment, as also, of reward or remuneration in a competent degree, should, after a perverse custom, be begging aught of people, like paupers; and seeing that in times past, every year at the Feast of Our Lord's Nativity [25 December], according to a certain custom, which has grown to be an abuse, the vadlets of the Mayor, the Sheriffs, and the Chamber of the said city – persons who have food, raiment, and appropriate advantages, resulting from their office – under colour of asking for an oblation, have begged many sums of money of brewers, bakers, cooks, and other victuallers; and in some instances have more than once threatened wrongfully to do them an injury if they should refuse to give them something; and have frequently made promises to others, that in return for a present they would pass over their unlawful doings in mute silence; to the great dishonour of their masters, and to the common loss of all the City: therefore, on Wednesday, the last day of April, in the 7th year etc., by William Sevenok, the Mayor, and the Aldermen of London, it was ordered an established, that no vadlet or other serjeant of the Mayor, Sheriffs, or City, should in future beg or require of any person, of any rank, degree, or condition, whatsoever, any moneys, under colour of an oblation, or in any other way, on pain of losing his office.

DISCUSSION

The sergeants (a term derived from "servant") and bailiffs attached to the principal city officers and to the bureaucratic arm of government, the chamber, were responsible for executing tasks set them by their masters and so were frequently out and about in the community, enforcing court orders and collecting fines or other revenues. This provided ample opportunity for venality to those so inclined, and sergeants appear to have been chosen in part for their brawn, enabling them to be forceful in the execution of their duties. However, it does not follow that all cases in which such officials are accused of extortion under colour of their office represent a straightforward matter of corruption.

The first case above, although presented initially as an act of extortion by one of the sheriffs' staff, is in fact concerned with whether the city would be able to impose fees for trading licences on the butchers. The city authorities recognized the importance of this case when the record of it was copied into one of the volumes of city memoranda and precedents, the Liber Custumarum, along with other proceedings of the London eyre of 1321.

Although the jury verdict went against the city, it may be that the jury membership – which included fishmongers and likely other victuallers – saw in the two shilling annual fee the thin end of a wedge that might later be used against them. Goscelin is here the scapegoat in a political battle, with the butchers making a concerted attack on an unpopular levy on their trade; a levy the city authorities, far from disowning Goscelin, were eager to protect. We need not believe Goscelin's claim that the levy had been in effect since the beginning of the thirteenth century, but nor need we see it as a personal initiative of Goscelin at extortion. We may also note that Goscelin was one of several bureaucratic officials dismissed for abuses of office, as a result of a royal investigation of London government in 1319; but without placing too much emphasis on this, for the investigation was part of another political battle, as a populist party led by victualling interests sought successfully to overthrow a faction of professional administrators that had held power for several years.

The venue for the accusation of Goscelin must also be taken into account, for the 1321 eyre was an attempt to challenge many of the powers of the city government. The bakers complained at the eyre about a fee the city had imposed for weighing grain at the time they purchased it. The men of Billingsgate, a ward associated with the fish trade (and also containing East Cheap), accused Goscelin le Serjaunt of having, when in the office of bailiff of the queen's river, taken 1 fish per basket from a fish cargo brought to the wharf by foreign merchants, on the grounds of a toll, although no such toll ever existed; the jury placed the blame for this innovation on a previous bailiff, and the court banned further exactions. The bailiff of London Bridge and Old Fish Street (one of the locations of a fish market) was also indicted for taking unwarranted tolls from residents of the street; he was imprisoned, and the exaction banned. Another man was likewise condemned for levying a new toll on boats transporting rushes and other goods.

On the other hand, the description of Goscelin as the farmer of this revenue source may indicate that the sheriffs had either contracted out the collection to someone not one of their regular officers, or had assigned to one of their officers a specific target that had to be collected towards the city fee farm, payment of which was one of the fundamental duties of the sheriffs. In either case, it would have been left to the collector to raise this sum as he thought fit, and pocket a surplus, if any. Such an arrangement was an incentive to extortion, but in this case the butchers' target seems not to have been Goscelin's behaviour, which may not have exceeded his mandate, or any profit he may have been making therefrom, but the toll itself. It is not clear what the resolution of the dispute was; however, just before the attention to Goscelin's case, the justices had ordered the butchers' stalls in East Cheap torn down, after a complaint by the men of Candlewick ward (into which the street of East Cheap led). The mayor protested that this would result in the butchers selling meat from within their houses, which would make the trade harder to police; he did not mention, but may have had in mind, that it would also deprive the city of licence fees from the stalls. Just possibly the complaint was a desperate ploy by the butchers to rid themselves of the toll.

As the second text above indicates, there were certain long-standing customs involving small gifts, and it was widespread in medieval society to grease the wheels of administration, or to curry favour with men of in positions high and low, through small payments. Clerks in the employ of urban governments often charged small fees for the undertaking of official acts on behalf of private citizens; this was not seen as improper, so long as the fees were modest. However, such practices were open to exploitation; gifts could easily turn into bribery or blackmail. One example of this is seen at Colchester, but examples can also be found in other towns.

It may have been not that the situation had greatly worsened by 1419, but that this year saw in the mayoralty a man not inclined to tolerate such abuses. William Sevenok has been described as "A pious, even puritanical man" [Carole Rawcliffe, History of Parliament: The House of Commons 1386-1421, IV, 340], and a generous benefactor to several city churches, as well as founder of a grammar school at Sevenoaks, Kent, where his father or step-father had been based. This prominent citizen had served in a wide range of capacities in London, before going into semi-retirement six years before his death in 1432. For the city he was an auditor of accounts (first in 1399/1400 and on two later occasions); a tax collector (1402); warden of London Bridge (1404-06); a post that brought him the reputation as an expert on bridge maintenance; alderman (1411-26); sheriff (1412/13); parliamentary representative (1417); and mayor (1418/19). For his community he was a churchwarden of St. Dunstan's in the East around 1400 and was called on to act as arbitrator in various disputes between private citizens. For the king he served on various commissions relating to recruitment of troops, judicial proceedings, and victualling of the army; as regards the last, in his capacity as alderman he assisted the mayor to set prices for the ale to be supplied, the containers they were to be sent in, and for costs of transporting them. For his fellow merchants he was warden of the Grocers' Company in 1404/05, having begun his career in 1394 as an ironmonger, but shortly afterwards paid a large sum of money to transfer to the grocers; in the years that followed he is seen exporting wool and salt, and importing wine and cloth, as well as buying large quantities of wheat in northern England, for sale in London. During his mayoralty, in addition to forbidding the sergeants to seek perks at Christmas time, he took action to suppress mummary and other rowdy behaviour at that season. He also prohibited the fraudulent abuses of adding artificial colouring to lower-quality wine in order to pass it off for better wine, or of mixing different types of wine, at the encouraging citizens to inform on any trader adulterating wine in that way. Furthermore, he closed down Ludgate prison, on the grounds that citizens convicted of debt were choosing to go there rather than repay those debts and, once inside, were using their money to make themselves comfortable and continue their bad habits (including bringing false charges against members of the city elite); the inmates were transferred to the harsher conditions of Newgate. His successor as mayor, Richard Whittington, however, reversed this because the transfer resulted in the deaths of several prisoners.

Sevenok's severity, if a feature of his administrative career as a whole, may be guessed to have made him some enemies. In 1413, during his shrievalty, he was informed that an elderly scrivener, John Askwyth, had let escape (whether from custody or sanctuary is unclear) a priest caught in the act of fornication; he summoned Askwyth to answer the charge. During the interrogation, Askwyth became angry, took hold of Sevenok and insisted he show him justice regardless of any personal prejudice. Sevenok had him thrown into one of the Counters, and complained to the court of mayor and aldermen. Askwyth confessed and threw himself on the mercy of the court but, despite his age, it was decided to make an example of him, and he was stripped of citizenship and put into Newgate for a year (itself a likely sentence of death for an old man). Two years later Sevenok was interrogating grocer Thomas Maynelle, a resident of Tower ward of which Sevenok was alderman, about unspecified "irregular and sinister doings and sayings" [Riley, op.cit., 605]; Maynelle became angry with what was being laid at his door and warned Sevenok to act honestly, or he would suffer the same fate as Nicholas Brembre, a former mayor. Maynelle was again sentenced to a year in Newgate, but in this instance Sevenok intervened and obtained leniency.

NOTES

"officer of the sheriffs"

Whether he was, strictly speaking, one of the sheriffs' sergeants at this time is unclear; it is his surname rather than a specific reference, that leads one to that conclusion. In the official record he is referred to as a bailiff, which could be used generically, while in an independent report of the proceedings he is referred to as a beadle and as the sheriff's bailiff.

"East Cheap"

The smaller of the two shopping ("chepe") areas, or markets, of London dedicated principally to foodstuffs.

"two shillings"

Collected quarterly, 6d. a quarter.

"he says"

Not literally; the arguments for the defence were made by a lawyer, not Goscelin personally, but the lawyer is of course assumed to be speaking with Goscelin's voice.

"certain tolls"

The original term is custumas, as opposed to the theolonio mentioned in the opening sentence. However, these were not customs duties in the sense that we would use the term today, but rather customary payments such as, but not necessarily restricted to, tolls on commerce.

"stall"

An independent report of the process indicates that the stall took the form of a framework or overhang (perhaps attached to the shop) from which carcasses or cuts were hung.

"public enquiry"

The original inquiri per patriam ("to be enquired by the countryside") is a request to bring together a jury from the locality to give its opinion on the facts.

"oblation"

An offering (i.e. something of a theoretically voluntary nature, rather than a required payment); the term is more commonly found in a religious or charitable context.

"scapegoat"

Even after the jury's verdict was that the toll had only been in effect 24 years, Goscelin's lawyers demanded he be exonerated, on the grounds that the innovation had taken place during a former administration, and he was simply continuing a practice previously (even if wrongly) established. Since sheriffs held office for only a year, Goscelin clearly served under several sets; the accusations suggest Goscelin was in the office by 1304, but less likely he was so since ca.1296, although the court itself was uncertain on that point and proposed to make enquiry. Prosecution made the rebuttal that, even if the wrong had been initiated by others and even if Goscelin himself had no profit from the exaction, he was equally in the wrong for continuing it. There was some debate over whether it was the sheriffs who should have been charged.

RICARDIAN FRIENDS OF BARLEY HALL

Society Members Form Group to Aid York's Hidden Ricardian Treasure

[\[Barley Hall Index\]](#) [\[Richard III Society/American Branch\]](#)

Many travelers to the medieval city of York, even Ricardians, overlook a site tucked away in one of its back alleys-- Barley Hall, a fifteenth-century townhouse in Coffee Yard.

This is a shame, because Barley Hall offers us something that no other site in York can match -- a look at medieval life as it was lived by the emerging middle class that gave such strong allegiance to the Yorkists, in a house occupied by one of Richard III's urban supporters. The Barley Hall team has restored the building to its fifteenth-century appearance, and is recreating its furnishings and other objects to give us a look at medieval life as medieval people would have seen it.

BARLEY HALL seen from the courtyard. Until recently, this monastic-hospice-turned-goldsmith's-residence in a York back alley was bricked up and used for offices and workshops. Now, the Ricardian Friends of Barley Hall are helping to provide for its continued survival. Photo by Simon Ian Hill FRPS, © York Archaeological Trust. Used with permission.

Barley Hall was constructed as a townhouse for a Wakefield-based priory.

Later it became the townhouse of a goldsmith who was one of the members of York City Council to learn of Richard III's death on August 23, 1485. It is architecturally significant, historically significant, and connected to Ricardian history. And it needs Ricardian help.

Barley Hall's story is, in its own quiet way, a cliffhanger, and the last chapter isn't written yet by any means. To help assure its continued existence, members of our parent society have formed the Ricardian Friends of Barley Hall, dedicated to increasing awareness of and support for this important piece of our Yorkist heritage. With the travel season rapidly approaching, American Ricardians may want to add this site to their York itineraries, especially if they can visit during the Richard III Society days (from June 26, the date of Richard's accession, through July 4).

A Narrow Escape from the Wrecker's Ball

Barley Hall's medieval origins had been long forgotten by 1980, when it appeared to be a jumble of brick structures. Ironically, millions of tourists had literally walked right through what was originally an internal corridor of the L-shaped house as they used the Coffee Yard snickelway (an alley-like passageway from one street to another) to travel from busy Stonegate to Swinegate and Grape Lane. When its medieval origins were documented in 1980, it was also classed as a "dangerous structure," a prime candidate for demolition.

Four years later, a developer bought the site, planning to convert the crumbling buildings into offices and apartments. When an archeological survey revealed the building's true nature, the York Archaeological Trust stepped in and purchased the building, intending to make it an example of a medieval citizen's residence, something missing from York's stellar array of medieval buildings open to the public. The building was re-named Barley Hall in honor of Professor Maurice Barley (d. 1990), founder and chairman of the Trust and an expert on "vernacular" buildings.

Finding Barley Hall

Tucked away in a snickelway as it is, Barley Hall is a true hidden treasure, which is one of the pleasures and the frustrations of getting to it. It wasn't listed on any of the tourist maps Roy and I picked up, at our hotel and elsewhere, when we visited York last summer. So plan before you go. [\[printable map\]](#)

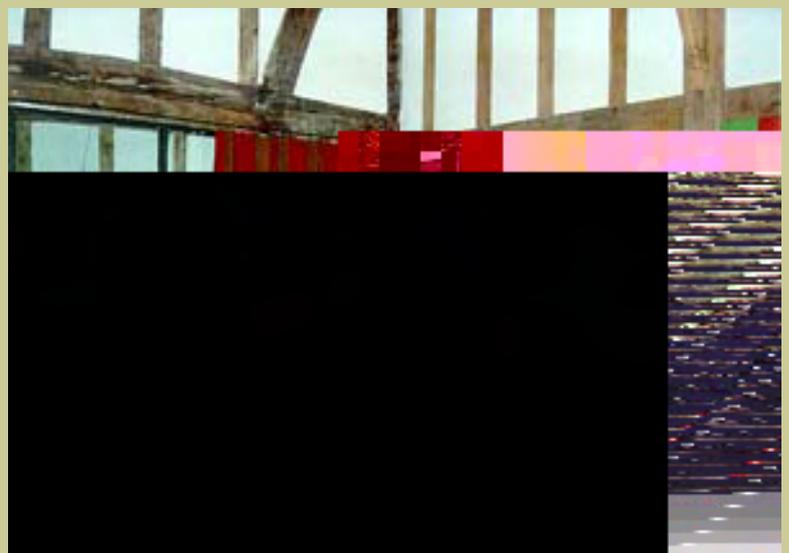

Coffee Yard is a snickelway that runs between Stonegate -- a very fashionable address in the later middle ages -- and Grape Lane. From the South door of York Minster, walk down Stonegate, cross High/Low Petergate, and watch for an elaborate wrought-iron sign saying "Olde Starre Inn" that stretches all the way across Stonegate, preceded by a few meters by a small cast-iron Red Devil somewhat above eye-level on your left. The Devil is famous -- you can buy postcards with his picture on them all over York -- and he's a marker for the snickelway. Turn in, and the building you see arching over the next passageway when you emerge from the first tunnel is Barley Hall.

The Devil.

If you buy a copy of Mark Jones' popular "snickelways" guidebook while in York (or have one in your library), you may find references to the "hospice to Nostell priory" in the section on Coffee Yard. When these books were written, there was talk of restoring the building to its condition when it was the priory hospice, and that is how the building we know as Barley Hall is identified in older editions.

Although I had a map and was planning to search out Barley Hall the next day when I was in York last summer, I happened upon it quite by accident on my way to dinner in Grape Lane. Since Coffee Yard goes right through the building, the Trust has cleverly put a large glass wall at the end of the Great Hall facing the passageway (and they leave the lights on). The vast expanse of glass may not be authentic, but it certainly is effective. The view of the Great Hall lights up the gloomy passage, and I suddenly found myself staring right through the glass and into a welcoming fifteenth century hall, all ready for a festive dinner.

The Priory Hospice

As part of its investigative work, the York Archaeological Trust sent twenty-two timber samples from two ranges, or wings, of Barley Hall to the Nottingham University Tree Ring Dating Laboratory.

They found that the older part of the building, described in this section, was built from oak from one small area of woodland, felled in 1359-60. Builders didn't wait for beams to cure in those days, so the Trust could be pretty confident that this part of the building went up in 1360 or 1361.

Barley Hall was originally built as a monastic "hostel" or townhouse for the Augustinian Priory of St. Oswald at Nostell, near Wakefield in West Yorkshire. The priors of Nostell had been members of York Minster's governing body since 1130, and were expected to be present for important ceremonies and services. Additionally, York was an important regional center with a diverse population of noblemen, craftsmen, and merchants, and both ecclesiastical and civil courts. Nostell Priory thus had a number of pragmatic reasons to maintain a presence in the city, and so they built their hostel on a strip of land leased from the Minster.

The prior who commissioned the present building, Thomas de Dereford, is remembered as an unbending disciplinarian who was rarely seen to laugh; but his careful management greatly increased the wealth and status of the priory. The building included a section that still stands as the North or "Chamber" range. It consists of ground floor rooms, possibly used for storage, and at least five chambers on the first and second storeys. A central "Great Chamber" extended through both storeys to the roof, with pairs of single-storey rooms, one above the other on either side. The chambers served both as sleeping and living rooms, and the Great Chamber had a stairway entrance from the courtyard.

In addition to this Chamber range, the 1360-era building also had a Great Hall range, in the same location as the current Great Hall range, and another range, set parallel to the Chamber range to form a U-shaped building. After the stone-faced Prior Dereford died, the Priory fell on hard times, and by 1438 the canons were complaining of extreme poverty. Their records indicate that they were buying supplies closer to home, and thus had less need for a luxurious York townhouse. The obvious solution: make money by renting it out.

William Snawsell, Lord Mayor and Alderman

The second group of tree-ring samples, from the Great Hall range, indicates that this part of Barley Hall was rebuilt in the 1430s. Some of the construction techniques smack of work done on the cheap, leading the Barley Hall construction team to theorize that it was built by a tenant who was not necessarily concerned about the long-term effects of his actions. It took some creative work with hidden steel beams to save this part of the structure during the restoration.

