the butchery that followed. The closely packed French knights and infantrymen that were mired in the mud were killed without pity.^[25] The French faltered and then fled. Over 2,000 prisoners were taken after the French attack disintegrated.^[26] Then the French second wave began to advance and King Henry ordered the killing of the prisoners. The second wave faltered and fled but not before a number of prisoners had been killed.^[27] The prisoners were worth ransom money and therefore more valuable alive than dead. As the English looked across the battlefield they said it looked rather odd because in places the feathered ends of the arrows that they had fired were so thick it appeared there was snow on the ground.^[28] They had done their work too well. The field was now covered with over 5,000 French dead.^[28] The English losses were negligible.^[29] The English longbow was a death instrument in the hands of the experienced English yeomen archers. All the bravado in France could not ignore the fact that Sir Thomas and his yeomen archers had destroyed a generation of French nobility on that muddy field near Agincourt.

A Good Old Commander

*May the Dedicated Service of William Shakespeare;
"Good Old Commander" and most kind Gentleman Ever Be remembers and his Soul Rest in Peace.*

Norwich Cathedral

Sir Thomas' role at Agincourt was immortalized not only in history but also in fiction. In William Shakespeare play, Henry V, 4.1.17, on the eve of the battle, Sir Thomas rejects King Henry's suggestion that his "good old commander," is too elderly to sleep on the hard ground. Sir Thomas replies that he enjoys being able to say, "Now Lie I like a king." King Henry then congratulates him on his spirit, thus contributing to the episode's emphasis on the high morale of the English army.^[30]

Sir Thomas is buried on the north side of the presbytery at Norwich Cathedral with his two wives, Joan Clopton and Joan Walton^[31] A plaque reads:

SIR THOMAS ERPINGHAM, K.G.

A GALLANT SOLDIER AND GENEROUS BENEFACTOR LIES BURIED WITH HIS TWO WIVES NEAR THIS SPOT. In 1399 HE WAS ONE OF THE COMMISSIONERS TO WHOM RICHARD II SURRENDERED HIS CROWN AND IN 1415 AS MARSHALL OF KING HENRY V'S ARMY AND COMMANDER OF HIS ARCHERS, HE PLAYED A PROMINENT PART AT THE BATTLE OF AGINCOURT. LOCALLY HE FUNDED THE REBUILDING OF THE DOMINICAN FRIARY NOW KNOWN AS ST. ANDREWS AND BLACKFRIARS HALLS AS WELL AS THE ERPINGHAM GATE LEADING INTO THE CATHEDRAL CLOSE AND WAS LARGELY RESPONSIBLE FOR NORIWCH OBTAINING ITS MOST IMPORTANT CHARTER.

MAY THE DEDICATED SERVICE OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE'S "GOOD OLD COMMANDER" AND MOST KIND GENTLEMAN EVER BE REMEMBERED AND HIS SOUL REST IN PEACE.

Opposite the west door of the Cathedral is the Erpingham Gate, given about the year 1420 by Sir Thomas Erpingham, whose chantry is in the Presbytery. It is very richly cared on the outside, with statues of the apostles and of female saints set in canopied niches in the arch mouldings. The Clopton arms are replicated dozens of times, either by itself or with Erpingham impaling Clopton. An attractive paving was laid from the gate to the west door in 1968-71.

Detail showing Erpingham impaling Clopton. In other words, the left half of the shield is Sir Thomas' arms and the right half, the arms of Joan Clopton's father.

Sir William Clopton would return to Long Melford following the battle, however, any joy he may have felt was short lived. It is thought a plague visited the countryside, and in 1420, his first wife, Margery Drury, their son William, and two daughters died. His second wife, Margery Francis, would die in 1424. 2. William⁸ Clopton, Knt., Lord of Toppesfield Manor (Walter⁷, William⁶, Walter⁵, William⁴, Walter³, William², Guillaume¹ Peche, Lord Of Cloptunna and Dalham)⁷ died Bet. January 22, 1375/76 and January 14, 1376/77 in England and buried in Babwell Friary⁸. He married (1) Amitia or Ivetta Grey, of Buckenham Castle⁹, daughter of Thomas Grey, Knt., of Buckenham Castle, Norfolk. She was born in England. Buckenham, County Norfolk, is about 8 miles southeast of Norwich. It is reported that her daughter Johane, was born at Paston, Norfolk, about 22 miles north of Norwich. None of this has been confirmed. He married (2) Mary Cockerell, of Toppesfield Manor, Hadleigh¹⁰, daughter of William Cockerell, Knt, of Toppesfield Manor.

Children of William Clopton and Amitia Grey are:

- 5 i. William⁹ Clopton, of Hawstead Manor¹¹, died in Hawstead Manor, County Suffolk, possibly, about 4 miles southwest of Bury St. Edmunds and may be buried at All Saints, Hawstead. He married Chewyt; died in Hawstead Manor, County Suffolk, possibly, about 4 miles southwest of Bury St. Edmunds and may be buried at All Saints, Hawstead.

- 6 ii. Walter Clopton, of Toppesfield Manor, Hadleigh¹², died Aft. May 5, 1413 in Toppesfield Manor, probably, and possibly buried at Holy Trinity Church, Long Melford, County Suffolk¹³. He married Elizabeth Peccott¹⁴; died in Toppesfield Manor, probably, and possibly buried at Holy Trinity Church, Long Melford, County Suffolk.

The 1612 Visitation of Essex refers to Sir Walter as a Knight of the "Roodes." States he was the third son by the second wife.

- 7 iii. Edward Clopton, of Newnham Hall, Ashdon, Essex¹⁵, died 1389 in Newenham Hall, Ashdon, County Essex¹⁶. He married Blanche FitzEustice.

- 8 iv. Johane Clopton, of Toppesfield Manor, Hadleigh¹⁷, born in Paston, County Norfolk, possibly, about 22 miles north of Norwich. She married (1) Walter Walcote, of County Norfolk. She married (2) Roger Beauchamp, 2nd Baron Beauchamp of Bletsho¹⁸¹⁹; born Abt. 1363 in Bletsoe, County Bedfordshire, about 24 miles west of Cambridge, County Cambridgeshire²⁰; died May 3, 1406²¹. She married (3) John Cavendish, Knt.²².

Johane married into one of the most eminent and powerful families, the Beauchamps. A companion in arms of the victorious William the Conqueror, the family was represented by the Earls of Warwick and Albemarle, and, the Barons of St. Amand, Barons of Bletsho, Hache, Kydderminster and Powyke. Counted among her direct descendants are most of the Kings and Queens of England who have held the throne since Henry, VII.

- 9 v. Joan Clopton, of Wickhambrook & Norwich²³, died 1404 in England and buried on the north side of the presbytery at Norwich Cathedral, County Norfolk²⁴. She married Thomas Erpingham, K.G., Lord Marshall of England²⁵ Aft. 1380²⁶; born 1357; died 1428 in England and buried on the north side of the presbytery at Norwich Cathedral, County Norfolk²⁷.

The opposite side of the Erpingham Gate is very plain, with diagonal buttresses and the gable plastered and Sir Thomas' arms as the only ornament.

Child of William Clopton and Mary Cockerell is:

- 10 i. Thomas⁹ Clopton, of Toppesfield Manor²⁸.

3. Thomas⁸ Clopton, Knt, of Kentwell Estate, Suffolk (Walter⁷, William⁶, Walter⁵, William⁴, Walter³, William², Guillaume¹ Peche, Lord Of Cloptunna and Dalham)²⁹ died Bet. March 8, 1381/82 and October 12, 1383 in Long Melford, County Suffolk, and buried at the Church of the Blessed Mary, near Chipley Priory³⁰. He married Katherine Mylde, of Clare, Suffolk³¹³², daughter of William Mylde, of Clare, County Suffolk. She died Bet. February 24, 1402/03 and June 18, 1403 in Tendring Hall, Stokes-by-Nayland, County Suffolk, about 6 miles southwest of Hadleigh, and buried The Church of St. Mary the Virgin, before the altar in the South Chapel³³.

After Sir Thomas' death, Dame Katherine took as her second husband Sir William de Tendring of Stoke-by-Nayland. Through this marriage she became the distant grandmother of three queens of England: two of the unfortunate wives of Henry the VIII, Ann Boleyn and Catherine Howard, and Queen Elizabeth I. Dame Katherine, who died in 1403, is buried at the Church of St. Mary the Virgin, Stoke-by-Nyland, Suffolk. Their memorial brasses are among the finest in England. The Clopton Arms: ermine spot on the bend in base may be seen on the mantle of the depiction of Dame Katherine. The descendants of William Clopton and his wife, Ann Booth, are direct descendants of Guillaume Peche and Alfwen, his wife, by both the Clopton-Mylde marriage and the Mylde deTendring marriage. See "Place of Lutons."

Children of Thomas Clopton and Katherine Mylde are:

- 11 i. William⁹ Clopton, Knt., of Long Melford³⁴, born in Long Melford, County Suffolk, England³⁵; died August 1446 in Long Melford, County Suffolk, England and buried in the North Aisle of the Clopton Chancel of Holy Trinity Church, Long Melford³⁶. He married (1) Margery Drury, of Rougham³⁷; born in Rougham, County Suffolk, about 3 miles southeast of Bury St. Edmunds and possibly baptized at St. Mary³⁸; died June 19, 1420 in England and buried Holy Trinity Church, Long Melford in the North Aisle of the Clopton Chancel³⁹. He married (2) Margery Francis, of County Norfolk⁴⁰ Bef. 1423 in County Norfolk, probably; died June 12, 1424 in Long Melford, County Suffolk, England and buried Holy Trinity Church, Long Melford and buried in the North Aisle of the Clopton Chancel⁴¹.

- 12 ii. Thomas Clopton, of Long Melford, Suffolk⁴², died Aft. 1382⁴³.

Engleheart, The Church of St. Mary the Virgin, (Courtesy of Suellen (Clopton) DeLoach Blanton), p. 8-9, The monumental brasses of both Sir William de Tendering and Katherine Mylde are found in the south chapel of the church. They are considered among the finest in England. Sir, Williams brass, in full armour, resting his head on his helm, bears a crest of feathers. Citing Weaver's "Funeral Monuments" Written in 1631, the brass is described: "Upon the Pavement before the high Aultar lyeth an auncient Gravestone, having thereon the figure of a Knight in compleat Armour, resting his Head upon his Gauntlet, with this circumscription: 'Hic iacent Tumulati, Dominus Willelmus Tendering, miles, et Katherine Clopton uxor eiusdem: obierunt anno Domini 1408.'" Engleheart notes the incorrect death date of 1408. Possibly Weaver misread the date and assumed they both died in that year. Unfortunately, many publications have used this date of 1408 which is incorrect on both accounts.Also, in her will dated February 24, 1403, proved June 18, 1403, she states she wishes "to be buried in the Chapel of the Church of Stoke Neyland on the south side of the church before the altar of said chapel."
34. Hervy, The Visitation of Suffolk 1561, (Courtesy of Suellen (Clopton) DeLoach Blanton), p. 23, It is noted he is "usually called a knight" D'Ewes refers to him merely as "Esquire." King Henry king makes a speech reflecting the pride the English took in the memory of a glorious victory, and, by connecting the Battle of Agincourt with a holy day, helped reinforce the popular belief that Providence played a role in England's fortunes during that historic battle.

In the 14th and 15th centuries England and France fought the Hundred Year's War, a conflict in which the English lost all their French possessions, except the port of Calais, and France was ravaged by the pillaging and dislocation of war. And yet each country emerged stronger at the end. The aftereffects disrupted England and led to the dynastic Wars of the Roses between the House of Lancaster and the House of York.

Prior to Agincourt, most archers held their bows horizontally while drawing the arrows back to the waist. This method greatly reduced the bow's range and effectiveness. At Agincourt Henry's archers employed the superior technique of holding their bows vertically and drawing the arrows back to the their ears. The English bowmen could shoot nine arrows per minute and hit targets at 400 yards. Their proficiency took the French completely by surprise.

The archers carried a number of different types of arrows designed for different purposes such as armor piercing and horse killing.

Contrary to popular opinion, some scholars maintain that the armored knight was not a helpless turtle when he fell from his horse. In The Battle of Agincourt, <http://www.aginc.net/battle/index.html>, there is an interesting analysis of the armored knight.

Knights who were in good physical shape were very nimble in their battle armor. They took great pride in their strength and ability to fight in the armor. They did not need assistance in getting on their horse and could easily get up if knocked down. Uninformed writers and scriptwriters have created these myths about knights in armor being immobile.

[19] Maximum range varied from archer to archer. Skilled strong archers could shoot effectively out to 450 yards. It is obvious that Henry V wanted to not only reach the first ranks but beyond to strike throughout the entire French force and goad them to attack. Many sources called the large number of arrows fired an "arrow storm."

[22] The forward impetus of the mounted knights was so great that many impaled their horses on the sharpened stakes. See Keegan, The Face of Battle.

[23] The French crossbowmen and cannoneers could not fire in fear of hitting their own men.

[24] The majority of the casualties at Agincourt were in the French infantry, men-at-arms.

[25] The English yeomen archers were bare footed and in most cases bare legged. They easily moved through the sucking mud that held the armored French knights and men-at-arms. The archers swarmed around the flanks of the French columns pulling French infantrymen down and killing them as quickly as they could with swords, knives, and mallets. A hit to the back of the head or knee knocked them down then a quick thrust through the eye slit or a gap in the armor plate dispatched the helpless Frenchman.

[26] Reports of the number of prisoners taken and the number executed vary from source to source.

[27] In Face of Battle, John Keegan analyzes the circumstances of the killing of prisoners. The order was not obeyed immediately because the prisoners were the prisoners of individual captors and not the King. The captors were reluctant to sully their honor by killing prisoners against the law of chivalry. Also there was the ransom value of the prisoners that the captors did not want to lose. Henry V had to detail 200 archers to carry out his order. The archers were not under the law of chivalry and therefore had fewer reasons not to carry out the king's order. All this took time so the real amount of time available to kill the prisoners was quite short, considering that the order was immediately canceled when the French did not attack. Close to 2000 prisoners were taken back to England to be ransomed.

[28] The New Encyclopaedia Britannica, Volume 1, Micropaedia, Encyclopaedia Britannica, Inc., Chicago, 1987, p. 148. The French lost 13 members of the highest nobility, about 1,500 knights, and approximately 4,500 men-at-arms.

[29] Charles Boyce, Shakespeare A to Z, The Essential Reference to His Plays, His Poems, His Life and Times, and More, A Roundtable Press Book, Dell Publishing, New York, 1990, p.721. The only nobleman killed was Edward, Duke of York, who had commanded the right flank of the army during the battle. Although Shakespeare, in his play, Henry V, paints the Duke's death as heroic, he was a big man and very overweight, and it was reported that he either suffocated to death in his armor or suffered a heart attack in the press of fighting. His corpse was put in a huge cauldron of water and boiled all night so that the flesh dissolved and the bones could be transported back to England where they were buried in the collegiate church at Forthinghay.

[30] Boyce, Shakespeare A to Z, p. 180. The historical Erpingham supported the King's father, Henry Bolingbroke, later King Henry IV, when he deposed King Richard II (enacted in Richard II), and later served as his chancellor. Sir Thomas was about 58 years old at the time of the battle, rather long in the tooth for that period.

The Benedictines

The revival of monasticism in England in the tenth century, whose spirit had been so severely damaged during the Viking invasions of the ninth century, was led by the great Benedictine monk, Archbishop and advisor to the royal house of Wessex, St. Dunstan. Through the efforts of Dunstan and others, by the year 1066, there were some three dozen Benedictine houses in England, a number which would grow to 136 by the time of the Dissolution of the Monasteries in the mid-sixteenth century.

Each Benedictine abbey was an autonomous body, only loosely tied to other Benedictine communities by mutual adherence to the "rule". Larger houses were ruled by an abbot, and smaller communities, known as priories, were responsible to the "mother" abbey, and were governed by a prior.

Over the years, the Benedictines became known for their church architecture. Seven of the great Cathedrals were once Benedictine abbey churches: Canterbury, Rochester, Winchester, Durham, Norwich, and Ely. Benedictine life centered on liturgical celebration, and scholarship. Monks copied ancient manuscripts, and kept learning alive throughout the middle ages, with schools and universities rising up around their monastic centers. Benedictine monasteries could be found throughout Europe, and became the predominate form of monastic life. In 1539, it was calculated that, over their thousand year history, there existed over 37,000 Benedictine monasteries.

In Europe, Benedictines were very influential people. Their brother/sisterhood had included 11 emperors, 20 kings, 15 sovereign dukes and electors, 13 sovereign earls, 9 empresses and 10 queens. In England, Benedictine monasteries were quite wealthy and exerted great influence on society.

The Carmelites

Known as the Order of Our Lady of Mount Carmel, the Carmelites are unique, in that they claim no founder. Hermits lived on Mt. Carmel in pre-Christian times, and Christian hermits continued to do so. St. Berthold attempted to gather these hermits into an organized community in 1154. Albert the Patriarch of Jerusalem petitioned Rome that they be recognized as an order within the Church. They were given the Rule of St. Augustine to follow and were grouped with the emerging mendicant orders.

Their life was one of extreme asceticism. They came to England after the failure of the Crusades, arriving around 1240. They lived in monasteries, called priories, and at their height had 50 houses before the Dissolution. Their nickname, The White Friars, came from the color of the cloaks they wore over their brown habits.

The Augustinians

The Augustinian order (also known as Austin Canons, or Black Canons) came to England and established themselves at St. Botolph's Priory at Colchester, c. 1106. They spread rapidly, reaching Scotland by 1120. At their height, the Augustinians had over 200 houses in England and Wales.

Each of the houses was governed by a prelate, usually a prior, but sometimes, an abbot. The monastic "rule" followed by the Augustinians was that of St. Augustine of Hippo and was not particularly austere. Each of the Austin Canons was a priest and as such was not bound to his house, but was free to have outside responsibilities, such as to a parish. The Black Canons also ran schools, hospitals and almshouses.

Some well known Augustinian houses are Holyrood, St. Andrews, Jedburgh, Lacock, St. Botolph's, Leeds (Kent), Llanthony, Walsingham and Barnwell. Their habit consisted of a hooded black cloak over top of a black cassock. The Augustinian Friars are another, separate order.

The Franciscans

The Franciscans arrived in England in 1224, and settled in Canterbury, London and Oxford. They are a mendicant order, founded by St. Francis of Assisi.

Their star seemed to rise for about a hundred years, but faded in the mid fourteenth century., when they went into a period of laxity and decline, possibly as a result of the Black Death. Even during the lifetime of St. Francis, himself, there was discord about the future direction of the Order. Various attempts at reform produced off-shoots known as the Observants (most of whom were arrested by Henry VIII during the English Reformation) and the Capuchins, who never reached England.

[Arkenberg Introduction]

Of the various mercantile statutes, the Statute of Forestallers appears in very few of the Common Law statute books. Prohibiting forestalling, an activity of middlemen designed to drive up prices, the statute first appears in books written at the beginning of the fourteenth century (See: R. H. Britnell, "Forstall, Forestalling and the Statute of Forestallers," EHR 102 (1987): 89-102).

And also Forestallers, that buy any thing afore the due and accustomed hour ["hour which is due and appointed in the Town"?] against the good state and regulation of the town and market, or that pass out of the town to meet such things as come to the market, and buy outside of the town, to the intent that they may sell the same in the town more dearly, that utter it more dear than they would that brought it, in case they had come to the town or market. And their names shall be presented distinctly and openly, and they be amerced for every default, or to be judged to the Tumbrel, if they forestall contrary to the statute.

[002] returned after the felony or he has harboured him after the offence, as [in the roll]
[005] earls and barons, and all who have soke and sake, toll and team, and similar [006] liberties ought to have their knights and their household servants, as stewards, [007] butlers, chamberlains, cooks and bakers, within their frankpledge, and these in [008] turn their own squires and others serving them, so that if they have become liable
[009] to anyone their lords may produce them for trial, or if they do not, pay the forfeiture [010] for them.⁴ and for all others who are of his mainpast, for⁵ every man, whether [011] free or bond, is or ought to be either in frankpledge or in mainpast, unless he is one [012] who wanders from place to place, remaining no longer in one than in another, or [013] has what suffices for frankpledge, a dignity or a religious order, a free tenement, or [014] in a city, an immovable.

At the view of frankpledge.

[016] [Every [male] who has reached the age of twelve years must take an oath at the

[018] All who hold land and house, who are called 'householders,' ought to be in frankpledge, [019] and also those who serve them, who are called 'followers.'⁷ No one ought [020] to dismiss his servant before he is cleared of every accusation, those with which he [021] has previously been charged.⁸ A man belongs to the mainpast and household of [022] him from whom he has food and clothing, or food only with wages, as in the case of [023] hired household servants. He may also be called a member of another's household, [024] according to ancient custom, who has lodged with another for three nights, because [025] on the first night he can be described as 'stranger,' on the second as 'guest' and on [026] the third as 'one of the household.'⁹ And in conclusion note that one, as a 'borg-holder,'¹⁰
[027] may receive another in frankpledge when he wishes and at his pleasure,

[028] but cannot extrude him from frankpledge when he pleases; nor, it is submitted, is [029] the converse true, for one who has put himself in the frankpledge of another,

BYZANTINE & MEDIEVAL LINKS INDEX

Notice: until this list is updated, please use www.netserf.org

[March 2001: this list is now quite out dated. Many links are dead, and there are hundreds of of additional resources around. Manual maintenance of this list long ago became unfeasible. I do intend to update it, once I have located good links management software.]

This page attempts to track ALL Byzantine material on the Internet, and ALL significant entry points for Medieval studies. Ancient and Classical links, except insofar as they impinge directly on Byzantine and Western Medieval matters, should be sought out via the direct links provided to ARGOS associates which track and maintain sites devoted to the Ancient world.

Since this page was begun, the Medieval and Byzantine Internet has exploded in size. As a result, although I will take suggestions, I will no longer add the following materials:

- Syllabi for courses, unless the page contains additional material - texts, graphics, lecture notes.
- History Department sites, unless the page contains additional material - texts, graphics (etc.)
- Sites at geocities, or any other free web site which forcibly opens pop up windows.
- AOL sites, which seem to last just a few weeks on average.
- Sites which do not look to be stable: e.g. temporary exhibition pages.
- Sites for individual Orthodox or Easter Catholic churches, unless the page contains additional material (see above).
- Gopher sites. Gopher is dead.

WIDE AREA SEARCHES

Here are links to the best "wide area" search engines on the Web. The Web is so vast now that it contains more, and more diverse information, than any single printed source. This availability of information will only increase.

To use the Web efficiently, the various search engines are essential. Yahoo is best, I think, if you are looking for specialized websites. Lycos, Excite, and Hotbot all index many more documents. These engines will always turn up more references, but far more will be dross than with Yahoo. It is useful to start with Yahoo since it has a nice feature - once it tells you everything that it has found, it will automatically plug you in to the other search engines.

It is important to form your query words as clearly as possible. For instance, if you are interested in finding information on a particular musician, do not search for "music", but for a style [eg "jazz" or "gregorian chant"] or even a name ["abba", "charlie parker", "hildegard"].

As the WWW has grown these wide area engines have become more difficult to use. Searching for "Plato" for instance, will return more "hits" than one could possibly read in a lifetime. For this reason it is best to start searches for Byzantine and Medieval subjects with the "limited area" ARGOS search engine.

- Byzantium1200
A wonderful site which provided CAD drawings of 50 buildings in Constantinople as they would have been in 1200.
- The Constantinople Project Over the past several years, Professor Ahmet Cakmak, of Princeton University's Department of Civil Engineering and Operations Research has undertaken the structural analysis, under earthquake loads, of the Hagia Sophia, the major church built by the Emperor Justinian during the 6th century AD. Professor Cakmak sought to determine the susceptibility of the structure, specifically its large dome and arches, to collapse due to the earthquakes that often strike that part of the world. As an extension of that work into the architectural realm, he recently offered a class which studied Byzantine structures from a structural and art-historical perspective. One of the goals set forth in the class was for students to construct three-dimensional models of specific Byzantine structures utilizing the computer drafting software AutoCAD. This was the first step towards a long term goal of creating a full model of the topography of ancient Constantinople, with models of many Byzantine buildings in place.

This developing site consists of the guide (html texts) and 3 major components: an archive images & prints of watermarks (from Greek manuscripts), a database of paper descriptions, and a bibliographical database. It is both a research tool and a mode of publishing information on papers in a centrally accessible way, and much more. The database interface is not yet functional, but the rest is, and there's a lot to think about there relevant to the methodological issues about use of evidence from paper to identify scribes and centers of book production. Part of it (the bibliographical database) is mostly just a shell at the moment, but you can see how it will work once our database interface is done.

Orthodox Monasteries, Churches, Cathedrals

- St. Catherine's Monastery, Mt. Sinai St. Catherine's Monastery

located in Sinai at the foot of Mount Moses (Mt. Sinai) is a true jewel of Christian heritage. Founded around 527, it is the oldest fully functioning monastery in the world. Yet, because of its isolation, fortification and specific protection granted by the Prophet Mohammed, it remains original and pristine. Its powerful setting seems a natural home for the many rare Christian icons which it houses, including a collection of original illuminated manuscripts second only to the Vatican. Within, one will find the chapel of the Burning Bush, which is believed to be built atop the famous burning bush of Moses, but most Christians have never even seen the monastery's exterior, and interior views are almost non-existent. Egypt's Ministry of Tourism has expanded these pages so that we can now have a first look into this fascinating Christian setting. It is worth a visit. Go to antiquities and then monuments, or to destinations and then Sinai to find the St. Catherine pages.

- Historical and Cultural Atlas Resource

Maps in a new on-line atlas use the latest technology -- animation and pull-down menus -- to help show how nations have been settled and how empires have risen and collapsed. The atlas offers more than 50 maps -- about half of them interactive -- and is divided into two sections. A group of maps of North America focuses on important themes in 18th- and 19th-century U.S. history, such as territorial expansion and slavery. A section on Europe explores trade routes, political change, urbanization, and the distribution of natural resources. Also on the site are maps of North Africa and the Middle East. Users can follow the expansion of Macedonia under Philip II and his son, Alexander the Great, in the fourth century B.C.; compare migration routes of the Vandals, Franks, Huns, Saxons, and Visigoths during the time of the Roman Empire's disintegration; and examine changes in slave-population density in 19th-century America. To see the interactive maps, users must have free Shockwave software installed on their computers and must have computers that can handle graphics.

In pleas initiated by the king's writ where essoins are permitted and a party provides an excuse why he is unable to appear, he is to be given a week's postponement. The same applies in pleas of debt begun by writ in which a peer of the city is defendant. If a plea between peers is begun without writ, the extent of the postponement is to be at the discretion of the bailiffs. If the defendant, after he has been attached [to answer a charge] gives the excuse that he is busy performing a service for the king he must present documentary proof of this on the date to which the case is postponed or face being heavily amerced (and must still answer the charge).

[Some situations, such as the borough equivalent of novel disseisin required quick remedy, which precluded the delay involved in obtaining a royal writ to initiate legal proceedings. In such cases, the bailiffs would need to set briefer postponements in response to essoins.]

Pleas relating to matters such as construction of a wall, house, drain or ditch creating a nuisance to the tenement of another are to be initiated by king's writ, proceed by summonses and attachments and by inspection of the location of the nuisance (if either party requests that). If it is found that there is a nuisance, it is to be removed at once and compensation awarded by the inquest jury (or other judge depending on the direction the case has taken) to the plaintiff. As well, the party responsible for the nuisance it to be heavily amerced by the bailiffs and be obliged (by distraint) to remove the nuisance.

In pleas which city custom treats like novel disseisin by fresh force, once a suit is introduced, the land or tenement in question is to be seized into the king's hand and the tenant to be removed – the bailiffs may call upon the community to assist in this, if required. The person accused of the forceful intrusion is to be attached to answer the charge on a specified date. At which time an inquest jury may need to be assembled from the neighbourhood of the tenement. If the defendant fails to appear or refuses to attach himself, the inquest may nonetheless authorize seizure of the tenement; it will subsequently be restored either to plaintiff or defendant, depending on the jury's verdict. Such pleas are to proceed on a daily basis, so that a judgement can be reached within 40 days (after which the bailiffs have no power to proceed [without a royal writ]).

Because legal matters concerning tenements in the city are governed by city custom and city courts (as is the case in London and other boroughs) and because such tenements can be freely bequeathed, probate of the last testament of persons bequeathing these tenements is to be made before the bailiffs in the city court, immediately following probate in ecclesiastical court (concerned with disposition of moveable goods). No executor may have administration of any bequeathed tenement until probate in city court makes public the bequests, legatees and conditions governing the bequests. To protect the rights of legatees, testamentary clauses referring to tenements are to be enrolled in the court records, and record of probate is to be made on the dorse of the testament by the bailiffs' clerk. Note that a tenement which descends, or reverts, hereditarily cannot be bequeathed; any such bequest will not be allowed if against the interests of the testator's heir. However, if the heir sells or gives his inheritance to anyone, the acquirer may freely bequeath it (as he may any property that he has acquired) without any future challenge. And that bequest shall hold good, and be forever steadfast and firm in the city, without opposition, just as [those of] any other tenement he has acquired.

[Strictly speaking, the will was the document that dealt with real estate, while the testament bequeathed personal effects and other moveables. However, the distinction was not always maintained, and both types of bequest might be combined in a single "will and testament".]

In the case where property that is jointly owned by husband and wife is bequeathed by the husband to his wife for her lifetime and afterwards to go to some other legatee and his heirs (said legatee having no heirs, the property to be sold for pious uses for the benefit of the souls of the deceased husband and wife), if the wife has ratified the testament after her husband's death, or was its executrix, or in any other way can be shown to have consented to her husband's bequest, then she may have no future claim on the bequeathed property. If she subsequently denies or backtracks on that consent and claims right by joint acquisition, so as to assert ownership of the property contrary to the terms of the bequest, but if a record of her consent is found in the court rolls, then her right in the property may not extend beyond tenancy during her lifetime – if she makes any attempt to sell, give or bequeath it herself, that shall not be held valid.

[The application of bequests to benefit the testator's soul generally meant either charitable gifts or provision for priests (or others) to say prayers and celebrate masses for the testator – as well, often, as the souls of his wife, children and sometimes other kin, friends or benefactors (the king often being thrown in for good measure!). Wealthier testators might make provision for the foundation of a chantry for long-term celebration for their souls.]

CUSTOMAL: CAPITULUM 21

If the widow or executor of a testator refuses to deliver to the legatee of a tenement the deeds relating to that property, the legatee may obtain a writ from the king to initiate an action demanding the deeds be handed over. It will have to be proven that the deeds in question were in the possession of widow or executor after the testator's decease. When such a deed is displayed in the city court, the claimant is to be examined as to whether he has legitimate children. If he has, then the deed may be delivered to him; if not, the deed is to be placed in the common chest of the city until the legatee has legitimate offspring.

[The chapter evidently relates to the circumstances of cap. 20 and 21, in which property bequeathed to a legatee who dies without heirs shall be sold by the city officials.]

In a case such as in the earlier chapter, where someone bequeathed a tenement dies with heirs, the tenement may be bought by the nearest heir of the original testator or (if the testator has no direct heir) by his closest relative for the assessed value of the property, giving good security for payment within a time-limit set by the bailiffs and other wise men of the court. Which money will be put towards pious uses for the testator's soul by the bailiffs and others chosen for the purpose. If the heir or next of kin declines to purchase the tenement, it may be offered to the landlord. If he declines then, by joint decision of the Ordinary of the ecclesiastical court in which the the testament was proved and of the bailiffs and others chosen for the purpose, someone is to be appointed to manage the sale of the tenement for the benefit of the testator's soul.

As Hudson notes, the right of first refusal by the original testator's relatives, and subsequent right of refusal by the lord of whom the property was held, is also seen at [Nottingham and Northampton. A more elaborate statement on the subject is found among the customs of Fordwich.]

When a tenement jointly owned by a man and his wife has, with the wife's consent, been bequeathed by the man to be sold so that the money can be used to benefit his soul, and the widow has ratified this before the bailiffs in full court, her consent is to be recorded in the court rolls. She is then to be instructed to deliver any deeds or documents relating to the property to her husband's executors. If she refuses or is reticent, she is not to be allowed any [lifetime] rights in the bequeathed tenement until she delivers up the deeds. No-one who holds a tenement for life, or for a specified number of years, may bequeath, sell, lease or in any way alienate the tenement beyond the term of his permitted tenancy; and if that is done, it shall not be held valid.

Often self-seeking persons will intrude into lands and tenements legitimately bequeathed to others, claiming to have a hereditary (or some other) right to those properties. The executor of the testament may introduce a plea of hamsoken by gage and pledge, to have the tenement seized into the king's hand and the intruder attached to answer in court on an assigned day. At which day the testament referring to the tenement is to be produced in court. If the intruder cannot show reason for putting aside the testament, the court may delivered the seized tenement to the executor to carry out the last will of the testator, and the intruder is to be heavily amerced for trespass and is to pay damages.

[Procedure in a plea of hamsoken is dealt with in cap.17. This would appear to be a special application of that, focused around the legitimacy of the will and testament.]

Sometimes, when a husband and wife give or sell their jointly-owned tenement and make recognizance of this fact in the city court, the deed is endorsed but not enrolled in the court records (which are preserved in the treasury of the city, according to custom); such endorsements and enrollments have the same legal force as a fine levied in the king's court. The bailiffs' clerk is to be charged – as part of the oath of office he swears each year – not to endorse any deed unless the woman who is co-owner is present in court and is examined by the bailiffs to ensure that she is not being forced into agreeing to the transaction against her will. If she acknowledges to the bailiffs that she willingly agrees to the transaction, then the deed should be endorsed and enrolled in court (and not elsewhere, outside the Tolbooth). The clerk is to perform this duty conscientiously and shall receive a minimum fee of 4d. [for the endorsement] and 2s. for the enrollment (unless a larger sum is offered him). He may not refuse to endorse or enroll any deed thus acknowledged. Each Michaelmas the recognizance rolls are to be placed in the common chest of the city for safekeeping, so that if there is any future question about the transaction the enrollment can be quickly found to provide clarification.

[The type of "fine" referred to here was an abbreviation for a "final concord"; this was a method of transacting a transfer of property via a fictitious legal action over ownership (in which the party transferring conceded the right in the property to belong to the transferee) in order to give the transfer the force of law – i.e. there was a legal record of ownership. Michaelmas represented the end of the administrative year for Norwich, and many other boroughs; the records of that year were closed and a new set of records begun. However, records of several years were often grouped together before they were permanently deposited in the archives. Payments to town clerks (or other officers) for services performed to the benefit of private individuals were quite typical and, in modern conception, would lie somewhere between a fee and a gratuity; the Liber Consuetudinum version specified a fee of 2d. not 4d. for the endorsement, and 4d. (not the rather expensive 2s.) for the enrollment.]

In a plea of debt between peers of the city, regardless of the amount involved, as soon as the plaintiff has made attachment for prosecuting the plea, the debtor is to be summoned to answer on the following day. If the debtor comes and claims to be a freeman he is to attach himself to answer in eight days time. If he fails to come, then he is to be distrained; if he comes after that and attaches himself, he is to be given the eight days. If he maliciously delays the plea by allowing three distraints without coming, he is to incur the penalty specified in chapter 14 and distraint is to continue each day until he attaches himself. When accused in a plea of debt, a citizen shall defend himself by waging his law, if there is no written record or tally of the debt. If a plaintiff produces a tally of the debt, then – if there is any question as to its authenticity – the bailiffs are to ensure that it is carefully examined by witnesses under oath; if they are uncertain or cannot agree (especially if the debt claimed is a large one) the tally is to be considered a fake and the defendant exonerated.

[A tally was a way of recording a debt in the non-literate urban society: a stick was notched in such a way as to represent a sum of money (e.g. each notch represented a certain amount); upon payment of the debt, the notched stick could be cut down the middle, so that the debtor could have half as his receipt for payment.]

In a plea of debt between a peer of the city and a foreigner, whether initiated by or without king's writ, when it comes to judgement the peer's proof is to hold good over the word of a foreigner. The citizen may wage his law according to the ancient customs of the city.

[In the absence of any deciding factor, when it came down to word against word, it was natural enough that the city court would show favouritism to citizens.]

Where the wife of a comburgess has borrowed goods from a neighbour (with or without providing any security for the loan), without the knowledge of her husband, the husband is nonetheless answerable for the loan. Provided that the husband and wife are on good terms, viz.: that they were living together when the goods were borrowed, or were living apart with his consent and at his wish; that the wife is of good reputation and has not separated from her husband through deceit or her own wilfulness; that the separation is not the result of dishonest and bad behaviour on the part of the wife, intending to do mischief (as opposed to harsh maltreatment by the husband). If any of these proves to be otherwise, then the husband may not be held liable for the loan. Creditors lending anything to a woman who is separated from her husband without good cause do so at their own risk, if the husband has not consented to the loan.

[This chapter is more interesting for what it reveals about marriage relations than its ostensible purpose of dealing with pleas of debt in a specialized situation.]

During a plea a plaintiff may allege that a contract or trespass was made in the marketplace, in order to exclude his adversary from waging his law and to obtain a favourable inquest from a vicinity other than that where the deed was actually committed. If the defendant wishes he may be given the chance to disprove that it was in the marketplace; if an inquest or confession of the plaintiff finds that it was not, the plaintiff shall be in mercy for making a false plea, but shall nonetheless be allowed to enter a new plea and have a new inquest based on the location where the deed actually took place. The same is to hold for deeds alleged to be committed at the fish quay during fishing season. If a plea is to be decided by inquest, it is to be made by men of the vicinity in which the deed was committed. If it is found that a contract or trespass was done in the market, the plaintiff must initiate his complaint within 15 days of the deed; if the plaintiff waits longer without prosecuting, the defendant may be at his law if he wishes, regardless of the market being named as the location.

[It was evidently felt a superior means of getting to the truth of a case to have an inquest of witnesses from the marketplace or quay – busy locations where witnesses would not be in short supply – than to rely on the word of the parties supported by compurgators (who were really more akin to character witnesses than witnesses to events central to the plea). Compurgation was the necessary resort where witnesses to events were lacking, or where (as indicated at the end of this chapter) so much time had elapsed after the deed that witnesses might be hard to find, or perhaps their memory hard to trust. The opening of the chapter, however, does suggest that an inquest could be "fixed" by obtaining jurors from a location where one of the parties was in favour. The qualifier "in fishing season" appears in the Liber Consuetudinum version but not the later one of the Book of Pleas; this may simply be a scribal omission.]

When a man sells a rent of assize due from a city tenement of which someone else is the tenant, the purchaser cannot have full seisin delivered without [the acquiescence of] the tenant of the property from which the rent issues. So, when recognizance of the deed of transfer is made in court before the bailiffs, in the presence of the purchaser and vendor, the purchaser may request that the tenant immediately be summoned to court. If the tenant comes, the bailiffs are to ask him whether the tenement was the property of the vendor or owed to the vendor the said rent. If the tenant acknowledges this, he is to be advised by the bailiffs that the rent should henceforth be paid to the purchaser, so that the latter have the same lordship over the rent that the vendor had, including the power to distrain for [arrears of] the rent. By reason of this acknowledgement, the purchaser may in any plea (if necessary) assert that he made distraint on his own property, and the tenant may not deny that rent is due from the property to the purchaser. However, if when the tenant comes he denies that any rent issues from the tenement to the vendor, the purchaser may request an inquest into the matter. If this finds that the tenement was, at the time of the sale, within the lordship of the vendor, the tenant is to be instructed to pay the rent to the purchaser henceforth; if it does not, the tenant may leave free of any obligation. If the tenant refuses to come to court to perform his duty, the bailiffs have full power to distrain on the tenant (if the purchaser so requests) from day to day by anything distrainable at the tenement in question or other tenements in the city [held by the tenant], until he comes. If, after the tenant's denial of the vendor's lordship, an inquest is called but the tenant defaults [in participating], the inquest may nonetheless proceed and a verdict may be issued on the matter. The same procedure is to apply with regard to rents bequeathed to any individual or to be sold by the executor. If a [sub-]bailiff reports to a court, three days running, that he can find nothing in the city by which to distrain the tenant, then the bailiffs may give the purchaser leave to try to make distraints. If the tenant, after acknowledging the rent due, sells or alienates the tenement in question, he must join with the new tenant in repeating the transfer of the obligation to the latter. No essoins are allowed to any party in the aforesaid process.

[When the tenant (who, as can be seen, might well be the owner of the physical property) made his acknowledgement to the owner of the rent this was called "attorning" himself to his new "lord" (i.e. the individual to whom an obligation was due through tenancy of the property).]

No peer of the city may take his servant as a partner for purposes of buying and selling unless the servant makes entry as a peer, nor may the servant be represented as an apprentice in order to make profit for his master. Anyone convicted of this shall pay a fine of 40s. to be delivered to the chamberlains for the use of the town.

No butcher, broker or those called "tipplers" may, by God's penny as an earnest of payment, reserve corn, animals or any other goods being brought to the city for sale, unless they are prepared immediately after the bargain is made to satisfy the vendor [for the price]. This is so that country-folk are not hindered in receiving payment for their goods. After a buyer has viewed the merchandize and a deal has been struck for it, the quantity of goods in the lot is not to be reduced. If it is, a plea may be introduced and if it is found to have been done with the knowledge of the seller, the complainant may receiving damages, and the offender is to be heavily amerced if he has the means to pay – if not, then some other punishment is to be assigned by the bailiffs. Repeat offenders are to be punished with the pillory as well as making satisfaction to the complainant, and subsequently with abjuring the city for a year and a day, as in chapter 37.

No outsider is to be hosted for more than a day and a night unless his host is prepared to be answerable for him, so that if the outsider flees the city after incurring a debt or committing a trespass, regarding which legal action is brought, the [outsider's] goods and chattels left in possession of the host are to be frozen by the bailiffs' order and surveyed to see what they comprise, and may not be restored to the outsider until he has attached himself to answer the charge and satisfy his creditors. If the host, contrary to the freezing of the assets, restores them to the outsider, he himself shall answer (just as the accused would have done) to the complainant for any debt due or trespass committed, up to the value of the goods and chattels that had been in his possession. In addition the host shall be heavily amerced for disobeying the order of the bailiffs.

Some labourers who work for citizens at various tasks for a penny a day are the subject of complaints. Because they have no possessions by which they can be attached, and in certain cases they cannot be arrested, nor are their employers answerable for them (since they are day labourers and not servants belonging to the employer's household), these men are emboldened in offending and it is difficult to put a stop to their behaviour. Therefore, whenever anyone takes legal action against such a person by gage and pledge, no-one is permitted to give the offender employment until he has answered to the law; any person who contravenes this is to be amerced. If loss of work fails to force offenders to answer to the law, then they are not to be allowed to stay in the city.

Because the city ditches deteriorate from being fouled by animals, public proclamation is to be made four times a year, from street to street and gate to gate, that all owners of animals are to keep them away from the ditches. Any animal found in a ditch is to be seized and kept by the gate-keepers until its owner has paid, towards repair of the ditches or towards murage, one penny per foot [i.e. the number of legs] of the the animal. Whichever gate-keeper captured the animal shall be rewarded with a quarter of this fine. Every gate-keeper shall take oath annually to seize and detain all animals found in the ditches and to pay the redemption fines towards murage, without any withholding.

[In the agreement of 1344 between the city and Richard Spynk concerning upkeep of the city defences, to whose costs Spynk had made very large contributions, this chapter's provisions were reaffirmed. Additional detail was also given (perhaps representing subsequent interpretation or elaboration of the custom): the proclamations were made on 2 February, a moveable date in late May, 1 August, and 29 September; the fine was 1d per foot for citizens, but 2d per foot for non-citizens. Furthermore, a fine was set for citizens who hung their cloths (probably a reference to cloth-makers, dyers or fullers) on the walls, in the archways built into the walls, or on the adjacent ground which gave foot-passage along the course of the walls.]

When there has been the need to hold a common assembly for the benefit of the city, some comburgesses have not bothered to obey the summons to come and deal with community business, with the result that much business cannot be dealt with, to the detriment of the city. Henceforth let summons be made (as in the past) from each leet of the better and wiser citizens to come on days specified by the bailiffs' sergeant, viz. 8, 10 or 12 per leet (according to its size). On that day the sergeant of each leet is to be prepared to name the panel he had summoned to attend, and to give true assurance that he has made the summons at the house of each individual, to his wife or his household. A roll-call will be taken and a cross is to be put by the name of anyone failing to appear, who shall be summoned to appear the next day before the bailiffs and other good men of the city to give a credible excuse for his absence (if he can) – whether prevented by serious illness or not in the city at the time of the summons, and to give assurance of [the authenticity of] this. If a good excuse cannot be given, the absentee shall be amerced two shillings, half going to the bailiffs and the other half to the community; the amercement is to be levied immediately by a sergeant and the common clerk, who are to deliver it to bailiffs and community, and the chamberlains are to make record of the amount and the name of the person fined and account for these monies. So as not to hinder merchants from conducting their business, summonses are only to be made on holy days when no market is held, unless there is some special business concerning the king's rights or urgent business posing a risk to the city, which must be addressed at need.

What we see here is an early effort to formalize and regulate democratic participation in the assembly, although it would be going too far to argue that such participation was (at the time of this chapter – probably the early fourteenth century) restricted only to those summoned. Nor should we think that the summoned participants are a formal [town council, for the numbers involved add up to greater than the size of council membership (24), even though for a while at least council membership was drawn 6 per leet. There is some evidence of a council from the late thirteenth century and that council may itself be reflected in this chapter by the reference to the "bonis viris de civitate" who assisted the bailiffs in judging defaulters; see also cap. 46. It is not clear from the text, which merely says "et super hiis faciant fidem", whether the assurance to be given in regard to the excuse of absentees was by personal oath or by supporting evidence from others.]

The problem of absenteeism was not easily solved. At one assembly meeting in 1367, only 5 of the 24 councillors showed up. In 1372 an ordinance (similar to part of this chapter) was made confirmed 2s. as a fine for unreasonable absenteeism by the councillors and 12d. fine for the craftsmen who were summoned as representatives of the community, with half of each fine going to bailiffs and half to community.]

Tallages and other taxes for the financial benefit of the community have often been levied from some but not others, so that the middle people and poor people inhabiting and making a living in the city feel themselves injured and oppressed. Therefore the collectors of such taxes and the receivers and chamberlains are to give an account under oath of such monies each 8th September (and at other times if necessary) before the twenty-four, or a quorum of those being in the city. After having accounted, and delivered receipts and any arrears owing, they shall be given an acquittance [of future liability] for the time when they served as collectors. [The purpose of] this is so that it shall be publicly known how the levied money was spent, and so that the middle and poor people are not excessively burdened [by taxation] while the greater people are exempted therefrom. Such taxes are to be imposed [i.e. assessed?] by the more judicious men elected at need by the community from each of the crafts in the city.

[Local taxation had been a bone of contention since at least the beginning of the fourteenth century. A protest about unauthorized taxation by the bailiffs and the rich had been made to the king by the "middle people" in a petition of ca.1326, and it may have been these that gave rise to this chapter; however, complaints about taxation are sufficiently commonplace that we cannot use the petition as a device to date this chapter with confidence.]

Where damages are awarded in the city court in debt, trespass or other pleas, let the judgement be executed immediately through an order to distrain for the full amount of the damages; distrained items are to be placed in safekeeping. The individual distrained upon is to be instructed to make satisfaction to his adversary within 8 days. If he fails to do so, let another distraint be made. If, in contempt of the court, he neglects to make satisfaction for a fortnight, let the first distraint be brought into court before the bailiffs and others of the court – its owner being given forewarning so that he may appear if he chooses – and there appraised by trustworthy men under oath, and delivered to the one to whom damages are due. If the distraint is appraised at a greater value than the damages, the amount exceeding the damages is to be restored to the one from whom the distraint was taken. The same thing is to be done with distraints made in regard to community aids, which are to be delivered to the chamberlains.

Sergeants who plead on behalf of clients in the court of which they are officers are to uphold the laws and customs of the city and shall not for any client, outsider or other, make arguments contrary to those customs. They are to take oath before the bailiffs each Michaelmas. They shall not, in court, speak of their associates [i.e. fellow sergeants representing the opposing party?] nor their adversary in a defamatory or dishonourable way, nor stir up bad feelings, but rather serve their clients in a good and honest manner. If any acts contrary to this and continues in such behaviour after three warnings to desist and behave honorably, he shall be suspended from pleading the case until he amends his behaviour and wins back into the good graces of the community.

[It was not uncommon in towns for sergeants, who were familiar with the workings of the court, also to act as legal representatives (or "countors") for a party to a case. This was not considered a conflict of interest, but there was the need, as this chapter shows, to define a code of conduct.]

Those peers whom the community elects as bailiffs of the city may not refuse to take up the burden [of office], under the ancient penalty of 40s. paid to the community. Which fine the bailiffs then in office are to quickly levy from everyone who refuses (sparing no-one), unless they change their mind within three days and accept the office. Once a fine is levied, the appointed electors shall choose another suitable person in the place of him [who refused]. Each year on the day of their election the bailiffs are to swear an oath on the Gospels to observe and maintain all this [i.e. the city customs].

[It was only "peers" – i.e. freemen of the city – who could be elected to the executive office; accepting such election was considered to be one of the obligations of citizenship.]

Upon their election each year, the city bailiffs will take oath that:

- They will serve the king faithfully in that office of having custody of the city.
- They will treat the people of the city properly, giving equal justice to rich and poor.
- They will uphold and maintain the laws, liberties and customs of the city in all matters.
- They will faithfully acquit the city of its obligation by paying in full its fee farm.
- They will execute judgements of the city court in all points, as specified by city custom, sparing no-one.
- They will not permit any foreigner to stay in the city conducting commerce as though a peer of the town, unless he first makes solemn entry [into the franchise] before those elected by the community to administer that.
- If they are informed of anyone conducting commerce in the city contrary to the above, they will have his goods seized and put in safekeeping until he pays a penalty for the offence and swears not to commit the act again without becoming a peer of the city (to which he is to be compelled, if he wishes to remain in the city).

[This chapter is little more than a rephrasing of the oath itself, except that it becomes diverted at the close into the matter of illegal trading – it is hard to believe that the last clause – perhaps even the last two clauses – would actually have been specified in the ballival oath. It is not clear here whether the use of "foreigner" refers to someone whose residence is outside of the city, or to a resident non-freeman. Similarly, the entry to which the foreigner is to be compelled may be as a full freeman (if he is a resident) or as a foreign burgess, if all he wishes is to obtain trading rights in the city. The Liber Consuetudinum version is less specific, using "anyone" instead of "foreigner".]

If anyone wounds another with a sharpened (or other) weapon so that blood is drawn, he is to be put in prison until he finds surety for his appearance in court to answer a plea of trespass.

October 1272

If anyone beats or hurts another to the extent that the latter's life is endangered, the assailant is to be put in prison until it is determined whether the victim recovers or dies. If he dies, the felon shall remain in prison to await the arrival of the [king's] justices who will try the case.

December 1444

Carts that transport malodorous and other vile materials through the streets of the town may do so only twice a week, that is on Wednesdays and Saturdays. Anyone who dumps such materials at the Muckhill, or in the watercourses or ditches shall pay [a fine of] 1d. for each "treyleft", 2d. for every "soo" and 4d. for every "grete lepe", and shall forfeit the treye, soo or grete lepe. Butchers shall obey the same in transporting animal entrails in enclosed carts or barrows to the river at flood, half-ebb, or half-flood.

[Since entrails are separately mentioned, the materials initially referred to were probably primarily dung and manure, perhaps including human refuse. An ordinance made early the following year specified a quarterly fee payable per household to carters who were presumably collecting such refuse. It is not evident where this offensive material could be dumped, if not at the Muckhill. I am not certain what were the measures mentioned, although a "leap" is a name which occurs throughout the late Middle Ages as a container for a dry measure, and a "treye" was a tray which (in some circumstances) held about 6 lb. avoirdupois and may have resembled the v-shaped container used for carrying mortar, although the term could also be used for a sled.]

Because frequent ringing of bells in bell-towers of the town, especially that of St. Margaret's, threatens serious costs or injuries to the townspeople, damage to the towers, and danger to approaching ships, it is ordained that the great bells in St. Margaret's main tower and in the chapels of St. James and St. Nicholas shall not toll for the dead except for brethren of the great gild of Holy Trinity and their wives, or for the Prior and monks [of St. Margaret's priory], or other worthy persons according to their social status at the discretion of the wardens of the church or chapels. No bell is to be tolled for a longer period than the day of the individual's death or its anniversary, except for one hour (with pauses), for which the sacristan shall receive 10d. if the great bells are used or 6d. if the lesser bells.

[One of the dangers that prompted this ordinance is exemplified by Margery Kempe's report, a few years later, of a stone falling from the church.]

3 February 1461

Each constable with four men of his constabulary shall attend the mayor, each group for eight days. Each of the jurats shall have one man for protection. Twenty of the men involved in the defence of the town shall attend the mayor daily, at the cost of the community (4d. a day), and eight men of whichever constabulary is on nightwatch shall guard the gates, viz. four at the south gate and four at the east gate. The jurats shall each find a man for the defence of the town, 12 on each alternate day.

[While this is not a general ordinance, but one providing a temporary response to a specific crisis, I have thought it worth including here as a rare example of efforts towards defending the town. The crisis was of course the civil war, now in full swing with the recently ascendant Duke of York killed at Wakefield and a Lancastrian army marching south. On 7 January, the Lynn constabularies were each assigned their section of the town perimeter to defend, both land-side and river-side. One week later it was decided to despatch a small force of 24 well-armed men to the royal commissioners raising troops in Norfolk, and a tax of £40 was to be assessed on all other full-bodied males to cover the wages of this contingent. Six days after the above ordinance, which seems mainly concerned with providing bodyguards for the town's governors and a standing force to respond to emergencies, it was elaborated with the specification that, of the 20 men attending the mayor, 4 each would be assigned to day-guard of the town's two main gates, and that an additional 12 men would be assigned to attend on the mayor. Three days later (on 12 February), there were more orders for stepping up the defences, including fines for constables and ward-captains neglecting their duties (in March, 4 men were imprisoned for this), and doubling of the nightwatch. After the Yorkist victory at Towton, concerns reduced and on 29 April the nightwatch was given a respite and attention turned to examining the costs that had been incurred in the defensive provisions.]

Penalty for impleading a burgess without licence of the mayor

From this time forward, no burgess of Lynn shall implead another in any court without licence from the mayor, on pain of 6s.8d fine to the use of the community, to be levied by the common sergeant-at-mace. With the proviso that if the mayor is not able to bring to a settlement a quarrel between burgesses, then he shall allow the plaintiff to pursue his complaint [in court].

[While an ordinance of this type might in most boroughs refer to citizens taking their pleas before external courts, in Lynn the reference is as likely to be to the local courts, since much judicial jurisdiction was in the hands of the Bishop, not the borough. Throughout the fourteenth century, however, we see the mayor and assembly frequently acting as an informal judicial authority to resolve disputes between burgesses.]

16 January 1381

[Income from the following sources] shall be put safely away, without taking anything out of it, so that the mayor and community may use the revenues for a purchase which shall be to the profit of the community: all money arising from [sale of] merchandize called "host's parts" which was above granted to the benefit of the community; the money issuing from rental of stalls by St. Margaret's church; the rents from waste land near the South Gates; the rents once belonging to John Burghard, now in the hands of the community; and also the reversions of rents belonging to the community after the death of various folk (who inherited them for the term of their lives). Exceptions to these are: the [normal] deductions from the profits of the said houses and stalls; the life annuity due to Thomas de Keninghale; the salary of two priests celebrating in the Charnel for the souls of John, his wife and his children. These revenues shall be in the safekeeping of the chamberlains, who shall render account for them when mayor and community order it.

[The intent was probably to use the money put aside to buy real estate, rents from which would increase the annual revenues of the borough. Keninghale was Burghard's son-in-law.]

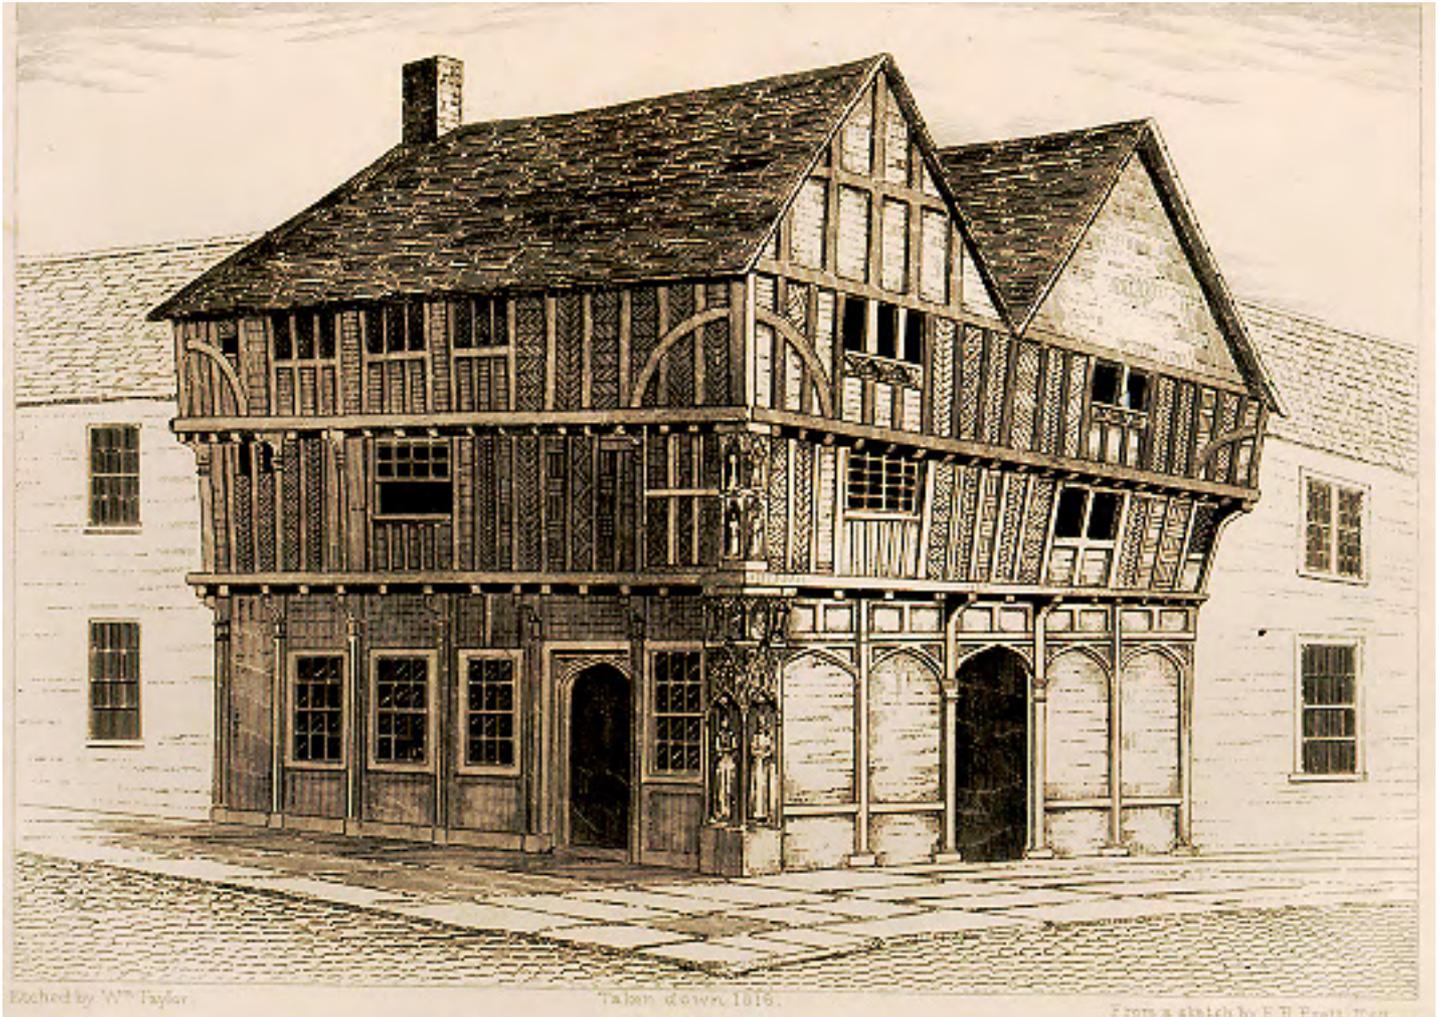

Early 15th century

Every man is to keep his watch according to the Statute of Winchester and the common custom of the town. He is to be at the constable's house between 8 and 9 o'clock to answer the roll-call and be assigned his charge. If any man defaults in this the constable may take distress from his house the morning after and sell it to the profit of the community, and the defaulter will have to answer before the justices of the peace, as law prescribes.

[This undated extract from the early 15th century volume of memoranda is actually described as a command by the mayor, but it has much the same appearance as if an ordinance of mayor and council. The town was divided into ten constabularies in the 14th century, but only nine in the fifteenth; constabularies were named after the appointed constable of the time, who had to be a resident of that ward.]

45. King's Lynn, Old House on High Street, exterior, mid 15th-century residence of Walter Coney, destroyed 1816.

Coney (+ 1476) was four times mayor of Lynn and had a memorial brass in St. Margaret's. After William Taylor, The Antiquities of King's Lynn (London, 1844).

17 December 1390

Frequently, excessive crowding at the town's water conduits has resulted in damage to their vaulted arches, or their stones have been carried off and other intolerable damage done; without prompt remedy this essential utility, constructed at great cost and labour, will be destroyed. Therefore, taking example from the regulation of conduits in London and elsewhere, it is ordained with regard to the getting of water in containers: first come, first served. All seeking to fill their containers may place them in a queue, so that each may be served in succession without any arguments arising. Furthermore, it is ordained that no very large containers, commonly known as "sogs" [tubs] are to be filled at the conduits until smaller containers have been filled, nor are large containers to be placed so as to impede others. Anyone breaking this ordinance, or supporting someone breaking it, shall be fined 12d.; anyone informing on a transgressor shall receive 4d. out of this fine. If anyone breaks the fragile containers of poor people, the mayor will ensure that he compensates the injured party.

[A further ordinance on the matter was required in May 1426; it re-emphasized the first come, first served principle (regardless of whether the individual was a burgess or a servant) and set 10d. as the fine for queue-jumpers.]

6 October 1309 *

The mayor and community grant "that all unlawful and unreasonably harsh taxes and tallages which have often been imposed by the great men of the aforesaid town upon the middle and poor people, to their oppression and hindrance, taken of them forcefully, without cause and to the great impoverishment of the town, shall not be done hereafter except when required for profit or need, and then reasonably and in a measured way, with contributions given according to the faculty, might and power of every man without exception of any person." The account of such tallages is to be audited before a group of townsmen chosen from each of the three degrees.

[These local taxations appear to have been the basis for the budget of Lynn's self-government The older (probably original) Latin fair copy of the composition uses the terms potentiores, mediocres and inferiores for grete men, mene peple and povere.]

18 September 1377

If anyone is summoned by the common sergeant to come to a session of the mayor and community in the gildhall, he should come before St. Margaret's clock strikes nine, under penalty of 4d. [fine] to the use of the community.

[In 1444 the corporation issued an order to move the orlagium anglice also known as "the klokke" from the new bell-tower where it then was back to the lantern where it had anciently been.]

Because the community daily bears greater and excessive costs and expenses so that it[s budget] is much in arrears, it is ordained that the share [in merchandise] that hosts used to have shall belong to the use of the community and hosts shall only have the same share as other purchasers present at the sale of the remaining parts of the merchandise; hosts may not acquire any of the merchandise as their share to the loss or damage of the community. Anyone infringing this ordinance, so that the community is deprived of its share, shall be punished at the discretion of mayor and community. Furthermore, after the [annual] election of officers, one of the chamberlains is to be assigned to take charge of the said share.

This ordinance, by an administration evidently concerned with fiscal reform, was repealed in November 1380, probably by an administration representing the interests of the wealthier merchants of the town who profited much from [hosting. However, an ordinance of January 1381 seems to reflect another attempt to formulate this type of ordinance.]

December 1423

Butchers resident in Lynn may not sell meat on Saturdays in any place except [that] next to St. Margaret's church; if they do so they shall hereafter be excluded from the marketplace like any non-resident.

[This would seem to be just a variant of the ordinance dated tentatively to November 1423.]

26 March 1432

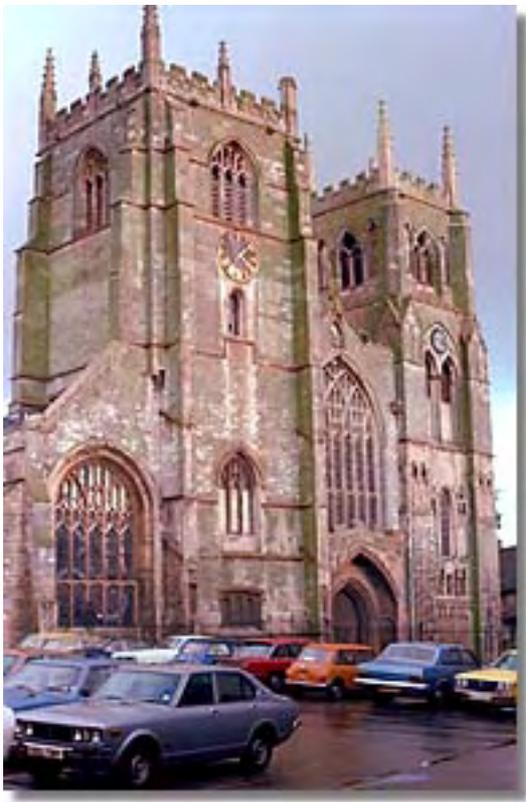

All residents of Lynn, whatever their status, shall have their grain ground at the common mill if the mill is able to handle their demands. Henceforth if anyone has his grain ground at any mill outside of town when the common mill could have ground it, he shall forfeit the grain or the flour produced outside town, which may be confiscated by the common serjeant or someone else and put to the use of the community.

The [mill had been built in the 1390s to create a new source of revenue for the borough (see the notes appended to the mill's entry in the rental); one of the chamberlains was assigned the responsibility of keeping track of mill finances, and there even appears to have been a contrarotulator assigned to keep duplicate accounts, as a control on honest accounting. Between 29 September 1398 and 25 March 1399 the borough had obtained revenues of £33.3s.4d from the mill, through fees for grinding 1,670 qt. of grain (at 4d. a quarter), although much of this had to be reinvested in mill maintenance. After March 25 the corn mill, together with a fulling mill, two cottages and a garden, were farmed to John Miller for three years at £50 a year, and farming out henceforth became the preferred approach for dealing with the mills. However, it proved difficult persuading bakers and other townsmen to give their business to the town mill, and eventually it became necessary to apply compulsion through this ordinance. Four bakers were appointed to supervise adherence to the ordinance. Fines were later introduced as an added deterrent.]

Concerning seven ladders newly-made for use of the community, they shall not be loaned out in future except to the gild of Holy Trinity, for work on St. Margaret's church or the chapels of St. James and St. Nicholas, and for fire-fighting. Of these ladders, two are over 43 feet long and have 28 rungs, one is 30½ feet and has 20 rungs, one 28½ feet with 19 rungs, one 26½ feet and 17 rungs, one 16½ feet and 11 rungs, and one 11 feet and 8 rungs. The ladders are marked with a crown at one end.

ST. MARGARET'S CHURCH © Stanbury/Raguin/MMK

This is the parish church of Margery Kempe whose autobiography of 1436 is now much studied as a source of understanding lay piety, gender roles, and the development of written English. In this large parish church it is possible to see that the parishioners were often well out of earshot of anything said, as opposed to sung, at the altar. During Lent a huge veil was suspended in the sanctuary reaching almost to the ground, which remained throughout the weekdays so that the observers were completely blocked off from the clergy singing their office or saying Mass. Margery's vocal outbursts may be seen as fitting into this situation where sound may have substituted for sight even in the "regular" performance religious ritual.

APPENDIX I

The Officers of Borough Government

Notes

- 1 I cannot verify the statement that Henry Godyear was bailiff, made by Rickword (Trans. E. A.S., IX, 134) who is unreliable in some other attributions.
- 2 The date of – fitz William and Adam de Castro to this year (Red Paper Bk., 74) is almost certainly a mistaking of 10/11 Ed.I for 10/11 Ed.II.
- 3 From an undated deed (Red Paper Bk., 71) of tempore Edward I; it is Rickword (op. cit., 144) who gives the precise date, without substantiation.
- 4 Possibly alias le Clerk
- 5 Hypothetical.
- 6 The number of coroners was reduced from four to two from 1318 onwards.
- 7 The names of chamberlains are rarely recorded in the fourteenth century.
- 8 It is not quite clear whether these men are chamberlains or sergeants; see G.C.R. 22-23 Ed. III, m.1.
- 9 No qualificative epithet is placed after the Starling name henceforth, so it may be that one (presumably Geoffrey senior) had died.
- 10 See chapter 1.
- 11 Thus Add.Ms. 30158 f.14, although Bacon gives William Winter and Robert Hall as treasurers.
- 12 According to Harrod, from the evidence of deeds.
- 13 But possibly William de Karleton; see KL/C50/Be 204.

14 Not all identities are certain, due to damage to the source document (Red Reg. f.61; see also Arundel Castle Ms. MD 428).

15 Only two chamberlains were elected this year.

16 Based on Saul (who follows Le Strange, who in turn used Swinden) and on Palmer (using Swinden and Manship), with amendments and additions (including chamberlains' names) from primary evidence.

17 However, an entry in Cal.Memo.Rolls 1326-27 (p.145) lists these bailiffs for that year.

18 Thus C.P.R 1343-45, 166 (for 20 November 1343). Le Strange and Palmer state that the bailiffs of 1341/2 were re-elected in the next two years, however.

19 Although Palmer gives Richard de Wymondham, E101/507/30 gives Gimingham; it is not certain whether the two names might represent one individual.

20 Thus Add.Ms. 14965 (dated 3 February 1365). Le Strange gives a different set (without citing his authority), whilst Swinden and Palmer leave this year blank.

21 Although Le Strange and Palmer say Thomas Hall, the parliamentary return (C219/15/2) gives Hillys.

22 Ipswich, Lynn, and Yarmouth (as well as Norwich) are known to have been represented in parliament as early as 1268, but no names of members are known until 1295. Maldon is not known to have been represented before 1332.

23 Although Lynn, at least, is known to have been represented (KL/C37/1 m.20r), Henry Barsham being a likely representative.

24 Possibly alias de Massingham.

26 Prorogued to November.

27 Although Thomas Stace and Gilbert Robert are known to have journeyed to this parliament (C.Cl.R. 1313-18, 271), it is not clear whether as formal representatives.

28 The former pair were named on the return, but the latter pair were paid in the borough account.

29 I.e. of the Haraud family.

- 30 Prorogued to February.
- 31 Possibly an error for John? I find no other biographical data on a Richard Jordan.
- 32 We cannot be certain that Maldon was summoned to every parliament during this period.
- 33 Although Lynn paid Roger de Buttele, Geoffrey Drewe and Thomas de Massingham for attending a 'Council' of this year.
- 34 Hypothesis from a surname ending '--lle': all that remains of the writ. N.B. that Warin atte Welle died in 1349.
- 35 Summoned by name, not elected. McKisack thought it was Tolbooth who attended the June parliament, but the chamberlains' account clearly pays Botkesham for attending the Winchester session, and names Tolbooth and Botkesham together in relation to an unspecified (but doubtless the February) parliament.
- 36 Replaced Nicholas de Swerdestone, who was originally elected, before the October prorogation.
- 37 The name is only partially legible on the writ.
- 38 Thus the original return, but the Red Register f.161b records the election of Hugh de Ellingham, not that of Morton.
- 39 Prorogued to January.
- 40 John Bilney and James Nicholasson had originally been selected, however.
- 41 Walter Curson according to one source, but this is probably an alias.
- 42 Confirmed from the original returns; the suggestion by Palmer/Le Strange of Gaynes and Elys is incorrect.
- 43 This pair was hypothesised by History of Parliament: Biographies, 652, on rather flimsy evidence.
- 44 Hypothesis, on the grounds that the Paston letters refer to Heydon in connection with these parliaments, and Yarmouth is the most likely constituency.

DISCUSSION

This document provides a glimpse, over the course of a year, into part of the export trade conducted, through the port of Lynn, with parts of northern Europe stretching between the Low Countries and the Baltic. Besides this subsidy, there were other customs collected on particular types of imports and exports, and accounted for separately (often by different sets of collectors). The particular levy reported here was categorized as a subsidy on tannage and poundage. Whereas customs duties were, in general, permanent impositions by the king, subsidies were – at least in theory – temporary grants by the populace of financial aid to the king, for specific purposes such as funding efforts to make the seas safe for commerce in times of war. Since there were a variety of different customs and subsidies collected, we should not imagine that this document represents the total volume of international trade conducted through Lynn in the period covered.

The customs collectors based at Lynn were responsible for a 45-mile stretch of the northern Norfolk coast, between Wisbech (10 miles south-west of Lynn and connected to the Wash via the River Nene) and Blakeney (30 miles north-east of Lynn). However, the fact that the vast majority of merchants and ship-owners mentioned in this account were either Lynn citizens or foreigners suggests that all of the traffic reported by the collectors went through Lynn's port; not surprisingly, the majority of the Lynn exporters were men from the upper echelon of borough society, characterized by membership in the town council of jurats. Judging from the places of origin of the ships, the most prominent destinations for the exports were Gdansk, Briel and Durdrecht. Most commercial ventures were conducted by individuals; partnerships were few, and joint-stock companies a thing of the future.

For each locality where customs collectors were in operation a controller (literally, keeper of a counter-roll) was appointed to compile a duplicate record of customs receipts, as a guard against fraud on the part of the customs collectors. Since this was just a check-list, the controller rarely bothered to provide a final total of all receipts. The total (estimated) value of the goods shipped was just over £5,632 and, as can be seen, cloth was by far the most prominent export item.

"dozen"

The term "dozen", when applied to cloth, does not represent (as it appears) a quantity, but a length: a dozen was a cloth of approximately 12 ells (about 13-14 yards).

"packs"

Pack is a hypothetical translation for pynnok, as opposed to fardellus which was used for a bundle of some kind; these terms had more precise meaning, in terms of volume, to medieval people than they do to us.

"kerseys" "worsted"

Cheaper types of cloth assumed to have originally been produced at the villages of Kersey (Suffolk) and Worstead (Norfolk).

"bale of thrums"

The term here translated as "bale" is in the original poka, which might however be used in this context for a smaller pack or pouch. Thrums were threads or yarn.

"quintals"

A quintal was a measure equivalent to 100 lb.

"maces"

The term I have translated as "maces" is macecell; the term might perhaps refer to wooden bowls (mazers) or silk, or – given the context – be a name for a type of cloth.

"says"

A say was a fine cloth with a worsted warp and a woollen weft.

"tunholt"

Tunholt refers to a kind of lumber.

"John Grene"

Appears not to have been a citizen of Lynn.

Medieval East Anglian

Preface: By the end of the 11th century political organisation had given Western Europe a degree of stability, this allowed the growth of civilisation which is called Medieval. Morals were beginning to be of value although there was very little knowledge of physical science, education was for the upper class and Latin was the international language. The papal authority over the churches in Western Europe led to a central organisation which brought the first stability to England since the Romans left our shores, this was called the Holy Roman Empire.

This combining of European countries led to the Crusades for Christian dominance in the Middle East, the biggest being in 1188 under Emperor Frederick I. The East Anglian See was moved from Thetford to Norwich by Bishop Herbert de Losinga when he was appointed in 1091, a few years later a huge cathedral was starting to take effect in Norwich. It was built on the site of two earlier churches which were demolished to make way for it. The cathedral had cells for 60 monks and was built with defence in mind with a keep.

English was now being abandoned for French which became the language of the Royal Court, churches and Law Courts. Anglo-Saxons followed the Normans and even used French names.

Yarmouth was a Medieval Town. Taken from Before the Walls by Paul Rutledge

Herbert de Losinga, the first Bishop of Norwich. He had churches built throughout East Anglia.

THE CHARTER OF JOHN OF OXON, 1175-1200.
GRANT OF ST. NICHOLAS' TO THE CHURCH OF ST. MARGARET,
THE ORIGINAL WITH THE RECORDS OF THE DEAN AND CHAPTER, NORWICH.

6 October 1309 *

Regarding the "use of free court and plea", the view of frankpledge held by the 24 [capital pledges] belongs to the Bishop and is presided over by his ministers and bailiffs, but mayor and burgesses commit themselves to participating in it.

6 October 1309 *

At the leet court, held in the [Bishop's] Steward's Hall each October 28, certain members of the community chosen by the steward are to make presentments on the leet articles and regarding the observance of right and the peace. The steward is to preside over the court, and court profits and ameracements belong to the Bishop, but he farms them (in perpetuity) to mayor and community for £40 annually, to be paid in two instalments due 30 November and 2 February. Excepted from this is the assize of bread, whose ameracements are to be collected by the Bishop's bailiffs as often as necessary, but in the presence of the mayor who will be given notice by the bailiffs when they intend to hold an assize. The assize of ale will be held by the bailiffs only on leet day, unless specific complaints are made at other times. Correction of trespasses made by officers of the Bishop, and their ameracement, remain within the power of the Bishop alone. He also reserves: the ameracement of any non-resident foreigners who trade within the town; the goods and chattels (seized by the court) of fugitives or outlaws; any other rights prescribed in royal charters to the Bishop. The bailiffs may distrain upon any and every burgess for default in the community paying the farm.

6 October 1309 *

They [the bailiffs] (and not mayor and community) may execute any summonses, attachments, arrests, and distrains for the [steward's] court. However, any amercements and amounts offered as redemptions [for distrained goods?] they will deliver to mayor and community, without any fraud or withholding; to ensure this, the mayor and community may choose persons from their number [i.e. auditors?] to assist the clerk of the court in recording these estreats and to be present when the steward seals this record, which is to be delivered to mayor and community. If the bailiffs are found to have been negligent or remiss in this duty, then (unless the bailiffs can justify their action) whatever amount has been lost to mayor and community shall be deducted from the farm of the following year. If the mayor and community withhold an amount from the farm for the above reason, but it is subsequently proved that this was unwarranted, they shall deliver to the Bishop whatever they withheld, without delay or argument.

6 October 1309 *

[The standard] weights and measures are to remain in the keeping of the steward and bailiffs, and profits from their application are to belong to the Bishop without any objection from mayor and community, except amercements resulting from presentments in the leet court.

[Weights and measures were to be presented for examination at the annual leet court, so that their accuracy could be checked, as was required by royal decree; townsmen failing to bring them were fined.]

6 October 1309 *

The mayor and community concede that the husting (previously a subject of dispute between parties to the composition) is to be presided over by the steward in the presence of the mayor, or by their deputies. Summoning, distraining [etc.] are exclusively within the power of the bailiffs. However, profits of this court will go to the mayor and community. The mayor may compile a [control] record of all pleas touching free tenements and cases claimed out of the king's court.

6 October 1309 *

Testaments involving [borough] lands or tenements are similarly to be dealt with; they shall be proved before the Bishop's official and then presented to the steward in the husting (and nowhere else). Whoever brings the testament shall pay no charge [for probate or enrollment], unless money is due from any plea resulting from the will – and this money is to belong to the Bishop.

The [assembly record, the Red Register, which is full of enrolments of testaments, illustrates how this provision of the composition was subverted by the burgesses]

6 October 1309 *

No member of the community shall occupy waste ground for more than four or five days without being enfeoffed therein by the Bishop or defending by law his claim to the land. At the time of holding the town fairs the Bishop has the right to rent out any [plots] of the waste ground to residents or outsiders.

6 October 1309 *

No townsman shall construct a quay on the port without the Bishop's permission. The Bishop has the right to tear down or appropriate to his own use (renting out for his profit) unlicensed quays; the same applies to any quay built without his permission prior to this composition.

6 October 1309 *

Any statutes or ordinances made in the town hall for community benefit must be approved by the Bishop.

6 October 1309 *

Because alien merchants have, for various causes, withdrawn from the town, to encourage their return the mayor and community grant that any coming to sell their goods may freely reside in the town for 40 days (as is the custom in other boroughs). The Bishop's bailiffs are to preside over any plea regarding disruption of this right. No burgess shall retract on any commercial agreement made with an alien.

[In fact, it seems to have been just as much the extortionate actions of the officers of the Earl of Arundel – exercising their charter rights of charging for harbourage, applying standard measures (inconsistently) to cargos of grain and ale, and imposing unreasonable tolls on merchandize – that was discouraging outsider merchants from frequenting Lynn.]

6 October 1309 *

The mayor and community shall not ask or take anything [i.e. a fine or licence fee] from any man wishing to dwell in the town, as this is expressly against the liberty [granted to the town by] the Bishop. But if anyone resides there for a year and then wishes to be treated as other than a stranger, he may give what is reasonable to purchase the [franchise].

The first sentence doubtless refers to licences to trade sold to non-burgess residents, which were themselves in part a punitive measure to create incentive towards becoming a [freeman (a status which was supposed to provide superior commercial rights). The licences might be of a general tenor, or might be specific such as the case ca.1299 in which various butchers paid a fee for permission to retail meat on days other than the Tuesday market.]

[In association with a decision to levy a tax on the community, in order to pay off borough debts, the assessors were instructed] to have regard to those who were richer and better able to contribute, and to those burdened with children ... so that the tax be assessed fairly on each according to his means.

- On the day after Michaelmas [election day] the chamberlains of the previous year shall hand over to the new chamberlains all the muniments and records belonging to the community. The muniments and records shall be displayed and read out each year before the mayor and those ordained for [i.e. to represent and serve - probably the jurats are meant] the community. Each chamberlain is to provide surety for the performance of his duties; on any who acts contrary to his duty the common bailiff, at the command of the mayor, will levy [i.e. distrain] on the surety, which will be put towards the common profit, to offset the outrageous costs the community has had to bear.
- All officers elected are to take oath before the mayor and those ordained, upon pain of a fine.
- All debts due to the community are to be paid (at the exchequer in the gildhall) to the chamberlains and to no-one else; these revenues are to be deposited in the treasury of the hall, under lock and key, upon pain of 20s. fine.
- The chamberlains elected in future are to serve the community better than those of earlier times, taking from the community for their annual fee 20s. each (conditional upon good performance of their duties). Chamberlains are to strive for the profit of the community.
- Chamberlains leaving office are to render their accounts within 8 days after Michaelmas, on a day to be assigned them by the mayor; the account is to be reviewed by the mayor, the new chamberlains, and those chosen by the community to act as auditors. Anyone who refuses to come to render account shall be fined 20s.; defaulters who are assigned a second day to appear and fail to come shall be fined 40s. – and so on, the fine doubling from day to day.

[It is not clear from the larger record within which these ordinances are embodied whether they predated 1342, or whether they were additions at that time to a larger set of constitutional ordinances that were read publicly each Michaelmas. The borough budget ran up small deficits in several years during the 1330s. Account rolls for 1341/42 and 1342/43 have not, regrettably, survived, but an improvement in the style of recording the accounts between the rolls of 1340/41 and 1343/44 is one reflection of the attempt to reform financial management.]

Every alien bringing a cargo of timber to the port of Lynn shall give [as toll? to the borough] two boards or beams for every hundred sold.

[The record of these ordinances in B.M. Add.Ms.37791 is badly damaged and parts are difficult to read.]

- Because the community recognizes that the office is burdensome and costly, it is agreed that if a burgess is elected mayor, accepts the office, takes oath and serves for the year, then he is exempt from holding the same office for two years following.
[This item is struck through, with the note "voided by common assent".]
- Each mayor, if he has served diligently and preserved the honour of the town, is to receive £20 for his fee and shall be exempt from taxation during his year in office; if not, then he shall have only £10 and exemption from his tax.
- If anyone elected as mayor refuses to accept the office, he shall pay £20 to the community in return for being discharged from the office for a period of two years (but shall be exempted from taxation during the first year). If he refuses to pay the £20, the community may use all powers at its disposal to levy the amount from him. In cases where the person elected mayor is absent [at the time of his election], he may come at a later time and offer the £20 to be discharged. Any burgess elected chamberlain may, if he wishes, be exempted from holding the same office again during the next two years, on condition that he renders account within 15 days [of leaving office] for all expenses and receipts. No-one is to be made a chamberlain unless a burgess and sufficient for that office.
[This item is struck through, with the note "voided by common assent, 14 August 1395". The reference to a chamberlain being "sufficient" likely refers to having the means by which to be distrainable for any arrears owing to the community.]
- No mayor is to place any charges [i.e. taxes or other financial commitments] on the community without the aid and counsel of his comburgesses and commoners.
[The comburgesses are presumably the jurats, and the commoners are other townsmen summoned to participate in assemblies – possibly this was on an ad hoc or rotational basis prior to the creation of a Common Council.]
- The 12 burgesses who are elected to give counsel to the mayor and who elect another 12 to their number – the which 24 (or the majority of them) may, by advice of the mayor and chamberlains, ordain as seems profitable [to the community].
- Because burgesses [have proven] unwilling to appear before the mayor to give aid and counsel regarding matters concerning the community, it is ordained that if any burgess is summoned, by the common sergeant or another, and defaults in appearance he shall pay 40d. per occasion. If any [jurat?] defaults on election day he shall pay 6s.8d, and each other burgess 12d. Each chamberlain who fails to come [when summoned?] during the term of his office [shall pay] 40d. per occasion. Unless they provide a reasonable excuse.
- Community taxations that are granted from year to year are to be assessed in the first quarter of the year and collected during the second quarter.

The community agreed that all burgesses who act as hosts shall have from their guests one-sixth of any merchandise they bring to the town, except for kippered herring, pickled herring, fresh herring, fresh salmon, or other fresh fish, of which they shall have one-third, on condition they (nor anyone on their behalf) not buy anything further from the guests through fraud or collusion, contrary to the interests of the community, nor that the hosts conceal any of the merchandise their guests bring. The [visiting] merchant is to be allowed to sell his merchandise openly both within the community and elsewhere. Salmon or other victuals of which the third part is allowed to the hosts may not be bought or delivered before sunrise or after sundown. Any host convicted of infringing any of these points shall lose the profit from hosting for a year afterwards and shall pay a fine to the community.

[That the borough persevered in enforcing this ordinance – which brought it a source of revenue – is evidenced by the case of Philip Frank who, in 1430, was reprimanded by the corporation for taking one-third of the share of a herring cargo of an outsider to whom he was host; he was instructed to take only one-sixth part, according to custom.]

Whereas previously the election of mayor, chamberlains, clerk and bailiff was held each Michaelmas [September 29], henceforth elections shall be held on the Friday following the Decollation of St. John [August 29], or on that feast-day if it falls on a Friday. The officers elected shall take up office on Michaelmas. On which days every burgess is expected to attend without being summoned.

[This ordinance, which is recorded immediately following those of September 1358, on a similar subject, is deleted, suggesting its repeal at some point.]

18 February 1368

Every burgess who is to contribute to a tax on the community shall be given notice by the sergeant to pay his tax on a certain day at the gildhall or to the chamberlains. If he does not pay on that day, he is to be given notice by the sergeant to pay on another specified day. If he still fails to pay, he shall pay (in addition to his tax) 12d. for his default, and be given a third day to pay. If he continues not to pay, he shall be distraigned by the sergeant by all goods available for distraint, until the amount is paid.

14 July 1368

No burgess may personally or by his sons or servants buy any merchandise from any ship in the port until the merchandise has been brought to shore, as per the king's statute, under penalty of 20s. paid to the community for each transgression.

[This ordinance was subsequently repealed.]

18 November 1372

No burgess shall make an agreement with a "lodesman" to sail a ship to locations outside of Lynn for a fee greater than 40s., under penalty of a fine of 40s. paid to the community.

8 December 1372

If any burgess is summoned by the common sergeant to appear before mayor and community at any day when they are in session and he fails to come before the clock strikes ten, but arrives later, he shall pay 4d. into the chest in the gildhall immediately.

8 December 1372

All burgesses shall henceforth pay their taxes at the gildhall to the chamberlains when given notice or summoned by the sergeant. Any burgess thus forewarned three times and failing to come to pay after the third warning shall pay a surcharge of 1d. for every 12d. due in tax. And each further time he is warned to come and pay his tax and fails, a surcharge of a 1d. per 12d. shall be imposed, until the tax is paid in full.

27 January 1374

If anyone speaks ill of tax-collectors because of the tax assessed on them, or arranges for anything to happen whereby they are harmed or obstructed, he shall pay twice as much tax that year.

7 May 1378

Tax assessors shall not henceforth be reimbursed by the community for any expenses, but will have to cover their own living costs, if it is a community tax that is being levied.

[Presumably expenses would be allowed if it was a national tax that they were assessing.]

7 May 1378

Whereas great, various and excessive expenses have been incurred during the period of office of several mayors on the occasion of the holding of the leet and immediately afterwards in food and drink (as evidenced in the accounts of those mayors), the mayor and community wish not to have to bear these expenses hereafter. They ordain that henceforth no expenses at the time of the leet will be allowed or reimbursed, except those that are necessary and have existed from ancient times, such as 2s. to the capital pledges upon view and presentment of offences and 15s. [wages?] before the submission of the roll of verdicts of the leet. If anyone incurs expenses contrary to this ordinance, he shall pay them himself without any reimbursement from the community.

Because matters affecting the community have often been dealt with by individual members of the community without the knowledge or consent of mayor and community, with the result that discord has arisen within the community, it is ordained that if any burgess henceforth pursue, or cause to be pursued, any community business without the knowledge of mayor and community he shall be disfranchised and fined £100 to the use of the community.

[It may be suspected that this ordinance was prompted by an attempt being made about this time by a segment of the populace (including some prominent townsmen) to obtain from the Pope letters granting sacramental privileges for St. Nicholas' chapel. This was vigorously and successfully resisted – but not without effort and cost – by the corporation and majority of townsmen. This ordinance may have been a pre-emptive measure, but proved insufficient. In 1380 jurat Nicholas Swerdestone was perpetually disfranchised (in part on the grounds of infringing this ordinance) for his part in the St. Nicholas' affair.]

If the mayor orders any burgess to get up from the place where he is seated in the communal assembly and move to another place, and the burgess is unwilling or can't be bothered to do so, he shall pay 1d. into the community chest each time he fails to obey an order from the mayor.

16 January 1381

In order that silence be better maintained in communal assemblies so that business can be more speedily dealt with, it is ordained that any burgess whose chatter delays business after the mayor (or anyone else by his instruction) has struck three times on the chest or pyx in the gildhall shall immediately pay into the chest 4d. per offence.

16 January 1381

Before this time citizens of Norwich have appointed certain burgesses of Lynn their attornies to sell their merchandise stored in various places within Lynn, and given them keeping of their keys for that purpose, to the damage of the community. It is therefore ordained that no burgess henceforth be the attorney of the said citizens, nor others, for the storage and sale of such merchandise, nor receive the keys of houses where such merchandise rests with the intent that they become its guardians, upon penalty of 20s. for each conviction.

16 January 1381

It is ordained that the community shall have the third part of all types of merchandize that outsiders or aliens bring by sea into the port of Lynn – or by land, if the merchandize belongs to aliens and is coming from far away – excepting victuals brought for the use of lords; paying for the third whatever their value is [fairly] assessed as. After the purchase of such merchandize, the chamberlain who has been assigned to take care of the third part shall have one hour's notice to make the third part available to the community. Furthermore, it is ordained that the hosts of these aliens or outsiders may have the sixth part of the two parts remaining after the taking of the third part, on condition they buy nothing more from [the merchandize of] their guests. If any burgess conceals [merchandize] or is the cause of the community being obstructed from, or deprived of, its share, he shall pay 12d. for each load concealed and also will lose his share of merchandize for the following year. In times past outsiders have sent merchandize with letters [of attorney] to various burgeses of Lynn to sell their merchandize as if they were the burgeses' own, so that the community would be deprived of its part, if remedy were not made. Therefore it is ordained that anyone receiving such letters and merchandize deal with the chamberlain to ensure that the community is not deprived of its share, or face the penalty already mentioned.

3 October 1382

No host in Lynn shall from now until the end of Michaelmas have more than an eighth part of any merchandize.

[Here Michaelmas is referred to not as a specific festival but as a term, which ended in late November.]

6 December 1385

No son of a burgess may enter the franchise without paying a fee, unless he is of legitimate birth and was born after his father entered the franchise.

No burgess shall take on anyone as his apprentice unless that individual is of free birth, and was not born into servitude. When someone is about to take on an apprentice, he shall come before the mayor in the Gildhall with the apprentice and the indenture [of apprenticeship] and the apprentice shall be examined in the presence of other burgesses as to whether he is of free or servile status. If he is found to be free and not a villein, the date of him being received into apprenticeship shall be enrolled in the gildhall records. But if, after completing his apprenticeship, he is found to have had a servile birth, his term of service shall be invalidated as a basis for entrance to the franchise.

No mayor may have a share in merchandize brought by outsiders into the port, unless he or his nominee is present at the sale; except in the case of wholesale cargoes, in which the mayor may have a share the same as those present at the sale, even if not present. No tax-assessor or parliamentary burgess, nor anyone else busy in the service of the community, may have a share unless he or his nominee is present at the sale.

25 February 1390

Every man shall repair broken pavement adjacent to his house; if any fails to do so, the mayor may assign workmen to the task and distrain [on the defaulting householder] for their wages.

17 December 1390

Whereas it had been ordained that anyone summoned by the common sergeant to go to the gildhall and failing to do so would be fined 12d., the mayor and community now extend this to any location within the town where the sergeant issues such a summons, by instruction of the mayor on community business, and the word of the mayor shall be sufficient to warrant levying a fine on a defaulter.

3 February 1391

Henceforth when certain men are elected as collectors of taxes imposed on the town by the king, they shall render true account [of the money collected] before mayor and community and deliver the tax money to the chamberlains.

No record of a tax assessment on the community for a previous year should be used as a basis for a subsequent assessment; the assessors should arrive at their assessment based on current information.

Early 15th century **

No man, regardless of status, may himself or by deputies lay in wait at watergates, highways, or entryways into the town in order to forestall or buy corn, grain or other victuals before they reach the market for sale (as custom is), upon pain of confiscation [of victuals thus purchased] and imprisonment.

Early 15th century **

No butcher, whether townsman or country-dweller, may sell corrupt or unsuitable meat in the market, upon pain of [its] confiscation and [his] imprisonment.

Early 15th century **

All retailers of ale are to close their doors at 9 o'clock in the evening.

The terms used to describe these retailers are "camerers, tapsterys, [gannokers and sellers of ale".]

Early 15th century **

Fishermen bringing fish by cart or by boat to sell [in town] must bring them into open market and sell them by their own hand; the fish is not to be concealed but laid out for sale openly, as is ancient custom in Lynn, so that no huckster or forestaller can interfere, upon pain of [its] confiscation and [his] imprisonment.

Early 15th century **

Every man who keeps pigs within the town is to keep them in their sties every day, except on Saturday afternoon while [the sties] are being cleaned, upon pain of 1d. fine paid to mayor and community for every default as often as they [i.e. wandering pigs] are captured by the town officers appointed to that duty.

A borough-employed pig-keeper is seen in 1360/61, and may be implied in the [ordinance of 1331. A further ordinance against wandering pigs was made in November 1427, when it was allowed to whoever captured a loose pig to keep the animal unless the owner redeemed it for 4d.]

Early 15th century **

Every man is responsible for keeping the area in front of his house clean of dung or other filth, upon pain of 4d. fine every Saturday that a default is discovered.

8 January 1420

Because on many occasions discussions in the Guildhall have been made public, to the damage of the mayor and the town, it is ordained that any burgess spreading rumours or revealing any Guildhall deliberations shall be amerced 20s.

[This was probably a measure at the tail-end of over ten years of political strife, to help prevent any recurrence. However, it also reflects a typical medieval borough concern with secrecy, often stated in custumals or in the burgess' oath.]

Manner of giving holy bread

A resident of a tenement worth 20s. annual rent or more shall make an offering of holy bread and a candle. If the tenement is divided among several residents but the total rent exceeds 20s. annually they may jointly offer holy bread and a candle, and each make a contribution according to the amount of his lease. If there are several shops under one roof and the [total value of the] lease is 20s. annually, they may jointly give holy bread and make a contribution according to the amount of each's lease. If it is a capital tenement which has other tenements under one roof (not separated) and the capital tenement is worth 20s. annually or more it shall give holy bread without any contributions being made [by the adjoining tenements?]. If this [capital] tenement is not inhabited, then the adjoining tenements – so long as their [total] lease is worth 20s. annually and one of them that is inhabited is worth at least 6s.8d annually – shall jointly give holy bread and each make a contribution according to the value of each's lease. If there are three tenements or shops situated together, with each of them worth 6s.8d annually, they shall give holy bread in the same fashion. If there are two inhabited tenements situated together and one is worth 6s.8d and the other 13s.4d annually, they shall jointly give holy bread [contributing] according to the value of each's lease. With the proviso that no tenement or shop that by itself is worth less than 6s.8d annually or that is inhabited by mendicants should be obliged to make any contribution towards holy bread.

[Holy bread (panis benedictus) was a loaf that was blessed after Mass and then cut up for distribution among parishioners. Mendicants may refer here to the friars who had taken a vow of poverty, or simply to poor people. In 1428 this ordinance was reconfirmed after some debate about the question of shared contributions by multiple residences under a single roof.]

Penalty on those warned to come to the hall

All burgesses summoned by the common sergeant to come to the [gild]hall and failing to appear before the hammer is struck for the second time shall pay 4d. If he sits down before paying the 4d., he must pay 8d. If he absents himself for the duration of the whole meeting, he must pay 12d. If, on the next time he returns to the hall he sits down before paying the 12d. or offering to the assembly an excuse for his absence, he shall be fined 2s. to the use of the community.

["Burgesses" here likely refers to the members of the recently instituted Common Council. A very similar ordinance was passed in October 1425 and it is difficult to know whether that above is simply a variant draft, or an earlier ordinance on the same subject. The 1425 ordinance applied to the jurats, councillors and chamberlains who arrived after the mayor had taken his seat (4d. fine); 8d. was the fine for sitting down without offering an excuse, 2s. for failing to offer an excuse for being absent for an entire congregation, and 4d. for any jurat refusing to sit in a particular place designated by the mayor. There were evidently periodic ordinances on this matter, for in October 1421 the corporation confirmed an earlier ordinance (record of which has not survived) imposing a fine of 12d. on any jurat or councillor failing to attend a congregation when advised to do so, and 4d. fine for arriving late (again defined as after the mayor had taken his seat).]

Penalty on manucaptors of anyone acting against the community

No burgess is to be manucaptor or pledge for any man or woman in any legal matter concerning the town liberties which may result in mayor and community suffering a loss of their liberties or financial loss due to damage to the liberties, on penalty of 6s.8d fine.

November 1423 ***

Penalty on butchers not using the Saturday Market

Anyone not selling meat in the section of the Saturday Market set aside for that next to St. Margaret's shall be disfranchised unless he make amends according to the decision of the mayor.

December 1423 ***

Penalty on chamberlains not coming to the hall

At every assembly held there should always be at least two [of the four] chamberlains present when summoned by the common serjeant-at-mace, on the same penalty as for burgesses, unless they have a reasonable excuse for not coming.

Manner of registration of judgements by the jurors

Each and every judgement given in future by the mayor and jurors, at the request of parties, concerning view of land, shall be enrolled by the common clerk in the Red Parchment Book. He or those to whom the judgement is given in favour shall pay 40d. to mayor and jurors (or wine of that value if they prefer), 8d to the common clerk, and 4d to the common sergeant-at-mace. If anyone is summoned by the sergeant to come to be a juror and fails to come, he shall pay 40d. to the use of the community.

View of land might be required in pleas concerning property and involved a [jury known as the Magna Jurata, which would determine rightful ownership. On this see the Ipswich custumal.]

Manner of enrolment and admission of apprentices

From this time onwards anyone, whether merchant or craftsman, shall during the first year [of the apprenticeship] bring his apprentice to the gildhall before the mayor and common clerk, so that he [i.e. the apprentice's name] may be enrolled – just as merchants have been accustomed to do since ancient times. As was the case in ancient times, the common clerk shall be paid [by the master] 4d. for the enrolment. After the completion of at least seven years [of apprenticeship], or the term specified in the indenture [of apprenticeship], the craftsman or his executor shall bring back the apprentice to the gildhall before mayor and common clerk, so that he shall be issued by the clerk with a written record that he is free to practice his craft, without paying any fee, until he has reached the age of twenty-one. If, upon reaching that age, he is found through interrogation of reliable witnesses to be free-born, well behaved, and able to bear the burdens of a member of the community, then he will be admitted into the franchise according to ancient custom. With the proviso that no-one shall be admitted to the franchise unless he has faithfully completed the [apprenticeship] term of at least seven years.

[The key feature of this was that craftsmen's apprentices were to receive the same treatment at those of merchants, who had long been entitled upon graduation to enter the franchise without admission fee. This concession must have been hotly debated, and we are told that a speaker for the craftsmen, Robert Brod, put forward the egalitarian argument "quod est una libertas in villa, unum iuramentum et unum finem [sic]" ("that there is one franchise in the town, one oath and one fee"). The record of this ordinance was inserted in the Hall Book on a separate sheet (schedule) immediately before the folio recording Brod's declaration. The interrogation of the apprentice, before grant of the franchise, also required the right answers to the questions: whether the apprenticeship term had been properly completed; and whether the apprentice had bought or sold anything for his own profit since completing the apprenticeship. If the graduated apprentice did not take up the franchise before embarking on a career, he lost the exemption from an entrance fee.]

9 August 1425 ***

Penalty for not coming to the exequies of John Burghard, and the manner of seating the 24 in St. Margaret's choir on feast days

The mayor, with the 24, chamberlains and common councillors shall gather together at St. Margaret's church for the annual obit of John Burghard, on pain of 12d. fine for non-appearance without a reasonable excuse. All [members] of the 24 who are present at the celebration of any religious festival shall seat themselves in the choir in an orderly fashion, on pain of 12d. fine for each default. The chamberlains shall reimburse them for their oblations, from borough revenues, when they attend these services.

The last sentence was a slightly later addition, in the same hand as the ordinances that followed. Burghard was a leading merchant of the 1320s and '30s, several times mayor. His will (1339) made unusually large provision for charitable bequests, including to the poor and infirm of Lynn and to the repair of public roads and bridges; many of his property bequests were conditional upon the perpetual commemoration of the anniversary of his death, and much of this property – along with the obligation of the obit, to be attended by the mayor – was [bequeathed to the borough by one of Burghard's daughters. The ordinance has been struck through, although this was probably a consequence of the Tudor Reformation.]

Penalty for those ordered by the mayor to come into hall and refusing

If the mayor calls on anyone to take a seat and he refuses to do so, he shall pay 4d. each time he refuses. And if anyone, after silence [is called for] in the hall, is clearly seen to go on talking, to the hindrance of silence, [he shall pay] 4d.

Penalty for showing favour to anyone acting against the community

If someone shows favour or gives support, by word or deed, to anyone acting against the liberties in any way, and the one thus acting is examined in the presence of the mayor and convicted, he who supported him shall pay 6s.8d to the use of the community. And if that person repeats [his offence] by favouring or supporting the convicted party against the conviction, by word or deed, and this is proved, he shall pay as great [a fine] as he who was condemned.

Penalty for chamberlains refusing to pay to the order of the mayor

If any chamberlain refuses, when instructed by the mayor, to make any payment or pay any expense that is for the benefit and advantage of the town, so long as it does not exceed the revenues he has been assigned to collect, for the first offence he shall lose his annual fee, for the second offence [he shall pay] 20s., for the third offence 20s., and so on. If any member of the 24 or the common council, or any other burgess, shows favour or gives support in word or deed to such a chamberlain, he shall pay 20s. to the use of the community.

Anyone fishing with nets in the town ditch, without licence from the mayor and community, shall be fined 20d. and their nets, baskets and other equipment shall be confiscated. Anyone who informs on such offenders shall have one-third of the money from the fine.

[This was not strictly speaking an ordinance, but a general decision stemming from a specific offence.]

July 1426

A carrier having offered his services for disposal of refuse, for 66s.8d a year, it is ordained that every householder shall pay a base fee annually of 5s. a year, with additional amount determined by the value of his rent (increasing in amounts of 1/2d. per level) and 1/2d. per beast owned. Each constable shall select a resident of his ward to assess the appropriate amounts.

All inhabitants of [residing beside?] the Old Lynn and Mercer Row fleets shall clean them by 24 June next, on pain of 40s. from each inhabitant who fails.

The sewer [or privy] at Gannock [gate] is to be repaired by the chamberlains as quickly as possible. All constables of the town, with [the aid of] persons living in their constabularies, are to clean Mill Fleet from Gannock gate to Mintling.

21 January 1443

All victuals or coal brought to the town by outsiders may not be bought by burgesses except in the Corpus Christi [gild] hall, assigned for that purpose, and between the hours of 2 p.m. and 4 p.m., upon pain of confiscation of the victuals or coal.

January 1445

The keeper of the east gate is empowered to confiscate any townsman's grain that has been ground [by a mill] outside town; the offending baker shall pay 6s.8d to the use of the community.

March 1446

Coopers of the town shall be under the supervision of the mayor regarding their barrels, so that barrel of herring have a 30-gallon capacity, and half barrels and "feryndell" contain the correct quantity; and each barrel of beer is to have the same capacity, and similarly with half barrels and "feryndell".

[A ferndell was a measure that was probably equivalent to a quarter barrel.]

14 December 1446

Elections of churchwardens of St. Margaret's, which may be held every year if necessary, are to be made by 8 persons, with the mayor nominating the first 2 electors who shall choose the remaining 6. Anyone elected and refusing office shall pay 13s.4d.

[The borough had long been appointing churchwardens, so the principal issue here seems more with affirming that right and setting out the practice, perhaps in the face of some discord on the matter.]

2 August 1448

No mayor is to have his reward until the chamberlains' account has been written onto a parchment roll, and shown to the council [i.e. audited], and they are acquitted. Nor is any mayor, under penalty of £10 fine, to have possession of any gold or silver belonging to the community, unless he receives it by the hands of the chamberlains then in office.

[The "reward" referred to was a sort of performance bonus, above and beyond the mayoral salary; what started out as an ad hoc reward for some incumbents had, by this time, become a standard payment expected by each mayor. Here the council seems to have been trying to ensure that it was not automatic, but linked to fiscal responsibility if not profitability.]

No resident of the town shall take on as a servant any man or woman until first ensuring that the servant has faithfully completed his/her term with the previous master.

November 1449

No resident of the town shall (after next Christmas) own sleds or carts that are shod [with iron], but shall have unshod carts and also "bouges" for carrying water. Anyone delinquent in this shall forfeit the shod vehicles. The custodians of the town gates [shall warn] others living outside town that after Christmas they may not bring beyond the gates carts lined with iron.

[I am not certain what a "bouge" was, but suspect it to have been a type of cart – perhaps one that bulged like a barrel; in the 19th century "bogie" was a term used for a cart, and in the 20th century it was being used for railway vehicles (some of which were barrel-shaped). Presumably the implication here is that the shod vehicles were being used to transport water. The issue addressed by this ordinance was probably related to damage done by such vehicles to paved streets.]

29 August 1455

No-one who occupies the office of mayor shall again be chosen to that office within the period of five years following.

1 October 1456

If it is proved that any capital pledge conceals any offence against the articles of the leet, then he shall be amerced the same amount that would have been assessed on the concealed offence.

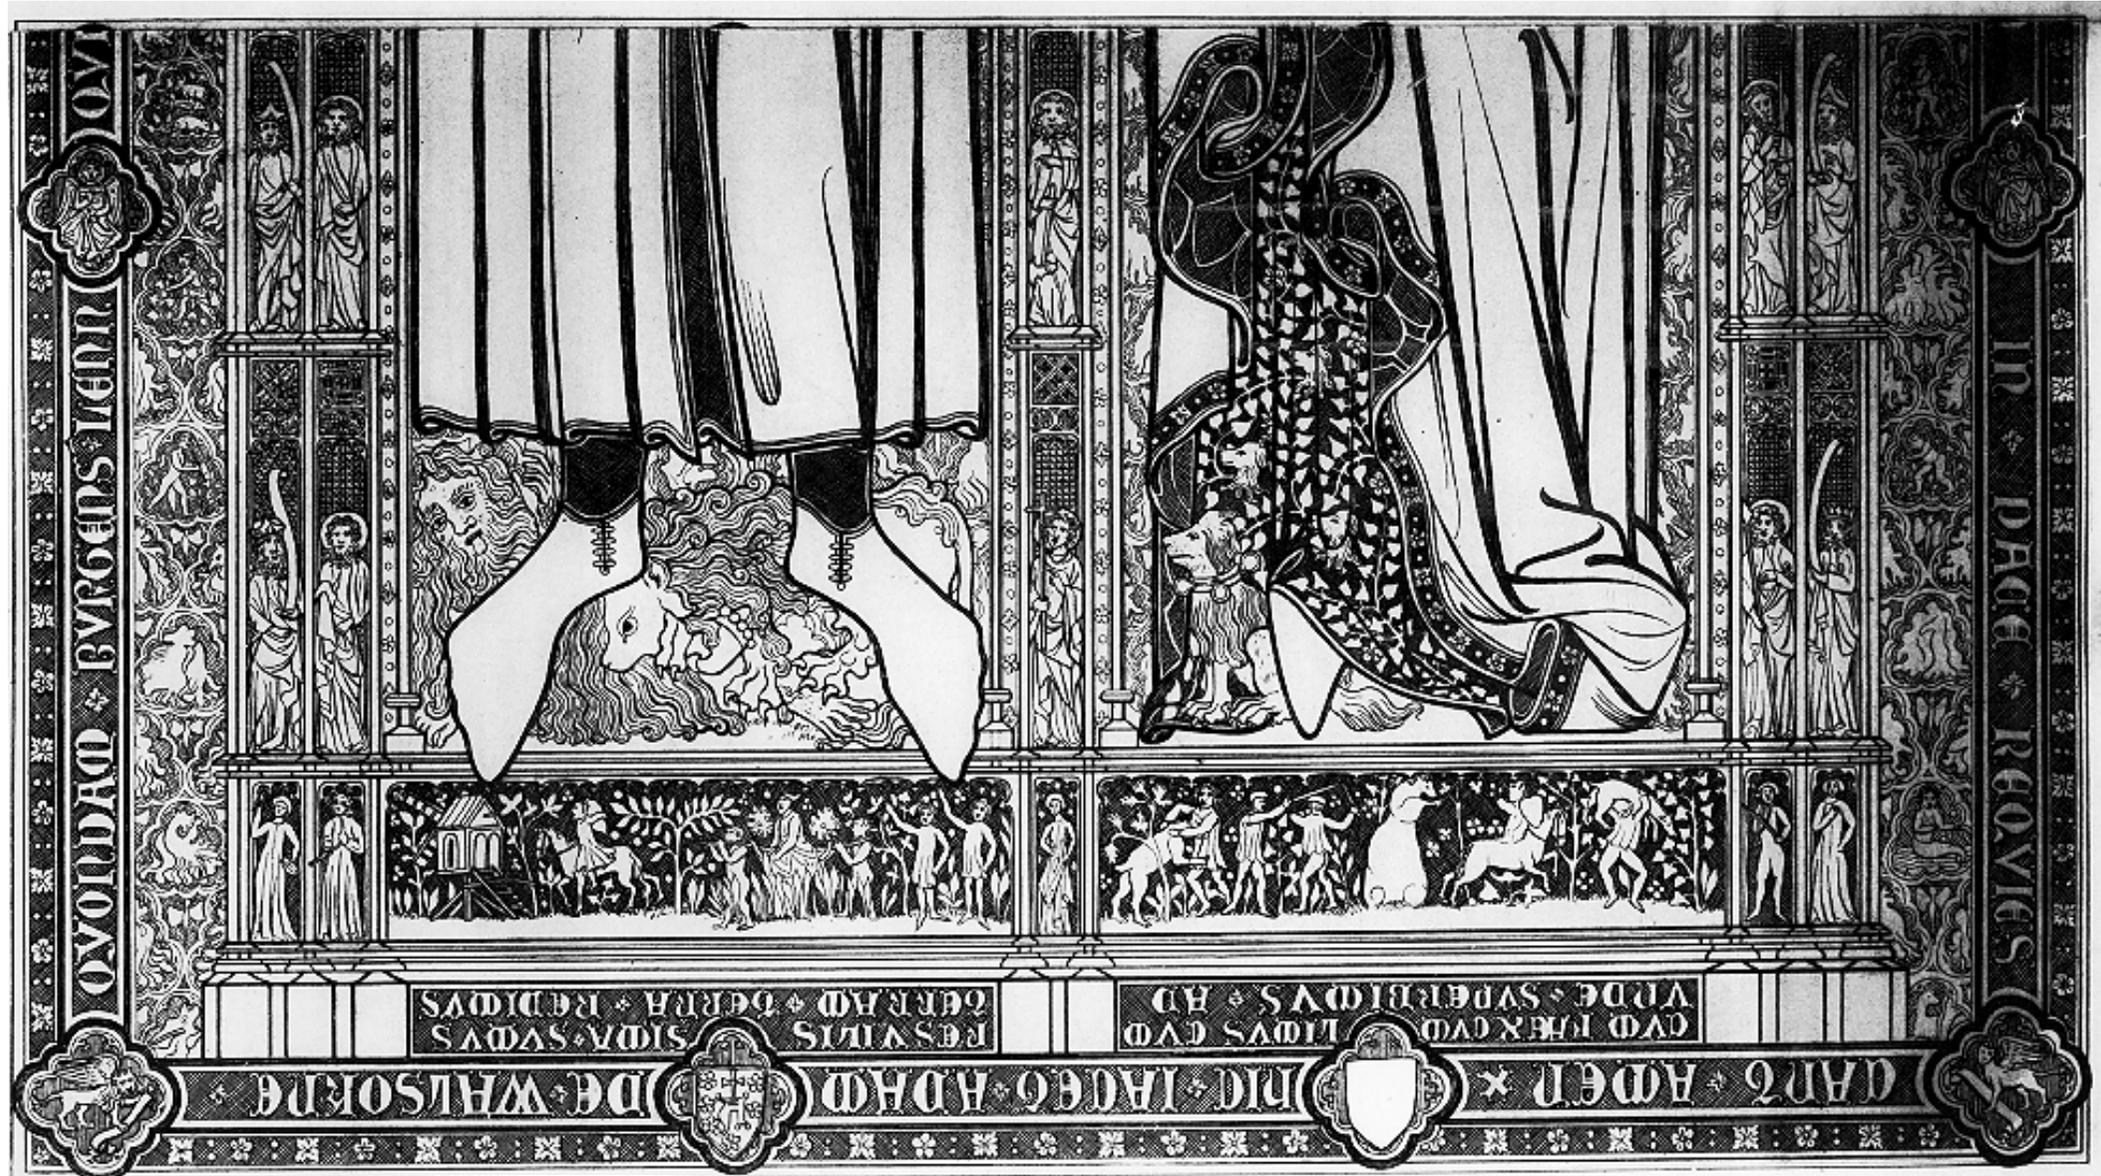

2 September 1457

Every constable, with [all members of] his whole constabulary in person or by a suitable deputy, shall keep the nightwatch when it is their turn. No-one who is under 21 years of age shall participate, however. Any householder failing to participate shall be fined 4d.

6 April 1459

If any burgess henceforth seeks [from the king] a commission of gaol delivery without the assent of mayor and council, he shall be fined 100s. and have to pay all the expenses of the commission.

CONCLUSION

October 1272

To strengthen the ability of the bailiffs in administering and enforcing these ordinances, 24 wise men of the town have been chosen and have been sworn to obey a summons from the bailiffs – upon pain [, if they default to answer, of a fine] of 6s.8d to be levied the morning after [their default], without remission. If the bailiffs are negligent [in levying this fine?], they shall pay £4 to the profit of the community. If the jurats are found guilty of failing to maintain the king's peace to the best of their ability or to uphold these ordinances, they shall pay £26.13s.4d to the king. Anyone supporting a jurat who fails to submit to this, shall likewise pay £26.13s.4d to the king or, if he lacks the means, shall be put in prison for a year and a day. If any [townsman] complains in a foreign place [i.e. an external court] about the 24, or anyone else of the town, to their damage or conviction, he shall be similarly punished to the king's use.

South Gate

Also known as the Great Gate. When the deputy-lieutenants advised on the defence of the town in 1625, they considered the East Tower of this gateway to be a very convenient place upon which to plant a "murdering piece." In later times a telegraph was erected on the West Tower.

The ceremony of shutting this gate every night was continued down to the 18th century, for in 1724 an order was made "to pay Goody Ely 35s. a year for cleansing, opening, and shutting the South Gate."

Why it is so called is unknown. The name appears at an early period, but is sometimes spelt "Poding." The open space to the north, within the wall and adjoining the precincts of the Priory, was called Pudding Yard. (P. viii p.26).

Chamberlains are to provide themselves with a building where they shall be in attendance twice a day, viz. two hours in the morning and two hours in the afternoon, if necessary, in order to receive and collect from merchants, both denizen and alien, customs duties which rightfully belong to the town. Often in the past the goods and merchandize of denizens and outsider merchants, on which custom ought to have been paid, have been falsely presented by men of this town and others privileged [to trade without paying custom] as their own property, thus concealing and withholding the customs to the loss and damage of the town. Therefore it is ordained that whenever any ship or boat, whether of this town or any other place, is freighted or loaded with merchandize within the liberties of the town, [whether bound] inward or outward, the owner of the ship or boat if present, or in his absence its master, shall each time be brought by the water-bailiff before the chamberlains in the said assigned house, there to take oath on a book as to whose goods they have as cargo, so that the town custom may be honestly paid without any fraud or deceit, excepting the customary freedom [from paying customs] cities, towns and other enfranchised places.

Welcome to the Florilegium SEARCH

THL Stefan li Rous (Mark Harris, stefan@florilegium.org)

This is a collection of files that I have assembled from various sources since I first joined the SCA (Society for Creative Anachronism) in 1989. The information in these files comes from the Rialto newsgroup (rec.org.sca), the old fidonet medieval echo conference area, various mail lists and articles submitted to me by their authors.

Florilegium Tile Project

I would like to remind folks of the Florilegium "Tiles of Many Media Contest" that will be held at the upcoming Lilies War, Pennsic War and Knowne World A&S Collegium. "Huh, you say? I've never heard of this before.". No, probably not, for it is only a little over a month old. What is it? Well, from the website, "The purpose of this display is to show in a uniform way the great number of different media/ artforms that are done in the SCA, as well as to encourage folks to try media which they have not worked in before."

In other words, create a tile using an artform done in the SCA period of study, whether that artform was used for creating tiles in the Middle Ages or not. Bring it to one of these two events or send it with someone, and we will organize these tiles into a large display showing what folks in the SCA can do. To encourage folks to try new artforms, anyone may enter multiple tiles, but only one tile per artform.

How about a tile with your device on it made of sugarpaste? Or one carved into wood? Or done in tooled leather? Or blown into glass? Or if you tend to break ceramics, a tile mosaic? Are you better working with embroidery or calligraphy? Thin media can be backed with another material to create a stiff tile of the appropriate size. How about copperworking or other metalwork?

While this project is meant to show the arts done in the SCA, it is not meant to be confining or stuffy. While documentation would be nice to have on the various artforms, it is not a requirement. So, think of various period artforms and how you might be able to adapt them, and have a fun time with this!

More details can be found at this site:

Just as this display is meant to show what SCA folks from across the Known World can do in the Arts, I also welcome volunteers from across the Known World to help out with this project either at these events or beforehand.

Several types of files are available:

- -msg (or no suffix) These files are composed of a variety of short messages from a variety of authors having a common subject .
- -art A stand-alone article written by a single author. Some are off of the networks while some were submitted to me by the author.
- -bib A bibliography of book and article titles on a single subject.

- -FAQ An article file that follows a Frequently Asked Questions format.

WANTED - Article Submissions

I am always looking for additional articles for the Florilegium. The copyright remains with the author and I will accept or remove an article upon request by the author. Short articles written for local newsletters are often good candidates for the Florilegium, as are longer papers written as Arts and Sciences contest entries and even Master's Theses. Bibliographies, especially annotated bibliographies, are also desired. Even class notes that you may have assembled for a class you taught may make good submissions.

To contact me about submissions, write to me at: stefan@florilegium.org)

Bad Links

I try to do my best to ensure that all links that you find in the Florilegium are correct. It bothers me when you can't get to a file you seek here due to a bad link. However, because of the constant updating that this site undergoes, bad links do creep in. If you find a non-working link, PLEASE let me know. The sooner I know about it the sooner I can fix it.

To contact me about a broken link, write to me at: stefan@florilegium.org)

What's a Florilegium?

Literally, it means "a gathering of flowers". Florilegia were collections of choice tidbits (from Ovid, Aristotle, various popes, church scholars, etc) arranged topically.

Typically, a florilegium is huge, encyclopedic, and contains only choice selections from particular works. Example, Ovid's Metamorphoses would be too long to include in its entirety and might suggest some of the wrong ideas (from a Church viewpoint), so only those works that offer clear exegetic or moralistic exempla would likely be included. Thus, a florilegium would probably not include Nestor's account of the battle of the Lapiths -- the tale pokes fun at Nestor, at old men attempting to claim wisdom solely based upon age, and (less directly) at Homer. A florilegium probably would contain the tales of Midas, however, because they provide lessons on the evils of greed, pride, and gossip.

I hope you find these files useful, interesting, amusing or all three.

St Nicholas Church

Chapter II

St Nicholas Church 1870

"Say, sacred edifice, thiysself with years

" Grown grey - how long hast stood

" Thy weather-braving tower, and silent marked

"The humanleaf in constant bud and fall ?

" The generations of deciduous man

"How often hast thou seen them pass away !" - Hurdis.

Five rows of lime trees form pleasant avenues from the Marketplace to the Parish church, (many old and decayed trees have, in late years, been removed and new ones planted. It is earnestly to be hoped that the hand of innovation, more destructive than that of time, will never be permitted to displace them altogether) of which sacred edifice it is no part of the design of this work to give a history, as that has already been done in the Continuation to Manship (p.109).

We have seen that, soon after the permanent settlement of the inhabitants, a small church, dedicated to St. Bennet was erected. This, at the commencement of the twelfth century, gave place to a much larger structure erected by Herbert de Lozinga, the first Bishop of Norwich, completed. in 1119, and dedicated to St. Nicholas, the patron of mariners (Before the reformation the model of a ship was suspended in this church, as an emblem of the patron Saint; for says Peter of Langtoft -

"The bishop, Saint Nicholas, his help is ay redie

" To shipmen in alle cos, when thei on him crie."

Sir William Denny, in his Pelicanicidium, likens a church to an inverted ship. "The roof," says he, "is the keel; the walls, the sides; the floor, the deck; the east end, the prow or forecastle; the central tower, the mast; and the west end, the poop.")

It was very different from the church which we now see, for it consisted of a portion only of the present nave, having small aisles with lean-to roofs, a central tower, small transepts and a chancel.

Some Norman work still remains; and when the south aisle was taken down in 1869, for the purpose of being rebuilt, the Norman tower, with its superstructure of early English, was laid bare, and its original proportions distinctly seen (Among the additional M.S.S. in the British Museum (Kerrick's Collections, 6,751 and 6,759), there is a ground plan of St. Nicholas' church, before the aisles of the nave were enlarged, from which it appears that there was then a chancel transept. Floor Plan)

As the town augmented in population and wealth, so did the church of St. Nicholas increase in size, until it became, as it now is, the largest Parish church in the kingdom. (It covers more ground; measuring in length 230 feet, by 108 feet in breadth. Its internal superficial area is 238085 feet, whilst the areas of its nearest rivals are as follows: -

St. Michael..... Coventry.....23,080.

St. BotolphBoston.....22,270.

St. NicholasNewcastle 20,110.

Holy TrinityHull.....20,036.

Holy TrinitySouthwark18,200.

4,000 persons can be accommodated on the floor of St. Nicholas' church.)

The borough rolls are full of entries respecting the repair and enlargement of this church from time to time, some of which are very curious. In 1296 John, servant of Gilbert de Hardele, sued Simon le Parmenter, for breach of contract for not providing a ship to carry stone, for the use of St. Nicholas' church, he having received 2s. " in earnest." The plaintiff recovered, and the defendant was amerced.

Large as this church is, there was, nevertheless, an intention of extending it; for in 1330 a new building was commenced at the west end, called "Bachelor's aisle," as its cost was to be defrayed by the young men of the town. It was to be 107 feet from north to south, and 47 feet from east to west. Considerable progress had been made, the walls being sixty feet from the ground, when the works were suddenly stopped by an outbreak of the plague. They were never resumed, and what had been erected was allowed to fall into ruin. The walls however remained until 1650, when some of the great stones were taken down and carried to the haven's mouth, where they were employed in the repair of the piers. In 1658 Colonel Briscoe and Lieut-Colonel Stile obtained a further portion to be employed in strengthening the fortifications; and, 1714, the churchwardens obtained a faculty from the Bishop of Norwich (This faculty is printed in extenso in the East Anglian, vol. ii. p. 208.), authorizing them to pull down what thus remained. of the "new work," as it was called, and to use the same in the construction of St. George's chapel, and thus an interesting and magnificent ruin was finally destroyed.

St. Nicholas' church probably attained to its greatest state of magnificence towards the close of the 15th century. It was then open from end to end; the windows were filled with stained glass, (Upon opening a door at the foot of one of the turrets at the west end in 1847; some bushels of minute fragments of stained glass were found, no doubt the remains of demolished windows.) the walls were covered with poly-chromatic decorations ; and the floor enriched with sepulchral brasses. A stone reredos, richly carved and decorated, stood at the back of the high altar (An altar stone, marked with five crosses, was discovered some years since. In the wills of the 13th. and 14th centuries may be found numerous bequests to the high altar), which latter was laden with rich and massive church plate and. jewelled, reliquaries. (Sacrilege was in the middle ages considered one of the blackest crimes, yet it was occasionally perpetrated. In 1348 a chalice was stolen from St. Nicholas' church, but was recovered by the bailiffs in a broken state, and it was by them delivered, in the presence of witnesses to a silversmith to be repaired. Previously to the reformation, this church was particularly rich in plate (see F., p.88; and P.C., p.116); and possessed some relics which were much prized, especially some oil supposed to have been consecrated by St. Nicholas, the gift of Prior John Hoo, and a holy thorn set in silver. There still grows in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem a peculiar thorn, specimens of which are occasionally sent to this country, and preserved in the cabinets of the curious). Other altars there were in. the chancel aisles, and in the numerous side chapels belonging to the several guilds or to private persons of influence and importance, (For an account of the guilds and their chapels, see M. i., p143). A richly-carved. rood loft stretched. across the west, end of the "middle aisle" of the chancel, upon. which a cross was displayed; and lights burned day and night before the images of saints, dispersed throughout the church (Some of the stone steps, leading to the roof loft on the north side, still remain with the aperture for the door; but there is no vestige of a screen).

Benedictine monks in the costume of their order, and singing men in surplices had their appropriate seats, while the services of the church were performed by priests and chaplains, dressed in magnificent robes, varied in accordance with their degrees, the duties they had to performe, and the season of the year. Black (of which there were several velvet copes, some of them spangled with gold, and others with bells of gold), were seldom worn, except on Good. Friday, Rogation Days, and on occasions of mourning. Violet was also a mournful colour. Red and. purple were used on occasions of great solemnity; of these there were two copes of red satin of Bruges, and others of red velvet (Red is still worn by Roman catholic priests in England on the anniversary of an English saint's martyrdom). There were tunics also of red satin and velvet.

Green and blue (the emblems of faith and. hope) were used on particular festivals; one vestment of green was wrought with birds, another was of branched silk, and another of velvet: of blue velvet there were several copes. White signifying purity, was worn on the festivals of confessors, virgins, and angels. The principal vestment, composed of cloth of gold., and eleven tunic were the gift of Sir John. Fastolfe.

In Process of time the seeds of the reformation, sown by Wickliff which had long been germinating, began to bear fruit; and early in the 15th century, the bishop of Norwich was called upon to suppress the heressies which were spreading in his diocese.

In 1428 Margery, wife of William Backster, a wheelwright at Martham was accused. The evidence against her was given by another woman, named Joan Cliffand, who deposed that being asked by Margery what she did every day at church, she answered that she kneeled down and said five paternosters in worship of the crucifix, and as many Ave Marias in worship of Our Lady, upon which Margery denounced the worship of images as being of no avail. Having stated her belief that the sacrament of the altar, after consecration, was the very body of Christ, Margery denied it, giving cogent reasons, and affirmed that such doctrine had been "falsely and deceitfully ordained by the priests, to induce simple people to idolatry." She denied the necessity of fasting in Lent, or on other days appointed by the church, saying that people had better eat their fragments of meat on such days, than "goto market and bring themselves into debt to buy fish." Margery also asserted that it was useless "to go on pilgrimage, either to our Lady of Walsingham or to any other saint or place;" and offered that her husband should come secretly at night to Joan, and "read the law of Christ unto her." It seems that Margery had some suspicion of Joan, for she said to her - " it appeareth by your countenance that you intend. to disclose what I have said to you," but Joan sware she would not. Then Margery said to her "if you so accuse me "unto the Bishop of Norwich, I will do unto you as I once did unto a "certain friar, a carmelite of Yarmouth, who was the best learned friar "in all the country." Margery had rebuked the friar for begging, saying that it was no alms to give him anything, unless he would leave his habit and go to the plough, which would please God more than following the life of some friars; and at his request she " declared to the friar the gospel in English." Afterwards the friar accused her of heresy, and she made a counter accusation against him, "for which her husband would have killed him;" and so the friar, for fear, held his peace " and went his way for shame." Margery also told Joan that she would never confess to a priest, "because he had no power to absolve any man from his sins," but that "men ought to confess themselves only unto God. It was also proved against her that, upon going to Margery's house on Saturday after Ash-Wednesday (horrible to relate) a brass pot was found standing over the fire, with a piece of bacon and oatmeal seething in it. The depositions in this case raised nearly all the questions at issue, between the catholics of that time and those who protested against what they believed to be the errors of Rome. Ecclesiastical censures and severities were able for a time to suppress the "new doctrines," but could not extinguish them. They continued to spread until some of the priests themselves were converted to them.

In 1535, whilst Sir Cotton, a priest, was preaching a sermon in the parish church, William Swanton, a chaplain, openly denounced the practices of Rome, maintaining that no honor should be given to saints, or to the pictures or images of them within the church; that a christian man profited nothing by praying for their intercession; and ended by saying that holy water was "good sauce for a capon." He was supported by twenty-four persons, and a great tumult took place. Six years afterwards four merchants openly derided the elevation of the Host, speaking "heretical words;" and Thomas Hammond, a fish-merchant, bargained with one Thomas Alleyn for the sale of a last of white herrings, within the church during divine service. These disorders called for suppression, and the offenders were fined; and the corporation made an order that whoever thereafter disturbed or "disquieted" any preacher, "should be committed to ward, there to remain at the discretion of the bailiffs." Some account of the further progress of the reformation and of the subsequent ecclesiastical affairs of the parish, will be found in P. C., p. 147. (A popish priest at Yarmouth having sent up to the privy council certain questions concerning the sacrament of the Eucharist, the same were referred to J. Boleyn and John Foze, who answered them. Harl. M.S.S., No. 416).

The church books inform us that, in 1465, there was in the church "our lady's organ," and in 1485 they speak both of the "old organs" and the "new organs," and in the following year the "great old organ," and in 1550, "Jesus organ." Manship says that, when he wrote in 1619, there was in the chancel on the north side, "a fair pair of organs," and near thereto sat eight priests and "a competent number of singing men." Organs continued to be used in the reformed churches until the puritans got the upper hand.

By an ordinance of Parliament made in 1644, "no organs were to remain in churches, choral books were to be torn, painted glass windows broken, sepulchral brass inscriptions defaced, and cathedral service totally abolished;" notwithstanding which the people of Yarmouth contrived to preserve "a fine old organ " until 1650 when it was destroyed. At the time of the restoration not a single instrument is known to have been in existence throughout the kingdom: and nearly a century elapsed before an organ was replaced in this church, by which time the chancel and north aisle and north transept had been separated, and divine service was performed in the south aisle, the nave itself being occupied by a huge gallery.

The organ of St. Nicholas' church was built by Jordan Byfield, and Bridge, at that time the best organ builders in England, who had agreed to unite their talents so as, without competition, to produce the best instruments that could be made. It was erected in 1733, and to celebrate the opening, a sermon (afterwards printed) was preached by the Rev. Dr Macro, (from Eph. V19), in which he cautions the organist not to let "the harmony of its sounds be frisking, airy, or ludicrous, which tends to dissipate the thought and break the attention of the mind."

This organ was long considered as the best in England for the excellency of its tone. It has lately been enlarged by Hill and. son, of London, under the advice of Mr. Henry Smart, at an expense of £800; and, under a faculty obtained for the purpose, it has been removed from the west end of the south aisle to the north transept.

The following is a description of the organ as now constituted: (This noble instrument is ably presided over by Mr. Henry Stonex, a pupil of Dr. Buck of Norwich. The appointment of organist was long in the hands of the corporation, and during the last century there have been organists, good, bad, and indifferent. The most distinguished were Heighington, Eager, and Warne. Previously to the appointment of Mr. Warne, "the blind organist," there was one whose musical talents were appreciated solely by his father, a very aged man. On one occasion, when the son was playing his best, the father exclaimed, "a second Handel!" "Yes," said a stranger who sat next him, "quite a second-hand one." As the organist was utterly regardless of the vocal accompaniment, the playing and singing were seldom in accord.)

In the vestry there has been long preserved a very curious library table, having six shelves for books suspended between two discs, and so regulated by concealed wheels, that, in revolving, the shelves remain horizontal, thus allowing the reader to consult a large number of open books spread out upon them.

(See illustration . A copy of this desk, made by Mr. Norman, of the Market place, is now in the library of the Middle Temple).

Upon removing the plaster from the west side of the south transept in 1869, a noble early English doorway, of remarkable delicacy of detail, was uncovered, of which no living person had any remembrance. It is represented on the page, and may have been the "marriage door," mentioned by Manship.

.Old English Doorway

It was anciently the custom for a couple about to be married to appear at a particular door, where the priest joined their hands and performed the greatest part of the ceremony. They then entered the church and proceeded to the altar, there to receive the nuptial benediction and to hear mass.

Chaucer, in his Wife of Bath, says-

"She was a worthy woman all her life,

Husbands at the Church Dore had she five"

The origin of this custom may be traced to the desire, which prevailed from the earliest times, to make the ceremony as public as possible. Many years elapsed, after the disruption of Roman Catholicism in this country, before the nuptial ceremony was wholly performed within the church. Selden affirms that dower could only be lawfully assigned at the church door; and Littleton says that the bridegroom "when he cometh to the church door to be married there, after affiancing and troth plighted, endeweth the woman of his whole land, or of the half, or other lesser part thereof, and there openly doth declare the quantity and the certainty of the land she shall have for her dower."

The unusual position of this door, which has every appearance of having been an external one, was probably occasioned by the south transept being connected with the priory by a cloister, so that the priests and monks could alone enter by the south door.

The tower and spire of St. Nicholas' church were always conspicuous as a land and sea mark; and in 1798, when an invasion was apprehended, the churchwardens were provided with a red flag, which if hoisted was to be repeated from every church tower in the county, to communicate an attempted landing as rapidly as possible.

The Spire was 186 feet high. It was struck by lightning in 1683, and the woodwork having ignited, the fire was extinguished by John Grice, for which service lie was presented by the corporation with a silver tankard, having a view of the church engraved upon it; and the same man, in 1695, was paid £4 for taking down and putting up the weathercock. When this spire was removed, the flat top of the tower was used as a telegraph station. (In 1732 "a man," says Ives, sen., "slid from the church steeple upon a rope.")

There appears to have been a bell foundry in Yarmouth, for a bell in Martham church bears the name of "Thomas Doo, bell founder of Yarmouth, 1674." (*Rev. J. J. Raven, who in 1869, published The Church Bells of Cambridgeshire, and has extended his researches in campanology into other counties, the result of which it is to be hoped he will give to the world.*)

The sessions rolls afford evidence that at an early period the church was fled to by malefactors as a place of sanctuary. If such an offender could reach the churchyard, without being apprehended, and there confess his crimes before the coroner or bailiffs, he was allowed to abjure the realm; a limited time being fixed within which he was to leave the kingdom at some appointed outport. Thus, in 1295, Richard Clerk of Norwich placed himself in the church of St. Nicholas, and acknowledged to have killed John Russell, and to have broken out of prison. He was allowed to take ship at Southampton within a month. In like manner, Simon Blaking confessed to several robberies and to have broken out of prison, and afterwards killed a Martham man. Port was given him to transport himself within fifteen days.

It was formerly considered necessary when one man undertook to pay another a sum of money, to specify the place where such payment was to be made; and, down to a late period (in bonds given as a primary or collateral security), it was customary to name the south porch of St. Nicholas' church for this purpose. This was not altogether imaginary, for in ancient times such payments actually took place in churches, until, by a proclamation of Queen Elizabeth, they were prohibited. Nevertheless the porch continued to be named as a place for the payment of money; for Mr. Warnes, by his will, made in 1694, directs an annuity, which he gave to Anne Markant, the sister of his widow, to be paid "yearly on the 1st of May, in the south porch of the church of Great Yarmouth."

The congregation has always been a very large one. Never probably were they more disturbed than on St. Andrew's day, 1544, when, during divine service, it being Sunday, news arrived that two French ships had pounced upon two crayers, then riding in Yarmouth roads laden with wheat for the King's service at Boulogne, and were making off with them. The townsmen "presently betook themselves to armour, and having manned a ship, pursued and overtook the enemy, and after notable skirmishing rescued the prizes, and brought six Frenchmen found in them prisoners to Yarmouth, where their purses paid passage before their departure."

During the seven hundred years this church has been in existence, how many eloquent sermons have been delivered in it! No preacher, probably, ever excited more commotion than did Dr. Camil, rector of Bradwell, in 1724. His sermon gave great offence to "a certain person of great power in the town," who summoned some of his brethren to meet him, and then sent for the clergy, and "made a violent speech," ending by telling one of them to inform the doctor that he "should never come into the pulpit again." Upon this Camil published his sermon to prove that it only contained "some warm expressions against the crying vices of the age," and insinuated that "the cap fitted." "For my part," says the preacher, "I am resolved to cry out and spare not; and the scandalous and opprobrious usage which the ministers of Christ sometimes meet with, shall not frighten me from discharging my duty; and neither the frowns of the great, nor the threats of the wicked shall hinder me from telling the house of Jacob their iniquity, and the house of Israel their sin." (There is an engraved portrait of him. His great grandfather came from Scotland and settled at Gisleham in Suffolk, in 1583. The original name was Campbell; and he bore gyronny of eight or,' and sa, a crescent ar. He died in 1732. Fancy the mayor offended at a sermon, calling the council together, and reprimanding the clergy, for too much freedom of speech in the pulpit!)

Dean Davies, when in Yarmouth, took the following method of rebuking the congregation for their impatience of long sermons, When the preacher had, one Sunday, finished his morning discourse, the Dean rose in the reading desk and commenced the afternoon service. "The grinning congregation," says Doran, "who found themselves subjected to this discipline would have been a study for Hogarth. (Saints and Sinners:- How startled would have been the congregation, in former times, to have seen a black man rise in the pulpit and deliver a sermon! This was Bishop Crowther; his ample lawn sleeves contrasting strongly with his face and hands.)

The floor of this church was filled with the graves of those who in their day were the most considerable burgesses. Unhappily the numerous brasses which recorded their names and deeds were, in 1551, ruthlessly torn from their stones and sent to London, there to be cast into weights for the town's use. (It might have been asked, with Dr. Corbet, the witty Bishop of Norwich, "

"Tell me, ye antii-saints, why brass,

With you is shorter-lived than glass ?

And why the saints have scap'd their falls,

Better from windows than from walls ?"

for it is said that some of the stained glass, with which the windows of this church were once so rich, remained until the end of the last century, when every particle was carefully removed.

A better taste now prevails; the first of a proposed series of memorial windows in the south aisle, is one in remembrance of the late Charles Cory, Esq., town clerk, erected by public subscription. It was designed by Mr. Seddon, the figures by Mr. Rossiter, and the glass executed by Messrs. Saunders.

Some few incised slabs alone remain. So utterly were all funereal monuments in this church defaced, that when Weever visited Yarmouth he could find no inscription or epitaph save this one-

"Elyn Benaker, mercy doth crave;

God on her soul, mercy mote have."

Since that period the chancel, transepts, and north aisle have been almost re-paved with sepulchral slabs, bearing inscriptions to the memory of many whose names will be recorded in these pages. Of those buried in this church and the adjoining churchyard, who were neither natives nor residents, or who cannot be connected with any particular locality, mention will be made in a separate chapter. (The most ancient monuments were conceived in a spirit of great piety and simplicity. Those of more modern date frequently exhibit a false taste, and bear -

"-the marks of earthly state,

And vain distinction."

Others display-

"The pride of heraldry and pomp of power";

nevertheless their mutilation or removal is unjustifiable end contrary to law. We all know that-"Sepulchral columns wrestle but in vain

With all subduing time; whose cank'ring hand

With calm deliberate malice, wasteth them."

But this inevitable result ought not be hastened by the hand of man.)

We are told by Manship, that a carnel or charnel house, built in the churchyard, was "fully finished" in 1308 by Sybilla, the widow of William Flath, "a woman of singular virtue and dignity;" for the purpose of containing the bones of the dead formerly there buried and again cast up by the making of new graves; and to enable her to do so she obtained a licence from the bishop of Norwich and a bull from Pope Clement V., subsequently confirmed by Richard II. Over it she built a mortuary chapel, "wherein divine service was by two priests, for that purpose by her appointed, solemnly performed." She died in 1311, having first endowed the carnel with an ample revenue arising from the rents of houses, vested in the corporation, who appointed two of their number to be "collectors of charnel rents." (F. vi., M. p.39, and P. C. p.115)

This chantry was dissolved at the reformation, the building fell into ruin, and in 1588 was levelled with the ground; the stones being employed in constructing the lower wall of the mount, to guard the town against the Spanish Armada; there says Manship, "to defend the bodies of the living, as they had previously done the bones of the dead." The latter were removed and buried under the east wall; and ultimately the lower part of King Henry's tower, at the N.E. corner of the churchyard, was appropriated for that purpose, and is now filled to a considerable height, so that entering the tower from the churchyard, the living may stand upon the bones of many generations. In the Cottonian view of the town this carny is depicted, standing in the S.W. part of the churchyard, of an oblong shape, having a turret or pinnacle at each corner; but there was nothing to mark the spot, until, in lowering the path leading from the church gate to the west door in the present year, a portion of the foundation, of a most substantial character, was laid bare.

Since the publication of the Continuation to Manship's History, considerable progress has been made in restoring St. Nicholas' church, under the advice of Mr. J. P. Seddon.

The central tower has been reinstated, the Norman work being carefully preserved; and the four corner pinnacles have been replaced.

The chancel proper has been carried out to its original extent; and after the lapse of two centuries the church has been thrown open from end to end. A new oaken ceiling in panels, divided by ribs, has been placed on the middle aisle of the chancel.

The south aisle (except the lower portion of the west gable internally) has been entirely rebuilt from the original foundations. The noble triplet at the west end, formerly hidden by the organ, has been restored. The seven south windows, originally early English (subsequently filled with perpendicular tracery), have been rebuilt in the early geometrical style, alternately varying in detail. Between each pair of these windows, a buttress finished with a gabled canopy rises to the level of the parapet. A new roof of Memel timber has been placed on this aisle, of better construction than the old one, which had become decayed, and had thrust out the south wall. The ceiling, which is of oak, is of an elegant arched form (instead of the former awkward waggon shape); and is divided into panels by moulded ribs, and the original bosses with their shields of arms and curious emblems have been replaced.

The pinnacle at the S. W. corner has been rebuilt from the foundation, to allow of which a huge modern buttress of red brick covered with cement had to be removed.