We don't know who was responsible for the rebuilding. We do know, however, that the first record of rental for the property is from 1466, when it was leased -- for the then-astronomical sum of fifty-three shillings and fourpence -- to one of York's leading citizens, William Snawsell.

Snawsell's family originally came from Gloucestershire, but had settled in York by the middle of the fourteenth century. "Our" Snawsell inherited his grandfather's property in the city, and took on his father's trade of goldsmithing, becoming a goldsmith to the Minster canons. He owned considerable property both in York and in surrounding villages. He was married to Joan Thweng of Sheriff Hutton, whose cousin Agnes was married to Thomas Wytham, one of the councillors of Richard Duke of Gloucester.

Snawsell became increasingly prominent in York civic affairs, first as a member of the Corpus Christi and Holy Trinity Guilds, then becoming Chamberlain (finance officer) in 1459, Sheriff in 1464-65, and finally, Lord Mayor in 1468 and alderman for two decades thereafter.

THE GREAT HALL. The square hearth in the center of the floor, the raised dais, and the patterned tile floor are reconstructed based on evidence found during the archaeological excavations. The designs on the red-and-green striped painted wall hangings (left) are based on a fifteenth-century Book of Hours. The furnishings in this room were made possible by a grant from the London Clothworkers' Foundation. (Photo by Lynda Pidgeon, used with permission)

THE PARLOR. In this room William Snawsell, an Alderman in the City of York during Richard's time as duke of Gloucester and King, would have received business associates, and its furnishings were calculated to impress the visitor. Shown here are some of Barley Hall's meticulous reproductions: chair, table, stool, writing desk, pottery, and hornbooks. Many of the items shown here were made possible by gifts from local residents and merchants. The Ricardian Friends of Barley Hall hope to raise funds for the construction of additional furnishings. (Photo by Lynda Pidgeon, used with permission.)

His career intersected with that of Richard III in several ways. He was kissing cousin to one of Richard's councillors, as noted above. As an alderman (a post he held for 23 years, stepping down in 1492, when in his late seventies), he often turned out in his scarlet gown to greet the Duke of Gloucester, and as a fellow member of the Corpus Christi guild, he would have walked in procession with the Duke and Duchess of Gloucester on this feast day. After Richard III's accession, Snawsell joined the civic party taking gifts to Richard's son, Edward of Middleham. Snawsell was prominent in the ceremonies surrounding Richard III's September 1483 visit to York, and two years later he was present at the emergency meeting of the City Council that dispatched troops to Richard III's aid in the fight against Henry Tudor. His name is first among the councillors who were present to hear John Sponor's August 23 report that "King Richard late mercifully reigning upon us was through grete treason...piteously slane and mured to the grete hevyness of this citie." Later, making the best of a bad bargain, he swore allegiance to Henry VII. He died two or three years after resigning as alderman. His will has not survived, so we know neither the date of his death nor the place of his burial, although we do know that he had left Barley Hall by 1489.

Decline of Barley Hall

The later history of Barley Hall awaits further research, but we know that the building was marred by poor quality brick repairs and was divided into smaller and smaller units. By Victorian times it had become a hodgepodge of offices and workshops. In the 1930s and 1940s, its tenants included an undertaker, a radio repairer, and a tire vulcanizer. Its last tenant was Mr. Auton, a plumber, who filled the Great Hall with plumbing fixtures and the tools of his trade as recently as 1978.

Barley Hall Today

After years of painstaking archeological and historical research, the York Archaeological Trust has decided to furnish and equip the interior as it would have appeared in 1483. This makes Barley Hall unique among York's medieval sites – visitors can actually experience a late-medieval townhouse as the inhabitants themselves would have known it, not as a museum filled with objects half a millennium old.

Fortunately, the York area is rich in archival resources, and has many surviving objects which can serve as patterns for the furnishings, crockery, and other items in Barley Hall. Because of later medieval York's strong connection to the Low Countries, many houses contained objects of 'Flanders make,' and these are also represented in the material furnishings of Barley Hall.

A visit to Barley Hall today means a step back in time, as authentically-recreated as archaeology and historical research can make it. On special days, guides in costume appropriate to the period explain their master's connection to our Good King Richard. They lead visitors on a tour that includes detailed explanations of both the function of the objects found in Great Hall, Parlor, Kitchen, Pantry, Buttery, and Chamber and of the processes of restoration and rebuilding. Visitors are encouraged to handle pottery, sit on chairs and peer into chests. At other times or if they simply prefer it, visitors can tour Barley Hall at their own pace, listening to a pre-recorded tour narrated by Robert Hardy CBE and Dame Judi Dench. Visitors wishing to contribute to the general fifteenth-century ambience (or keep warm in spring or fall months!) may borrow medieval garb.

Barley Hall is open seven days from 10:00 a.m., with last admission at 4:00 p.m., July through October this year. Admission is £3.50, concessions £2.50, under 6 and disabled free. Group bookings and winter openings are by appointment; call the Barley Hall Office on (01904) 610275, or write Barley Hall, 2 Coffee Yard, off Stonegate, York YO1 8AR.

Ricardian Friends of Barley Hall

The York Archaeological Trust has committed considerable funding to the restoration of Barley Hall and to its day-to-day operation, but always with the expectation that it would become self-sustaining at some point. While restoration work on the building itself is largely complete, Barley Hall still is a long way from being properly furnished and fitted out. Despite its hidden location, Barley Hall is able to attract enough paying visitors to meet its ongoing expenses. However, it is encumbered by a loan from the York Archaeological Trust, which must be repaid if the building is to remain open; and it will need additional revenue to complete its furnishing.

In April 1998, a group of Barley Hall's supporters formed the Barley Hall Trust. Three Society members were asked to be Trustees and were given permission to form a group of Friends within the Richard III Society to support this imaginative and exciting project. The Friends' mission is to promote Barley Hall as an educational and historical attraction, and to raise funds to assist in the completion of the restoration and furnishing of Barley Hall. Ricardians are encouraged to make Barley Hall their York "tourist information center." Friends members have prepared guides to Ricardian York and Ricardian Yorkshire, with other guides to sites with particular connections to our period, and these are available at the Hall. As a contribution to this project, the American Branch is donating server space and web design for the Friends web site, and is also sponsoring July 4 as an American Branch Day at Barley Hall.

TRANSLATION

On 26 March 1464, I, John Stokker, alderman of London, [being] of sound mind, bequeath my soul to Almighty God and my body to be buried in the chancel of St. Michael Cornhill. I bequeath 40s. to the church, and 40s. to the parson for forgotten offerings. I wish to have a Dirige at my month's mind, without candlesticks, with 4 tapers and 12 torches and 16 poor men to hold the tapers and torches. Each poor man is to have 20d. I wish that every priest [of that church] have 10s., to recite the Dirige by note at the month's mind, and every clerk 10s. to pray zealously for my soul. To all other priests who attend my Dirige, 4d. apiece. When my month's mind is concluded, I wish that 1 torch be left at the high altar, another torch go to the brotherhood of Our Lady, another to [the altar of] St. Michael, another to St. Christopher, another to St. George. I wish to have a priest to sing for my soul and for all my friends' souls in St. Michael's church for the term of 5 years. That priest is also to pray for all those persons from whom I ever took any goods wrongfully, privately or publicly, and for all the souls of such persons.

I wish that my wife Katherine have all my household [items] for as long as she remains single. Should she marry, then the household is to be divided between my children and her; that is, Katherine is to have half of my household and my children the other half. As for my plate, I wish my wife to have half and my children the other half – excepting such plate as I bequeath to other people.

First, I bequeath my cousin William Stokker the largest Christmas bowl. Also, I bequeath my cousin John Stokker the standing cup [decorated] with the columbine. I wish my cousin John Pake to have a standing cup with gilt chasing. I wish Agnes Basse to have 40s. and her husband 40s. I bequeath to Pernella Calett, my brother's daughter, 1 pottle pot, chased. I bequeath 20 nobles to John Stokker's daughter Alison. I bequeath 40s. to Robert Stokker, the son of my brother, and I bequeath 40s. to his brother Thomas. I bequeath £10 to Simon Hogon. I bequeath £10 to William Sawstone. I bequeath 40s. to John Serley, 40s. to Robert Holt, 40s. to John Nek, 40s. to William Couper, and I bequeath 20s. to John Cooke. I bequeath £6.13s.4d to Elizabeth Reder. I bequeath £5 to Emlyn Mirfyn. I bequeath £5 to Margaret Baron. And 20s. to little Robin.

I bequeath my wife half the remainder of all my possessions, and the other half to my sons John and William. I bequeath my wife all my income for as much of her lifetime as she remains unmarried; if she takes a husband she may have only her dower. That remainder is to go to my children after my wife is dead. I wish my son John Stokker to have the house in which Hungerford is living, the house that Nicholas Notman rents from me in Cornhill, the house in which William White draper lives, and my stable. I bequeath my son William Stokker my renter in Thames Street, in which Pynke the cordwainer and Richard Couper live. I also wish my son William Stokker to have the house at Radclyf, with all the lands and meadows I own there. If either of my children dies without issue, then his brother is to inherit all. If they both die without issue, then I wish my cousin William Stokker to have the house in which William White lives, and the house in which Hungerford lives. And I wish my cousin John to have my house at Radclyf with the land and meadow. I wish my cousin John Pake to have the house in Cornhill in which Nicholas Notman lives. I wish Thomas Basse's wife to have my house in Thames Street in which Pynke and Richard Couper live. And I wish William Stokker to have my stable. If any of those men die without issue, then it goes to my next of kin among the sons of Henry Stokker, my brother.

I wish my debts to be faithfully paid. I wish Laurence Martyn to have £10 in recompense for various things. I wish John Hille of Brikhille to have to his own use the house of which I have ownership; concerning which I have the legal documents, which I wish you to return to him. I appoint as my executors William Stokker and my cousin John Pake; and I appoint as my overseer Philip Malpas, who is to have 20 nobles for his labour. I wrote this testament with my own hand.

DISCUSSION

John Stokker served London as an alderman from 1454 to his death in 1464, although it was not until 1477 that his widow, Katherine, put before the city authorities his will for registration. The will she presented had long before received probate in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, necessitated by Stokker's real estate outside of London. The delay seems not to be related to the sons coming of age, for the elder son William is said to have done so in 1472, although John's executor was his cousin of that name, not the son. Perhaps the timing had something to do with Katherine's health or marital status, but something was certainly afoot, for in 1478 Katherine and the other executors were involved in transactions to firm up rights to property.

The family was involved in the drapery trade, and its London interests seem to have been centered in the parish of St. Dunstan in the East. John himself was a draper, and a later alderman (1479-85) of the same name was too – the testator being referred to as John Stokker senior as early as 1457 – and his executor William Stokker (alderman 1470-85) was another draper. These two were not the testator's sons, but probably kinsmen, and their family roots were in Bedfordshire; they and Henry Stokker founded a chantry in their home town ca.1471. This drapery business was of a mercantile nature. In 1438 an investigation held at Sittingbourne, Kent found that John Stokker had the previous year smuggled 80 woollen cloths, worth £100, by shipping them from the Isle of Sheppey without paying customs. Stokker appealed to the king, protesting his innocence and claiming that it was a false and malicious charge brought by personal enemies. Whatever the truth, the affair had no great impact on his fortunes. In 1440 he was engaged in importing salt when his ship, along with others, was threatened by pirates from Holland and Zealand, forcing the king to send out ships to try to capture the pirates. Stokker was evidently well respected by his fellow drapers, for he was often called upon to act as a trustee for them, from the late 1430s into the early '60s; he played the same role for men of other crafts as well.

His involvement in international trade is reflected in a role he was called upon to play in the summer of 1450. Along with Henry Bermyngham, a Lynn merchant, and Thomas Kent, a clerk of the king's council, Stokker was sent on a diplomatic mission to Prussia. This was in regard to some trade violation (perhaps a seizure of merchandize) affecting John Stokker and Robert Stokker, Bermyngham and his partner Thomas Talbot, John and William Catrik of York, and perhaps others. Those merchants put up £400 as a loan to the king to finance the mission, and were authorized to recoup the costs via exemptions on customs they would otherwise have paid on export cargoes.

Bermyngham (whose expense account survives) returned about a year later. However, Kent and Stokker – who had apparently already taken the precaution of appointing Robert Stokker and several other drapers as trustees of all his goods during his absence – had been arrested and imprisoned at Lubeck; it may be in association with this that Robert Stokker and other Londoners were ordered (September 1450) to arrest the ships and merchandize of Hanse merchants – the same order being sent to authorities in Ipswich and Colchester, and in May 1453 the king appointed a commission to find out whether the Lynn authorities had, in retaliation, arrested men of Lubeck, as he had ordered. John Stokker had already been released by that time, however; he was back in London before the end of 1451. His business had not been severely hurt by the affair, it seems, for in 1456 we hear of a transaction through which Thomas and Simon Eyre, London drapers, owed Stokker £236. In 1457 he was a member of a royal commission to put together a fleet to accompany the king's army in a campaign.

"month's mind"

A commemorative ceremony held a month after the funeral; also known as the trental.

"tapers"

Long, slender candles placed in holders (not candlesticks).

"by note"

Musically notated; that is, sung rather than said.

"other priests"

In the original, "straunge prestes" meaning strangers (i.e. not associated with) to the church of St. Michael.

"pottle pot"

A pot with a half-gallon capacity.

"nobles"

A coin of value 6s.8d.

"income"

The original has livelode (i.e. livelihood) and I take this to mean annual income such as would come from rents.

"Radclyf"

Perhaps Redcliff, Somerset, but more likely Radclive, Buckinghamshire.

TRANSLATION

In the name of God, Amen. I, Joan, the widow of John de Thornhegge, burgess of Lynn, on 24 February 1341 have set out my testament in the following manner. First, I commend my soul to God, the Blessed Virgin Mary, and all the saints, and my body to be buried in St. Margaret's church, Lynn, on the north side of John's tomb. I bequeath 20s. to the high altar of that church, and 6s.8d to its fabric. I bequeath 13s.4d to the convent of the Friars Minor at Lynn. I bequeath 10s. to John de Cantbrigge, a lay brother of that order, for his necessaries. I bequeath 6s.8d to the convent of the Friars Preacher at Lynn. I bequeath 2s. to the Magdalene lepers next to the Lynn Causeway. To the lepers of Cowgate, 2s. To the lepers of Hardwick, 2s. To the lepers of Setchey, 2s. I bequeath £10 for my funeral expenses. I bequeath 20s. to my niece Margaret, a nun at Blackborough, for her necessaries. I bequeath 40d. to Alice Bataille, nun of the same house.

It is my wish that out of my goods my executors arrange for the celebration of four anniversaries for my soul and those to whom I am beholden, in St. Margaret's church by suitable chaplains chosen by them. I bequeath to my daughters Agnes and Margaret, and their daughters, to be divided among them in equal shares, the whole of my bedroom and its contents, viz. hangings, blankets, linens, quilt, of whatever type or colour, bed, pillows, table linen, and towels. I bequeath to my daughter Agnes a gilded silver cup with cover, a girdle [decorated] with pearls, a golden box, and 2 gold rings of which one has a sapphire embedded and the other a peridot.

I bequeath to John de Massingham, [his wife] Margaret my daughter, their daughters Joan and Agnes, and the legitimate heirs of Joan and Agnes, my capital tenement in the town of Bishop's Lynn, lying between the tenement formerly of Folkard le Estrish on the north and the tenement formerly of Katherine de Lyndiseye on the south, and extending in length from the public road called the Exchequer to the west as far as the tenement of Ralph de Brunham to the east; as well as all vessels and utensils of lead or wood belonging to the tenement. On condition that John pay my executors £40 for the fulfillment and performance of my testament, and that he, for as long as he lives (and after his death, his heirs), arrange for the celebration each year, at the convent of the Friars Minor in Lynn, of my anniversary and the anniversary of my late father and mother, Ralph Coc and his wife Agnes, and my brother Walter. It is my wish too that John, for as long as he lives (and after his death, his heirs) donate 13s.4d to the Friars Minor, as a pittance, on each anniversary day. I also bequeath to John de Massingham, my daughter Margaret, their daughters Joan and Agnes, and the legitimate heirs of Joan and Agnes, my quay with all buildings at the same site; which quay and buildings on that site in Bishop's Lynn lie between the tenement of Folkard le Estrish on the north side and the tenement of my sister Margaret on the south side, and extends in length from the public river on the west to the public street on the east. But if Joan and Agnes die without direct heirs, then I wish my capital tenement and my quay, and the buildings on the same, to revert in its entirety to and remain in future with the closest heirs of my daughter Margaret.

I bequeath to John de Massingham one gold brooch, one set of coral beads, and 6 gilded silver crosses. I bequeath to Joan, daughter of my daughter Agnes, and her heirs and assigns, half of a certain tenement of mine in the town of Bishop's Lynn which lies opposite St. James' chapel (to the north). I bequeath to my sister Margaret a large set of silver beads, with a gold brooch and ring belonging to the same. I bequeath 13s.4d to Richard de Sutton, canon of Pentney. I bequeath to mag. Thomas Beek, my kinsman, my best altar-cloth, a chalice, a missal, a large portable altar, a portable breviary, and a maple-wood cup which dom. Richard de Creyk gave me. I bequeath to dom. William Baret of Sculthorpe my other altar-cloth and a maple-wood cup. I bequeath to Peter de Hidyngham one piece of silver [plate] and six silver spoons. I bequeath to Agnes de Elmham a silk girdle with embroidered images and a silk bag. I bequeath Margaret, my sister's daughter, a green silk girdle adorned with animals. I bequeath to Margaret, daughter of Thomas Shillyng, 12 sheep and forty shillings that her father owes me. I bequeath 13s.4d to dom. William de Erpyngham chaplain. I bequeath to Margaret, daughter of my niece Matilda, a mazer.