The works remaining to be done are :-To rebuild or thoroughly repair the west gables of the nave and north aisle, and rebuild the three dilapidated pinnacles; to replace the present ceiling in the north aisle by a loftier one, corresponding with that in the south aisle; to bring the great south porch into harmony with the new work; to rebuild the south transept, replacing the present perpendicular south window with one of early English, and to substitute for the present debased windows in the south aisle of the chancel, others corresponding with those of the south aisle; to restore the two east windows of the chancel aisles, and to put in these aisles new carved ceilings of panelled oak; to fill all the windows with stained glass, of patterns and colours harmonizing one with the other; and to crown the whole by placing a loftier spire upon the present tower.

St Nicholas Church was destroyed by a fire bomb in the second world war and then rebuilt

After King Johns' Charter

Now that the King's reeve was no longer with them, the burgesses elected from among their own a number of four provosts or bailiffs to govern them, as their royal chartered had ordained. The town was then divided into four districts. Each bailiff looked after his own particular ward, and it was he who was responsible for public behaviour and the maintenance of the watch. By 1269, the fifty-third year of the reign of Henry III, the system was beginning to be over stretched, and the bailiffs were complaining of being overworked. King Henry, in response agreed that the town should appoint a further twenty-four burgesses called jurats to help the bailiffs.

So the town was governed for over hundred years until 1386, when 24 citizens were elected to form a common council and assisted the 24 jurats and the four bailiffs to administer the town. However over time the number bailiffs halved and a little later it was recorded that the 24 aldermen represented the burgesses and the 48 councillors the common people. This was to be the first sign of decay in the true democratic spirit in Yarmouth, and gradually a few wealthy families prospered and began to take control of the town.

Acts from the Monarchy and Parliament came and went with each one restricting the rights of the townsfolk and giving massive benefits to the few with voting rights and freemen. Aldermen and councillors alike feathered their own nests and those of their friends. Lucrative posts within the Corporation were given to blood relatives and so corruption was happening left, right and centre. In 1834 to make there position secure Aldermen and Councillors saw to it that they were elected for life!

But this was not to last forever and in 1835 after many year of protesting being heard throughout the length and breadth of the country, Parliament created the Municipal Corporations Act. This piece of legislation gave voting powers to all ratepayers and it was they, and not a privileged few, who elected their councillors for a term of three years. The councillors elected the aldermen, who were expected to serve for six years, and these two sections, together with a mayor to control meetings, formed the town council, and apart from one or two changes still works in much the same way today.

The wardens who are to be elected and chosen for the awarding of herring to the community shall be given their oath every year on Michaelmas [September 29] or the day after at the latest. They shall honestly and impartially award and assign to the community its share of all fresh herring that is brought to the quay by any fisherman, regardless who may be his host, except [in cases where] the fishermen are townsmen or are being hosted by [one of] the bailiffs. No herring are to be awarded, neither for bribe nor through favouritism, to any man who resides outside of the town, only to the community – that is, every man dwelling in the town, according to his status, be it last, half-last, one thousand, or half a thousand. They may take for their labour, 4d. from every last, 2d. from every half-last, 1d. from every thousand, and a half-penny from every half thousand, as per an old ordinance made in the past. The wardens shall honestly collect and levy the money for the herring that they award to the community and shall deliver it, or have it delivered, to the hosts, so that the fishermen are not ill-served through default in payment. If any warden acts contrarily to any aspect of this ordinance, he shall pay 10s. fine for each proven fault, without any remission.

[I am uncertain whether the central part of the ordinance implies that the share of herring allowed to townsmen would vary according to their status ("degre"), although this could simply refer to their means to pay. The term which I have translated as "bribe" is in the original "mede" which was used at that time for a money payment such as a reward.]

If any man refuses to be subject to gage and pledge, or will not be attached, then he is to be put in prison and left there until he submits to justice.

October 1272

If anyone goes about armed in peace-time, unless at command of the king, he is to be disarmed and put in prison until he finds surety for making amends for his disturbance of the peace.

October 1272

Anyone found wandering at night is to be put in prison until he finds surety for keeping the peace.

Any burgess who suffers distraint or arrest in a foreign place, [i.e. elsewhere than Yarmouth] in order to make payment [of a debt] due from [one of] his neighbours, may recover his losses and damages from that neighbour. If the neighbour lacks the means to make reparations, he shall be put out of the community until able to make them; if afterwards he is discovered conducting mercantile activities in the town, he is to be imprisoned until he settles [with the injured party].

This ordinance refers to a common practice, such as occurred in cases of [withernam: if a merchant of Town-A, while visiting Town-B, incurred debts to a burgess of Town-B, but failed to pay them, the burgess of Town-B could seek payment through distrain upon the goods of any burgess of Town-A who happened to be in Town-B – this being a concept inferred from the notion of community. If unjust by modern standards, this was a pragmatic solution to the problem that the Town-A merchant (if no longer in Town-B) could not be obliged to come to Town-B's court to answer in a plea of debt, while had it been possible to bring the case before Town-A's court, the defendant might receive favouritism from the judges. Consequently retribution was from one of the debtor's "neighbours" (i.e. fellow-citizens), thereby in effect making him the surrogate of the creditor in seeking repayment of the debt in the court of Town-A, where a case between two members of the same community would receive more equitable treatment. The reference to being put out of the community means disfranchisement rather than exile.]

Every host may claim [the exclusive right to purchase] a one-third share of the merchandize of foreign merchants whom he is hosting. The other two parts are to be divided between the principal buyer and those [burgesses] who are present [at the making of the bargain] and claim a share (other than the principal buyer).

July 1300

All merchandize [of the hosted merchant] is to be sold by the hands of the host – excepting herring and other fish, which is to be sold by the fishermen.

July 1300

The third part [of a cargo of merchandize] which is hostage may not be sold by the host to foreigners but only to his neighbours [i.e. fellow burgesses].

July 1300

Because some people who claim a share in merchandize fail to pay their part of the price, the principal buyer shall receive [at the time of the claim] from each claimant 2s. in the £ as part payment. Anyone refusing to give this shall forfeit his right to a share.

July 1300

Anyone breaking these ordinances shall pay a fine equivalent to one-fourth part of the merchandize that he claims; if he lacks the money to satisfy [this fine?], then for every £ [due] he shall be imprisoned for 8 days.

July 1300

Anyone who harbours at the quay must unload his cargo for at least a day, so that any burgess wishing to may claim the right to buy a share.

July 1300

Herring are to be sold only in the quantity of 11,000 per last; ling and "Iceland fish" at the quantity of 164 per hundredweight if in a dogger, or 144 per hundredweight if in a "trohwer".

[A "last" was a term for a load applied to certain types of goods (not exclusively fish); the Statute of Herring (1357) seems to define a last as 10,000. "Iceland fish" likely means cod. A dogger was a broad two-masted fishing-boat used in the North Sea. A "trohwer" was presumably a trawler.]

July 1300

All merchants are to pay fully and honestly for merchandize [they purchase] according to the terms of the bargain. etc. reiterating the [1272 ordinance.]

July 1300

No man who owns a fish-house is to hire it out to a stranger for purposes of fraud or collusion, or he shall pay [a fine of] 6s.8d per last of the said fish-house's capacity. If the owner lacks the money to pay, then the fish-house shall be confiscated by the community, as security for payment.

A fish-house was where fish were hung for drying and smoking. An ordinance on the same subject in [1491 seems to imply that the concern may have been competition with the curing activities of burgesses. However, the reference to "fraud and collusion" is mystifying, unless there was an additional problem of the owners of the fish-houses misrepresenting the outsiders' fish as their own when it came time to sell them.]

Because disagreements and discords have arisen among the burgesses and community of the town of Yarmouth, and have increased due to lack of good government and maladministration of, or failure to uphold, the ordinances and laws in earlier times made, ordained and established by wise and sensible men (burgesses of the town);

And because [of the need] to resolve and quieten the said disagreements and discords, with the goal of restoring and building an amicable peace and unity to the honour of Almighty God, and to the increase of the common good and prosperity in the town;

The bailiffs, burgesses and community of the town, assembled on Tuesday before the feast of Easter in the 6th year of the reign of our sovereign lord king Henry VII , by the good and sensible advice of the right worshipful James Hobart, the king's attorney, then being present, intending to provide a remedy in this matter, it was fully decided and agreed by their common assent that two burgesses, John Peers and John Tanne, should nominate and select 10 other well-disposed burgesses to join them, and those 12 should after consultation amend and reform the old ordinances and apply their discretion to formulating other ordinances and reforms such as to prevent the difficulties that recently caused the said disagreements and discords.

Whereupon John Peers and John Tanne nominated to join them John Russe, William Albon, William Aldrich senior, Robert Baret, Christopher Moy, Nicholas Moore, Stephen Watson, John Borell, William Patenson, and Richard Osteler, well-disposed burgesses of the town. Which 12 burgesses thus selected took upon themselves, for the honour of God and the increase of the common good, the task of reforming the old ordinances and creating additional ordinances, as follows, to endure perpetually by the grace of God.

[The first six of these 12 had already served as bailiff; 3 others were to take that office within the next 3 years. It seems probable that the committee therefore represented the perspective of the ruling class. The committee took several months over its task; they applied their personal seals to the document on 22 August.]

Each year on August 29 a common assembly is to be held in the community house for the election of bailiffs and other officers, according to ancient custom of the town. Each of the 24 [jurats] and of the 48 [Common Councillors] who is in town shall – without any excuse, except for illness or some particularly good reason – be present at this annual assembly without having to be summoned, upon the following penalties: 20s. [fine] on each of the 24 who fails to appear by 9 o'clock, or 10 o'clock at the latest; 10s. on each of the 48 who similarly fails, to be forfeited and levied without delay for the use and profit of the community. None of those who are absent are to purpose to go out of town that day without a very good reason, upon the same penalties.

[The last sentence probably referred to an attempt to avoid the fine for non-appearance by pretending an absence from town.]

Henceforth, he who is bailiff one year shall not be bailiff [again] for five full years afterwards. Each time that one of the 24 (whoever he may be) presumes to break, or by any subtle means or collusion causes to be broken, this ordinance in any way, and is found guilty thereof by sufficient evidence, shall pay a forfeit of £40 – half to the king and half to the profit of the community – to be levied on him or his goods. If any of the 12 persons [of the electoral committee] is obstinate and, for favour or through ill-will, presumes to behave contrarily to these ordinances and impose [his will] on part or all [of the choices], each that does so and is found guilty shall pay a forfeit of 40s. – half to the king and half to the profit of the town. This ordinance is to be read out each year by the steward, or his deputy, to those 12 persons when they take their oath at the election, so that they are well advised of their responsibility; and the steward or his deputy shall assign them their task and administer the oath, according to the form and intent of these ordinances.

[We may infer from the opening part of the ordinance that bailiffs were selected from the 24 jurats – something which appears to be the case a century earlier, although the evidence is too scant to be certain.]

August 1491

The bailiffs shall execute the office of bailiff and administer justice well, honestly and impartially, delivering justice to the poor as well as the rich, according to the law and the good customs of the town, and [they shall] observe, preserve and maintain all franchises, liberties, ordinances, customs and statutes of the town. They shall punish according to their deserts those breaking or rebellious against these franchises, ordinances and statutes, as well as those breaking the king's peace; the bailiffs and chamberlains (or two of the said chamberlains with them at least) shall affeer and assess the fines and amercements of such evil-doers, according to the seriousness of the offence. The bailiffs are to levy, or make to be levied, the said fines for the profit of the town; they are in no way to meddle with any revenues – that is, rents, farms, fines, amercements, wrecks, waifs, strays, forfeitures, customs (by water or by land) – or with any other manner of thing accumulating profit for the town. The bailiffs are to acquit and discharge themselves of all types of charges relating to the king's fee-farm of the town, as shall hereafter be more fully laid out in another ordinance on that subject.

[N.B. that it was not until 1494 that the bailiffs acquired, by royal charter, the authority of justices of the peace.]

August 1491

Each year the chamberlains are to collect and receive all the customs called murage, and honestly [i.e. without any fraud] deliver the same to the muragers, by [record of] indentured bills to be made between them. At accounting time the chamberlains are to give an honest account of their receipts and of the delivery of the murage money, and the muragers are to account under oath for the expenses [paid] therefrom.

August 1491

Henceforth the auditors may allow the 4 chamberlains, upon the rendering of their annual account, £4 – that is, 20s. each – by way of a reward for their labour and their attendance [at the accounting], to encourage them to be diligent in carrying out their duties as specified by these ordinances.

August 1491

Whenever the revenues for the accounting year produce a clear surplus (all expenses being paid and the chamberlains' fee and other allowances being made) of £4, then the bailiffs who were in office during the accounting year shall have the £4 by way of a reward, for their gowns [i.e. towards the cost of their ballival liveries], to be divided evenly between them. All revenues accounted for in any year that exceed the said £4 shall be deposited in the common chest for the profit of the community. Whenever it is found from the chamberlains' accounts that the profits, revenues and receipts are not sufficient to cover the reasonable expenditures for that year, those who were bailiffs during the accounting year shall bear the cost between them to the sum of £10 (maximum) and thereby preserve the town [from debt]. And if the expenditures exceed revenues beyond the amount of £10, the bailiffs then in office are to set [a date] for a common assembly within four days after the account is audited, so that a satisfactory solution may be commonly agreed for acquitting the bailiffs and chamberlains of the deficit beyond the £10 to be borne by the bailiffs. So that these ordinances may be better observed and kept, the chamberlains shall be sworn upon a book at Michaelmas, according to ancient custom; if any newly-elected chamberlain refuses to accept the office, or is negligent or contrary and will not do as these ordinances prescribe, he who is found to be in default will forfeit 40s. to be levied to the profit of the town and also be deprived of his burgess status.

Whenever any owner or master of a ship or boat within the haven or streams, loaded [with merchandize] of burgesses or outsiders, proves obstinate and refuses to come before the chamberlains to take an oath, as per these ordinances, then his ship or boat is to be attached without further ado. The ship or boat is to remain under attachment until he [i.e. the owner or master] has paid a 20s. fine for his resistance to authority, to be levied to the profit of the town. And notwithstanding [this fine], the owners are to pay their customs to the town without any pardon.

[The "streams" referred to were probably the local rivers that fed into the estuary channels surrounding the site of Yarmouth.]

August 1491

Whenever it can be shown hereafter that any person, by fraud or deceit, falsely pretends or claims the ownership of any goods or merchandize with the intent of denying the town the customs duties on them, he who makes the false statement shall forfeit 40s. for each fault proved without reasonable doubt and also lose his liberty and burgess status forever.

August 1491

All receivers [of revenues] for the town, viz. chamberlains, churchwardens, muragers, haven reeves [? water-bailiffs?], collectors of the half-doles, keeper of the hospital, keeper of Our Lady's light, and keeper of the sick men's house, with all other accountants, shall once a year render a due and clear account before the bailiffs then in office, the bailiffs of the previous year [i.e. the year in which revenues were collected], and at least two of the auditors. This audit shall be held in the tolhouse each year on the first working day after New Year's Day, continuing day by day until each of the accountants has rendered account of all revenues and receipts received and payments paid, for and to the use of the town and church. All the accounts are to be recorded in fair books within 14 days after New Year's, regardless of any other business occupying [the clerk]. The bailiffs shall also, a week before the day appointed for the audit, send an officer to the auditors and to the accountants giving them notice to keep the appointment at the tolhouse. If any of the auditors is at home [i.e. in town] and able to come to the audit but refuses to, he shall pay 20s. fine (half to profit of the town and the other half to the use of the bailiffs). If any of the accountants absents himself and refuses to come to [give] his account on the day assigned, he shall pay a fine of 20s. (half to the town and half to the bailiffs). These fines are to be levied by the bailiffs within four days after anyone makes default [in appearance]; if they are obstinate and refuse to pay the fine when first asked, or argue with the bailiffs about the default, then the bailiffs may send them to prison no matter who they are, there to remain until the fine is fully paid, without any remission. However, so often as two of the auditors and two of the chamberlains attend [the audit], the other two who fail [to attend] shall not be fined for that.

["Fair book" refers to the making of a more legibly written copy of accounting records in an official volume; this copy may also have amalgamated the separately kept accounts of each chamberlain and organized items of receipt and expenditure differently from the sources from which the information was copied.]

Henceforth the fine of every new burgess who is to be made [i.e. permitted to enter the franchise] by advice of the bailiffs and chamberlains, is to be affeered at a minimum of 20s., to be collected for the profit of the community. Those who have the means are to be asked to pay more, according to an old ordinance under the common seal of the town which is kept in the common hutch.

August 1491

Henceforth, for evermore, those who are the children of burgesses and were born in Yarmouth shall be sworn to the liberties of the town when they reach the age of 20 years. Hereafter, he who refuses to be sworn shall forfeit 10s. each year after he has reached the said age, for as long as he remains unsworn, to be levied to the use and profit of the community.

[It was probably too well understood to need specifying that males alone were being referred to in this ordinance.]

August 1491

No comburgess or inhabitant of the town shall initiate or bring any suit, action or cause against any other burgess or inhabitant [of this town] in the Court of the Admiralty nor in any other foreign court, spiritual or temporal, concerning any matter of covenant, contract, debt, or [other] matter capable of being judged in the king's court within this town; unless the matter has [already] once been tried in the court before the bailiffs. If any man acts contrary to this ordinance, he shall pay for each fault 40s. fine, to be levied half to the profit of the town and the other half to the profit of the bailiffs; if he is frequently found to be committing this fault, he is to lose his burgess status forever.

August 1491

If any burgess, whether principal [party in a plea] or pledge, sues a writ of error upon any record or judgement given in the king's court here, and if the judgement is not reversed at a higher level in the King's Bench, and [with result that] a writ of execution is issued for the party [to whom judgement was originally given], then he who sued the writ of error shall pay a 40s. fine, half to the profit of the town and the other half to the profit of the bailiffs.

[The aim here was to discourage frivolous appeals.]

August 1491

Whenever any man is summoned to take part [as juror] in an inquest between one party and another, and he fails to appear, wilfully absenting himself, he will be allowed grace at the first default, but for the second default is to be amerced 3d., for the third 6d., the fourth 12d., and thus doubling with each further default. The bailiffs are to levy these ameracements to the profit of the town, without any remission. The chamberlains are to account for the same at their audit, based on entries [of the ameracements] to be made in the [court] records by the steward.

No alien dwelling within the town, no matter what nationality he may be, is to act as host to any man, nor give bed or board, except for his own servants and children, upon penalty of 20s. each time he is at fault in this, to be levied by the bailiffs (without any remission), half to the profit of the town and half to the profit of the bailiffs.

[I have assumed that this refers to hosting in the narrow sense of taking responsibility for visiting merchants and guiding their mercantile activities while in town – something that was the prerogative of burgesses. However, it may perhaps refer to being a host in a broader sense.]

August 1491

When any member of the 24 or 48 is duly summoned to come before the bailiffs at any place within the town, for the holding of a council [session] or to give help to the town, and absents himself and fails to appear before them at the appointed hour, whoever of the 24 is absent is to forfeit 12d. on each occasion and whoever of the 48 is absent is to forfeit 6d. to the use of the town, unless they have a legitimate excuse; levy [of these fines] is to be made immediately or[, if not possible,] a distress is to be taken by the officers, wherever it [i.e. distrainable property] may be found, and brought into the Tolhouse, there to remain until the fine is paid.

During fishing season, when English fishermen come to the quay with herring, each fisherman shall come ashore to his host; and that host shall sensibly and wisely buy his herring for the best [bargain] that can be achieved, as much for the benefit of the community as for himself. If it happens that they cannot agree on a price, and the fisherman quits his host with the intent of obtaining from another man a higher price than the current market price, it is ordained that no man shall involve himself in any way nor offer to buy the herring of a fisherman who has quit his host, unless the host permits and consents to it. Of all such herring bought by a host, he is honestly to make available to the community its share, by assignment of the wardens; viz. half of all fresh herring that are brought to the quay. The community shall take its share both of old herring and new, paying for them the same price at which the host bought them, without the host scheming to take any profit. If any man, no matter what his status, presumes to act contrarily to any aspect of this ordinance, and is found guilty in that respect, he shall pay a fine of 20s. to the profit of the town each time he is found in default, to be levied by the bailiffs within 3 days – or else he is to be sent to prison, there to remain until the fine is paid without any remission.

In the past it has happened that irresponsible persons have prematurely gone aboard fishing-boats [while still] at sea near the town, and have bought the herring catches without permission from the hosts, at an excessive price to the serious damage of both the hosts and the community, as well as contrary to ordinances made in times past. It is therefore ordained and warned that no man shall in any way interfere or offer to buy herring from any fisherman [while] at sea, excepting the hosts; if the host is not present there [i.e. when someone tries to make a bargain] then the fisherman is to come ashore to his host, who is to buy the herring for the best [bargain] that can be achieved. And those persons present when the bargain is made for such herring are to have their share, as has been the case in times past. Whosoever acts contrarily to this ordinance shall for each fault pay 20s. fine to the use of the town as previously indicated.

August 1491

Nowadays various residents of the town rent their fish-houses to denizen outsiders, so that the said outsiders make [i.e. cure] their own herring there, as freely as any burgess of the town, to the damage and impoverishment of those burgesses, and contrary to statutes and ordinances made on 4 July 1300, which statute is under the common seal of the town as more plainly is indicated in the no matter what his status, shall rent any fish-house nor other houses or yards to outsiders for making either white or red herring by any fraud or collusion. If it is sufficiently proven that any resident has done so, he shall pay to the profit of the town a fine of 10s. for every last of herring so made in any house or yard; if he lacks the means to pay the fine, or the property whereof a distress might be taken, then the party at fault is to be attached and taken to prison, to remain there 14 days for every last of herring, without any prospect of bail or mainprise.

August 1491

When any of the 24 dies, or is removed [from office] for a legitimate reason, the bailiffs and their brethren [i.e. the remaining jurats?] shall choose a replacement from the wisest and most able townsmen who are not aliens nor the children of aliens. Each newly-chosen member shall take oath well and truly to maintain, execute or cause to be executed – without any favouritism, partiality, bribe, ill-will or malice – all ordinances and by-laws made by this town or in future to be made for the common good, profit and politic rule of the town. Also, no member of the 48 is to be expelled from that council, nor any new member elected, without consulting the common assembly.

Henceforth the bailiffs shall, at least once [during their term of office], in person or by suitable deputy, carry out upon the waters and streams within the full extent of the jurisdiction and liberties of this town a search for unlawful drag-nets, trammels, bow nets or other nets, or hurdles made, set or used contrary to the laws, statutes or ordinances made for the common good. Periodically (at least once a year), information about these infractions is to be presented to a panel of 12 men, chosen and sworn to enquire into all such infractions, without any concealment; fines and amercements stemming from the same are to be levied by the bailiffs to the profit of the community.

August 1491

When any burgess of the town buys any kind of merchandize [carried] in any ship or ships coming into the liberties of the town, or [at sea] in front of the town, from outsider merchants (whether aliens or denizens) who are coming to him or are sent to him as host: if the merchandize is worth £13.6s.8d or more, then the host buying the merchandize may have a one-third share for his own use and the other two parts are to be divided between those [burgesses] who are present at the making of the bargain and wish to claim their share. If any such merchandize coming within the town liberties is bought by a burgess other than the host, then the host may have a one-quarter [share]. The principal purchaser thereof shall have a share equivalent to that of two men, and the remainder is to be divided among those present when the bargain is made. This ordinance is to apply to all types of merchandize except fresh herring and fresh fish brought in by fishermen. And because some men will claim a share in merchandize when they are present, and afterwards will "stand at large" [hold off in paying for their share?] until seeing if the bargain is profitable, it is therefore ordained that the principal purchaser shall receive from every merchant who makes such a claim 2s. in the pound as part payment in advance (that is, 2s. for 20s., 4s. for 40s., more for more, and less for less), as per an old ordinance made in times past.

Concerning every ship loaded with coal or salt, to the volume of 10 weys of salt or more, that hereafter is bought within the liberties of the town by any burgess of the town or by some other man not resident in the town, the bailiffs shall have a proclamation made around the town about the sale of such coal and salt, with the intent that members of the community may claim part of it for their own use, at the same price for which it was [originally] bought; [such claims may] extend up to the amount of one-quarter of the coal and salt, without the [original] buyer taking any profit therefrom. If it is proven that any man acts contrary to any point of this ordinance, he shall pay 40s. fine, half to the profit of the town and half to the profit of the bailiffs, without any remission.

The chamberlains, in consultation with the bailiffs and the 24, shall periodically when it is necessary correct and renew the required common weights and measures at the cost of the community, the chamberlains to be allowed [the expense] in their account.

[The common weights and measures would have been the town-owned standards used for judging the accuracy of privately owned weights and measures.]

At least once a year between Martinmas [11 November] and Christmas, the bailiffs are to impanel 20 of the "best dysposed" of the 48, [who] are to be summoned to appear before them in the Tolhouse on a certain day set by the bailiffs. There, these ordinances are first to be read out to them, [then] they (or at least 12 of them) are to be sworn and charged to make enquiry about all who have broken or disobeyed any aspect of any of these ordinances, and are to render a true verdict on the matter. If any of those summoned to be impanelled on the enquiry defaults [in appearance], he shall be amerced 12d. for the first default, 2s. for the second, this doubling with each further default. If any of those impanelled and sworn, to win favour [possibly, for a bribe] or out of preferentiality or fear, avoids presenting any person (whatever his status) who has broken or caused [others] to break any of these ordinances, or conceals such offenses, and that offense is afterwards discovered and presented by another inquest, then every member of the first jury shall pay a fine of 40d. for concealing the offense, to be levied to the profit of the community.

[The descriptor "best dysposed" could be interpreted in different ways, although my personal guess is that it means those members of the Common Council thought most likely to comply with the summons.]

Whenever hereafter it may happen that the bailiffs, through preferential treatment or negligence, fail or refuse to enforce any aspect of these ordinances, or for the same reasons fail to punish and properly correct the breaker or breakers of the same, or refuse to levy any fine or amercement that has been affeered or assessed upon anyone for breaking or disobeying any aspect of the ordinances, and the bailiffs' faults are discovered by the verdict of [the inquest of] 12 men [held] before the bailiffs who succeed them, then every [former] bailiff found deficient shall for each fault pay a fine of £5, to be levied on his goods to the profit of the community.

August 1491

Because of the great need and desirability that all men be aware of the aforesaid ordinances and that they are properly enforced, they shall be publicly read out to the community twice a year, viz. on 29 August and again the first Friday of Lent. Responsibilities related to the same are to be read out periodically by the steward to those who are to be charged and sworn to inquire about those who break or disobey the ordinances.

CONCLUSION

Boudicca, Queen of the Iceni, led a revolt against the Roman military in AD 60-61

The Iceni were a Celtic tribe living in Norfolk and Suffolk in eastern Britain. Due to flourishing trade across the English Channel with the Roman empire, their merchants and rulers prospered, issuing their own coinage between about 65 BC and AD 61. Near the end of this period, following the Roman invasion of Britain under Claudius in AD 43, king Prasutagus (AD 50-60) became a rich and powerful client of the Romans. After his death, however, the Roman administrators in Britain made the Iceni a subject population.

Boudicca, widow of Prasutagus, now became queen of the Iceni. After she and her two daughters were subjected to grave humiliations by the Romans, she led a revolt of the Iceni and several other tribes which lasted for several months in 60-61. The Boudiccan forces burned and destroyed the three major towns of Londinium (London), Verulamium (St. Albans), and Camulodunum (Colchester), killing many thousands of citizens.

The revolt was eventually suppressed in AD 61 by the Roman military governor, Suetonius Paullinus. The story is told in the Annals of Tacitus, written about AD 110-120. Tacitus had a special interest in Britain because his father-in-law, Agricola, became governor of the Province in AD 77-85 after a successful military campaign in Wales and the north. This campaign, together with some details on the native Celtic tribes, is described in the book Agricola by Tacitus, written in AD 98.

The silver Iceni coin shown above was buried in a hoard along with hundreds of similar coins during the Boudiccan revolt. These were minted in great quantities in order to finance the rebellion. After their defeat in AD 61, the Iceni were resettled in a civitas capital at Caistor-by-Norwich (also called Caistor St.Edmunds), located along the River Tas. The site may be visited today, along with related exhibits at the Norwich Museum.

Maldon.co.uk - Moot Hall

The information portal for Maldon residents, businesses and visitors

The Moot Hall as it stands now is a 16th century building, purchased by the Corporation of Maldon as its meeting place in 1576. The word 'Moot' comes from a Saxon one meaning meeting-place, and to this day (or until the new town Hall opens on Market Hill) the building's principal purpose is to house the chamber of the Town Council. It was first built as a family home by Sir Robert D'Arcy in the mid-1430's. The tower was raised on top of the original house later in the 15th century, and completed in brick in the year of its purchase by the Corporation. Property prices then were strikingly different in those days: when it was acquired for the town it cost just £55.

Perhaps the most interesting feature of the Moot Hall from an architectural point of view is the brick staircase which leads from the ground to the upper floors. This is a fine example of 16th century brickwork. It has a built-in handrail and vaulted ceiling. The ground floor was the police station between 1839 and 1914, first as the headquarters of Maldon's own police force and then as the County police station until the opening of the new building in West Square. The Moot Hall yard was used to exercise prisoners held in the cells of the old police station and many of their names with their dates of incarceration be seen scratched in the outside walls. The ground floor also contains the Mayor's Parlour.

On the first floor is the old Magistrate's Court, which still remains as it was when the last session was held there. From this room a door leads to the magistrates' robing room and thence to the gallery, which with the handsome portico beneath it is a Georgian addition.

The Council Chamber is on the second floor and from it a door gives access to the roof and splendid views over the town. Leading off the Council Chamber is the Muniment Room where the town's records were once stored in the chest which can still be seen, although the documents themselves have been transferred to the County records office in Chelmsford.

Minster History

The Norman Minster

On Christmas Day 1066 Ealdred anointed and crowned William the Conqueror king of the English in Westminster Abbey, an event which radically changed the course of history for Britain, York and its cathedral.

The Doomstone:
Norman carving

When Archbishop Ealdred was buried in the Saxon Minster in 1069 the building was virtually intact. However, within days of his burial it was severely damaged during conflicts between the Danes, rebellious Saxons and William I and his followers, with many of its charters and fittings lost. William had faced rebellion in the north in that year and always feared York as a centre of Viking sympathisers. His answer was characteristic: a fearful devastation from which the city took several generations to recover fully.

In 1070 Thomas of Bayeux was consecrated the first Norman archbishop, and on his arrival began to put the affairs of the church back in order, re-roofing the church and rebuilding the refectory and dormitory. In 1075 the Danes came again to York and destroyed the church entirely. Undaunted, In 1080 the archbishop, decided to rebuild the Minster. Remains of this Cathedral can still be seen in the Foundations Exhibition below the present Minster. The first Norman church was remarkable, 365 feet long with walls seven feet thick, the exterior was rendered with hard white plaster and lined in red to look like ashlar.

St Luke from
c.1000 AD

Perhaps the greatest change to the everyday life of the church in York after the arrival of the Normans was caused by the introduction of a secular Chapter. Archbishop Thomas, who died in 1100, reorganized his cathedral on an institutional pattern that survives to this day. In York, unlike some other medieval cathedrals, the foundation was never monastic. Thomas of Bayeux introduced canons living the common life at York, later converting the Chapter to conform with the model to which he had been accustomed in Normandy, a fully secular Chapter of canons living in their own houses, enjoying separate incomes or 'prebends'. From among this Chapter of canons the four offices of Dean, Treasurer, Precentor and Chancellor were created to manage the running of the cathedral, while the Archbishops themselves became increasingly significant national figures, often away from York on the business of King or Pope.

In 1137 York Cathedral was damaged by fire. The worst damage was to the eastern arm with the remainder being as patched up or improved. Newly quarried limestone was used in repairs to the walls which were re-rendered with red lines as before. However, even if the eastern arm had not been damaged in the fire, it would have been antiquated by the standards of other large churches of the twelfth century.

When Roger of Pont l'Eveque became archbishop in 1154 he set to work and built anew the choir and crypt of the cathedral. Evidence of this rebuilding can still be seen in the western crypt. Over the years the east end was entirely rebuilt with the west end enlarged by the addition of a pair of towers, close together and projecting only a little beyond the side walls of Thomas's nave. Also at the west end a large chapel known as St Sepulchre's was built at an angle to the north wall of the nave. By the early thirteenth century the fame of the Norman cathedral at York had spread beyond the Alps: it was one of the great Norman cathedrals of Europe. But fashions were changing and the first cathedrals in the 'Gothic' style had already been built, including the new church at Sens, finished in 1168, a new choir at Canterbury. York Minster must have seemed dark, heavy and antiquated to anyone who had visited Canterbury or Ile de France.

(b) York Memoranda

DATE: 23 August. AUTHOR: Mayor and aldermen of York. TEXT: York City Archives, House Book, B2-4, f.169v. (Also printed in Extracts from the Municipal Records of the City of York during the Reigns of Edward IV, Edward V, and Richard III, ed. R. Davies (London, 1843), pp. 218, 217. (English; spelling modernized.)

Memorandum of meeting in council chamber on the Vigil of St Bartholomew, 'where it was shown by divers persons, and especially by John Sponer, sent unto the field of Redemore to bring tidings of the same to the city, that King Richard, late mercifully reigning upon us, was through great treason of the duke of Norfolk and many others that turned against him, with many other lords and nobles of this north parts, was piteously slain and murdered, to the great heaviness of this city.'

There is also a summary record of the battle at 'Redemore near Leicester'. It is followed by information obviously derived from the king's proclamation, though a clerk has later crossed through the names of three lords (Lincoln, Surrey and Lovell) who had been wrongly reported dead. (c) Parliamentary Record

DATE: November, 1485. AUTHOR: King and council. TEXT: "Rotuli Parliamentarium," ed. J. Strachey, 6 vols.(London, 1767-83), VI, p. 176. (English; spelling modernized.)

The act of attainder records that 'Richard, late duke of Gloucester, calling and naming himself, by usurpation, King Richard the Third.' John late duke of Norfolk, Thomas earl of Surrey, Francis Viscount Lovell, Walter Devereux late Lord Ferrers, John Lord Zouche, Robert Harrington, Richard Charlton, Richard Radcliffe, William Berkeley of Weobley, Robert Brackenbury, Thomas Pilkington, Robert Middleton, James Harrington, knights, Walter Hopton, William Catesby, Roger Wake, William Sapcote, Humphrey Stafford, William Clerk of Wenlock, Geoffrey St German, Richard Watkins, Herald of Arms, Richard Revel of Derbyshire, Thomas Poulter junior of Kent, John Walsh alias Hastings, John Kendal, secretary, John Buck, Andrew Ratt, and William Bramton of Burford, on 21, in 'the first year of the reign of our sovereign lord, assembled to them at Leicester ... a great host, traitorously intending, imagining and conspiring the destruction of the king's royal person, our sovereign leige lord. And they, with the same host, with banners spread, mightily armed and defenced with all manner [of] arms, as guns, bows, arrows, spears, 'glaives', axes, and all other manner [of] articles apt or needful to give and cause mighty battle against our sovereign lord'. Keeping the host together, they led them on 22 August to a field in Leicestershire, and 'there by great and continued deliberation, traitorously levied war against our said sovereign lord and his true subjects there being in his service and assistance under a banner of our said sovereign lord, to the subversion of this realm, and common weal of the same.' (d) Historical Notes of Londoner

DATE: Probably 1485-6, though later copy. AUTHOR: Londoner, using civic records. TEXT: R.F. Green, "Historical notes of a London citizen, 1483-1488" E. M.R. 96 (1981), 589 (English; spelling modernized.)

'This year the earl of Richmond and Jasper, earl of Pembroke ... came forth into England and met King Richard III at Redesmore, and there was King Richard slain and the duke of Norfolk and Lord Ferrers and Brackenbury, with many other. This battle was the 22 August, 1485. Likewise, in this year the earl of Northumberland and the earl of Surrey were taken and brought into the Fleet of London, and there they were nine days, and then they were led into the Tower of London, and there they were two days, and after had to the castle of Queenborough in Kent.' (e) Miscellaneous Town Chronicles

DATE: Probably compiled annually, but recopied and updated in early 16th century. AUTHORS: Citizens of London and Calais. TEXTS: London "Vitellius A XVI": C.L. Kingsford (ed.), Chronicles of London (Oxford, 1905), p. 193; Calais Chronicle: The Chronicle of Calais in the Reigns of Henry VII and Henry VII to the Year 1540, ed. J.G. Nichols (Camden Society 35, 1846), p. 1. (English; spelling modernized.)

The London Chronicle 'Vitellius A XVI' records that on 22 August 'this year ... was the field of Bosworth' at which King Richard, the duke of Norfolk, Brackenbury and many others were slain, and the earl of Surrey taken prisoner, 'by the power of King Henry the Seventh'. The Calais Chronicle dates the battle to St. Bartholomew's eve and locates it a 'Bosworth heath', but otherwise follows the same pattern. In addition, it records the death of Sir William Brandon as well as the slaying of Radcliffe, Catesby and the "gentle" Brackenbury; it includes the earl of Northumberland, the earl of Shrewsbury, and Lord Zouche among the prisoners; and it documents the escape of Lord Lovell.

York - Minster

As the second city of the kingdom – in effect the northern capital – and with the archbishop of York the second most important churchman in England, York not surprisingly is home to what is the largest cathedral in England and one of its most important surviving medieval buildings.

The cathedral that dominates York's skyline almost as much today as it must have done during the Middle Ages was constructed between 1220 and 1472. It is distinguished not only by the predominantly Gothic architecture, but also by decoration such as stained-glass windows and numerous elaborately carved roof bosses – some of these the original medieval pieces, others copies made after the several fires which have ravaged the cathedral over the last two centuries.

The cathedral was built on the site once occupied by the fort of the Roman legion based at York. The city had a bishop at the close of the period of Roman occupation, and what is considered the first episcopal church was built by the newly-Christianized Edgar, king of Northumbria, in the 620s. Even under the rule of the Vikings, a line of archbishops managed to survive, with a few interruptions. Destruction during attacks on the city by the Normans in 1069 and the Danes in 1075, and a fire in 1137 provided only setbacks to rebuilding initiatives. In the early thirteenth century Archbishop Walter de Gray undertook not only to reform the monastic chapter, but also to rebuild the Minster on a scale rivalling Canterbury. The outcome was, eventually, the present building.

For further information about the cathedral, see the history section of the York Minster Web site.

Minster History

Rebirth

Toward the end of 1215 Pope Innocent III brought a long and ill-tempered election process to an end by telling the representatives of the York Chapter that 'By Saint Peter, virginity is a great virtue; and we will give him to you.' The events of the next forty years were to reveal to the canons of York that chastity was only one of their new Archbishop's many qualities.

The outside of the south transept

Tomb of Walter de Gray c.1255 (south transept)

The accession of Walter de Gray marks the most important turning point in the history of the medieval Minster. During the previous generation the clerks of the cathedral had suffered from the lack of an effective and respected leader. By formulating a strict code of conduct for members of the Chapter, regulating the size and distribution of prebend payments and, for the first time, keeping careful records of his acts, Gray redefined the position of the archbishop in his diocese and his cathedral.

It was in 1220 that construction of the Minster as we know it began. Archbishop Gray and the Dean and Chapter decided to rebuild the Norman Minster on a scale to rival Canterbury.

The South Transept was the first section to be rebuilt between 1220 and 1250 with the North Transept both started and finished a few years later. Both transepts were built in the Early English Gothic manner and with similar interiors. The very different atmosphere created in each transept is attributable to contrast between their end walls. The south wall is in an elaborate French style featuring gables, arcading and lancets thick on its surface with two tiers of doubled lancet windows below an ornate rose window. The north wall is so different it is hard to believe it was built at the same period: the Five Sisters, five tall, even lancets, rise above a blind arcade and are crowned by five graduated lancets in the gable. The effect is austere and graceful. While the South Transept is believed to have been the personal scheme of Walter de Gray it is his sub-Dean and eventual treasurer, John Romanus who is associated with the North Transept - whether the design was dictated by aesthetics or economics, it makes him a noble memorial.

Romanus was also responsible for the great central tower built at this period, which held the Minster bells and was almost certainly topped by a wooden spire. It is thought to have been heavier than the present tower, though carried on smaller piers, which probably explains its collapse in 1407.

Walter de Gray died in 1255 an elderly and wealthy man and his burial place is the Minster's most beautiful tomb, in the South Transept he and his Chapter created between the dark nave and choir of the Norman cathedral.

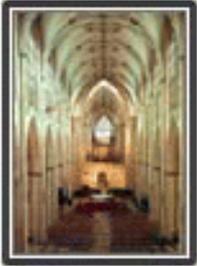

The rebuilding of York Minster that began with the transepts went on almost continuously for two hundred and fifty years.

The Nave

Interior of the nave, looking east.

By the 1280s, when the Archbishop, Chapter and their master-masons turned their attention to the nave they were surrounded by a just-finished, up to the minute Chapter House separate from the daily liturgical routine of the Cathedral. Down the passage and across the tranquil space of the North Transept stood Archbishop Thomas's old, gloomy nave, the only part of his church still intact. The decision to replace it with a new aisled nave, its vault even higher than the transepts, its interior lit by huge and complicated expanses of glass and tracery would involve the Minster in seventy years of building work.

It was decided early on that the new nave should stand on the deep, well-constructed foundations of the old Norman foundations, in this way the two lines of piers would run directly westwards from the pillars that supported the tower. The distance between them, that is the width of the Norman church, was the guiding measurement. The new outer walls were half this distance from the piers and each pier the same distance again from its neighbour. The whole structure was therefore exactly twice as wide as its predecessor. The result of this simple but highly ambitious scheme is the widest nave in England and, after Westminster Abbey, the tallest.

In about 1320, when work on the nave had already been in progress for 30 years, it was decided to demolish Archbishop Roger's Norman towers and build a completely new west front with two new towers. What these western towers were intended to look like is now impossible to tell, since the front was finished only as far as the height of the nave roof with the present top storey, parapet and pinnacles added at a much later date.

The outer roof of the nave was finished by the 1330's and the glazing of the windows began, but the vaulting caused a great deal of trouble. The planned stone vault was abandoned, either through concern about the foundations or the technical difficulties of spanning almost fifty feet in stone. In the end wood had to be used and all kinds of problems held up completion of the work.

Supplied of the necessary oak timbers were hard to come by and in 1345 the master-carpenter was found to have lost his head for heights and had to be replaced. Four years later the Black Death killed the master mason and many of the craftsmen. In the end, the vaulting was not completed until 1360.

Minster History

The Eastern Arm

The intention of successive archbishops since the beginning of the new nave had always been to replace the whole of the Norman cathedral with a larger, more modern building. When Archbishop Thoresby laid the first stone of the new eastern arm in 1361 he was continuing a process that had already been going on for almost 150 years. The Zouche chapel (in memory of Thoresby's predecessor) and the vestries behind it had been started and the masons and carpenters who had finally completed the nave simply moved their tools and equipment eastward.

Beginning on fresh ground with the Lady Chapel, the four easternmost bays of the present Minster, the furthest wall was a good sixty feet further east than Archbishop Roger's east front. With its massive proportions and the unadventurous tracery of its aisle windows it is remarkably consistent with spirit of the nave. Only the external screenwork of the clerestory, which, against the more exuberant tracery of the clerestory windows, produces one of the most dramatic architectural effects of the building.

The east end of the Minster.

In the early 1390's, under Archbishop Thomas Arundel, demolition of the choir, the only surviving part of the Norman building commenced. In 1395 construction of the new choir began and celebration of the liturgy was transferred to the vestry. The design was close to that of the Lady Chapel but not identical, in particular, the tracery and screen were reversed so the tracery was now on the outside wall and the screen, across an internal passage, on the inside wall.

The choir, looking west.

During the decades that saw the building of the new choir the drama surrounding the throne of England produced repercussions in the see of York. Richard II had close connections with Archbishop Arundel and gave money for the work at the Minster. In 1396 he translated Arundel to Canterbury and York received an Austin friar Robert Waldby for its archbishop although in the two years left before his death he never actually visited the Minster. The Chapter elected a Yorkshire cleric, Bishop Skirlaw of Durham as Waldby's successor in 1398 but were immediately over-ruled by the now desperate Richard II who installed another aristocratic friend, Richard Scrope. A brave and learned man, Scrope nevertheless betrayed two kings and died a traitor's death. Only a year after Richard II had personally secured him the archbishopric, he was in the Tower Of London with other lords to hear the king's statement of abdication. In 1405 he led several thousand men in revolt against the new king Henry IV. After being tricked into surrender he was executed under the walls of York amid a huge crowd on the feast of St William.

Great East Window from the choir.

After this disaster the see of York was vacant for two and a half years while Bishop Skirlaw, ousted by Richard II's appointment of Scrope, attempted to regain office. He never succeeded and died with the matter still unresolved but in the meantime made the Minster a gift which ensured him immortality. In 1405 Skirlaw commissioned and paid for the glazing of the east window of the Lady Chapel by master-glazier John Thornton of Coventry who finished the window (with studio help) in three years. This window is not only the largest expanse of medieval glass to survive but is a masterpiece of narrative design. It tells the story of God as alpha and omega, of those who praise Him, of the beginning of the world and the end. At the centre of the bottom row of panels which show legendary and historical figures from York's past, Skirlaw kneels at his altar.

Minster History

The End of the Middle Ages

In 1407, while work on the windows and vaulting of the eastern arm was still in progress, part of the central tower of the Minster collapsed. Although this was blamed on 'a horrible tempest' it is more likely that alterations to the crossing weakened the tower's support. The master-mason William Colchester was dispatched from Westminster Abbey to solve the architectural problems and supervised the completion of the eastern arm and the strengthening of the crossing. He also inserted two screen arches (with a sliding joint against the piers which actually allowed them to move while adjusting to their load) at the entrances to the choir aisles and is thought to have planned the exceptionally solid choir screen (which was not built until later) and was definitely responsible for the design of the new central tower which was begun after his death in 1420 and never completed according to his intentions.

The western towers.

During the middle of the fifteenth century the church was absolutely subordinate to politics. In 1465, as the conflict between the houses of Lancaster and York raged, Archbishop George Neville (bother of Richard Earl of Warwick, the Kingmaker) was enthroned at the Minster. It was a magnificent occasion, fraught with dynastic tensions, the Neville family parading their Yorkist allegiance. At the feast afterwards the chief guest was the Duke of Gloucester, who eighteen years later became Richard III.

By this time the Minster was, at last, almost complete, the building programme of two and a half centuries slowly reaching its close. Master Colchester's plan to rebuild the central tower with the bells in its second stage had been abandoned because of concern for the strength of the piers and foundations. Instead, the south western tower was designated the new belfry and the new central tower was raised only to the top of the lantern. In 1472 the Dean and Chapter decided that the Minster was at last complete and held a great re-dedication ceremony to mark the occasion.

In 1536, after suffering several weak, ineffectual and often absent archbishops York witnessed the Pilgrimage of Grace, the only serious popular protest against Henry VIII's proceedings against the church. The archbishop at the time, Edward Lee, was a nervous man who had presided over an historic meeting at the Chapter House on 5 May 1534 where it was declared that the Bishop of Rome had no greater jurisdiction in the realm than any other foreign bishop. However, when the Pilgrimage passed through York, the Minster clergy met its leaders and Lee himself, under duress, first joined then disowned the revolt. This rebellion, brutally put down by Henry VIII was a protest against the first dissolutions of abbeys and priories. When Henry VIII made his only visit to York in 1541 the city fathers crawled before him and the new Dean Richard Layton smashed St William's shrine as a gesture against popery. Coming Soon: The Great Chamber Project

The Barley Hall Trust is planning to furnish additional rooms at the Hall, and to this end is setting up a Furnishing Fund. Plans are in a very early state at the moment and full details are not yet available but the first new room to be furnished will be the Great Chamber, William Snawsell's bedchamber.

For this room we will need a large bed, complete with hangings, bolsters and covers, a cupboard, folding chairs and, when we have achieved the other items a painted wall hanging, perhaps showing the Seven Works of Mercy, a popular subject. This will be an excellent opportunity for Barley Hall's many friends to show their support by "adopting" an object or group of objects.

As soon as possible the Trust will announce its full plans and the Friends will want to play as big a part as possible. Your gift can help bring Barley Hall's Great Chamber to life. To be added to the e-mail list to receive advance notification of the giving opportunities offered by this project, write to barleyfriends@r3.org.

Origins

The particular siting of Knareborough may well be due to the easily defended location - the castle remains stand on a rocky outcrop 120 feet above the river. Ancient Britons gave the Nidd its name over 2000 years ago, although very little evidence of iron age or subsequent Roman occupation remains.

The origin of the name of Knareborough is not altogether clear, although one of two sources seems most probable. The origin of "borough" is not in dispute, being derived from "burgh", an Anglo-Saxon word for fortress or fortified settlement. "Knare" may come either from the name of a chieftain, such that the whole means something like "Cenheard's fortress"; or it may derive from "knar" - a rocky outcrop - thus giving Knareborough the appellation of "the fortress on the rock", which would fit the location very well. The development of the name of the town is explored in From Chenaresburg to Knareborough

Several ancient name derivations survive around the town - "gate" is a Scandinavian word for street and survives in "Briggate" - the street leading to the bridge, "Kirkgate" - the street leading to the church, "Tentergate" - the place where cloth is stretched for drying on "tenterhooks"; "ing" means meadow, "Gracious" as in Gracious Street, probably derives from Anglo-Saxon "gracht-huys" - the houses on the ditch.

The very first mention of Knareborough is in the Domesday book, begun in 1086 only twenty years after the conquest by order of William, as "the Manor of Chenaresburg", there being no mention of a castle at this time. Thus it is the time of William the Conqueror and the Norman invasion which sees the beginnings of the town of Knareborough when Serlo de Burgh was granted the Manor of Knareborough as a reward for his part in the invasion.

In 1158 Knaresborough was granted to Hugh de Morevill, possibly as compensation for lands given to the King of Scotland. Morevill forfeited the lands in 1173, according to Early Yorkshire Charters: "... not apparently for his participation in the death of Becket, but for complicity in the rebellion of the young Henry.". Knaresborough, together with Aldborough, were granted to William de Stuteville in the same year.

The Honour of Knaresborough

The totality of the Manor was known as the Honour of Knaresborough and comprised three parts - the Forest, the Borough or Town, and the Forest Liberty. In medieval times a Forest was not simply an extensive expanse of wooded area but included clearings and settlements and was associated with hunting. The Forest of Knaresborough was located west and south-west of the town and covered about 100,000 acres, stretching twenty miles from east to west. The inhabitants of its settlements were occupied in farming, fishing, charcoal burning, and iron smelting. The Forest Liberty was an area of farmland to the north of the town where its dozen villages occupied a fairly flat and easily cultivated landscape.

We now begin to see the town developing. The earliest recording for the parish church is in 1114 in the Coucher Book of Nostell Priory as "the Church of Cnaresburgh" and we can today see remains from this time, particularly in St John's which has outlines of Norman windows and a typical chevron patterned string course. The first documentary evidence for the castle occurs in 1130 in an account of works carried out by Henry I, when Knaresborough is again described as "Chenardesburg".

When the direct line of descent of the Stuteville lords of the manor was interrupted, King John contrived to take over the Honour for himself (1204/1205) by the levy of a fine. The king was then able to collect various revenues associated with rents, harvests, court proceedings etc. In 1211 the revenue came to £318, 19s 3d (Early Yorkshire Charters). In the same year his outgoings included "work on the castle of "Cnarreburch" and on the ditch and houses thereof for 2 years £119, 18s. 8d."; also "in work on a new mill, improvement of fulling mills and repair of the mill-pools of Knaresborough and Boroughbridge £15, 8s. 2d" (Early Yorkshire Charters). He was one of several royal visitors who enjoyed hunting in the forest.

Royal Maundy

Dr. Arnold Kellett's research (1) has revealed that the first recorded instance of a Royal Maundy (Royal gifts) took place at Knaresborough on April 15th, 1210. King John gave the traditional gifts to each of thirteen paupers - thirteen pence, one belt, one knife, clothing, and a pair of shoes. The tradition, of course, is still maintained to this day, although the reigning monarch now gives a second purse in lieu of clothing. Dr. Kellett's evidence for the historic claim for Knaresborough comes from the king's personal account of his expenses - the Rotulus Misae.

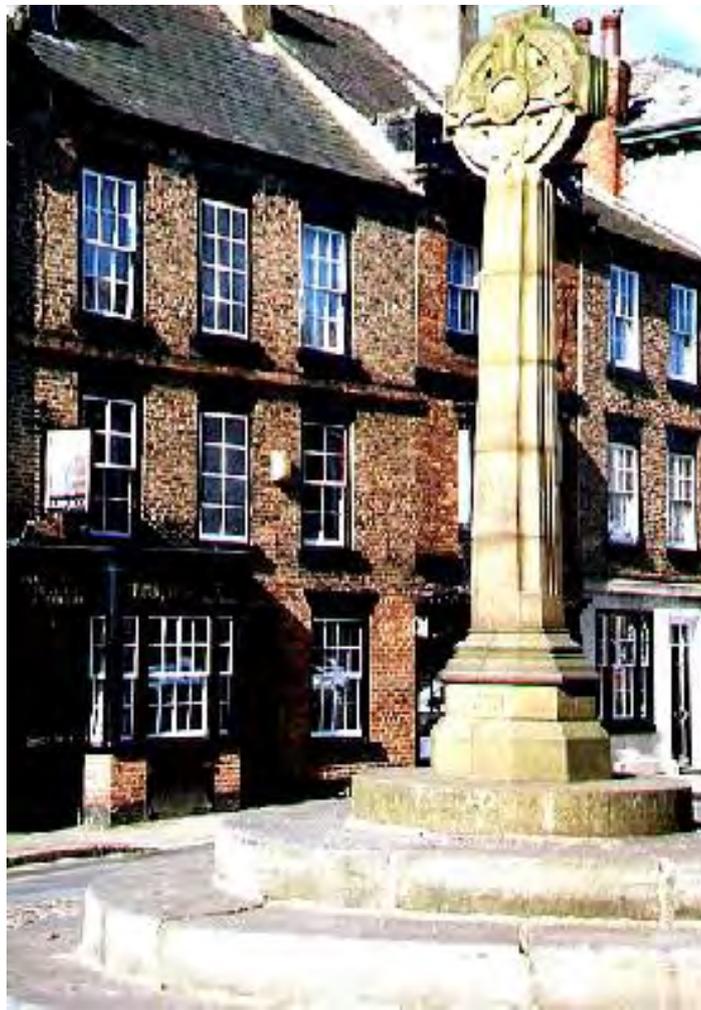

Murder in the Cathedral

Hugh de Morville was Constable of the Castle of Knaresborough and leader of the unfortunate group of four knights who took King Henry II at his word when he said "will nobody rid me of this turbulent priest". On December 29th, 1170 they murdered Thomas Beckett, Archbishop of Canterbury, on the steps of the altar of his cathedral. The four knights first fled to Knaresborough, where legend has it that they were reviled even by the dogs of the town, although Hugh is also said to have built Hampsthwaite Church and dedicated it to the canonised priest as an act of penance.

Saint Robert

Robert Floure was born in York around 1160 and became a hermit in a riverside cave at Knaresborough. Attributed with miracles of healing and powers over wild animals, when he died in 1218 a cult grew up and the waters of St. Robert's Well were said to have healing powers. His land was given to the Trinitarian Friars and a friary was built. Nothing of the riverside friary remains today. See also The Will of Thomas Hill and St Robert's Cave and Friary

The Market Cross.
© Alyson Jackson

The market is first mentioned in 1206 and the fair in 1304 but the earliest known charter was granted by Edward II in 1310, confirming Wednesday as Market Day and the fair to be held between July 18th and July 20th.

During this time the castle continued to expand. Under Edward II it gained twelve towers and a keep.

Rebels occupied the castle during Edward's reign and the curtain wall was breached with a siege engine during its recapture. Later, Scots invaders burned much of the town, including the parish church. The church was restored by Queen Philippa, wife of Edward III, who had been granted "the Castle, Town, Forest and Honour of Knaresborough" as part of her marriage settlement in 1328. After her death the Honour was granted in 1372 by Edward to their youngest son, John of Gaunt (born in Ghent). He had already inherited the estates of his wife, Blanche of Lancaster, and was Duke of Lancaster and thus linked the Honour of Knaresborough with the Duchy of Lancashire and hence to the Lancastrian cause in the Wars of the Roses.

King Richard II spent a night in Knaresborough Castle on his way to Pontefract Castle in 1399 where he was murdered.

Chapel of Our Lady of the Crag

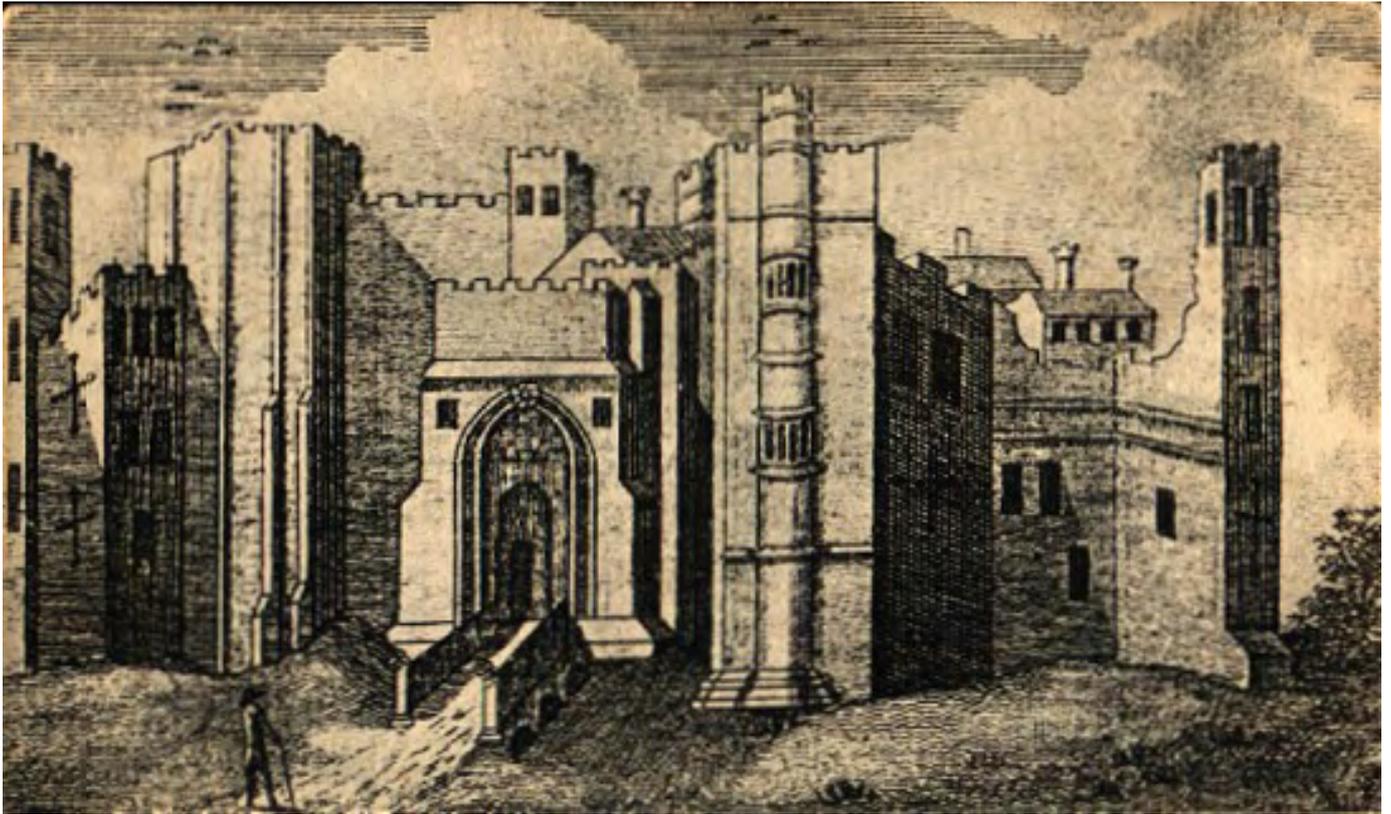

This wayside shrine was carved out of the rock face near Low Bridge in 1408 by John the Mason. The entrance is guarded by a carved medieval knight, possibly a Knight Templar, whose face has been "restored" in later times! Services occasionally take place but must be held outside as the chapel measures only 12 feet by 8 feet. See also The Will of Thomas Hill

Religion, Civil War, Education and Spas

The various religious upheavals of the first half of the sixteenth century, during the reigns of Henry VIII, Mary and Elizabeth, affected the people of Knaresborough who were generally loyal to the Catholic faith. They were conservative in their religion and slow to accept new ideas, especially if imposed from above by a distant monarch. In addition, most of the local landowners and lords were of the Catholic faith. After the unsuccessful Rising of the North in 1569 services were still being secretly held but the Protestant religion gradually became established. In 1580 a great effort was made to suppress recusancy (the refusal to conform) and an Act of Parliament the following year made this a crime punishable by a fine of £5 a week.

At this time the parish church became firmly established as the church of St John the Baptist \(Virtual Tour\), having previously sometimes been known as St. Mary's (a more Catholic name) and the Parish Register was begun in 1561 with the recording of 41 baptisms, 12 marriages, and 21 burials in its first year. Thatched Manor Cottage at the bottom of Water Bag Bank (up which ponies carried bags of water from the river to the town) dates from this period. Effigies of the Slingsby family in the parish church are worthy of note and include the recumbent Francis Slingsby who died in 1600, cavalry officer to Henry VIII, with his wife lying on his right hand side as she was from a higher born status of the Percy family. Other notable tombs are those of Sir Henry Slingsby, executed under Cromwell in 1658, and Sir Charles Slingsby who drowned in 1869. The church also contains a fine late Jacobean font-cover.

During the civil war Knaresborough was a Royalist stronghold. The castle remained loyal to King Charles but was taken by Cromwell's soldiers, after a short siege, on December 20th, 1644. A popular story tells (see e.g. The Knaresborough Story) how a Mrs Whincup successfully led a group of people to plead with the commander for the life of a boy found taking food to his besieged father. The castle suffered little damage at this time but in 1648 was a victim of an Act of Parliament ordering the demolition, or "slighting", of several Royalist castles.

Sir Henry Slingsby, MP for Knaresborough, who had been expelled from the House of Commons for his Royalist tendencies in 1642, remained determined to restore the monarchy. He was arrested in 1654 and charged with high treason. Being found guilty, he was beheaded on Tower Hill on June 8th, 1658 and his headless body returned to Knaresborough for burial.

The early 17th century saw the establishment of King James's School in the town, its charter being granted in 1616, beginning a long tradition in the town emphasising the importance of education. Originally this was an all-boys school, endowed with £20 per year by Rev. Dr. Robert Challoner, who was born in Goldsborough, and boys from Knaresborough and Goldsborough were to be admitted free, with fee-paying scholars admitted at the discretion of the governors. By 1820, however, there had been no free scholars for over twenty years. In 1971 it became a large mixed comprehensive school, still bearing the name of King

James.

The Charity School was established at the bottom of the High Street by Thomas Richardson in 1765. It was to accommodate "thirty boys and girls of the township of Knaresborough, and for putting them out to apprenticeship". Several Sunday Schools provided elementary education for all denominations.

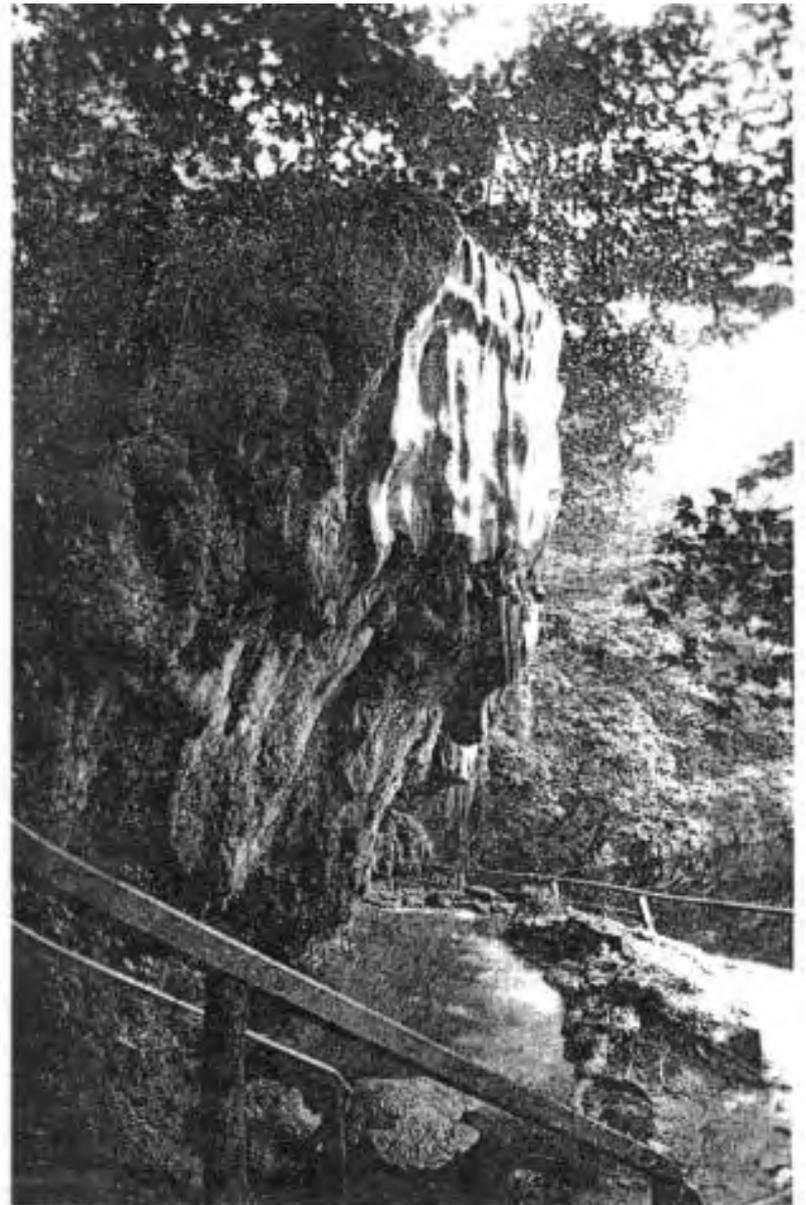

It was in the latter half of the sixteenth century that Knaresborough's reputation as a spa town began with its recommendation as a base for taking the newly discovered waters of Tewit Well. Many eminent travellers of the day, including Celia Fiennes (1697) and Daniel Defoe (1717) visited Knaresborough at a time when Harrogate was still only two small hamlets - Low and High Harrogate. Inns and hotels were being built in High Harrogate but the tradition at this time was to stay in Knaresborough and travel to the Harrogate area to take the waters.

Mother Shipton and the Dropping Well

Much has been written of this semi-legendary figure. She is said to have been born in 1488, but the earliest reference appears in a pamphlet of 1641, associating her with York. A later pamphlet of 1667 states that she was born at "Naseborough near the Dropping Well in Yorkshire". She is famed as a prophetess, although most of the prophecies attributed to her were, in fact, later forgeries. John Leland, Henry VIII's official antiquary, makes no mention of Mother Shipton in his account of his visit to Knaresborough in 1558, although he visited, and was impressed by, the Dropping Well.

The Dropping Well has appealed to visitors for centuries, attracted by the curious sight of objects, suspended in the cascade of water, apparently turning to stone. In reality, the objects are calcified by a deposit from the waters.

Although the origins of Mother Shipton and her prophecies may still be debated today, the Mother Shipton Cave and the Dropping Well remain very popular attractions in Knaresborough, delighting thousands of visitors every year.

Multangular tower

The Roman-built Multangular Tower stands in the Museum Gardens in the centre of York. It has been called the Multangular Tower since 1683. Between 1315 and 1683 it was called Elrondyng (the earliest reference to a Tolkein character!)

However, the tower is much older than its first mention in the records.

It was built as part of the Roman defences that began in the late second or early third centuries AD. The main feature of these defences was the south-west wall of the Roman fortress that overlooked the River Ouse and the civil town (called the colonia) on the opposite bank. This wall has been described as one of the grandest examples of military architecture of its age.

There was a multangular tower at each end of the wall. The Multangular Tower in Museum Gardens is one – the other is buried underneath the street Feasegate. There were six other towers, three on either side of a central gateway which guarded the entrance to the fortress. The centre of the wall and cornices (mouldings at the top) of the towers were decorated with tiles. The corner towers were at least 10 metres high.

The Multangular Tower is the only section of this wall that has survived. It was probably built during the reign of the Emperor Severus who was in York between 209 and 211.

The tower has ten sides and is nine metres high. Originally there would have been three floors on the inside and a roof on top. Only six metres of this surviving masonry is Roman.

York - Stonegate

The York street (now pedestrianized) of Stonegate, was one of the main roads of the Roman city and, as such, would have been paved with stone – hence the name that Norse settlers gave it when they established themselves in the former Roman base of Eboracum, subsequently an Anglo-Saxon administrative centre (Eoforwic). The Norse made the place, which in their tongue was "Jorvik", a commercial centre of the kingdom they established in northern England.

Stonegate is lined with buildings representing architecture from many periods in history; some timber-framed buildings hark back to the late Middle Ages. Mulberry Hall, for instance, was built in the fifteenth century. Most of these buildings are today shops at ground-floor level. The street led from the community hall, passing by the marketplace, and terminated, as it still does, at the cathedral. When the street was laid out by the Romans, its purpose was to connect the headquarters of the legion based at Eboracum to one of the gates in the city wall.

A number of English boroughs had their shape and layout influenced by preceding Roman settlements. Even though Roman features may have become obscured or obliterated during the decline of urban society in the Early Middle Ages, the Roman walls and gates (the likeliest feature to survive) influenced later settlers to recreate – perhaps unknowingly – the grid pattern of streets originally laid down by the Romans; Colchester provides another example. The shapes of other towns were influenced by a variety of factors, such as the intersection or convergence of highways (land- and/or water-based), the presence of a fortification or religious house, the curve of a river, access to a sheltered harbour, the availability of an open flat area, the preoccupations (e.g. protection, agriculture, commerce, industry) of the peoples who settled in these locations at different periods, as well as specific historical events that owe little or nothing to topography. These often interacting factors produced the great variety of medieval town plans many of whose features may still be traced in their modern descendants.

York - Bootham Bar

York, as England's second most important city during the Middle Ages and as a northern stronghold against incursions by the Scots, required a strong defensive ring. Bootham Bar was one of the original Roman gateways into the city/fortress of Eboracum, providing access from the north, although the present structure is mostly of late medieval (or later) construction. To what extent the Roman-built walls were maintained by the Anglo-Saxons is uncertain, but they failed to prevent its capture by Norse invaders who, however, themselves made effort to restore city defences once they were masters there.

The fifteenth-century city financial accounts show that expenditure on wall maintenance was a repeated (if not huge) item in the city budget. The temporary right to levy murage had been granted by the king in 1226 and repeated at intervals. In 1449 the right was granted in perpetuity. Although Richard III cancelled this on the grounds that the tolls were a disincentive to commerce, he compensated the city with an annuity for wall maintenance. Collection of the tolls imposed on commercial goods at the city gates was, in the fifteenth century at least, often leased out to private citizens, who would hope to make a profit beyond the amount they were paying to the city for the lease.

By the close of the Middle Ages the walls and gates were strong enough, to be a useful defence during the conflict between Yorkists and Lancastrians. For instance, during the rebellion of Lambert Simnel (whom the Yorkists claimed to be Edward V), "the lords Scrope of Bolton and Upsall, constrained as it was said by their folk, came on horseback to Bootham Bar, and there cried 'King Edward' and made assault on the gates, but the commons who were watchmen there well and manfully defended them and put them to flight." [The York House Books 1461-1490, ed. L. Attreed, 1991, vol.2, p.572; language modernised somewhat by me.]

Nonetheless, Henry VII criticized the city for not keeping its walls in top condition when, two years later (in 1489), other Yorkist rebels were able to breach the defences and capture the city.

Although towns for the most part tried to distance themselves from the national political conflicts that could erupt into warfare, and although private loyalties varied in the event of such conflicts, York – neither surprisingly, nor consistently (opinion within the city being divided and it being politic to give lip-service loyalty to whichever side was dominant at any given time) – had Yorkist leanings during the Wars of the Roses. This was most noticeable when Richard, Duke of Gloucester, tried to establish a power base in the north, by winning allies there and showing himself a supportive lord to those under his authority. City authorities prosecuted several citizens for criticizing or slandering Richard, provided military support on occasions of need, and expressed deep regret over Richard's death at Bosworth. Towards Henry VII the city behaved coolly, although cautiously, and looked instead to the Earl of Northumberland for support. The capture of the city in 1489 was aided by Yorkist sympathizers among the citizens.

1. The fame of the city of London

Among the splendid cities of the world that have achieved celebrity, the city of London – seat of the English monarchy – is one whose renown is more widespread, whose money and merchandize go further afield, and which stands head and shoulders above the others. It is fortunate in the wholesomeness of its climate, the devotion of its Christians, the strength of its fortifications, its well-situated location, the respectability of its citizens, and the propriety of their wives.

Furthermore it takes great pleasure in its sports and is prolific in producing men of superior quality. Each of which characteristic I shall address in turn.

2. The mild climate

There, without question, "the mild sky doth soften hearts of men", not so that they become "[weak slaves] of lust", but so that they are not brutal and uncivilized, instead being of a kind-hearted and generous disposition.

3. Christian worship there

The bishopric is seated in the church of St. Paul there. At one time it was a metropolitan see, and it is believed that it will be again, if the citizens return to this island – unless perhaps the title of archbishop, which the Blessed Martyr Thomas held, should preserve that status in Canterbury, which has it now. Since St. Thomas has graced both of those cities – London in the early part of his life, and Canterbury in the later part – each has just grounds to argue against the other, with regard to [a claim on?] that saint. In relation to Christian worship, there are also in London and in its suburbs thirteen conventual churches and one hundred and twenty-six lesser, parish churches.

4. The setting and security of the city

On the east side stands the royal fortress, of tremendous size and strength, whose walls and floors rise up from the deepest foundations – the mortar being mixed with animal's blood. On the west side are two heavily fortified castles. Running continuously around the north side is the city wall, high and wide, punctuated at intervals with turrets, and with seven double-gated entranceways. Similarly, London had wall and turrets on its south side; but that greatest of rivers, the Thames, which teems with fish, through the ebb and flow of the tide lapping against the wall, has over time undermined it and caused it to collapse.

In addition, further to the west, two miles from the city and linked to it by a populous suburb, there rises above the bank of that river the king's palace, a structure without equal, with inner and outer fortifications.

5. The cultivated gardens

Beyond the suburban houses, on every side and adjacent to each other, the citizens have beautiful and spacious gardens, planted with trees.

6. The pastures

To the north there are tilled fields, pastures, and pleasant, level meadows with streams flowing through them, where watermill wheels turned by the current make a pleasing sound. Not far off spreads out a vast forest, its copses dense with foliage concealing wild animals – stags, does, boars, and wild bulls.

7. The fields

The arable fields of the city are not gravelly and parched, but are like the fertile fields of Asia which "make glad the crops"; their cultivation fills the granaries "with sheaves of Ceres' stalk".

8. The spring waters

There are also in the northern suburbs of London springs of high quality, with water that is sweet, wholesome, clear, and "whose runnels ripple amid pebbles bright". Among which Holywell, Clerkenwell and St. Clement's Well have a particular reputation; they receive throngs of visitors and are especially frequented by students and young men of the city, who head out on summer evenings to take the [\[country?\]](#) air. Truly, a good city – if it has a good lord.

9. The reputation of the citizens

The city has won repute for its men and glory for its martial prowess, and has a very large population; so that, during the ruinous wars of the time of King Stephen, it was able to marshal an estimated 20,000 cavalry and 60,000 infantry fit for battle. The citizens of London are universally renowned and talked about for their superiority over those of other cities in the refinement of their dress, manners, and dining.

[see notes]

10. Proper behaviour

The married women of the city are true Sabines.

11. The schools

The three principal churches of London – St. Paul's (seat of the bishop), Holy Trinity, and St. Martin's – possess schools, by ancient right and privilege. But, thanks to the support of a number of those scholarly men who have won renown and distinction in the study of philosophy, there are other schools licensed there.

On holy days, the schoolmasters assemble their students at the churches associated with the particular festival, for purposes of a training exercise. There the students debate, some using demonstrative rhetoric, others using dialectical logic. Yet others "hurtle enthymemes", while those who are more advanced employ syllogisms. Some undergo the debating exercise just to be put through their paces, it being like a wrestling match of the intellect; for others it is to help perfect their skills in determining the truth. The contrivances of sophists receive credit for the torrent and flow of their arguments. Others apply false logic. Occasionally some speakers strive to persuade by delivering rhetorical orations, taking care to observe the rules of their art and not to leave out anything related to them. Boys from different schools fling versified arguments against each other, disputing matters of grammatical principles or rules governing the use of the future or past tenses. There are those who make use of epigrams, rhymes, and metrical verse – types of sarcasm traditionally heard at street-corners; with "Fescennine License", they freely ridicule their associates, without naming names. They hurl "abuse and jibes"; with Socratic wit they take digs at the character flaws of their fellows, or even their elders, and "bite more keenly even than Theon's tooth" with their "bold dithyrambs". The audience being "ready to laugh their fill", "with wrinkling nose repeat the loud guffaw".

12. The daily routine of the city

Every morning you can find those carrying on their various trades, those selling specific types of goods, and those who hire themselves out as labourers, each in their particular locations engaged in their tasks. Nor should I forget to mention that there is in London, on the river bank amidst the ships, the wine for sale, and the storerooms for wine, a public cookshop. On a daily basis there, depending on the season, can be found fried or boiled foods and dishes, fish large and small, meat – lower quality for the poor, finer cuts for the wealthy – game and fowl (large and small). If friends arrive unexpectedly at the home of some citizen and they, tired and hungry after their journey, prefer not to wait until food may be got in and cooked, or "till servants bring water for hands and bread", they can in the meantime pay a quick visit to the riverside, where anything they might desire is immediately available. No matter how great the number of soldiers or travellers coming in or going out of the city, at whatever hour of day or night, so that those arriving do not have to go without a meal for too long or those departing leave on empty stomachs, they can choose to detour there and take whatever refreshment each needs. Those with a fancy for delicacies can obtain for themselves the meat of goose, guinea-hen or woodcock – finding what they're after is no great chore, since all the delicacies are set out in front of them. This is an exemplar of a public cookshop that provides a service to a city and is an asset to city life. Hence, as we read in Plato's Gorgias, cookery is a flattery and imitation of medicine, the fourth of the arts of civic life.

13. Smithfield

In a suburb immediately outside one of the gates there is a field that is smooth, both in name and in fact. Every Friday (unless it is an important holy day requiring solemnity) crowds are drawn to the show and sale of fine horses. This attracts the earls, barons and knights who are then in the city, along with many citizens, whether to buy or just to watch. It is a delight to see the palfreys trotting gently around, the blood pumping in their veins, their coats glistening with sweat, as they alternately raise then lower both feet on one side together. Then to see the horses more suitable for squires, rougher yet quicker in their movements, simultaneously lifting one set of feet and setting down the opposite set. After that the high-bred young colts, not yet trained or broken, "high-stepping with elastic tread". Next packhorses, with robust and powerful legs. Then expensive war horses, tall and graceful, "with quivering ears, high necks and plump buttocks". Prospective buyers watch as all are put through their paces: first, their trot, followed by their gallop (in which their two sets of legs, front and rear, are thrust out forwards and backwards, in opposition to each other).

On occasions when a race is about to be held between these chargers – or perhaps other steeds who, like their kind, are strong enough to bear riders and lively enough to race – the fact is loudly proclaimed and a warning goes up to clear lesser horses out of the way. Two or sometimes three boys prepare themselves to take part as riders in such contests between the fleet-footed creatures. Skilled in controlling horses, they "curb their untamed mouths with jagged bits"; their biggest challenge is to prevent one of their competitors from taking the lead in the race.

The horses too, in their own way, psych themselves up for the contest: "their limbs tremble; impatient of delay, they cannot stand still". When the starting signal is given, they leap forward and race off with as much speed and determination as they can muster. The riders, eager for glory and hoping for victory, try to outdo one another in using spurs, switches or cries of encouragement to urge the horses to go faster. You start to believe that "all things are in motion", as Heraclitus put it, and lose faith in Zeno's theory that motion is impossible – so that no-one could ever reach the end of a racetrack!

In a separate part of [Smithfield] are located the goods that country folk are selling: agricultural implements, pigs with long flanks, cows with swollen udders, "woolly flocks and bodies huge of kine". Also to be found there are mares suited for pulling ploughs, sledges, and two-horse carts; some have bellies swollen with foetuses, while around others already wander their newborn – frisky foals who stick close to their mothers.

14. Ships and commerce

Middlemen from every nation under heaven are pleased to bring to the city ships full of merchandize:

"Gold from Arabia, from Sabaea spice
And incense; from the Scythians arms of steel
Well-tempered; oil from the rich groves of palm
That spring from the fat lands of Babylon;
Fine gems from Nile, from China crimson silks;
French wines; and sable, vair and miniver
From the far lands where Russ and Norseman dwell."

[\[see notes\]](#)

According to the chroniclers, London is far older than Rome. For it was founded by the same race of Trojans, but by Brutus prior to Rome's foundation by Romulus and Remus. Consequently both still have in common the same ancient laws and institutions. The one, just like the other, is divided into wards. In place of consuls, London has sheriffs chosen annually. It has a senatorial order and lesser officials. It has a system of sewers and conduits in the streets. Judicial pleas, arguments, and deliberations each have assigned places, their courts. It has days fixed by custom for the holding of assemblies.

15. Religious observances

I cannot think of any city more commendable for the habits of its citizens in attending church, in observing the divine festivals, in giving alms, in providing hospitality, in formalizing betrothals, in contracting marriages, in celebrating weddings, in throwing banquets, in keeping guests entertained, as well as in attention to the burial and funeral needs of the deceased.

The only problems that plague London are the idiots who drink to excess and the frequency of fires.

To all this I should add that almost all the bishops, abbots, and lords of England are residents and, for all practical purposes, citizens of London. They have imposing houses there, where they stay and make lavish expenditures when summoned to the city by the king or archbishop to take part in councils or important gatherings, or when they come to deal with private business.

16. Recreational activities

Let us look more closely now at the city's recreations, since it is not productive for urban society to be always serious or practical – it also needs to smile and have fun. In relation to which, on the signet seals of the High Pontiffs, down to the time of Pope Leo, there was engraved on one side Peter the fisherman and over him a key, as though it were being passed down from heaven by the hand of God; around which, the motto "For me thou lef'st the ship; take thou the key". While on the other side was engraved a city, with the words "Golden Rome". Again, it was said in praise of Rome and Caesar Augustus:

"All night it rains; with dawn the shows return.
Caesar, thou shar'st thine empery with Jove."

17. Miracle plays

In place of such theatrical performances and plays, London has religious drama portraying the miracles performed by the Holy Confessors or the sufferings endured by martyrs illustrating their constancy.

18. Cockfighting and ball games

Let us begin with boys' games (for we were all boys once). Each year on the day called "Carnival" schoolboys bring fighting-cocks to their schoolmaster, and the entire morning is given over to the boyish sport, for there is a school holiday for purpose of the cock fights.

After lunch all the youth of the city go out into the fields to take part in a ball game. The students of each school have their own ball; the workers from each city craft are also carrying their balls. Older citizens, fathers, and wealthy citizens come on horseback to watch their juniors competing, and to relive their own youth vicariously: you can see their inner passions aroused as they watch the action and get caught up in the fun being had by the carefree adolescents.

19. War games in the fields

Every Sunday in Lent, after lunch, a "fresh swarm of young gentles" goes out into the fields on chargers and "steeds skilled in the contest", each being "apt and schooled to wheel in circles round". Crowds of the lay sons of citizens pour through the city gates armed with military spears and shields; the younger carry spears whose metal point has been removed. "They wake war's semblance" and practise military exercises. With a view to joining in the combats, there come many of the king's entourage, when he is in residence; and from the households of earls and barons, young men not yet invested with knighthood. Each is consumed by a hope for a victory. The fierce horses whinny, "their limbs tremble; they champ the bit; impatient of delay they cannot stand still"[\[see notes\]](#). When finally "the hoof of trampling steed careers along", the young horsemen have divided themselves into troops; some unhorse their comrades and speed past, while others chase those who retreat, but fail to catch them.

20. Naval exercises

At Easter they hold games that are a sort of naval tournament. A shield being securely fastened to a mast fixed mid-river, a young man standing in the prow of a small boat, propelled by the current and by several rowers, has to strike that shield with a lance. If he can splinter the lance by striking it against the shield and manage to avoid being thrown off his feet, his prayers have been answered and his objective achieved. If on the other hand the lance strikes it square on without breaking, he'll be cast into the fast-flowing river, and the boat will move on beyond him. However, there are anchored on either side two boats holding several young men to pluck out of the river any contestant who has taken a plunge, once his head emerges above water-level or "once more bubbles on the topmost wave". On the bridge and on galleries overlooking the river are numerous spectators, "ready to laugh their fill".

20. Summer games, such as wrestling and the like

On festival days throughout the summer young men exercise through sports such as athletics, archery, wrestling, shot-put, throwing javelins (by use of a strap) beyond a marker, and duelling with bucklers. "Cytherea leads the dance of maidens and the earth is smitten with free foot at moonrise".

21. Winter baiting of boars, bull and bears with dogs

On most festival days during winter, before lunch, boars foaming at the mouth and hogs armed with "tusks lightning-swift" fight for their lives; they'll soon be bacon. And fat bulls with horns or monstrous bears, under restraints, are set to fight against hounds.

22. Games on the ice

When the great marsh that laps up against the northern walls of the city is frozen, large numbers of the younger crowd go there to play about on the ice. Some, after building up speed with a run, facing sideways and their feet placed apart, slide along for a long distance. Others make seats for themselves out of ice-slabs almost as large as millstones, and are dragged along by several others who hold their hands and run in front. Moving so quickly, the feet of some slip out from under them and inevitably they fall down flat. Others are more skilled at frolicking on the ice: they equip each of their feet with an animal's shin-bone, attaching it to the underside of their footwear; using hand-held poles reinforced with metal tips, which they periodically thrust against the ice, they propel themselves along as swiftly as a bird in flight or a bolt shot from a crossbow. But sometimes two, by accord, beginning far apart, charge each other from opposite directions and, raising their poles, strike each other with them. One or both are knocked down, not without injury, since after falling their impetus carries them off some distance and any part of their head that touches the ice is badly scratched and scraped. Often someone breaks a leg or an arm, if he falls onto it. But youth are driven to show off and demonstrate their superiority, so they are inclined to these mock battles, to steel themselves for real combat.

24. Those who amuse themselves with birds of prey

Many citizens enjoy sports involving high-flying birds – falcons, hawks and the like – or hounds for hunting in the woods. The citizens have hunting rights in Middlesex, Hertfordshire, throughout the Chilterns, and in Kent as far as the river Cray. The Londoners, in a time when they used to be called Trinovantes, repulsed Caius Julius Caesar, who "rejoiced to make no way save with the spilth of blood". Regarding which, Lucan writes: "To the Britons whom he sought, he showed his coward back".

25. Sons and daughters of the city of London

The city of London has been the birthplace of a number of persons who brought under their rule many kingdoms and the Roman empire, and many others who, through their excellent qualities, have been "raised to the Gods as lords of earth", just as had been promised to Brutus by Apollo's oracle:

"Brutus, past Gaul beneath the set of sun,
There lies an isle in Ocean ringed with waters.
This seek; for there shall be thine age-long home.
Here for thy sons shall rise a second Troy,
Here from thy blood shall monarchs spring, to whom All earth subdued shall its obeisance make."

During Christian times it gave birth to the noble emperor Constantine, who dedicated the city of Rome and all symbols of empire to God, St. Peter, and Silvester the Roman pope, to whom he showed his subordination by holding his stirrup; he preferred the title Defender of the Holy Roman Church, rather than the traditional one of emperor. So that the peace of His Eminence the Pope should not be disturbed by the hurly-burly of worldly affairs occasioned by his presence, Constantine entirely withdrew from the city he had handed over to the Pope, and built the city of Byzantium for himself.

In modern times, London has produced majestic and celebrated rulers: the Empress Matilda, King Henry III, and the blessed Thomas the archbishop, Christ's glorious martyr, "than whom she bore no whiter soul nor one more dear" to all good people in the whole of the Latinized world.

DISCUSSION

FitzStephen's Description has survived to us in several versions, some part of the biography of Becket, some independent (while some versions of the biography lack the Description). It has been printed and translated, in whole or extracts, a number of times since 1598, when Stow included a transcript in his Survey of London; he appears to have had access to another version, not now extant. The best-known translation is perhaps that of H.E. Butler, a professor of Latin at the University of London, published in 1934 as an accompaniment to Sir Frank Stenton's study Norman London (Historical Association Leaflets nos.93, 94). The translation by Butler, who was also qualified to identify many of the classical sources that FitzStephen quoted or adapted, was based on an examination and collation of several of the surviving versions. Christopher Brooke has more recently thrown fresh light on the Description, although I have not had access to his full translation.

The version in Liber Custumarum (hereafter L.C.) is not the oldest extant, having been copied into the London volume of memoranda in the early fourteenth century. Nor is it the best, for the copyist has made alterations to parts of FitzStephen's text he found unintelligible and has divided the text under a larger number of headings than other versions have. Those headings, none of which may have been present in FitzStephen's original, represent a more logical division than in the other versions; although even they do not fully do justice to the range of topics FitzStephen covered or occasionally disturb the logical flow of the narrative. I have chosen to translate the L.C. version simply because it reflects a city perspective, both from its author and from the editor-copyist of the L.C.. In attempting to render the literary style into modern, accessible English, I have inevitably taken more liberties than are necessary with other, more bureaucratic documents translated in this Florilegium. The reader is referred to Professor Butler's translation for something more faithful, for the most part, to the original Latin, as well as for references to the sources of quotations from other authors (which is not our principal concern here). In cases of such quotations, I have avoided modernizing but instead have relied on Professor Butler's expertise in the classics.

"men of superior quality"

The association that FitzStephen seems to imply between sports and the men of the city is that it is the heavy involvement in sporting activities that produces manly males. On the other hand we should not forget that this account of London is a preface to the biography of Londoner Thomas Becket, a man of superior quality in FitzStephen's eyes.

"weak slaves of lust"

This quotation, part of which is missing from the L.C. version, in this context means decadent.

"church of St. Paul"

St. Paul's cathedral was founded in the early 7th century as the seat of the bishop of the East Saxons. After fire destroyed one of a succession of versions of the building in 1087, it was rebuilt on an even larger scale and this version lasted throughout the Middle Ages. It was the largest structure in the city.

"if the citizens return to this island"

The seemingly cryptic phrase "if the citizens return to the island" (which I have modified with a slight clarification) has been identified by Christopher Brooke as an allusion to Geoffrey of Monmouth's History, specifically the prophecies of Merlin therein. Professor Brooke believes that in his adaptation of part of one of the prophecies, FitzStephen envisaged a possible restoration following the Second Coming of Christ. FitzStephen is evidently, however, torn between his loyalties to Canterbury and London.

"just grounds"

The L.C. version of the passage concerning whether Canterbury or London should have metropolitan status (i.e. the head of an ecclesiastical province) omits – probably more than a scribal error – an additional argument favouring Canterbury: that Becket's tomb was there.

"one hundred and twenty-six"

The number of 126 parish churches cannot be confirmed with certainty, but historians generally accept the high figure on the understanding that the "suburbs" included a large surrounding area of what is now Greater London. Having said that, it is likely that most of these churches (perhaps a hundred or so) lay within the city walls. English townspeople seem to have preferred worshipping in small churches with their close neighbours.

"royal fortress"

The fortress on the east side of the city was the Tower of London, built by William the Conqueror to ensure his control of one of England's power centres, which had resisted his claims to sovereignty. Although its size, intentionally, overawed the citizens, the Tower in the 12th century occupied a smaller site than it did later: basically the great keep (the White Tower) atop an existing small hill, surrounded by a palisaded ditch/rampart. The myth about the keep's mortar being mixed with the blood of beasts perhaps, Brooke cautiously implies, had some connection with the fact that butchers operated in East Smithfield, to the northeast of the Tower.

"castles"

The western fortresses, likewise probably built by William the Conqueror or with his permission, as part of his early programme to subdue England, were (subsequently) known as Montfichet Castle and Baynard's Castle, both named after families who at one time held the lordships of those fortifications. Castle Baynard was built in the southwestern corner of the city, just inside the city wall, and its lords later claimed – perhaps with justice – to hold the hereditary generalship of the city militia. The original castle lasted only to the 13th century, when the site was given to the Dominicans, although a more scaled-down version was later built. The site of Montfichet Castle is not known with certainty, but was probably just to the north of Baynard's, and was also gobbled up by the Dominican precinct.

"wall"

The city wall was the medieval citizens' principal inheritance from Roman Londinium. Unlike its medieval successor, which had no stretch along the riverfront, the Roman wall surrounded the city on all sides, and the Thames stretch evidently survived into the early Middle Ages, for local placenames such as Billingsgate and Dowgate would seem to reflect openings through the wall; it was around such openings that goods were being landed. But that part of the wall was not maintained, since the river frontage was gradually being extended into what had once been river and built on. Whether FitzStephen's reference to the Thames stretch was just a folk memory by his time, or whether some fragments of wall remained, we are not sure. Around the remainder of the wall there were six main gateways at this time: Aldgate on the east side; Bishopsgate, Cripplegate, Aldersgate on the northern circuit; and Newgate and Ludgate facing west. FitzStephen probably intended the Tower's postern gate as the seventh.

The suburb between the city and the palace of Westminster was more properly the site of the old Saxon town of Lundenwic, straddling the Strand and with settlement spreading as far west as the future Westminster. Although largely abandoned during the period of Viking incursions, this area was repopulated after Edward the Confessor refounded and enlarged the abbey there and established a palace nearby. In the 13th century Westminster attained borough status of its own. We can understand why Professor Brooke preferred to translate FitzStephen's suburbano as "faubourg", thinking of the orientation towards Westminster rather than London. The administrative capital and the commercial centre together defined what is modern London.

"suburban houses"

The suburban stretch between London and Westminster was beginning to become popular as the location of town houses of the nobility.

"if it has a good lord"

This aside is taken by some to be as close as FitzStephen dared come to an admonishment to Henry II, who is markedly absent from the list of worthy monarchs at the end of the Description. The dig, however, may be aimed more at the Empress Matilda, to whom the Londoners were opposed, rather than at Henry – Christopher Brooke suggests that FitzStephen had in mind the crisis of 1173, when London supported Henry against his rebellious son.

"20,000 cavalry and 60,000 infantry"

These figures are an obvious exaggeration (not atypical of medieval writers dealing with numbers greater than were countable), for the total population of the city in the 13th century is unlikely to have amounted to half that total. But certainly London did muster large forces to take part in the civil war between Matilda and Stephen.

following "dress, manners, and dining"

Curiously, the L.C. version omits here two sentences one might think the scribe would have taken pains to include. The first states (Butler's translation) that: "The inhabitants of other towns are called citizens, but of this they are called barons"; it has been suggested that the term represents a Latinization of the Anglo-Saxon burh-thegn, reflecting the superior status of merchants active internationally, but this is looking further than necessary – "baron" was a term widely employed in a variety of circumstances, ranging from no more than male head of a household to a tenant-in-chief of the king, either of which might be applicable to the leading men of London. Possibly, however, the omission of this sentence from the L.C. version reflects a change in use of "baron", restricting it more to the upper urban class. The second omitted sentence states (Butler) that: "With them a solemn oath ends all strife", a reference to the prominence of purgation in urban judicial procedures, which is echoed in the charter of Henry I to London.

"Sabines"

The Sabine women of Roman legend had become a metaphor for chastity, propriety and fidelity.

"schools"

The school attached to St. Paul's is heard of during the reign of Henry I. St. Martin-le-Grand was a college of secular canons in existence by 1068. Holy Trinity, Aldgate, was an Augustinian priory founded by Queen Matilda; its prior was also an alderman of the city, due to the priory's lordship of the Portsoken ward of London, acquired from the cnihtengild.

"enthymemes"

An enthymeme is a simple type of argument, in contrast to a syllogism which is a more complex form of argument.

"versified arguments"

Versification was presumably a device for assisting with memorization.

"Fescennine"

Fescennine verses were a crude precursor to Roman dramatic verse, often with a satirical or sarcastic bent (in some regards, limerick-like).

"Theon" "dithyrambs"

The L.C. version does not actually use those two terms, the copyist (or the source from which he copied) having failed to understand the terms, or their classical source (Horace), and having substituted other terms. A dithyramb was a song in praise of Bacchus and here perhaps connotes a bawdy verse.

"cookshop"

The cookshop that FitzStephen singles out may have been located on the vintner's quay, near to where the Walbrook flowed into the Thames.

"goose"

Butler argues that "goose" (anserem) is a corruption of "sturgeon" (acipenserem), which appears in other versions, on the grounds that the latter would appear more of a delicacy.

"cookery"

The point which FitzStephen, in somewhat garbled fashion, has taken from Plato is that cookery is like medicine in catering to the physical needs of citizens.

"field that is smooth"

The derivation of Smithfield is, as FitzStephen correctly states, from the fact that the field was "smooth" (level and/or trampled flat). It is West Smithfield to which he refers, there having been another field of the same name on the east side of the city, just outside the Tower.

"palfreys"

Horses of subdued temperament, easy to ride (especially for women).

"two or sometimes three boys"

An addition in some other versions, meaning "according to what the arrangement is", may imply the races were organized by spectators wishing to wager on the results.

"kine"

Here the term means cattle.

FitzStephen's use of the term "institores" (salesmen or hucksters) rather than

"mercatores" may or may not have some significance (perhaps derogatory?), so "middlemen" may catch his tone better than "merchants".

following the verse on merchandize

This lengthy quote (by an author unknown, but inspired by Virgil), while it may appear fanciful at first glance, and likely FitzStephen's knowledge of geography was weak, nonetheless provides a fair reflection of the type of goods involved in the London luxury trade of this period, and of the general area of the world from which they came. London was an important trade destination.

"it was founded"

FitzStephen doubtless took this legend of London's founding by Trojans fleeing the wreck of their Homeric city from Geoffrey of Monmouth, who had it from even older tradition. This legend was of some psychological significance to Londoners, judging from the fact that it resurfaced periodically and at one point leading politician Nicholas Brembre was said (perhaps scurrilously) to be contemplating renaming London "New Troy", as the legend had it named originally.

"in common"

Some continued to argue, down into the 19th century, the influence of Rome on medieval urban institutions. The comparable elements are, however, so fundamental to organized civic life that we do not need to resort to such an argument.

"wards"

The two dozen wards – 12 on either side of the Walbrook – were a basis for raising manpower for policing and defence of the city (several encompassed territory surrounding a part of the city wall). An alderman had authority in each ward and presided over his own court (wardmoot), comparable to a hundredal jurisdiction; wards seem to have been named after the incumbent alderman. The wards may perhaps trace their roots to a time when London lacked a centralized authority and certain areas were administratively independent communities of varying types; their precise boundaries may not have become fixed until the 11th century.

"sheriffs"

By the time FitzStephen wrote, two sheriffs administered on behalf of the king London and a large area of adjacent territory (Middlesex); as a collection of administrative areas comparable to hundreds, this territory had a status analogous to a shire. The fundamental duty of a sheriff was to collect and deliver revenues due to the king. During Henry II's the office was frequently held by citizens, and sometimes earlier – the charter of Henry I to the city tries to formalize this, but we cannot be certain of the authenticity of the charter. It was likely the sheriffs who came to preside in the husting court, although that institution is heard of as early as the late 10th century, later to be superseded by the mayor (an office post-dating FitzStephen) in the role.

"senatorial order"

In using this term (Senatoriam dignitatem), FitzStephen is probably thinking more in terms of the office of alderman than a class of patricians, although it would be possible to read into it that some Londoners were at this time perceived as worthier than others of holding aldermannic office.

"custom"

Even though FitzStephen's term is jus statuendi, I am inclined to think that he was not referring to any specific statute formulated by city government – at this period it being doubtful whether London had such communal organization – but by the 'natural law', or custom, later encapsulated in writing as a quasi-constitution.

"assemblies"

Here the term refers to governmental meetings involving public presence and participation. He was likely thinking of the folk moot, which met three times a year, and the husting court which, as Henry I's charter indicated, convened every Monday.

"drink"

The transcription has putatio, which would be nonsensical in its translation of "pruning" but has been interpreted as "fornication". Entirely apart from the fact that the Latin for that would be putagio, it seems unlikely that fornication, although doubtless as offensive to FitzStephen, would have been as conspicuous a folly as drunkenness, and we may recall that he has already (section 1) praised the chastity of London's matrons. We can clearly prefer the potatio of other versions.

FitzStephen makes an interesting distinction between cives and municipes. While it is risky to read anything too precise or fixed into this, FitzStephen himself grew up in the urban community and may have been conscious of a distinction. To effect a translation inevitably results in an interpretive decision, and the temptation is to distinguish between those who were residents of the town, which the passage goes on to support, and those who were members of the civic community – the latter being fully subject to local jurisdiction and sharing in communal privileges and obligations. Whether "citizenship" was, at this date, more formally defined in terms of freeman status is questionable; FitzStephen's statement might suggest not. But we may remember that true Londoners had, by the time FitzStephen wrote and perhaps within the scope of his personal memory, forcefully expressed collective identity in the form of the commune.

"boys' games"

It is possible that FitzStephen was using pueri in the general sense of "children", but more likely that his thinking was focused on boys – himself and his fellow playmates from school. His text as a whole shows little perception of the female dimension of urban society.

"Carnival"

Carnival (or Carnilevaria in the Latin) was Shrove Tuesday, the festival marking the beginning of Lent when meat-eating (carnivorax) was put aside (levare); it was consequently taken as an opportunity for great feasting and drinking – by the end of the Middle Ages it had almost become orgiastic in its excesses, which were condemned by the Church.

"ball game"

FitzStephen's use of the term is the earliest reference in England to what eventually became football.

"workers"

By workers (exercitatores), FitzStephen was probably thinking of the apprentices and journeymen; the masters of the trades and crafts were perhaps included among the older (majores natus) citizens.

"Lent"

Lent, the few weeks before Easter, was presumably a natural time to practice horsemanship, weapons and combat skills, since it preceded the preferred campaigning season. That the river-based contests were later may have been to allow the water to lose some of its winter chill.

"lay sons"

FitzStephen means those who were not being trained for a career in the Church.

"military spears"

By qualifying spears with "military" FitzStephen as presumably contrasting the pike-like spears used by soldiers with shorter spears used for hunting.

following "cannot stand still"

FitzStephen appears to have forgotten he has already made use of this quotation (section 13).

"bridge"

This is of course London Bridge; since it was the only one in existence at that period, it needed no distinguishing name. It is not clear whether the galleries (solariis) were actually part of the structure of the bridge, as was the case in later centuries, or were part of buildings on the riverbank. FitzStephen probably felt no need to clarify, expecting his readers to know. The bridge was one of those features of London FitzStephen took for granted and felt no need to dwell on. He could not know that, by representing the crossing of the Thames, it also reflected the reason why settlement was established at London in the first place and why London became important under the Romans, the hub of their road system in Britain. It was they who built the first London bridge, just east of the site of the medieval and present bridge. The site was probably dictated primarily by the availability of suitably solid ground on the southern bank of the Thames, which was marshier than the northern bank, for a road leading south. Not long after FitzStephen wrote, the city authorities rebuilt the bridge in stone; it was an expression of the confidence of communal government, and has remained one of the foremost symbols of the city, down to modern times.

"athletics"

This seems to be a plausible interpretation of saliendo, literally "leaping" (although a related term meant "tumblers").

"(by use of a strap) beyond a marker"

The relatively lengthy qualifications attached to javelin throw were presumably to make it clear that the purpose was to throw a distance, rather than hit a target.

"bucklers"

These were small, round shields intended for practice or lightly-armed combat; we may assume that swords of some kind were also used in the one-on-one combats.

"great marsh"

This lay in the area now remembered by the names Moorfields and Moorgate. It served as meadowland when it was kept drained, thanks in part to the Walbrook – a stream which divided the city into eastern and western halves – channelling water into the Thames. During the Middle Ages, the moor was not kept well-drained, and the Walbrook's course was encumbered with debris and garbage cast therein by the citizens; consequently, the area became boggy.

"slide along"

The run-and-slide recreation was still, in my schooldays, a favourite playground activity during the winter, done exactly as FitzStephen describes.

"shin-bone"

Numerous examples of such crude ice-skates have been found at archaeological sites, dating from the 8th century to the close of the Middle Ages.

"hunting rights"

The extensive area of hunting rights probably owes much to the role of London as a centre of one of the early Saxon kingdoms. Compare with the clause in Henry I's charter.

"King Henry III"

Henry II, wishing to secure the succession of his heirs, had his eldest son Henry crowned in 1170; "the young king", however, did not outlive his father to take sole possession of the throne.

"city perspective"

A further known copy, made from the Liber Custumarum version in the late fourteenth century, is notable for several updates made to reflect the situation at that time. It was selective in what it copied, showing interest in passages on city administration and economy and ignoring those on social recreations. But it retained the reference to the supposed Trojan roots of London, showing a continuing interest in that legend. See Hannes Kleineke, "Carleton's book: William FitzStephen's 'Description of London' in a late fourteenth-century common-place book," Historical Research, vol.74 (2001), 117-26.

TRANSLATION

When you reach England, if you come to London, pass through it quickly, for I do not at all like that city. All sorts of men crowd together there from every country under the heavens. Each race brings its own vices and its own customs to the city. No-one lives in it without falling into some sort of crime. Every quarter of it abounds in grave obscenities. The greater a rascal a man is, the better a man he is accounted. I know whom I am instructing. You have a warmth of character beyond your years, and a coolness of memory; and from these contrary qualities arises a temperateness of reasoning. I fear nothing for you, unless you live with evil companions, for manners are formed by association.

Well, be that as it may! You will arrive in London. Behold, I prophesy to you: whatever evil or malicious thing that can be found in any part of the world, you will find in that one city. Do not associate with the crowds of pimps; do not mingle with the throngs in eating-houses; avoid dice and gambling, the theatre and the tavern. You will meet with more braggarts there than in all France; the number of parasites is infinite. Actors, jesters, smooth-skinned lads, Moors, flatterers, pretty boys, effeminates, pederasts, singing and dancing girls, quacks, belly-dancers, sorceresses, extortioners, night-wanderers, magicians, mimes, beggars, buffoons: all this tribe fill all the houses. Therefore, if you do not want to dwell with evildoers, do not live in London. I do not speak against learned or religious men, or against Jews: however, because of their living amidst evil people, I believe they are less perfect there than elsewhere.

I do not go to the extent of saying that you should not go to any city whatever, since in my opinion there is nowhere for you to live except in a city; I refer only to which city. If, therefore, you arrive in the neighbourhood of Canterbury or if, indeed, you pass through it, your journey will be wasted. There is a whole collection of men there who have been abandoned by their lately deified leader, I know not whom, who was high priest of the men of Canterbury, who now, through lack of bread and of work, die in the open day in the broad streets. Rochester and Chichester are mere hamlets, and there is no reason why they should be called cities, except for the bishops' seats.

Oxford scarcely sustains, much less satisfies, her own men. Exeter refreshes both men and beasts with the same provender. Bath, placed or, rather, dumped down in the midst of the valleys, in an exceedingly heavy air and sulphureous vapour, is at the gates of hell. Neither should you choose a seat in the Marches, Worcester, Chester, or Hereford, because of the Welsh, who are prodigal of the lives of others. York is full of Scotsmen, filthy and treacherous creatures scarcely men. The region of Ely stinks perpetually from the surrounding fens. In Durham, Norwich, and Lincoln there are very few people of your sort amongst the powerful, and you will hear almost no-one speaking French. At Bristol there is no-one who is not or has not been a soap-maker, and every Frenchman loves soap-makers as he loves a dung-heap.

Outside the cities, every market-place, village, or town has inhabitants both ignorant and boorish. Moreover, for such qualities always look on Cornishmen as we in France consider our Flemings. In other respects, that country is most blessed with the dews of heaven and with richness of soil. In each locality there are some good men, but there are fewer of them by far in all of them put together than in one city, Winchester.

That city is in those parts the Jerusalem of the Jews; in that city alone do they enjoy perpetual peace. That city is a school for those who want to live and fare well. There they breed men; there you can have plenty of bread and wine for nothing. Monks are there of such mercifulness and gentleness, clerks of such wisdom and frankness, citizens of such courteousness and good faith, women of such beauty and modesty, that for a little I would go there myself and be a Christian among such Christians. I send you to that city, the city of cities, the mother of all and better than all others. There is one vice there and one alone, which is by custom greatly indulged in. I would say, with all due respect to the learned men and to the Jews, that the people of Winchester lie like sentries. Indeed, nowhere else under heaven are so many false rumours made up so easily as there; otherwise they are truthful in all things.

DISCUSSION

Richard de Devizes' chronicle of events of the early years of Richard I's reign (1189-92) was produced for the benefit of a former Prior of St. Swithun's and is not believed to have circulated much beyond perhaps a small group of friends. Only two versions are known to have survived and that there may not have been others is suggested by the lack of references to his work by later writers.

Richard was a man of distinct prejudices and quite willing to make them known – at least among that circle of intimates for whom his chronicle was produced. Among those prejudices was a distaste for urban society, other than that of the city in which he lived. On the other hand, his opinions may have been distorted somewhat by the satirical character of his work; parts of his chronicle are irreverent and intended to amuse – his humour is perhaps at its best in his critique of the towns and the surrounding passages. Dr. Appleby's translation so well captures this character that I have thought it futile to try to offer here a new translation of my own, although I have broken the text into shorter paragraphs to make it easier to read.

The context for Richard's critique is a fictional speech by a French Jew to a young orphan he had befriended; having advised the boy to seek his fortune in England, which he describes as "a land flowing with milk and honey", he goes on to recommend the places to avoid – being practically all of the towns he mentions. Since the Jew can only recommend the youngster to his fellow Jews in England, there is no notion that the boy might go beyond urban centres, where Jewish communities congregated. Ironically, the boy later becomes the purported victim of a ritual murder by the Jews; this was a time when attacks on Jewish communities were incited by similar accusations elsewhere, attacks to which Richard refers at the beginning of his chronicle, while noting that Winchester did not get caught up in that madness. There is an additional irony in that Richard, like most Englishmen of his time, had no love for the French (nor evidently for any other foreigners); thus the critique of English towns may itself be intended to be seen by readers as suspect because of its source – perhaps Richard was seeking to escape any possible censure by portraying his own opinions as those of another.

"all this tribe"

Since the foregoing list was inspired in part by lines from Horace's Satires, and probably other classical sources, we must beware of taking it too literally.

"abandoned by their lately deified leader"

The leader was Becket, and the "abandonment" refers to a dispute which turned nasty between the monks of Canterbury and some of Becket's successors as archbishop.

"bishops' seats"

The technical distinction between a city and a town was the the former was the base for a bishopric and therefore home to a cathedral.

TRANSLATION

The population of this island does not appear to me to bear any proportion to her fertility and riches. I rode, as your Magnificence knows, from Dover to London, and from London to Oxford, a distance of more than 200 Italian miles, and it seemed to me to be very thinly inhabited; but, lest the way I went with your Magnificence should have differed from the other parts of the country, I enquired of those who rode to the north of the kingdom, i.e. to the borders of Scotland, and was told that it was the same case there; nor was there any variety in the report of those who went to Bristol and into Cornwall ...

[....]

... there are scarcely any towns of importance in the kingdom, excepting these two: Bristol, a seaport to the west, and Boraco (Eboracum) otherwise York, which is on the borders of Scotland; besides London to the south.

Eboracum was in ancient times the principal city of the island, and was adorned by many buildings by the Romans, in their elegant style; but, having been sacked and burnt in the reign of King William the Conqueror, she never afterwards could recover her former splendour; so that, at present, all the beauty of this island is confined to London; which, although sixty miles distant from the sea, possesses all the advantages to be desired in a maritime town; being situated on the river Thames, which is very much affected by the tide, for many miles (I do not know the exact number) above it: and London is so much benefited by this ebb and flow of the river, that vessels of 100 tons burden can come up to the city, and ships of any size to within five miles of it; yet the water in this river is fresh for twenty miles below London. Although this city has no buildings in the Italian style, but of timber or brick like the French, the Londoners live comfortably, and, it appears to me, that there are not fewer inhabitants than at Florence or Rome. It abounds with every article of luxury, as well as with the necessaries of life: but the most remarkable thing in London, is the wonderful quantity of wrought silver. I do not allude to that in private houses, though the landlord of the house in which the Milanese ambassador lived, had plate to the amount of 100 crowns, but to the shops of London. In one single street, named the Strand, leading to St. Paul's, there are fifty-two goldsmith's shops, so rich and full of silver vessels, great and small, that in all the shops in Milan, Rome, Venice, and Florence put together, I do not think there would be found so many of the magnificence that are to be seen in London. And these vessels are all either salt cellars, or drinking cups, or basins to hold water for the hands; for they eat off that fine tin, which is little inferior to silver (pewter). These great riches of London are not occasioned by its inhabitants being noblemen or gentlemen; being all, on the contrary, persons of low degree, and artificers who have congregated there from all parts of the island, and from Flanders, and from every other place. No one can be mayor or alderman of London, who has not been an apprentice in his youth; that is, who has not passed the seven or nine years in that hard service described before. Still, the citizens of London are thought quite as highly of there, as the Venetian gentlemen are at Venice, as I think your Magnificence may have perceived.

The city is divided into several wards, each of which has six officers; but superior to these, are twenty-four gentlemen who they call aldermen; and, of these aldermen, one is elected every year by themselves, to be a magistrate named the mayor, who is in no less estimation with the Londoners, than the person of our most serene lord (the Doge) is with us, or than the Gonfaloniero at Florence; and the day on which he enters upon his office, he is obliged to give a sumptuous entertainment to all the principal people in London, as well as to foreigners of distinction; and I, being one of the guests, together with your Magnificence, carefully observed every room and hall, and the court, where the company were all seated, and was of opinion that there must have been 1000 or more persons at table. This dinner lasted four hours or more; but it is true that the dishes were not served with that assiduity and frequency that is the custom with us in Italy; there being long pauses between each course, the company conversing the while.

A no less magnificent banquet is given when two other officers named sheriffs are appointed; to which I went, being anxious to see every thing well; your Magnificence was also invited, but did not go in consequence of the invitation having come from the Lord Privy Seal. At this feast, I observed the most infinite profusion of victuals, and of plate, which was for the most part gilt; and amongst other things, I noticed how punctiliously they sat in their order, and the extraordinary silence of every one, insomuch that I could have imagined it one of those public repasts of the Lacedemonians that I have read of.

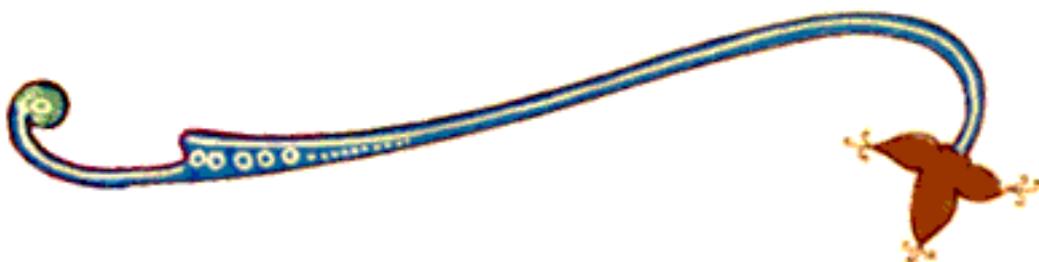

In imitation of London, which is truly the metropolis of England, every town, however small, elects its mayor, and the least towns their bailiff, and the shires their sheriff. I believe that the same is done in the island of Jersey, one of the Menanian isles, lying near the kingdom of England to the south; and in other small islands appertaining to Normandy, but nevertheless under the dominion of England.

DISCUSSION

Neither the identity of the sender nor that of the recipient of the report, of which the above is just an extract, is known for certain. It is assumed from internal evidence to be a report produced for a commissioner sent by Venice to England in 1496 to negotiate a treaty of alliance, which task was concluded the following year. The reporter was evidently part of the embassy sent to England and remained behind after the commissioner returned home, in order to carry out additional research and write his report, which he did in 1500, according to its title.

It is therefore not surprising that London gets the lion's share of the attention, as it does from Devizes and of course FitzStephen. The writer's direct knowledge of English towns, as he admits, is limited, and he relied on reports of others for locations farther afield. It seems unlikely he would have relished visiting most, for only London came close to matching the great Italian cities with which he was familiar – although his incorrect suggestion that London was as populous as Florence or Rome is an example of his tendency to exaggerate for effect.

The writer's particular interest in London is in its commerce: its capacity to act as a maritime port, and its luxury trades. The main thrust of his research seems to be towards England's wealth, and who controls it, although he is clearly as fascinated as any tourist in a country so different in many regards from Italy; his report addresses a wide range of subjects, from social behaviour to the way the kingdom was governed, and he makes the types of errors in interpretation that one might expect from a tourist, although at times there is some depth to his perception – he was at least an avid researcher.

"goldsmiths"

London's goldsmiths had in fact been known, nationally and internationally, for their skill since at least the 11th century and in the 13th century a small community of English goldsmiths (some with the surname de London) were found operating in Genoa.

The role of the Church in urban life

It is tempting today to think of towns primarily as business and industrial centres. Yet by contrast with the secularized and highly commercialized society of the latter half of the twentieth century, in which the cityscape has been dominated by sprawling factories, indoor shopping centres, and towering high-rises for residential, business or governmental use, the urban skyline of the Middle Ages spoke of the prominent role of the Church in society. The towers and spires of cathedrals, abbeys, friaries, and churches rose above other architectural features of the townscape (castles excepted). Religious institutions consumed a large amount of urban territory, both in their own precincts which were sometimes quite extensive, and in properties they had acquired, by purchase, gift or bequest, which provided revenues from rents. They had command of large proportion of the wealth of the nation. A sizeable minority of the residents of urban areas, whether intramural or suburban, were in religious orders: clerks, priests, deacons, monks, friars. Despite the programmes operated by fraternal societies of laymen and laywomen, most of what we would consider today social services were provided by religious institutions: temporary housing and food handouts for the poor or disabled, care of the sick, education, protective custody (sanctuary), and retirement homes. Finally, most of what we know of the Middle Ages through its documentary evidence was written by men trained and educated by the Church.

The Church played an important role in the survival or revival of urban life in the Early Middle Ages, providing some degree of leadership, protection, and a wealthy clientele for local products and services; the growth of many settlements was initiated or stimulated by the foundation of cathedrals and monasteries. This patronage and authority continued in subsequent centuries. In the High Middle Ages, bishops were prominent among the founders of "new towns". Even where bishops or abbots were not themselves lords of towns, their influence was strong: they had jurisdiction over large areas within the urban boundaries, they were employers or landlords of many townspeople, and they exercised spiritual authority. The more important of these ecclesiastical foundations demonstrated their dominance in the form of superior skills (e.g. architectural, literacy), through the wealth at their disposal, and through the favour of king and nobles, who were patrons of the institutions and increasingly chose burial there.

On the other hand, the proliferation of smaller churches during the High Middle Ages, of which Domesday Book provides clear evidence, can also be an important reflection of urban development, since these churches were largely private foundations and the result of a growth in prosperity in urban areas. During the Early Middle Ages the Christian church had a missionary character in England, and the minsters built as a focus of missionary activity were the central points of worship, in part because there were relatively few priests available. However, it was more suitable to many of the converted owners of estates to build their own chapels or village churches, and at the same time the very centralization of the minsters made them targets for the depredations of the Vikings.

These illustrations of London suggest how ecclesiastical architecture visually dominated the cityscape.

The tenth and eleventh centuries saw a high-level of church-building by laymen in established towns; it was an activity by which men showed that they were men of wealth and status, leaders in their community, and to be respected for their piety. Although these churches were mostly associated with private residences, some public use may have been allowed, if only for the founder's tenants. The transfers of land ownership after the Conquest added further impetus to church-building or to re-dedications of existing churches. At the same time as local churches were proliferating, the tithe system enforced by legislation in the tenth century provided a means for their financial support and, by placing the onus of support on the locality rather than the private founder, set the scene for the gradual development of the parish system.

By the twelfth century, during which period the nobility turned over their control of many local churches to the bishops or to monastic houses, the parish system had taken shape and private churches were being converted to parish churches. The number of churches reached its peak around this time or a little later, in part due to development of new towns or expansion of existing ones. The number actually declined slightly during the Late Middle Ages, and new towns founded from the twelfth century on were more likely to focus on a single parish church. Urban wealth in this period focused rather on the rebuilding, expansion and beautification of parish churches (although this did not happen in all towns), and private citizens had to content themselves with founding chantries or chapels rather than entire new churches.

One can hardly turn a corner in central Norwich without coming across a church, most of which served a medieval parish; a mere handful are shown here.

The high ratio of churches in medieval Norwich is still evidenced by surviving buildings, although many have now been turned to non-religious uses. As astonishing as this concentration may seem to the modern visitor, around 1300 there were almost twice as many: perhaps 60 parish churches, serving a city population probably between five to ten thousand people. Although the Late Middle Ages saw a drop in the number of churches at Norwich, some destroyed and others reduced to chapels, most of those that remained were rebuilt on a larger scale and were capable of holding congregations of around 200-250. London had just over twice as many churches as Norwich, but serving a population several times the size; the Great Fire of 1666 put paid to most of the medieval structures. The number in York, compared to population size, again suggests an average congregation of about 200 people. It was the longer-established towns that had so many parishes, inheriting a network of churches established prior to Domesday. By contrast, less important towns such as Maldon had only a few parishes, while the newer foundations of Lynn and Yarmouth are examples of the single-parish model.

Early churches were mostly modest in size and simple in plan. Their primary role was to accommodate a congregation, and so the most basic form of a church encompassed a single rectangular hall. A second important function was liturgical services, and so the most common form of the early church involved two adjoined spaces: nave and chancel. Some churches were built with, or had added later, side chapels for special ceremonies (e.g. funerals) or to house altars to saints other than the principal dedication. Or they might have a tower to serve as belfry, community landmark acting as a constant visual reminder of Christian values – many of the Anglo-Saxon towers probably having been crowned by a wooden steeple – and for defensive purposes (although this aspect has been exaggerated). Anglo-Saxon churches used much more timber in their construction than we see today; the rebuilding that became fashionable in the twelfth century, and continued into the thirteenth, replaced timber structures with more durable stone.

That trend was accompanied by the elaboration of church decoration through wall-paintings and followed by the introduction of stained glass. The Biblical stories and miracles portrayed were intended to assist preachers with the instruction of the laity in religious messages; initially they illustrated Biblical stories and figures, particularly the life of Christ, but towards the close of the Middle Ages more admonitory themes – such as the Last Judgement or moralistic stories – were favoured, a change in temperament inspired partly by the traumatic impact of the Black Death. But there was also a desire simply to beautify churches for the glory of God (and to win divine favour for those who paid for the beautification), seen in the more elaborate carving on fonts, the intricate wooden screens to separate one section of the church from the remainder, and the ornate tomb sculptures that began to find their way inside churches from the thirteenth century, followed by brasses. By the fourteenth century we see an almost competitive interest on the part of laymen for contributing towards the improvement and decoration of the fabric of the church and and beauty and richness of its furnishings; most leading townsmen in their wills left something to their parish church, if not to several churches in their community as well as to those in places with which they had family or commercial connections, although part of the rationale was self-interested piety.

Townpeople could give generously to the Church in life as well as in death. Besides genuine piety, they were motivated by such things as the desire to beautify the parish churches where they worshipped, to enhance their social status by being seen as benefactors, and to obtain some benefit in return from the Church – such as prayers for the soul, or retirement provisions.

The parish was the principal means of organizing the practice of religion by the lay community. Parishioners were expected to attend mass in their parish church each Sunday and on the special festivals, to receive the sacraments of Penance and the Eucharist there yearly, and to support the parish church through tithes and oblations (offerings). The roles of the parish priest were:

- to teach Christian values to the parish community, through sermons for example, and oversee the adherence to those values;
- to provide the fundamental services required by the community, such as baptisms, weddings and funerals, although the scarcity of records of such make it difficult to assess just how common baptism and wedding rites were;
- to perform the increasingly elaborate liturgical rituals;
- to preserve and if possible increase the property, revenues, and rights of their church;
- and to undertake charitable work, particularly in support of the poor.

Sometimes the amount of work required more than one priest to serve a church, and where chantries were established within a church this called for additional staff. Priests, however, were not supported by wives. Reforms during the High Middle Ages aimed at ensuring priests were unmarried was in part a concern for their purity, but also a desire to avoid any of the Church's property becoming in effect a family inheritance, divisible among heirs. The parishioners do not appear to have had much control over their parish priests, however; it was up to periodic episcopal visitations to root out performance or morality problems, as well as deal with parishioners defaulting in their duties.

The principal income to support the parish church and its staff was the tithes, a kind of tax payable on crops, livestock, wage earnings, and profits from commerce or industry. The Church was constantly battling with a minority of parishioners to obtain these payments due it; but the majority seem to have acquiesced in their financial obligations, although resentment over tithes seems to have increased in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, perhaps most notably in London where resistance became widespread. In those later centuries, wills not uncommonly include bequests to the parish church to cover tithes unpaid due to (supposedly) negligence or oversight, although the small size of most such bequests is not suggestive of serious defaults. A mortuary payment at the funeral was expected, in part to cover defaults in tithes. Ad hoc offerings, at festivals or in gratitude for non-routine services also contributed to the income supporting the church, the maintenance of the priest in his own residence, and the payment of those who helped the parish priest undertake increasingly complex liturgical and administrative duties – notably a parish clerk, sometimes with his own assistant (the suffragan).

With much of the responsibility for the upkeep and improvement of church buildings falling upon the parish community, meetings of parishioners – later to become formalized as the vestry – must have occurred periodically, and we start to hear in the late thirteenth century of the churchwardens, lay officers whose range of duties, growing over time, included fund-raising, repair of church fabric and furnishings, purchase of supplies, and administering some of the church revenues. However, this kind of community involvement in managing church affairs may have varied from place to place across the country; the scarcity of related documents leaves us uncertain how common churchwardens were. For the extensive improvements or substantial re-building efforts undertaken in the late fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, individual benefactors vying with each other in their generosity were instrumental in some initiatives, while the cumulative effect of small gifts or communal collections financed others; on one level, these alterations were aimed in part at making church conditions (e.g. lighting) better for the congregation, on another at memorializing the benefactors. The focus of the parish community on the physical fabric of its church, with the setting up of fabric funds and testamentary bequests to the fabric, provided another factor that siphoned money away from payment of tithes, perceived as supporting priests rather than churches.

Not only the parish community but also craft guilds and socio-religious guilds had associations with some particular church, or a chapel within a church. Guild valuables or trappings for pageants might be stored there. Guilds or individual members were among the patrons of improvements to those churches, whether extensions to or renovations of the structure, or beautification the church. The last century of so of the Middle Ages saw increased decoration of tombs with three-dimensional effigies or brasses; equipping of churches with gifts of relics or jewelled ornaments, religious art, gold and silver plate, service books, and even decorative priestly vestments; introduction of more carved features, such as roof supporters, pew ends, pulpits, and reredos; and, with rebuilding introducing more and larger windows, more numerous installations of painted glass (largely destroyed during the Reformation). In the case of the last, donors were often acknowledged by including in one of the less central panels their arms, a portrayal of them at prayer, or some representation of their trade. Brasses were likewise an expensive decoration; they reflect a growing preference for burial inside a church – something restricted to ecclesiastics until the twelfth century, and still uncommon in the next except for the nobility. To obtain this privilege, bequests to the church were de rigueur.

Decoration of both the exterior and interior of religious buildings must have given the phrase "to the glory of God" meaning that we can hardly appreciate today, when so much of the colour and richness has been lost. The art served to reinforce the educational messages of Catholicism, by targeting the visual senses (in a manner perhaps not dissimilar to the effect of television today), as well as to inspire awe both for religion and for the power of the Church.

Chantries

While the beautification of parish churches was in part a matter of community and of civic pride, the desire of the wealthy to leave a memorial for themselves and the more general desire to commemorate their dead and, particularly, provide for the well-being of their souls during the expected ordeal in Purgatory. Borough governments increasingly became involved in the administration of such matters, as citizens looked to them – as perpetual institutions – to manage and protect their pious investments. The piety of the corporation itself (whether real or to enhance its authority) often found expression in the fifteenth century through a close affiliation with a socio-religious fraternity.

Chantries were endowments to maintain one or more priests to celebrate services for the soul of the founder(s), typically on a daily basis; foundations might take place during the founder's lifetime or through testamentary provision. Some founders intended for these services to continue indefinitely, and so we refer to them as perpetual chantries, in contrast with the provision of services for a limited period – usually for one year or a few years following death – which can be considered temporary chantries. The foundation of chantries was one of the most common concrete forms in which piety was expressed in late medieval England. In that period it was believed that nothing so pleased God as to have mass celebrated, and so to provide for the saying of mass was a sure way of winning divine favour. There are many instances, therefore, of medieval townspeople providing during life or at their deaths for masses being said. Money might be given to an existing religious institution so that one or more of its members would provide this service, or property assigned to provide annual income to support the services. In the latter case, those who could afford it established independent chantries through which masses could be said daily on a permanent basis, with a priest appointed solely for that function – wealthier founders, such as Richard Whittington, might set up a college of priests to man the effort.

If the founder was particularly wealthy, a perpetual chantry might have its own dedicated building constructed, served by a college of priests, or a new chapel built onto an existing church. But more commonly chantries were established in existing chapels of churches, or in other parts of the church, usually with a new altar being provided for the purpose by the founder; alternatively, services might be said at the tomb of the founder. It is important to conceive of chantries as services rather than places.

During the Late Middle Ages it was not too difficult to obtain licence to found a chapel in which a chantry was established.

Those wills that have survived for citizens of fourteenth-century London show that an average of 28 chantries were founded each decade. At York we know of at least 140 perpetual chantries that were founded during the course of the Late Middle Ages. Not all of the urban chantries were founded by citizens, whether individually or communally through guilds; some were by clerics or by gentry residing outside the town. However, all too often the funding provided for the indefinite continuance of chantries – usually in the form of a real estate endowment, whose annual rents supported chantry costs – proved inadequate within a couple of generations, or for other reasons the chantry lapsed or was amalgamated with a later foundation. The problem lay partly with dropping property values, and partly with rising clerical wages, following the depopulation due to mid-fourteenth century plague. Those able to provide a higher-level income to ensure continuance (like John Baret) had similarly high expectations of the amount of work the chantry priests would undertake. Others with more modest means, or more realistic outlooks, might provide for services to be said for their souls for a finite period of years; in fifteenth-century York, experiencing economic decline, this became the norm and foundation of perpetual chantries became a rarity. Still others might place their reliance on membership of socio-religious guilds, part of whose function was to maintain services for the souls of deceased members.

A chantry was established in the chapel added to the church of Holy Trinity, Goodramgate, York. Almshouses were built to endow another chantry there.

Other religious institutions in the towns

The vigour and importance of a medieval town may be reflected in the number of foundations not only of parish churches but of other religious institutions such as monasteries, friaries, hospitals – particularly the latter two, which were more reliant on support and donations from townspeople – and in a few cases cathedrals. Towns were less reliant than were rural communities on the parish church to provide the range of religious services needed. A few of the wealthiest townspeople could even afford to employ private chaplains or have private chapels in their own homes, although the extent of this practice seems to have varied from town to town.

The larger religious foundations – monasteries and abbeys, predominantly Benedictine, Cistercian or Augustinian – tended to have a touchy relationship with the urban community within, or adjacent to, which they were situated. Initially trying to distance themselves from the secular world, they attracted benefactors from that world – who endowed them with treasures, lands, and parish churches – and became wealthy and worldly as a result. Although an important market for products and services of the townspeople, the religious houses, as major landlords in the locality, had a degree of legal and commercial jurisdiction that periodically brought them into conflict with urban authorities. Not surprising then that their precincts were surrounded with high, sturdy walls (e.g. St. Mary's Abbey at York).

The friars, on the other hand, were an essentially urban phenomenon from the beginning, since their aim was to minister to sinners rather than to pursue a life of contemplation and worship; they integrated more comfortably, and intentionally, into towns. They arrived in England in the 1220s and, their intent being to preach to the maximum number of people possible, spread from town to town quite quickly during the first half of the thirteenth century; patronage from the nobility was often instrumental in the construction of the earliest friaries. Friaries tended to be built initially on unoccupied, out-of-the-way land, whether inside or outside the walled area of a town, that was of little use for other purposes. But in the fourteenth century we find some trying to establish themselves closer to the centre of town life, closer to their audiences. The orders of the Dominicans (Black Friars or Friars Preacher) and Franciscans (Grey Friars or Friars Minor) were most in evidence, with the Carmelites (White Friars) and Augustinians next in prominence.

Twentieth-century depiction of a friar preaching from the market cross.

It was, ironically, the fact that friars were dedicated to lives of poverty that attracted the approval of townspeople (as well as of the nobility) and their benefactions. Historians are uncertain whether this endeared them to the lowest levels of urban society: the ideal of apostolic poverty, in the context of a community of mutual support, may not have had much appeal to those living in destitution and lacking the communal support available in the upper echelons of urban society. On the other hand, perhaps the friars' philosophy that poverty was a commendable state which would bring rewards in the afterlife enabled prosperous townspeople to feel less concerned about the plight of the poor. Yet a high level of patronage could work against the friars; if they became seduced away from their ideals by the higher standard of living made possible, it could jeopardise their reputation in the eyes of townspeople. That the friaries must have been comparatively comfortable accommodations is suggested by the fact that visiting dignitaries, including kings, often chose to stay there.

Friaries attracted not only living benefactors and guests, but also dead ones. Donations to friaries are a common feature of wills, and they were popular burial places for those who could afford it. Friaries seem to have been attractive to the upper echelons of urban society, which increased the resentment of the parish clergy at the competition. As well, arrangements for memorial services to the deceased could be made through the friaries, as an alternative to a chantry in a parish church. But perhaps their greatest influence on urban society may have been through their sermons, although we know too little about these to judge precisely what impact they had.

Sizable chunks of urban land had been, by the close of the Middle Ages, consumed in the larger towns by friary precincts; it being the major towns, with the larger populations and wealthier benefactors, where multiple orders could flourish side by side. Some were established within the heavily populated areas of towns, while others received land in less populated or wasteland areas, or in suburbs, although the friars' preference seems to have been to be situated as close to their lay audiences as possible. The management of property may have helped make the friars more worldly, although they sometimes sought lay administrators. The friaries, along with monasteries, were dissolved in the reign of Henry VIII and their properties passed into private hands, a fact that goes a long way to explaining why relatively little has survived either of their architecture – except where it was suitable for conversion to residential or commercial purposes – or their archives.

Heresy

The thirteenth and fourteenth centuries were a time of great intellectual speculation, thanks in part to the rise of universities, when established theology was subjected to question. There was, however, no significant heretical movement in England before the late fourteenth century. At that time, from the environment of intellectual debate emerged John Wycliffe; his initial metaphysical speculations expanded into a condemnation of the structural fundamentals of the Church: the papacy, the sacraments, priestly authority, excommunication, etc. Although heresies which had divided society in parts of Europe in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries had left England largely untouched, there had been, for a long time before Wycliffe, among the common people and even the lower ranks of the clergy a distaste for the wealthy, self-satisfied, and, in some instances, dissolute Church establishment more interested in protecting the status quo than promoting true Christian values. The worldly vices of some of the clergy, and absenteeism of others, so that duties to parishioners were left to those less well-endowed, similarly diminished laymen's respect for the mainstream Church. This helps explain why the friars, initially exemplars of the ideals of apostolic poverty, simplicity and spirituality (and, ironically, a rather anti-establishment movement given papal blessing in order to fight heretical fire with fire), were welcomed by townspeople as an alternative. Wycliffism only added doctrinal enrichment to an existing undercurrent of religious thought that, in later times, is called puritanical.

It was not heresy but plague that brought disruption to social organization, both secular and religious, prompting the lower classes (now at an advantage with the shortage of labour) to seek economic improvement while increasing their resentment of the wealthy, while landlords tried to dig in their heels and maintain the established social and economic order. Wycliffism, arising at a time when even the friars had lost their apostolic ardour and become propertied and worldly and a target for criticism, simply gave the underlying discontent a focus and brought anti-clericalism to a crisis point, of which one expression was the Peasants' Revolt, with its insistence on redistribution of the wealth of the Church. Its initial successes were also due in part to the preparedness of some politicians – as far up the ladder as John of Gaunt – to support anti-clericalism for their own reasons.

The heretical movement called Lollardy (originally by its detractors, although the precise meaning of the term is debated), following in Wycliffe's footsteps, and facilitated to some degree by the political conflict in the latter part of Richard II's reign, acquired sufficient support as to present a real threat to both Church and State, requiring severe measures from each to suppress it. They included an Act promulgated by the Church and supported by the State, condemning persistent heretics to be burnt at the stake – although there were not very many executions, the Church preferring public recantations to martyrs. By 1414, with the failure of the uprising by Sir John Oldcastle – a response to the newly-enthroned Henry V's expressed determination to support his bishops in stamping out heresy – the strength of the movement had been broken. Yet Lollard ideas continued to diffuse through and percolate in various parts of England for the next three decades, and in some places even longer, providing a legacy for Protestantism.

An economic downturn in some parts of England during the fifteenth century aroused among merchants and crafts masters greater resentment towards the wealth of the Church; this may have helped the spread of Lollardy in some towns, while at the same time decreasing tolerance of the licentious behaviour of some of the clergy. The growth in educational standards among the urban upper class may also have been a factor here, both through the spread of vernacular literature and through raising expectations of the moral and educational standards of the clergy.

It is not evident that "Lollardy" represents a clearly defined set of beliefs; confessions of accused heretics suggest diversity in the ways their beliefs diverged from Catholicism. The above image of the crucifixion is from a replica of the Jelling runestone in Jutland, ca.965; the stone was a monument to King Harald Bluetooth's intent to Christianize the Danes. The original is held by the National Museum of Denmark.

Charitable attitudes

For I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in: Naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me.

[Matthew 25: 35-36, King James Version]

These instructions of Jesus to his apostles formed the basis of the charitable obligations of Christians in the Middle Ages. They were known as the Corporal Acts of Mercy and depictions are found in stained-glass windows such as those at York and Leicester.

In the view of the early Church, private property (i.e. wealth) was not something God had in mind when he created the world. But it was a reality of medieval society and of course the Church itself accumulated immense wealth. The position that gradually emerged from the work of theologians and canonists was that while the unbridled pursuit of profit was contrary to Christian morals, wealth was acceptable so long as it was put to good uses, notably the support of one's family and support for the wider community, particularly the less fortunate members of the community. There was no notion of eradicating poverty, as a social undesirable; but alongside an acceptance of poverty as a part of the social hierarchy went the belief that the involuntarily poor had the right to expect help from the wealthy. At the same time, the recognition of poverty as part of the social reality led Catholic thinkers to rationalize and glorify it as a form of spiritual purity, although it is hard to imagine that for the lay poor this made their situation more palatable.

It can be argued – though not without contradiction – that poverty became more of an issue as a result of the emergence and growth of towns. In rural communities, the difference in economic status between one resident and another was less dramatic; most lived close to the subsistence level, but there was a high degree of mutual support possible in a small, close-knit community where everyone knew each other. Towns, by their nature, fostered differentiation in occupation, level of success, and socio-economic status; they attracted large numbers of immigrants, creating a growing labour supply which had an adverse effect on employment availability and wages. The labouring class as a whole was perceived as poor; with no discretionary income, they were also disempowered, and with a poor standard of living and harsh working conditions were more susceptible to health problems. Up to the end of the Middle Ages in England we still find urban society viewing itself through the simple differentiation between the potentiores and the pauperes groups, even though they also saw a middle group in the equation. Thanks in large part to the friars, towns were also where there was a good deal of social pressure, i.e. through preaching, on behalf of poor relief; they were likewise where most charitable support institutions were founded.

The poor, sick, and unfortunate, along with churches and their personnel, were typical recipients of charitable bequests. In some cases it was a matter that the testator believed the intercession of such persons with God, through prayer, would weigh at the final judgement. In others it was a question of relieving the unpleasant circumstances in which those less fortunate found themselves; many prisoners relied on bequests like this to provide them with some income with which they could make their prison conditions less uncomfortable.

It is difficult to judge whether the intentions of such bequests were truly charitable, in the sense that we would understand it, or were more a matter of currying favour with God. By the Late Middle Ages, the fear of Purgatory had become prominent among lay religious beliefs; perhaps particularly in towns, since the friars who especially emphasized this aspect of doctrine. Purgatory was that part of the redemptive process in which sin was purged from the soul of any sinner who had shown penitence before death and had been absolved in the last rites. The purgative process could, it was believed, be eased by investing in charitable and pious acts that both demonstrated contrition and obtained divine intercession through those who had the special favour of God.

We do not have to opt for one or the other motive; they were two parts of a whole. Even in modern charitable works, motivation may combine an easing of the conscience with a genuine desire to help others. Charity was a kind of social contract, a win-win situation. Given strong medieval religious beliefs, most notably in divine judgement and damnation, and the fact that pious and charitable bequests, small or large, were a very common feature of medieval wills, historians today are inclined to emphasize testators' concern for their own souls. Nonetheless, it is also recognized that the last testament provided a final opportunity to give something back to the community – a concept more vital in medieval towns than it is in modern cities – at a time when the testator could have no further personal use for the worldly goods and wealth acquired during life; other than, of course, to provide for heirs, which remained the first priority. Even founding a chantry was more charitable than simply providing for a large but finite volume of masses to be said, for the chantry priests thus employed contributed to the performance of the liturgy of the church as a whole, and to the quality of services for the community.

Nor should we forget the self-satisfaction that comes from giving aid to others. Charity is a value that helps define both personal identity and one's place in society. It is thereby a two-way street. Moreover, a street that links the different strata of society, through mutual obligations. If the wealthy were obliged to provide relief to the poor, the poor were obliged to be grateful and to demonstrate that gratitude in a variety of ways, such as showing humility, not envying their betters or seeking to overthrow them, and interceding with God on behalf of their benefactors, whose advantages in many cases owed something to the transgression of Christian morals; without this return on investment, there might have been far less impetus to charitable behaviour. Charity – as the return of ill-gotten gains to the less fortunate or more exploited members of society – may have enabled the entrepreneurial exploiters to rationalize their good fortune and make it socially more acceptable within a framework of Christian teachings. At the same time, the gradual development of an alternate view of the poor from that of the Church, in which they were perceived as lazy, troublemaking, and sinful, made it easier to think of them as undeserving, and encouraged a narrower focus of charitable efforts towards the close of the Middle Ages. We find many of the charitable institutions set up in the thirteenth or fourteenth centuries having their mandates changed or restricted in the fifteenth, in part due to shifting priorities but as much to a decline in resources, itself the result of factors such as maladministration and decline in public interest.

Religious art communicated the importance of the rich giving to the deserving poor.

Hospitals

From an early time, the Church took some responsibility for creating supportive programmes and institutions for the unfortunate, unprotected, and unaided members of society. The system by which tithes were paid had been created to support poor relief, although this was gradually undermined. It became necessary for laymen to take up the slack, even though only a small percentage of their incomes was diverted to charitable purposes. The foundation of hospitals arose out of a variety of Christian beliefs: the importance of charitable acts (not least for the good of one's soul), concern for the poor and helpless, and support for pilgrimage. It is not clear what proportion of townspeople may have made pilgrimages during their lifetimes, even if only to local shrines; but a small percentage of wills included bequests to individuals to make pilgrimages on behalf of the testator, to fulfill a pilgrimage vow the testator had not personally been able to keep.

The twelfth century saw a growing pace of investment in institutions dedicated to social welfare; these went beyond the provision of hospitality in the guesthouses of abbeys and priories, and show a recognition of the need to address in an organized fashion problems particularly affecting urban society.

Although they were not an exclusively urban institution, hospitals were mostly in or just outside towns. This should not be surprising, for several associated reasons:

- towns were the more populous parts of the country;
- urban society had a more conspicuous wealth gap, from wealthy merchants to poor labourers and widows;
- dense population in parts of a town made it more unsanitary and more susceptible to epidemic diseases and there was a relatively high mortality rate (thus producing larger numbers of widows);
- towns attracted settlers who through migration had been separated from immediate family and the related support structures;
- towns had less tradition of the mutual support that characterised smaller and closer-knit rural communities.