The residue of all my goods, once my debts are paid and this testament is fulfilled, I wish to be sold and the money received from the same distributed faithfully by my executors to poor people in the town of Lynn for [the benefit of] my soul and the souls of all the faithful deceased. To carry out and fulfill this testament, I make, designate and appoint as my executors mag. Thomas de Lenna my kinsman, Thomas Shillyng, and John atte Hirne de Massingham. Written at Lynn on the above date. In addition to those things arranged and disposed of by my testament, I wish that my executors pay all my debts out of my goods; and if my goods do not suffice to pay the remaining legacies in my testament, then I wish that the omissions be decided by my executors. I bequeath to my daughter Agnes a silver cup, other than that left her in my testament, and a silk girdle.

DISCUSSION

[I have divided the documents into paragraphs to make for easier reading.]

A good deal of what we know about specific individual lay women living in towns comes from their wills; because of their low involvement in politics or large-scale business, and lesser involvement than men in acquiring and managing property, they inevitably make less of a mark on majority of the types of records that have survived to us from medieval England. As with the men, it is the women of the urban upper crust who are most in evidence through wills.

It is unfortunate that we must largely identify townswomen by their relationships to men. Joan de Thornegge was the daughter of Ralph le Keu (or Cook), a man in evidence around the turn of the century; in 1297/98 he travelled to St. Albans and Norwich on community business, and three years worth of tax assessments (1299-1301) were remitted, in consideration of his work on behalf of the community. He is not known to have held a borough office, although his brother Richard served as chamberlain and jurat, but he was a scabin of the merchant gild from 1295 to 1299. Ralph was also a customs collector at Lynn 1298-1303. So the family was of some account in the town. Joan was also the widow of one of Lynn's most prominent townsmen of the early fourteenth century. John de Thornegge had probably died about five years before Joan drew up her will, although he had drawn up his own will in 1330. When Joan actually died we are not certain, but the wills of both her and John did not receive probate before the mayor until March 1345.

Before he died, John de Thornegge had served his community as mayor for five terms between 1315/16 and 1330/31, and may have served in that capacity in 1313/14 as well. In other years during the same period he is found in the posts of jurat and ward constable, and twice represented Lynn at parliament (1321 and 1324). He was also very active in the royal customs service, in the posts of collector of wool custom from 1318 to 1320 and again from 1322 to 1334, as collector of prisage (1322-27, and from 1328 possibly until his death), and as a searcher for counterfeit or smuggled coin (1324-35).

John first appears in the local records in 1303, when his goods were valued, for taxation purposes, at £26.13s.4d, well above the average. The surname does appear in Lynn earlier in the reign of Edward I, but John or his family may have been relatively recent arrivals from Thornage, Norfolk (some 25 miles west-north-west of Lynn), for John's will shows continued connections: he bequeathed 20s. to the fabric of the village church at Thornage, provided for an anniversary service for his soul in that church, and made a charitable donation to poor people there. John had married Joan before 1309, when the pair made an agreement with Joan's sister Margaret and her husband John de Frenge about the division of the women's inheritance from their father, Ralph Cok. Joan and her husband received the northern part of a tenement in Wingate and a half share in a riverside quay associated; this is evidently one of the properties bequeathed in Joan's will (the distinction between Wingate and the Chequer sometimes being blurred).

John was a merchant, apparently specializing in victualling: in 1314 he received a royal safeconduct to take victuals throughout England for trading purposes, and another safeconduct in 1322 to acquire grain and other victuals for the use of the king's army in the north – later that year he is seen as co-owner of the vessel Margaret bound for Norway to bring back victuals. His one-year protection from the king may also have been for trading purposes. The Margaret was not the only ship in which he had an interest, for in 1319 he and Thomas Melchburne, who would become one of the most active Lynn merchants of that generation, complained that their ship the Godyer, carrying a cargo worth £200 – wheat, worsted, and other cloth – to Gascony had been captured by Flemish pirates. That same year he had been sent by Lynn as one of its representatives to a national Merchant Assembly, to discuss the stabilization of the wool trade. He is also seen at that time or slightly later selling timber to the borough, for work needed on the guildhall. Two years earlier he had been given £20 worth of the goods of the merchant gild, to trade with on the gild's behalf; although no record of his membership in the gild has survived, we can take it as a given, and in 1321/22 he served as one of the gild scabins.

Although Joan was named one of the executors of her husband, his will bequeaths her nothing; doubtless he considered her widow's dower, along with what she held in her own right, would suffice to support her in the style to which she was accustomed. John's will refers to his daughter Margaret, to whom he left one property (on condition she used the income from the same to support anniversary celebrations for him for ten years), some cash, and some precious household items. There is no mention of Joan's other daughter Agnes; possibly she was the offspring of an earlier marriage. Despite the lack of attention paid Joan in her husband's will, the close bond between the pair may be suggested by the fact also among his executor's was Joan's sister Margaret Frenge, while the couple's son-in-law John de Massingham was another executor. Massingham himself was a good match for Thornegge's daughter; he was himself a prospering merchant and served two mayoral terms at Lynn – in fact was in that capacity and heading proceedings when the Thornegge's wills were together brought in for probate. After he succumbed to the plague in 1349, his widow Agnes married Ancelm Braunch.

The roster of executors was completed by Thomas Shillyng. Shillyng and his wife were remembered in the will with bequests of small valuables, but their daughter Joan received a property on Stonegate with a staith, while her sister Margaret received an associated property comprising three shops with upper rooms (both on condition of applying the income from the same to anniversaries for Thornegge's soul). Clearly the Shillyng and Thornegge families were close, but whether it was a matter of kinship or friendship is unknown; possibly Thomas' wife Agnes may have been Joan's other daughter. The Shillyngs were from the wealthy urban upper crust, although not so politically prominent as Thornegge, and Thomas acted as the community attorney from 1331 to 1344.

It is notable that Joan's bequests focus on female members of the family. She and her husband are not known to have had any male heirs, but their daughter Margaret had a son by John de Massingham, and Joan's sister Margaret also had two sons; if they were still living in 1341, then they are ignored by Joan's will. On the other hand, John's will had ignored those of Joan's nieces to whom she made bequests, so perhaps she was just redressing a perceived imbalance.

NOTES

"lay brother"

For communities of monks or friars to dedicate themselves primarily to spiritual matters, they needed help to take care of worldly concerns. Some communities therefore instituted lay brotherhoods, whose members took vows of obedience and observed the rules of the order, but spent their time dealing with matters such as property management and looking after fields or livestock.

"Magdalene"

The hospital of St. Mary Magdalene was on the road (raised, because of marshy ground) to Gaywood.

"Cowgate"

A stretch of road just south of the Tuesday Market running between Briggate and the Chequer; it had been reduced to no more than a lane by the close of the Middle Ages.

"Hardwick" "Setchey"

Villages to the south of South Lynn, originally on the bank of the Ouse estuary, when the upper part of the Little Ouse was in effect a lake.

"Blackborough" "Pentney"

A few miles southeast of Lynn, Pentney lying a little beyond Blackborough.

"peridot"

A gemstone of green colour (lighter and more yellow than emerald).

"pittance"

A pious gift.

"quay"

This must have lay between the Chequer and the Ouse bank.

"Sculthorpe"

Northwest of Lynn, near Fakenham.

"silk bag"

A small bag, possibly a reliquary.

"mazer"

A wide cup made of maple-wood; there appears to be a difference between this and the maple-wood cups (chiphum de murno) bequeathed earlier.

The first sheriff of Bristol original in Bristol Record Office, MS. 04720 f.100

The original full-colour depiction of the first sheriff of Bristol, elected pursuant to the city charter of 1373 (see "Petition requesting county status be granted by charter"), illustrated the volume known as Ricart's Kalendar. It was placed within a listing of the city's principal officers.

The newly-elected sheriff, John Vyell, is shown centre, seated on the dais in the guildhall. He is apparently acknowledging his audience. He wears as livery a scarlet gown trimmed with white fur, and a blue domed hat bearing a golden badge (possibly a rose), probably a symbol of shrieval office. In Ricart's time (1480s) the city paid an allowance of £6.13s.4d for 10 yards of cloth for the sheriff's livery, and £5 for the fur; there were relatively extravagant sums, given the overall size of the city budget.

The two men flanking him carrying the axe and mace, more potent symbols of office, might perhaps be intended to represent (left) mayor William Canynges and (right) one of the bailiffs; but more probably, based on the colour of their liveries, they are the sheriff's sergeants. The depiction reflects more accurately a sheriff's livery at the time when Ricart was town clerk than at the time when Vyell was sheriff.

John Vyell was a member of a Bristol branch of a county family; the surname would appear to be a patronymic. Another member of the family, merchant-draper Henry Vyell (likely John's father), had served as a town councillor in the years following the first visitation of the Black Death, and as bailiff of Bristol in 1359/60. He, or another of the name, also held a ballivalty in 1371 and shrievalty in 1376. John Vyell himself was a city bailiff for two consecutive terms from 1369 to 1371.

Despite obtaining from the king in 1374, only months after completing his shrieval term, a life exemption from the offices of mayor and sheriff, along with royal offices, and in 1382 a confirmation of that exemption, he accepted election to the post of constable of the Bristol staple in 1378, continuing therein for four years, and (having served on the city council in the 1380s) election as Bristol's mayor in 1388. In the years preceding his mayoralty he had even shouldered the unpopular duty of tax collector on several occasions. He was thus a man prepared to do his duty, but careful to ensure that he had some say in what would be the extent of that duty.

His service as an officer of the staple was the type of obligation many of the mercantile class were prepared to undertake. He was much involved in the export of cloth, sending his wares to France, Spain, Portugal and Ireland, and also invested in its manufacture – he was described as a draper, but this is indicative more of commercial than craft activity. His trade dealings are also reflected through his membership in socio-religious gilds in Coventry and Lynn. Through marriage, and with the money he made from commerce, he built up property holdings in Bristol, including shops and a stone house near the quayside, which was his residence. He also came into possession of a manor in Somerset.

John Vyell died in 1399, survived by his widow Elizabeth and sons Henry and John. The beneficiaries of his charitable bequests included city almshouses, the poor residents of St. Bartholomew's hospital, poor people who were bedridden; £20 was bequeathed to pay off small debts of selected debtors in a city prison, so that they could be set free. He instructed that anyone claiming a debt from him, who swore to the truth of it on the Bible, was to be paid. To St. Stephen's church he left a ring bearing what he believed to be a relic: a stone chip from a pillar to which Jesus had been bound. He ordered that expenses on his funeral be limited, but paid for 1,000 masses to be said for his soul, after death.

TRANSLATION

Delivery of the gaol of Bishop's Lynn of prisoners there, before William Yelverton, one of the king's justices for hearing pleas coram rege, Simon Pygot mayor of Bishop's Lynn, John ...atham, Thomas Burgh, on 21 March 1455.

John Hide yeoman of Setchey in the county of Norfolk, Peter Mower labourer of Setchey, William Lekyngfeld weaver of the same town, John Boston of Hardwick next to Bishop's Lynn in the county of Norfolk, John Glover glover of Downham Market in the county of Norfolk, John Ogan sailor of Bishop's Lynn in the county of Norfolk, Thomas Lekinfeld husbandman of South Lynn in the county of Norfolk, [and] ... Blakenham thatcher of Gaywood in the county of Norfolk, are indicted for having, on [date partly obliterated, but see below], broken into and entered the close of Thomas Wodehous at Bishop's Lynn, within the hospital of St. Mary Magdalene, and having feloniously taken and carried off [goods] found there.

John Hide ... Peter Mower ... John Ogan ... and William Lekyngfeld are indicted before the keepers [of the peace] on the grounds that on 6 March 1455 they with force and arms (viz. swords, glaives, and cudgels) feloniously entered the close of John Pygot in the location called Le Balle at Bishop's Lynn and feloniously took, carried away and stole from there a dozen of white, coloured, wide, woollen cloth worth 10s. belonging to John Byrde fuller, as well as 24 yards of white, coloured, narrow, woollen cloth worth 8s. belonging to John Litill fuller

John Shomaker cobbler of Downham Market in the county of Norfolk is indicted ... on the grounds that, on 6 March 1455, he and others with force and arms (viz. glaives, bows and arrows) broke into the close and buildings of Thomas Wodehous at Bishop's Lynn, within the hospital of St. Mary Magdalene, and feloniously took and carried off goods and possessions they found there belonging to Thomas Wodehous; viz.: a partly gilded chalice with a silver dish, worth 30s.; a purse; a book of services, worth 26s.8d; eight books called primers, worth 27s.; a gown, hood, and bonnet, worth 16s.; a silk belt woven through with silver, worth 8s.; along with other items to the value of 46s.8d

John Kyng formerly of Middleton in the county of Norfolk, alias John Kyng of West Lexham in the county of Norfolk, yeoman, and John Neyburgh innkeeper of Bishop's Lynn are indicted before ... on the grounds that, on 20 January 1454, they and others with force and arms (viz. bows and arrows) committed an assault upon William Gilberd clerk within the inn called the Swan in Gresemarket at Lynn, beating, wounding and mistreating him so that his life was despaired of; besides which, [they took] William's goods and possessions in the form of cash to the value of £2.13s.4d.

Walter Walshe sailor of Lynn was arrested at Bishop's Lynn by the mayor on suspicion of felony.

John Smyth porter of Bishop's Lynn likewise.

William Launde porter was arrested by William Caly for the same.

William Davy of Wormegay, Frenchman, likewise.

John Lomb porter likewise.

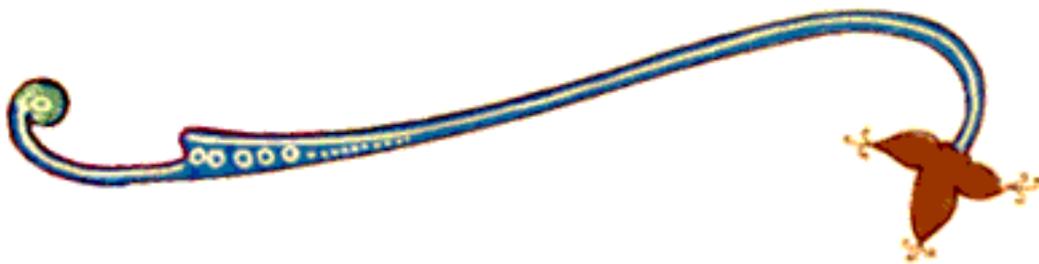

Robert Watson tailor of South Lynn [likewise].

Isabella Doraunt of South Lynn was arrested by Ralph Geyton for the same.

John Kyng of West Lexham likewise.

DISCUSSION

The fifteenth century saw an increase in the number of judicial commissions to prominent local men, as well as the extension of justices' powers to borough executives. Commissions of gaol delivery were issued frequently, to ensure crimes subject to the king's jurisdiction could be dealt with periodically.

NOTES

"Bishop's Lynn"

Until the king took over lordship of Lynn, in the 16th century, Lynn's lord was the Bishop of Norwich.

"William Yelverton"

Yelverton had a long and distinguished career in royal judicial administration, based in Norfolk; his early career included the roles of judicial commissioner at and recorder of Norwich, where he was later the architect of political settlements, as well as bishop's steward in Lynn (1441). From at least 1459, and probably from 1443, he was a Justice of the King's Bench until his retirement in 1470.

"Simon Pygot" "John ...atham" "Thomas Burgh"

Symon Pygot was mayor 1454-55. Thomas Burgh was alderman of the Merchant Gild. The middle-named person (whose name is lost due to damage to the document) was probably the bishop's steward – only that official could rank high enough to be named before the alderman. Unfortunately, I do not know who held the steward's office at that time.

"1455"

The date of 1453 given in Mrs. Owen's heading to the document is a typographical error.

"close"

An enclosed piece of land.

"glaive"

A particular kind of sword, like a broadsword.

"dozen"

A "dozen" was a volume rather than a quantity.

"William Caly" "Ralph Geyton"

Geyton may have been acting in the official capacity of coroner in making the arrest. He was certainly one of the coroners by 1466. Caly was perhaps the other coroner (I have no reference to him in any other official capacity); although he might have been the bishop's steward, since members of that family had served the bishop in the past.

Anglo-Saxons

Anglo-Saxons, name given to the Germanic-speaking peoples who settled in England after the decline of Roman rule there. They were first invited by the Celtic King Vortigern, who needed help fighting the Picts and Scots. The Angles (Lat. Angli), who are mentioned in Tacitus' Germania, seem to have come from what is now Schleswig in the later decades of the 5th cent. Their settlements in the eastern, central, and northern portions of the country were the foundations for the later kingdoms known as East Anglia, Mercia, and Northumbria. The Saxons, a Germanic tribe who had been continental neighbors of the Angles, also settled in England in the late 5th cent. after earlier marauding forays there. The later kingdoms of Sussex, Wessex, and Essex were the outgrowths of their settlements. The Jutes, a tribe about whom very little is known except that they probably came from the area around the mouths of the Rhine, settled in Kent (see Kent, kingdom of) and the Isle of Wight. The Anglo-Saxons eventually formed seven separate kingdoms known as the heptarchy. The term "Anglo-Saxons" was first used in Continental Latin sources to distinguish the Saxons in England from those on the Continent, but it soon came to mean simply the "English." The more specific use of the term to denote the non-Celtic settlers of England prior to the Norman Conquest dates from the 16th cent. In more modern times it has also been used to denote any of the people (or their descendants) of the British Isles.

Henri Pirenne's Thesis Concerning the Economic History of Europe in the Middle Ages

References:

Henri Pirenne, Economic and Social History of Medieval Europe

Henri Pirenne, Medieval Cities: Their Origins and the Revival of Trade

The Roman Empire was fundamentally a maritime empire oriented around the Mediterranean Sea. There were of course nonmaritime frontiers in the wooded north of Europe and the deserts of the Sahara and the Middle East but most, if not all, was within the watershed of the Mediterranean-Black Sea. The sea not only provided the routes for political administration and military supervision but also for trade. Sea trade was predominantly in the hands of merchants from the Levantine, the Syrians and Jews. This trade made possible regional specialization and economies of scale. Not only were goods provided cheaper as a result this trade but there was a vastly larger variety of goods available.

The Germanic tribes in the West were becoming Romanized. Germans served in the Roman Army and sometimes Germans commanded the armies of Rome. Thus the conflicts in the West were not civilization versus barbarians but instead Romanized Germans fighting against Germanized Roman armies. The battles in the East were a different matter; there it was Roman culture versus Parthian (Persian) culture. Losses in the West could be regained by diplomacy if not military operations, but losses in the East were permanent. Thus the shift of administration from Rome to Constantinople reflected this situation.