It was the growth of towns and of a complex urban social structure, in which poor and wealthy were in close proximity and part of the same community, that fostered awareness of the need to address issues such as welfare and hygiene. Community support in urban settings needed a more conscious effort. Towns became the source of experiments with social programmes, some as private initiatives of leading townsmen or fraternal associations, and others under the wing of borough authorities as they extended their areas of activity. Furthermore, towns had a relatively high density of moderately wealthy individuals, potential benefactors; many hospitals were founded and expanded through the endowments of townspeople.

Early hospitals, as the name indicates, were concerned with providing food and shelter (hospitality) for the needy, continuing the charitable tradition of Benedictine monasteries and nunneries, an ethic which had infiltrated lay society by the late Saxon period. Few hospitals were dedicated to their modern purpose of caring for the infirm and aged and tending to the sick, although there was some growth in that role towards the close of the Middle Ages. We can distinguish four main types of hospital:

- Hospices, either dedicated to providing temporary lodgings for poor wayfarers and pilgrims – wealthier travellers being able to stay in inns, and visiting merchants often being hosted by a local merchant – or including limited accommodations for such alongside permanent accommodations for poor folk.
- Almshouses, the second most common type, which might be intended for anyone who was poor, although some were restricted to local residents or even just members of the founding guild who had fallen into poverty. Most were for males, a few for females; where both sexes were accommodated there was strict segregation. Rules were laid out for inmates to lead a semi-monastic life. Domestic chores might be handled by servants. Healthy female inmates helped look after sick inmates. Although such houses accommodated the infirm, this meant invalids rather than those suffering from illness. Some hospitals might, alternatively or additionally, distribute food as alms on a regular basis to poor people who were not residents.
- Leper houses were the most common as well as the earliest type, with many being founded between late eleventh century (when a fresh epidemic of leprosy was causing problems in England) and the early thirteenth century. Towns of any size usually had several such institutions, although most were small with only a few inmates. They were located around the outskirts of a town, since lepers were required to remain apart from the townspeople or anyone who was healthy.
- Hospitals dedicated to giving medical care or dealing with casualties were by far the least numerous type.

In a few cases, hospitals might provide education, either to clerical residents or to poor students who could not afford tuition fees elsewhere.

But we should not forget that, as religious houses, hospitals also had the role of worship, the founders looking to set up institutions where prayers for their souls could be said, and worship being seen as curative for the souls of the sick, or preparation for the afterlife on the part of those in the last years of life. Strictly speaking, we should probably see the primary role of medieval hospitals as religious.

Historians have identified "waves" in which the foundation of hospitals occurred most intensively. The first took place between the middle of the twelfth and the early thirteenth century, and was primarily the initiative of the Church or the aristocracy; by the end of this period there were over 250 hospitals in existence, although many were very modest establishments. A second wave occurred in the late thirteenth century, with townsmen particularly prominent among the founders; there were at least 540 hospitals in existence just before the Black Deaths struck. And another in the fifteenth century, focusing on the almshouse type; these were predominantly urban foundations, occasionally catering to particular groups, such as widows, impoverished members of the ruling class, or the long-term infirm members of specific trades. Following the depopulation and adverse economic effects of the plague in the third quarter of the fourteenth century, hospital funding and governance underwent something of a crisis, some hospitals were unable to stay in operation or were merged with other religious institutions; in some cases, urban governments stepped in to take responsibility for their management.

Most large towns had several hospitals. It was relatively easy for the wealthier townsmen to found and endow small hospitals, and there were no legal restrictions, whereas the endowment of religious houses such as monasteries was more a challenge for the nobility. The locations chosen for hospitals tended to be just outside or inside the town gates (i.e. on routes taken by travellers, who might either be recipients of hospitality, or donors of alms), or on sites that were not in demand or not of use for other purposes, which usually meant they were quieter and there was scope for future expansion; only towards the end of the Middle Ages did such institutions start to appear in significant numbers near the centre of towns. Norwich provides an example of a large town where leper houses were distributed around the outside of the town walls, each near one of the principal gates, thus optimising the prospect of alms from travellers. For the same reason of proximity to traffic, we find a number of hospitals situated adjacent to bridges or quaysides.

Among the most prominent hospitals were St. Leonard's in York, and St. Bartholomew's in London. The latter was one of the earliest founded by a lay commoner, while the former was one of (if not the) wealthiest, housing a large community – about two to three hundred – of clergy, sisters, corrodarians, sick people, and orphans. Excavations of burials on the site of St. Mary Spital, founded just outside Bishopsgate, London, in 1197, have revealed some distinctive groups: a high proportion of adolescents, the hospital being known to have had a special mandate for care of orphans; a group of well-fed, older citizens buried inside the hospital church, reflecting the role of the hospital as a retirement home for the wealthy; and a large number of adult males, possibly representing migrants to London unable to establish themselves and not surviving long.

Religious attitudes of townspeople

As important as the physical fabric of the Church was the set of religious beliefs and attitudes that pervaded urban life. It is not easy for citizens of the highly secularized western world to appreciate how deeply-seated Catholic beliefs were and how they permeated every aspect of medieval life. On the other hand, nor is it easy to reach confident conclusions on to what extent such beliefs were acted upon upon by all sectors of society, when all we have to go on are reflections. Consequently, historians debate just how sincerely religious were medieval people. It would of course be a mistake to tar all with the same brush, either of unquestioning devotion or scepticism. We find evidence to support both interpretations and must allow for some measure of ambiguity and ambivalence.

There was doubtless a spectrum of religiosity within the urban population, ranging from genuinely devout attitudes (whether catholic or non-conformist) to indifference. There was also some measure of anti-clericalism, fostered by resentment towards the legal privileges and jurisdictional authority of the longer-established religious houses, disgust at the worldliness and even moral corruption occasionally evidenced, but we should not over-emphasize this. Urban society accommodated a good deal of diversity in its religious options. Those who could afford it, when they made bequests to religious institutions, tended to spread their money among the options: monastic houses, friaries, parish churches, even hermits and anchorites might be recipients. Urban families continued throughout the Late Middle Ages to supply recruits for all branches of the Church, and provided employment opportunities for priests through the socio-religious guilds and chantries they founded and supported.

At the same time, there are indications that the Church was not universally, or at all times, held in the highest respect. Churchyards were often the site for activities that would today seem inappropriate and were occasionally the subject of reproofs in the Middle Ages: commercial transactions were often finalized there; youths played games there, even during services, causing annoyance or worse; and even more formal community sports, such as wrestling matches, might be held there. On the one hand this illustrates how central churches were in community life; however, such activities do not suggest a strong respect for the sanctity of religious sites, and even the time-honoured principle of religious sanctuary was not free from violation. Another indication of less-than-exemplary devotion, suggestive of the priorities of some townspeople, are prohibitions of trading on Sundays or other religious festivals. In relation to this and other distractions, if not a want of religiosity itself, we may note those parishioners who were taken to task before ecclesiastical authorities for their failure to attend divine service and/or pay the tithes or oblations that were expected of them, as well as for performing labour or retailing food or drink on the sabbath. They were a minority certainly, but nonetheless illustrate how strength of religious feeling varied from person to person. A more extreme indifference to divine displeasure is seen in that churches, as a source of items of precious metals and high-quality cloth, were not immune from burglaries. Occasionally, religious houses or high-ranking religious officials were the target for violence; the assault on Norwich cathedral-priory in 1272 and an attack on Bishop Despenser at Lynn in 1377 are extreme but by no means unique examples. In such cases, however, the religious institutions or personnel were resented as possessors of jurisdictional privileges rather than as sources of pastoral authority; yet it was precisely this heavy involvement of the Church in secular affairs that contributed to alienation among the otherwise faithful. Finally, we can point to heresy; this is not an alienation from religion, but as a divergence in belief it further illustrates the diversity in religious attitudes that existed during the Late Middle Ages.

We may suspect that religion was in some regards a privilege of the wealthy. The poorer townspeople, who struggled to make a living, did not always feel they could afford the luxury of a day of worship and rest; it is they we more often find accused of failing to attend church services or pay their dues, and doubtless primarily they who might be driven by desperation to robbing churches. At the same time, wealthier citizens also occasionally bequeathed money to make up for unpaid tithes. There seems to have been some undercurrent of resentment towards the obligatory payments to the Church; although we cannot be certain how widespread it was, the impression is that parishioners preferred to give when charitable feeling moved them, and particularly when they had some say into what was done with the money.

But even here there is uncertainty. To what extent were the wealthier citizens' contributions towards the rebuilding and beautification of churches a genuine expression of religious devotion, and to what extent was it self-serving? Testators who left money to such projects may have been motivated primarily by a last-ditch effort to redeem their souls; their generosity was not necessarily paralleled by comparable patronage during their lifetimes. At the same time, we should not forget that while some parish churches benefitted from having wealthy parishioners, other churches were falling into disrepair because parishioners either would not or could not contribute to their upkeep. Possibly financial support for religious institutions varied according to the level of prosperity of a community.

Sponsorship of improvements to the fabric, donations of valuables to a church, or patronage of stained glass windows sometimes had attached a proviso that the sponsor/donor/patron would receive recognition, such as through public announcement, an inscription, or depiction in a panel of the window. There are some indications that this conspicuous patronage was considered by critics contrary to true religious humility, and may have been a source of resentment among the less well-to-do. At the same time, what it perhaps reflects is a desire, on the part those parishioners with the means to influence events, not merely to play the passive flock responsive to the bidding of those who spoke the word of God, but to shape the local institutions of the Church in ways that addressed local concerns, as they perceived them.

For it can be argued that the urban upper class used conspicuous religiosity to reinforce the hierarchical values that ensured its hold on political power. Patronage of churches, increased emphasis on civic parades during major religious festivals, association of urban government with a prominent socio-religious gild, governmental direction of religious drama, are all indications of this. Much of what we see of the attitudes of urban society towards the Church is through the eyes of the upper class, because their activities are best represented in the records surviving from the Middle Ages. Therefore we get a somewhat one-side picture of religious attitudes. Despite this, we can be confident that organized religion, not least through its determination of the festivals that punctuated and defined the yearly cycle of medieval life, played a substantially and significantly more important and more central role than it does today, even though the experience of that religion may have varied from place to place, class to class, individual to individual.

While some townspeople may have shaped their devotion to the Church to suit their own interests, it is hard to discount the effect on attitudes and behaviours of the belief – so strongly promoted by Catholicism – of an all-seeing, all-knowing God, who would consign souls to Heaven or Hell, based on earthly performance.

TRANSLATION

This arrangement and agreement was made by indenture on 20 September 1477 between dom. Robert Syleby, master of the hospital of St. John Evangelist and St. John Baptist of Leicester, and the brethren of the same place, on the one part, and Richard Wiggeston of Leicester, steward of the gild of the same St. John, on the other part. It witnesses that Richard and his successors as stewards of the gild, in consultation with the mayor and his successors, are to provide for as long as the gild endures a good and capable priest to say or sing mass in the chapel of the gild of St. John, and on two days each week in the chapel of St. John located at the Town's End in Leicester, unless the master or his successors at any time wish to say mass there themselves. On which occasions, or when they are out of town, the gild priest is to sing or say high mass at the high altar of [the hospital of] St. John; and he is to assist the master and his successors with singing and readings in the choir there during divine service on every holy day in the year. Saying special prayers for the souls of Piers Celler and his wife and for the welfare and the souls of all the brothers and sisters of the gild and hospital, and general [prayers] for all other kind benefactors of the hospital or gild. The master and his successors are to provide the gild priest with sufficient food and drink, or else 40s. cash a year for his board. The steward and his successors are to pay the remnant of his salary, as negotiated with him, and to find him a room within the [hospital of?] St. John. Should it happen through the default of the master or his successors that the gild priest fail to receive his board or the 40s., as he ought to have at the appropriate times, then it is permitted to the steward or his successors during their terms as stewards to enter into a place that belongs to St. John, currently occupied by Thomas Davy grocer, located outside the East Gate of Leicester between the property of the gild of Corpus Christi in St. Martin's church on the west side and St. Margaret's Lane on the east side; and there take and carry off a distress for the 40s., as often as there is a default in [provision of] the board or payment of the 40s. annually. In testimony to which, the common seal of the hospital and the seal of the stewards have been appended to the opposing halves of this indenture.

DISCUSSION

The hospital of St. John, with which a college of priests was associated, was an early foundation at Leicester, in existence by the close of the twelfth century. We have records of endowments of lands around the turn of the century, and at the same time it was said that the hospital had been endowed with a monthly supply of grain by the second earl of Leicester, who lived in the first half of the twelfth century. The brethren were living under the Augustinian rule in the fifteenth century, and this was likely the case earlier. The purpose of the hospital is uncertain, but there is a reference ca.1200 to it sheltering the poor; in 1518 (some 70 years before it was dissolved and its lands turned over to the borough corporation) it housed six poor women, and this tradition was continued at its revival in the seventeenth century as an almshouse for poor widows.

In 1355 the hospital had been endowed, by the executors or trustees of the late Peter Seler (saddler) of Leicester, with a share in a tenement, adjacent to property the hospital already held outside East Gate, and 12 cottages to fund one of the brethren of the hospital serving as a chaplain for daily celebration of divine services for the souls of Peter, his wife Alice, their children, and all benefactors of the hospital. The person chosen as chaplain, a life appointment, was to take his oath of office before the mayor and community in portmoot. That arrangement had probably lapsed and the spiritual obligation to Peter was assumed under this new arrangement.

Bateson has suggested that the endowment of 1355 also marked the foundation of the gild of St. John. Whether so or not, it had a chaplain in the early fifteenth century. The purpose of the 1477 agreement was evidently to make new provisions for the financial support of that priest.

In 1483, a quitclaim to which Richard was party, as one of a group of feoffees, was witnessed by Roger Wigston as deputy mayor; Roger was mayor of Leicester in 1465/66, 1471/72, 1487/88, and other men with the surname also held the mayoralty in the second half of the 15th century. In 1513 another ex-mayor member of the family founded a hospital dedicated to St. Ursula, although during Elizabeth I's reign the name was changed to William Wigston's Hospital.

TRANSLATION

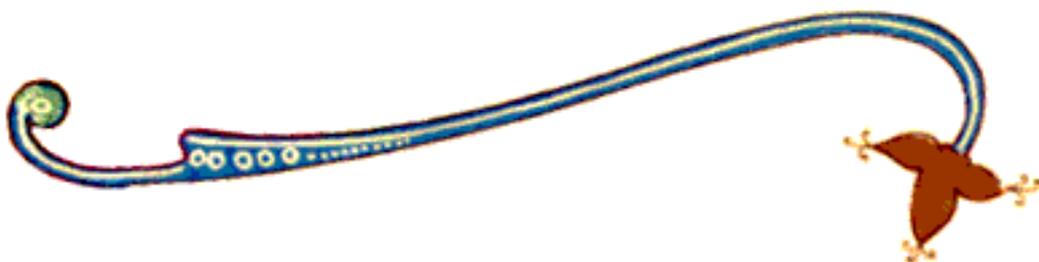

John de Bilby brings a charge of trespass against Roger de Mampton, chaplain, complaining that when John, on 1 August 1387, was at Radcliffe on business, Roger broke into his property and entered his chamber here at Nottingham in Bridlesmithgate, in contempt of John[s rights]. He was found under a curtain of John's bed. John interrogated Roger as to what he was doing there; who responded that he was not there, nor had he come, with any evil intent. After which John advised Roger that he had better not find him with his wife, nor in any of his houses, at any time of day or night. After which warning, Roger subsequently, in the week following 22 June 1388, came during the night to John's house in Stone Street, here at Nottingham, and broke John's wall there, leaped over it to [\[get to\]](#) the houses of John de Bilby, entered where was private and John's wife was, and spent a long time there with John's wife, without John's permission or consent. This continued through an entire year after the warning. Because of Roger's visits, John's goods and possessions have been used up and lost to him, viz. two pairs of linen sheets, tablecloths, towels, and 1 brass pot, worth 13s.4d, have been lost to him through their destruction, and the entire profits in John's money from 10 quarters of malt have been spent and wasted by Roger and John's wife, particularly due to the visits paid by Roger. For which reason John brings this complaint, claiming a hundred pounds in damages. Roger appeared in person and denied the force and injury and the damages, saying that he was going about with holy water in his parish, as is the custom for parish clergy, and came with the water to John's house in a proper fashion, not with any evil intent. As for breaking the wall, wasting John's goods and possessions, or entering John's house, he says that he is in no way guilty, and asks that this be enquired into. And the other [party requests] the same. Therefore it is ordered [to hold an inquest].

DISCUSSION

This complaint was brought before Nottingham's court on 13 October 1389. The jury inquest upheld Bilby's accusation. This was the sort of morals-related offence that brought disrepute on the clergy. However, it is notable that John does not dwell here on damages associated with interference in his relationship with his wife, but more on property damage and loss of possessions. Nor is there any suggestion that John's wife was an unwilling partner in the offence.

NOTES

"John de Bilby"

Probably the skinner of that surname (without mention of a Christian name) referred to in 1396. He was himself in trouble with the authorities in 1394, for refusing to take the juror's oath and participate in an inquest, and in 1395 for forestalling coal in order to create a shortage and push up the price at which he could sell it.

On that day [20 October 1419] it was agreed through the assent of the warden and the entire community that two chaplains who are of honest demeanour, good reputation, and are good singers of plain-song should each receive annually from the bridge-keepers £6 for their services as chantry priests, and living quarters adequate for their needs. And furthermore that the chaplains shall supervise the choir at appropriate times, both on the eve and on the day of a festival.

Also on that day, the warden and community of the town agreed that bridge-keepers Hugh Bakere and John Tubbe, and their successors, shall keep and observe an obit in memory of Hugh Cooke and his wife Alice once a year in Henley church, beginning on 12 November of this year and so from year to year until a full twenty years have elapsed. This out of consideration for the fact that Hugh and Alice contributed many items to the parish church of the town. For which reason the warden and community wish and grant, for themselves and their successors, that the bridge-keepers then in office expend on the memorial obit forty pence, in the following way. First, to each chaplain of the parish church who celebrates there and attends the exequies, 2d. Also, in offerings at the five Masses, 5d. The rest is to be spent on wax, on the clergy (2d. each for their labour), and on bread and ale; should there be anything left, it is to be distributed among the poor. In regard to that forty pence spent by the bridge-keepers, they shall have allowance made for it when they render their accounts before the warden and community.

On that day [7 November 1419] Thomas Barnavyle and John Curteys churchwardens and William Logge, supervisor of the upkeep [of the church], presented their accounts before the community, as set out in a roll of their receipts. Notably, of £67.17s.2d and of 26s.8d. Out of which they paid for 9 fothers and 400 lb. of lead, bought at the price of £5.16s.6d per fother; total £53.13s. In expenses incurred on the labour of plumbers, on other work on the church and its bells, for [re] paving the church, on ornaments and vestiments for the church, and for a new missal, as set out in that same roll, £21.6s.4d. Total of all expenditures on lead, £74.19s.4d. And therefore there is owed to William Logge, 5.16s.6d.

On that day [1 June 1420] it was ordained by the consent of the warden and community there that on the day the obit of any person there [i.e. of the town] may be rung by the ministers of the church on a single bell. That is, whichever bell is wished, according to the wishes and pleasure of the friends of the deceased, is to be rung in the appropriate fashion; they paying to the ministers of the church 2d. for the ringing and their labour. Also that on memorial days the trental or anniversary of the deceased may be rung on four bells in the appropriate fashion, paying to the ministers 2d. plus bread and drink. Anyone who does anything contrary to this ordinance is to pay 6s.8d into the community money-box.

The account of John Wryght and John Elam wardens of the church and bridge of Henley, covering the accounting period from 25 March 1472 to the same date following, that is for an entire year; audited 23 May 1474. The two Johns accounted for £31.1s.¼d from the rents payable to the church, as set out in the court roll. Also, they accounted for 30s. in arrears from the previous account. And they accounted for 10s. collected at the church porch in Easter week. And they accounted for 20s. [paid] for various interments within the church. Total, £34.1s. ¼d. Out of which were paid various costs and expenses made by the wardens, as itemized in the [written] account they submitted for examination, £32.19s. At the close of their accounting, they owe 22s. Of which 10s. was paid out for the purchase of stone. Also 14d. to William Styleman for making 1 tallow [candle].

On the same day [14 September 1476] it was agreed and ordained by the warden, bridge-keepers, and the entire community of the town, that henceforth no-one from inside or outside the town might have the largest bell, of the five great bells hanging in the bell-tower of the parish church of Henley, rung at his exequies or Masses at which the body is present, nor at any obit or anniversary whatever in the future, unless he pays 4d. into the communal money-box for [having] that single bell [rung] on each occasion. That is, 4d. for when his body is present at the exequies and Masses, and likewise at his obit or anniversary, on top of the fee due the clerics and others who undertake the ringing. But that everyone, depending on his social standing, may have at his decease, when his body is present, an appropriate amount of tolling with a single one of the other four great bells, at the exequies or at another time as suits those who will be in attendance. And that everyone may have at his exequies, obit, or anniversary, three appropriate tolls with the four bells, and not more. At the time of the Masses with the body present, and at the burial, as well as at the Masses of the obit or anniversary, [there may be] appropriate tolling with the same four bells, and not more.

DISCUSSION

Henley-on-Thames provides an instance of the authorities in a town of very modest size and modest means exercising its concerns for the religious life of the community. It was not uncommon in the last century or so of the Middle Ages for borough authorities to be called upon to play some supervisory role in regard to the maintenance of chantries or services for the dead. In the case of Henley, a single-parish settlement, the community and its representatives were that much more closely involved in the affairs of the parish church.

Henley's urban status was recognized by the central government by at least the 1240s, and it is in the same century that we first hear of bridge-keepers there. The town had as its executive officer the warden, who appears to have originally been the head of the Merchant Gild through which the community was organized – by the fifteenth century the burgess community and the gild were one and the same – and its aspirations were achieved; judicial administration was in the hands of the lord of the manor and law enforcement carried out by bailiffs, who were manorial officials, even though their election was a privilege that the community had won. Other than these, and with a formal town council not apparently emerging until the reign of Henry VI, local government also included two constables and the two bridge-keepers.

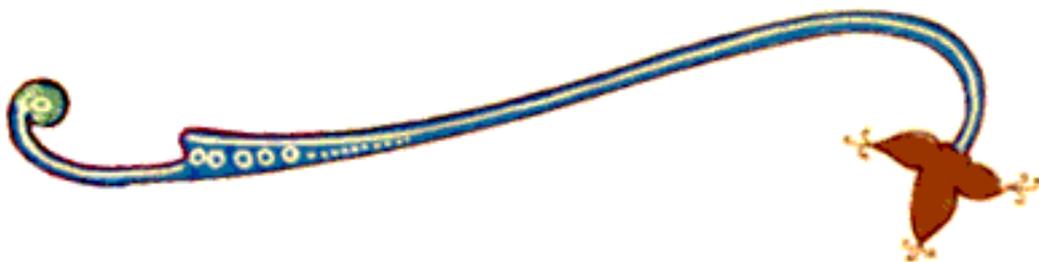

In 1385 a townsman obtained licence to alienate in mortmain rents from 115 properties towards the maintenance of the bridge across the Thames and a chantry in the town church. Thereafter, if not before, the bridge and the church were associated administratively. The bridge-keepers were responsible for administering the rents of such a staggering number of properties, for a small community. By the end of the fifteenth century, the "bailiffs of the church and bridge on Henley were accounting regularly for these revenues and the way they were spent on upkeep of bridge and church. At the earlier end of the century, the churchwardens were accounting for expenditures; they were also elected officials of the borough, but perhaps not on an annual basis. The work of the churchwardens called on revenues additional to those assigned the bridge-keepers, such as burgess entrance fees. In 1415 the offices of bridge-keeper and churchwarden were held by the same pair, but this appears an exception; after 1429 the offices were combined, and the office of the pontenarii is actually described in 1433 as procuratores ecclesie et pontis.

After a brief experiment in 1434, an additional set of officials was created in 1441, by ordinance, to be keepers and supervisors of all goods belonging to the church and to act as holy-water clerks; their duties involved receiving income associated with burials (including bequests to the fabric of the church) and using it for repairs, and to look after the furnishings, books, vestments, etc. of the church. In 1449 we hear of a special commission of townsmen appointed to look after renovations to the bell-tower and its bells; but this effort apparently proved too much for, in 1455, it was necessary to sell a large new-made bell in order to pay borough debts, but what remained was to be used to make smaller bells. Four years later a new commission was appointed, to collect alms for the churchworks. The work on the bell-tower went ahead and in 1462 a contract was let to build a steeple atop it; by the following year the collectors were able to turn over to the churchwardens £69.15s.2d for the work on the bell-tower, and in 1464 or 1465 the hanging of the bells was begun. In 1473 a record was entered of the five new bells and their weights and total value (over £91). The preoccupation with the bells was because their tolling was an important part of the ceremonies marking the death, and subsequent anniversaries of the death, of townspeople – reminding others to pray for the soul of the deceased.

The concept of Purgatory, posited in the twelfth century and receiving official recognition in the thirteenth, established in the Late Middle Ages a core belief that gave tremendous impetus to the saying of prayers for the souls of the deceased, and to the purchase of such prayers in one's last will and testament – for those who could afford it, by the foundation of chantries dedicated to saying a special Mass for the soul(s) of the founder(s) along with prayers for others the founder designated. Prayers could help relieve the suffering of the souls parked in Purgatory until they would be released to the Last Judgement. For the poor who could not afford to buy prayers, general prayers were said at every Mass and each November, on All Souls Day, a special Mass was dedicated to every soul in Purgatory. But prayers said for specific individuals were considered far more efficacious.

Consequently, services for remembrance of the dead – obits, or anniversaries – became an important element in church celebrations, filling in gaps between the major daily services. Whereas today most churches are quiet for the greater part of a day, in the Late Middle Ages, many had activities going on throughout the day. Only a handful of townspeople were wealthy enough to be able to found chantries. The less expensive alternative was to arrange for an anniversary each year; like a chantry, it was typically funded by endowing the church where the anniversary was to be celebrated with property or rents, or with a sum of money expected to support a finite number of anniversaries. These memorial services could sometimes be as elaborate as the original exequies, or obsequies, at the funeral. Although far less frequent than chantry services, they compensated somewhat by involving larger numbers of attendants to pray for the soul of the deceased. Another tool for remembrance was the bederoll, listing the names of deceased parishioners, read out in church. In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries we find bedemen, or bellmen, appearing in the roster of borough officialdom, part of their duties being to go round town announcing deaths or anniversaries; Henley's earliest record of such an appointment is in 1426, although the fact that the appointee was handed the bell of office suggests that he was not the first.

"from the bridge-keepers"

I.e. from the borough revenues collected by the bridge-keepers, or Bridgemen, of which there were two elected annually.

"exequies"

Funeral rites and/or the annual memorial service.

"wax"

For candles.

"William Logge"

He was the warden then in office.

"fother"

A measure traditionally applied to lead in England, its weight might vary between about 2100 lb and 2600 lb. Unless the financial calculations in the record are inaccurate, the additional amount of 400 lb must have been charged at a significantly higher rate.

"23 May 1474"

The date is suspect as the record identifies it as a Wednesday; it was in fact a Monday.

Memorandum that on January 30, 1378, Roger de Seleby, the son of Hugh de Seleby, appeared in the mayoral chamber above the Ouse Bridge, before John de Santone then mayor of York, Robert de Howom, Thomas de Howom, William Tondew, William de Tykehill, Robert Talkan, and other of the reputable men of the city. He presented to the mayor, chamberlains, reputable men, and community his preferred choice, dom. John de Crome chaplain, to [service] the chantry long ago established and constituted for the soul of Hugh de Seleby senior and the souls of his ancestors and all the faithful deceased, at the altar in the chapel of St. William the archbishop on the Ouse Bridge. To the effect that dom. John should celebrate the chantry appropriately and act and serve according to the custom of the chapel. And that he should be in permanent possession of all tenements, objects, rents, and goods pertaining to the chantry. On which day the said dom. John, by consent of the community, was administered the oath and admitted to the chantry on the aforementioned terms, for as long as [he behaves] properly and honestly in that duty.

DISCUSSION

The foundation of chantries – that is, the provision of an endowment to cover the costs of Masses celebrated and prayers said, sometimes indefinitely, for the benefit of the soul of one or more specific individuals – became increasingly popular, among those who could afford it, during the Late Middle Ages; they supplanted, to an extent, charitable donations to monasteries or friaries for similar intercessional purposes. In cases of the better-endowed chantries, there might even be a chapel within a church dedicated to the function; in other cases an altar was set up for the purpose within an existing space.

The founder was often deceased when the chantry was established, through a testamentary provision; or sometimes a widow or heir might take the initiative, usually providing for their own souls at the same time. Bearing in mind the tendency of bloodlines to die out, townspeople not infrequently delegated the responsibility for maintenance of chantries to guilds or to borough authorities (which had at least the semblance, if not the legal recognition, of being perpetual corporations); the founders allowed such trustees to manage – and potentially profit from – the funding, itself usually stemming from annual revenues from real estate, allocated to the chantry. John de Eshton, for example, bequeathed (ca.1384) 18 houses and shops with a total annual income of £10.18s.8d (although £1.16s.8d of this was lost in rents resolute), to fund a chantry in St. Nicholas' church, Micklegate; £5 of this was applied to the chaplain's salary.

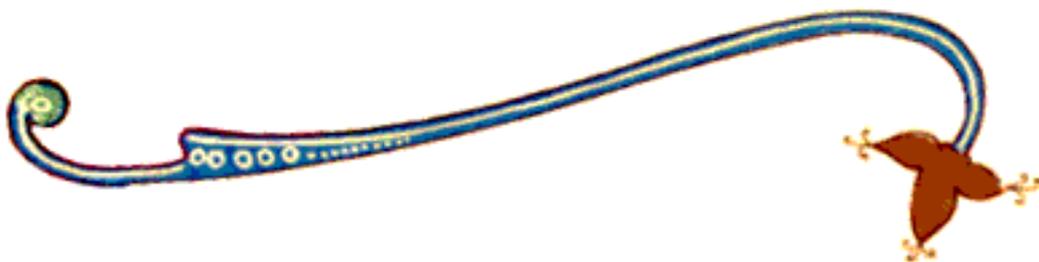

The responsibility turned over to the authorities gave them a role in the appointment of chaplains to serve the chantries. In fact, in the context of a dispute (1388) between York's chantry priests and the parish rectors, over a traditional exaction which the former were resisting, mayor William de Seleby came to their defence with a public statement that, since the chantries had been founded by citizens, this made the city the patrons and masters of the chantry priests, and it was incumbent upon the citizenry (as heirs of the chantry founders) to defend those priests from any onerous demands.

York's churches and chapels had numerous chantries by the late fourteenth century, eight of which were identified by name as under city patronage in the documentation of the 1388 dispute. However, recruiting chaplains was not easy, since nominees had to pay various fees to the Church before obtaining admission to a benefice. A number of such appointments are found among the city records of medieval York. A few months before the appointment of John de Crome to the Selby chantry, the city appointed dom. William de Thorne to a chantry in the same chapel, requiring daily celebration of a morning Mass. Crome's own appointment, although the nomination lay within the Selby family's power, evidently had to be approved by the city authorities before coming into effect. Crome did not last long in the job, resigning in July 1379; although a replacement had already been found, he too resigned in November 1381. In 1416, alderman William Selby presented Thomas Howran as chantry chaplain, after the previous incumbent, John Algude, had died.

When Richard II granted the city a new charter of liberties in 1393 it included permission to the authorities to acquire real estate to the value of £100 a year, to support not only the maintenance of the Ouse and Foss Bridges themselves but also the maintenance of various chaplains and clerics celebrating divine services in the community-owned chapel of St. William, some of those services being for the spiritual well-being of the king and his ancestors and successors.

In 1536 the city authorities obtained from parliament the abolition of seven chantries for whose maintenance it was still responsible. Not so much because religious attitudes had changed and now saw no rationale for that kind of thing, but more because the income devoted to the chantries could then be diverted to offsetting the borough's financial deficit.

NOTES

"Roger de Seleby"

A man of this name was mayor in 1369. The chantry founder was more likely one of the citizens acting in 1380 as constable of the ward stretching from the Ouse to St. Leonard's.

TRANSLATION

Know all people, present and future, that I, John Munden, having obtained licence from the king and other chief lords, have given, granted and by this present charter have confirmed to God, the Blessed Virgin Mary, St. Michael archangel, Nicholas Gourtop and Nicholas de Portlond priests, and the priests who succeed to their posts, for the purpose of divine services celebrated in perpetuity in the chapel of St. Michael at Bridport for the souls of King Edward, myself and my late wife Christine, Nicholas Pynnok, Robert de Faryndon, and the souls of my father and mother and of all the faithful who are deceased: twelve tenements and four acres of land with appurtenances in Bridport; six tenements, thirty-eight acres of land, four acres of meadow, thirty acres of pasture, 60s. in rent, and the rent of five pairs of gloves and half a pound of pepper, with appurtenances, in Allington, Bradpole and Walditch. The said Nicholas and Nicholas, priests, and their successors to the chapel are to have and to hold the aforementioned tenements, land, meadow, pasture, and rents with their appurtenances for purposes of celebrating divine services in the following manner.

Viz. that one of those priests celebrate the daily mass each day and the other the mass of the Blessed Virgin in the chapel of St. Michael, and every day they are jointly to say matins, vespers and the other canonical hours, and the placebo, dirige, and commendatio in the chapel according to the Salisbury usage, unless one is incapacitated or has other reasonable cause to be excused, and one or other of the priests shall conduct the daily services dressed in the surplice designated and prepared for that.

While I live, I am to have the presentation of the priests, and those who succeed them in the office, to the Bishop of Salisbury. I grant, on behalf of myself and my heirs, that after I die whoever is at that time rector of the church of St. Mary, Bridport, may in perpetuity present to the chantry or chantries a suitable priest or priests, within a month after being informed of the deaths of those priests, or any one of them. If, after a month, the presenting rector proves negligent or remiss in presenting those priests, or any one of them, then the bailiffs and community of Bridport may in perpetuity present a suitable priest or priests to the chantry or chantries within a month following that month which the rector has exhausted. If, after a month, the bailiffs and community prove negligent or remiss in presenting those priests, then the incumbent Bishop of Salisbury shall appoint suitable priests to the chantry or chantries; first, as a pre-requisite for the conferral, an oath is to be administered to the presented priests that they will not fail to celebrate divine services in the manner specified above. It is to be ensured that those priests thus presented, or on whom after a lapse in time the Bishop may confer the chantries, have no obligations related to any other benefice or ecclesiastical office, but can devote their complete attention to the chantry duties and will be continuously resident, twenty-four hours a day, in the house where I, John, used to reside. If those priests, or any one of them, acquires thereafter obligations to, or possession of, a benefice or office elsewhere, then they are to be deprived of their rights in the chantry and be completely excluded from [control over] the lands, properties and rents. Each of the priests and their successors in perpetuity is to receive annually for food and clothing 100s., in equal quarterly installments at the principal terms of the year. For bread, wine, and lighting for the masses, 10s. from the rents and other revenues from the tenements, land, meadow, and pasture. They are to take their meals together. Any surplus income from the land, tenements, and rents that Nicholas Gourtoup and those named to succeed him as warden of the house of St. Michael can clearly demonstrate before the rector, bailiffs and community each year at Michaelmas, I require to be put to the benefit of the two priests through repairs and improvements to the chapel and tenements. Each priest, when admitted and instituted [to the benefice], is to take oath before the Bishop of Salisbury that he will adhere faithfully to the above ordinances, and every one of them, to the best of his power.

In case the priests are unable to continue their divine services, because of the inadequacy of the revenues from the tenements mentioned, I have given and granted to [support] the celebrations of the priests in that chapel £200; of which £100 is in the custody of the abbot and convent of Cerne, and the other £100 is in the custody of the abbot and convent of Abbotsbury, [secured] under my seal and [those of] the bailiffs and community and the priests, to be and remain there during my lifetime. After my death, it is to be delivered to the priests and their successors when they may be in dire need, in annual allocations, at the discretion of the incumbent rector, bailiffs and community, to support the priests and also to maintain the tenements.

It is a duty of the priests to participate in each of the principal holy festivals at vespers and mass, and for one of them to be present at mass each Sunday, in the parish church of St. Mary, Bridport, until vespers and mass on such days have been concluded.

I have also given and granted to the chapel, for the use of the priests, two missals, three breviaries (of which two are large), a good bible, one gradual, two chalices, three sets of vestments (of which one costume incorporates a cope and tunic), one silver basin, and two silver cruets, to remain within the chapel in perpetuity and to be inspected by the rector, bailiffs and community each year at Michaelmas, to ensure they are not disposed of by the priests or put to other uses. I, John, and my heirs will warrant, defend, and acquit in perpetuity the aforesaid Nicholas and Nicholas, priests, and the priests who succeed to their duties in celebrating divine services in the chapel, against all persons concerning [legal challenges to] all the above-mentioned tenements, land, meadow, pasture and rents with their appurtenances.

In testimony to which matters, I have put my seal to this charter.
Witnesses: Sir John de Chidiok, Sir Robert Latymer, Sir Richard Tourbervile, Sir Edmund Everard, Sir John de la Hale, Ivo de Chiltecombe, John de Watton, John de Fighelten, Robert de Bemynster, William Hichecok, Richard Laurenze, and others.

Drawn up at Bridport on 24 May 1361.

DISCUSSION

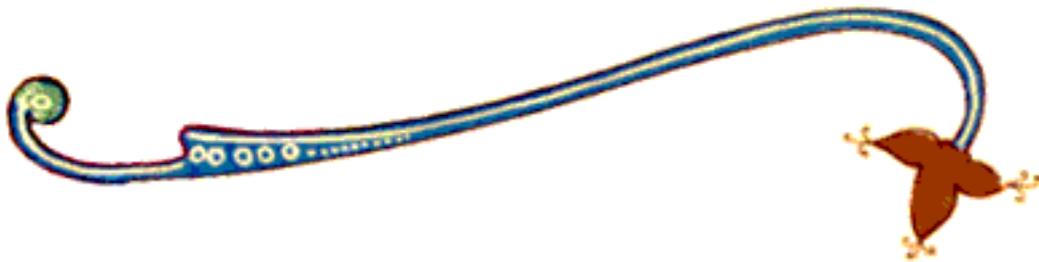

John Munden was a prominent member of Bridport society, having represented the county of Dorset in parliaments of 1339, 1346 and 1352, and found acting as a county justice on several occasions during the 1340s and '50s. By giving the borough authorities some responsibility for the supervision of the chantry – they having to audit the financial accounts and inspect the property and its moveables each Michaelmas – he assured that relevant records would find their way into the borough archives, and a few of these have survived. It was written into the borough customal that the inspection of the chantry should take place on the Monday following Michaelmas (September 29), and that the warden's accounts be presented in writing.

It is not clear whether the chapel of St. Michael was a stand-alone building (no such exists today), or was within St. Mary's church, which still stands, although its present fabric is mostly of the fifteenth century. Wherever situated, certainly the chapel was in existence prior to Munden's time, for an earlier chantry was instituted there by Robert de Farendon; this does not appear to have lasted – perhaps inadequate provision was made for it, financially or administratively – and the inclusion of Farendon's name in the list of souls for special mention in services may indicate that Munden was taking responsibility for the earlier chantry. We can see from Munden's foundation document that a chantry was viewed as a service rather than a location.

Chuntries were usually supported through endowments of the revenues from real estate. Munden evidently feared – perhaps prompted, Dr. Wood-Legh suggests, by the decline of property values following the plague's extermination of tenants and buyers – the property he provided might not be sufficient; the provision of a cash fund as an emergency reserve is unusual. For a later period, when we have figures as to income and expenditures, the former was not greatly exceeding the £10.10s. assigned by Munden as the operating expenses, although the expenditures were generally a little higher than Munden had anticipated.

By contrast with the Whittington foundation, Munden made no explicit provisions for absences of either of the priests from the chantry at any point. Those priests whom we know to have staffed the chantry were aged and unlikely to travel far afield. Possibly such institutions were perceived as appropriate for older priests in a state of semi-retirement; certainly Munden expected that there be no other demands on their time, although this was primarily to ensure chantry duties were attended to conscientiously.

NOTES

"Allington, Bradpole and Walditch"

Hamlets in the neighbourhood of Bridport.

"presentation"

The right to appoint a priest to a living (or other benefice).

"twenty-four hours a day"

The original has cu[m]bantes, meaning lying down – i.e. staying overnight.

Absentee priests, dividing their time between multiple posts, were a problem in the Church.

"100s."

At the time from which the priests' financial accounts survive (1450s), they were in fact receiving 20s. each, leading Dr. Wood-Legh to conclude that the remaining £4 due each were probably being pooled to pay for common expenses, such as food.

"principal terms"

Quarters focused on the major Church festivals of Christmas, the Annunciation, the Nativity of St. John Baptist, and Michaelmas.

"10s."

Dr. Wood-Legh read this as 10s. per priest; the text is not precise on this, however. The punctuation inserted by Wood-Legh would suggest a single allowance for the pair, while a late fifteenth century document, referring to the borough authorities having temporarily taken direct control of administering the chantry budget, read it likewise.

"missals"

Books containing prayers and other devotions said or sung during mass.

"breviaries"

Books compiling the order of prayers for the canonical offices.

"gradual"

A book containing liturgical texts (psalms, readings etc.) used during mass.

"cruets"

Small containers, one for the sacramental wine and a second for the water used (poured into the chalices) during mass.

TRANSLATION

On 30 November 1424, one John Grace, who was at that time called John Grace hermit – and since then men have said he was a monk, then a friar, and after that a recluse – came to this city and preached for 5 days consecutively in the Little Park, saying that he was a licenciate and had a licence to preach from the bishop's officials in this diocese, and that he had preached to the canons at the close in Lichfield for 3 consecutive days, and after that he preached at Birmingham, and next at Walsall, then at Coleshill, and thence came down here. At that time this John Grace was highly reputed among the populace for his preaching, since he was very graceful in his speech, and saintly in the way he lived, and performed and demonstrated many marvels. Because of his reputation, many men were prepared to believe what was said about him in the past, and that encouraged the people to be more receptive to his preaching. Nonetheless, on 30 November after John Grace had preached, it was rumoured that he was not a licenciate and had no licence to preach, notwithstanding that he himself stated in every sermon he gave that he was a licenciate and had such a licence.

On the afternoon of the same day, once Evensong was over, Richard Croseby, Prior of St. Mary's church in Coventry, intended (it was commonly said) to go into the pulpit in the church of Holy Trinity to denounce as accursed all those who listened to the sermon of John Grace. And so, because of the behaviour of the Prior, and what was said by one Master John Bredon, one of the Greyfriars in Coventry, making critical comments among the people, the rumour spread among the populace that the Prior and Friar Bredon wanted to curse all those who had heard John Grace preach. Because of that rumour, neither the Prior nor Friar Bredon were willing come out of the church until the mayor was present; despite the fact that they could well enough have gone wherever they wanted, Heaven knows!

Because of what had happened, the story was spread in the countryside that the commons of Coventry had rioted and planned to kill the Prior and the friar – which, God knows, was not the case, nor was any such thing attempted or plotted. Word of this came to the king's council, which was at that time in London, and it had a letter sent to the mayor, bailiffs, and commons of this city, in the following words: "Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well; forasmuch as it was recently reported to us and some of our councillors that a certain person, a sometime monk, etc."

DISCUSSION

Puritanical criticism of the Church, many of whose institutions had become very worldly, was nothing new in the Late Middle Ages, and Lollardy simply provided a new, doctrinal focus. It found strong sympathy in the Midlands in the late fourteenth century, including at Coventry, which became notorious as a base for the heretics. The citizens' long political struggle with the Prior, who had lordship over half the town, may have contributed to the anti-clericalism felt by some. At the same time, Coventry was one of several places where seemingly heretical tendencies emerged from the other end of the spectrum: a peculiar devotion to a local cult focused on a purportedly miracle-working statue of the Virgin Mary, which was a particular target for Lollard derision.

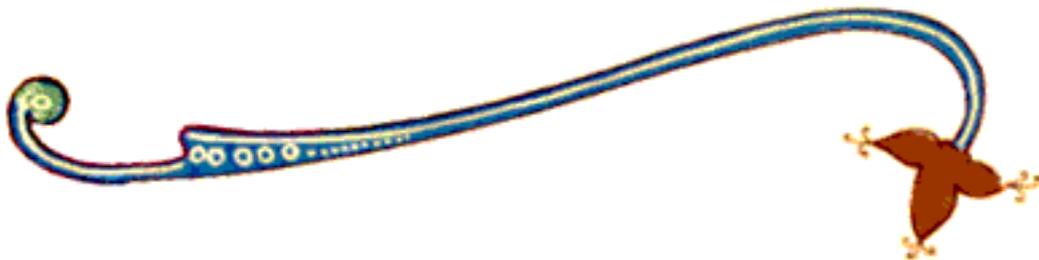

Lollard sympathisers included some in positions of power and influence, and they were able to return supporters to parliament. At one such parliament held at Coventry in 1404, the Church came under attack and the demand was made (fruitlessly) that its revenues be confiscated. But even then the crackdown on heretics was underway. At an episcopal convocation of 1413 a number of books were condemned as heretical, and one of the most offensive had been produced at Coventry. Again, the abortive uprising by Lollard Sir John Oldcastle attracted some supporters from Coventry. In 1419 Robert Clerke, alias Taylor, of Coventry was brought before the bishop on a charge of heresy; he recanted and did penance, but it has been suggested his ideas were due more to mental instability than Lollardy.

In general, urban authorities were anxious to deal firmly with heretics, not for reasons of doctrine but simply to prevent any divisions within the community that could lead to a breakdown in law and order. In some Midlands towns, however, we find sympathy or tolerance for Lollards among the authorities. Such at least is evident from the above document, representing the viewpoint that events had been blown out of proportion, a position that may have been taken to try to forestall or limit intervention by external authorities. The document does not imply any overt support per se for Grace, however, and the city rulers must have been concerned about the disorder that had come about; Lollardy incorporated ideas about social equality that were part of what appealed to the lower classes and must have made the ruling class somewhat nervous. In some cases, the authorities overreacted, as in the famous detention at Leicester of Margery Kempe, returning from her Spanish pilgrimage and en route from Bristol to Lynn; despite her orthodox answers to doctrinal questions, the mayor of Leicester doubted her sincerity, and needed persuasion from the clergy that she could be sent on her way.

Grace was an anchorite friar who had obtained a preacher's licence from Bishop Heyworth. His preaching had caused riots in Staffordshire before he reached Coventry. At this period Coventry was perhaps the principal centre in the Midlands offering support to Lollardy. Prior Crosby was a natural opponent, both because of his ecclesiastical and secular interests in the town. Already, in 1421, he, mag. Bredon (a doctor of theology), and the warden of St. John's Hospital had submitted a proposal to the city authorities for preventing disturbances on Midsummer's Eve and St. Peter's Night, resulting from the large crowds in the streets; they advocated appointing special officers for each ward on those nights and having the mayor or bailiffs patrol the streets with a posse. Possibly they were instrumental in the issue of royal letters patent, in December 1424, ordering Grace's arrest for teaching unorthodox doctrines. The following Easter saw orders for the arrest of seven Coventry men on charges of insurrection; on May 6 two of them and thirty-one others put up bonds to guarantee that they would be obedient to the mayor, would not knowingly support Lollard or other heretical opinions, nor make congregations contrary to the king's peace; sixteen more men gave similar assurances later that year. These were probably the outcome of the investigation into the disturbances resulting from Grace's visit.

Two of the original men whose arrest was ordered, along with two more ordered apprehended in late 1425, remained at large at the beginning of the following year. One was taken and brought before the bishop in March 1426, obtained his release by recanting his heresies, and promptly disappeared – he had still not been retaken by 1428. The mayor's account of 1429 refers to £3 having been spent on fines incurred by poor men of the town in relation to some unspecified indictment before the King's Bench; it is not unlikely that these were fines consequent to the investigation into the alleged riot. In 1431, Lollard leaflets were spread around Coventry, but the problem was dealt with locally, without arousing the king's attention. The same year saw executions of some Lollards at Coventry. For a few decades after this, things were quieter, but Lollardy made a strong reappearance in the 1480s and helps explain why, under the Tudors, Coventry was strongly Protestant.

TRANSLATION

[1. Confession and recantation]

In the name of God, before you the worshipful father in Christ, William by the grace of God Bishop of Norwich, I, John Fynch tiler, resident of the parish of Crouch Church in Colchester, recently arrested in the town of Ipswich of your diocese under suspicion of heresy and imprisoned, [as] your subject, on the grounds that I have been associated and in communication with heretics – that is, with Laurence Tyler, Dutchman, and with his servant John Laborere and others – whose doctrines I have heard, learned, understood, and spread; [viz.] all the errors and heresies which are written and included in this indenture, which I have held, believed and affirmed:

First, that the sacrament of baptism by water, in the common form customarily [performed in] the Church, is neither necessary nor helpful to the increase of bliss, for every child is sufficiently baptized in the blood of Christ's passion, and needs no other baptism.

Also that confession ought to be made only to God, not to any priest, for no priest has the power to absolve a man of any sin.

Also that a simple agreement between man and woman to love one another is sufficient for the sacrament of perfect matrimony, without any verbal contract or any solemnization in church.

Also that it is not lawful to swear [\[an oath\]](#) for any purpose.

Also that every man may lawfully carry out any physical activity, excepting sinful, on Sundays and all other festivals which priests command be kept holy by order of the Church.

Also that every man is obligated to cease paying and withhold all tithes and offerings from curates and priests, and give them to poor people.

Also that no man is obliged to fast at Lent, the Ember Days, Fridays, nor the eves of saints [\[days\]](#), when priests command fasting.

Also that all prayers ought to be directed only to God, and not to other saints.

Also that pilgrimages should not be undertaken, except to the poor people.

Also that no reverence or worship of any kind ought to be done to any images.

The which errors and heresies I heard, understood, spread, held and affirmed since Christmas 1427. For the which errors and heresies I, John Fynche, was brought to justice before mag. David Pryce, Commissary of my lord [\[the bishop\]](#) of London, sitting in judgement in St. Nicholas' church in Colchester and proceeding against me, accused of heresy, around Michaelmas 1428. Before which mag. David Pryce, I – judicially impeached on articles of heresy and errors which I did in truth hold, believe and affirm before that time – denied and swore false oath on the mass book, which I touched with my body, that I never held, believed, nor affirmed any heresies. And so I falsely cleared myself of all [charges of] error and heresy before the same mag. David. And since the time that I foreswore myself falsely on the mass book I have on many occasions listened to, learned, spread, held, believed and affirmed those heresies and errors of which I swore untruthfully that I was not guilty.

Because of which – and many other errors and heresies – I am summoned before you, worshipful father, who has responsibility for my soul. Let me declare absolutely to you that what I have affirmed, believed and held are plain errors and heresies, in contravention of what the Church of Rome has determined [as doctrine]; for which reason I willingly follow and uphold the doctrine of Holy Church and put aside any kind of error and heresy, and return with a good will and heart to the authority of the Church. Considering that Holy Church does not reject those who turn back towards it, and that God does not desire that a sinner die but rather that he reform and live, with a pure heart I confess, detest, and despise my errors and heresies, and acknowledge the opinions as heretical and erroneous, and repugnant to the faith of the Church of Rome and the entire universal Holy Church. And to the same extent that I, through the things I held, believed and affirmed, showed myself to be corrupt and unfaithful, I shall henceforth prove to be uncorrupt and faithful, and I promise to adhere to the beliefs and doctrine of Holy Church. And all kinds of error, heresy, doctrine, and opinion contrary to the faith of Holy Church and to what the Church of Rome has determined – notably the opinions stated above – I abjure and forswear, and swear by these holy gospels which I am touching with my body that from henceforth I shall never hold errors, nor heresies, nor false doctrines against the faith of Holy Church and what the Church of Rome has determined. Nor shall I obstinately defend any such things. Nor shall I support or [allow] anyone else [to support], openly or privately, any person holding or teaching such kinds of things. From this time forth I shall never receive, support, advise, or protect heretics or anyone suspected of heresy. Nor shall I give any credence to them. Nor shall I knowingly have any association with them, not by socializing with them, nor giving them advice, gifts, help, favour, or comfort. If I learn of any heretics or persons suspected thereof, or of their supporters, advisors, or protectors, or of any persons holding private conventicles or assemblies, or [of persons] holding divergent or separate opinions from the common doctrine of the Church, I shall promptly and readily inform you, worshipful father, or your vicar-general in your absence or the diocesans. So help me God at the holy doom and these holy gospels.

In witness of which, I inscribe here with my own hand a cross +. And to this part of the indenture which will remain in your register, I imprint my signet. And the other part of the indenture I receive under the seal of office of your vicar-general, to remain with me for the rest of my life. Given at Norwich in the chapel of your palace, 20 September 1430.

Memorandum that on 27 October 1428, during the term of John Beche and Robert Selby as bailiffs of the town of Colchester, a certain William Chivelyng tailor of Colchester was, in the church of St. Nicholas, Colchester condemned for heresy before mag. David Pryce, vicar in spiritual matters of the venerable dom. William, Bishop of London, and for that reason was handed over to the custody of those bailiffs. In consequence of which he was taken to the Colchester moothall and there held in prison. At that time that bailiffs requested from the king's Chancery a writ from the king [authorizing] the burning of William Chivelyng. Which writ was in the following words:

Henry, by the grace of God King of England and France, and Lord of Ireland, to the bailiffs of his town of Colchester, greetings. Mag. David Pryce, vicar-general of William, Bishop of London, in the absence of the bishop but with the agreement of the clergy of the bishop's diocese, due process of law having been followed in all regards, has pronounced and declared a definitive judgement that William Chivelyng tailor of Colchester as a manifest heretic is condemned, in accord with canon law, sanctions and legal customs in such cases; so that the vicar has certified to us, through our Chancery, that Holy Mother Church has nothing further that it may do in this matter. Therefore, we being devoted to the cause of justice and supportive of the Catholic faith, wishing to maintain and defend Holy Church and its rights and liberties, and to tear out by the roots such errors and heresies in our kingdom of England, to the best of our ability, and to inflict a fitting punishment on convicted heretics – considering that such heretics who are convicted and condemned in the way indicated above, according to both human and divine law and to canon law customarily observed in such cases, should be burned in fiery flames – we order you as firmly as we can that the aforesaid William, who is now in your custody, be placed in the fire in some open and public location within the liberty of the town, the reason for the proceeding having been announced to the populace; and that he in that fire be burned. This you are to have done as a clear example to other Christians of how abhorrent is this kind of crime. Should you fail to carry this out in any regard, it will be at your peril. Witnessed by myself, at Westminster, 2 November 1428.

By authority of which writ from king, addressed to the bailiffs, the heretic William Chivelyng as burned before the tower at Colkynescastell on 4 November 1428.

DISCUSSION

East Anglia was one of the regions of England in which Lollardy was evident in the early years of the reign of Henry VI, and there is evidence that it had taken root in Colchester (although not to the degree it had in some towns, such as London, Bristol or Coventry). In the opening years of the century, Essex had not come under much scrutiny by those rooting out heresy. In 1405 there had been an investigation of books, suspected of containing heresy, in possession of some Colchester citizens; but, since these were returned, we may assume the suspicions were groundless. In 1414 we hear of a group at Colchester alleged to hold secret readings of books written in English. Again we need not take that as an indication of a heretical sect. But that was the year of Sir John Oldcastle's rebellion, and Essex is believed to have made the largest contribution of dissidents to his forces.

The quick suppression of the rebellion encouraged heretics to lie low throughout the remainder of Henry V's reign. But during the last years of his episcopate, Bishop Wakering of Norwich renewed the investigative efforts, and his successor, Bishop Alnwick, was even more determined to renew the persecutions; these efforts suggest that Lollard communities were become large and lively again, and they seem to have been in communication with each other, as the leaders moved from place to place, in part to keep ahead of the law; certainly we can see connections between the Essex and Kent communities of Lollards. We hear of "schools" of heretics, where their beliefs were passed on to new converts; one was hosted in the home of a Colchester cordwainer, John Abraham, who had become a freeman there in 1416, after migrating from nearby Great Tey.

Between 1428 and 1431, as part of a general attempt to suppress Lollardy throughout the country, 60 men and women went on trial in the diocese of Norwich. The Bishop of London's people were also active in Essex, and John Fynch was first arrested there, but saved himself from an abjuration of his heretical beliefs by lying. In Norfolk and Suffolk Lollardy focused on villages and small towns and did not have much impact on the large towns. This was just part of undercover survival of heretical beliefs; there is virtually no evidence of any influence from the continent, although Fynch's connection with a foreigner – apparently of the same profession as he – is an exception.

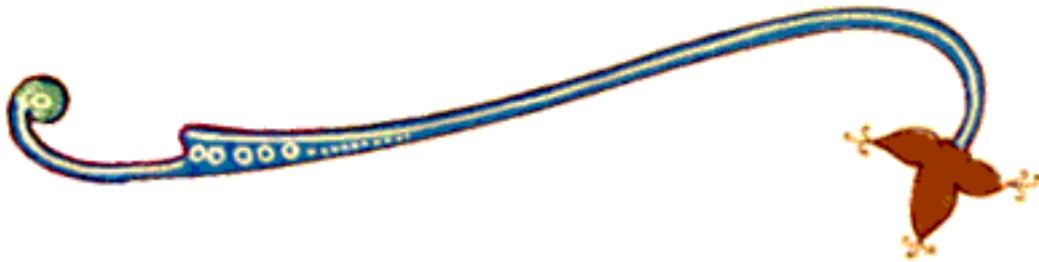

The above copy of the confession and recantation is part of a longer record of Fynch's trial, which however does not add a great deal beyond the above extract; the records of inquisitions are quite formulaic, partly because the authorities were only interested in recording those elements of an accused heretic's answers that related to a set of questions considered pertinent to the charge. This could have served, in consequence, to lump together under Lollardy individuals whose religious attitudes may have varied widely. Fynch lived in Crouch Street in the southwestern suburb of Colchester; he was not a burgess of any prominence, not apparently being one of the freemen. Colchester being in the diocese of London, he appears to have been snared only through his visit to Ipswich, where perhaps he was involved in meetings with other heretics. His confession and recantation were doubtless drawn up by his advocate, notary public John Wylly, and were read out by Wylly to the court, following which Fynch placed his right hand on the Bible and swore to the accuracy of the statement and signed one copy of the document with a cross.

None of the 60 persons tried is known to have been sentenced to death – a punishment normally given only to relapsed heretics. Public flogging and/or solemn penance were the judgements handed out. As one who was, in effect a lapsed heretic – only his perjury having saved him from prior conviction in Colchester, at the time of the Chivelyng affair – Fynch was fortunate to escape execution. He received a stern warning from the bishop never to reoffend, upon pain of burning, and the sentence of three public floggings in the cathedral and city marketplace, and several appearances over the following three years, to do penance before the bishop. However, the last entry in the record of his trial states that he failed to appear at the Cathedral on the February 1431 date assigned for his first flogging; we hear no more.

At the same time as the investigations were going on in East Anglia, Archbishop Chichele was taking similar action in Kent. Several dozen Lollards were arrested and, after confessions were made to a plot for an abortive uprising, some were hanged. Other suspects fled Kent into East Anglia, only to be captured and executed there. One of these was the unrepentant William Chivelyng. Upon his condemnation by the Church, the bailiffs lost no time in obtaining permission from the king to make an example of him, nor in burning him at the stake once they had the king's writ. The speed with which they fulfilled their duties may owe something to a dispute underway at that time between the Colchester authorities and the abbot of St. John's, one episode in an ongoing battle over jurisdiction, with a series of related documents copied into the borough register, the Chivelyng execution being one. In the context of the bill the abbot had written to the king, complaining of various offences committed against him by the bailiffs supported by a community "among whom some have been discovered, rumoured or accused of Lollardy" [Red Paper Book, p.54]; the abbot returned later in his letter to the same theme, asking the king to order the bailiffs not to countenance Lollardy within the community. The date of this document is uncertain, but according to the town clerk's notation it would have been written a matter of weeks before the Chivelyng affair. The bailiffs were doubtless anxious to demonstrate their catholic zeal, so that the king did not take the abbot's side for that reason. We hear in 1429 that John Abraham was dead, so perhaps he too was caught up in these executions. William Caleys, a priest connected with the Colchester Lollards, was burnt at Chelmsford in 1430.

This did not extinguish Lollardy in Colchester, though it must have cowed it for a while. At the beginning of the next century, the heresy was to emerge in some of the leading families of Colchester society. Of these the Bardefields supplied, from the head of the family, a borough bailiff in 1505, although John Bardefield escaped a trial for his beliefs by dying during his ballivalty. It may have been he or his father who had in 1463/64 been dismissed from the office of sergeant-at-mace after falling out with the bailiffs, although he regained favour and twice held the ballivalty himself in the 1490s. The Cowbridges, who were said to have been Lollards since Wycliffe's day and were associated with Bristol, likewise provided a bailiff, in the person of Robert Cowbridge, in 1501/02 and 1507/08. Robert's daughter married a John Bardefield of the younger generation.

NOTES

"Crouch Church"

A name by which St. Mary's-at-the-Wall parish was sometimes known, because the Crouched Friary was in that parish.

"Dutchman"

"Ducheman" was a generic term applied to those from the Low Countries or parts of Germany.

"pilgrimages"

The reference to pilgrimages to the poor people perhaps refers to charitable visitations.

"Colkynescastell"

Tradition had it that Colchester castle had been built by the legendary figure whose name has come down to us in nursery rhyme as Old King Cole.

Chapter 22: Concerning Godric the butcher

When indeed the aforementioned church began to rise from foundations that the heavenly Father had put in place, and the reputation of the apostle's virtues was spreading throughout the neighbourhood, Rahere associated himself with a certain elderly man known as Aelfwine, who had the seriousness of those his age and associated with that seriousness the wisdom of age. Not long before, that old man had built the church of St. Giles by the city gate whose name in English is Cripplegate, and had brought that project to a successful conclusion. Rahere thought this man could be a big help to him. He took him on as his associate and, with his advice and assistance, arranged and undertook all that needed to be done. It was the habit of this Aelfwine to roam the neighbourhood around the church, along with ecclesiastical officials, on the business of soliciting contributions for the relief of the poor men who were laid up in the hospital and for those who had been hired to build the church. He was diligent in bringing back whatever was handed over to him and dividing it among those who needed it. Now there was a certain butcher by the name of Godric, a hard man and acerbic, far more than he had any business being; not only would he refuse to give anything to someone who asked him, but he would scornfully insult them. One day, as this Aelfwine was going around to the butchers, one by one, after the others he came to this Godric and in the name of the apostle urged him with good and honest words, persevering unwaveringly, regardless of whether the moment were opportune or inopportune, despite his unwillingness to give anything; he [i.e. Aelfwine] was not willing to go away empty-handed. And when the old man came to the realisation that neither for the fear or love of God, nor for the shame that any normal man would feel, could that hard and stubborn heart be softened from its persistent refusal, he was driven to exclaim:

"What a sorry excuse for a man you are! Disrespectful and ungrateful towards the Giver of all things, for you will not share with Christ's poor folk those things given by heaven's grace. Wretched man, I entreat you to soften a little your hard and unfaithful heart, and open it up to the virtue of the glorious apostle – if you place your trust in him, I promise you that each heap of meat from which you give me a portion will sell faster than any other; and, what is more, without any reduction in its price."

This did nothing to stir up any charitable feelings in him, but worn down by the persistence of the supplicant, he brought forth a piece of the worst [meat] and threw it into his [i.e. Aelfwine's] pot and, calling them truants, told them to take themselves off. To which Aelfwine replied: "I shall not leave here until what I have foretold has come about." No sooner had he spoken than there came a citizen wishing to buy meat for himself and his household. And he bought that heap to which Aelfwine had referred, at the price of the seller, and carried it away with him. When the news of this spread throughout the butchers' market it was taken, as was fitting, to be a creditable miracle. From that time on, they began to be more enthusiastic about giving alms, more fervent in their devotions, and competed to be the first to give – particularly he, the hardness of whose faithless heart had been dissipated through the power of Christ the Lord, who promised to anyone giving a dishful of cold water to someone who comes in the name of a disciple that he will not go unrewarded.

DISCUSSION

This anecdote is one of many recounted in a work whose purpose is to describe the foundation in 1123 of a priory and hospital dedicated to St. Bartholomew and at the same time present (as Christopher Brooke puts it) a "prospectus" illustrating to pilgrims or the sick the efficacy of the hospital as a place of miracles. St. Bartholomew was not one of the foremost saints, but there had been previous English foundations dedicated to him, including close to London a hospital at Rochester/Chatham in the late eleventh century.

The founder of the London institution was Rahere, a man of whom we have almost no mention other than in this work. According to the author, Rahere was of humble birth, but sought to improve his lot by becoming a hanger-on at the court of King Henry I. This description, which probably stems from Rahere's own self-deprecating story of his youth, uses terms that suggest he was some kind of court jester, although Professor Brooke proposes that he may rather have held some clerical position at the court. Whichever is the case, he seems to have prospered and become more serious at the same time; a man of this unusual name is found as a canon of St. Paul's.

Regretting his youthful follies, Rahere made a pilgrimage to Rome where, becoming seriously ill and fearing that he had not yet cleansed his soul, he vowed that if he were restored to health he would build a hospital for the poor. On his return journey, still feverish, he had a vision of hell, followed by one of St. Bartholomew, who instructed him to build a church in the London suburb of (West) Smithfield. Later in that century FitzStephen painted an appealing picture of the horse market at Smithfield; the "smooth field" was evidently already by the 1120s dedicated to the horse and cattle markets and Rahere, when he obtained licence from the king to proceed with his plans, faced erecting church and hospital on ground to the east; much of this area was marshy, but Rahere built on the higher part, which had been used for public executions (the gallows thereafter being moved further west, to a spot now under the present meat market at Smithfield). The land given him by the king was expansive enough for a large priory to be built and a separate hospital close by, to the southwest. He began that task in 1123 and, by recruiting citizens to help him with reclaiming the land, fundraising, transporting building materials (the stone being imported) and building, work had proceeded sufficiently for the site to be consecrated by the end of 1129.

The account of these events was set down by a canon of the priory, in the years following the death in 1174 of Rahere's successor. The author claims to have obtained information from those who had known Rahere. The surviving copy of this account dates from ca.1400. It is likely that the book incorporates elements of fact amidst its propaganda.

Whether true or not, the story above provides a small corrective to documentation of charitable foundations and gifts, indicating that not everyone was of a charitable frame of mind. At the same time, while the charitable foundations of the twelfth century are more commonly associated with royalty or the nobility, wealthy citizens were also active either as founders or as donors, and the story of Godric implies that he was an exception to the rule of charitable giving. While the stories in the foundation book talk in terms of modest donations, the survival of hospitals and other such foundations relied upon their endowment with real estate, usually from bequests.

Rahere became the first prior of the Augustinian community he established. In 1133 he secured a royal charter, giving the priory various privileges and exemptions, and licensing a three-day fair around the feast of St. Bartholomew; this fair, which had apparently grown up because of the crowds of pilgrims, sick, cured persons etc. who gathered at the church on the feast-day, became one of the major cloth fairs of medieval England. By Rahere's death in 1143 only the eastern end of the church had been completed; its choir is today one of the few medieval structures to remain standing in London. Furnished with royal and papal grants of privileges, St. Bartholomew's went on to become a wealthy priory, although the hospital became distanced from it at the end of the century; Rahere's successor as prior appointed a businessman, Adam the Merchant, to run the hospital. A charter of 1147 defines the purpose of the hospital as to provide shelter and care for the poor, the sick, the homeless, and orphans; in the fourteenth century, the hospital was focusing its efforts on looking after the sick poor until they had recovered, caring for pregnant women until after they had given birth, and maintaining children born in the hospital until they were seven years old. A separate building, south of the Thames, was set up as a leper house.

Although the account, unlike FitzStephen's written around the same time, does not have London as its focus, its miracle stories throw some light, incidentally, on urbanisation in England and there are points of comparison with what FitzStephen reveals. We have reference to the specialized markets in London – that at Smithfield, and the Shambles just within the walls south of the site of St. Bartholomew's – as well as the Jewish quarter. We see that the brewing of ale was already a task associated primarily with women in the first half of the twelfth century. Rural residents were coming in to London to buy or sell food in the markets there, paying toll at the city gates, while the women were taking on piecework, spinning cloth to be sold by the wives of the citizens. Mentions of prostitutes and pimps reflect another trade for which London was well-known. We hear of commercial voyages from London to the "ends of the earth". Meanwhile, Flemish merchants were heading for London's harbour; two such ventures are mentioned, one involving a fleet of eleven ships owned by the merchants and carrying domestic goods made by Flemish craftsmen. There are also references to the coastal trade between Dunwich and London, ships setting out from Sandwich and Dover, as well as travel between Norwich and Yarmouth, and between Northamptonshire towns and London – one case involving a young man possibly off to seek his fortune in London, and another involving the transport of logs to be sold in London. One merchant of Hastings is mentioned as bringing wine from foreign parts to London in his ship, in a story in which we hear how many Hastings houses were lost in a great fire.

In another anecdote, a Colchester victualler perceived the king's war in Wales (1157) as an opportunity to supply the army, and was able to make a good profit from his venture (relying on coastal rather than overland transportation), some of which he then reinvested in other business deals. He was so occupied with his business dealings that he could not find the time to go to St. Bartholomew's to donate a few pennies he had apparently vowed to give in return for success in his venture. When his money was stolen on the return journey, he called on the saint for aid, only to be upbraided for fraudulent dealings to earn exorbitant profit, and for being dilatory in fulfilling his vow. Naturally the story ends with him fulfilling his charitable obligations.

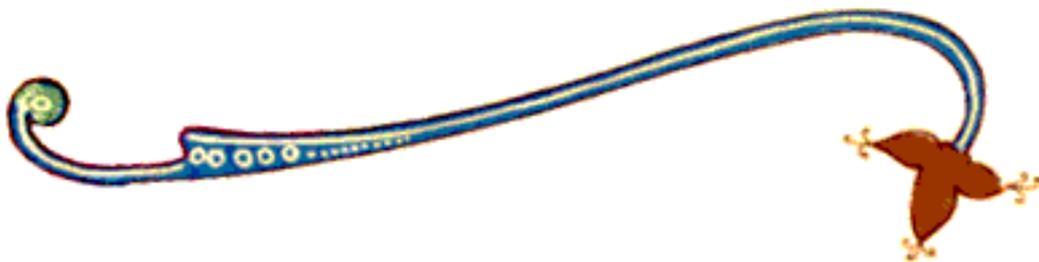

Yet another story reflects on the role of the hospital, and why people placed faith in its ability to restore them to health:

"Another man, named Aldwyn, lived in a town which is called Dunwich on the sea-shore, who was so crippled that he had not the free use either of feet or hands.... When the story of the miracles of the most blessed apostle reached him he began to raise his sorrowful spirit with a better hope and to promise himself that he would have health if he should be carried thither.

Therefore... he paid the passage money and was set on a ship and, being carried to the church, was set in the hospital of the poor and supported there some time of the alms of the said church. Meanwhile, by the virtue of the apostle he began to revive and his longed-for health began to return bit by bit. And so at first, bent though he was, he made with his hands little things such as distaffs, weights, and other girls' gear. Next as his steps grew stronger and his limbs enjoyed their natural vigour, he followed the more important works of those who cut logs with axe and hatchet, and not long after practised the craft of carpentry in the same church and throughout the City of London as he had been taught as a boy, blessing God whose eyes are on them that fear Him and on those who hope in His mercy."

NOTES

"apostle's virtues"

The reference here is to the efficacy of prayers to St. Bartholomew, one of the 12 apostles, whether at the church dedicated to him or elsewhere, for healing the sick or protecting those in danger; a number of such miracles having been recounted earlier in the book.

"Aelfwine"

Alfunine in the original, although a different source renders the name as Aelmund.

"church of St. Giles"

Built just outside the walls, a little east of the site for St. Bartholomew's, its location might suggest a role as a leper-house, but we know it only as a parish church; not long after Queen Matilda built a leper hospital dedicated to St. Giles in the Fields just west of London (Holborn). South-west of St. Bartholomew's, the extra-mural parish church of St. Sepulchre Newgate was also built by an individual or group associated with Rahere.

"truants"

In the sense of someone who avoids work, preferring to live by begging from others

"made a pilgrimage"

An implicit association is often made between Rahere's change in attitude and the gloom that overtook the king's court after Prince Henry drowned when the White Ship sank in November 1120. However, the book of St. Bartholomew's states that Rahere was prior for 22½ years, yet he died in September 1143. If this is not an error by the writer (which seems unlikely, for the writer clearly knew 1143 was the year of death), it may be a matter of licence, with the priorate being dated back to the conception of Rahere's plan. Since that would point to early 1121, when Rahere was already lingering sick in Rome, he is likely to have departed for Rome prior to the death of Prince Henry. An alternate inspiration for his conversion might have been the death of Henry I's queen in 1118; Matilda's own good works had included the foundation of the Augustinian priory of Holy Trinity, Aldgate and the hospital of St. Giles (see note above).

TRANSLATION

[1. Presentation to a hermitage]

John de Hertwell mayor of Oxford, William de Codesale and Geoffrey Lodewell [bailiffs], together with the entire community of Oxford lease to John Bray of Shiplake, hermit, a plot of land with appurtenances in Swinsell, opposite the chapel of St. Nicholas and called St. Nicholas' yard, in the county of Berkshire, for 12d. annually etc. Given at Oxford on 28 February 1365. By this indenture he is obligated to repair and maintain all those buildings presently standing or that will be constructed in the future.

[2. A leper? appointed to the post]

Indenture by which William le Northerne mayor of Oxford and the entire community of that town lease to John Leper a plot of land next to Cowmead in the county of Berkshire, called the Bridgewright's Place, opposite the chapel of St. Nicholas, for the term of his life for an annual rent of 12d. [payable] quarterly. For the term of his life, John is to maintain, repair and support the bridge of Grandpont both on the inner and the outer sides of the New Gate, using the alms given and bestowed for that gate and what he receives for himself, and is to preserve the plot and the buildings presently standing or to be constructed there in the future without any deterioration or damage. Should it happen that the rent be in arrears for a full year, or John be responsible for deterioration or damage to the land or the buildings, or fail to maintain the bridge, John acknowledges that the community and its successors will be fully within their rights to re-enter and repossess the land, buildings, and appurtenances, etc. Given at Oxford on 20 January 1377.

[3. Letter of reference for a hermit collecting alms for borough works]

Let it be made known to all people through this document that we, Richard de Garston mayor of the town of Oxford, William Ryvel and John Banbury bailiffs of that town, Walter Bowne, John Shawe, John Merston and Edmund Kenyan aldermen, with the consent and at the wishes of the entire community of the town of Oxford, have ordained and appointed William Cardon hermit, the bearer of this document, as warden of the great south bridge in the county of Berkshire. To live in the hermitage located there, as long as we wish it, to repair any defects found on the bridge and, in addition, to maintain various other places around the town of Oxford and correct anything found to be a threat to life and limb in the vicinity. Consequently, we humbly request each and every person who reads this letter that, when William comes to you seeking alms and collecting on behalf of the causes mentioned above and you do not feel inclined to be responsive, as a favour to us you give credence to William and that you show a willingness to give generously by way of charity whatever is within your means and pleasure, in support of the aforesaid project. In witness to which we have set the seal of the mayoralty of Oxford to this document. Given at Oxford on 10 November 1399.

DISCUSSION

Hermits, also known as anchorites, accepted poverty, deprivation and seclusion as part of their lives of contemplation and devotion. The Church tolerated rather than approved this form of religious expression, but hermits were on the whole well respected in lay society. How well they were supported by that society, in terms of charity, is less well understood. The third of the documents above indicates that charity was not more freely given in the Middle Ages than it is today, people being suspicious of beggars; a stationed supplicant might be more favoured than an itinerant one. Testaments occasionally include small charitable bequests to hermits, but far less frequently than to parish churches, communities of monks or friars, leper-houses, or the poor (on the other hand, hermits were likely fewer in number, the heyday for eremitical leanings having passed by the Late Middle Ages).

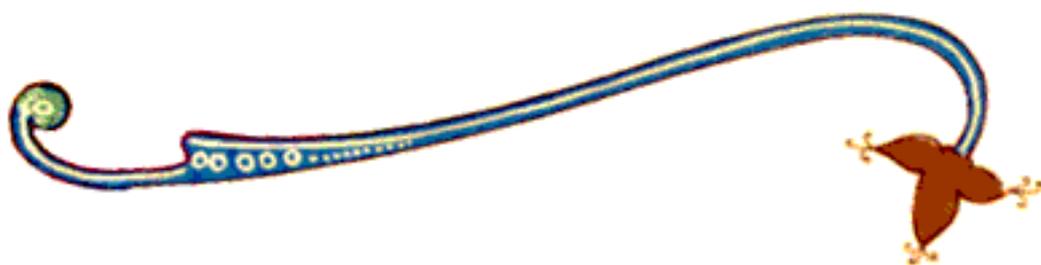

The above documents suggest that Oxford authorities were killing two birds with one stone: providing some support for those committed to a life of relative solitude, while also addressing the growing need for maintenance of civic works. The extracts from borough chamberlains' accounts made by Brian Twyne, Oxford university's first archivist, in the early seventeenth century show that during the 1360s, at least as early as 1363, the borough was providing the hermit of Grandpont with 13s.4d annually towards the costs of repairing "the south bridge of a certain school", with the money coming from the rent paid by the school.

The bridge in question lay across the Thames south of Oxford, controlling access to the causeway known as Grandpont, entering Oxford at its South Gate, one of the entrances through the town walls; from the late seventeenth century the South Bridge became known as Folly Bridge. Probably in the late thirteenth century the New Gate had been built atop the bridge, the outer fourth of which was turned into a drawbridge. In 1283 we hear of 12d. rent from a tenement in Oxford assigned to the pontarius of South Bridge, and it may be that this officer was a hermit from that time; hermits were appointed to the task up until the late fifteenth century. That the bridge was situated partly on land within the liberties of Oxford, and partly on Berkshire soil created a complication to arranging for financial support for repairs. The use of a hermit able to move about freely collecting alms may have tapped into diverse communities in a way that the Oxford authorities could not, had they sought a more conventional solution.

In these circumstances, clearly the hermit could not have been almost wholly divorced from society. But his work on behalf of the borough also provided him with somewhere to live at a modest rent. It is not certain whether John Leper was a hermit, or whether he was living alone and seeking alms because diseased, or again was perhaps leasing the property as a business arrangement – although that would seem to defeat the charitable aspect of the initiative. In a rental of town properties compile in 1387/88, John Leper is still paying 12d. a year for the plot on Grandpont. It is not unlikely that this man was a leper, living in isolation at the edge of town as a hermit would do; although leprosy was a term applied to a range of skin diseases in the Middle Ages, seclusion was the general approach insisted upon by lay authorities. However, we should not put too much reliance on surname evidence, for one of the chamberlains in 1363/64 was named John le Leper, and we hear again in the poll tax of 1380 of a married baker named John Leper, sufficiently well-to-do to have six servants.

That the alms collected by the hermit were insufficient to meet needs is suggested by a section of the 1404/05 chamberlains account, itemizing expenditures of almost 43s. on materials and labour for work on "the bridge at the new gate". Occasionally royal grants of pontage were obtained to help fund bridge repair.

Rochester provides another example of a town where a hermit was commissioned to travel around the parishes responsible for maintenance of its bridge, collecting donations for the upkeep. And in 1496, the Henley-on-Thames authorities decided "that Reginald Wynche hermit should be given a certain public letter under the seal of the community [\[authorizing\]](#) him begging [\[for money\]](#) for repairs to the chapel of St. Anne on the bridge and the highway there, continuing [\[in this task\]](#) from year to year while it suits the warden and the community." [P.M. Briers, ed. Henley Borough Records: Assembly Books i-iv, 1395-1543. Oxfordshire Record Society, 1960, 117.] A building adjacent to the chapel was later, suggestively, known as the hermitage.

NOTES

"Shiplake"

A village some distance south of Oxford, near Henley-on-Thames.

"appurtenances"

Easements, rights of way, or other rights belonging to a piece of real estate; in medieval use, the term may also have occasionally encompassed physical attributes of the real estate other than the main house, such as garden and outbuildings.

"Swinsell"

Swyneshull in the original, this was a suburb surrounding the South Bridge, crossing the Thames to the south of Oxford, bearing part of the Grandpont a causeway heading north from the bridge into Oxford.

"chapel of St. Nicholas"

A wayside chapel, where alms could be collected.

"Grandpont"

A "great bridge" was said to have been built by one of the companions of the Conqueror, Robert d'Oilly, who also built Oxford's castle; later the name came to be used for the suburb lying between the South Gate and South Bridge. The bridge had four arches.

"New Gate"

This was built towards the southern end of the bridge, over the piers beyond the third arch.

"threat to life and limb"

Literally "perils"; the authorities probably had in mind things such as fallen trees, blocked ditches, holes in the road, etc.

TRANSLATION

These are the ordinances made by the authority and with the advice of the venerable father Walter, by the grace of God Bishop of Worcester, with the consent and involvement of Sir Robert de Gournay, patron of the almshouse of St. Mark at Billeswick and Henry Gaunt, then master of the same, concerning the rents and lands acquired by Henry and belonging to the almshouse. That is, the manor of Stockland with the advowsons of the churches of Stockland and Quantoxhead, the manors of Earthcott and Lea with [their] appurtenances, the lands acquired in Brewham, and Langford mill, and the rents in the town of Bristol.

The ordinance previously made by Sir Robert de Gournay, and approved by the Bishop, concerning there being a master and three chaplains in the almshouse and concerning the daily feeding of poor Christians there (as is more fully set out in his charter), is nonetheless to continue in force. That it, that among the number of the poor are to be twelve scholars, who may be admitted or removed at the will of the master; they, dressed in black copes and surplices, shall fulfill their duties under the direction of the precentor. Satisfactory provision for whose needs is to be made, by arrangement of the master, depending on the resources of the house. From whose number one is to be chosen who is capable of overseeing and instructing the others; more complete provision is to be made for his needs than for that of the others.

Further to Robert's ordinance, it is ordained that there be appointed three clerks in holy orders and five lay brothers there wearing the habit, in a style similar to that of the brethren of the hospital of Lechlade, except for the badge of the almshouse which is a white cross and a red shield bearing three white geese. Should it happen that any of the six clerks be raised to the order of priest by the master, he shall nevertheless [continue] to take his turn in fulfilling his duties in the church under the precentor's direction. Beyond the aforesaid number of chaplains, clerks and brothers, there are not to be any others wearing the habit. The number of chaplains and clerks is not to exceed thirteen, unless over the course of time the house's resources increase and then they [received] into the charity of the house may increase accordingly as the master of the house shall think fit in God's sight.

When anyone shall be admitted into the fraternity, while he is in his probationary period his habit shall be imprinted only with the shield; once his year of probation is up and [if] he is found suitable, then he is to profess [his vows], and then the shield with the cross may be placed on his [habit]. Or, if during his probationary period he requests an exception be made and asks for the right, the shield with the cross may be placed on his upper habit once he has taken the basic vows of the order; that is, to contenance, obedience, and renunciation of material possessions, as well as observance of the other rules of the house. If someone who has been admitted is, during the probationary period, found to be less than suitable, he may be allowed to leave without obstruction or may be removed by the master.

In regard to fasting and other observances, the procedures and practices of the brethren of Lechlade hospital are to be followed, except that as regards divine offices they are to comply with the consuetudinary and ordinal of Salisbury. Should it happen that any deceased persons will their bodies to be buried in this place, or if any prince or prelate comes to visit, it is permitted for the chaplains and clerks to go out to meet them dressed in their almshouse habits or in more solemn attire as prescribed by the Salisbury practice; on condition that this not be a habit used for other purposes [i.e. in divine services], except in the choir or other situation when church services are not being performed.

On the matter of celebrating solemn mass, the chaplains and clerks of the almshouse are to behave as follows. One mass is to be celebrated solemnly each morning for the Blessed Virgin Mary, a second for the deceased, and a third as the daily mass; this is a daily requisite. The other chaplains may celebrate their masses, both for the living and the dead – and especially for the benefactors of the house – according to the direction of the precentor. After these solemn masses and other divine services have been celebrated, the needs of the poor shall be seen to by two of the chaplains and the six clerks, wearing the habit of the house, together with two lay brothers each carrying in his hand a knife to cut the bread of those who are debilitated or incapacitated, according to their preference. This between the first and third hour, before the chaplains and clerks themselves breakfast, so that having received a share there they [i.e. the poor] may nonetheless seek their necessities elsewhere.

As for the master, the chaplains, the clerks, and the brothers wearing the habit, they are to sleep together in one building and take their meals in one building (that is, the refectory); but no secular person may eat or drink in that refectory unless by special permission of the master. Nor shall any of them [i.e. the brethren] eat or drink within the grounds of the almshouse other than in the refectory, unless prevented by illness or blood-letting; in which case, at the direction of the master, he may take his meals in the space designated and outfitted as an infirmary. If guests arrive or there is some other good reason, the master, however, may dine in his room or some other location of his choice; with the proviso that when the master does not wish to join his guests at table, or is prevented from doing so for some reason, he may task whichever he wishes of the chaplains, clerks or brothers in the almshouse habit to substitute for him in that duty. Furthermore, whenever the master eats outside the refectory he may have with him one or two of the chaplains of the house. The same applies whenever he happens to go outside to some other place, such as into the town of Bristol or beyond, on whatever business or for whatever reason. Also, none of the chaplains, clerks, or brothers may eat or drink in the town outside of their house, unless in the company of the bishop or the patron, or in [other of] the religious houses; and then [only] with the permission of the master or someone acting in his place. On such occasions he is to take with him one of the chaplains, clerks, or brothers in the habit of the house, both on his way there and on the way back, to avoid any of them being seen wandering around alone in the town.

Whenever they are at table, or within the grounds of the house, or elsewhere, the master and the chaplains are to wear black mantles and amices, with the badge of the house visible on the outside. But when riding out or walking about the town they are to wear black copes bearing the badge.

The chaplains, clerks, and brothers are to have good bread made from corn and, similarly, good ale well brewed and good pottage, with a small dish, and an allowance determined by the master – but they may not [use it to] buy wine for their own consumption nor to host a party to which others are invited, at the expense or to the loss of the poor. At each mealtime and get-together some lesson is to be read out, as is the custom among other religious communities, under the direction of the precentor.

Also, if any of the chaplains or clerks knows how to write or has experience in notating music, he should under instruction from the master write or notate such things that are useful for the house. Similarly, if any of the lay brothers has received training in any mechanical art, he is to employ himself in the same, under instruction from the master, for the benefit of the house. Moreover, each and every of the lay brothers is to be diligent in attending to the duties assigned him by the master, whether inside or outside the house, whenever and as often as required by determination of the master. If in fulfilling his duties someone behaves improperly or performs less well than he should, and this is proven, he is to be removed from that role and someone else substituted, as seems best to the master.

This also must be stated, that if the land at Pawlett next to the sea, which belongs to the almshouse, should be flooded because of tide action (which Heaven forbid), so that the crops grown on that land are completely or in large part ruined; then, this having been proven by the master of the house to the bishop of Worcester then in office and to the patron of the almshouse, after an enquiry has taken place, with their agreement the allowance for the poor and costs incurred in relation to that allowance are to be reduced until the house has recovered from its loss.

The bishop has also granted, for himself and his successors, that the house of St. Mark be relieved of and exempted from his procurations, visitations from the archdeacon or his official, and from making obedience to the archdeacon, as much as permissible for a religious house, given the obligations with which the house is burdened and due consideration to its limited means; however, visitations of the house will be conducted by the bishop or his official as the law requires.

We, Walter, by the grace of God Bishop of Worcester, having inspected these ordinances, confirm them by our authority from the pope. In witness to which, we have had set to this document our seal, together with the common seal of the house of St. Mark, as well as the seals of Sir Robert de Gournay the patron of the almshouse and Henry de Gaunt the master of that place. Given on 15 September 1259.

DISCUSSION

At an uncertain date in the early years of the reign of Henry III, wealthy landowner Maurice de Gaunt built an almshouse just west of intramural Bristol, near St. Augustine's Abbey (itself founded by one of his ancestors), and made an arrangement with the abbot and convent that they, in return for him supplying them with a certain quantity of produce from his estates, to provide a daily meal for a hundred poor people there and to maintain a chaplain to pray for the souls of Maurice and his ancestors. He subsequently added properties in the town and county, notably the manor of Pawlett, to the endowment.

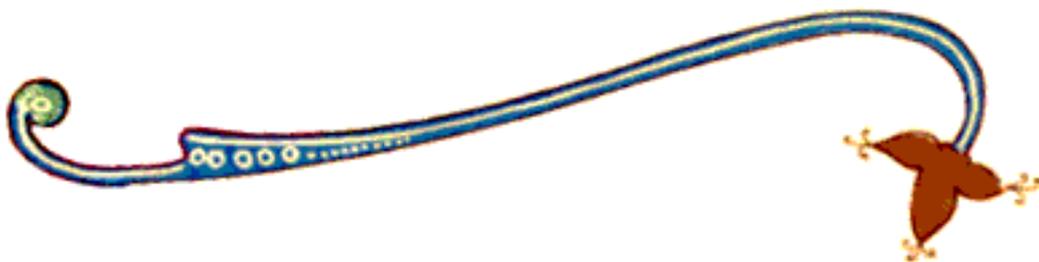

Maurice's nephew and heir, Robert de Gournay, transformed the almshouse into a hospital that was a religious house in its own right. He made it and its endowment independent of the abbey (which led to a series of disputes between the two corporations), limited his own powers as patron, increased the number of chaplains, and appointed a master to govern the institution; Maurice's younger brother Henry de Gaunt was given that post, although thereafter the community was to elect its own masters. In consequence, Robert was viewed as the founder of the hospital, although from the fifteenth century it was increasingly known as Gaunt's House. Most of the endowments of the hospital were acquired from, or through the agency of, Gournay or the Gaunts; from the late thirteenth century on, there were few gifts of land to the hospital.

It seems likely Robert continued the daily feeding of a hundred poor persons, although his foundation charter refers to only twenty-seven; but over time the charitable handouts were reduced and by the close of the Middle Ages were restricted to the twenty-seven. This limitation of activities was the result of revenues from the endowments being diverted to support the enlarged clerical community – the regulations of 1259 present one stage in that process of expansion – and the high cost of legal battles with the abbey and with later patrons, as well as a general trend taking place in hospitals. At several times later in the thirteenth century bishops or hospital patrons complained about reductions in the hospital's almsgiving, and royal commissions similarly investigated suspensions of the doles in the early fifteenth century.

It is not certain whether the hospital went beyond the daily meal to providing short- or long-term accommodations for the hundred poor. The impression is not, for Gournay's confirmation ca.1231 of his uncle's endowment refers to the obligation to give bread or broth to any poor person coming to the hospital between the first and ninth hour of the day. The exception may have been the twenty-seven, whose number included twelve poor scholars serving as choristers. Nor seems there to have been any mission to look after the sick or aged infirm, although from the mid-thirteenth century the hospital was prepared to take on as residents those willing to turn over their lands to the house. It therefore served as a retirement home, but out of self-interest and in favour of persons of at least modest means rather from charitable concerns about the poor or down-and-out. Probably the twenty-seven recipients of alms were, or came to be, all residents; besides the scholars, the number may have encompassed the pensioners and retired hospital brethren or servants – certainly the hospital's residents later included some of its retired masters. There was a trend away from general handouts to more targeted maintenance of inmates in medieval hospitals over the course of the Late Middle Ages.

The focus of St. Mark's hospital was, then, primarily its monastic life, governed like Lechlade hospital by the Augustinian rule; in this it was atypical. It did not abandon its charitable work, nor did its reduction in charitable activities lose it the respect of the local community. Several Bristol merchants founded chantries there in the fourteenth century; in the fifteenth and early sixteenth, the master was called on to perform religious trusteeships, including of Forster's Almshouses in Bristol. Nonetheless, it was as an Augustinian convent, not a hospital, that it was closed at the Dissolution (1539). Its site was purchased by the Corporation of Bristol. Today there survives only a storage cellar of the master's house, which now houses a wine museum.

NOTES

"Billeswick"

An area in the suburbs to the north and west of the walled town.

"advowsons"

The right of nominating a clergyman for appointment to a vacant living in a church or some other ecclesiastical benefice; the person holding the advowson was in effect the patron of the church. Presentative advowsons typically originated in the Anglo-Saxon period, when major landowners built churches on their property and were allowed by the bishop of the diocese to present a priest of their choice for the bishop's confirmation. After the churches themselves passed out of private hands, the advowsons tended to remain with the heirs or designates of the original patrons.

"Stockland and Quantoxhead"

These two parishes were near each other, but quite some distance southwest of Bristol, near the coast of Bridgwater Bay.

"Earthcott"

Earthcott was part of what is now Almondsbury, a few miles north of Bristol; Lea was a subsidiary manor.

"Brewham"

What is now South and North Brewham in Somerset, to the south of Bath.

"Langford"

Probably Langford Budville in southern Somerset.

"precentor"

This ecclesiastical dignity had functions that included teaching and leading the choir, and explaining the church ceremonies to those who participated in them.

"continence"

This refers principally to chastity (i.e. abstinence from sex), but also to the self-discipline and self-restraint that permits moderation in sensual indulgences generally. It was not the same as celibacy, although a required condition for celibacy.

"obedience"

Aquinas argued that, of the three monastic vows, poverty and continence were less important than obedience.

"renunciation of material possessions"

i.e. poverty.

"consuetudinary and ordinal"

I.e. documents recording the customs and regulations governing the religious community, principally with regard to divine services and observances. For bibliographical references to those of Salisbury, see here.

"seek their necessities elsewhere"

I assume this to mean that the non-resident poor, having received some food from the hospital, would go to other locations whence they might expect to receive a handout.

"may have with him"

It is unclear whether this was an option or an injunction; i.e. whether for the benefit of the master, or as a check on his behaviour.

"amices"

An oblong piece of linen placed around the neck and over the shoulders; usually a white cloth worn during mass, but here specified as black.

"good bread made from corn"

The bread to be given to the poor was specified as being made from equal quantities of wheat, beans, and barley or rye.

"pottage"

A thick broth; the pottage for the poor was thickened with oat-flour.

"mechanical art"

I.e. a craft.

"Pawlett"

A manor in Somerset, on the other side of the River Parrett from Stockland Bristol (see above). It was presumably proximity to the Parrett estuary that put it in jeopardy from storm-fostered high tides; Stockland was similarly vulnerable.

"process of expansion"

According to Ross, the figures given in the constitutions were a clerical error; the copies enrolled in episcopal registers indicate that rather than 3 (chaplains), 3 (clerks), and 5 (lay brethren), the numbers should be 6, 6, and 5. It is not impossible that these later enrolments, the first of which was ca.1269, reflect alterations to the terms of the original, which clearly envisaged further expansion beyond the numbers it specified. However, Gournay's confirmation ca.1231 of his uncle's foundation referred to 4 chaplains and 8 clerks.

"residents"

Some diverse examples: in 1248 carpenter Simon de Dene gave the hospital his lands at Earthcott and La Lea in return for an annual pension of 13s.4d and, after his wife Isabella Bochan was dead, room and board in the hospital on an equal footing to a chaplain there, for the remainder of his life – he does not seem to have made provision for his wife, in the eventuality of him dying first. Around the same year, Robert de Malefeld and his wife Aldith Bochan gave land in Earthcott and Lea in return for a lump sum of 20s., a quitrent of 13s.4d annually, and for boarding their son John at the almshouse, for life; possibly this unusual arrangement points to mental incompetence in the son, for the hospital added the proviso that it would not host him if he proved disobedient or ungrateful. In 1255, Robert Bilebost offered to transfer his legal rights to a piece of land and provide his services to the house (in what capacity is unknown), in return for a 10s. annual pension and board and lodging on a par with that given the more important servants of the house; the hospital accepted and promised to loan him a horse so that he could travel to the king's court to establish his claim to the land, but warned that if he failed to win his case, the contract would be void. And in 1268, Thomas de Ermynton gave to the hospital houses, land, rents, and a row of shops in Bristol, in exchange for accommodation and maintenance equivalent to that provided the chaplains (excepting clothing and shoes) for himself, his father, and his brother, for as long as each of them should live. He negotiated for the "knights chamber" to be allocated to their use, with sufficient fuel and candles supplied and, in case Thomas and Elias died (or became monks), leaving their father alone, a servant was to be provided for the father. Supervision of fulfillment of the terms of this agreement was put in the hands of the borough authorities.

TRANSLATION

This is the order and rule of the brothers and sisters of the Hospital of St. John the Baptist at Nottingham, made and ordained by Walter de Grey, archbishop of York, in 1241 A.D.

Walter, by the grace of God Archbishop of York, primate of England, to our beloved in Christ Robert Alwin, master of the Hospital of the blessed John the Baptist of Nottingham, and to the brethren serving God and St. John the Baptist there, our greetings and blessing. Since men of religion have agreed among themselves that order should be observed, without which order there would be no religion, we decree and firmly direct that whoever shall be the warden or master of the House of St. John the Baptist of Nottingham is to ensure that there will always be two or more chaplains there to celebrate divine service. Furthermore, we decree that between Michaelmas and Easter all brethren shall get up at the same time for Matins, at an early enough time to allow Matins to be sung before dawn or at the break of day. Prime and Tierce having been sung thereafter, mass is to be celebrated; Sext and None having been sung after mass, the brethren may attend to the business of the house, each one according to the duties assigned to him. And, when they are not prevented by some reasonable and unavoidable hindrance, they shall hear Vespers and Compline. We also decree that all shall habitually be obedient to their warden or master, without gainsay or demur. None of them is to possess any property; but if any of them has possessions, he may surrender them to the warden or master within seven days of the issuing of this rule, or else on the seventh day be excommunicated on the grounds of having kept possessions. The keeper or warden may put to the use of the house the possessions anyone may have. If, however, it is discovered that any of them has property when he dies, his corpse shall be denied burial on Christian ground, and shall be buried elsewhere, the brethren casting his possessions upon him and saying "Take your money with you into perdition!" No-one may have a locked chest, unless it is a chest assigned for his official duties. Everyone shall receive the same kind of clothes, food and drink, and shall not eat meat during the week except on three days – Sunday, Tuesday, and Thursday – unless by permission of the warden. They shall dine together in one refectory, keeping silent during the meal or – if it is necessary to say something – speaking in a low voice. Everyone shall sleep together in one dormitory, dressed in breeches and undershirts or garments which they use instead of undershirts; and they shall go to sleep at the time they retire to the dormitory. They shall observe silence until Prime has been sung and, during the night, the brothers shall not approach where the sisters are, nor vice versa, unless they are taken ill. Everyone shall be chaste and sober; they shall not drink anywhere in the town or the suburb. They shall eat in moderation, putting the goods of the house and alms collected to provide [\[instead\]](#) for the needs of the poor and infirm. They will dress in a standard habit; that is, of russet and black cloth. At least once a week they shall meet in chapter where transgressions [\[of the rule\]](#) will be denounced and formally corrected by the warden or master; there is to be no chatter or noise while the chapter is being held, and those who have transgressed shall humbly and obediently submit to canonical discipline. No more brothers and sisters are to be admitted [\[to the brotherhood\]](#) than are needed to serve the infirm and administer the goods of the house. If any of them has a household it is to be well-behaved, honest, sober, and chaste; if any member of the household is discovered to be drunk or lecherous he is to be expelled from the service of the house, unless he restrains himself from such vices. No brother may wander through the town or elsewhere, unless he has formal permission from the warden or master. [Financial] accounts shall be rendered immediately after the Provincial Council. This document is to be read out in chapter, once a month, in French or English. To the extent compatible with their sex, the lay sisters shall comply with what we have above decreed for the brothers to observe. At the beginning of Matins the lay brothers and sisters shall chant "Credo in Deum" and "Pater Noster"; next, for Matins, twenty-five "Pater Nosters"; at Prime, seven "Pater Nosters"; at Tierce, seven "Pater Nosters"; at Sext, seven "Pater Nosters"; at None, seven "Pater Nosters"; at Vespers, fifteen "Pater Nosters"; at Compline, seven "Pater Nosters". After Compline they will chant a single "Pater Noster" and "Credo in Deum". In the place where brothers and sisters shall die, the remainder will, within thirty days, chant five hundred "Pater Nosters". Also, everyone shall chant a hundred "Pater Nosters" each week for the brothers and sisters living and dead and for all the benefactors of the House of the Hospital of St. John the Baptist.

DISCUSSION

The foundation of a hospital, or almshouse, at Nottingham by the Palmers was made possible by a grant of land by Robert de St. Remy (for the benefit of the soul of his brother); it was confirmed by Henry II at some point in the 1160s or '70s, and in the 1180s given recognition by the Pope. The Palmers were professional pilgrims – that is, those who chose a pilgrim life, as opposed to those who made a pilgrimage as a break from their normal life; their name associates them particularly with the Holy Land (palm leaves), although they in fact travelled to many lands. They professed poverty and supported their wanderings through alms. In one or two places in England they seem to have established guilds – which suggests that some at least had given up the itinerant life – and this may have been the case in Nottingham. The purpose of the hospital was described as providing hospitality to poor folk, and probably the Palmers had their own kind particularly in mind. Whether it was this that subsequently became the hospital of St. John Baptist – perhaps as a re-foundation – is not clear, but possible.

The hospital of St. John, by that name, is first mentioned in endowments of land from the 1220s, when already in existence as is evident from a papal grant (1220) of chapel and cemetery for the house; it is believed to have existed since at least 1202. Yet, in response to investigations during an archepiscopal visitation in 1321, jurors stated that the hospital had been founded by those men of Nottingham who made the endowments in the 1220s. Possibly it was at that time that the hospital adopted its dedication to St. John. The roles of the hospital at that time were to give alms to the poor, and to provide shelter and care for the infirm poor. Its funding for this came from the income from the endowments and apparently also efforts to collect alms for redistribution; the latter task helps explain its location next to the bridge where the road from London crossed the River Trent and entered Nottingham, the hospital being assigned responsibility for the bridge's upkeep.

The hospital subsequently came under the administration of the borough authorities, but some of this control was lost in the early years of Edward I's reign (when the borough liberties were suspended for several years). By the time of the inquiry in 1321, the hospital had declined considerably in means – accusedly by dissipation – and motivation, and its community had dwindled to practically no-one. The archbishop's intervention began a process of recovery, and was later furthered by a licence from the king to acquire property in mortmain. The hospital is still heard of in the 1460s.

NOTES

"Matins" "Prime and Tierce" "Sext and None" "Vespers and Compline"

In canonical rule Matins are the divine offices held at midnight; matutina were originally held just after dawn, but later the term was applied to midnight service and the service in the first hour after dawn renamed Prime, approximately 6 a.m. Here Matins is evidently used for a pre-dawn but not necessarily midnight service, Prime presumably for the first post-dawn one. Tierce, as the third hour after dawn, would have been approximately at 9 a.m., Sext around midday, Nones around 3 p.m., Vespers (the hour for lighting candles) around 6 p.m., and Compline (the completion, or close, of the day) around 9 p.m. Bells were rung to announce these services, thus providing some indication of the time of day, but only an approximate one, since the intervals between services were adapted somewhat to the differing number of hours of daylight in summer and winter.

The reference to individual brethren having a "household" is unclear; it seems improbable that anyone admitted to the house would bring family with him or her, and the communal style of living indicates that there were no household accommodations. Possibly what is meant is brethren in their official duties having servants.

TRANSLATION

The way in which [...] any brother or sister is received into the almshouse of the hospital of St. Nicholas within the city of Salisbury.

First, it is ordained that the master, or warden, of that hospital is to call together all the brothers and sisters in the chapel of St. Nicholas within the hospital. In front of which gathering, the reason for the meeting having been declared, the following should be declared in English to those to be admitted:

You are to be loyal and obedient to the master of this place and to his successors.

If you should happen to have any of the goods of this house under your administration, you are to take care of them to the benefit of the house.

Also, if you know now, or come to know at any time hereafter, that any goods belonging to this house have been carried off, given away, or stolen, you shall do your duty by ensuring the master is informed of it, as soon as you reasonably can.

Also, you shall make an honest declaration to the master or his deputy, within a month [of admission], of what possessions you are bringing in with you.

Also, you will not reveal [to outsiders] the matters discussed in this place, or concerning the brothers and sisters, while they are confidential and private.

Also, you are to live chastely insofar as God gives you the fortitude.

Also, you are to hear a mass every day, whenever you are able.

And if you know how to, you shall every day recite a Placebo and Dirige with Commendations.

And if you are not as educated as that, every day you are twice to say Our Lady's Psalter.

Also, you shall attend the daily mass anciently ordained, and there pray for the souls of the founder, all those who have supported this place, and for all Christian souls.

Also, you shall behave in a peaceable manner and do all you ought to ensure every brother and sister is at perfect peace with, and loving and charitable towards, one another.

All these things, and each of them, you will uphold to the best of your power, so help you God at the [Holy] Doom, and by [oath on] this book.

Then the master is to say: "My friend, commit to continence, and dedicate yourself and all your possessions to God and St. Nicholas, and [your] continual service to this house, turning over to it all your goods and properties."

DISCUSSION

When St. Nicholas' Hospital came into being is unknown. It might have been associated with Harnham, a village on the south bank of the Avon, before the bishop founded his new borough on part of his manor of Salisbury on the north bank. But more likely it was Bishop Richard Poore, the founder of New Salisbury (which in time eclipsed and superseded the hill-fort of Old Salisbury, in which both king and bishop had a share of the lordship), who established the hospital after beginning construction of his new cathedral. The hospital was located south of the close, near a crossing of the Avon. Certainly the hospital was in existence by 1227, when it received endowments from the Bishop and from the Countess of Salisbury; at that point the hospital had a chapel, chantry commitments, and the mission of catering to the needs of the sick, the poor, and travellers.

The next bishop made such major changes that he subsequently claimed, and for some time was believed, to be the hospital's founder. He built a new bridge at the Avon crossing and a chapel on the bridge, and then rebuilt the hospital, adding new buildings to the south of the original. The constitution he issued for the hospital in 1245 associated the administration of bridge and chapel with that of the hospital. The purpose of the hospital was stated as to receive, help, and support the poor, the weak, and the sick. A warden was given the duties as administrator of the property (including the bridge) and its revenues, as supervisor of the charitable obligations towards the inmates, and as principal priest conducting the divine offices – with emphasis on masses for the souls of Bishop Bingham, the hospital's benefactors, the residents, and anyone who died in the hospital – assisted by three other priests. They were to wear, when in public, russet cloaks as their uniform, to eat communally in the refectory, and two were to sleep in the hospicium on the bridge while the warden and the third priest slept at the hospital. Patronage of the hospital had been transferred by Bingham to the Dean and Chapter, but was returned to a later bishop in 1260, possibly in relation to episcopal plans for the foundation of de Vaux College nearby, on land that was part of the hospital endowment.

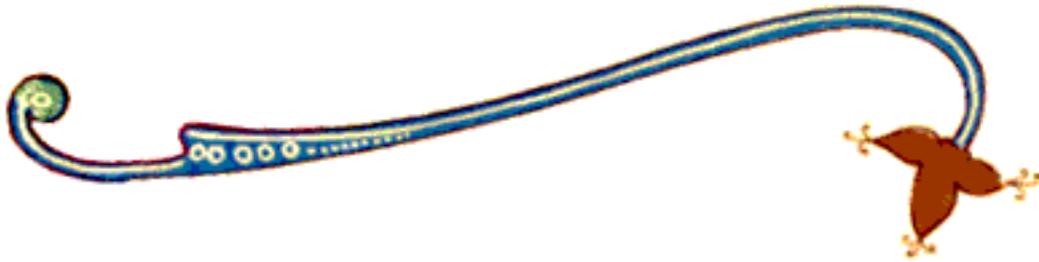

The new hospital took the form of a church, but with only two aisles, separated by an arched arcade; this had led to speculation that it may have been designed as an infirmary segregating male and female inmates, each into their own half. In the final years of the fifteenth century, the south aisle was divided up into six cubicles, as more private quarters for the brethren and sisters, and an upper floor added with further rooms, some for the master and chaplain; the north aisle served as a common hall. Besides the priests there were some lay brethren, tasked with serving God in the hospital; it is not clear if they were included among the poor or sick inmates. We have explicit references to sisters from the late thirteenth century. The inmates were apparently admitted for life.

Neither the hospital nor its neighbour, and possibly associate, the college were wealthy in terms of endowments. While the latter's expanded through the Middle Ages, however, some of the former's were lost. This, along with falling rent values and some poor fiscal administration, caused the hospital increasing difficulties, obliging it to restrict its activities to what its revenues would support; the bridge had become ruinous by 1413, requiring a royal grant of pontage to restore its integrity. A new constitution issued by Bishop Beauchamp in 1478 shows that the hospital had become by then only an almshouse for a limited number of inmates (probably 12), at least some of whom were its own retired or incapacitated staff; this had probably been the case since at least the 1440s. Most entrants were from the city or the surrounding region of Hampshire; some were widows, others married couples.

The ordinances of 1478 stated that brethren and sisters were to have an allowance of 7s.6d a week, divided between them, and annual provision of 16 wagonloads of firewood and 1 wagonload of coal. That this was recognized as meagre is suggested by the prohibition of inmates begging on the street. As indicates of necessary economies, temporary hospitality was to be available only to benefactors, and those admitted were required to own a certain level of property; that property would henceforth be administered by the warden, who would use its revenues to support the clothing and other needs of the former owners. The warden was also required to pay for the services of a barber and laundress, as well as supply everyday utensils. He exercised disciplinary authority over the inmates, punishing any guilty of quarrelling, or co-habitation of unmarried men and women, and similar faults. Sharing of quarters was permitted only in the case of a man and woman who had been married before entering the hospital.

The admission regulations and/or oath set out above stems from the new ordinances, although the copy in the chartulary may have been made a decade or two later. The final instruction by the master invites the entrant to take the three monastic vows of chastity, obedience, and poverty. Psalms and prayers followed that, and the ceremony closed with the new entrant receiving the kiss of peace from each of the inmates.

NOTES

"Placebo and Dirige"

These were services for the souls of the dead, said, respectively, at vespers and matins.

"Our Lady's Psalter"

The reading from the original is uncertain, and this is the editor's hypothesis. Two psalters, he notes, would consist of 100 Aves and 10 Paternosters.

"contenance"

This refers principally to chastity (i.e. abstinence from sex), but also to the self-discipline and self-restraint that permits moderation in sensual indulgences generally. It was not the same as celibacy, although a required condition for celibacy.

TRANSLATION

Once, as King Edward IV was passing through Reading en route to Woodstock, in 1480, complaints were made to him by the townspeople and country-dwellers against the abbot and convent of Reading, concerning certain dilapidated bridges, chapels, and almshouses not kept up or maintained as they ought to be and as they used to be in past times; they having, it is said, both lands and income sufficient for that purpose. First, a part of Caversham Bridge on which stands a chapel dedicated to the Holy Ghost. Also the High Bridge and other bridges throughout the town. Also a chapel at the west end of the town, dedicated to St. Edmund king and martyr, in which lie the bones of many Christian folk, and now it is used as a barn. Also there was outside the abbey gate a place called St. John's house in which resided and were supported certain religious women, widows living in chastity in the service of God, praying night and day for the king's health and for the souls of their founders and benefactors. In which there was a fine chapel dedicated to St. John Baptist, for those women to say their prayers at certain times of day and night, and where masses were also said many times in the year, as well as other divine services. These women were accustomed to receive each week from the abbey a certain [quantity of] bread and ale, as well as money; and, it is said, once a year certain clothing. This was set up for such women as had once been the wives of men who had previously held office in the town, but who in old age had fallen into poverty or did not intend to remarry, etc. Nowadays there are neither divine services or prayers, nor anyone left alive to perform them. Yet the abbot takes the revenues associated with it, but uses none for alms or good deeds. Moreover, there was another chapel there, on the east side of town, called the Chapel of Mary Magdalene, with income associated for the relief of sick people, such as lepers, as well as a house in which they could live, with good land attached. Whose revenues the abbot receives, but he has demolished the chapel and the house associated. With the result that it no longer provides relief for any poor people.

Not long after these complaints were made, King Edward IV commanded Richard Beauchamp, the then Bishop of Salisbury, to see that all these matters be corrected straight away, and that they be restored to the terms of the original foundation and arrangements. Notwithstanding those commands given by the king, the bishop came to the place during his regular visitation, with the intent of making the required examination and finding out more, so that he could determine how to proceed on these matters. Having continued his visitation until a certain day, he departed from the place highly dissatisfied not only in regard to the above but, it is said, as to many other things similarly badly managed within the place due to the wayward behaviour of the abbot and his assistants. A few days later he received a visitation – from God – and he died; and so all these matters have remained in limbo, uncorrected. Notwithstanding that my lord of Salisbury who lately died had said that whoever was bishop of Salisbury was one of the founders of the house of St. John, as he had evidence to prove. He had intended, had God let him live longer, that it should have been restored to supporting sisters, as it was in oldentime according to the terms of its original foundation. Which place the abbot has now transformed into a free school, telling his neighbours that he has made provision to pay a schoolmaster £6.13s.4d [annual salary] and an usher £3.6s.8d to teach grammar there at no cost [to students], etc.; adding that Master Robert Shorborne, now Dean of St. Paul's, has given him £40 for the project. Despite this, there is as yet no school, nor any man, woman or child assisted by it. Yet the place has been receiving the revenues from the same [almshouse] for the last 35 years and more.

DISCUSSION

This document is among a collection compiled ca.1500 as part of legal evidence in jurisdictional disputes between the merchant gild and the abbey of Reading; the burgesses of the gild likely saw this document as supporting their charges of maladministration against the abbot, John Thorne I (1445-86). The abbot has no opportunity to present his side of the story. Whatever that may be, the case of Reading provides one example of how some almshouses or hospitals were no longer able, for whatever reason, to pursue the aims of their founders, and their communities dwindled or the buildings were converted to other purposes.

NOTES

"1480"

The original simply gives the regnal year (19 Ed.IV); the editor appears to have had other information, attributing the complaint to November 1481.

"not intend to remarry"

Probably they had taken vows of chastity, or wished to lead such a life.

"usher"

Under-teachers, i.e. assistants to schoolmasters; this usage is archaic.

TRANSLATION

To all sons of Holy Mother Church into whose hands these letters come, Robert, by divine permission Bishop of London, gives greetings. Lord Jesus, our Saviour, when he entered the Temple, predecessor to the Church, and seeing there the Jewish populace more involved in buying and selling than in prayer, and in the uninhibited performance of other abominable acts there, by whipping them with cords ejected the buyers and sellers, and overturned the tables of the money-worshippers Now indeed, it has come to our attention through persistent reports made by many credible persons that on an almost daily basis, and particularly on days of worship and festival days, people – both men and women – are getting together at our cathedral church for the purpose of selling merchandize, goods, and other things; so that this place, which was created for the worship of God, has been perverted through the increasing iniquities of the people. At their stations there, as if they were in a public square or marketplace, they show disrespect [for the place] by exposing for sale and selling their merchandize, goods and other things. Not content with this, but as if degenerate and ungrateful sons, neither paying heed nor showing respect to their mother, they defecate next to the entrance and urinate upon the doors of our church, and in the churchyard; which, hardly surprising, is abhorrent and disgusting – not only in appearance but in its stench – to those persons who visit our church to perform their devotions.

There are also others – insolent, idle persons answering to no-one, troublemakers by nature, who would rather cause mischief than make themselves useful – who throw or shoot stones, arrows, and various other missiles at the crows, pigeons and other birds that nest or perch in the walls and recesses of the church. Not only that, but they play ball-games inside and outside the church, and engage in other destructive games, breaking or seriously damaging the glass windows and the stone carvings in the church; which, being of the highest craftsmanship and very expensive, are adornments throughout the church and add refinement to its fabric, giving pleasure to those who gaze upon them. In doing so they offend God, cause us and our church injury, and also expose their souls to grave danger.

With the intent, therefore, of putting a stop to these kinds of wicked, malicious, and injurious activities, insofar as we are able – to avoid the appearance of approval or sanction that would come from tolerating what ought to be suppressed, or letting it go unpunished, or looking the other way – we are by this document issuing a warning [to be proclaimed] three times, requiring that each and every person committing the types of offences mentioned above, within ten days of the publication of this document ... cease and desist from these kinds of wicked acts, on pain of sentence of major excommunication ... By virtue of the sacred obedience [owed us by] each and every rector, vicar, priest, and curate who is ordained in our city of London, we command and enjoin very strictly that they proclaim publicly and with all solemnity – with the ringing of bells, lighting of candles, and holding erect the cross in their hands – that all and any troublemakers who commit such offences after the issuance of our warning have been and are excommunicated. And this is to be proclaimed on the dates and at the times and places which they consider most effective.

Given in our palace at London, 9 November 1385, in the fourth year following our consecration.

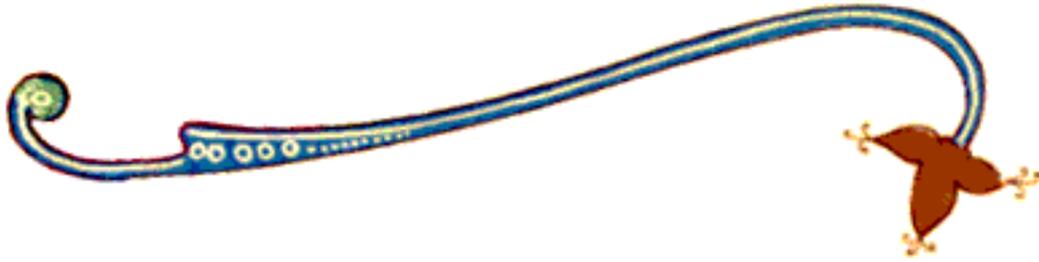

DISCUSSION

St. Paul's was founded in 604 as the episcopal seat it has remained; its early foundation helped make it an integral part of the city and city life, rather than the imposition of a rival authority as was the case with cathedral-priory foundations in some other English cities (although this did not prevent jurisdictional disputes between city and chapter). Londoners' pride in St. Paul's was reflected in his figure being placed on the common seal of the city. The structure that existed in the Late Middle Ages was even more of a landmark than the present building, with a spire considerably higher than the current dome; it was the largest church in England, and even few continental cathedrals surpassed it. In that period the cathedral was surrounded by a sizable wall-enclosed precinct that consumed a large chunk of the western end of the city; the roads leading west out of the city had to circumvent this obstacle.

The precinct was a lively place. The bishop had his palace there, the canons and cathedral officials their residences; St. Paul's brewery and bakery, nearby, furnished bread for that community. The cathedral drew the citizenry to services, particularly on important holy days, and there were even two parish churches incorporated within the precinct. St. Paul's was a sanctuary and so among those it attracted were undesirables. The folkmoot had its traditional meeting-place in the northeast corner of the precinct. Although there were few such gatherings in the Late Middle Ages, that area attracted congregations who came to listen to sermons or public proclamations delivered from St. Paul's Cross, near the folkmoot site, and the churchyard was a common assembly point for crowds. Because of the large area consumed by the precinct, it was inevitably a thoroughfare for the citizens, whether on daily business or taking part in civic parades. Men of trade and commerce met within the precinct, and even the cathedral itself, to make business deals; by the sixteenth century it had become notorious for this.

Bishop Braybroke's complaint and injunction is indicative of the alarm that the resident religious community was feeling because of the familiarity with which the citizens treated St. Paul's. From his perspective, things were getting out of hand. His was the earliest known of a series of efforts to prevent the cathedral precinct from being used as a place for inappropriate activities; the efforts continued up to the seventeenth century. From another perspective the abuses are indicative of the importance of churches in the everyday life of medieval townspeople.

NOTES

"Robert"

Robert Braybroke became Bishop of London in 1382, holding office until 1405. He was one of the most active of the medieval bishops of London. The year following his effort to cleanse the precinct, he was trying to resurrect observance of the festivals dedicated to St. Paul and St. Erconwald, while in 1392 he sought to prevent London shoemakers from working on Sundays or other holy days. Yet he was also considered lax in taking action against prostitution.

"defecate" "urinate"

This I take to be the meaning of naturae suae pondera foetida et horrenda, the locations given suggesting both bodily functions; the verbs in the sentence indicate both that they dropped their loads and then failed to clear away the faeces.

"destructive"

The original term, inhonestos, means shameful or inappropriate; but in this context it would appear that the connotation is harmful.

Concerning certain observances and ceremonies at various festivals

It is said to be the custom for the mayor, on the festival of All Saints following [\[his election\]](#), to go with his household after lunch to the church of St. [Thomas], and also for the aldermen, and those who are of the mayor's retinue, together with the leading men of the crafts, to congregate there in their suits. And from there to go to the church of St. Paul and hear vespers there before returning. Similarly, on Christmas Day it has been the custom for the mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs, and those who are of the mayor's and sheriffs' retinues, to come together after lunch at the church of St. [\[erased\]](#) and from there, as mentioned above, to go to the church of St. Paul. There he is accustomed to stand on the right side of the choir, in the stall next to that of the Dean; while the aldermen, arranged in order of precedence, stand some on the same side of the choir near to the mayor and some on the other side. After hearing vespers and compline, the next thing they do is as set out in the previous chapter. The same procedure is followed on St. Stephen's day. Likewise on the day of St. John the Evangelist. And on Holy Innocents day it has been the custom for the mayor, aldermen, sheriffs, and the others to hear vespers in the church of St. [Thomas of Acon]; and on the following day there to hear a mass, as well as vespers. Which being done, they return home. Formerly, these rites were also observed on the day of Circumcision, at Epiphany, and on the festival of the Purification of the glorified Virgin.

Note that no prayers are said for the soul of Bishop William inside that church, except on the days when the mayor and sheriffs take their oaths at the Exchequer. Nor has it been the custom for the mayor and aldermen to stay at St. Paul's until compline is over, except at Christmas, Epiphany, and the Purification of the Blessed Virgin. At other of the abovementioned festivals they leave immediately after vespers. On the Monday in Easter week, before noon, it has been the custom for the mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs, in their suits, as well as either sex of the greater populace of the city, to come to the Hospital of St. Mary outside Bishopsgate to hear a sermon. Likewise on the Tuesday and Wednesday of the same week.

Also, around the festival of Pentecost it has been the custom of the mayor and aldermen to get together and, by joint decision, make arrangements for suits of clothes for themselves. Furthermore, the mayor and the sheriffs confer on their friends, members of their households, and officers of the city their liveries, according to what is demanded by each's level.

When in fact the Monday during Whitsun arrives, before lunch, between the bell striking nine and ten, the mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs have been accustomed to assemble in their suits at the church of St. Peter Cornhill, along with all members of the retinues of sheriffs and mayor. From which place, they would set out in a procession of the rulers of London along Cheapside as far as the cemetery of St. Paul's, with those of the sheriffs' retinue leading the way, followed by those of the mayor's retinue; then the mayor, with the recorder and the aldermen, in order of precedence. Entering on the north side and making their way through by procession towards that church, they would exit on the south side of the cemetery, and thus via the close they would enter the church from Watling Street, through its great west entrance. There they would rest themselves, while verses of the hymn Veni, Creator were, alternately, chanted by the vicars and played by the organ, while angels on high dispensed incense. After which the mayor and aldermen, going up to the altar, would make offerings. Once this was completed, each returned to his own home. Note that the Archdeacon of London was accustomed to give to the sergeants-at-mace accompanying the mayor, sheriffs and the chamber, because they had protected the procession of rulers from the press of the crowds, two nobles to be divided equally between them.

The following day (that is, the Tuesday) before lunch, between the bell striking nine and ten, the mayor and aldermen have been accustomed to gather at St. Bartholomew's and, from there, leading a procession of the folk of Middlesex, they would pass through the gate of Newgate and from there to St. Michael Cornmarket; then beyond, via the Old Exchange, they would enter the close of St. Paul's by St. Augustine's gate, and from then on just as was done the previous day. And the Archdeacon would give 10s. to the same sergeants, so it is said. On the third day (that is, the Wednesday in Whitsun week), the mayor, aldermen and the others have been accustomed to gather at the same hour at the church of St. [Thomas] of Acon, and from there lead a procession of the folk of Essex, along a direct route to St. Paul's cemetery. And the same proceedings would take place as on the Monday previous; and the Archdeacon of Essex would give the sergeants-at-mace 6s.8d. Let it be known that when those fees were not paid, it was customary to distrain on the Archdeacon to pay them.

DISCUSSION

These quasi-religious rituals owe as much to the forging or maintenance of social solidarity within the ruling class, and reinforcement of the social hierarchy, as they do to religious customs. Which is not to deny the religious sentiments of those townsmen, but to suggest that these ceremonies served purposes above and beyond the demands of such sentiments. Such ceremonies are a feature particularly of the late fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, when class consciousness within the towns was finding clearer expression; they doubtless grew out of less formal periodic events.

It will be noted that a number of these ceremonial occasions clustered around the Christmas season.

NOTES

"festival of All Saints"

November 1.

"lunch"

The original has prandium a term for meal-time, usually applied to breakfast or lunch; since Vespers was celebrated around 6 p.m., lunch is the likeliest meaning here.

"church of St. [Thomas]"

The hospital of St. Thomas was centrally located, north of Cheapside. It was perhaps not just the location but the connection of Thomas Becket, a source of pride to Londoners, with the hospital (the building originally having been his father's house) that dictated the choice. The building later became home to the powerful Mercer's Company. The name "Thomas" has been erased from the original document.

"mayor's retinue"

Literally, of his livery: those officers specifically assigned to assist him (e.g. his sergeants and clerks).

"leading men"

Another use here of probi homines, in this context likely referring to the chief officers of the craft guilds.

"suits"

Probably referring to their official costumes (liveries), implying a similar style. Or in sectis suis might possibly mean "with their followings".

"compline"

Compline was celebrated around 9 p.m.

"previous chapter"

This was to offer prayers for William, Bishop of London, credited with having obtained from King William I a charter of liberties for the city, and to pay a visit to the graves of the parents of Thomas Becket.

"St. Stephen's day"

December 26.

"day of St. John's"

December 27.

"Holy Innocents day"

December 28.

"day of Circumcision"

January 1.

"Epiphany"

January 6.

"festival of the Purification"

February 2.

"oaths"

Oaths of loyalty to the king, as distinct from their oaths of office.

"Hospital of St. Mary"

The "New Hospital" dedicated to St. Mary was founded in the thirteenth century, by a London citizen and his wife.

"Pentecost"

The 7th Sunday following Easter (Whit Sunday).

"liveries"

Depending on who was receiving it, this might range from a badge, to a particular style of cap or other worn article, to an entire uniform.

"nobles"

A noble was a gold coin valued at 6s.8d.

"St. Bartholomew's"

The priory of St. Bartholomew stood not far outside the city walls, in northwestern London; today it represents one of the few medieval standing structures to have survived (partially) in London.

"Old Exchange"

I.e. the mint and money exchange; this would have placed it around the northeast corner of St. Paul's churchyard, adjacent to the site of the old folkmoot – a logical location.

"St. Augustine's gate"

This appears to have been the same cemetery entrance mentioned earlier as leading off Watling Street.

[1. Provision for proper attention to the Corpus Christi and other divine services]

In the name of God, Amen. By a certain custom in effect over the course of many years, all of the crafts of the city of York have taken upon themselves the presentation of a lavish play (its various pageants, taken together, telling the story of the Old and New Testaments) each year at the festival of Corpus Christi, at various stations in the city; at the same time they make a solemn procession in honour of the blessed sacrament representing the body of Christ. This begins at the great gates of the priory of Holy Trinity in York and goes in procession to York cathedral, and then to the hospital of St. Leonard in York, where the sacrament is delivered up. It [i.e. the sacrament] is preceded by numerous lighted torches and a multitude of priests dressed in surplices, and is followed by the mayor and citizens of York with crowds of other people flocking behind.

On this matter a certain very religious man, brother William Melton of the order of Friars Minor, a propounder of holy scripture and one of the most famous preachers of the word of God to have come to this city, in several of his sermons commended the play, declaring that it was a good thing and most praiseworthy, in itself. However, he said, the citizens of the city and outsiders attracted to the festival there, instead of focusing their attention exclusively on the festival play, also gave themselves over to feasting, boozing, carousing, sing-songs, and other improper behaviour, and made little effort to attend the divine services that day. And what was most to be regretted was that, because of this, they lost the right to the indulgences recorded to have been graciously granted in regard to the festival by Pope Urban IV: of one hundred days to those Christian faithful who attend the Matins services celebrated in association with the festival; the same amount to those [who attend] mass; to those who attend instead the Vespers of that festival, which is the second most important, likewise a hundred; while to those who attend Prime, Terce, Sext, None and Compline, forty days for each of those hourly services; and to those who on the octaves of the festival attend the morning or evening services, Mass, and the hourly offices, a hundred days for each day of the octave. Just as is more fully specified in canon law.

Consequently it seemed advisable to Friar William, and he had convinced the people of the city in that regard, that the play take place on one day, and the procession on another; so that the populace could congregate in the churches on the festival and be present for the church services that would result in them obtaining the indulgences.

In relation to which, Peter Bukcy mayor of this city of York, Richard Russell recently mayor of the staple at Calais, John Northeby, William Bowes senior, John Moreton, Thomas Gare senior, Henry Preston, Thomas Esyngwald, Thomas Bracebryg, William Ormesheved, and John Aldestanemore, aldermen, Richard Louthe and John Dodyngton, sheriffs, John Hewyk, Thomas Doncastre, John Usburn, Thomas More, Robert Yarom, Robert Midelton, Geoffrey Savage, Thomas Snawdon, John Loftehouse, John Bolton, John Lyllyng, John Gascoigne, William Craven, Thomas Aton, Thomas Davy, John Baynbrig, Thomas Kyrkham, William Bedale, William Gaytesheved, John Louthe, and John Warde, members of the 24, gathered in the city's council chamber on 6 June 1426 [to consider] the declarations, urgings, and the sensible warnings convincingly put forward by Friar William, and persuasive arguments that it was not a sin, nor would it offend God, if something good were changed to something even better. Having therefore carefully discussed among themselves the issues set out above, they gave their unanimous and explicit agreement first to the proposal being announced to the community in the common hall; and then, having obtained the consent of the community, to these matters being reformed for the better.

For which purpose the mayor and community of this city having come together in the common hall on 10 June, and having made a proclamation about the aforesaid serious matter, it was ordained with community consent that as to the solemn play, which it had been the custom to present on Corpus Christi day, it would henceforth be presented annually on the Wednesday, the day before that festival. And that the procession should be made in a solemn fashion on the day of that festival. So that all the people then in the city could devote time to Matins, Mass, Vespers, and the other hourly services of the festival, and be recipients of the indulgences graciously granted in that regard by Pope Urban IV.

Burton, R.

Also at the same place and time, at the urging of Friar William, it was first ordained by the mayor and the community that on Sundays no victuallers or craftsmen henceforth have their shops or windows open, nor place stalls or benches in front of their houses in the place called the Thursday Market, nor anywhere else within the city or its suburbs (except in times of great need [such as] the sudden arrival of lords or ladies or persons from outside the city), for the purpose of buying or selling any kind of merchandize, or for buying or selling meat, fish or any other foodstuffs. But that shops and windows of all men be kept closed on Sundays, from nightfall on Saturday to sunrise on the Monday after, with the sole exceptions of those of taverners and common cooks, for the convenience of travellers, and also fishermen on the Ouse and Foss bridges from Lent to Easter. Buyers, captors, and purveyors of victuals should make arrangements for spending time in buying supplies on the Saturday rather than the Sunday following. So that six days may be occupied with all business and labour, while the people set aside the seventh – that is, Sunday – for rest to the praise of God, who on the seventh day rested from all those works he was performing; and putting aside their worldly preoccupations, they may go to church and personally attend Matins, Masses, and Vespers. Upon penalty of 6s.8d paid to the use of the community of this city by anyone engaged in commerce, industry or victualling who is found to have contravened this [ordinance] at any time in the future.

[2. Arrangements for the procession at Winchester]

At the congregation held at Winchester on 31 May 1437, an ordinance was made by Richard Gater mayor of the city of Winchester, John Gymer and Henry Putte bailiffs of that city, and agreed to by all the citizens and the community of that city, concerning the public procession on the festival of Corpus Christi by the various crafts within the city. Which is that the carpenters and tilers should go together in the first section of the procession, the smiths and barbers in the second section, the cooks and butchers in the third, the shoemakers with two lights in the fourth, the tanners and coverlet-weavers in the fifth, the fraternity of St. Thomas and the tailors' assistants in the sixth, the fishermen and the skimmers in the seventh, the vintners and the fraternity of St. Anne in the eighth, the weavers with two lights in the ninth, the fullers with two lights in the tenth, the dyers with two lights in the eleventh, the mercers with two lights in the twelfth, wives with one light and John Blake with the other light in the thirteenth section of the procession. All these lights ought to be carried in due order in the procession, in advance of the priests walking in the procession. Four lights of the fraternity of St. John Baptist should be carried on either side of the body of Our Lord Jesus that day in the procession. If any member of those crafts raises any objection, or refuses hereafter [to comply with] this ordinance, or pulls out of the procession, then that craft offering resistance or failing to participate is to forfeit 20s. to the city, at the discretion of the mayor and the 24 then being in office, and may face imprisonment. And should any craft slander any other craft, then it is to forfeit 6s.8d to the city, on the grounds of having committed a violation.

DISCUSSION

In 1264 Urban IV ordered that Corpus Christi be celebrated as a religious festival each year on the Thursday following Trinity Sunday, although his death that same year prevented this from having much effect. It was not until early in the next century that Clement V followed up and observance of Corpus Christi, as one most important Catholic festivals; its observance spread quickly across England in the 1320s. The festival was marked by a solemn procession whose purpose was to display the Holy Sacrament (or rather, the shrine that contained the Host) on its travels from one church to another, but also gave the Church the opportunity to show off its pomp and circumstance, since it was the local clergy who accompanied the Host on the march. With observance and organization being left by the Church up to its local representatives and to local authorities, we find the procession becoming a major civic event by the mid-fourteenth century. The timing of Corpus Christi, a moveable festival occurring between late May and late June, placed it very close to midsummer, providing for long hours of daylight and one of the best chances for clement weather.

The Corpus Christi procession provided an opportunity for communal display generally. Particularly the display of communal harmony, in which all interests – as represented by the various trades and the socio-religious fraternities – worked together. The lower strata of urban society are not very conspicuous in this ceremony, and this may reflect their general exclusion from the definition of community at this period in towns; on the other hand, the guilds simply provided a convenient mechanism for ordering the procession, while at the same time reflecting how urban society was coming to be perceived as divided into these interest groups. Borough authorities often took advantage of the event to reinforce their authority by giving themselves a conspicuous role in the procession. The trend towards ever more elaborate display, fostered in part by competitiveness between the guilds, led to the introduction of religious iconography and in some English towns to the Corpus Christi pageants, which may initially have been still-life scenes but later developed into playlets. It is not clear whether these could have been integrated into the procession itself, but possibly they were presented on a second circuit, after the procession proper – which began very early in the morning – was completed.

The procession thus combined expression of religious piety, civic pride, and gild rivalry. Ironically, because of the social statement being made by the procession and the competition between the participating groups to see which could outshine the other, matters such as the order in which participants appeared, or the costs of participation, or behaviour prompted by jealousy, could become the cause of squabbling, disharmony, and even bloodshed. An example of this is at York, where it appears that the torches for the procession were custom-made to beautify them as much as possible. In 1419 on the day after Corpus Christi the skimmers complained to the mayor and city council that their torches had been smashed by certain carpenters and tawyers, using cudgels and Carlisle axes, and other unspecified enormities had been done to them, disturbing the ceremonies. Early in the reign of Henry VI the York cordwainers were complaining about the high cost of custom-made torches for the procession as well as the cost of the Corpus Christi plays (which was a frequent bone of contention for the craft gilds). In 1426, a week after Corpus Christi, we have the concern expressed in the document above, that the party atmosphere at the time of Corpus Christi plays was interfering with the solemnity associated with the procession; the arrangement for separating the two was later altered so that the play would be the main feature on Corpus Christi day, and the procession was relegated to the day after.

The persuasive argument in leading the city authorities to this decision was the question of indulgences. The concept of Purgatory had become, for the lay population, a key feature of Catholic theology in the Late Middle Ages, painting the picture of an extended period the soul must spend prior to the Last Judgement in a place of punishment and torment – at least, so it was perceived in England. Indulgences provided a partial remission of their punishments, for sins that had already been confessed and contrition shown, so that the recipient was in a state of grace. Normally, the adverse effect of sins on the well-being of the soul had to be erased not merely by absolution from guilt but also by undertaking the reparations assigned by the pardoning agent; in order to remove the burden from the soul before Judgement, these reparations might be undertaken during life (e.g. through penance) or for a certain period in Purgatory. An indulgence removed or reduced the obligation for reparations (or, more strictly, assumed that the sinner's debt to the Church had been paid in full or in part). The value of such remissions to medieval people, in reducing the length of the dreaded stay in Purgatory, was influential, as evidenced in the widespread medieval traffic in indulgences, reflected in Chaucer's Pardoner. The normal length of time specified on an indulgence was 40 days, but longer periods could be given – in the case of the Corpus Christi indulgences above, 100 days for attending the principal Mass of the day. The various services gave structure to a day for the clergy and especially monks, but Mass lay at the core of religious participation for lay people.

Friar William did not stop with his proposal about Corpus Christi. He was on a reforming kick for, as we see above, his proposals to the authorities went beyond Corpus Christi to lack of church attendance on Sundays generally. At the same time he also had roused the populace, and was urging the authorities, against prostitutes, seeking their expulsion from the city; the authorities revived an existing ordinance prohibiting them from living in the city and ordering all to leave within eight days or forswear their occupation.

A gild dedicated to Corpus Christi had been founded at York in 1408, though it is difficult to say whether this had anything to do with a perception among the clergy that the spirit of Corpus Christi observances had been corrupted among the citizenry. It took some years for the gild to establish its authority in regard to the procession. At some point apparently after the date of the document above, which makes no reference to the gild's role, it was the master and keepers of the gild – all chosen from local clergy – who took the lead in the procession, ensured the procession remained orderly, and accompanied the bejewelled gilded container of the blessed sacrament in the procession. Other local clergy sang, if capable, during the procession, and carried crosses, banners, and lights (torches and tapers). The city officers, dressed in their ceremonial robes, followed after the clergy, and were in turn followed by the the gilds, each in a prescribed order, carrying more banners (symbolizing their crafts) and torches. The streets down which the procession passed were decorated by the citizens. Most members of the Corpus Christi gild were clergymen. Lay persons of good reputation could also become gild members, but not participate in governing the gild; mayor Peter Bukcy had been a member since 1414, and Richard Russell (a former mayor) joined in 1426 – probably close to the events in June – while Thomas Gare had been one of the founding members. Melton was not a member; he would have lacked the means to join.

As the Winchester ordinance was made immediately following the day of the procession, we may suspect some local commotion there concerning the ordering of the procession, necessitating intervention from the borough authorities. As in other towns, each group participating in the procession would carry a large light, which went in pairs; they would probably end up as an offering. The largest crafts monopolised a section of the parade and thereby had to provide two lights; we can clearly see here the importance of the cloth industry in the town. These provisions remained in effect into the reign of Henry VIII, with minor additions of other crafts (the plumbers, silk-workers, chandlers, and brewers).

At about the same period we find other urban regulations governing the processions. At Beverley a Corpus Christi gild founded to support the procession, with priests its principal members, dates back to the 1330s. As the craft gilds became involved, there was a tendency towards disorderly behaviour. In 1430 the Beverley authorities restricted participation in the procession to the aldermen and stewards of the gilds, and arranged the order in which the gilds would appear in the procession. At Chester too we see, in the first reference made to a Corpus Christi procession (1399), an outbreak of violence between the weavers and fullers participating.

At Norwich we hear of the procession in the 1389 returns of two gilds associated with the Collegiate Church of St. Mary's, also known as the Chapel in the Fields; one of the gilds, its members clerics, was said to have been created in honour of Corpus Christi in 1278, which was when the chapel changed from a hospital to a college. It is therefore probably significant that a Norwich ordinance of ca.1449 reveals the Chapel in the Fields as the destination of the Corpus Christi procession; the fact that the same building was also used at times in the late fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries for large civic assemblies is of less certain significance. The same ordinance specified that the procession should begin with the Body of Christ surrounded by light-bearers, followed by specific gilds, the lesser in front and the greater (mercantile) to the rear, each bearing a banner, then followed by "the procession" possibly meaning a dozen pageants depicting scenes from Old and New Testaments, and ending up with the city officials: the sheriffs' assistants, the sheriffs themselves, the mayor's assistants, the mayor himself, and finally the aldermen each carrying bibles or rosaries.

Instructions issued at Coventry in 1445 for the order of the procession also seem to embody some rationale for positioning, placing victuallers first, artisans involved in the leather- and metal-working trades next, those involved in the cloth industry (more vital to the city's economy) thereafter, closing with the large-scale cloth-dealing trades of drapers and mercers. Charles Phythian-Adams has noted that this arrangement is the reverse order in which the crafts were likely to have access to high political office in Coventry ["Ceremony and the citizen: The communal year at Coventry, 1450-1550", in Crisis and Order in English Towns 1500-1700, ed. P. Clark and P. Slack, London, 1972, 63]

London, as so often, is an exception to the rule. It had no gild of Corpus Christi dedicated to organizing a city-wide procession, and the feast of Corpus Christi was not treated as a civic ceremony, per se. However, the skinnners gild, whose dedication was to Corpus Christi, was holding a procession by at least 1327; over time this grew to incorporate (according to Stow) over 100 decorated wax torches, more than 200 singing clergymen, followed by civic officials, and finally the members of the skinnners gild. In some other London parishes, other individual gilds or fraternities organized lesser processions for their members.

"York cathedral"

Here a sermon was preached to the principal participants in the procession.

"propounder of holy scripture"

The original sacre pagine professor might alternatively be translated as "advocate of the holy pageants", which is tempting given the overall context; but the association with the specific context of him being a preacher is slightly more likely.

"Matins" "Vespers"

Matins was the principal service of the day, celebrated at dawn. Vespers, the most solemn office of the day, was celebrated at sunset; this service was the most popular with the faithful, Matins being at a difficult time to attract celebrants.

"Prime, Terce, Sext, None"

The shorter services of the day, taking place respectively around 6:00 a.m., 9:00 a.m., noon, and 3:00 p.m.

"Burton, R."

"Burton recorded this", i.e. the stamp of Roger Burton, York's town clerk at that time, a man trained as a notary and with a strong interest in historical matters.

"windows"

Lesser retail outlets were essentially residences/workshops with goods being sold through the open window.

"from Lent to Easter"

I.e. when fish became more the dietary staple.

"captors"

Officials taking prizes of shipments.

"purveyors"

Those tasked to requisition victuals for official purposes or purchase them for provisioning some noble or ecclesiastical household.

"John Blake"

A man of this name was mayor in 1403/04 and 1407/08, although it is unlikely he would still be alive in 1437.

Urban recreation

There was not during the Middle Ages the same differentiation between sport, entertainment, and casual recreation that we make today. The term ludus might be applied indifferently to martial contests, hunting, dramatic performances, children's games, sports, adult board games, or just taking a break from the workaday life, but generally involved some kind of social gathering or interaction. All these had the character of diversion or recreation, although some also had more serious attributes in terms of, for example, skills acquisition or moral education.

On a more informal level, the medieval tavern served the same need for social gathering and recreation, and was as ubiquitous, as the modern-day British pub. Both men and women frequented taverns, although some that doubled as brothels were more male haunts. In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, socio-religious guilds were providing social occasions for urban upper classes that avoided the common or dangerous aspects of tavern visits, while the crafts guilds too had social gatherings usually involving drinking. Medieval townspeople liked to make merry, and there were plenty of opportunities for it. An Italian commentator at the very end of the fifteenth century made these amusing but disparaging observations about English social habits:

"Few people keep wine in their own houses, but buy it, for the most part, at a tavern; and when they mean to drink a great deal, they go to the tavern, and this is done not only by the men, but by ladies of distinction. The deficiency of wine, however, is amply supplied by the abundance of ale and beer, to the use of which these people are become so habituated, that, at an entertainment where there is plenty of wine, they will drink them in preference to it, and in great quantities. Like discreet people, however, they do not offer them to Italians, unless they should ask for them; and they think that no greater honour can be conferred, or received, than to invite others to eat with them, or to be invited themselves; and they would sooner give five or six ducats to provide an entertainment for a person, than a groat to assist him in any distress."