When Moslems captured the Mediterranean in the seventh century the trade routes were cut. The Vikings later also made sea trade difficult. The Magyars swept into Europe out of Central Asia and further cut trade in the east. The net result is that individual regions could not count on producing some goods for market and using the proceeds from their sale to buy the other goods which were needed. Each region had to be self-sufficient.

Self-sufficiency has its attractions but with self-sufficiency are lost the gains from specialization and the economies of scale. The levels of income standards of living decline so there may not be any market for trade goods even if they were available. The surpluses that could support some elements of the society pursuing cultural activities disappeared and almost everyone had to grub for a living.

Wessex

[wes'iks]Pronunciation Key

Wessex, one of the Anglo-Saxon kingdoms in England. It may have been settled as early as 495 by Saxons under Cerdic, who is reputed to have landed in Hampshire. Cerdic's grandson, Ceawlin (560–93), annexed scattered Saxon settlements in the Chiltern Hills and drove the Celts from the region between the upper Thames valley and the lower Severn. But Ceawlin himself was finally expelled from Wessex, and until the end of the 8th cent. the country was overshadowed successively by Kent, Northumbria, and Mercia. King Cædwalla (reigned 685–88) conducted several successful campaigns; and his successor Ine consolidated the western expansion through Somerset and exacted tribute from Kent. After Ine's death, however, the kingdom relapsed into anarchy. Egbert (802–39) became overlord of all England, but his successors were forced to relinquish many of his gains and to concentrate on defending their lands against the invading Danes. With the reign of Alfred (871–99) and the halting of the Danes, the history of Wessex becomes that of England. In the 10th cent., Edward the Elder, Athelstan, Edmund, and Edred gradually acquired firm control over all England, including the Danelaw. This unity ended, however, after the quiet reign of Edgar (959–75), for Æthelred (978–1016) could offer no effective resistance to the invading Vikings. Canute established Danish rule in 1016. The end of his line caused the recall of Edward the Confessor (1042–66), last of the Wessex line of Alfred. In the novels of Thomas Hardy, Wessex is used to mean the SW counties of England, mainly Dorsetshire.

Mercia

[mûr'shu]Pronunciation Key

Mercia, one of the kingdoms of Anglo-Saxon England, consisting generally of the region of the Midlands. It was settled by Angles c.500, probably first along the Trent valley. Its history emerges from obscurity with the reign of Penda, who extended his power over Wessex (645) and East Anglia (650) to gain overlordship of England S of the Humber River. After his death Mercia suffered a three-year loss of ascendancy during which it was converted to Christianity by a Northumbrian mission. Penda's son, Wulfhere, then reestablished a Greater Mercia that finally, under Æthelbald in the 8th cent., extended over all S England. This hegemony was strengthened by Offa (reigned 757–96), who controlled East Anglia, Kent, and Sussex and maintained superiority of a sort over Wessex and Northumbria. He had the great Offa's Dyke built to protect W Mercia from the Welsh. After his death, Mercian power gradually gave way before that of Wessex. The victories of Egbert of Wessex in Mercia established him briefly as overlord. In 874, Mercia weakly succumbed to the invading Danish army, and ultimately the eastern part became (886) a portion of the Danelaw, while the western part was controlled by Alfred of Wessex.

Thereafter Mercia had no independent history, although it had one more distinguished ruler in Æthelflæd, Lady of the Mercians.

Alresford - Fulling mill

Alresford is a small Hampshire town a few miles east of Winchester. There was an Anglo-Saxon settlement (now Old Alresford) belonging to the church at Winchester, but this declined after Bishop Godfrey de Lucy established – as part of a plan for six "new towns" – a new community on the south bank of the River Arle in the late twelfth century and subsequently obtained a grant of privileges for it from King John: market, fair and the rights to build mills on the river and collect tolls on goods being transported along the River Itchen. The Bishop had canalized the Itchen and, to ensure a good head of water, dammed the river, creating a huge reservoir. It was immediately to the south of this (now much shrunken to the Alresford Pond) that he established his town, originally called Novum Forum (Newmarket), although subsequently referred to as Alresford Forum. The "town" was essentially a street running south from the dam, wide enough to host a market.

New Alresford was perhaps the most successful of the Bishop's town foundations, thanks in part to the nearby Winchester-London trade route – this ancient road was realigned to bring it past the southern end of the market street, in order to make the town more attractive to merchants. New Alresford was being referred to as a borough by the early thirteenth century; over 40 burgesses were listed there around that time, attracted to occupy the building-plots the Bishop had offered to newcomers. The Bishop set up a town hall, communal oven, and a building for sifting bran from flour, as well as rebuilding a fulling mill already there.

New Alresford's growth was due in large part to its role in sheep-farming, the wool trade, and the manufacture of cloth. In the fourteenth century it was an important wool-collecting centre for the regions east and north-east of Winchester, and was even said to be one of the ten greatest wool-markets in the country. However, its prospects were limited by proximity to its much larger neighbour: Winchester so dominated regional trade that Alresford could not compete at that level.

There still stands, on the modest Arle, a mill built (or rebuilt) in the thirteenth century for the fulling of cloth. Access to clean, fast-running water was a requirement of this element of the cloth-finishing industry and much of the mill is built directly above the river. The great pond created by the Bishop's weir supplied a source of fast-running water for the operation of mills.

England's wool was known throughout medieval Europe for its quality (although that of southern England was not the finest produced in the country), and the wool and cloth trades were a major element in the English economy from the twelfth to the fifteenth century. At first it was the export of raw wool to cloth-producing centres of Flanders and Italy that was important, particularly in the earlier period, as a growing population across Europe produced greater demand for clothing.

English merchants and entrepreneurs came to realize the sense in using the wool to produce cloth domestically (rather than buy it back from Europe). They invested in the development of an existing, modest, rural cloth-producing industry (with a corresponding adverse effect on the elements of that industry already established in the larger towns); many fulling mills were built in the thirteenth century. Cloth manufacture employed a large number of townsmen in its various stages (e.g. shearing, carding, combing, spinning, weaving, fulling, felting, dyeing, cutting). Fulling was a two-part process:

1. newly-woven cloth was cleaned by soaking it in clean water and then beating it, usually with water-driven mechanical paddles;
2. the cloth was thickened by scrubbing it with "fuller's earth" (aluminium oxide) which provided a good texture and initiated bleaching, a process later completed by the cloth-owners who stretched the cloth out to dry over a wooden frame called a "tenter".

In the fourteenth century, wool exports were declining and those of cloth increasing. The Merchant Staplers increasingly dominated the wool trade during that century. At the end of the century and into the fifteenth (although it is difficult and dangerous to generalize for all areas of the country) there was a downturn in commerce, greater competition in the cloth trade from foreign merchants – notably those of the Hanseatic League – who acquired advantageous privileges from the king, and later a decline in foreign demand for English cloth (in part due to international political troubles) which was offset a little by growing domestic demand. The economies of many of the larger towns were adversely affected, while some smaller centres went into decay as the larger towns tried to dominate what commerce remained. Most large towns were sufficiently diversified in their economies to weather the storm.

St Frideswide & the Beginnings of Oxford

Since the Thames formed a frontier between two Anglo-Saxon kingdoms, Wessex and Mercia, a habitable site at an established crossing place was likely to become important. Of Mercian Oxford, however, almost nothing is known, yet by the early tenth century the site was occupied by a major town.

Tradition links the beginnings of Oxford with St Frideswide, part of whose legend, first recorded in the twelfth century, depicts her as a pious Mercian princess who became a nun in an Oxford monastery founded at her behest; she was pestered by a lecherous royal suitor who was struck blind when he tried to enter Oxford to seize her, but he recovered at Frideswide's intercession, and she continued in the monastery until her death.

Scholars now think that Frideswide was a real person associated with Oxford and nearby Binsey, and that a religious house, perhaps for a mixed community of monks and nuns, with Frideswide as first abbess, was indeed founded about AD 700 on the site of Christ Church. It was burned down in AD 1002, rebuilt, and in AD 1122 refounded as the Augustinian priory of St Frideswide. A cemetery, probably attached to the first St Frideswide's, has been excavated in Christ Church.

Significantly, the site chosen for the early minster was beside the north-south Thames crossing on the line of the later St Aldates and Abingdon Road, a route important enough by the later eighth century to require considerable engineering work. Here indeed may be the 'oxen ford' from which the town is named, although some later evidence points to the ford at North Hinksey.

It now seems likely that the earliest settlement called Oxford comprised a small lay community at the gates of St Frideswide's, flanking the important route from Mercia into Wessex, but firm archaeological confirmation is awaited.

Alfred, Edward the Elder & the Saxon Burh

▶ Alfred, Edward the Elder & the Saxon Burh

Model of Oxford as it may have looked in the tenth century. Later the Norman castle was built to the west and the walled area extended eastwards

We are told that on the death of Aethelred of Mercia in AD 911 the West Saxon king Edward the Elder, Alfred's son, took control of 'London and Oxford and the lands that belonged thereto'. By then Oxford was clearly an important place, and in the early tenth century, possibly earlier, it belonged to a system of fortified towns or burhs created as a defence against the Danes.

The surviving rectilinear street plan, centred on Carfax, resembles that of other Saxon planned or 'planted' towns, and documents and archaeological evidence suggest strongly that the central streets of Oxford were deliberately laid out within a fortified enclosure at some date in the late tenth or early eleventh century.

Instead of fortifying whatever settlement existed near St Frideswide's, the king provided land for an entirely new town. The building plots between the grid-plan of streets were no doubt quickly taken up by magnates, merchants and craftsmen, who saw the advantages of royal protection, strong military defences and a market located on an important trade route.

The area enclosed by the original earth banks and ramparts was smaller and squarer than the medieval walled town. The fortifications on the east were probably just west of Catte Street and Magpie Lane, on the west somewhere west of New Inn Hall Street and St Ebbe's Street, on the north on the line of the medieval wall, and on the south aligned with Brewer Street, meeting St Aldates near the south-west corner of Christ Church's Canterbury Quadrangle, the site of the medieval church of St Michael at Southgate.

Churches seem to have been built at the other three principal gates: St Michael's church tower in Cornmarket Street, Oxford's oldest building, marks the site of the north gate, and the original east and west gates were probably near St Mary's church in High Street and the demolished church of St Peter-le-Bailey at the west end of Queen Street.

The grid of central streets seems to have been established in a single operation, and under New Inn Hall Street, embedded in the original surface, was found a coin of Edward the Elder (d. AD 925), perhaps the safest indication of the date of the town's creation. Even so, Edward's father, King Alfred (d. AD 899), was the first to establish a system of fortified towns and he is associated with Oxford not only in legend but through a puzzling series of coins bearing his name and that of a mint called 'Orsnaforda' or 'Ohsnaforda'. Scholars are uncertain whether or not these coins were minted in Oxford, and in default of further evidence the identity of the king who founded Oxford must remain in doubt.

Medieval Sourcebook: Edgar, King of the English: Grant of Market Rights to Medhamstead Minster, 963

Market rights were sometimes extensive. Other markets might not exist in a given area and exclusive rights were granted to the local lord of the manor. There was also a very careful definition of the localities in which tolls might be levied.

I, Edgar grant and give today, before God and before Archbishop Dunstan, freedom to St. Peter's minster at Medhamsted, from king and from bishop; and all the thorps that thereto lie; that is, Eastfield and Dodthorpe, and Eye, and Paston. And so I free it, that no bishop have any jurisdiction there, but the abbot of the minster alone. And I give the town called Oundle, with all that thereto lieth, called Eyot-hundred, with market and toll; so freely, that neither king, nor bishop, nor earl, nor sheriff, have there any jurisdiction; nor any man but the abbot alone, and whom he may set thereto. And I give to Christ and St. Peter, and that too with the advice of Bishop Athelwold, these lands;--- that is, Barrow, Warmington, Ashton, Kettering, Castor, Eylesworth, Walton, Witherington, Eye, Thorp, and a minster at Stamford. These lands and all the others that belong to the minster I bequeath clear; that is, with sack and soc, toll and team, and infangthief: these privileges and all others bequeath I clear to Christ and St. Peter. And I give the two parts of Whittlesey-mere, with waters and with wears and fens; and so through Meerlade along to the water that is called Nen; and so eastward to Kingsdelf. And I will that there be a market in the town itself, and that no other be betwixt Stamford and Huntingdon. And I will that thus be given the toll;---first, from Whittlesey-mere to the king's toll of Norman-cross hundred; then backward again from Whittlesey-mere through Meerlade along to the Nen, and as that river runs to Crowland; and from Crowland to Must, and from Must to Kingsdelf and to Whittlesey-mere. And I will that all the freedom, and all the privileges, that my predecessors gave, should remain; and I will write and confirm this with the rood-token of Christ . . . (sign of cross follows).

York - Clifford's Tower

As one of the most important cities in England, and an important base for holding and administering the north, York was the site for two of the castles William the Conqueror built in the years immediately following his conquest. The principal castle was begun in 1068, as part of a campaign to subdue anti-Norman sentiment in the north. Its wooden defences focused around and atop the motte; they were destroyed during a local rebellion the following year, but rebuilt by the Normans after suppressing the rebels and taking harsh reprisals on York.

In 1190 the wooden keep was again burned down, during a siege by citizens of the Jewish community which had taken refuge there. This was one instance of a continent-wide persecution stimulated in part by the emotionally-charged and propagandized environment of the Crusades. At and following the accession of the crusading king Richard, successor to Henry II who had been careful to protect England's Jews, there were a number of violent outbursts against them in various English towns. In York, a violent incident was quickly followed by most of the Jews there seeking protection within the castle. However, when their fear became so great that they refused even the constable of the castle admittance, an attempt by royal authorities to regain access deteriorated into a mob assault on the castle. Rather than fall into the hands of the mob, many of the Jews committed suicide and set the keep afire. The survivors emerged the following day, only to be massacred by the besiegers. As punishment for this terrible act, the king's Chancellor dismissed the sheriff and constable, imposed a heavy fine on York's citizens (who claimed not to have been involved), but the ringleaders had fled and could not be brought to justice.

In the latter half of the thirteenth century, the keep was rebuilt in stone. It was given a quatrefoil plan, of which there is no other example in England. The keep later became known as Clifford's Tower, possibly after Roger de Clifford, who was hanged there in 1322.

Yarmouth - Tolhouse

The building known as the Tolhouse was the seat of local administration in Yarmouth in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. A focal part of such administration was the borough court presided over by the town bailiffs, in part because the development of self-government was largely a matter of the gradual acquisition of expanded legal jurisdiction, while the revenues from fines and licenses were part of the income needed to support autonomous activities.

The precise role and importance of a borough court was varied from town to town – in part depending on whether it was in the hands of the community, or of the borough's lord. (If the latter, communal ambitions for self-government were more likely to express themselves through a Merchant Guild). It was not necessarily solely a judicial organ, but could appear in many guises, adapted to a variety of governmental functions. It might deal with contentions over matters of local by-laws or (to an extent) national law, and the jurisdictions granted the borough through royal charter grants; it administered matters relating to property and financial transactions (also governed in part by local custom), as well as supervising such matters when they involved community income or expenditures; and it served not only as a law-enforcing or law-interpreting mechanism, but also a law-making one. In a number of boroughs, including Yarmouth, enrolments of court business are the central and predominant elements of surviving medieval archives, covering a variety of records under their umbrella, with specialized records emerging only as borough business became increasingly complex.

The transfer of decision-making from the ancient and unwieldy folk moot to a representative set of officers operating out of a building with limited capacity to host gatherings of the urban citizenry, was an early step on the transition from a primitive democracy to a more bureaucratized form of local government.

York - Shambles

York's Shambles is a rare example of a street identified as far back as Domesday Book. In the Middle Ages the street was used as the butchers' market, its name deriving from an Old English word referring to the stalls from which meat was sold. Shambles were to be found in many of the larger English towns.

The slaughter of livestock and sale of carcasses in York (as elsewhere) created a range of health hazards, prompting city ordinances such as that of 1301, which forbade butchers to sell carcasses or cuts of meat that had already been displayed for sale on their stalls, exposed to the sunlight, for a full day (unless it had been carefully cleaned and salted). Spoiled or poor-quality meat might be given to the city's lepers.

As one of the elements that made up the city fee farm, butchers were required to pay 1d weekly, under the name of "Schameltoll", for the right to slaughter beasts and sell their meat from these stalls. In 1382 the butchers refused for several months to pay this toll and used force to retrieve an item that the city bailiffs had distraigned from one of the butchers. The bailiffs responded by successfully suing the butchers.

There remain examples of late medieval buildings in the Shambles, which represents a good example of how houses – topped by overhanging "solars" through which it was hoped that sunlight might be brought through the windows into burgesses' living quarters – were sometimes within arms' reach of each other.

main menu

To ensure that every craft or industry in the city is carried out properly and honestly, without any fraud that might cause scandal to the city, each year the bailiffs and the 24 elected by the community shall choose between two and four of the more prominent and trustworthy of each industry or craft (or others knowledgable in the craft, depending on whether the industry is large or small). They are to be sworn on the Gospels to conduct an honest and comprehensive search [i.e. investigation] of the industry or craft, without sparing anyone, at least four times a year – more if need arises – so that no fraud, deceit or falsehood can be maintained by the practitioners. If they discover any such offence, they are to inform (without any concealment) the bailiffs and the 24 elected in the name of the community, who are to amend the problem, exact compensation, and punish the guilty in order to set an example to others and to restore the city's good name. If the searchers are convicted of negligence or concealment they are to be heavily amerced as accomplices after the fact and are to be removed from office and replaced by others.

[The description of the qualifications of those to be chosen as searchers is "potencioribus et fide dignioribus"; the former term could be translated as "more capable", but the adjective was also frequently applied to the ruling class and the intent here was probably to designate the leading (in socio-economic terms) members of a craft; the proviso indicates that others of lower status could be chosen if a craft had only a few practitioners.]