[C.A. Sneyd, ed. A Relation, or Rather a True Account, of the Island of England, Camden Society, vol.37 (1847), 21-22]

Sports and games

Probably the closest thing to an organized sport in the Middle Ages was the tournament, which was of course for the aristocracy. But commoners also had a role to play in military operations, and so they too had recreational activities aimed at developing martial skills – notably archery and hunting. There may have been a keep-fit rationale behind some of this, and some activities appear to have been simply for the sake of exercise. At the other extreme, perhaps for reasons of increased enjoyment, activities such as archery went beyond mere practice into the realm of competition. Where there was competition there was gambling and aggression. Most outdoor sports were fundamentally races or combats, which inevitably got adrenaline flowing and excited emotions. Even indoor games often symbolised martial activities or racing; or the element of chance made them prone to cheating and to emotional upsets – dicing was one of the simplest, longest-standing, and most prevalent, particularly in taverns or gambling dens. Sports and games often come to the historian's attention because they have deteriorated into brawls or worse, giving rise to court records.

Another dimension to sporting events was that of assertion. On the individual level it might be a matter of building and maintaining a reputation – opportunities to demonstrate personal prowess and even, on occasion, take licence in challenging social superiors in a way that could not be done in other contexts. On the communal level, activities such as wrestling and hunting often involved rivalries with other communities or authorities. Hunting rights were associated with territorial jurisdiction, and were for a while sought after by urban authorities. Most recreational activities were male-oriented. However, women are occasionally found engaging in such activities, but usually of a less competitive or more solitary sort (e.g. swimming, boating, skating, gardening), or of a sedentary sort (e.g. chess). Many activities involved animals, particularly the horse which was so important to medieval society, but also wild animals or performing animals; gambling was often involved.

While some recreational activities could be healthy for medieval society, others were perceived as undesirable, and attempts were made to suppress them. Competition, and particularly gambling, too often led to criminal or antisocial acts; gangs of youths were particular sources of violence, while boardgames were targets for fraud. The king preferred his subjects to engage in activities that fostered martial abilities; so he encouraged archery (its practice being enforced beginning with the Assize of 1252, and receiving a further boost from the Hundred Years War), while prohibiting ball games. The game that by the close of the Middle Ages was beginning to be referred to as football was for most of that period considered particularly reprehensible, appearing to the authorities as little more than another expression of the mob violence that too often caused problems in towns. Yet by the fifteenth century we find the beginnings of organization in the sport, at least in London, in the form of a fraternity of football players. Mock combat with short sword and buckler, an exercise for adolescents, likewise over time degenerated into gang warfare. Yet even games such as tennis, or its racquetless counterpart handball, were the subject of bans. However, the repeated prohibitions at both national and local levels suggests that suppression was, for whatever reason, not very effective.

Games like football might take place on wasteland in or near a town, or in the streets themselves. Just as churches were foci for social gatherings, churchyards were also a place for sporting events, as they might be also for commercial transactions. However, the church authorities deplored the risks of damage this posed.

Although we often hear of recreational activities in the context of them being banned, or leading to court cases (too frequently, coroner's reports), there are other sources of information. One of the best descriptions of the spectrum of such activities available to townspeople is given by FitzStephen, whose memories of growing up in London are largely those of the more diverting side of life. He makes reference to numerous avenues for diversion:

- taking a stroll on a summer evening;
- debating contests, often amusing, which he likens to intellectual wrestling matches;
- going out for some fast food;
- watching horses be put through their paces before being sold at market;
- horseracing, ostensibly as a way of illustrating the value of horses for sale, but behind it lying the competitiveness of the riders;
- social occasions – weddings, banquets, as well as frequenting taverns;
- theatrical performances;
- animal contests (cock fights, and the baiting of bulls, bears, or boars);
- ball games, with teams representing schools or crafts,

- which attracted an audience;
- jousting on horseback;
- river-based tilts at a quintain, another amusement that drew an audience;
- yet another variant inspired by tournaments, a form of jousting on ice-skates;
- more casual fun on the ice, simply sliding, or being drawn on a crude, makeshift form of sled;
- other quasi-military exercises, including athletics and duels;
- hawking and hunting with hounds;

This, we must never forget, is London, England's metropolis. But the same range of activities was available elsewhere, if on a less ambitious scale. It is evident that medieval people valued their off-work time, whether it was for casual recreation or more elaborate celebrations or competitions on the occasion of festivals. FitzStephen indicates that certain recreational activities were associated with particular days or season. Lent/Easter was particularly being a time of outdoor activity, as spring arrived; the great Carnival preceding Lent became a time for a wide range of celebrations, often to excess – Bruegel's allegorical depiction of "Carnival and Lent", although produced in 1559, compiles illustrations of many medieval recreations (while his "Children's Games" is a similar visual compendium). Such activities provided a release mechanism, while at the same time opportunities for socializing – even to the point of crossing class barriers – and in some cases rituals that helped cement or restore group solidarities.

Medieval games took various forms and catered to both physical and intellectual competitiveness. Many however met with disapproval from both secular and ecclesiastical authorities, being considered unproductive or even a threat to social order or morals.

Ceremony

Not mentioned by FitzStephen, largely because it was more a feature of later centuries, was the recreational element of ceremonies. Whether having a political function (e.g. swearing-in of newly-elected mayors), a social character (e.g. annual gild feasts and processions), or a ritualistic role (e.g. the Corpus Christi day procession), ceremonial occasions provided an opportunity to reinforce communal solidarity and fellowship within a celebratory context, while at the same time subtly reasserting society's hierarchical structure by distinguishing leaders from followers and associating wealth with power. Even charitable activities could disguise similar messages.

The great nobles of the kingdom travelled around their domains a good deal, accompanied by retinues. Not only because of the cost-efficiency of living off the hospitality of those under their lordship, but also because their personal presence was the most effective way of ensuring their rule was enforced, their wishes respected. Their display of power was not merely in the soldiers they brought with them, but in the magnificence – the evident visual superiority – of their parades. This was in turn aped by the ruling class of the towns, many if not most of whom aspired to rise into the ranks of gentry, and increasingly felt themselves superior, not merely economically but also socially, to other townspeople.

Townspeople did not have to wait for visits of dignitaries to engage in festivities or ceremonial. There were many festivals throughout the year that provided opportunity for conviviality or show. Some involved solemn ceremonies, others called for free-spiritedness. Christmas, Easter, Corpus Christi, May day, Midsummer, and Lammas were but a few of the times when there were communal feasting and drinking or other activities and when the streets might be decorated. Besides which the socio-religious guilds of the town each had their own special feast-days, associated with the saint to which they were dedicated.

Entertainment

As with sports, much medieval entertainment took place in outdoor contexts, since this permitted more communal participation. At home, those who were well-off might be able to engage minstrels or storytellers for social occasions, or amuse themselves with parlour games. But for those without parlours (the "chamber" of the medieval house) or halls, the home was mostly a place to eat and sleep, and recreation was ought out-of-doors.

In addition to communal gatherings, sports, and public ceremonies, there was a taste for music and dancing, and dramatic or comedic performances, appealing to emotions that sometimes seem less governed than those of Victorian and post-Victorian society, although perhaps the fondness for drinking was partly the cause of this.

Music and dance:

In Anglo-Saxon England, secular music tended to be accompaniment for storytelling – whether spoken or sung – or more lighthearted tomfoolery, such as dancing or tumbling performances. The tradition of bard with harp gave way as new instruments came to the fore, and individual itinerant minstrels were joined by travelling bands. By the close of the Middle Ages, ensembles rather than solo performers were the norm.

Urban authorities themselves had occasion to hire musicians, most commonly called "waits", not just to entertain the populace or visiting dignitaries on celebratory or ceremonial occasions, but for more mundane tasks, such as noisemaking to accompany social offenders to the pillory, playing fanfares to bring audiences to order, sounding the hours during nightwatch, or accompanying a contingent of the local militia to the front. At Lynn for example one of the bureaucratic officials hired from mid-fourteenth century was a bedeman, whose duties included the making of public announcements, i.e. town crier; the incumbent from 1375 to 1388 was Thomas de Sutton, alias Thomas Bedeman, alias Thomas Belleman (either because of the use of a bell to attract public attention, or because he tolled the church bell to announce the death of a citizen), alias Thomas Whaite. But these various roles do not mean we should discount the entertainment element. Music was popular on most occasions, including as an accompaniment to feasting.

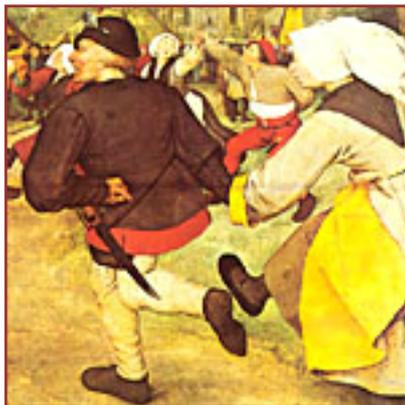

Dancing was also well loved, as a participative activity – perhaps nowhere more clearly expressed than in the exuberant folk dances depicted by Bruegel – or in performance. Some of those performances became increasingly dramatic at the close of the Middle Ages, as the penchant for display and disguising increased. The Dance of Death, for those able to afford professional performers, was something occasionally staged as part of pageants, to remind the audience of their mortality.

Outdoor events required loud instruments, notably wind and percussion; such events included dances in a range of social settings. Music suitable for the intimacy of a chamber called for softer instruments such as the lute.

Theatre:

It was sometimes a thin line between a dramatic dance and a masked mime. At one end of the spectrum they were rowdy and almost anarchic – perceived as a threat to order and eventually banned. At the other end they developed into dumb pageants with ritualistic elements. A second influence on the development of medieval theatre was the celebration of divine services, which had inherently dramatic qualities and, on special occasions, came to involve the introduction of props or costumed characters from the Bible, as dramatic elements were emphasized to create an impression on the congregation.

The best-known and most urban manifestation of medieval drama was the Corpus Christi plays. They, together with other plays known to have been performed in a number of towns, are one example of the rich ceremonial life of townspeople. But ceremony with a more overt educational purpose – entertainment having a long history of being bound up with education.

The play associated with the festival of Corpus Christi was actually a cycle of performances which came to be known, in the post-medieval period, as mystery plays – not because of their content, but because the performances were organized using the craft guilds, or misteria (a term derived from the classical Latin word for "occupation" and evolving into the French métier meaning "trade" or "craft"). One or more guilds were assigned responsibility for the production and performance of one of the dramatic presentations in the cycle, with the town government overseeing and regulating the whole.

To the best of our knowledge, the Corpus Christi cycle was strictly an urban phenomenon, although by no means all towns engaged in this activity – it appears to have been only a few of the larger, more prosperous towns, particularly those in the northern half of England. Samples of the plays performed have survived for York, Chester, Wakefield, Coventry, Newcastle and Norwich, while there is evidence (or suspicion) that Beverley, Ipswich, Kendal, Leicester, Lincoln, Bristol and Worcester; Lancaster, Louth, Preston, Canterbury and London may perhaps also hosted similar performances – although at London the large number of national, civic and parochial processions, full of their own kind of drama and celebration, may have made it unnecessary to develop the play cycles found elsewhere. Plays that may or may not have a Corpus Christi association, written largely in Cornish Celtic, with the surviving copy dating from the late fourteenth century, are associated with the town of Penryn. For the guilds, production and presentation of the plays gave an opportunity for conspicuous display of socio-economic status; there is some evidence of competition between guilds to present visually impressive performances, sometimes leading to excess.

The Corpus Christi play comprised a number of individual performances, the number and subjects varying from town to town, each dramatising events or persons from the Bible, from the Fall of Lucifer to the Last Judgement. Sometimes it appears that plays were assigned to particular guilds because of a perceived association, or perhaps the guilds themselves made a choice that might serve to advertise their trades – occasionally explicit advertisements were posted, although city authorities considered this an abuse; the plasterers (who undertook construction work) might, for example, present The Creation, the shipwrights the building of Noah's Ark, the water-carriers or mariners Noah's Flood, the bakers the Last Supper, or the cooks the Harrowing of Hell. The Corpus Christi plays were not strictly speaking morality plays, although their function was partly didactic. The individual performances were often referred to as pageants, a term deriving from the crude stage (Lat. pagina meaning "plank") on which presented, usually mounted on wagons; the mobile character of the performances seems to be particular to England, whereas on the continent the locations were stationary.

Historians generally agree that the roots of these urban plays, which were performed in English, lie in Latin liturgical drama – particularly miracle plays – presented by the Church in the twelfth century, at religious festivals such as Easter and Christmas; they focused particularly on the life and death of Christ, although FitzStephen mentioned plays in London depicting holy miracles and the sufferings of martyrs. There is less agreement on how this evolved into the secularized form of the Corpus Christi play. Some point to folk-plays acted out by wandering minstrels, during seasonal revels of the common people, as one influence, infusing burlesque or humorous elements into religious drama. The Corpus Christi play retained religious influences, such as instructional tactics derived from sermon and homily; and the Church likely encouraged and supported the presentation by laymen of drama that provided religious instruction, even in a popularized form relying on visual illustration and appealing more to the emotions than the intellect.

A major step towards the development of the Corpus Christi play had to have been the official establishment by the Pope of Corpus Christi as an important and universal festival; this happened in 1311. Since the festival took place at a time of clement weather (late May or June), it was suitable for an outdoors procession led by city and church officials in which the holy sacrament was carried through the streets to a church; the Pope authorized such a procession in 1317, and the earliest record of one in England is from the following year. Over the years this festive parade likely became more elaborate, with additional religious ornamentation introduced and in due course, it is hypothesised, static depictions of scenes from the Bible, drawn along on wagons. Brief dialogue may next have been introduced to interpret each scene; in time these pageants developed, in ways differing from town to town, into scripted plays. For the populace, the play cycle represented on the one hand a celebration of the God-directed destiny of humanity, and on the other hand a new facet of the traditional midsummer revels.

Although there is a suspect tradition that the dramatization cycle had emerged in Chester by about 1328, other evidence suggests the 1370s as a more likely period of origin. At York and Beverley, the plays were said in the 1390s to have been long-established, although this too likely does not refer back much beyond the earliest references: 1376 in York (a passing reference in a rental to a house where pageant stages were stored), and 1377 at Beverley (likewise, the context suggesting that the performances were well-established). That Corpus Christi fell in a period when daylight hours were long helped encourage the development of a cycle of performances. At York the cycle became so extensive that it seems unlikely that all pageants could have been performed on one day; by 1426, there was no time for both pageant and procession, and the latter was displaced to the following day.

The Corpus Christi play was not the only play for public entertainment and edification. The Passion play was also popular. At York, Beverley and Lincoln a play called the Pater Noster was created along similar lines to the Corpus Christi play, in terms of sections being allocated to different groups to produce. The Pater Noster, unlike the Corpus Christi play, was essentially a morality play. Morality plays appeared about the same period as gild pageants; their aim was to personify the vices and virtues. There is slight evidence for other plays – nature unknown – having been performed in York as early as the thirteenth century.

With the miracle, morality and other plays having moved out of the sphere of influence of the Church into the hands of the guilds, there was the tendency to introduce secular and even farcical elements to appeal to popular taste. This degradation, from the perspective of the Church, led it to become increasingly critical of the plays and, after the Reformation, to succeed in repressing performances in the sixteenth century, although the legacy of the plays found its way into dramatic forms and characterizations of the Early Modern period.

TRANSLATION

[1. Brawling and hunting, January 1421]

[We command] that there be no gatherings for the purpose of the group supporting the quarrels of its individuals, nor that [anyone] go to any bede-ale held outside the city, nor that anyone ride into the countryside, without permission from the mayor and bailiffs, upon penalty of up to 40s. for every infringement. Also that no man should be so bold or foolhardy to go into the countryside and break into any lord's park, for the purpose of hunting his deer or rabbits, under penalty of 100s. fine and imprisonment.

[....]

Also, that no man walk large hounds or bitches along the highway, upon penalty of 40d. for every infringement.

[2. Archery and cock-fighting, 22 April 1441]

It is their wish that William Oxtun remove the butts specified herein, located at the muckhill in Little Park Street, without anyone objecting (by order of the mayor); and that those being made at present should be erected elsewhere. No-one is henceforth to practice archery in the place for cock-fighting.

DISCUSSION

Recreational or sporting activities in towns are usually evidenced through authorities' prohibitions of those considered undesirable. Prohibitions were, however, no more effective than their enforcement, which relied largely upon charges being brought by private individuals or presented by the leet jury. It was a not uncommon complaint from owners of estates surrounding towns that townsmen would trespass and poach thereon. In 1480, for example, the Prior of Coventry was complaining to the mayor that (among other things) townspeople: were hunting and hawking on his lands within and outside the city bounds; had damaged his hedges and crops by a reckless sport called "roving" which involved shooting arrows at movable targets; were surreptitiously, during the day and at night, fishing in his ponds; had made a "sporting place" on his land where they practised archery and played "other games". The mayor's response was basically that all these were offences committed by individuals and it was incumbent upon the Prior to prosecute any guilty party; the mayor noted that roving was a problem commonly encountered in large cities and prohibited in Coventry by ordinance.

Archery was one of the few sports sanctioned by authority, since it built skills useful in times of war or local defence. In the passage above, the concern was not with archery per se, but with it being practiced in a location where it was not likely to prove a danger to bystanders.

NOTES

"bede-ale"

An ale was a drinking party thrown for the purpose of fundraising. Such parties might be the subject of a general invitation (probably as here) or of specific invitations; in some cases these became opportunities for a form of extortion by local officials, in which invitees – coerced into participating – were expected to pay high prices for the ale they drank.

"large hounds"

This would probably refer to hunting hounds.

"their"

This refers to the leet jury, who acted with the mayor and other officials as the legislative body of the city.

"William Oxton"

The common sergeant of the city.

TRANSLATION

On Sunday before the Nativity of Mary [4 September 1261], Richard de Borham with many other people from London went to a wrestling match at Bermundseye outside the City and there wrestled with the men of the prior of Bermundseye; a quarrel arose between them and Richard and his companions chased the prior's men into the priory; then came a monk called Arnulf and other monks from the priory who entered a solar above the gate and threw stones at Richard and his companions; Arnulf the monk threw a stone upon Richard and crushed him so that he quickly died.

DISCUSSION

It seems that wrestling competitions were commonplace, and perhaps initially among approved sports, being martial in bent or at least a demonstration of combatitiveness. In towns, wrestling was perhaps one of the most popular competitive sports not involving teams. Fitzstephen mentions the matches as a typical pastime on summer holy days. However, the roughness of the contests and their attraction for gambling on outcomes brought wrestling into disfavour with the Church. Furthermore they excited crowd emotions in a disruptive manner that in modern times is more associated with soccer matches.

It is mostly when matters got out of hand that we hear of wrestling bouts. At a time not much beyond that of Fitzstephen, Jocelin de Brakelond mentions what were perhaps Christmastide wrestling matches between the townsmen of Bury St. Edmunds and the abbey's men, which broke down into a free-for-all. Roger de Wendover tells how, on St. James Day in 1222, several teams representing the citizens of London and residents of the various suburbs held a wrestling competition that resulted in the steward of Westminster Abbey, a member of one of the losing teams, seeking revenge via a return challenge on St. Peter's day. That second bout likewise disintegrated into a general brawl.

TRANSLATION

John Dauson brings a complaint against Henry Dromeys, on the accusation that he unjustly withholds twenty shillings that he owes him. Unjustly for the reason that it was agreed between them at Nottingham, on 8 May last, that John and Henry should ride together from the town of Nottingham to the town of West Chester on a particular day to be agreed upon by John and Henry – that is, John upon a stallion and Henry upon a mare – and that they return upon those horses from West Chester to Nottingham without any rest period; so that whichever of them was the later to arrive back at Nottingham should give to the one arriving first 20s. of silver the day after his return. In this regard John went to Henry on the day set and gave him notice to come and fulfill their agreement. Henry did not come, nor carry out the agreement; consequently John on several occasions afterwards went to Henry and asked him to pay him the 20s.; Henry did not wish to pay, but withheld it and continues to do so, to John's damage of 40d., whereof he produces suit etc. And Henry comes and defends etc. and says that he made no agreement such as John has testified against him, and on that defence he wages his law with the 12th hand, and he is assigned a hearing at the next court session.

DISCUSSION

FitzStephen shows racing to have been a common sport at London and, although a churchman, clearly reveals how deeply such events affected him as a spectator. The races he describes were associated with showing off horses in order to sell them, and that may have been a common motive behind public horse-racing, although the desire to show off the superiority of horses and riders was by itself a motivation from the earliest time that horse-racing is evidenced in English records (seventh century). The proposed race described above was less of a sport, however, than a personal wager. Like many sports, horse-racing – whether a private or public race – attracted gambling.

NOTES

"John upon a stallion and Henry upon a mare"

My interpretation of "super unum equum et ... super unum jumentum" is a hypothesis on the assumption that there must have been some reason for mentioning the different types of mounts in the evidence. Possibly part of the background to the wager was a disagreement between the two men as to what type of horse was faster or had more stamina. Stevenson interpreted jumentum as draught-horse, but the more common interpretation of mare would then suggest that the opposing horse might have been male.

Location: London

Date: late 13th or early 14th century

TRANSLATION

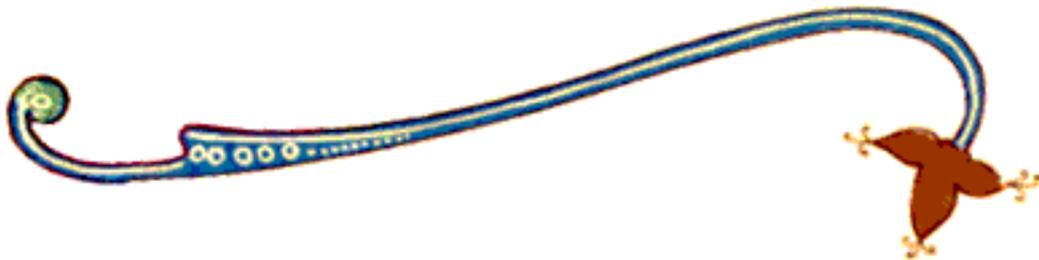

Concerning those who delight in mischief, proceed to learn in the city how to fence with the buckler, by night and by day, and consequently are emboldened to do wrong: it is decided that no-one within the city is to hold a school nor take lessons in fencing with the buckler, by night or by day. Anyone so doing is to be imprisoned for 40 days. He [i.e. an instructor] is not to take an apprentice by day, unless he is a man of good reputation and known [character]; if he is convicted of doing so, he is to receive the same punishment.

DISCUSSION

The intent of this ordinance was to suppress the conditions that encouraged brawling and duelling, and in that sense is a concern with keeping of the peace, but might also be considered part of the "recreational activities" of a certain set within London society – largely adolescents who roamed around, often in gangs, to challenge each other. The king and aristocracy were offended by what they saw as the degradation of their values based on honorable combat, as well as the risk of death or injury from this sort of behaviour (even though swords and bucklers were often made of wood). In 1310, one Roger, surnamed "the Skirmisher", was brought before the courts for teaching fencing skills to the sons of respectable citizens.

The context of this passage is a set of ordinances prescribing curfew and, particularly, ordering taverns and alehouses to close by curfew. The connection presumably being that, under the influence of drink, the men of London were more inclined to brawling, and training in swordplay only made this situation worse. It is not certain whether the last part of the passage is connected with the first.

NOTES

"buckler"

This was, in the 13th century, a small shield – not used as a bodily protection so much as for parrying blows, and thus particularly in duels to serve with sword or dagger. There is a small possibility that the French eskirmir de bokeler could alternatively be translated "to fight with a staff (bacellus)". In either case, the issue here is that the authorities were concerned that the giving of combat lessons would only encourage duelling.

TRANSLATION

Nicholas Prestone, tailor, and John Outlawe, were attached to make answer to John atte Hille and William, his brother, in a plea of deceit and falsehood; for that the same John Outlawe, at divers times between the Feast of Our Lord's Nativity, in the 49th year etc., and the First Sunday in Lent, then next ensuing, came to the said John atte Hille and William, and asked if they wished to gain some money at tables, or at chequers, commonly called "quek"; to which they said "Yes"; whereupon, the same John Outlawe said that they must follow him, and he would shew them the place, and a man there, from whom they could easily win; and further said, that he would be partner with them, to win or to lose.

And they followed him to the house of the said Nicholas, in Fridaystret; and there they found the said Nicholas, with a pair of tables, on the outside of which was painted a chequer-board, that is called a "quek." And the said Nicholas asked them if they would play at tables for money; whereupon the said complainants, knowing of no deceit of ill-intent, being urged and encouraged thereto by the same John Outlawe, played with him at tables, and lost a sum of money, owing to false dice.

And the said John then left them to play alone, and after that they still continued to lose. The said tables were then turned, and the complainants played with the defendant Nicholas at quek, until they had lost, at the game of tables and quek, 39s.2d. After which, the complainants, wondering at their continued losing, examined the board at which they had been playing, and found it to be false and deceptive; seeing that in three quarters of the board all the [black] points were so depressed, that all the white points in the same quarters were higher than the black points in the same; and on the fourth quarter of the board all the white points were so depressed, that all the black points in that quarter were higher than the white. They inspected and examined also the dice with which they had first played at tables, and found them to be false and deceptive. And because that they would play no longer, the said Nicholas and John Outlawe stripped John atte Hille of a cloak, 16 shillings in value, which they still retained. Wherefore the said John atte Hille and William, his brother, made plaint etc.

DISCUSSION

The accused pair, evidently in cahoots, with Outlawe rounding up suckers for his partner to fleece using the fixed table and dice, was accused at the same time by William Caboche and Robert Geffrone of having, at various times, used false dice to cheat them out of 53s.4d. The only defence Prestone appears to have put up was that he had acquired the table from an outsider, as security for a loan, and did not know it was fixed. A jury, however, concluded that Prestone and Outlawe were guilty of fraud; they were ordered to repay the four men for the amounts the latter had lost. They were also to be committed to the pillory for one hour, with their false board being burned under their noses, and then to be returned to gaol until the city authorities saw fit to release them.

On January 8, 1382 an embroiderer, William Soys, was accused by three separate complainants of having a fixed chequer board, with its white squares depressed in some quarters, and the black squares in the other quarters. The complainants had lost 76s.8d in total. These were no small amounts in that period. William was found guilty and sentenced to go to the pillory, with fanfare, for an hour on each of three consecutive days, with his false board displayed beside him. The same court session saw charges brought by two Dumfries men against a hosier, Richard Scot, of being enticed into his house to play dice and being cheated out of 44s. Richard was convicted, and sentenced to three sessions in the pillory, with his false dice hung around his neck.

"at tables"

Riley suggests that this dice game was similar to backgammon. However, it may have been a general term for games played with board and counters (pebbles).

"chequers"

According to Riley this was "probably played with rounded pebbles, rolled upon the squares", in which one party wagered on the pebbles landing on the white squares (or points) and the other wagered on them landing on the black. It was among the games that the king specifically prohibited in 1477.

TRANSLATION

[1. Court session of 5 February 1433]

The same Henry [Bonyngton] complains in person of the same John [Balthwayt junior of Nottingham] concerning a case of deceit. Regarding which he says that on 26 December 1428 at Nottingham, John was playing at tables with Henry under the terms of an agreement previously made, that if Henry allowed John to win Henry's money as a strategem whereby the money of the other players could be won, John would give back to Henry the money he had lost together with half of the winnings had from the others. As a result of this collusion, John, playing and gambling with various men on that date and in that place, accumulated the amount of 9s., including 20d. of Henry's. Although he has often been requested to, John has not yet paid Henry the 3s.8d that are his share of the winnings together with the 20d. belonging to Henry, but has refused to pay him and continues to do so to this day, defrauding and injuring Henry. As a result of which, he says, he has suffered damages to the value of 6s.8d; and for this reason he has brought this action. John comes in person and denies force [and injury] etc. and says that he is in no way guilty as [charged] etc., and he is prepared [to defend] etc.; and Henry does likewise etc. Therefore an inquisition [is to be held] etc.

[2. Assizes of 1483]

The jurors from the western sector [of the town] say, under oath, that Thomas Coste baker of Nottingham, in the county of the town of Nottingham, Thomas Mariott barber of the same town and county, Thomas Ball tailor of the same [etc.], Geoffrey Whitehed tailor of the same [etc.], Richard Parker baker of the same [etc.], William Howett sawyer of the same [etc.], Thomas Chaworth esq. of the same [etc.], and Joan Kell housewife of the same [etc.], on 10 October 1482 and on various other dates and occasions, regularly and usually host individually in their houses at night disorderly gatherings, receiving and welcoming the servants of various men who in their houses, using the goods of their masters, play at dice, cards, and other illegal games prohibited by the statute issued on that matter, to the serious detriment of their masters and contrary to the king's peace.

DISCUSSION

A series of royal ordinances and statutes throughout the Late Middle Ages, the nearest in time to the latter case having been that of 1477, prohibited various sports or games, particularly where gambling was involved, on the grounds that they were idle and useless recreations, if not morally reprehensible (compared, say, to archery or hunting which instilled martial skills useful to society). The former case illustrates part of the moral concerns. Bonnington was rather audacious to think that he might seek to use to the law to claim profits from an illegal activity; and indeed, the (possibly indignant) mayor threw his case out of court and fined Henry for bringing the charge.

Nonetheless, games of chance involving gambling were popular across the spectrum of medieval society. Dice, in the cubic form in which we still know them, had been around since ancient times; their portability in part accounts for the prevalence and popularity of dicing or board games involving dice. It also meant that fixed dice frequently featured in cases of fraud brought into the courts. Playing cards, on the other hand, were rather more expensive to obtain, being imported, and only filtered down from the aristocracy to lower classes towards the end of the Middle Ages, although they infiltrated society fairly quickly and led to a domestic industry springing up to produce them.

NOTES

"at tables"

There were a number of board games that fell under this general title. All employed dice to determine the movement of counters over a board. Such games have modern counterparts in backgammon, or the less serious ludo (a name as generic as tables).

[10 September 1451]

On that day, the warden, and all officers, and the whole community of the town granted that if anyone of the town plays a ball-game on holidays or festivals while divine service is underway, from now on any officer present at the occurrence has full power to distrain [on the players] and impose [a fine of] four pence, towards supporting the lights of St. Mary, Henley, whenever and however often this occurs.

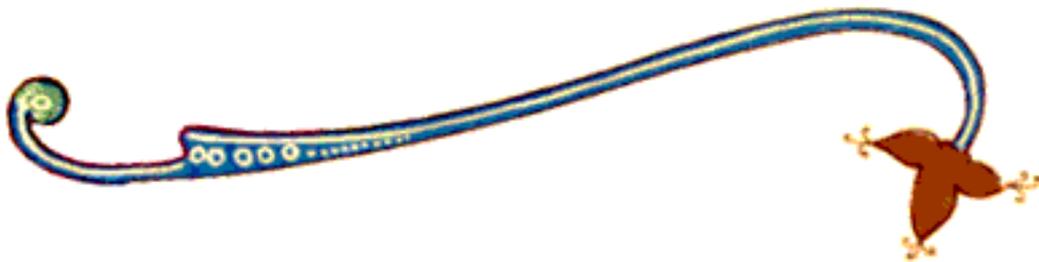

Also, the same thing applies to those playing at dice, except at Christmas time.

DISCUSSION

There was nothing metropolitan about vices, which in the eyes of authority included many sports and games. Henley's example shows that problems plaguing large towns were also concerns in small towns.

It is not certain whether the objection behind this ordinance was to parishioners being seduced away from attending church services, or to the playing of handball using the exterior wall of a church, as was often done, thus disturbing the service.

Memorandum that on 20 May 1450 William Canynges, mayor of the town of Bristol, Thomas Hore, sheriff of that town, John Borton, Richard Forster, John Sherp, Clement Bagot, John Shipward, John Stanley, Nicholas Hille, William Coder, John Forde, William Pavy, with all [other] notable and worthy persons who were assembled in the hall of the common council of the town on the above date, have ordained and permitted that the drinkings on the nights of [the festivals of] St. John and St. Peter shall, from henceforth, be restricted solely to members of those crafts who come on those nights before the mayor, sheriff and notable persons, and their successors. The mayor then in office is to provide at his expense wine to be sent to the craft [gild] halls on St. John's day, according to the provisions below. And the sheriff then in office is to do the same on St. Peter's day. On condition that the members of the crafts send their own servants and their own pots for the wine. Which ordinance the mayor, sheriff and notable persons commanded me, John Joce their common clerk, to enrol in their book of records. Which is:

|-----------------------|------------|---------|-----------|
| First, to the weavers | 10 gallons | Hoopers | 3 gallons |
|-----------------------|------------|---------|-----------|

| Item, to the fullers | 10 gallons | | |
| Item, the dyers | 5 gallons | Barbers and waxmakers | 4 gallons |
| Item, the tailors | 8 gallons | Cordwainers | 8 gallons |
| Item, the skinners | 4 gallons | Tanners | 4 gallons |
| Item, to the butchers | 6 gallons | White-tawyers | 4 gallons |
| Item, the bakers | 5 gallons | Bowyers and fletchers | 2 gallons |
| Brewers | 5 gallons | | |
| Smiths, ironworkers, cutlers, locksmiths, and cardmakers | 3 gallons | Wiredrawers | 3 gallons |
| Masons | 3 gallons | Shermen | 5 gallons |
| Tilers | 3 gallons | | |
| Carpenters | 4 gallons | | |

Any future mayor or sheriff who acts contrary to the above ordinance is to forfeit and pay £3.6s.8d, to be levied by the mayor next in office to the put to the use of the community of the town of Bristol, without any remission.

DISCUSSION

This appears to be one example of the effort by urban governments to bring craft guilds under careful regulation and control. The volume of wine assigned to each craft, or group of crafts, was presumably dictated (at least in part) by the numbers of gildsmen.

For another example of a festival celebration specific to a craft, see "Homicides investigated by the coroner".

NOTES

"St. John and St. Peter"

The former probably refers to the festival of St. John before the Latin Gates (6 May), while the latter to St. Peter in Chains (1 August).

"common clerk"

I.e. the town clerk.

"cordwainers"

Leather-workers specialising in a fine quality leather originally from Cordoba in Spain. This leather was found particularly suitable for footwear, and so cordwainers were essentially shoemakers, but distinct from cobblers (who repaired shoes).

"white-tawyers"

Tawing and tanning were the two main methods softening and preserving (preventing decay of) hides. White-tawyers took hides that had been cleaned and treated them with alum and oil, to produce a hard white leather useful for manufacturing items.

"wiredrawers"

I believe these were makers of wire, although the term "drawers" was more usually applied to those involved in transportation services.

"shermen"

Sheep-shearers.

event, for their patron saint

It is also ordained that the place where the crafts are to hold their assemblies and religious services for their patron saint – if they have such now or in the future – is, within 14 days of this ordinance being communicated to the wardens, to be made known to the mayor prior to the holding of any assembly or service and to be restricted [in location] by the wardens and craftsmen as per the city ordinance; upon penalty of 40s. to be levied from wardens and craftsmen who fail to comply, to be paid to the chamber of the city for the use of the community....

That every craft that stands alone and every craft with mysteries assigned to it is to be clothed, who is to be clothed, and when

Furthermore, it is ordained, granted and enacted that the craft wardens have the power to order and require each and every citizen belonging to their craft, and of the mystery or mysteries assigned to their craft, who is wealthy enough and well-behaved, to be clothed in such a costume or livery as the craft wardens indicate, by the time of the next riding of the mayor. And thereafter to be so clothed whenever they are so instructed, upon such a penalty as is or will be recommended by the common council of the city....

How persons properly clothed are obliged to participate in processions on foot or horseback and to worship of the saint to whom the craft is dedicated

It is ordained, granted and enacted that all those persons who may dress in the livery of a craft – whether of that craft standing alone, or the craft as united with mysteries – have the duty on all occasions to participate in all processions on foot or horseback to attend religious services in honour of the saint to whom the craft is dedicated, on the principal saint's day, and in other obligations such as are set out above or below.

How they shall ride or walk, and in what manner

First, it is ordained and granted in relation to rules governing gild processions on foot or horseback that all craft wardens – both those of crafts standing alone and those of crafts with mysteries assigned – shall by themselves take charge of and supervise all walkings and ridings, in such order and form as is set out on the [blank] leaf of this book, under penalty.

Ordinance on which craft is to ride in front of the mayor

It is also ordained and granted, for the honour of the crafts, that from henceforth that craft of which the city mayor then in office is a member is to ride or walk immediately ahead of the mayor at times of his ridings, and at all other ridings or walkings – for the honour of that craft during the term of office of the mayor.

At what times crafts are to be prepared to accompany the mayor dressed in their liveries

It is also ordained, granted, and enacted that all crafts – both crafts united with mysteries and crafts standing alone – are to be ready in their liveries to accompany the mayor, sheriffs, and aldermen to the cathedral church of the [Holy] Trinity in the city, or to any other destination, at all times designated by the mayor, and at whatever hour the mayor designates upon these 3 festival days: that is, All Hallows Day [1 November], Christmas Day [25 December], and Epiphany [6 January], and other days that the mayor designates, and in such an order and manner as is indicated above, upon penalty such as is or will be recommended by the common council of the city.

[Extract 2]

The order of the procession of occupations on Corpus Christi day from the Common Hall, through Cutler Row, around the marketplace, through Holter, and so straight back to the same Hall.

First, smiths, tilers, masons, and limeburners with their 2 banners.

Carpenters, engravers, joiners, sawyers, sieve makers, bowyers, fletchers, wheelwrights, and basket makers – 1 banner.

Reeders, claymen, reed sellers, and carters – 1 banner.

Butchers, glovers, parchment makers – 1 banner.

Tanners – 1 banner.

Cordwainers, curriers, cobblers, and collar makers – 1 banner.

Woollen weavers, linen weavers, fullers, shermen, wool chapmen – 2 banners.

Coverlight weavers, dornish weavers, and girdlers – 1 banner.

Bakers, brewers, innkeepers, vintners, coopers, and cooks – 1 banner.

Fishmongers, freshwater fishermen who are keelmen – 1 banner.

Barbers, waxchandlers, and surgeons – 1 banner.

Haberdashers, cappers, hatters, bag makers, lace makers, pinners, wiredrawers, and armourers – 1 banner.

St. Luke's Gild, that is, pewterers, brasiers, bellfounders, plumbers, glasiers, and painters – 1 banner.

Tailors, hosiers, skinnners, and embroiderers – 1 banner.

Goldsmiths, saddlers, dyers, and "calaundrers" – 1 banner.

Worsted weavers – 1 banner.

Grocers and raffmen – 1 banner.

Mercers, drapers, lawyers, and scriveners – 1 banner.

DISCUSSION

Corpus Christi day had become one of the most important holy days of the year. Even those towns that did not mount pageants or plays for the community had at least a parade, usually from some public place or landmark to a local church, which was itself a spectacle. Craft guilds were expected to take part in civic processions. In addition they often held their own parades and feasts on their own festivals, where a guild was associated with a saint.

The first extract given above is from a set of ordinances in which the city government attempted to regulate various aspects of the craft guilds in 1449. This included the special feast-days of the individual guilds, as well as communal occasions in which the guilds were expected to make an appearance to show community solidarity.

The route of the Corpus Christi procession given in the second extract above, of uncertain date but ca.1453, indicates that the starting point was the Blackfriars hall, heading directly south to Cutler Row (present-day London Street), which swung west around the castle ditch, and following until the marketplace was entered from its north-east corner; the procession then probably followed a clockwise route around the edge of the market until, just after passing the Guildhall, it turned north into Holdtor (earlier Smallgate, later Dove Lane) and then making its way back to the Blackfriars. However, another undated order of the procession (ca.1449) indicates that the chapel of St. Mary in the Field, a little southwest of the marketplace, was the destination on that occasion; the chapel was the base for the Guild of Corpus Christi, whose members were the local parish priests, and was also associated with the Great Guild (a.k.a. the Guild of the Annunciation of St. Mary). The latter was amalgamated with another important socio-religious guild, dedicated to St. George, in 1452, as part of a constitutional reform in the city, which may help explain the change of venue for the Corpus Christi procession. The same document of ca.1449 mentions that the procession of craft guilds followed a group of light-bearers surrounding the body of Christ, and that at the rear of the procession came the sheriffs' entourage followed by the sheriffs themselves, the mayor's entourage followed by the mayor, and finally the aldermen carrying bibles or rosaries.

A certain logic can be perceived in the groupings of the guilds. Similar but not identical groupings are seen in the partnerships for mounting the Corpus Christi pageants at Norwich. Since the positions of honour were, as the ca.1449 list indicates, at the rear of the procession, it is likely that the order of the guilds also reflects a ranking of socio-economic precedence; certainly at this period the higher city offices were filled by members of the guilds towards the end of the list.

"mysteries"

In this context the term is used for smaller crafts that did not have enough members to warrant them being treated as fully-fledged guilds, and were apparently unregulated. For administrative purposes, they were therefore affiliated with the larger guilds; those with seven or more members were allowed to elect their own warden to supervise the craft, those with fewer had a warden chosen by the mayor. Whether the list of groups of crafts for the Corpus Christi procession precisely represents these groupings is uncertain.

"such a place"

The specification "above" was that the meeting place be within the city.

"assemblies"

The ordinances required that a guild meet at least four times a year to deal with business and that this set of ordinances (or such of them as were relevant) should be read out to the membership at such gatherings.

"clothed"

Dressed in a costume, or livery, that distinguishes the members from those of other guilds (as with a uniform). The craft warden was to supervise the design and fabrication of the craft's livery, after first presenting the proposed colour combination to the city chamberlain and receiving approval, to ensure no two crafts used the same design, nor that any livery was too like that worn by mayor and aldermen.

"calaunders"

Probably calenderers (who pressed cloths, such as linens, to make them smooth and glossy), although might be launderers.

[1. St. Helen's Gild]

At the year's end, the alderman and stewards, and the bretheren and sisteren of the gild, meet together, on the feast of St. Elene [18 August]. And then a fair youth, the fairest they can find, is picked out, and is clad as a queen, like to St. Elene. And an old man goes before this youth, carrying a cross, and another old man carrying a shovel, in token of finding of the Holy Cross. The sisteren of the gild follow after, two and two; and then the bretheren, two and two; and then the two stewards; and after all follows the alderman. And so, all fairly clad, they go in procession, with much music, to the church of the Friars Minor of Beverley; and there, at the altar of St. Elene, solemn mass is celebrated, and every one of the gild makes offering of a penny. The mass ended, and all prayers said, they go home; and, after dinner, all the gild meet in a room within the hall of the gild; and there they eat bread and cheese, and drink as much ale as is good for them.

[2. St. Mary's Gild]

Every year, on the feast of the Purification of the blessed Mary [2 February], all the bretheren and sisteren shall meet together in a fit and appointed place, away from the church; and there, one of the gild shall be clad in comely fashion as a queen, like to the glorious Virgin Mary, having what may seem a son in her arms; and two others shall be clad like to Joseph and Simeon; and two shall go as angels, carrying a candle-bearer, on which shall be twenty-four thick wax lights. With these and other great lights borne before them, and with much music and gladness, the pageant Virgin with her son, and Joseph and Simeon, shall go in procession to the church. And all the sisteren of the gild shall follow the Virgin; and afterwards all the bretheren; and each of them shall carry a wax light weighing half a pound. And they shall go two by two, slowly pacing to the church; and when they have got there, the pageant Virgin shall offer her son to Simeon at the high altar; and all the sisteren and bretheren shall offer their wax lights, together with a penny each. All this having been solemnly done, they shall go home again with gladness. And any brother or sister who does not come, unless good cause for staying away be shown, shall pay half a pound of wax to the gild. On the same day, after dinner, the bretheren and sisteren shall meet together, and shall eat bread and cheese and drink ale, rejoicing in the Lord, in praise of the glorious Virgin Mary.

DISCUSSION

Nothing is known of St. Helen's gild other than what is revealed in its response in 1389 to the king's demand for information about the character, purposes, and possessions of socio-religious gilds. It appears to have been associated with a chapel dedicated to St. Helen that was later absorbed into the Franciscan friary. The description of its celebrations on its saint's day is strikingly similar to that of the gild of St. Mary.

St. Mary's gild is better known than St. Helen's. It was founded in 1355 by the vicar of St. Mary's, nine married couples, and two unmarried women. Its procession is its most notable feature. In the following century, the gild went on to found a hospital/almshouse.

NOTES

"St. Elene"

The mother of Constantine the Great, and incorrectly believed by the English during the Middle Ages to have been the daughter of a British king.

"fairly clad"

There is no indication here of a formal livery, but members were evidently expected to dress decently for this occasion.

TRANSLATION

It has been the custom upon All Hallows [1 November] for the mayor and sheriff of Bristol, after dinner, to gather with the entire council at the Tolsey, along with such other respectable and well-born commoners who show up at that time, and from there to proceed to All Saints church. There they make offerings and then the company walks to the mayor's house, where they have [?bon]fires, eat spiced cakebread, and drink various wines, everyone's cup kept cheerfully filled. From there, every man heads off for his parish church for evensong.

[...]

Again, on the eve of St. Clement's [22 November], the mayor, sheriff and their colleagues are accustomed to walk to St. Clement's chapel within St. Bartholomew's, there to hear evensong and, on the following day, mass, and to make offerings.

And on the eve of St. Katherine's [24 November], the mayor and sheriff, with their colleagues, walk to St. Katherine's chapel within the Temple church, there to hear evensong. And after evensong they walk to the Katherine Hall, where they are received with formality by its wardens and brethren, and in the hall there have a fire and a drink, with spiced cakebread and a choice of wines with which to keep everyone's cup cheerfully filled. Thereafter each man heads for home, the mayor, sheriff and their honorable associates preparing for a visit from St. Katherine's players, offering them a drink at the front door and a reward for their performance. On the following day, St. Katherine's day, the mayor, sheriff and their colleagues are to go to the Temple church and, from there, take part in a procession around the town, ending up at the Temple church where they hear mass and make offering. After which, everyone returns home.

In the same way, on the eve of St. Nicholas [5 December], the mayor, sheriff and their colleagues walk to St. Nicholas' church where they hear evensong; likewise the following day, to hear mass and make offering, and to hear the bishop's sermon and receive his blessing. After dinner, the mayor, sheriff and their colleagues are to assemble at the mayor's Counter to await the bishop's arrival, playing dice in the interim (the town clerk is to provide the dice and to receive 1d. from every raffle). When the bishop arrives, his chaplains are to sing, the bishop will give them his blessing, and then he and his chaplains are to be served bread and wine. After which the mayor, sheriff and their colleagues leave, to hear the bishop celebrate evensong at St. Nicholas' church.

The following day, St. Nicholas' day, it has been the custom for the bailiffs of Bristol to hand out the town livery cloth to all the officers of the town ...

The mayor and sheriff of Bristol are, by custom, during the quarter and season before Christmas to attend Advent sermons – that is, on the first Sunday of Advent, which always falls on the Sunday following the day of St. Livinus the bishop in November. On which first Sunday the mayor and sheriff, with their colleagues, are to walk to the Friars Preacher and there hear the sermon. The following Sunday they are to hear the sermon at the Friars Minor, and the third Sunday at the Friars Preacher. The fourth and last Sunday of Advent, at the Friars Minor. And that brings to an end the Advent sermons.

By custom, during this quarter on the market day preceding Christmas day (or else on Christmas eve), the mayor of Bristol is to have a public announcement made that during the holidays everyone behave in a good and orderly fashion in the town, along the following lines:

"The mayor and the sheriff order and command, in the name of our sovereign lord the king, that no persons, regardless of social status, at any time during Christmas are to go mumming with masks covering their faces, nor go out after curfew has been rung at St. Nicholas without carrying a light – that is, a sconce light, lantern, candle, or torch. And that under no circumstances should they go about carrying weapons, so that the king's peace risks being infringed in any way. Upon penalty of imprisonment, and payment of a fine to the king."

DISCUSSION

These passages provide an indication of how ceremonial and recreation were intermixed, and how they had underlying political functions. It was important for the town leaders to be seen participating in festival activities, while at the same time setting an example for decorous behaviour. Processions and worship were suitably dignified activities that helped to reassert political authority within the community, in part by imputing legitimacy to the town rulers by linking their earthly jurisdiction with Divine order. At the same time, they reinforced bonds within the ruling class. Unfortunately these passages reflect only the participation of Bristol officials in the celebrations, and say little of the way the community as a whole celebrated.

The official ceremonies associated with the festivals of St. Clement, patron saint of merchants and mariners, and St. Katherine, patron saint of weavers and (particularly) spinsters, were probably a product of the fifteenth century, when ceremonial had become very important in the preservation of harmony in a society that was, or had once been, egalitarian in theory, but by this time was clearly stratified socio-politically. The great Corpus Christi festival was the clearest expression of such symbolic ceremonies, but at Bristol November was an important time in the annual cycle of urban affairs, since towards the end of the month a great fleet would set sail for France carrying English cloth manufactures; Bristol's importance and prosperity relied heavily on the cloth export trade.

The procession and religious service on St. Katherine's day, a very popular festival and the high point of November, was followed by merry feasting and itinerant actors performing outside selected homes – a form of wassailing, it appears. Probably the play presented related to the legend of the saint's life; we hear of a play in honour of St. Katherine being performed elsewhere in England during the fifteenth century.

David Sacks (The Widening Gate: Bristol and the Atlantic Economy, 1450-1700, University of California Press:1991) has interpreted the official activities preceding the festivals of St. Clements' and St. Katherine's as rituals of social unification. He argues that underlying symbolism demonstrated amical relations between the town authorities and the weavers, who were focused in the franchise called the Temple Fee not under jurisdiction of the authorities, while the subsequent visits by St. Katherine's players symbolized the powerful members of the community paying tribute to the less powerful, a reversal of the normal relationship in which rulers exacted payments from the ruled. The procession on the saint's day itself, by encompassing the independent franchise with the rest of the town, was to show the essential territorial cohesion of the town, he suggests.

St. Nicholas' day was another popular festival associated with various entertainments, prior to the more solemn period of fast that was Advent. Smith assumed that the bishop active on this day was in fact the boy-bishop, a character associated with misrule – a feature of the Christmas season. It was a custom in many places on St. Nicholas' day for a schoolboy or choirboy to be chosen and dressed in episcopal robes, then to proceed around a town blessing the townspeople and presiding at church ceremonies, sometimes with elements of parody or burlesque involved, although the Church authorities had suppressed much of this by Ricart's time. Bristol was evidently one of those places where this took place; an inventory of 1433 includes the boy-bishop's mitre and crozier, eight banners to be carried in his procession, and a white cloth hung before the statue of St. Nicholas (presumably also carried in the procession). The gambling activity of the town officials prior to the bishop's arrival would seem inappropriate behaviour (especially given the usual prohibition of gambling) except in the context of misrule.

The Christmas season as a whole provided a release mechanism for feasting, drinking and high spirits; Carnival, preceding Lent, was another season when misrule came into play. The authorities were anxious to keep Christmas revels from getting too far out of control. With many of the townspeople staying up late to attend midnight mass, there was greater concern that honest folk abroad in the dark identify themselves by carrying a light. However, a certain amount of tomfoolery was tolerated. By reversing the norms of society, misrule provided a temporary release for social tensions which, through dissipation, helped ensure compliance with those norms during the rest of the year and thereby it too contributed to unity and conformity within a community.

NOTES

"Tolsey"

A building near the town centre where court sessions were held; the name derives from "toll-seld" suggesting a small building where market tolls were collected.

"cheerfully filled"

According to Dr. Sacks, the turn of phrase used here was one that implied the drinking of healths.

"colleagues"

I.e. the members of the city council.

"St. Bartholomew's"

There were both a priory and a hospital of this name in Bristol; St. Clement's chapel, founded in the 1440s, was in the latter, which like the Temple church lay outside the walled urban core.

"St. Katherine's"

One of the principal "virgins of Christ", St. Katherine's festival was widely celebrated, and chapels were frequently dedicated to her.

"Katherine Hall"

The hall, which stood near the Temple church, was associated with the weavers and possibly the hosts were the gildsmen; the weavers' gild was one of the largest and most important in the town, to judge from the amount of wine allocated for its "drinkings".

"Temple church"

A church that had once belonged to the Templars, who had held land on the marshy south bank of the Avon.

"mayor's Counter"

This refers to the place where mayor and sheriff conducted town business; they were expected to be in the office from 8 o'clock in the morning until 11, and again from 2 o'clock until 5 in the afternoon, every day except Saturday afternoon (and presumably Sunday), unless it was a religious festival.

"raffle"

A cast of dice for a stake towards which each player contributed.

"livery cloth"

The material from which uniforms were made for the city officials to wear on formal or ceremonial occasions.

"Advent"

The four weeks preceding Christmas; Advent began the ecclesiastical year and was a period of spiritual preparation for Christmas.

"sconce"

For holding a candle; it usually took the form of a wall-mounted bracket.

[...]

Also the king has granted that the brethren may wear a livery and may hold their feast in a suitable place assigned by the alderman and masters....

.... It is ordained, by common agreement of the fraternity, that all the brothers and sisters of the fraternity shall honour as holy St. George's day [23 April] each year, on whatever day [of the week] it falls.

Also they are to celebrate the divine services of both evensong and mass in the cathedral, and other observances ordained by the fraternity.

An exception occurs when St. George's day falls within the three days preceding Easter Day or the three days following. Should it happen that St. George's day fall on any of those seven days, the alderman and the masters, with the agreement of the brethren chosen for the assembly of 24 for that year, shall set a day by ordinance. On which, all brothers and sisters are to participate in the observances of the divine services mentioned above, and participate in the horseback procession, and wear their liveries, and hold their feast.

It is also ordained that all brethren shall provide themselves with a suit of clothing one year (that is, in red), and the next year with hoods. Which gowns and hoods every brother is to keep for the use of St. George and the company, for two years.

And if he no longer wishes to wear it, [no matter] what brother he is, he is not to give or sell it to anyone else, neither within the city or outside, unless the colour of the cloth is changed. Whichever brother is found defaulting in this is to pay 6s.8d for a gown and 3s.4d. for a hood.

It is also ordained that no brother is to buy or wear any kind of clothing intended to be the livery of St. George except from those men officially appointed as buyers of liveries by common agreement of the fraternity for that year. Unless an ordinance to the contrary is made by the alderman and masters.

It is also ordained that every sister of the fraternity and gild is to be dressed in a hooded costume that is red.

It is also ordained that the alderman and masters shall set a date for an assembly prior to St. George's day. On which date the 24, or the majority thereof, are to choose [who will act the role of] their George, and a man to carry his sword before him and be his carver, and a man to carry the banner of St. George, and two men to carry the wax (or have it carried by persons of good reputation, and accompany them). And any man who rejects or fails to perform the role for which he is chosen, without a good excuse, he shall pay [a fine].

And at that assembly the alderman and masters shall announce and make it known at what place the brethren should gather for their horseback procession. And at what location the brothers and sisters shall set their wax. And in what location they shall eat together.

It is also ordained that on St. George's day (or a substitute day assigned, as indicated above) every brother, in his livery for that year, shall be on horseback at a certain location at the hour designated and ordained by the alderman, masters, and by the agreement of the 24 chosen for the assembly.

When the riding is over, every brother and sister is to be ready at the located assigned for the setting and carrying of their wax, and make an offering of it at the high altar of the church indicated above, to burn there for the worship of the Trinity, Our Lady, and the glorious martyr St. George.

Also that every brother and sister is to attend mass from beginning to end, and make an offering of a halfpenny, for the worship of the Trinity and the glorious martyr St. George.

Any brother or sister who is absent during mass, without the special permission of the alderman or a good excuse, is to pay 2s. to the fraternity.

It is also ordained that when mass is said and ended, all the brothers and sisters are to proceed in good faith to their meal, to the place assigned by the alderman and the masters where they shall eat together. Every brother and sister paying for their meal, wax, and minstrelsy, 10d.; and any brother or sister who is absent [\[is to pay ...\]](#)

It is also ordained that every brother and sister shall on the festival day, after the meal, attend evensong and pray for the health and prosperity of the king, this city, the brothers and sisters of the fraternity, and all true Christians. And afterwards they are to hear a dirge praying for the souls of the king's ancestors and those of the deceased brothers and sisters of the fraternity. No brother or sister is to be absent from this divine service without a good excuse, upon penalty of 16d.

It is also ordained that on the day after St. George's day every brother and sister of the fraternity is to come to the church mentioned above by 8 o'clock (that is, as struck by Our Lady's bell). Where they are to hear a requiem mass for the souls of all the brothers and sisters and for all Christians. At that mass every brother and sister is to offer a farthing. Any brother or sister absent from this mass is to pay 6d. unless he has permission or a good excuse.

DISCUSSION

The socio-religious gild dedicated to St. George is thought to have been founded about 1385; this was certainly its own claim. The cult of St. George had already established a good foothold in England (his arms are visible flying from a ship portrayed on the official seal of Lyme Regis in 1285), and appears to have been particularly strong in Norwich. Two of the city's churches were dedicated to him, and there were a number of depictions in the city of dragons or knights fighting dragons dating as far back as the late thirteenth century. St. George's day was a lesser festival in England as early as 1222, but not until 1415 was it made one of the major festivals.

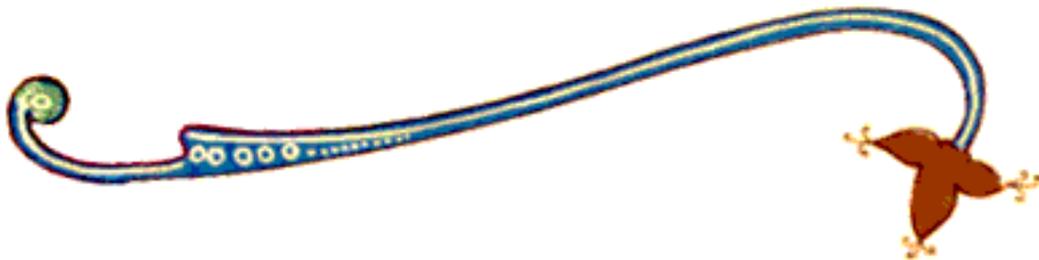

There was nothing that made the gild stand out from others of this type when, in 1389, it responded to the central government orders that all gilds submit information on their functions, governance, and property. Although the gild of St. George was already associated with Norwich cathedral, rather than a local church, hinting at some social importance. It was possibly an influential membership, extending beyond leading citizens to include notables from the regional gentry, that led the gild to the unusual step of being able to obtain a charter from Henry V (1417), incorporating it, recognizing its privileges, and allowing it to acquire real estate; Henry was thereafter viewed as the gild's founder. Equally unusual was that the prior of Holy Trinity and the city mayor and sheriffs were given the right to expel members who caused trouble within the gild.

The gild ordinances, from which those above are extracted, were likely formulated within the years closely following the royal charter, judging from the way in which Henry V is referred to within the document. In 1452, after a period of constitutional conflict within the city, St. George's gild – possibly a power-base for members of one of the competing political parties – became part of the settlement and was merged with the city corporation, so that the outgoing mayor took over the gild aldermanship for a year, and city aldermen were to be members of the gild.

The gild brethren got together for a winter dinner every Christmas, but their principal ceremonials focused on St. George's day. That day began with a procession led by the bearer of an ornate (but wooden) sword, preceding the person chosen to play St. George, decked out in armoured and riding a horse trapped out in finery. A third participant carried a painted canvas dragon, with which St. George was expected to engage in mock combat during the procession. The ordinances also mention a banner, probably bearing the arms of St. George. Possibly, as at later times, lights were carried by other participants, including a few poor men hired for the occasion, and minstrels and chanting churchmen also added to the spectacle. After the gild's unification with the city government, the mayor and aldermen also took part in the procession, dressed in their official robes. The cathedral bells were rung throughout the duration. The cathedral was the ultimate destination of the procession; there the brethren made offerings of wax, to be burned during the mass that followed.

The annual gild feast was the next event of the day, held in the Blackfriars hall. After which the brethren returned to the cathedral for further divine services. The following day saw more of the same.

NOTES

"livery"

Costume and/or adornment that distinguished the members from those of other gilds (as in the way of a uniform).

"cathedral"

There was an altar or small chapel dedicated to St. George within the cathedral.

"set a day"

The postponement of celebrations was usually to May.

"wax"

Wax for candles.

"set their wax"

Possibly purchasing the wax is meant; the gild return of 1389 required that members show up at a waxchandler's shop first thing in the day.

"farthing"

One quarter of a penny.

Receiving the king

Memorandum that on 26 September 1451 our sovereign the king came to Coventry from Leicester; the mayor then in office (that is, Richard Boys) and his worthy brethren decked out in scarlet, and all the commonalty dressed in green gowns and red hoods, waited on horseback at Hazelwood, beyond the Broad Oak, for the arrival of our sovereign. As soon as our sovereign came into view, the mayor and his peers approached him on foot and humbly made obeisance to our sovereign, bending the knee before him three times, the mayor speaking these words to him: "Most high and gracious king, your true liegemen welcome you with all our hearts." At this point the mayor, by advice of his counsellors, was not holding his mace in his hand; but his sergeant, who was in attendance upon him, put the mace in the mayor's hand after he had uttered those words and the mayor, kissing the mace, offered it to the king. The king, halting to give fair hearing to the mayor's speech, responded thus: "Well said, sir! Mayor, mount your horse." The mayor then set off, riding ahead of the king, carrying his mace in his hand. Next came the High Constable, preceding the king's sword. The city bailiffs rode ahead of the mayor, with their maces in their hands, clearing a way for the king's passage. They rode thus before the king until the king arrived at the outer gate of the priory. The king then straight away sent a knight to summon the mayor and his brethren into his presence in his chamber, in order to speak with him. Obeying his command, the mayor and his peers came into his chamber and three times knelt to make their obeisance. Thomas Littleton, who was then recorder, said some pleasantries to the king, our sovereign responding again thus: "Sirs, I thank you for your welcoming reception and orderly behaviour, especially for your good behavior during in the past year, when the people [of the city] have been the best behaved in my realm. I also thank you for the present you have just given us." This present was a tun of wine and 20 large, fat oxen. The king continued by commanding them to govern his city well and see that the peace was well preserved, as it had been in times past, and promised that he would be a good lord to them. Following which the mayor and his peers departed, etc.

The king was still lodging in the priory on Michaelmas eve [28 September] when he sent the clerk of his closet to St. Michael's church to prepare a space there for him, advising them that the king would make a procession there on Michaelmas day and hear high mass there. The mayor and his council taking thought on the matter, recommended him [i.e. the clerk] to request the Bishop of Winchester to say mass before the king. The bishop agreed to do so with great pleasure.

In preparation for the king's visit to St. Michael's church, the mayor and his peers, clothed in scarlet gowns and wearing cloaks and everyone else in scarlet gowns, proceeded to the door of the king's chamber, to wait for the king to come out. When the king came out of his chamber, the mayor and his peers performed due obeisance and the mayor took his mace and bore it in front of the king, preceded by his brethren, until he came to St. Michael's and led the king to the space assigned. Then the bishop, dressed in his pontifical garments, with all the priests and clerics of the church of Bablake wearing copes, made a procession around the churchyard. The king devoutly followed this procession, along with many other lords, bareheaded and dressed in a gown of golden cloth, lined with fur of a sable marten, the mayor carrying the mace before the king, as he had done previously, until he came back to the space assigned him. During this mass, after the king and his lords had made their offerings, he sent Lord Beaumont, his chamberlain, to the mayor to say: "It is the king's wish that you and your brethren come and make an offering." And so they did.

When mass was over, the mayor and his peers escorted the king back to his chamber in the same manner they had done before, except that the mayor with his mace went before the king until he had gone inside his chamber, his brethren waiting at the chamber door until the mayor came back out.

At evensong that same day the king, by 2 of his personal attendants and 2 yeomen of the Crown, sent the furred gown that he had worn during the procession and gave it to God and St. Michael freely (in that none of those who brought the gown would accept any kind of reward).

After all these events, on 5 October the king, deciding to depart, mounted his horse and rode out toward Kenilworth. In the same manner that they had ridden with the king into town, the mayor, his peers, and the commonalty likewise rode with the king towards Kenilworth, until they came to a place beyond Astill Grove, where a wide lane leads off to Canley. There the king, wishing to speak with the mayor and his brethren, said the following to them: "Sirs, I thank you for your welcoming reception and orderly behaviour at this time, and for the good order there has been among you in the past, especially that during the last year. And whereas you now have bailiffs, it is our will that you hereafter have sheriffs; this we grant to you of our own free will and not from anyone's special request. Moreover, we charge you to keep our peace amongst you, and not to allow any riots, gatherings, or assemblies of immoral persons [to take place] among you. And also that you not permit anyone of your number to receive liveries from lords, knights or squires, for this is contrary to our statutes. And also that you obey my commands. If you govern yourselves in this manner, we will be your good lord." This being done, the mayor and his brethren took their leave of the king, and departed and rode back to Coventry. God save the king.

And the mayor, considering the great affection and kindness that the king, our sovereign, has shown to this city, as appears in the above record, on 13 October summoned before him the worthy men whose names are indicated below, to have their advice on what is most necessary and desirable to obtain for this city. The which worthy men decided that Thomas Littleton, recorder, Reynold Bere, one of the city bailiffs, John Norwode, William Betley, Henry Boteler, John Whalley and John Abell should ride to London and there, with advice from lawyers, obtain a charter that shall best serve the needs and benefit of this city.

DISCUSSION

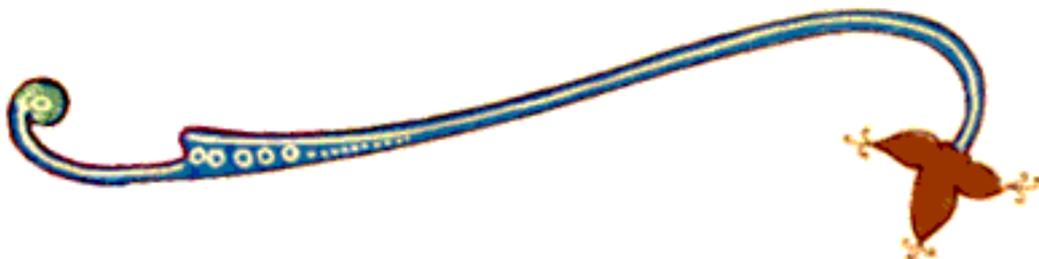

This part of the country, Coventry included, was particularly strong in its support of the Lancastrian party, and the king and queen consequently were often in residence here in the troublesome 1450s. The year prior to the visit to the city of Henry VI in September 1451 had been a particularly trying one. Henry's enemy the Duke of York was building support during his virtual exile in Ireland and, before September, word had come that the Duke was returning in force to England. Several of Henry's supporters, most notably the Duke of Suffolk, had been murdered. His possessions in France were falling in quick succession to the French armies. And Jack Cade led a popular uprising in Kent that caused the court to take flight to Kenilworth castle (near Coventry) and, although opposition from London eventually ended Cade's cause, led to a series of lesser uprisings in other counties. Small wonder then that the king expressed appreciation of the administration of Richard Boys, who had made strenuous efforts to bolster the city defences; and, when leaving the city, urged the authorities not to allow any riotous assemblies or citizens to develop political affiliations with the aristocratic factions then at odds in England.

Henry's visit provided the opportunity for the city ruler's to demonstrate their solidarity with their monarch, the source of their authority to rule. It will be noted how the members of city administration were distinguished by their apparel from other members of the community; even when all dressed in clothing of the same colour, the city rulers showed their superior status by wearing cloaks. The city authorities were by no means averse to capitalizing on Henry's gratitude to strengthen the powers of self-government.

In September 1456 less solemn celebrations were mounted for a visit from Henry's queen. At various points during its entry into the city, the royal entourage was met with pageants and speeches, performed by actors portraying biblical characters, saints, the cardinal virtues, and conquering heroes (such as Alexander, Arthur, and Charlemagne). From the market cross, passed along the route, angels swinging censers had been hung and pipes of wine had been opened so that the wine was flowing out freely. Such a parade must have delighted the townspeople as much as it did the queen.

The attachment to the Lancastrian cause waned somewhat as its fortunes ebbed and as the Earl of Warwick's influence rose in the region. In 1474 the infant Prince Edward was given much the same kind of pageant-based reception accorded Queen Margaret eighteen years earlier, with fewer speeches but more elaborate props and minstrels playing harp, lute, pipes, and organ.

NOTES

"worthy brethren"

The city councillors.

"Hazelwood"

A wooded area north of the city, but part of which lay within Coventry's liberties; the road to Leicester (via Nuneaton) ran through this area.

"Broad Oak"

An area of open land adjacent to the Leicester road.

"his mace"

A symbol of mayoral office. Mace and/or sword were the two symbols of power, as a lieutenant of the king, usually permitted to a mayor.

"priory"

This was the cathedral priory of Holy Trinity, not far within the northern wall of the city.

"recorder"

The city's principal legal advisor. Such men were usually recruited from the gentry and typically went on to impressive legal careers; Littleton, for example, who had been appointed the city's recorder in 1449 (at the age of 47), was made a sergeant-at-law in 1453 and left the city's service two years later, upon appointment as king's sergeant. After several years as justice of assizes and other roles in service to the king, he was appointed (1466) a Justice of the Common Bench, continuing as such until his death in 1481. As a learned, diplomatic person of respectable status, the recorder was often called upon to speak for the town.

"a space"

In the original Closette, a private area set aside exclusively for the king and his attendants.

"Bablake"

The church of St. John Baptist, which was the base for the Holy Trinity gild, the principal socio-religious gild of the city, closely linked with the corporation.

"freely"

The refusal of royal officials to accept any kind of fee or gratuity for transporting the royal gown as an offering to St. Michael's is itself considered worthy of note, as an exception to normal circumstances.

TRANSLATION

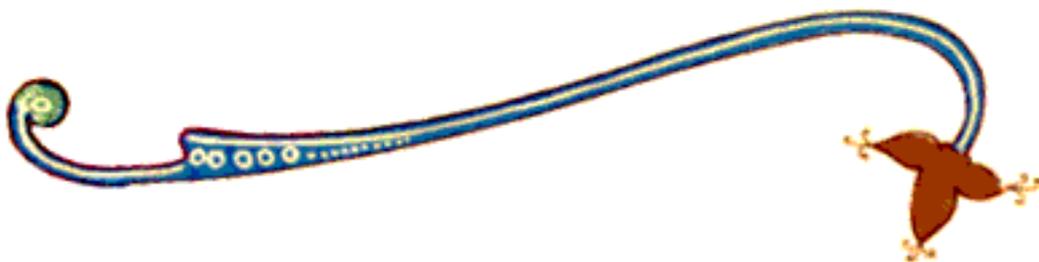

At the same time the commons of London made great sport and solemnity to the Prince. For upon the Monday next before the Purification of Our Lady, at night, and in the night, one hundred and thirty men were disguised and well mounted on horseback to go mumming to the said Prince, riding from Newgate through Cheapside, where many people could see them, with great noise of minstrelsy, trumpets, cornets, and shawms, and a great many wax torches lighted. The first forty-eight rode like esquires, two and two together, in coats and cloaks of red say or sendal, and had their faces covered with vizards, well and handsomely made. After these esquires came forty-eight like knights, well arrayed in the same manner. After the knights came one excellently arrayed and well mounted, as though he were an emperor; after him some one hundred paces came one nobly arrayed as a pope; after him came twenty-four arrayed like cardinals; and after the cardinals came eight or ten arrayed and with black masks like devils not at all amiable, seeming like legates. All these rode through London and over London bridge to Kennington, where the young Prince lived with his mother. The Duke of Lancaster, the earls of Cambridge, Hertford, Warwick, and Suffolk, and many other lords were there with him to behold the solemnity.

DISCUSSION

Mummers or mumming, or disguisings as it came to be known towards the close of the Middle Ages, had its origins in the performance of legends in which a hero was killed and restored to life; it therefore was largely a male activity and could get out of hand. Christmas was the season for mummers. The Purification of Our Lady, known as Candlemas (2 February), occurring 40 days after the birth of Jesus, when under the Law of Moses a mother could be cleansed of the impurity of giving birth), was therefore considered an extension of that midwinter festivity. It may be noted that curfew was evidently not applicable on occasions such as this.