6 October 1309 *

Any existing ordinances or statutes of gilds or the community which are detrimental to free commerce (as for example trade in millstones) and thereby harmful to the community and residents of the [neighbouring] countryside are to be annulled. Nor shall any such be made in future. Anyone infringing this may be subject to legal action taken by the Bishop's bailiffs.

No merchandize which is brought to the city by land or by river may be concealed in any house or courtyard to prevent the king's officers from collecting custom or toll. Nor may any resident pretend as his own the merchandize of outsiders, nor import or export (openly or secretly) outsiders' goods under the pretence of owning them, to avoid custom or toll. Anyone convicted of this offence shall pay double the amount of custom or toll that would have been due and also 40s. fine for violating the [freeman's] oath, of which half is to go to the use of the community and the other half to the bailiffs for their trouble [in investigating], provided that they are vigilant in such matters.

That this type of problem was common in towns is suggested by similar by-laws at [Yarmouth, Ipswich and Maldon. The losses in revenue involved both national customs and local tolls; since the latter was a component of the fee farm upon which the city liberties were conditional, to evade tolls was to act contrary to the welfare of the community.]

October 1272

All merchants of the town shall fully and honestly pay for merchandize [they purchase] according to the terms of the bargain. If any refuses, the matter is to be examined by four wise men (chosen by the town) who are knowledgable about mercantile affairs. If the buyer refuses to settle within three days of a judgement being rendered by bailiffs and the four men, then the goods in question are to be sold under supervision of the four, until the seller is satisfied . If this is not sufficient, other property of the buyer may be handed over to the seller, until the debt is paid.

18 February 1340

All grain brought by barge to Lynn should be sold at "le cornsondes" and nowhere else. If any burgess buys at any other location grain brought in this way, he shall pay 20s. to the community each time he commits the offence.

[The "cornsondes" was probably a designated area of the sandy Ouse shoreline. The record of this ordinance was followed by another that was unfinished, but apparently of the same tenor in regard to herring and other fish.]

Early 15th century **

No hosteler or owner of a hostelry within Lynn shall hide, conceal or disguise fish in his inn, but lay it out for sale in the market and sell according to market price (as recommended by the mayor), to the benefit of the people, upon pain of [its] confiscation and [his] imprisonment.

This seems to be a variant of [forestalling, with inn-keepers attempting to retail fish through their inns.]

No comburgess or any other resident of the city or its suburbs, nor anyone at all, may on any day in the year buy for purposes of resale to others any foodstuffs in the market, on the quay, on the river, in a house, courtyard, street, lane, or at any location in the city, nor make a bargain to buy such items by giving God's penny, until the bell has been rung for the mass of the Blessed Virgin in the church of Holy Trinity. No one may, in any road, street, lane or other place in the city or suburb, nor within one league outside by land or water, intercept such foods being brought to the city for sale, with the purpose of buying them before they reach the public marketplace [and then reselling them in the market], so that goods are sold for a higher price than they ought to be; no one who brings victuals to the city may in any way be impeded from being able to sell them freely in the market to anyone wishing to buy. If the bailiffs find anyone in contravention of this, or if any reputable man makes a complaint about such an offence, and the accused is convicted then he must be heavily amerced by the bailiffs and any complainant is to be awarded damages. If the offender is convicted of the same offence a second time, all his merchandize is to be confiscated and the city court is to sentence him to the pillory, as a deterrent to others and so as to make public his offence; the cause of his punishment is to be publicly proclaimed in the market. Because the offence is against the whole community, the bailiffs are not allowed to commute this punishment [to a fine], nor put off or delay carrying it out, but should execute it immediately after the conviction. If the same offender is again convicted, he shall be punished as before and also abjure the city for a year and a day, as well as paying damages to any complainant. If he thereafter returns to the city to live, he must provide good security for never committing the offence again. No citizen or city sergeant is to encourage, support or protect such men in committing these offences which cause a great scandal in the city and are contrary to its liberties, customs and ordinances. Anyone convicted of such support is to be fined 6s.8d to the profit of the community, which is to be levied immediately after conviction and delivered by the bailiffs to the chamberlains who shall have a record made of it and include those moneys in their annual accounts.

This chapter eloquently shows the strength of feeling against [forestalling and regrating, offences that were fundamentally contrary to the communal principle underlying towns, yet that – as is also evidenced in other towns, such as Maldon, Ipswich, Yarmouth, and Lynn– were ubiquitous and that borough authorities tried in vain to suppress. Today most foodstuffs are sold through middlemen-retailers, even in fruit and vegetable markets, but the medieval marketplace dealing in the necessities of life was not considered an appropriate venue for entrepreneurial profit-making via price-fixing. The closest modern equivalents to the medieval attitude towards forestalling and regrating might be those towards black marketeering or the recurrent suspicions of concerted price-fixing by the petrol industry. The sale of necessities at a "fair price" was important to the medieval townsman, and open sale in the marketplace helped provide an assurance of this. As J.C. Tingey noted in his introduction to volume 2 of the Records of the City of Norwich:

"All buying and selling was invariably carried on in the market place, where not only could the authorities keep an eye upon what was going on but the citizens themselves could see that no transactions were made contrary to their general interest."

The leet court is often seen dealing with forestalling offences by individuals or by whole trades (e.g. fishmongers). The exile of an offender from his means of livelihood for a year and a day was also prescribed as a punishment at Ipswich. God's penny was a nominal but good faith deposit made to seal a commercial bargain in which full payment was to be made at a later time. The bell for the mass of the B.V.M. was rung at the "hour of prime" (i.e. the beginning of the day) in the cathedral.]

Early 15th century **

No resident is to stockpile grain from market day to market day, but let it be sold to the people in response to market demand, upon pain of confiscation of the grain and imprisonment.

[The issue here was probably one of pushing up the price of grain by creating an artificial shortage.]

CUSTOMAL: CAPITULUM 34

Ells and weights used by merchants of the city for buying and selling are, between two to four times a year, to be examined by the bailiffs to see whether they are accurate and reliable. [If so] they are to be stamped with seals dedicated to that purpose. Ells and weights found to be inaccurate are to be confiscated and destroyed, as with all unreliable measures discovered in the city. Those who use such measures are to be heavily punished and to find security that they will not commit such offences in future. If, despite that, they are again convicted of the same offence, let them be so heavily penalized that it will deter others [from committing that offence].

[An ell was a measure of length, a little longer than the modern yard, used in particular for measuring cloth.]

Early 15th century **

Milkwives are to sell good milk and cream that is sweet [i.e. not sour], in the form that it comes out of the cow – not combined or thickened with flour, nor diluted with water, to the deceit of the people, upon pain etc. And they are to sell good, sweet butter, freshly made.

16 August 1449

Statute for the tailors trade

A certain statute made by the mayor and council, with the consent of the tailors, for the regulation of the tailors' craft, viz. that each year within the two months after Michaelmas, all resident craftsmen will be advised by the sergeant-at-mace to appear before the mayor in the gildhall to elect two burgesses of the most suitable of their number to be their headsmen. Which burgesses thus elected are to take oath to [see performed] the following:

- To make search of [i.e. supervise] the craft among all residents.
- Not to allow any newcomer to set himself up in the craft unless he has proper knowledge of it (which shall be determined by mayor and headsmen).
- Any newcomer admitted to the craft who does not wish to be a burghess shall pay, for the right to set up in the craft, 40d. each to mayor, community, and headsmen (the last to be put towards the cost of the Corpus Christi day procession); any wishing to become a burghess shall pay only the 40d. to the headsmen/procession.
- Craftsmen shall be answerable to the headsmen for resident seamstresses, a farthing a week or 2d. a quarter, and double for outsider seamstresses.
- Any craftsman who is not a burghess but has an apprentice shall pay 40d. towards the cost of the Corpus Christi procession.
- If anyone complains of bad workmanship by a craftsman, and the latter is found guilty, he shall compensate the aggrieved party in the presence of the mayor and headsmen.
- If a craftsman speaks slander of the deeds of any man, and the slanderous accusation cannot be proven, he shall be punished according to the judgement of mayor and headsmen by forfeiting 40d. towards the Corpus Christi procession.
- If anyone not of the craft slanders any [crafts?]man, and the slanderous accusation cannot be proven, he shall be punished according to the judgement of mayor and council.
- If there are any disputes between members of the craft, they are not to bring the complaint to court, but before the headsmen who will try to arbitrate a settlement; failing that, the headsmen shall bring the matter before the mayor. Failure to comply will result in a fine (prescribed in an existing statute). If any headsman shows partiality or lets anything other than good conscience rule his judgement, the aggrieved party may complain to the mayor; or if any headsman fails to arbitrate, so that the dispute is not resolved and the parties resort to the courts, the delinquent headsman will be fined.

1424 ***

Penalty for butchers if they kill animals in the highway

Any butcher killing an animal on the highway shall pay 4d. fine, for each animal killed; the fine is to be levied by the common sergeant-at-mace.

[The issue here, for medieval townspeople, was one of hygiene and public safety (animal blood made the roads slippery).]

13 February 1439

Henceforth the entrails of all animals slaughtered (especially those by butchers) in the southern part of town are to be carted to Le Balle and there cast [into the river] at the low-tide mark at the time of half-ebb; entrails of animals slaughtered (especially those by butchers) in the north end of town shall be taken to Dowshill and be similarly disposed of. Furthermore it is ordained by agreement of the whole congregation that butchers shall, by next Easter, equip themselves with covered barrows or carts such as those used in London for transporting entrails to the said locations, on pain of 20s. fine for failing to obey this ordinance.

[Le Balle was an area of open land on the bank of the River Nar close to where it entered the Ouse; this land was normally used for drying fish, so the intent was probably to keep foul-smelling activities away from habitation. Dowshill was on the northern bank of the River Gay, again fairly close to the confluence with the Ouse.]

29 September 1331

Henceforth no-one shall allow his pigs to wander in, or go along, the streets on any day of the week except Saturday. If a pig is found wandering on any other day, its owner shall pay 4d. (and may be distraigned by the common sergeant for the said fine), and Adam Tolob shall take custody of the pig.

[The fines became a regular, if minor, source of income for the borough. In 1370/71, for example, fines amounted to £6.8s.8d, with 47 pig-owners being fined, many for multiple offences; two years later the fine had been dropped to 2d. and there were 675 offences by 86 pig-owners during the fiscal year.]

York - Marketplace

The Newgate Market in York has a strong flavour of a medieval marketplace, surrounded by merchants' houses and inns, and with church towers rising in the background. Ironically, this was not in fact one of the medieval marketplaces but was established in 1955. In the Middle Ages goods were bought and sold in a number of locations, but particularly the Thursday Market, to the west (now St. Sampson's Square), and Pavement, to the south -- the latter a street market, that spread out into adjacent streets; due to post-medieval redevelopment, neither of these now has much that brings to mind a medieval marketplace. My first experience of the Newgate Market was on a late afternoon in November when the marketplace was shrouded in mist, creating a blurring effect which only made it easier to imagine how a marketplace might have looked in the fifteenth century.

Markets and commercial privileges were fundamental features of towns (although not exclusive to towns), and the development of trade was a major factor in urbanization. The marketplace was a focal point, both economically and socially, of – and often a fairly central space (as in York) in – the town. It might take the form of a large open space, or be held along one or more streets of the town. Often certain types of goods were sold in particular, set locations; e.g. in York, meat was sold by local butchers in the Shambles (just off the modern Newgate Market), although it was also sold in the Thursday Market, while fish and poultry was sold on the Ouse and Foss Bridges.

Some characteristics of the medieval market have lasted into the twentieth century. The selling of goods from stalls, in the open air, was typical of much medieval retailing; the stalls in the Newgate Market seem to have about the same length and width dimensions sometimes found specified for medieval stalls. Although craftsmen would have workshops in their residences, most selling of goods was done from through the ground-floor front windows of houses, from temporary stalls outside the houses, or in a marketplace (or similar area designated for retailing). Over time some of these stalls became more elaborate and permanent fixtures, and evolved into the modern shop. This conversion process often meant that parts of the original marketplace were lost to the structures in process of becoming permanent buildings.

The public character of retailing was important, particularly since some bargaining would be involved. The marketplace brought retailing into a venue where both community and local authorities could see that trading was conducted fairly, with goods (above all, foodstuffs) freely available to all-comers, of a satisfactory quality, and offered at a fair price. Ordinances were made to restrict or prohibit retailing in private places or outside normal market hours. The purpose of the marketplace was also to allow producers of goods to sell directly to the public, without intervention of middlemen who might seek a profit by raising prices or lowering quality or quantity. Thus a set of ordinances made by York's government in 1301 included the specifications that:

- Middlemen could not sell food or drink for higher than the price they bought them from the producers.
- Fishmongers should sell fish only in the public market designated for this, holding none back for private sale in their own houses, nor should they resell fish they had bought from others; fish was not to be sold between the hours of Vespers and Prime.
- Fixed prices were set for various goods and anyone selling at a higher price would forfeit the merchandize.

Of course, the fact that such regulations were necessary is itself witness to contrary practices; profiteering is innate to commercial activity and was not to be controlled.

Arch 343: Cities in History

Lecture 9: Medieval Cities, Bruges and Florence

Dr. Richard Ingersoll, Rice University Cities and History

The Advent of the Closed City

Every time we use a term to categorize a city, the "Islamic" city, the "hellenistic" city, and today, the "medieval" city, we set up a frame that can easily be broken. The Islamic city may be characterized by the dominant religion of Islam, but it has other less specific aspects connected to trade and to time that make it not only Islamic but also medieval, or mercantile, or expansionist, or multi-ethnic, or whatever the case may be. The city is never one thing, and it never stops changing, even if like Venice it is physically being frozen and purposely kept unchanging, the life it contains is never static and will never remain in the same categorical frame, tourists meeting for cappuccino to discuss the city's charm are not the same as black-robed nobles meeting in the Broglio to discuss the city's fate.

The medieval city enjoys a special mythical status in Western culture, and is a category that is tremendously fuzzy, referring to a vague time and implying certain formal characteristics, like winding, narrow streets. In the imagination, the medieval city is littered with formidable castles and soaring cathedrals, and is the habitus of fairy tales. The term "medieval," the time in between, presumes that Roman culture and Renaissance culture, the bookends that enclose it, were somehow superior, better organized, more like us on our path to ultimate efficiency. So medieval also comes to represent a time when cities disappeared or closed in on themselves, when language is confused, the clarity of Latin dissipated into numerous barbaric vernaculars. For various reasons the middle ages was a time dominated by a religious distrust of cities and a military abuse of them, a time that interrupted the progression toward the achievement of a technical and social perfection that often is justified as the ultimate goal of human culture.

These are preconceptions, and in some way misconceptions. As Henri Pirenne, the great historian of medieval cities pointed out long ago, cities did not disappear after the dismantling of the Roman Empire, and for at least four centuries after the Sack of Alaric in Rome, that is until the 9th century, the trade networks that had sustained an interdependence of cities in the accumulation of wealth continued, although at a much reduced scale. It is only with the antagonism to Islam, that western Europe became greatly limited in its trading possibilities. In Italy, the Lombards and other invaders, inherited the cities of the Romans, and adapted to urban traditions. In particular, the new religion of Christianity became the religion of their states. The papacy attempted to continue the unifying structure of the empire in the organization of the Church, and for many cities during the middle ages, the bishop as representative of the central religious authority of Rome, had the authority of a provincial governor analogous to those of the empire. The Church's diocese replaced the empire's civitas. Many cities of Roman origin became cathedral cities, with the church and bishop's palace as the new urban focus.

In places with a Roman past, the frazzling we observed in Damascus was quite similar: densification began to alter the clarity of the street patterns, straight roads were made crooked by overhangs crossing over the street and shops blocking it, the attempt to fortify individual family compounds, created impediments and blind alleys. The authority of the city was fragmented and could no longer control the plan of the city as a whole; thus the building of the parts, the concentration on enclaves, began to determine the plan. The transformation of the grid of Florence from the 4th to the 12th century shows this dynamic process of pinching and clogging the urban pattern and filling it in with solid enclaves. The city was greatly reduced in size, walls thrown up, invasions and sacks change the fabric. After the period of invasions subsided a new landed gentry created reproduced in the city the same sort of fortified castle-like compounds built to defend their estates in the countryside. The solid works of the Roman past, such as the amphiteater's structure was recycled during the next expansion to serve as the foundations for housing. The closed medieval city gathered around three solid enclaves: the castle, the cathedral, and the monastery.

Feudalism and Medieval Enclaving

Much of western Europe by the late 9th and 10th centuries had been politically fragmented into feudal estates arrived at through sometimes arbitrary acts of force or fate. This geographic reapportionment of the Roman Empire was directly due to the constant incursion of nomadic warriors from the north and the east, who destabilized the military security of larger territories, but indirectly it was just as much a consequence of a significant drop in population and the ebbing of international trade. The historic wave carried marauding invaders until at least the year 1000, and as we shall see, the mobile invader usually had a certain military advantage over the settled defender, in particular because they had nothing to lose.

One trend in the late empire that had profound economic significance was the creation of latifundi, huge estates meant to avoid the high taxes of the cities that became self-sufficient entities. This will evolve into the feudal system in the 9th century, when as Pirenne says: "an economy of exchange was substituted for an economy of consumption...each demesne (or estate) constituted from this time a little world of its own." A feudal desmene typically was composed of 300 farms, about 10,000 acres of land. The monarch of the region is the theoretical owner and the bishop or high nobility the titular owner, managing the property like a tenant-in-chief, owing service to the crown in the form of knights or arms. The land was worked by serfs, people who were not free to move, or own property, and who were required to give at least half of the yield of the land they worked to the local aristocrat, or vassal, who in turn owed tribute and military service to the regional lord.

When trade was revived in the 11th century, the feudal castles, known now as bourgs, that were closest to the trade routes or were able to draw the route toward them, became the nuclei for a market-based city. The castle in Hereford precedes other urban features such as the cathedral. The bourg, which often became an urban nucleus, was not always a precedent to urban formation but inserted into a growing complex, such as Gloucester in England, a small roman castrum town that first had its cathedral and then attracted a castle with its lord. Or Hereford, a trading town that grew around the year 1000, and from a crossroads fair attracted a castle and a cathedral. The attraction of the city to the lower classes was that if they could establish residence there they could become property owners and get free of feudal obligations--thus the saying "the city air makes you free" (Stadtluft macht frei). Enterprising castle lords speculated on this desire for freedom, realizing that there was more to be gained in taxes than from feudal agricultural surplus. Monasticism

The historic wave affecting Europe between the 4th and 9th centuries was also made of plagues and abandonments. And of course it carried high religious fervor and fanaticism. Military issues had always determined status in the Hellenistic and Roman world, the equestrian class being higher than the infantry. A Roman emperor was always treated as a military commander first. Something outside of the chain of command occurred between 300 and 1000, however, that altered military effectiveness. Post-empire life will be in some respects much more influenced by military events due to the greater instability of urban settlements, but there will also be a significant pacifist element in culture, in which humility, prayer, and cultivation of the after life replaced the more worldly concerns of conquest or defense. The pursuit of a spiritual alternative led many to the non-military solution of monasticism, a utopian flight from the city that resulted in small, self-selected groups of non-reproducing monks, who produced a remarkably disciplined settlement of a timeless and rigid social and architectural order as an antidote or antithesis to the moral, military and progressive nature of the secular city of the Romans. St. Augustine (354-430, De civitate Dei), a bishop from North Africa, theorized that if the civitas was predicated on justice, then Rome, or any city built by man would not be able to provide it because of the treatment of women and slaves and the other excluded members of society. The City of God, where true justice could only be found in a Heavenly Jerusalem, where all mankind gave up the vanity of this world and joined together in a state of humble pilgrimage.

I would never want to give the impression that Christianity is necessarily a pacifist religion--after all Constantine won his battles in the name of the cross, and the Church will constantly be taking sides in wars, and eventually during the Renaissance become an actively aggressive military power. Let's just say that Christianity among other things has the potential to inspire interpretations in favor of pacifism with the parable of turning the other cheek. And it is this potential for non-participation that is interesting as a component of the city, or sometimes as an alternative to the city.

Monasticism was already widespread in the Middle East during the lifetime of Christ-- his teaching may in fact have been derived from the monastic cult of the Essenes, a Judaic brotherhood who like Christian monks took vows of chastity and increased their numbers by adopting abandoned children and training them, devoting much of their daily life to prayer and reading the scriptures. Monasticism is of course not limited to Christianity but is found in most major religions--Islam has its Sufis, Buddhism its monks--in any case it implies a life separated from the daily obligations of the world of the city, devoted expressly to prayer, work, and study. Christian monasticism followed the examples established in Syria and North Africa, of retreating to caves and inaccessible places. Monks will remove themselves to mountaintops and islands and isolated sites that are really the opposite of the city as a demonstration of anti-worldliness. Perhaps the most extreme example was the case of St. Simeon Stylites, a 5th century mystic living in Syria, who spent thirty years chained to the top of a 60 foot high column. A great octagonal shrine was built around the column in reverence for his high example and a monastery for those who would follow his practice of self denial was attached to one side. But no matter how far monks retreated from the world, it is curious to see how much they brought urban organization in their architecture, and military discipline to their way of life.

St. Benedict, (480-543) a monk from central Italy, had the greatest influence on the movement in Europe when he wrote his little book on the rules of a monastery, explaining how every hour of the day was to be occupied by work, devotion and prayer (ora et labora). The monk's life is regimented like that of a soldier's and the conceptual plans for early monasteries resemble the order of a castrum military plan. The earliest document describing one is the plan of St. Gall, made sometime around 800, which shows the orderly arrangement of religious, living and working quarters. The great body of the church, like a covered hall or basilica, is offset by the void of the cloister, a rectangular or square court, slightly smaller than the enclosed Hellenistic urban spaces such as the imperial fora, but usually larger than the courtyard of a house. The artfully shaped void of the cloister instead of being an active public space for the community, was its antithesis, a purposefully uneventful space of silence and contemplation, with a green center, for a group that often respected vows of silence. The plan with its clear orthogonal links was like the memory of the order of the lost city. It was not only written culture that was preserved in the monasteries but also a language of architecture and planning.

Monasteries such as the fictional St. Gall were small cities unto themselves, like the feudal estates, and often had a feudal relationship with local peasants. Although in Benedict's original rules the monks were to do all of the work themselves, the revised rules by orders such as the Cluniacs, created a theocratic division of labor, with monks specialized in learning and religious functions, served by their dependents. Monasteries were even involved in trade.

One thing monasteries lacked, however, was military force, and many of the early examples, such as St Benedict's original monastery at Monte Cassino, and even its second version, which has been reconstructed in this perspective, were destroyed by marauding invaders. Monasteries were usually positioned in defensible sites and often attracted towns that settled around them and eventually became involved in their defense. The monastery as an institution and a form is important to the discourse of the European city on the one hand because they maintained the rational typologies of an earlier urban order that had lapsed during the devastation of the cities, but also because they often gave rise to the idea of a new city (such as we saw in Venice), or provided pockets of order as new additions to cities, such as the convents built for the mendicant orders during the 13th and 14th centuries--the soft armature I previously mentioned in reference to the Franciscan and Domenican convents in Venice.

The Soft Armature

A soft armature is a term I invented to indicate that in the carpet-like urban patterns of medieval cities like Cairo or Venice there are occasional breaks, usually devoted to religious institutions like mosques and medresa in Cairo or monasteries and hospitals in Europe, that constitute local pockets of orthogonal order. It is an armature only in that you expect every once and awhile that there will be this kind of highly structured element graced with monumental architecture and with columnated open space; it is soft because it usually bleeds into the carpet and does not makes definitive links from piece to piece for an overall coherent urban structure.

The ancient hellenistic city had large buildings and usually a temple mount or Akropolis as a strong vertical element, but the buildings themselves were not conceived vertically. The order in the city was achieved through coordinated horizontal organization or columnated spaces, of wide buildings like baths and theaters--breadth not height was the modicum of good urban importance. For the post antique city verticality became the new legible order of the city. On the horizontal plane, most cities were often as confusing and snarled as Venice, but they always offered strong vertical elements as signals of hierarchy: the cathedral and its bell towers and steeples, the towers of fortified castles, the towers of important citizen's compounds, and the bellfry of the municipality, once that institution took hold. The shape of the city became pyramidal and soaring: be it a town that grew from an earlier Roman city like York, where the cathedral overwelled the rest of the skyline, or one based on a monastery like Le Mont Saint Michel, which used its rocky site to climb to the sky, or a new cathedral town like Chartres, which promoted itself as a pilgrimage site, or a castle town, or a crossroads trading center like Troyes that grew up around the international fairs of Champagne. This same quest for vertical expression was present in the new founded towns that appeared after the year 1000, like Delft, towns that had a high degree of integral planning. The spire or tower were the points of orientation of the soft armature of medieval cities.

When the Cathedrals were White

About the year 1000, the map of the Mediterranean showed the great expanse of Islamic states on the south, the large but fragile byzantine empire to the East, the Holy Roman Empire, unified under Charlemagne but in no way resembling the administrative control of the old Roman Empire, the Frankish kingdom to the west. Europe was divided into an infinity of substates, duchies, church controlled territories, and city-states such as Venice. In Germany for instance of 120 towns, 40 were controlled by bishops, 20 by monasteries, and 60 by castles. Until the revival of international trade, the towns of Europe were fairly static. In the Domesday book written in England after the Norman invasion of the 11th century, it is explained that there were 13,000 villages in England, with none having a population greater than 8,000, and most of them located at a distance of no more than two miles. Market towns were found at a distance 7 miles from each other.

Almost every city in the medieval west is dominated by the cathedral, at first the site of power of the bishop, but as power shifted to the middle classes a great collective artifact and built mother for the people. The cathedral was a book in stone of the lessons of Christian virtues: charity, humility, respect. As the fortunes of medieval cities increased in the 12th century, the cathedral was boosted into a new program for a fantastic gravity-defying enclosure that lept above the city on flying buttresses, pushing beyond the logic of structure to ever greater heights and ever more marvellous filtering of light. The pointed arch of Gothic cathedrals is both a symbol pointing to heaven and the key to a new flexibility that allows through rotated groin vaults to deposit the load of the roof on points. If the City of God was impossible to attain because of mundane requirements of daily life, a substitute could be sculpted of stone. The cathedral came to represent the city, and in some cases like Chartres, rising in the distance above the wheat fields as prominently as the acropolis of an ancient city, it was the city.

The confusion of authority between church, state, local and international, feudal allegiance and craft or trade based allegiances, was reflected architecturally in the Medieval city as we shall see. This conflict partly accounts for the atomized quality of most medieval cities. Atomization is that phenomenon of things being related contingently but not comprehensively, what we have also called piecemealism, like each of the Venetian islands, which share adjacencies but are generally lacking a comprehensive order between the parts.

Bruges

As the feudal order was breaking down in the 12th century, the more enterprising lords sought to attract commerce. Among the most successful were the Counts of Champagne who set up seasonal trade fairs for merchants from the northern industrial cities of Flanders and the Italian merchants. By guaranteeing safe passage and protecting the mechanisms of exchange and credit, instant urbanism occurred on the outskirts of these small bourgs. Troyes set about to build a new cathedral from the new wealth it received. The fairs were at first held outside the city walls on fair grounds where long rows of tents were assembled. They generally lasted for two months and allowed foreigners to bring their wares for international clients. The walls of Troyes built in 1250 enclosed long strips of commercial streets extending from the intersection of the city's canals that bear reminiscent of the activities of the fair: street of money changers, court of meetings, street of spice, etc.

It may seem surprising that the major good that inspired this new wave of mercantilism was cloth--fashion if you like. Silk wool, and flax, which need to be carted, processed, woven, and marketed. The Champagne Fairs declined with the arrival of Atlantic shipping and the promotion by the Counts of Flanders of allowed Bruges to become a central node in international exchange. Bruges grew from a fortified bourg at a river crossing to be a great emporium.

Bruges is in the lowlands between France and Holland in the heart of a major textile producing area; like Venice highly urbanized and with a minimum of landed gentry and peasants. It takes its name from its function as a bridge across the Reie River, where a small castle town was set to regulate commercial traffic. The city was favored by a literal historic wave in 1134 when a storm altered the configuration of the coast and brought Bruges within one mile of the sea, the port of Damme was set up and the river was used as a canal to bring goods to the city, with at first the major trading partner being England across the channel. The counts of Flanders who were the lords of the city allowed it to have an annual trade fair beginning in 957 and guaranteed privileges for those involved in commerce to build in the city in the form of freehold estates. The traders, shops, money changers and such were allowed to deal outside of the gates of the bourg or castle compound, in an area called a Faubourg, meaning outside the bourg. The new residents of the faubourg as they grew wealthier separated into economic classes, the Poorters, the commercial elite from the draper craft were analogous to the nobility of Venice. They formed a self-governing body that communicated with the Counts of Flanders and were allowed to own property. The craftsmen were not allowed to own land and thus did not have the same juridical rights. The Poorters met in a special hall with a tall tower, the Poorterslodge, located at the head of the river where goods would first be sited entering the city. Already by the 12th century the city had become self-governing with a council of elected officials and a large collection of magistrates which among other things collected customs taxes and supervised the public works on canals and markets that would make the city attractive and efficient for foreign merchants. Once the Genovese in the 1270s had perfected the Atlantic route from the Mediterranean, the fortunes of the city escalated as the central merchandising site for wool and linen in the world. The new port of Sluis was opened in 1290. Major alterations to urban form would follow, financed from the revenues put on exchange and consumption.

New walls were thrown up in 1297 trebling the size of the city which was quickly filled in with new palaces and warehouses. The old moats were now used as canals facilitating the transport of goods. Legislation was reaffirmed that only tile roofs could be used as a fire safety measure and the city paid for every third tile. The streets were widened and the city government paid for demolitions: one of the first instances of eminent domain. The streets were cleaned every week at the expense of the city. The city also financed the construction of a great hall for storing and selling wool, the Waterhalle which spanned the river, so that the bundles could be unloaded in a covered space. In 1377 the Belfry, attached to the central markets and the tallest tower of its time, and not unlike the function of the campanile in Venice--it was a secular belltower, a great timepiece regulating the city that gave it a vertical core. The city also invested in public waterworks to bring clean water to the town and sponsored the hospital of St. Johns.

The foreign merchants were the wealthiest residents of Bruges, often having their own palaces or compounds. Sixteen nations were represented in Bruges, and half of these were from Italy. Among the wealthiest natives were the inn-keepers and one in particular, the vander Beurs family, gave their name to an institution, the bourse or stock exchange, that would stick as one the key ingredients of capitalism. The plaza in front of their inn, which was two steps away from the Poorterslodge, was next to the compound of the Genoese and the Florentines. It was a space analogous to the market of the Rialto in Venice, where prices were determined and information about investments was relayed. Bruges was a much smaller city than Venice, at its height in only had 40,000 residents (about a tenth the size of Venice). The lower classes succeeded in the 14th century in gaining representation, but switches in the world market and the decline of the Flemish textile industry were imminent, plus the silting up of the Reies River made access difficult to Bruges by the end of the 14th century.

Unlike Venice, those who had the greatest capital, the foreigners, had no commitment to the city, and when water access and markets became more favorable in Antwerp further east, they pulled out of Bruges without second thoughts, leaving a financial vacuum. From Bruges the center of European exchange moved to Antwerp, then to London and Amsterdam in the 16th and 17th centuries. Bruges establishes a pattern to be followed by Antwerp and Amsterdam of public investment in infrastructure, waterworks, street building, and monumental civic structures to encourage the processes of exchange from which the population would gain residuals. The art of space making in Bruges was not as refined as that of Venice, for instance the major square was lined with narrow, step-gabled buildings each not more the 15 to 25 feet wide and did not have the look of consciously shaped space. Although the patronage was usually guided by the Council, the elements were added piecemeal and the spaces were cut out of dense fabric as residual rather than figural.

Florence

One of the great trading partners in Bruges was Florence, and some of her incredibly wealthy bankers, in particular the Medici, had representatives stationed there. Florence, which is often offered as the epitome of the Renaissance city, is actually a fine example of the Medieval city. Until the rise of the Comune (the municipal government), it was contended over by the ecclesiastic authorities, by local feudal lords, by invading feudal powers, and by the Holy Roman Empire. Added to this chessboard of bishops, knights, and kings, was a new factor, not just the pawns that represent powerless peasants, but the craftsmen or producers, the more mobile commercial sector that will attract capital surplus to the city.

Florence had a succession of walls that can be read in the street patterns of a modern map; but within those walls, there were other sets of walls, where the islands of the Roman grid were taken over to create consorterie, family alliances protected by a fortified compound, each with one or more towers from which to keep a lookout for neighbor-enemies in times of feuding. [A glance at San Gimignano, a town controlled by Florence to the south where these consorterie with towers still exist in the form they would have had in 12th century Florence show these austere towers with arrow slit windows rising with the density of a modern highrise city]. The feudal towers were as symbolic as they were functional, indicating the status of the family. There were at least 90 of them in the center of Florence, but today only a few remain, and these were ordered to be lowered to the height of the palaces at the end of the 13th century, the moment when the magnates or urban nobles were excluded from the municipal government.

The mid-14th century Palazzo Davanzati is a fine example of the sort of palace that succeeded the tower houses, now with a symmetrical facade, nicely articulated with rusticated masonry, a bottom portal that would open for business on the ground floor, generous rounded arch windows above, and a top storey loggia or belvedere. The house was still defensible but had lost the fierce details.

The question of authority in the Medieval city often came up due to external threats, attacks by other cities or marauders. The elite could either turn to the Church to resolve its disputes, or to representatives of the Emperor, or else to an impromptu assembly. A common practice arose of appointing an outsider, a podesta, for short terms of one or two years, a noble person with no local conflicts of interests to serve as an objective arbiter and even a military leader when the town was under attack. The first Podesta was sent to Florence in 1193. So aside from the bishop's palace and the various fortified compounds, a common building that sprouted up in the 11th and 12th century was the Palace for the Podestà--the outside arbiter. Like the Bargello palace in Florence, built in the 1250s, these were usually fortified compounds, castles in the city, with narrow windows, and with crenellations for battle positions on its parapets, a sign both of the authority of the resident and the warlike nature of the city with its competing factions.

The placement of the largest structures in Florence, the town hall and the Cathedral demonstrates the historic antipathy between the power of the bishop and that of the republican comune. During the 13th century the population doubled to 100,000, making it one of the largest cities in Europe. Florence had well developed cloth industries and from the profits of this it developed a formidable banking industry to the extent that the standard currency used in the 14th century was known as the florin. Unlike Venice and Bruges, the nobility, which was derived from a squabbling feudal aristocracy, lost its authority in municipal politics during the mid 13th century to the emerging bourgeois class of cloth merchants and bankers, the officers of the well-organized upper guilds, or arti maggiori.

When the new town hall was commissioned in 1298, it was called the Palazzo del Popolo, the palace of the people, meaning those who have the right to participate in the government--today after the intervening years of monarchy it is called Palazzo Vecchio, the old palace. Notice that it is also conceived of as a fortified castle. The elected officials were to live in this compound during their two month terms, not unlike those living in the tholos in ancient Athens. The palace could be seized by dissident nobles or by factions that disagreed with policy.

Florence underwent a fairly coordinated rethinking at the end of the 13th century under the artistic guidance of the sculptor Arnolfo da Cambio, who was responsible for the new palace, the new series of walls, which gave Florence a girth she never was able to fill until the late 19th century, and a series of new towns in the provinces ruled by Florence. San Giovanni Vald'arno, structured on three parallel streets which are proportionately measured and divided by a central piazza for the palace of the Podesta and the major religious buildings, is an interesting depiction of the type of hierarchical and rational order that the dreamed of in the old city. It is one of hundreds of new towns that were created all over Europe, especially where there were contested borders or major trade routes, during the 13th and 14th centuries. If they were constructed for military purposes, they were known as bastides and almost always followed a rigid orthogonal composition, usually structured on a grid, leaving a void in the center for public open space and civic institutions. 35 bastides were built in Gascony where England and France disputed territory: Monpazier, founded in 1284, around the time of San Giovanni, shows how similar and international the idea of the new town was.

During the time of Arnolfo, Florence produced a collection of urban statutes for paving the streets, and later would add fire codes to these, insisting that facades be made in masonry to a nine foot level. The space for the piazza of the city hall was expanded in the beginning of the 14th century by expropriating the property of the Uberti family who were punished for their affiliations with the Ghibellines. The front of the palace had a special set of seats, known as the arangario (from whence we get the term harangue) meant for public speeches, and to the side of the palace a special loggia for public meetings, the loggia dei Lanzi was added mid-century. The loggia had a special function in Florence and almost all important families had one attached to their palaces. It is analogous to the stoa in Athens, a permeable and visible space to do business or carry out ceremonies that can be observed by all in the interests of accountability. The Loggia del Bigallo, built for a religious confraternity, near the cathedral is one of several examples of the type, and later the loggia for the palazzo Rucellai, the famous work of Alberti will continue this republican tradition.

The major building in the city, the great cathedral of Santa Maria dei Fiori was begun in 1296, and purposely meant to be larger than St. Peter's in Rome. The wool guild, the Arte della Calimala was in charge of its administration. The project for the dome was already planned mid-century and enlarged to its final form under Brunelleschi during the next century. As in Venice, the preaching orders of the Franciscans and Dominicans were allowed to establish their convents at the edges of the developed parts of the city, where they served as nodes for future development, soft armatures again. The magistrates known as the Ufficiali della torre, the officials of the tower, administered most of the public works in the 14th century, including the Ponte Vecchio, which had to be rebuilt after being washed out in a flood. The shops lining either side were a means of financing the project.

Probably the most interesting bit of urban planning carried out during the medieval republic was the widening of via dei Calzaioli, the axis connecting the Duomo to the town hall. This required eminent domain to condemn and tear down parts of buildings, and the magistrates enforced a building code on all the reconstructed facades to be masonry with rounded arches. A similar edict went into effect for the buildings surrounding the apse of the Duomo. This was done both in the interests of fire safety, but also out of a taste for order and regularity, a sense of urban decorum. It shows the attempt to coordinate public space, not just building bit by bit as in Bruges, but thinking of the effect of the whole, thinking of streets in terms of axes. And space is understood in three dimensions as having a shape that should be regulated for the good of the community.

The maintenance of Florence, its paving, rebuilding of public features such as the Ponte Vecchio, the coordinated planning of urban space, was arrived at through the effort to resolve the marked conflicts present in the city. There is an attempt in giving regularity to the city fabric, in straightening and widening, making safe, but also in making decorous, to impose civility, to create the citizen. Architecture thus returns to a rhetorical role as in Greco-Roman times. The new city imagined through these urban regulations has harnessed the conflicts between the bourg, the nobility in its castles, the church and its bishops, dreaming of its city of God, and the faubourg market tugging at the old walls. The comune, the medieval republic formed by the merchant class, was founded upon conflict and produced a new rhetoric of urban consciousness, punctuated by strong acts of architecture-- the city hall and the new cathedral--in the effort to make all of the individual and competing parts of the Medieval city desire to belong to the whole.

Grant of a New Fair at Westminster, 1248

The merchant who attended a fair not only had to run the risk of inclement weather but the possibility of the suspension of the fair by the king.

The king then declared it as his pleasure, and ordered it to be proclaimed by herald throughout the whole city of London, and elsewhere, that he instituted a new fair to be held at Westminster, to continue for a fortnight entire. He also strictly interdicted, under penalty of heavy forfeiture and loss, all fairs which usually lasted for such a length of time in England; for instance, that of Ely and other places, and all traffic usually carried on at London, both in and out of doors, in order that by these means the Westminster fair might be more attended by people, and better supplied with merchandise.... But all the merchants, in exposing their goods for sale there, were exposed to great inconveniences, as they had no shelter except canvas tents; for owing to the changeable gusts of wind assailing them, as is usual at that time of the year, they were cold and wet, and also suffered from hunger and thirst; their feet were soiled by the mud, and their goods rotted by the showers of rain....

The Hundred Years' War (1336-1565)

Dictionary and Thesaurus

Western Europe in 1328

CAUSES

The Battle for Flanders

Flanders had grown to be the industrial center of northern Europe and had become extremely wealthy through its cloth manufacture. It could not produce enough wool to satisfy its market and imported fine fleece from England. England depended upon this trade for its foreign exchange. During the 1200's, the upper-class English had adopted Norman fashions and switched from beer to wine.

(Note that beer and wine were very important elements in the medieval diet. Both contain vitamin and yeast complexes that the medieval diet, especially during the winter, did not provide. Besides, the preservation of food was a difficult matter in that era, and the alcohol in beer and wine represented a large number of calories stored in an inexpensive and effective fashion. People did get drunk during the middle ages, but most could not afford to do so. Beer and wine were valued as food sources and were priced accordingly)

The problem was that England could not grow grapes to produce the wine that many of the English now favored and had to import it. A triangular trade arose in which English fleece was exchanged for Flemish cloth, which was then taken to southern France and exchanged for wine, which was then shipped into England and Ireland, primarily through the ports of Dublin, Bristol, and London.

But the counts of Flanders had been vassals of the king of France, and the French tried to regain control of the region in order to control its wealth. The English could not permit this, since it would mean that the French monarch would control their main source of foreign exchange. A civil war soon broke out in Flanders, with the English supporting the manufacturing middle class and the French supporting the land-owning nobility.

The Struggle for Control of France

The English king controlled much of France, particularly in the fertile South. These lands had come under control of the English when Eleanor of Aquitaine, heiress to the region, had married Henry II of England in the mid-12th century. There was constant bickering along the French-English frontier, and the French kings always had to fear an English invasion from the South. Between Flanders in the North and the English in the South, they were caught in a "nutcracker".

The "Auld Alliance"

The French responded by creating their own "nutcracker." They allied with the Scots in an arrangement that persisted well into the 18th century. Thus the English faced the French from the south and the Scots from the north.

The Battle for the Channel and North Sea

The French nutcracker would only work if the French could invade England across the English Channel. (The French call it "La Manche," "The Sleeve," for what reason I do not know.) Besides, England could support their Flemish allies only if they could send aid across the North Sea, and, moreover, English trade was dependent upon the free flow of naval traffic through the Channel. Consequently, the French continually tried to gain the upper hand at sea, and the English constantly resisted them. Both sides commissioned what would have been pirates if they had not been operating with royal permission to prey upon each other's shipping, and there were frequent naval clashes in those constricted waters.

The Dynastic Conflict

The last son of King Philip IV (The Fair) died in 1328, and the direct male line of the Capetians finally ended after almost 350 years. Philip had had a daughter, however. This daughter, Isabelle, had married King Edward II of England, and King Edward III was their son. He was therefore Philip's grandson and successor in a direct line through Philip's daughter. The French could not tolerate the idea that Edward might become King of France, and French lawyers brought up some old Frankish laws, the so-called Salic Law, which stated that property (including the throne) could not descend through a female. The French then gave the crown to Philip of Valois, a nephew of Philip IV. Nevertheless, Edward III had a valid claim to the throne of France if he wished to pursue it.

An Agressive Spirit in England

Although France was the most populous country in Western Europe (20 million inhabitants to England's 4-5 million) and also the wealthiest, England had a strong central government, many veterans of hard fighting on England's Welsh and Scottish borders (as well as in Ireland), a thriving economy, and a popular king. Edward was disposed to fight France, and his subjects were more than ready to support their young (only 18 years old at the time) king.

THE COURSE OF THE WAR

War broke out in earnest in 1340. The French had assembled a great fleet to support an army with which they intended to crush all resistance in Flanders. When the ships had anchored in a dense pack at Sluys in modern Netherlands, the English attacked and destroyed it with fire ships and victory in a battle fought across the anchored ships, almost like a land battle on a wooden battlefield. The English now had control of the Channel and North Sea. They were safe from French invasion, could attack France at will, and could expect that the war would be fought on French soil and thus at French expense.

Edward invaded northern France in 1345. The Black Death had arrived, and his army was weakened by sickness. As the English force tried to make its way safely to fortified Channel port, the French attempted to force them into a battle. The English were finally pinned against the coast by a much superior French army at a place called Crecy (pronounced "cressie"). Edward's army was a combined force: archers, pikemen, light infantry, and cavalry; the French, by contrast, clung to their old-fashioned feudal cavalry. The English had archers using the longbow, a weapon with great penetrating power that could sometimes kill armoured knights, and often the horses on which they rode. The battle was a disaster for the French. The English took up position on the crest of a hill, and the French cavalry tried to ride up the slope to get at their opponents. The long climb up soggy ground tired and slowed the French horses, giving the English archers and foot soldiers ample opportunity to wreak havoc in the French ranks. Those few French who reached the crest of the hill found themselves faced with rude, but effective, barriers, and, as they tried to withdraw, they were attacked by the small but fresh English force of mounted knights.

Nevertheless, facing much the same battlefield situation some ten years later, the French employed the same tactics they had used at Crecy, with the same dismal result, at the battle of Poitiers (1356). The French king and many nobles were captured, and many, many others were killed. Old fashioned feudal warfare, in which knights fought for glory, was ended. The first phase of the war ended with a treaty in 1360, but France continued to suffer. The English had employed mercenaries who, once they were no longer paid, lived off the country by theft and plunder. Most French peasants would have found it difficult to distinguish between war and this sort of peace.

END OF THE CONFLICT

As the war dragged on, the English were slowly forced back. They had less French land to support their war effort as they did so, and the war became more expensive for them. This caused conflicts at home, such as the Peasants' Revolt of 1381 and the beginning of civil wars.

Nevertheless, in the reign of Henry V, the English took the offensive once again. At Agincourt, not far from Crecy, the French relapsed into their old tactics of feudal warfare once again, and were again disastrously defeated (1415). The English recovered much of the ground they had lost, and a new peace was based upon Henry's marriage to the French princess Katherine. These events furnish the plot for Shakespeare's play, Henry V. With Henry's death in 1422, the war resumed.

Western Europe in 1430

In the following years, the French developed a sense of national identity, as illustrated by Joan of Arc, a peasant girl who led the French armies to victory over the English until she was captured and burned by the English as a witch. The French now had a greater unity, and the French king was able to field massive armies on much the same model as the British. In addition, however, the French government began to appreciate the "modern" style of warfare, and new military commanders, such as Bertran du Guesclin, began to use guerilla and "small war" tactics of fighting.

The war dragged on for many years. In fact, it was not until 1565 that the English were forced out of Calais, their last foothold in continental France, and they still hold the Channel Islands, the last remnant of England's medieval empire in France.

Western Europe in 1470

THE RESULTS

This war marked the end of English attempts to control continental territory and the beginning of its emphasis upon maritime supremacy. By Henry V's marriage into the House of Valois, an hereditary strain of mental disorder was introduced into the English royal family. There were great advances in military technology and science during the period, and the military value of the feudal knight was thoroughly discredited. The order of knighthood went down fighting, however, in a wave of civil wars that racked the countries of Western Europe. The European countries began to establish professional standing armies and to develop the modern state necessary to maintain such forces.

From the point of view of the 14th century, however, the most significant result is that the nobility and secular leaders were busy fighting each other at a time when the people of Western Europe desperately needed leadership.

Conflagration: The Peasants' Revolt

Part One: The Fire is Laid

by Melissa Snell

In the spring of 1381, a rebellion occurred in England that threatened the very foundation of feudal government. No longer willing to accept the bonds of villeinage, thousands of peasants rose up and demanded legal recourse for the injustices of inherited servitude. The resulting explosion of violence and betrayal has gone down in history as the Peasants' Revolt.

Villeins, while theoretically "free" and owned by no man, were nevertheless bound by law to work the land on which they lived and provide services and goods to the owner of that land. They were prohibited from translating these services into cash and from paying rent instead of working. If they were ill-treated in any way by their landlord they could not speak against him in court; if they left the land without his permission they could be hunted down and imprisoned. There was no way out of this cycle of bondage except to change the law, but no one represented the peasantry in Parliament.

Why, after centuries of compliance with this system, did people accustomed to service suddenly rebel? The answer is that there was nothing "sudden" about it. Over the course of generations, conditions steadily worsened for the peasantry while the nobility not only thrived but displayed their riches with ostentation. The recurring conflicts of what would come to be called the Hundred Years' War drained England of manpower and funds alike, and be it in blood or money, it was the lower classes who paid the most dearly.

In the aftermath of the Black Death, unstable economic conditions led the English government to restrict wages in an attempt to control the rising costs demanded by skilled laborers. The result was the widely ineffective yet dangerously unpopular Statute of Laborers. At the same time, a shortage of food made it absolutely mandatory that as many farms as possible be worked, and the rights (such as they were) of the villeins who worked them were often overlooked in favor of turning a profit. Whether he stayed with his farm or found a way to move to the city, the average peasant would find it impossible to dig himself out of the hole into which the world seemed intent on shoving him.

To make matters worse, upon the death of King Edward III the crown passed to his young grandson Richard, and the reins of the country were put into the hands of a council led primarily by Richard's uncle, John of Gaunt. It soon became apparent that Gaunt cared less for the welfare of England than he did for conquering parts of the continent. Not only were issues of domestic importance ignored or mishandled, but the money to finance his expeditions was raised by round after round of injurious taxation.

Conditions were bad, but they'd been bad before. Now, however, an awareness of injustice had been awakened in the general populace. In the 1370's John Wycliffe had begun writing his revolutionary theories in which he tore at the roots of the papacy's power. Because of the spread of these theories, the Church, already unpopular thanks to a general failure of the clergy to live up to its standards during the plague, fell even further in the eyes of many people. For centuries the Church had been reminding peasants to keep their place. Now, slowly, serfs and laborers alike began to question just where their place was.

The Truth of Arthur - Page Three - The Real King Arthur

Wycliffe's theories were spread throughout England by his followers, who would later become known as the Lollards. Among these was John Ball, a particularly radical and outspoken priest whose speeches on equality and freedom landed him in prison on more than one occasion. Four hundred years later, these principles would form the founding philosophy of two successful revolutions and a brand-new nation; but in the fourteenth century they were considered by those of property, means and education to be "crazy," as Froissart recorded in his chronicles.

Crazy such ideas may have been to the rich, but to the "downtrodden masses," much of what John Ball was saying began to make sense:

"Are we not all descended from the same parents, Adam and Eve? and what can they show, or what reasons give, why they should be more the masters than ourselves? except, perhaps, in making us labour and work, for them to spend."

The Chronicles of Froissart

If such grumblings and murmurs of discontent were heard by the upper classes, they were largely ignored. The prevailing attitude was: "They're only peasants. What can they do?"

Just what the peasants could do was about to be seen when Parliament decreed one poll tax too many.

York - Walmgate Bar

Walmgate Bar is the most easterly of the gates of York's medieval wall. It is the only gate still to retain its barbican (the outer extension prominently seen in this shot), a fourteenth century addition which originally ran over a water-filled defensive ditch. Heads of those executed for treason were stuck on pikes which were mounted atop this gate, as a public warning.

By at least the latter part of the fourteenth century, the gatehouse was being rented out by the city to private citizens. It was perhaps this residence that was in 1478 assigned, rent-free, to a mason as part of the terms of his employment as a civil servant with the duty to "view and oversee yearly the walls of this city and all defaults therein to show and declare to the mayor and chamberlains of the time being, and he at all times to have and receive for him and his servants labouring on the said defaults such wages as belong to a mason to take daily." [The York House Books 1461-1490, ed. L. Attreed, 1991, vol.1 p.139; language modernised somewhat by me.] That the previous tenant was also a mason may reflect a similar, less formal arrangement.

Providing for a city's defence was not just a matter of building strong surrounding walls. It was necessary to furnish the gates with barriers such as portcullises (as Walmgate Bar had, and still has today). When Richard Spynk funded the improvement of Norwich's defences in the fourteenth century, this included provision for portcullises, wooden doors reinforced with lead, bars and chains for the entranceways (presumably when the doors were open), 28 springalds with ammunition for each, and a special defence for the river access into the city at the south end. By the end of the century, small cannon were being used to defend city walls. In the context of the civil war, ca. 1463, York took measures to repair the walls and the guns of the city and to buy supplies of gunpowder. By 1487, however, the citizens were petitioning the king to send them some of the royal armaments to augment city defences; Henry VII arranged for 12 serpentines, with gunpowder, to be transferred from Scarborough.

At the same time, the heads of each city ward were ordered to have the citizens of their wards assemble, armed and armoured, at a specified location for a "view of arms" by the mayor. This was a further essential element of city defence: the allocation of responsibility for defence of particular gates and stretches of wall to one or more wards and wardens – or, in 1380, to parishes and constables – and the provision of guards at each gate overnight in times of threat. Under the Assize of Arms (1181), reinforced by the Statute of Winchester (1285) each adult freeman had to provide himself with certain arms and armour, according to his financial means, and each hundred was to hold a review of the armed militia twice a year. Some townsmen (the information here coming from mid-14th century Norwich records) were wealthy enough that it was expected they be able to equip themselves with a full set of body armour suitable for a foot-soldier: breastplate with a padded undergarment such as a doublet, a bascinet helmet with neck protection (aventail), and brassarts and gauntlets to protect arms and hands. Others were only partly armoured (arm protection being the most dispensable item), while others had no armour, only weapons: usually a sword, dagger and staff or cudgel, although some specialized as archers.

Medieval Sourcebook: Reginald of Durham: Life of St. Goderic [12th Cent]

The growth of trade in the middle ages is of overwhelming significance. By the 13th century towns and trade, even though comprising a minority of the population, dominated the Western economy. This has widespread ramification - the monetization of life, the possibility of communally rather than aristocratically sponsored art, the possibility of urban subcultures and so on. On a wider level, it was this expansion of trade which in a later age pushed European states to establish the world system of the modern period.

Since literature was long the domain of aristocrats and clerics, we sometimes miss direct early accounts of merchant's lives. One merchant, Goderic, became a saint and hence we do have an account of his life.

This holy man's father was named Ailward, and his mother Edwenna; both of slender rank and wealth, but abundant in righteousness and virtue. They were born in Norfolk, and had long lived in the township called Walpole.... When the boy had passed his childish years quietly at home; then, as he began to grow to manhood, he began to follow more prudent ways of life, and to learn carefully and persistently the teachings of worldly forethought. Wherefore he chose not to follow the life of a husbandman, but rather to study, learn and exercise the rudiment of more subtle conceptions. For this reason, 'aspiring to the merchant's trade, he began to follow the chapman's way of life, first learning how to gain in small bargains and things of insignificant price; and thence, while yet a youth, his mind advanced little by little to buy and sell and gain from things of greater expense. For, in his beginnings, he was wont to wander with small wares around the villages and farmsteads of his own neighborhood; but, in process of time, he gradually associated himself by compact with city merchants. Hence, within a brief space of time, the youth who had trudged for many weary hours from village to village, from farm to farm, did so profit by his increase of age and wisdom as to travel with associates of his own age through towns and boroughs, fortresses and cities, to fairs and to all the various booths of the market-place, in pursuit of his public chaffer. He went along the high-way, neither puffed up by the good testimony of his conscience nor downcast in the nobler part of his soul by the reproach of poverty....

Yet in all things he walked with simplicity; and, in so far as he yet knew how, it was ever his pleasure to follow in the footsteps of the truth. For, having learned the Lord's Prayer and the Creed from his very cradle, he oftentimes turned them over in his mind, even as he went alone on his longer journeys; and, in so far as the truth was revealed to his mind, he clung thereunto most devoutly in all his thoughts concerning God. At first, he lived as a chapman for four years in Lincolnshire, going on foot and carrying the smallest wares; then he travelled abroad, first to St. Andrews in Scotland and then for the first time to Rome. On his return, having formed a familiar friendship with certain other young men who were eager for merchandise, he began to launch upon holder courses, and to coast frequently by sea to the foreign lands that lay around him. Thus, sailing often to and fro between Scotland and Britain, he traded in many divers wares and, amid these occupations, learned much worldly wisdom.... He fell into many perils of the sea, yet by God's mercy he was never wrecked; for He who had upheld St Peter as he walked upon the waves, by that same strong right arm kept this His chosen vessel from all misfortune amid these perils. Thus, having learned by frequent experience his wretchedness amid such dangers, he began to worship certain of the Saints with more ardent zeal, venerating and calling upon their shrines, and giving himself up by wholehearted service to those holy names. In such invocations his prayers were oftentimes answered by prompt consolation; some of which prayers he learned from his fellows with whom he shared these frequent perils; others he collected from faithful hearsay; others again from the custom of the place, for he saw and visited such holy places with frequent assiduity. Thus aspiring ever higher and higher, and yearning upward with his whole heart, at length his great labours and cares bore much fruit of worldly gain. For he laboured not only as a merchant but also as a shipman ... to Denmark and Flanders and Scotland; in all which lands he found certain rare, and therefore more precious, wares, which he carried to other parts wherein he knew them to be least familiar, and coveted by the inhabitants beyond the price of gold itself; wherefore he exchanged these wares for others coveted by men of other lands; and thus he chattered most freely and assiduously. Hence he made great profit in all his bargains, and gathered much wealth in the sweat of his brow; for he sold dear in one place the wares which he had bought elsewhere at a small price.

Then he purchased the half of a merchant-ship with certain of his partners in the trade; and again by his prudence he bought the fourth part of another ship. At length, by his skill in navigation, wherein he excelled all his fellows, he earned promotion to the post of steersman....

For he was vigorous and strenuous in mind, whole of limb and strong in body. He was of middle stature, broad-shouldered and deep-chested, with a long face, grey eyes most clear and piercing, bushy brows, a broad forehead, long and open nostrils, a nose of comely curve, and a pointed chin. His beard was thick, and longer than the ordinary, his mouth well-shaped, with lips of moderate thickness; in youth his hair was black, in age as white as snow; his neck was short and thick, knotted with veins and sinews; his legs were somewhat slender, his instep high, his knees hardened and horny with frequent kneeling; his whole skin rough beyond the ordinary, until all this roughness was softened by old age.... In labour he was strenuous, assiduous above all men; and, when by chance his bodily strength proved insufficient, he compassed his ends with great ease by the skill which his daily labours had given, and by a prudence born of long experience.... He knew, from the aspect of sea and stars, how to foretell fair or foul weather. In his various voyages he visited many saints' shrines, to whose protection he was wont most devoutly to commend himself, more especially the church of St Andrew in Scotland, where he most frequently made and paid his vows. On the way thither, he oftentimes touched at the island of Lindisfarne, wherein St Cuthbert had been bishop, and at the isle of Farne, where that Saint had lived as an anchorite, and where St Godric (as he himself would tell afterwards) would meditate on the Saint's life with abundant tears. Thence he began to yearn for solitude, and to hold his merchandise in less esteem than heretofore....

And now he had lived sixteen years as a merchant, and began to think of spending on charity, to God's honour and service, the goods which he had so laboriously acquired. He therefore took the cross as a pilgrim to Jerusalem, and, having visited the Holy Sepulchre, came back to England by way of St James [of Compostella]. Not long afterwards he became steward to a certain rich man of his own country, with the care of his whole house and household. But certain of the younger household were men of iniquity, who stole their neighbours' cattle and thus held luxurious feasts, whereat Godric, in his ignorance, was sometimes present. Afterwards, discovering the truth, he rebuked and admonished them to cease; but they made no account of his warnings; wherefore he concealed not their iniquity, but disclosed it to the lord of the household, who, however, slighted his advice. Wherefore he begged to be dismissed and went on a pilgrimage, first to St Gilles and thence to Rome the abode of the Apostles, that thus he might knowingly pay the penalty for those misdeeds wherein he had ignorantly partaken. I have often seen him, even in his old age, weeping for this unknowing transgression....

On his return from Rome, he abode awhile in his father's house; until, inflamed again with holy zeal, he purposed to revisit the abode of the Apostles and made his desire known unto his parents. Not only did they approve his purpose, but his mother besought his leave to bear him company on this pilgrimage; which he gladly granted, and willingly paid her every filial service that was her due. They came therefore to London; and they had scarcely departed from thence when his mother took off her shoes, going thus barefooted to Rome and back to London Godric, humbly serving his parent, was wont to bear her on his shoulders....

Godric, when he had restored his mother safe to his father's arms, abode but a brief while at home; for he was now already firmly purposed to give himself entirely to God's service. Wherefore, that he might follow Christ the more freely, he sold all his possessions and distributed them among the poor. Then, telling his parents of this purpose and receiving their blessing, he went forth to no certain abode, but whithersoever the Lord should deign to lead him; for above all things he coveted the life of a hermit.

CUSTOMAL: CAPITULUM 19

If a woman acquired property in the city before consummating a marriage, she may freely bequeath it to whomever she wishes (i.e. not necessarily her husband), unless she bore her husband a child after the marriage. If so, her bequest may take the form of the tenement going to the legatee only after the death of her husband, so that the husband retains the tenement during his life (without doing it any waste). She may also distinguish in her testament whether a bequest is to her husband and his heirs in perpetuity or just for the term of his life.

[Note that the woman had to acquire the property before consummation of the marriage, not before contracting the marriage – the latter could sometimes occur at a young age, long before the real marriage ceremony took place. The provision for a husband's life-interest in a property after his wife's death, referred to as "courtesy of England" was more for the benefit of the children than of the husband and had its equivalent, for a widow, as "free bench".]

Lynn - Whitefriars Gate

The various orders of friars were essentially a mission targeted at towns. The Church wished to use the friars to set an example of Christian values associated with modest lifestyle (to the point of austerity) and charitable behaviour. The friars played an important role in town life: preaching in public settings, providing spiritual services, their cemeteries offered sites for burial of townspeople, and they assisted in the improvement of living conditions through (for example) the creation of conduits for bringing in fresh water. They were popular with townspeople, as evidenced by the many bequests and gifts of land to them.

At Lynn, as in many other towns, it was in the thirteenth century that the friars established a presence. However, already the areas of Bishop's Lynn and Newland closest to the waterfront were already densely built up. Most of the friaries therefore built up what became quite extensive sites on the outskirts of the heavily settled areas in the eastern half of the area enclosed by the ditch/wall. The White Friars, however, acquired a site in sparsely settled South Lynn, along the western side of the road leading to the South Gate.

Little remains today of these friaries since, after the Dissolution, they were abandoned and their building materials were scavenged for use elsewhere. A tower of the Franciscan friary still stands, and one of the gateways, once-ruinous into the Whitefriars precinct also survives. The gateway was called Barfotesgate and led from the northern side of the friary into a road heading for the bridge across the Millfleet.

York - St. Mary's Abbey

St. Mary's Abbey, a Benedictine community, was built as the result of patronage by the king in 1088, on the site of an older religious foundation. It lay just outside the city wall, which provided its eastern boundary, in its own walled precinct. This proximity to the city and the fact that the abbey liberty was outside city administration almost inevitably meant that there would be conflicts between abbey and city officials over territorial (e.g. rights on common land outside the walls, right-of-way through the liberty along the wall) or jurisdictional (e.g. freedom from tolls and murage, rights to hold inquests within the liberty), and personal disputes between abbey tenants and citizens. In the mid-1440s the city was suing the abbey in regard to fishgarths placed in the section of the Ouse adjacent to abbey-owned land; these obstructed river navigation and therefore affected water-based commerce. The city paid out over £250 in legal costs in this dispute, necessitating special taxes upon the citizens to cover the expense.

Cathedrals, monasteries and abbeys – initially Benedictine, but joined in the twelfth century by Augustinian houses – were a part of the ecclesiastical element in many of the larger towns. Although, unlike parish churches and the orders of friars, they were not as popular with townsmen, in part because they were rivals for commerce and authority, and in part because monks were considered too worldly – in contrast to the more austere friars who won the townspeople's respect. On the other side of the fence, monastic communities found that the worldly temptations presented by urban society made it difficult for them to exist in that environment.

The ruinous remains of St. Mary's Abbey date mostly from the thirteenth century. Today they provide a backdrop for the medieval mystery plays associated with York (which originally were staged at various points in the city streets).

To undertake the assize of bread, four honest and law-abiding men (two of them bakers, and two knowledgable in what is required by the city and country) are to be elected each year. In front of the community, they are to take oath to keep the assize. They are to buy corn, have it ground, sifted and baked into bread, which they shall sell to the populace; this is to test the accuracy and honesty of the processes. The bailiffs shall supply the money for buying the corn and having it processed. No baker may sell bread until the bread [of the assize] has been sold. This testing is to be carried out twice a year, after Michaelmas and after Easter. No measure used by bakers or by others may differ in size from the king's standard kept by the bailiffs. If any divergent measure is found it is to be permanently confiscated by the bailiffs, and those who use such measures are to be punished as the offence warrants. The bailiffs are to undertake an assize of wine and ale according to the law and their ballival oaths; they are to ensure that there are no false measures used in the city, and that all measures used by taverners or brewsters have been compared to the king's standard and [if accurate] stamped with the city seal of approval in the presence of a bailiff. No measure may be stamped except under supervision of at least one of the four principal bailiffs; the stamp may not be delivered to a sergeant except in the presence of their superiors.

[Parts of this chapter are not very clear in their meaning, and I have taken some liberties in rendering in English what I believe that meaning to be. "Principal bailiffs" referred to the city's chief executive officers, distinguishing them from the sub-bailiffs, or sergeants, who did the bidding of the executive. The reference to the two members of the assize of bread "qui melius sciverint facere quod incumbit pro communi utilitate civitatis et patrie" may be one of the typically vague (for the early fourteenth century) references to members of city council, or at least the ruling class generally.]

Saint Crispin's Day

Regarding

William Clopton, Knt., & His Uncle,
Thomas Erpingham, K.G.

*We few, we happy few, we band of brothers.
For he today that sheds his blood with me shall be my brother; be he ne'er so vile, this day shall gentle his condition.
And gentlemen in England now abed shall think themselves accursed they were not here, and hold their manhoods cheap whiles any speaks that fought with us upon Saint Crispin's day.*

Henry V - William Shakespeare ^[2]

Delectable Valleys

It is truly a beautiful thing to behold one or two thousand tame swans upon the River Thames.

The last half of the fourteenth century saw the Cloptons migrate from their ancestral English environs of Wickhambrook, ^[3] and began to imprint the indelible mark of the family upon the history of East Anglia. It was a thrilling time as countries locked in battle for control of England; kings were murdered and deposed, armies marched and old noble names were ruined while rising dynasties seized power and lands.

The Black Death ^[4] of the fourteenth century left in its wake a large proportion of England's inhabitants dead, entire villages abandoned. With less competition, many survivors were able to grow rich beyond their wildest dreams. Peasants were now able to negotiate cash wages in return for their labor. This cornucopia did not go unnoticed. The Italian scholar Polydore Vergil, ^[5] was impressed by what he saw.

[In England is found] delectable valleys, pleasant, undulating hills, agreeable woods, extensive meadows, lands in cultivation, and the great plenty of water springing everywhere. It is truly a beautiful thing to behold one or two thousand tame swans upon the River Thames. The riches of England are greater than those of any other country in Europe. There is no small innkeeper, however poor and humble he may be, who does not serve his table with silver dishes and drinking cups.

There were many who wished to have the glittering gem as their own, none so impassioned than the French. At the same time, Henry V ^[6] longed to renew Edward III's claims to the throne of France. ^[7] Not only would victories abroad restore England's somewhat tarnished prestige but they would also give the people confidence in the Lancastrian dynasty.

King Henry V

And that is how Sir William Clopton, ^[8] would find himself along side his uncle, Sir Thomas Erpingham ^[9] on a cold and wet morning in 1415 facing the flower of French chivalry.

Following an unexpectedly long march in an attempt to find a practicable ford over the Sommes, during the mid-point of the Hundred Years' War, ^[10] an exhausted army of 6,000 Englishmen, led by Henry V, was caught at Agincourt. ^[11] The French force, numbering between 20,000 and 30,000 men, under the constable Charles I d'Albret, blocked the road to Calais.

On October 25, Saint Crispin's Day, 5,000 archers stood waiting at Agincourt. King Henry V called to him the husband of Joan Clopton, the distinguished marshal of his army, Sir Thomas Erpingham. Sir Thomas brought them into position. The elderly knight tossed his baton into the air and cried 'Nestrocque,' ^[12] his command answered with roars which echoed across the gentle countryside soon to be drenched in blood. And thus began one of the most famous battles in history, the Battle of Agincourt. ^[13]

It would be the skills of the English archers, ^[14] under the command of Sir Thomas, that would prove the decisive factor.

An Unforgiving Weapon

*The French were so packed together that many could not raise their arms to use their weapons.
The bodies began to pile up until they had to climb up to get at the English.
It was a bloodbath.*

Understanding the military advantages of the longbow, King Henry II^[15] mandated that men with a net worth of two to five pounds or more should own and practice with a longbow^[16] to defend the nation. Churches were required to set aside a butt, or target, in a marked area for archers to hone their skills. For archery was an art that took practice. A great deal of practice.

The English longbow was an unforgiving weapon. Anyone could pick one up and fire an arrow, but the key was being able to hit the target consistently and to be able to fire rapidly. A good archer could fire from six to twelve arrows^[17] a minute. This was critical when one considers facing a charging knight on horseback. The more arrows fired the better the chance of hitting the knight or his horse and surviving the encounter.

The armor^[18] that the knights wore on their torsos and heads was thick enough that arrows would have a difficult time piercing it. But the armor on their arms and leg was thinner. The horses had less armor and could be brought down, thus dismounting the knight. At Agincourt, the English archers had another advantage.

Sir Thomas Erpingham was one of the highest ranking officers at the Battle of Agincourt. This painting is based on his statue atop The Erpingham Gate, Norwich Cathedral Norwich, County Norfolk. It must be understood that unlike his nephew, William Clopton, Sir Thomas did not actually engage in battle. He observed and commanded the archers in a relatively safe location throughout the engagement. Photograph from The Armies of Agincourt by Christopher Rote. At first the French would not attack the English. After sitting for four hours in battle array, King Henry gave the order to advance to within three hundred yards of the French, maximum range for the longbows.^[19] Henry V ordered Sir Thomas to inspect his men to insure that they were in order and that they had their bows strung and arrows ready. ^[20]

Sharpened stakes were driven in front of the archers to protect them from the French knights charging on horseback. Sir Thomas then gave the order to fire the first volley of arrows. This was all it took to spur the French to action.

The French leaders tried to restrain their knights but to no avail. The mounted French knights, who had been placed on the flanks of the French army, impulsively charged. Their horses churned the ground into a mire. It had been raining for two weeks prior to the battle and the ground was saturated. King Henry had positioned his troops in such a way that the initial advance of the French was across marshy ground, and he kept his own armored cavalry in reserve until the charge of the French cavalry had been thrown into confusion by his archers. The field at its best places was ankle deep in mud. In the worst places there were reports of the mud being up to the bellies of the horses, waist deep on a man. ^[21] The French knights would fall from their disabled mounts and become mired in the mud.

The English archer's arrows brought down the first ranks. ^[22] The noise of horses and riders screaming in pain covered the battlefield.

The following ranks could not see what was happening and rode on top of the fallen men and horses and were killed also. Riderless horses ran in panic through the French infantry advancing behind the knights. The archers of Sir Thomas were pitiless and poured the arrows into the tightly massed ranks of French infantry. The French infantry slogged forward with their heads slightly down because they knew if they looked up an English arrow would come through the eye slit in their helmet. Men were falling as arrows penetrated their leg armor and other lightly armored areas of their bodies. The entire length of the field was a killing zone.

A kneeling statue of Sir Thomas Erpingham is in a niche in the center of the tall flint-faced gable of the Erpingham Gate at Norwich Cathedral.

The French infantry came to the piles of dead and dying knights and horses and began to climb over them. All the time they saw their comrades falling around them hit with English arrows. The impact of the French infantry drove the English line back several yards but it held. The French were so packed together that many could not raise their arms to use their weapons. ^[23] The bodies began to pile up until they had to climb up to get at the English. It was a bloodbath. ^[24]

The French died in the thousands of arrows, weapon strikes by English men-at-arms, and of falling and being suffocated by the weight of their own comrades trying to climb over them. The archers joined the men-at-arms in