NOTES

"Prince"

The Prince of Wales, shortly to become Richard II. He was doubtless fond of mummers and pageants, for his own coronation was celebrated with some of the most spectacular pageants seen up until then in England.

"Cheapside"

This route was typically chosen for processions, because one of the widest streets in medieval London.

"shawm"

A double-reed, woodwind instrument, sounding similar to an oboe.

"say or sendal"

Light, fine-quality cloths.

"vizards"

Painted masks shaped like visors.

TRANSLATION

The mayor and aldermen order, on behalf of the king and his city, that no-one whatsoever, regardless of status or position, during this holy season of Christmas be so bold as to walk about at night engaging in any fashion in mummary, plays, interludes, or any other form of dressing up in false beards, painted masks, or with faces made up or altered in any way; upon penalty of imprisonment and payment of a fine determined at the discretion of the mayor and aldermen. Except that it is lawful for every person to make merry in a respectable manner inside his own home. Furthermore, they order, on behalf of the king and his city, that each respectable person who resides in any street or lane of this city should hang from his house each night during this solemn festival a lantern containing a candle, burning for as long as it lasts, upon penalty for each default of 4d. paid to the Chamber.

Forasmuch as it is not becoming or agreeable to propriety that those who are in the service of reverend men, and from them or through them have the advantage of befitting food and raiment, as also, of reward or remuneration in a competent degree, should, after a perverse custom, be begging aught of people, like paupers; and seeing that in times past, every year at the Feast of Our Lord's Nativity [25 December], according to a certain custom, which has grown to be an abuse, the vadlets of the Mayor, the Sheriffs, and the Chamber of the said city, – persons who have food, raiment, and appropriate advantages, resulting from their office, – under colour of asking for an oblation, have begged many sums of money of brewers, bakers, cooks, and other victuallers; and in some instances have more than once threatened wrongfully to do them an injury if they should refuse to give them something; and have frequently made promises to others, that in return for a present they would pass over their unlawful doings in mute silence; to the great dishonour of their masters, and to the common loss of all the City: – therefore, on Wednesday, the last day of April, in the 7th year etc., by William Sevenok, the Mayor, and the Aldermen of London, it was ordered and established, that no vadlet or other serjeant of the Mayor, Sheriffs, or City, should in future beg or require of any person, of any rank, degree, or condition, whatsoever, any moneys, under colour of an oblation, or in any other way, on pain of losing his office.

DISCUSSION

Christmas was one festival season at which liturgical drama might be performed. The kind of "plays" referred to here, however, are unlikely to have been of that type – unless perverted or profaned in form. It seems more probable that those being banned were rather some kind of revelry – the predecessor to masques – tomfoolery, or just plain rowdiness, perhaps distantly inspired by the religious plays, but considered by the authorities inappropriate for Christmas. The passage suggests that Christmas was already taking on celebratory features in the modern sense.

Mummery in particular was a characteristic of "misrule", a concept closely associated with Christmas. In a mayoral order sent to the aldermen on 13

December 1405, they were reminded to keep a well-armed nightwatch patrolling the streets throughout the Christmas season, with special instructions to arrest anyone going about wearing a mask or a false face, and to ensure each house had its lantern burning outside during Christmas.

The second passage presents a different instance of misrule, in the form of begging for a Christmas "bonus" which – following a long tradition – has become in some cases an extortion (protection money). Christmas was typically a season at which officials received an instalment of their annual salary, but the bureaucratic officials (clerks, sergeants) might also – as at fifteenth century York – receive oblations (gratuities for good performance) on top.

NOTES

"interludes"

Relatively informal and short plays, involving few actors and little by way of props or costumes, and lasting under an hour.

[1. City ordinance of 1394]

It is agreed that all Corpus Christi pageants be performed in the places anciently assigned them, and not elsewhere than where advised by the mayor, bailiffs and their officers. If any pageant is presented contrary to this order, the craftsmen responsible for that pageant shall pay 6s.8d in the mayor's chamber, to the use of the community.

[2.] Expenses on the festival of Corpus Christi with gifts to lords' minstrels throughout the year [1396]

- They account for the dyeing of 4 cloths for use in the pageants, 4s.

- For transporting and bringing back timber for barriers in front of the king, 2s.1d
- To 8 porters for hauling and moving the pageants, 5s.4d
- For a new banner and its apparatus, 12s.2d.
- Towards the performances, 15s.4d.
- For bread, ale, wine, meat, and a fire for the mayor and reputable men on the day of the play, 18s.8d.
- To the gatekeeper of Holy Trinity for hosting the pageants, 4d.
- To minstrels on the feast of Corpus Christi, 13s.4d.
- For iron nails for repairing the pageants, 5d.
- For 20 "fursperres" for the barriers before the king, 5s.10d.
- To Robert Paton for carpentry in making a pageant, two days work, 12d.
- For the painting of the pageant, 2s.
- For 19 saplings bought from John de Craven for [making] the barriers, 6s.8d.
- To William de Barneby carpenter for his work on the same, 4s.4d.

Total: £4.11s.6d

- To visiting minstrels of the king and other lords, £7.7s.4d.

[3. Petition of the community to restrict the locations of the performances, 1398/99]

The community of the city of York petitions the honourable mayor and aldermen of the city that: Huge expenses and costs are incurred on the play and the pageants of Corpus Christi day, which cannot [all] be acted or performed on the same day (as they ought to be), because the pageants are acted in such a large number of locations, to the great damage and annoyance of the community and of outsiders who visit the city on that day for that reason. Considering that the pageants are maintained and supported by the community and craftsmen of the city, in honour and reverence of our Lord Jesus Christ and for the honour and benefit of the city, we ask you to ordain that the pageants be acted in the locations to which they were assigned and restricted by yourselves and the community in earlier times – the which locations are in a schedule attached to this petition – or in other locations each of which will be determined by the mayor and council. And that any and all who contravene the aforementioned ordinance and determination shall incur a penalty of 40s. payable to the council chamber of the city. And that if any of the pageants are tardy or dilatory [in progressing from location to location] due to default or negligence of the actors, they incur a penalty of 6s.8d to the chamber.

They implore that these matters be undertaken, or otherwise the play cannot be performed by the community. And this they beseech for God's and charity's sakes, for the benefit of the community and outsiders visiting the city, for the honour of God and fostering of charity among the common people.

The places where the Corpus Christi play shall be presented:

- first, at the gates of Holy Trinity in Micklegate;
- second, at the entrance to Robert Harpham's house;
- third, at the entrance of John de Gyseburne's house;
- fourth, at Skeldergate's end and North Street's end;
- fifth, at the end of Conyng Street opposite Castlegate;
- sixth, at the end of Jubretgate;
- seventh, at the entrance to Henry Wyman's house in Coney Street;
- eighth, at the end of Coney Street, next to the common hall;
- ninth, at the entrance to Adam del Brigg's house;
- tenth, at the gates of the monastery of St. Peter;
- eleventh, at the end Girdlergate, at Petergate;
- twelfth, on the Pavement.

It is ordained that banners for the play, [decorated] with the arms of the city, shall be made available by the mayor to the Corpus Christi pageants, for setting up in the locations where the pageants are to be performed. Those same banners must, each year on the day after Corpus Christi, be redelivered at the chamber into the hands of the mayor and chamberlains of the city, for storage during the year to follow, upon penalty of 6s.8d paid to the use of the community by any or all who hold on to those banners beyond the day after and do not return them as specified.

[4. Extracts from city ordinance of 1417]

The mayor, reputable men, and the whole community by unanimous agreement have ordained that all those who receive money for seating upon scaffolding, which they erect in the aforementioned places [i.e. the locations for performances] in front of their houses on communal land, must pay one third of the receipts to the city chamberlains to be applied to the use of the community. If they refuse to pay the one-third share or to make some other fair arrangement with the chamber, then the performance will be transferred to some other location selected at the discretion of the mayor at that time and of the city council; no-one being exempted from this ordinance, with the sole exception of a few owners of scaffolds in Micklegate....

... it is improper, and not to the advantage of the community, that the play be presented each year in the same particular locations and nowhere else, since everyone according to his status is doing his share of the work towards maintaining the performances. They have therefore unanimously ordained, for the benefit of the community, that the places where the play is performed may be changed, unless those before whose houses performances have previously been presented pay some fee to the community for that personal privilege which they have each year. And that in all years to come, for as long as the play continues to be performed, it shall be presented in front of the entranceways and houses of those who pay the best and largest [fee] to the chamber and show a preparedness to do more for the benefit of the whole community in order to have the play presented there; no favour being shown to any individual for his personal advantage, but taking into consideration only the public benefit of the whole community of York. The respectable gentleman John Moreton, in regard to his house, submitted completely to the decision and ruling of the mayor and council on the matter of the play being performed in front of his residence in Micklegate and other of his properties in the city.

It should not be ignored but instead committed to memory that the goldsmiths of the city of York have in previous years borne considerable and onerous expenses related to their two pageants in the Corpus Christi play. But now the world has changed for them; they have become poorer than they were in the past, because of the circumstances mentioned above. They have made repeated appeals to the mayor and council for grant of a subsidy that would lighten their insupportable burden. Or, failing that, for release from responsibility for one of their pageants and its associated expenses, which grow day by day, since they cannot much longer support the burden of both of the pageants without putting themselves in great difficulty. On the other hand, the masons of the city have been grumbling among themselves concerning their Corpus Christi play pageant, in which Fergus is scourged, because the subject of that pageant does not derive from holy scripture and has provoked shouting and laughter rather than evoked devout feelings. In consequence, arguments, quarrels and fights have occasionally broken out among audience members. Rarely, if ever, could they produce and perform their pageant in daylight, as preceding pageants did. Therefore the masons expressed a strong desire to be released from responsibility for that pageant and assigned a different one, which would be based on holy scripture and could be produced and performed in daylight. To have their wishes fulfilled, both groups petitioned and beseeched the mayor and council for their consent and favour in the matter. Whereupon the mayor, Thomas Snaudon, and the aldermen and council of the city chamber, sympathizing with the wishes and desires of the men of those crafts and considering them valid, decided that the goldsmiths should have their burden lessened by relieving them of one of their pageants – that is, Herod. Similarly, the masons and their gild should be released from the pageant of Fergus, taking over [instead] the pageant of Herod for which the goldsmiths had formerly been responsible, producing it at their own expense and performing it in a proper fashion that would bring credit to the city, as part of the Corpus Christi play, as often as that play would be performed in the city.

DISCUSSION

These various extracts are indicative of the amount of trouble and expense the city underwent to organize and present the Corpus Christi play, a burden it shared with the guilds supporting the individual pageants. The city put its stamp on the event through the banners bearing city arms, set up at authorized performance locations, and later permitted to be mounted above each pageant – in place of signs advertising the trade of the guilds producing each pageant.

One recurring problem was regulating the locations for presentations of the pageants. It may have been that the guilds were bribed by wealthy townsmen to stop and perform before those townsmen's houses. The large number of individual pageants, combined with the large number of performance locations – swollen by unscheduled stops – may well have impeded progress to the point of failure to complete the route during the day. Just possibly some such embarrassment may have occurred when Richard II attended the performance in 1396 (two weeks after granting the city a new charter).

The wagons were stored in one or more communal buildings on Toft Green, in the southwestern corner of the city; these storage sheds came to be known as Ratton Row. It was natural, therefore, for the route of the performances to begin outside the Benedictine priory at the southern end of Micklegate, not far from the town wall; just possibly the pageant scenery was erected on the wagons within the priory walls, and the cavalcade emerged from there. The wagons then trundled northeastwards along Micklegate, stopping before the homes of two citizens – master-weaver Robert Harpham and ex-mayor John Gyseburn – and again at the junction where North Street and Skeldergate ran into Micklegate, before crossing the Ouse at the only bridge then in existence. A short distance beyond the bridge up Ousegate, they reached a junction with Coney Street (west) and Castlegate (east), and gave another performance. Turning up Coney Street (the name meaning King Street), they stopped en route at the junction with Jubbergate (now Market Street), in front of the house of a prosperous merchant (and future mayor), and outside the hall that served for large political meetings. Further along Coney Street, they headed northwards up Stonegate; there they stopped at Adam del Brigg's house, then travelled on to where Stonegate ended, at the boundary of the Minster precinct. After a presentation near the Minster gates, they turned eastwards along Petergate and presented again at its junction with Church Street (formerly Girdlergate) then continued on until reaching the Pavement (a wide paved street) where the final presentation was given by All Saints church. From here it was a short distance south via Ousegate to the bridge and the route back along Micklegate. Part of the complaint of the masons seems to point to the problems which occurred with the large number of pageants combined with large number of stations; those coming last in the process were still performing after daylight had faded. As the final pageant, the Last Judgement, was put on by the powerful mercers guild, any complaint they might have had in this regard would have been influential.

At a meeting of the city authorities in June 1417, one item of business was the confirmation of ordinances stemming from the petition of 1398/99, including the stations for the presentation of pageants, which were described in almost the same terms (although "formerly of" was inserted in front of the names of most of the individuals outside whose houses presentations were to be made). Provisions about the banners were likewise reiterated. Two additions were made, a few days apart, to this ordinance to capitalize on the benefits to certain private citizens from the stations appointed for performances: intangible benefits in terms of social status, but also concrete profits from charging the audience for superior viewing-points; the city felt it should share in the revenues. Councillor John Moreton – being one of the citizens personally benefiting – evidently opposed this at first, but later gave way to majority opinion; he was elected mayor the following year. The city's resentment of the private profits being made from the pageants was doubtless partly due to the fact that costs related to the pageant were a regular item in its own budget. A grant in 1478 to two fishmongers to have the pageants performed between their properties, on the Ousegate side of the Ouse Bridge, shows that the city received 11s. annually for this licence fee; the grant was made for twelve years. The 1486/87 city chamberlains accounts show an income of £4.13s.4d. from 66 "locations" (presumably including both the licences for performance stations and taxes on viewing stands), although 12 other locations, in the Pavement, had not found lessees – perhaps these last stations were less popular because of the late hour at which the final presentations took place there. This represented only a small percentage of the city's total annual income.

The resentment felt by the city may have been exacerbated by the occasional complaints from some of the guilds about the burdensome expense to their members of mounting the pageants. The coopers guild, for example, requested the city authorities adopt an ordinance requiring that anyone who set up shop as a master-cooper should straightway pay a fee of 6s.8d, half going to the city and the other half towards the cost of the pageant. And in 1421 several minor guilds requested that their assignments be amalgamated into a single play, towards whose production costs all of the guilds would contribute (although arguments soon broke out between these guilds as to the amount of contributions). For a number of years in the same period the smiths and marshals (blacksmiths) were demanding – on the grounds of encroachment by each on the trade of the other – contributions towards the production costs of its pageant; arbitration finally decided that one representative from each guild should work together to collect the "pageant silver" from members of both guilds, with the sum collected being put towards production of both pageants. The plea from the goldsmiths again is testimony of what was perceived as a high expense, although we must allow for some exaggeration from the petitioners. Nonetheless, the play overall remained popular, and performances continued well into the sixteenth century.

I.e. office – in this case probably the financial (chamberlains') office.

Proclamation [concerning] the Corpus Christi play performed on the eve of Corpus Christi Hear ye, etc. On behalf of the king and the mayor and sheriffs of this city, we order that no-one is to go about in the city armed with sword or Carlisle-axe, nor any other weapon, so as to disturb the king's peace or the play, or to obstruct the Corpus Christi procession. They are to leave their harness in their inns – except in the cases of knights and respectable squires, who have their swords carried after them – upon penalty of confiscation of their weapons and imprisonment. Those men who present the pageants are to perform at the places assigned them, and nowhere else, upon penalty of the fine already established; that is, 40s. The craftsmen and all other men who have to provide torches are to proceed out in good array, in the fashion which has previously been the custom, carrying the pageant lights; none are to be bearing weapons. Officers responsible for keeping the peace, upon penalty of disfranchisement and imprisonment, ... [see note]. All craftsmen are to present their pageants in an orderly fashion, according to sequence, using good performers properly costumed and reciting audibly, upon penalty of 100s. to be paid to the chamber without any remission. All performers who are to take part are to be ready at the proper time – that is, at the half-hour between 4 and 5 in the morning; with each of the pageants following each other, according to the sequence, in a timely manner without dawdling, upon penalty of 6s.8d. paid to the chamber.

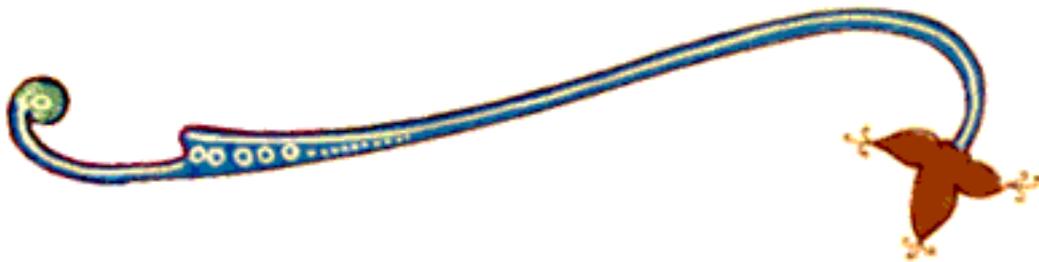

DISCUSSION

This set of orders suggests that the celebrations on Corpus Christi day had become an opportunity for trouble-making by rowdier elements, or a venue for bringing rivalries to a violent head. Such problems were not easy to resolve; we hear again, in 1419, that while participating in the Corpus Christi procession the skimmers were assaulted by members of the carpenters' and tawyers' guilds. Further evidence from the next decade indicates that the Corpus Christi festival was far from being a solemn religious ceremony, but was an excuse – at least among some elements of the city populace, as well as some of the visitors from outside – for general raucous behaviour.

The orders also reflect the continual difficulty with keeping the large number of presentations sequenced in an orderly fashion that adhered to a schedule and specific locations for performance. A simulation of the sequencing/timing of performances at the different stations has estimated that it would have required 20 hours to complete the entire cycle of 48 presentations at each of the 12 stations, assuming everything ran smoothly and there were no unscheduled stops (as there evidently were), with each wagon taking about 3 hours to complete the route. This estimation is based upon assumptions regarding the lengths of each performance and the speed and coordination with which wagons moved from station to station, and the assumption that all pageants were presented each year; all of which historians debate. That the different pageants varied considerably in length – performance time ranging between 5 and 30 minutes – must have made smooth transitions near to impossible: some stations would have been without any performances for periods, while other stations would have the next wagon waiting for the previous to finish. Even though the daylight hours were relatively long in northern England at this time of year, the last pageants must have been performing in twilight or the dark (as some complaints attest).

In addition we see a concern for the quality of the presentations. Craftsmen were not necessarily good actors (as Shakespeare reflected through Bottom's troupe in A Midsummer Night's Dream). A later ordinance (1476) required four of the most capable actors in the city to ensure the quality of production of the pageants, including auditioning performers and discharging any not up to the demands of theatrical performance. At the same time, it was prohibited for any performer to undertake more than two roles (again Bottom is recalled), suggesting either that the more capable guildsmen were being over-used or perhaps even that professionals were being employed by some of the guilds.

"harness"

In this context, harness refers to the accoutrements worn for carrying weapons. This phrase also indicates how the plays and the procession must have attracted visitors from outside the city, some perhaps coming for other entertainment than just the official events.

[latter half of text]

The latter half of this text is not the original version, but written in a different hand over an erasure. The erasure probably explains why the sentence concerning keepers of the peace is truncated and lacks verb and object.

"chamber"

Refers to the financial office of city government.

TRANSLATION

[1. Leet court session, 15 April 1428]

Memorandum that at [this session] the smiths of Coventry put forward a petition in the following words: "To the honorable mayor, recorder, bailiffs, and to all your wise councillors, the craft of smiths informs you that they were discharged from [assisting with] the cutlers' pageant by a leet in the time when John Gote was mayor and [by] mutual acquittances made between the two crafts, as is well known and as they are ready to prove. And now, when Giles Allesley was lately in the mayoralty, he requested the smiths craft to take on the production of that pageant during his term of office, and no longer. The craft willingly did so, to please him. The result of which is that the pageant has again been assigned to the craft, although it is by no means their responsibility to undertake it. They therefore beseech you to be so good as to discharge the craft of smiths from the pageant, for the sake of God and the truth, and assign it to some other [craft] which your wisdom tells you would be a better choice." Which petition, by the counsel of all the worthy [men] of the leet, and everyone else in attendance on the leet, was answered and endorsed thus: "It is ordained that the smiths shall henceforth take charge of the pageant every year, upon penalty for default of £10 to be paid to the use of the chamber."

[2. Leet court session, 22 April 1441]

It is ordained that Robert Eme and all the others who perform at the festival of Corpus Christi are to perform well and properly, so that no problems occur in any of the plays. Upon penalty of 20s. for each default, levied by the mayor and chamberlains for application to [maintenance of] the [town] wall.

[3. Ordinances regarding the pageant of the cardmakers, saddlers, masons and painters crafts, 1444]

By the recommendation of the mayor and his council, it is ordained that the 4 crafts shall associate with each other in bearing the costs, charges, and all other payments regarding their pageant and their association.... Also, every member of the crafts is to pay annually to the masters 12d. and all other customary and lawful payments that relate to the pageants and to the association.... Also that no man of the 4 crafts is to perform in any pageant on Corpus Christi day except that pageant of his own craft, unless he has permission from the mayor then in office.

[4. The Queen visits on 15 June 1457]

On the evening before Corpus Christi the queen came by night from Kenilworth to Coventry. She did not wish to be greeted formally on that occasion, but came privately to see the play there on the following day. And she then saw all the pageants performed, except Doomsday, which could not be presented because daylight ran out. She was lodged at the grocer Richard Wood's [house], where Richard Sharp once lived, and all the plays were performed there first. On which occasion the mayor and his associates sent her a gift comprising the following: that is, 300 demesne loaves, a pipe of red wine, a dozen plump capons, a dozen large pike, a large basket full of "Pescodes" and another basket full of pippins and oranges, two coffers of confectioneries, and a pot of green ginger. She was accompanied at that time by the following lords and ladies: that is, the Duke of Buckingham, his wife, and all their children; Lord Rivers and his wife; the dowager Countess of Shrewsbury and the Countess of Shrewsbury; and many other lords and ladies.

[5. Leet court session, 19 April 1460]

It is ordained that every craft that has a pageant to perform is to make preparations for the pageant and have it ready to be performed, upon penalty of 100s. to be levied from the 4 masters of the crafts that fail to comply.

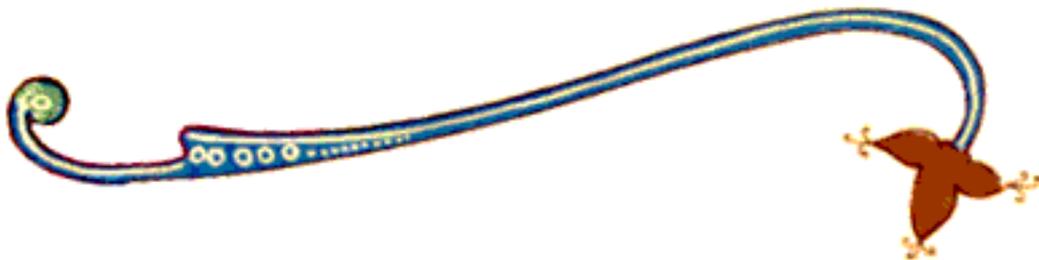

DISCUSSION

A gild dedicated to Corpus Christi was founded at Coventry in 1348; around this period such gilds were springing up in many towns for the purpose of organizing a procession to celebrate that festival. It may have been around the same time that the city fair which, in 1218, had been granted to be held following Trinity Sunday, became known as the Corpus Christi fair. We hear nothing explicit of the Corpus Christi plays until the next century, but reference to a pageant house in 1392 suggests that they were already being performed then, and in 1416 the pageants were said to have been performed before the king and his nobles; they were to be performed for the enjoyment of royalty several times during the century, and Coventry became renowned for the quality of its plays. The pageants probably took place after the early morning procession – itself an exciting affair, with the streets decked out with freshly-leafed boughs, town officers in their official robes and craftsmen in their liveries, the city waits playing musical accompaniment, and the ringing of church bells in the background. There were several stations at which plays were performed, probably chosen in part because they could accommodate a crowd.

The Corpus Christi plays are mentioned only briefly in the Coventry records, and texts of only two of the plays have survived, but it is clear that there was a similar cycle to that performed in other towns. Some of the texts may have been copied or adapted from those elsewhere, and the plays evolved through frequent rewriting. There does not seem to have been at Coventry the degree of local government supervision over the performances that we see at York, except insofar as the city government was concerned to ensure the guilds acted responsibly in fulfilling their duties in presenting the plays. We can see from the above extracts and other references that at Coventry, as elsewhere, there were problems with the financial burden of putting them on. It was not only a question of the regular yearly pageants; when royalty visited the town there were often special presentations of selected plays from the Corpus Christi repertoire, or pageants of a pseudo-historical bent, with the Corpus Christi props sometimes being called upon.

To address the financial difficulties various steps were taken. In 1424, a settlement of disputes between the master weavers and the journeymen of that craft included the requirement that journeymen contribute 4d. annually to the cost of the weavers' pageant. In 1435 it was ordered that the saddlers and painters join with the cardmakers in financing and mounting the latter's pageant. The pinner and needlers were joined in supporting their pageant by the tilers and wrights at some time before 1436, when the carpenters were added as well; the coopers joined this consortium in 1459. Partnerships between crafts continued to be a trend throughout the century and into the next.

NOTES

"John Gote"

Mayor in 1420.

"Giles Allesley"

Mayor in 1427.

"endorsed"

Not approved, as we would use "endorsed" today, but simply meaning that the response was written onto the dorse of the petition. The response took the form of an approval, in essence.

"problems"

The Latin impedicio implies the kind of problems that might disturb or hold up a performance; since the target of the ordinance is the actors, we may surmise past problems with the actors perhaps becoming embroiled in arguments.

"Kenilworth"

A village with castle a few miles southeast of Coventry; a common refuge for the beleaguered king and queen.

"demesne loaves"

Paynemaynes (panis dominicus), a high quality bread produced for consumption by lords.

"capons"

Roosters castrated to improve edibility.

"Pescodes"

Unknown; perhaps some kind of fruit, although the London Lickpenny refers to the sale of "Hot peascods".

"pippins"

A type of apple.

TRANSLATION

At a town council meeting held at Leicester on 26 March 1477 the actors who had performed the Passion play the previous year presented a petition regarding payment of debts and concerning whether the passion [\[play\]](#) should be made the responsibility of the craft gilds or not. At that time the actors turned over to the pageants the money they had received for performing the play in the past, and all the costumes and other items they had at the time. And at the same meeting, by the advice of the community, there were chosen the persons hereafter named to organize and direct [\[the performance of\]](#) the play.

DISCUSSION

The Passion play in some places (e.g. York) was part of the Corpus Christi cycle of plays – although they more commonly dealt primarily with Old Testament events – and in others was presented at Easter. It focused on the events surrounding the death of Christ, although in its fullest representation might encompass events from throughout his life. Emerging out of liturgical dramatic representation, it is known as a play in its own right from as early as the beginning of the thirteenth century (in Italy). In England, the Passion play was second in popularity only to the Corpus Christi play.

A list of 19 townsmen and two bealdes were named to take charge of the next performance. Here as at other towns, the borough authorities felt a vested interest in the performance of the pageants and did not wish to leave the matter entirely to the craft guilds.

"town council"

The original does not talk about a "town council" per se but uses the term "common hall", which means in essence 'a gathering of community representatives in the town hall'. The "community" which gave advice to the decision taken at the meeting may have meant whichever burgesses were in attendance – a common hall being open to all freemen – or perhaps already a group of representatives foreshadowing the formal lower council of 48 whose constitutional existence was confirmed in 1489.

"debts"

It is not clear from the document whether the debts that were the subject of the actors' petition were owed to or by the actors; Mary Bateson thought the latter. Either possibility could have encouraged the actors to try to have responsibility for the play transferred to others.

[1.] Ordinance for the perpetual performance of the Corpus Christi play

On 3 April 1411, to the praise and honour of God and Corpus Christi and for the peaceful unity of the worthier and the lesser of the commons of the town of Beverley, a restrained negotiation took place involving William Rolleston merchant, Nicholas de Ryse, Adam Tirwhitt, John de Holme, William Wilton, Adam Barker and other respectable men of the worthier sort, who do not – unlike those belonging to other crafts of Beverley – have liveries each year nor are otherwise involved in performing the play, [on the question of] whether the worthy men should (even though they were not accustomed to previously) at their own expense mount, support and arrange to be performed, in a fitting and creditable manner, a particular pageant on the festival of Corpus Christi. Regarding which, those worthy men, on behalf of themselves and others of their sort, insofar as as they were able, agreed to accept the decision and judgement of Richard Aglyon, Thomas Coppandale senior, William Dalton, William Melburne, and their associates, the 12 keepers of the community of the town of Beverley.

Those 12 keepers gave the following judgement: that, around the festival of Corpus Christi coming in the present year, the worthier sort should – through [the agency of] four of them and the supervision of the 12 keepers of the community in office at that time – at their own costs and expenses cause to be constructed a fit and proper pageant and a suitable play to be performed therein, under penalty of 40s. to be levied from the worthy men for the use of the community.

Furthermore, so that the honour of God and good reputation of the town be glorified with greater devotion and respect, as many as were present of the aldermen and stewards of the crafts in Beverley – viz. mercers, drapers, tanners, weavers, tailors, leather-workers, watermen, dyers, fullers, saddlers, bakers, butchers, smiths, skimmers, and others – on behalf of themselves, their crafts, and the whole community, insofar as they were able, agreed to accept the decision of the 12 keepers regarding both the erection of castles and the maintenance of the Corpus Christi play.

Whereupon the keepers announced their decision: that each and every craft accustomed to erect and have a wooden castle in honour of God and St. John of Beverley, or doing so in the future, shall from henceforth and forever erect them each year and cover them with greater ornamentation than is customary, under penalty of 6s.8d to be levied from any craft failing to do so, for whatever reason. And that every year from now on they shall perform those pageants of the Corpus Christi play which they have been accustomed to perform, and which shall be assigned to them at the discretion of the sworn governors of the town, when given a reasonable amount of advance warning by the 12 keepers. And that the worthier men of the town shall, as indicated above, henceforth each year arrange for a presentation to be performed in their pageant. Under penalty of 40s. to be levied to the use of the community for failure to do this, whether by the worthier or the lesser of the community. If any individual, whether of the worthier or the lesser sort, refuses to perform or have performed [the pageant], he shall pay 3s.4d to the use of the community, plus his share of the 40s. should it happen that any craft or pageant default in its entirety.

[2.] Ordinance regarding the performance by the hairers of Beverley, called "Paradise"

On 13 January, 1391, John de Erghes hairer came into the gildhall before the twelve keepers of the town of Beverley, and undertook on behalf of himself and his fellow craftsmen to perform properly a certain play called Paradise every year on Corpus Christi day, when the other craftsmen of the town perform, at the cost of the same John Erghes while he is alive. He willingly granted that he will pay to the community of Beverley 10s. each and every occasion when he defaults in [producing] the play, Nicholas Fauconer being his pledge. In addition he undertook, under penalty of 20s., that at the end of his life he would redeliver to the 12 keepers of the town in office at that time all the items in his possession that pertain to the play, viz.: 1 wagon, 8 hasps, 18 staples, 2 visors, 2 angel wings, 1 pine beam, 1 serpent, 2 pairs of linen hose, 2 pairs of undershirts, 1 sword.

[3.] Allocation of the Corpus Christi play [1450]

Memorandum that the pageants of the Corpus Christi play are assigned to be performed as written below. First at the North Bar. Again at the Bullring. Again at the house of John Skipwith. Again next at the Fishmarket. Again between the [? illegible] and the bell-tower. Again at the Minster. Again at the stream.

[4.] Penalty paid by the butchers regarding the Corpus Christi play

On 5 June 1459, Thomas Law, alderman of the butchers gild of Beverley, and other fellow gildsmen came into the Gildhall of Beverley and handed over 40s. of English money to the disposal of the community, because they and their players had been late in arriving at the North gates of Beverley for performing their pageant last Corpus Christi day, contrary to the ordinance on that matter. Of which 40d. was received and the rest remitted, on condition they not do it again.

[5.] Performance of the Pater Noster play this year

On 29 May 1467, the various crafts of the town of Beverley agreed to perform the Pater Noster play within Beverley on Sunday, 2 August 1467. Those agreeing: merchants, glovers, sailors, barbers, barkers, tilers, smiths, coopers, fletchers, walkers, weavers, tailors, leather-workers, dyers, bakers, labourers, cellarers, brewers.

Records [of the decision?] were delivered to: the barbers, glovers, sailors, tanners, fletchers, coopers, fishermen, butchers, bakers, weavers, tailors, smiths, carpenters, leather-workers, fullers, dyers, tilers, labourers, cellarers, brewers, merchants.

Places assigned for performances: first at the North Bar, the Bullring, at the threshold of Richard Conton's house, in the High Street, at Cross Bridge, the Wednesday Market, Minster Bow, and Beckside.

Plays: Pride, Envy, Anger, Avarice, Sloth, Gluttony, Lust, Cruelty.

The crafts and misteries were assigned to perform the said play. All the venerable men and craftsmen were assigned to perform different pageants within Pater Noster, as shown below:

- To the pageant Cruelty: gentlemen, merchants, clerks, and yeomen; Roger Kelk and John Copy have been appointed aldermen of that pageant.
- To the pageant Pride: shoemakers, goldsmiths, glovers, glasiers, skinnners, and fishermen; William Downes has been appointed alderman.
- To the pageant Lust: dyers, walkers, weavers, pinner, cardmakers, wire-drawers; Robert Johnson has been appointed alderman
- To the pageant Sloth: watermen, husbandmen, labourers, saddlers, ropers, creelmen, millers, and furbishers; Richard Bliton has been appointed alderman.
- To the pageant Gluttony: bakers, vintners, brewers, cooks, tilers; John Spaldyng has been appointed alderman.

- To the pageant Envy: butchers, wrights, coopers, fletchers, pateners; John Wod has been appointed alderman.
- To the pageant Avarice: tailors, masons, braziers, plumbers, cutlers; Nicholas Gedney has been appointed alderman.
- To the pageant Anger: tanners, barbers, smiths, and painters; John Robynson has been appointed alderman.

DISCUSSION

In the late Middle Ages Beverley was a thriving seaport and more prominent among the towns of England, in terms of wealth and comparative population, than it is today. Its church of St. John, a pilgrimage site and sanctuary since the late Saxon period, had become an archepiscopal minster in the eleventh century; the town had developed as a community serving the needs of the minster and its visitors, and the archbishop was the town's lord. It is not surprising, therefore, to find Beverley as one of the places where a Corpus Christi play evolved. An ordinance of 1390 lists 38 gilds required to put on parts of the play; whether each had its own pageant or there were partnerships is not revealed, but 37 plays were listed in the early sixteenth century. However, at Beverley the craft gilds were not as formally structured as at York; only about half were sufficiently organized to be electing aldermen to lead them, and there were frequent amalgamations of the smaller crafts.

No copies of the scripts performed at Beverley have survived, but there are ample references in the town records to indicate that performances were an annual occurrence from at least 1377, when the tailors were ordered to present a financial account of their costs in producing their part of the play. A later document – a petition which was probably adopted as an ordinance (1457) – reflects that there had been some slacking off, since its aim was to reaffirm that the play would be presented every year. In the years immediately previous there are instances of the authorities taking the fishermen and carpenters to task for failing to put on their parts of the play, the skimmers were receiving a financial subsidy from the borough to help pay costs of its pageant, and the hairers had turned over to the ropers production of "Paradise". It seems that from the 1430s the play was not being performed annually, and even after 1457 there may not have been performances every year. All this evidence shows that, as at York, the urban authorities were regulating and supervising the performances by the various guilds, although in mid-fourteenth century a guild of Corpus Christi, consisting mainly of priests, had been founded to organize the procession itself. Borough control is again indicated by the fining of the smiths in 1392 for failing to put on their part (the Ascension) of the play, although the fine was remitted upon humble submission by the leaders of the guild and writing of a bond guaranteeing no future defaults.

The procession that took place on Corpus Christi day also came to be regulated by borough authorities; in 1430 the keepers ordered that the guild alderman and stewards represent their guilds, without any additional guild members, in the carrying of candles or torches in the procession, and the precise order in which each of the guild representatives would appear in the procession was laid out. A few weeks before Corpus Christi there was another procession, in Rogation week, in which the shrine of St. John of Beverley was carried from the minster to St. Mary's church, passing liveried members of the craft guilds stationed at points along the way, then later back again with the guildsmen now joining in the procession. This was an even older tradition than Corpus Christi and more important in Beverley, since the tomb of St. John was the focus of pilgrimage. But whereas Rogation Day was an occasion for the guilds to display their wealth and status, Corpus Christi was more an opportunity for the expression and reinforcement of communal solidarity. Taken together, the period from Rogation Day to Corpus Christi was the ceremonial apex of the year for the townspeople of Beverley.

The Rogation procession was a case of a "performance" passing fixed audience points. In the case of the Corpus Christi play, the evidence from mid-fifteenth century suggests a similar approach of a series of stations at which each pageant was performed; although the number of stations was fewer than that at York, the fining of the butchers for starting late suggests that the total number of presentations to be made on Corpus Christi day required a strict schedule to be followed. A list of stations in 1449 had some small differences. The route of the play seems to have been a linear one beginning at the northern entrance into the town, south-eastwards along the High Street, passing through the Saturday and Wednesday marketplaces – the latter formerly serving as the fishmarket – until the Minster was reached, when the pageants verred eastwards for a final presentation beside the Beck (a tributary of the River Hull), where there was a prosperous suburb.

Despite the apparent reluctance of some guilds to participate in the Corpus Christi play, it was evidently popular enough to introduce another play later in the summer, the Pater Noster, whose component parts featured the Seven deadly sins, in this case expanded with an eighth (Cruelty). Although the 1467 orders have the appearance of establishing the performance, the Pater Noster play is mentioned as early as 1441, when the performance was given on 23 June, and the assignments of part of the play to specific groups was quite different from that of 1467. Production of this play was apparently under the supervision of a gild of the same name, possibly created for that purpose.

"liveries"

These were the 'uniforms' worn by at least the more prosperous members of each gild on ceremonial occasions, to identify them with a particular craft; poorer craftsmen could not afford these liveries.

"12 keepers"

The keepers, or governors as they came to be known during the 15th century, were the town council, similar to Ipswich's capital portmen and Maldon's wardemen but, from the early 14th century, the sole source of governmental authority – Beverley not having, with the exception of brief experimental intervals, a chief executive officer at the head of its urban administration (except insofar as the merchant gild's alderman represented burgess interests in 12th and 13th centuries).

"pageant"

Leach translated pagenda more literally as the physical stage, and ludus as the pageant or play. It does appear that ludus might be used for either; however, I prefer to interpret pagenda as possibly including not only the stage itself but also any associated backdrop scenery or props.

"castles"

It is not clear whether the castles had any association with the play. Other references indicate they were wooden frameworks with decorative coverings (perhaps ad hoc, e.g. bedspreads of gildsmen) large enough to hold a number of persons sitting or standing, and served as shelters from which leading gildsmen watched the procession of St. John in Rogation week. Each gild that was formally recognized by the borough authorities had its own castle, and each castle was reserved solely for the members of a gild – thus, a presence in the castle on ceremonial occasions defined and publicized gild membership. Each gild had a particular spot in the town reserved for its castle. Whether they may have been brought out again for the Corpus Christi performance is not clear, although other evidence suggests that only the keepers watched from a castle on that occasion.

"St. John of Beverley"

A bishop of York who retired ca.714 to a monastery traditionally considered the magnet for settlers who founded Beverley. Bishop John's tomb at Beverley acquired a reputation for miracles and, whether or not the tradition is historically reliable, the town became a moderately important religious centre from the 10th century, thanks in part to royal patronage, and in part to the efforts of the archbishops of York in building up the minster and its powers, as well as in having John canonized. Edward the Confessor made the archbishop the lord of Beverley. (A somewhat similar process is seen at Bury St. Edmunds.)

"hasps" "staples"

The hasps were either part of the harnessry for the wagon or hardware associated with the erection of a backdrop on the wagon. The staples likewise were probably required for fixing in place a backdrop.

"visors"

Probably masks for the actors.

"Bullring"

Where bulls were baited before being slaughtered for sale in the butchery. In 1449 the allocation of sites had specified "next to the Bullring". It was located at the northern end of the main (Saturday) marketplace.

"house of John Skipwith"

In 1449 Skipwith's house was indicated as being in the High Street.

"illegible"

All Leach could read of this word were the first few letters cer.... Possibilities include an alehouse, sail-yard, weathercock, fishpond, butchery, or a round tower. The location evidently lay between the Wednesday Market and the Minster, so we can probably rule out the butchery, as this is believed to have been in the northern part of the Saturday Market.

"cellarers"

This would be an unusual craft in a town, unless it refers to a group specializing in providing storage facilities for merchandize. The original Latin may be tellarii rather than cellarii, suggesting craftsmen associated with the cloth industry.

"creelmen"

A kind of porter, distinguished by (and named after) the type of baskets they used for carrying goods from the quayside into town.

"furbishers"

Armourers.

TRANSLATION

As to the beginning of the said gild, be it known that, once on a time, a play, setting forth the goodness of the Lord's Prayer, was played in the city of York; in which play all manner of vices and sins were held up to scorn, and the virtues were held up to praise. This play met with so much favour that many said:—"Would that this play could be kept up in the city, for the health of souls and for the comfort of the citizens and neighbours." Hence, the keeping up of that play in times to come, for the health and amendment of the souls as well of the upholders as of the hearers of it, became the whole and sole cause of the beginning and fellowship of the bretheren of this brotherhood.

....they are bound to make, and as often as need be to renew, a table showing the whole meaning and use of the Lord's Prayer, and to keep this hanging against a pillar in the said cathedral church near to the aforesaid candle-bearer. Also they are bound, as often as the said play of the Lord's Prayer is played in the city of York, to ride with the players thereof through the chief streets of the city of York; and, the more becoming to mark themselves while thus riding, they must all be clad in one suit. And, to ensure good order during the said play, some of the bretheren are bound to ride or to walk with the players until the play is wholly ended.

...There do not belong to the gild any rents of land, nor any tenements, nor any goods save only the properties needed in the playing of the before-named play; which properties are of little or no worth for any other purpose than the said play. And the gild has one wooden chest, in which the said properties are kept.

DISCUSSION

The document of which only a few extracts are given here was one of numerous whose production was the result of a national survey of guilds and fraternities ordered by a parliament of 1388; the survey wanted information about when guilds had come into existence, what purposes they served, and what property they owned. Most that replied were fairly typical socio-religious guilds.

In the present case, however, the gild had been created specifically to produce the Pater Noster play, although it had other characteristics similar to typical guilds (e.g. charitable works, burial of members, annual feast). Its return does not state when it was founded, but Wycliffe had made mention in 1378 of performance of the Pater Noster play in York. In 1399 the gild had 76 male and 57 female members. To prepare its feast, 6 cooks were hired with 4 women to help them; the menu included beef, pork, calves feet, sucking pigs, young pigeons, eggs, honey, wine, and ale. In the mid-fifteenth century the gild united with St. Anthony's Gild, which henceforth took responsibility for production of the play. Although it was not performed every year, performances were still going on as late as 1558 when the Pater Noster was performed instead of the Corpus Christi play.

NOTES

"Lord's Prayer"

The Lord's Prayer has and had a prominent place in Church liturgy. That name (oratio dominica) was not actually used much during the Middle Ages, however. The prayer, which was said in Latin, was better known by its opening words, in Latin Pater noster.

"one suit"

I.e. everyone was to dress in the same uniform or livery.

[1. Payments for services, 6 October 1423]

They ordain that Richard Waite, for the good service he has given to the city of Coventry and for the long time he has spent in that service, shall have during the rest of his life [a pension of] 13s.4d from the Trinity Guild, 6s.8d. from the Corpus Christi Guild, and 20s. from the wardens of the City.

Also, they have retained Matthew Ellerton, Thomas Sendell, William Howton and John Trumpere as minstrels for the city of Coventry, and [agreed] that they shall have the same [salary] that others have had before them. They shall also receive each quarter from every [dwelling] place with a hall 1d, and from every cottage a halfpenny; and may receive a better reward depending on their performance. And they ordain that two men from every ward shall be available to them each quarter to help them collect their quarterly fees.

[2. Minstrels' uniforms, 7 April 1442]

They wish that they [i.e. the minstrels] should have a livery, as this bill requests, on condition that they have a trumpeter, as is mentioned in [the bill], and escutcheons, upon providing security. That is, they shall have a dozen of cloth for their livery, of the value of 20s. to be paid them by the wardens shortly before the festival of Corpus Christi.

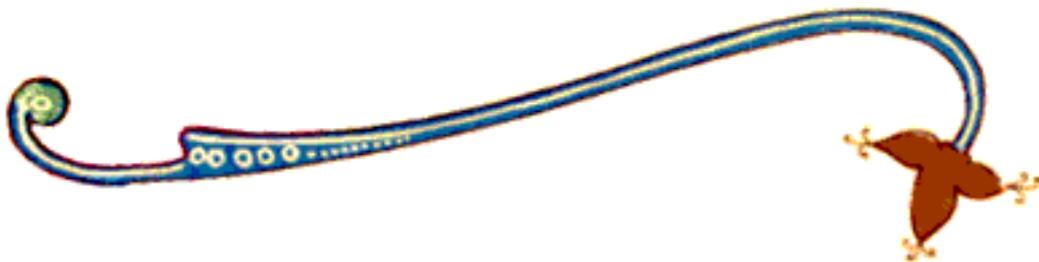

DISCUSSION

It was increasingly common during the fifteenth century for towns to include minstrels, also known as waits, among the lesser bureaucracy or to engage minstrels for particular occasions. This was an age when medieval urban ceremonialism reached a peak, as social stratification hardened and a need was felt to make and reinforce wealth-based social status in public settings. It was also an age when towns became increasingly caught up in the national political conflict, and felt it advisable to win the favour and support, or ward off the disfavour, of powerful and influential men by sending them presents, or hosting them at banquets which were often accompanied by musical entertainment.

In fact it was precisely those influential men who were the early employers of minstrels. From the 1330s the borough financial accounts from Lynn refer to payments to various visiting minstrel groups named for their employers, such as those of the Earl of Suffolk, Lord Bardolf, the Duke of Lancaster, the King of Scotland, Sir Robert Mortimer, and Lord Scales, or to the king's minstrels, as well as to solo artists playing gittern, harp, trumpet or other instruments; other minstrels paid had no identified affiliation with a patron. At an earlier date (1280s) the Merchant Guild accounts refer to small payments to minstrels. They were presumably rewards for performances given at Lynn, some of them specified as taking place on festive occasions such as Christmas and May Day. The employment of minstrels by the borough itself appears to have begun around the 1390s, although payments to men of the surname Wayte can be found earlier. Some of these waits were employed as nightwatchmen, a role calling for a good voice. But the employment of a small troupe of minstrels by the borough did not prevent it paying for engagements by visiting minstrels into at least the reign of Edward IV.

If employees of the city, minstrels were expected to wear some kind of uniform, or decoration, indicative of their status. Liveries of the Lynn waits were paid for in the 1430s. In 1470 mention is made in Coventry records of a silver badge and silver collar as part of these accoutrements. They evidently received an annual fee from the city, along with the proceeds of a levy on householders, although the latter may have been difficult to collect: in 1459 the minstrels had to petition the leet to appoint an "honest man" from each ward to accompany them when they made the rounds to collect their quarterly wages.

Many minstrels were itinerant, earning their living through commissions wherever they could find them. As employees, Coventry's minstrels were expected to be available when needed, however. Thus, in 1467 they were instructed not to go out of the city to undertake private engagements, with the exception of those for abbots or priors whose houses were within a ten-mile radius of the city.

NOTES

"they"

The "they" at the beginning of each clause refers to the leet jury, a group of 24 impanelled citizens, drawn from the ruling class, who acted with the mayor and other officials as the legislative body of the city. For the most part, this urban authority seems to have framed legislation in response to petitions, or bills, put forward by the citizenry.

"Richard Waite"

By this period, surnames had become relatively fixed and hereditary. Thus, to find a wait with the surname Waite reflects the fact that sons often followed fathers in the same occupation. Without other evidence, we cannot be certain in any given case; but it is possible, perhaps likely, that Richard Waite was the son of a minstrel and, if so, learned his skill from his father. Note also that one of the other minstrels has the surname of "trumpeter".

"Trinity Gild" "Corpus Christi Gild"

These socio-religious gilds were the two most powerful and important in Coventry, their memberships drawn from the urban elite.

"livery"

As clothing and/or insignia whose characteristics were specified by the provider, a livery was in essence a uniform.

"trumpeter"

The trumpeter was, according to an ordinance of 1439, to be the leader of the minstrel group.

"escutcheons"

Symbols derived from coats of arms displayed on shields. In this context they had been reduced more to what we would consider badges (possibly shield-shaped) of office.

"wardens"

City officials responsible for part of the financial administration, notably the collection of rent revenues.

[1.] Waits

William Johnson, Simon Herforth, and John Wardelow were appointed in the presence of the community to the office of waits of Beverley on 13 May in the year indicated above [1438], until 25 April next, receiving 36s.8d by way of salary from community money. Each of the waits is to receive a shield from the community, and they have taken oath to serve the community in their office until 25 April. And there were delivered to John Wardelow and William Johnson, waits, two community shields of silver, by pledge of John Colton yeoman (present) and Nicholas Brompton (absent). Later Simon Herforth left town, for which reason the waits took a boy in Simon's place, and they were allocated 6s.8d for the boy's work until 25 April. And thereby the waits received, for themselves and their boy, this year only 33s.3d.

[2.] Waits retained

On 14 January 1453, John Hesilhede, Robert de Celario, and Martin Gymer were newly appointed to the office of waits of the town of Beverley during the pleasure of the 12 keepers, or governors, in office that year, and their successors the 12 governors of the town who shall be in the future. Taking 40s. by way of salary, at the wish of the 12 governors of the town who shall be.

And the waits gave honest guarantees, each man on his own behalf, to the town governors in office that year that they would not resign, nor would any individual of them resign, from their service, nor would they or any one of them accept appointment from any lord of the realm of England, without the explicit permission of the governors then in office or their successors in future. And by way of gratuity they are to have 10s. of silver towards their uniforms, by agreement of the venerable men gathered in the Guildhall.

DISCUSSION

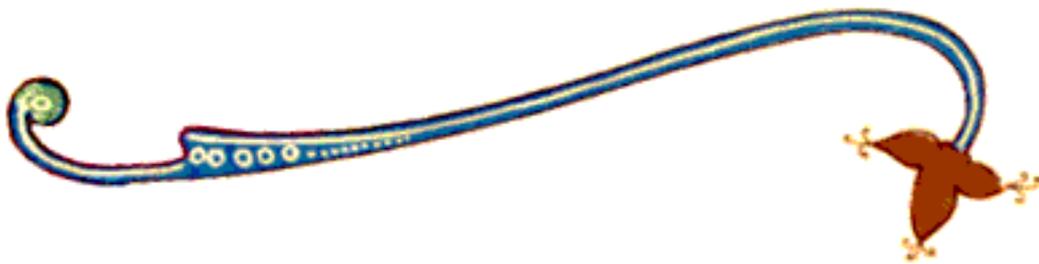

The term used in the original for waits is spiculatores, for which a more literal translation would be "watchmen"; this reflects the wide-ranging role of waits – they were not just entertainers, but also heralds, and nightwatchmen. In the 1460s the terms histriones (applied to performers, including minstrels) and ministrallis was also used for them.

We hear of the town employing a wait as early as 1366/67, when Ralph Wayt was paid 10s. as six months' salary. By the beginning of the fifteenth century there were two waits, sharing 40s. annual salary, and the number was later increased to three. However, the waits were not always employed for a full year, but sometimes only over the winter season when there were some important festivals requiring minstrelsy. The cost of their costumes was also subsidized, on occasion at least, and during the reign of Henry VI they were issued with miniature shields and collars, as badges of office. One of their tasks was to proclaim the Corpus Christi plays.

The fifteenth century saw a greater use of minstrels or waits than before, as ceremony became an increasingly important part of the political life of a town. In the fourteenth century we mostly find ad hoc engagements, often minstrels in the service of aristocrats but apparently touring the region. For example, in 1318/19 the mayor of Leicester paid 4d. to one Wade and his unnamed associate, minstrels, in 1338/39 of 3d. given to minstrels to pipe before the muster of armed citizens, and in 1375/76 of £1 as payments to messengers and minstrels on various occasions during the year. And the Dover borough accounts of 1365-67 include payments of 20d. to John Scot, harper, 24d. to three trumpeters performing on Christmas day (one in the service of a local knight), 2s.4d to minstrels performing on Corpus Christi and the day of Ascension, and 12d. to another trumpeter named Boffett.

We also hear in that account of 6s.8d was paid for a cloth decorated with the arms of the Cinque Ports to hang from the trumpet of Alan Trompour, and 13s. for clothing for Trompour and piper John Rustler. These payments suggest that some towns were beginning to designate "official" minstrels, although doubtless such men earned more of their living by private performances. York corporation had a trio – the "city waits" – on retainer from the time of Henry VI onwards; they were provided with uniforms each Christmas and paid fees for engagements, notably at Easter, Corpus Christi, the Nativity of St. John Baptist (24 June), Christmas, and the Translation of St. William (a former archbishop of York). In 1454 we even find that one of them has been granted a life pension, presumably for long service.

NOTES

"keepers"

The keepers, or governors as they were coming to be known during the 15th century, were the town council, and the sole source of governmental authority – Beverley not having a chief executive officer at the head of its urban administration.

A cost of doing business

The levying of taxes on commercial activities – sometimes on the goods imported into or exported from towns, sometimes on transactions themselves (or the privilege of being assigned a place at which to conduct transactions) – was commonly one of the sources of income used by an urban community to help pay the fee farm upon which urban trading privileges and powers of self-government were dependent. Likewise, it became in the Late Middle Ages an important source of revenue for the king, capitalizing on the growth England's involvement in international trade. Such impositions were not liked by merchants or lesser traders, for they were just another cut into profits; since the interests in favour of such taxes were stronger than those in favour of free trade, efforts both legal and illegal were made to escape payment.

Local tolls

It is not clear how ancient were impositions of tolls. But that exemptions from tolls were among the earliest liberties which townsmen sought to acquire from their overlords indicates that at least some kinds of tolls predated urban self-government; and there are a number of tolls with Anglo-Saxon names. The revenue from tolls was one reason why lords were motivated to foster the development of settlements, through the introduction of official markets and fairs, or even to found new towns.

It became a standard feature of borough charters for the recipient to be granted exemption from urban tolls elsewhere. If the king were the lord of the borough, he could make this exemption applicable to all the other towns of which he was lord throughout the kingdom. A town with a lesser lord could win exemption from only the smaller number of towns with the same lord, unless that lord could acquire an extension from his own lord, the king. Particularly in the thirteenth century, this led to disputes between boroughs, as the right to collect tolls on one side and the right of exemption on the other came into conflict. Urban authorities must have had some means of keeping track of which towns were exempt, which not. We know of lists of such towns compiled by Southampton and Exeter, for instance, while some towns made and filed reference copies of the exemption grants to others.

As well, they needed some means of identifying whether a given trader was an enfranchised member of an exempt town. One of the reasons urban authorities compiled lists of freemen, or members of the merchant guild, was because those individuals were exempt from tolls. Exemption from toll provided a significant advantage to enfranchised members of the community, the lower overhead allowing them to sell more competitively; it was an incentive for residents to purchase the franchise, thereby providing revenue for urban administration. Not surprising then that town authorities made efforts to acquire and defend exemption privileges. Since lists of freemen were not available to the towns that traders visited, a claim by an individual trader to be exempt may have rested upon a solemn personal oath, or on corroboration from fellow traders from his home town or from residents of the visited town who knew the trader. In the absence of clear evidence, towns were inclined to exact toll and let the aggrieved trader try to claim it back in the courts. Towards the close of the Middle Ages we find examples of letters testimonial issued by borough authorities to identify specific merchants as being citizens, although these may have been only in exceptional cases of individuals who had experienced difficulties in the past.

With exemption from tolls being a common royal grant to boroughs, it seems likely that those paying the tolls were largely residents of non-urban settlements, town-dwellers who had not taken out citizenship, and foreigners. Even in those cases, tolls were not applicable to necessities bought for personal or household use (or, by extension, bought by a servant for his lord's use), but only to goods that the owner was intending to sell, although sometimes it was necessary to purchase membership in the franchise or the gild in order to be assured of this.

Lists of the tolls payable on different kinds of goods have survived in a number of towns' records, and a few of these are reproduced here. There are fewer records of specific collections (i.e. listing payments by specific individuals over a set period); perhaps such detailed itemized records were not commonly kept, although such that exist give no internal evidence of being exceptional, and there must have been some method of issuing some kind of receipt, tally, or other proof-of-payment to those who had paid, particularly in cases where individuals apparently could pay a one-time toll to cover multiple shipments over a period of time. There does not seem to have been any kind of national standard defining how much toll should be paid on particular types of goods; yet, although this was presumably left up to local authorities to decide, the amounts levied seem to be broadly similar from town to town – possibly there was some form of consultation between towns on the matter.

These local tolls might be collected at the main points providing entrance to and exit from a town – and were an incentive to reinforce such points of entry/egress with barred gates. However, tolls could also be paid directly to borough officials within the town, such as at municipal buildings called "tollbooths", or in the marketplace and at harbourside (tollbooths were often set up in such locations); in these cases, a buyer was going to have to prove to the wardens of the exits from town that toll had been duly paid on any goods they were carrying out – or prove that the goods had been purchased for personal use, rather than resale.

Beyond the standard local import/export tolls, which could apply to merchandize regardless of whether it was to be sold in the location where toll was demanded or was just passing through, special additional tolls often existed or arose later; for example:

- anchorage or quayage, imposed on ships for the right (in essence) to load or unload goods;
- cranage, for a service in assisting with loading and unloading;
- pesage or tronage for the (requisite) service of weighing merchandize;
- pontage, pavage and murage, surtaxes for the particular purpose of building or maintaining the town bridges, roads, or defences – all parts of the physical infrastructure that made commercial activities easier or more secure.

Some of the above could be imposed only by specific permission of the lord of the borough, for a set period, typically just a few years, but equally typically renewable. The burden of these tolls fell largely on the shoulders of outsiders; so, again, towns tried to obtain exemptions for their citizens. Certain other exactions, such as stallage (the right to present wares for sale on a market stall), were in their origin a kind of toll, but came to be treated more along the lines of what we would today consider as licence payments, since they were not necessarily based on the volume or value of the goods for sale and they might be purchased to cover an extended period. Towns appointed minor officers to take responsibility for collection of tolls. As time wore on, some experimented with farming out the revenue sources – i.e. leasing the revenues to an individual for a set period, in return for a lump-sum payment negotiated in advance (e.g. at Ipswich); it was expected that this would provide a reliable income while reducing administrative costs, although farmers were not always able to meet their commitments.

Tolls were collected at convenient points of entry or exit of towns, such as gates and bridges.

National customs

As the system of royal administration became more complex, more assertive, and more truly national in scope, a second system of customs collection was created. Ancient customs such as lastage and scavage, which had often come into the hands of local lords, were supplemented by royal prises – notably on wine, which took the form of an in-kind exaction of wine for the king's use. In the early thirteenth century, King John introduced a monetary duty on imports and exports and appointed a corp of officials to collect the new tax, but this experiment lasted only a few years. Experimentation was resumed in the latter part of the century and led to (1275) a duty on wool, woolfells and hides which lasted through the rest of the Middle Ages. Additional customs followed and, by mid-fourteenth century had more or less consolidated into a set comprising:

- the 1275 custom;
- an additional subsidy on wool, woolfells and hides;
- the "petty custom", which amalgamated a custom introduced in 1303 on goods other than wool, woolfells, hides, and wine, and a custom on cloth (sometimes called pannage) introduced in 1347 which had different rates for English merchants than for foreign merchants;

- and a subsidy on tunnage and poundage.

The purpose of customs was, in some cases, to protect domestic industry and commerce by imposing a surcharge on commerce conducted by foreigners, but in others simply to raise revenue for the king. The customs system, together with other legislation, helped English merchants win control of English commerce away from foreigners – with the exception of the favoured Hanseatic merchants – but this did not endear the customs to those English merchants who had to pay them, nor to foreign merchants.

Although 1275 marked the beginnings of a permanent national system of customs administration, with a certain number of ports designated as collection centres, customs collection was initially in the hands of existing royal officials, or farmed out to private individuals or consortia. In the fourteenth century, however, the designated ports became involved in choosing, or nominating, local collectors along with other officials responsible for related duties, such as searchers (one of whose duties was to prevent the import of counterfeit coinage or unlicensed export of gold and silver), and troners and weighers (whose work was necessary to the estimation of the volume of goods imported/exported and therefore the amount of customs due). Nonetheless, these officers remained answerable to, and paid by, the king. Mid-century there was further experimentation with farming out the customs to private consortia, because the king needed money for the French war.

Smuggling

Although the term "smuggling" was not in use in the Middle Ages, attempts to evade tolls and customs were rife. Sufficiently so that the central government appointed officers known as searchers, charged with combatting smuggling, and others known as controllers, to keep a duplicate copy of customs records as a check on the honesty of the collectors. While foreign merchants appear to have felt it wiser to purchase exemptions from customs, English merchants who knew the lie of the land better tried a number of strategies for avoiding payment. There was a long shoreline, and very few royal officers to patrol it.

One strategy might be to try to land goods elsewhere than at ports where customs were collected, or similarly to sneak goods into, or through, a town without passing a checkpoint. Another was to suborn collectors – easier for merchants who were themselves in such office; but for those who were not, the officer was often one of their colleagues, a fellow entrepreneur who might be receptive to an under-the-table arrangement. There appears to have been a good deal of corruption in the customs service, in terms for example of embezzlement, bribery, or complicity in smuggling, although we are perhaps somewhat biased because surviving documentation tends to focus on the dishonest, rather than the honest, officials.

A further strategy was for resident merchants to pretend that the goods of outsiders were their own, and therefore not subject to tolls. The numerous by-laws against this offence (see examples at Ipswich, Maldon, Norwich, and Yarmouth) are themselves an indicator of how prevalent was this form of evasion.

TRANSLATION

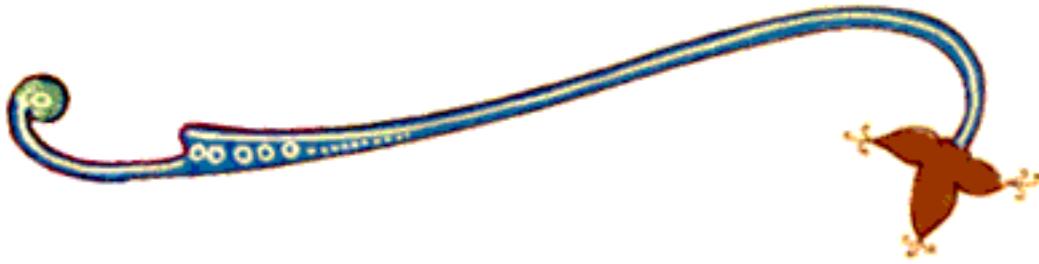

Richard, by the grace of God King of England, Duke of Normandy [and] Aquitaine, Count of Anjou, to his justices, sheriffs, and all bailiffs and officers throughout the whole of England, greetings. Let all know that we have granted to our men of Andover that they may have a merchant gild in Andover. And that they may be exempt from toll, passage, and customs throughout all of our land, just as those burgesses of Winchester who belong to their merchant gild are exempt. Furthermore, that no-one should harass them for customs, upon [penalty of] forfeiting £10. Just as our father King Henry granted to them and confirmed by his charter. Witnesses: Henry archbishop of Canterbury, William Marshal, Geoffrey fitz Peter, William de Sainte Mère Eglise, Hugh Bard, William Brewer. Given by the hand of William bishop of Ely, our Chancellor, at Portsmouth on 29 April 1194.

DISCUSSION

One of the interesting features of this document is that it survives only as a copy registered in Southampton's volume of memoranda, as a record that Andover men were not to be subject to tolls. The date when the grant was copied into the Black Book was about mid-fifteenth century, and Dr. Chapman hypothesised that this might be because the Andover authorities were attempting to reassert their rights at that time, following economic decline contributed to by a serious fire in 1435 that destroyed most of the town; the losses perhaps included key records, for the townspeople made a point of obtaining a royal restatement and confirmation of all their liberties in 1446. However, it may also be, more simply, that the exemption was copied at that time from some other document in the Southampton archives. A fourteenth century list of towns exempt from toll, compiled by the Southampton authorities, indicates that Andover men had already been claiming exemption, and that the authorities had to investigate whether this was warranted; a copy of the grant would have been the likely outcome of such investigations.

It has been suggested Andover's name may derive from a term referring to a royal hunting-lodge. Whether a correct interpretation or not, certainly Anglo-Saxon kings are known to have made short stopovers there on several occasions, and there was later a royal fish-stew there. Around this lodging a royal vill had developed by the close of the tenth century. Richard's grant, purportedly reflecting an earlier one of Henry II, shows that the manor was acquiring some urban characteristics. Not until 1201 did the residents take over the farm of the royal revenues from the manor. This was made a permanent arrangement in 1205, with a grant of fee farm, along with a fair. The merchant gild remained throughout the Middle Ages at the centre of local affairs. The townspeople were divided into those who had full membership rights, and those with a lesser set of privileges. The bailiffs, who presided over the borough court, which probably developed (as an institution otherwise separate from the gild) out of the court of the hundred of the same name, were elected at a gild meeting; and the town council of 24 "forwardmen" were drawn from the full members of the gild. In the fifteenth century gild and government merged to the point where the gild was eventually lost sight of. As a modest market town in the interior of the wool-producing region of Hampshire, although with the advantage of being on a major route between London and the West Country, Andover looked primarily to Southampton as the shipping point for its produce; so it was important for it to ensure its exemption from toll was respected there.

"passage"

A fee for transporting goods through or past a town (as opposed to bringing them into the town for sale there).

"his charter"

On the Pipe Roll for 1175-76 the burgesses of Andover paid 10 marks for the right to have a gild. This suggests that their exemption from tolls had also been granted by or about that date.

Location: Bury St. Edmunds

Date: 1180s

TRANSLATION

The merchants of London wanted to be exempt from toll at the market of St. Edmund's; however, many of them paid it reluctantly, being given no option. In consequence, there was great uproar and outcry among the citizens of London in their husting. Having discussed the matter among themselves, they informed Abbot Samson that they ought to be exempt throughout England, on the authority of the charter they had received from King Henry II. To which the abbot replied that he was quite prepared, if necessary, to bring in the king to warrant that he had never drawn up a charter for them that was to the prejudice of our church nor to the detriment of the franchises of St. Edmund's, to which the saintly Edward [the Confessor] had, prior to the conquest of England, granted and confirmed toll and theam and all regalian rights. And [he said] that King Henry had given the Londoners exemption from toll throughout the lands over which he had dominion – where he was able to give this; he could not give it in the town of St. Edmund, since it was not his [to give].

When this was reported to the Londoners, they communally decided to decree that none of them should frequent the market of St. Edmund's. For two years they stayed away, to the consequent great loss of our market and significant reduction to the offerings made to the sacristy. Finally, through the mediation of the Bishop of London and many others, an agreement was reached between them and us to the effect that they should come to the market and some of them should pay toll, but it would straight away be returned to them, so that through this pretence the franchises of both parties would be upheld.

But after a time, once the abbot had reached an agreement with his knights and had almost settled down in peace, see what again happened: "The Philistines are upon you, Samson!" For the Londoners, in unison, threatened to raze to the ground the stone houses that the abbot had built that year, or else to take a hundred times as much from the men of St. Edmund's by way of withernam, unless the abbot promptly redressed the wrong done them by the reeves of the town of St. Edmund, who had taken 15d. from the carts of the citizens of London when they passed through our town carrying herring from Yarmouth. The citizens of London declared that they had been exempt from paying toll in all markets throughout England, wherever and whenever, since the time of Rome's foundation. And that the city of London had been founded at the same time and ought to have this franchise throughout England on the grounds that it was a privileged city that had once been a metropolis, and on the grounds of its antiquity.

The abbot, however, asked that the dispute be put on hold for long enough for the king to return to England, so that he could consult him on the matter. After receiving advice from legal experts, he restored the 15d. to the claimants [\[on the understanding that\]](#) this not prejudice the question of which party was in the right.

DISCUSSION

This is an early example of the type of dispute that arose frequently in the following century, as the chartered rights of exemption from toll of one party came in conflict with the chartered rights of another party to collect toll. The abbot's claim was based on an unusually extensive jurisdiction given the abbey by Edward the Confessor, which did in some regards place the abbey's lands – the size of a small county – outside the mainstream of the realm within which the king could grant exemption from tolls. However, such grants were terse and took no account of exceptions, paving the way for disputes and hostilities.

The first source of dispute seems to have been tolls payable on goods being brought for sale in Bury St. Edmund's market. The face-saving compromise was acceptable to both sides. It suited the Londoners in that they did not have to cut into their profits by paying toll, while for the abbot it avoided establishing a precedent of exemption that might encourage other towns to claim the same. However, the powerful and assertive Londoners were bound not to let matters lie there, when it concerned privileges impacting on their profit margins.

The second source of aggravation came about when the Londoners simply wished to transport their goods through the town en route to London; the town lay on the most direct road from Yarmouth to London, so it would have been difficult to by-pass. From the perspective of the reeves the goods were being imported into the town and tolls were therefore payable; or rather, it was a toll on the passage of the carts, not on the goods they carried. It is not clear whether the 15d. was the total amount exacted from the London convoy, or whether it was per merchant; since London's own toll was a halfpenny per cart of herring, the former is probable, unless the St. Edmunds' tolls were truly extortionate.

"market"

nundinas might here be translated as fair, Henry I having granted (ca.1124/29) the abbey a 7-day fair surrounding St. James' day (25 July). However, in other contexts in Jocelin's Chronicle, the term seems to be used for the weekly market and here it is used in regard to a right dating back (it is claimed) to before the Conquest; Henry II's charter of ca.1123/35 had confirmed the abbey's right to a market and the tolls collectable there, as fully as in practice under previous kings and in the time of abbot Baldwin (1065 to ca.1100).

"toll and theam"

See the notes to the Nottingham charter of ca.1157.

"founded at the same time"

The legend of London's antiquity, with comparison to Rome, is also mentioned in FitzStephen's description of London.

"metropolis"

The same legend, that London had once been the seat of an archbishopric, before this was transferred to Canterbury, is also mentioned in FitzStephen's description of London.

TRANSLATION

Know, all who see or hear this document made in the form of a chirograph, that certain disagreements having arisen between the burgesses of Nottingham on the one part, and the burgesses of Derby on the other, concerning certain exactions made by the parties relating to tolls as well as to sales of living livestock or domesticated animals, and other things indicated below, thanks to the mediation of many friends by the express consent of each community, these disputes have now been settled, at Sandiacre as of 26 July 1279, to the following effect: viz., the burgesses of both Nottingham and Derby have granted, on behalf of themselves and their heirs and successors in the liberties of those boroughs, that henceforth any of their burgesses who buys any animal whatsoever, whether domesticated or livestock, within the liberties of the other borough should bring the sellers of those animals before the bailiffs of the liberty – before exiting the liberty with the said animals – for purpose of paying their toll thereon, if he so wishes. If it should happen that any seller refuses to pay his toll thereon, by claiming some kind of liberty, the buyers are allowed to cancel their purchase of the animals, if they wish; or, if they prefer and they see it as expedient to them, to go ahead [with the transaction] by paying the toll on behalf of the seller. After which, when with their animals they go past the street wardens who are called "Gategeters", or past other [officers] of the liberty of the borough where the purchase was made, who will require evidence from them of toll [having been paid] on the said animals, they can be cleared for passage by giving their oath that they have appeared before the bailiffs in the manner described. If the buyers are thereupon prevented by any representative of the borough from freely passing through, or are arrested, and can clearly prove this to have been the case, then whoever obstructed them shall – under the supervision of trustworthy men of both towns – compensate them for damages suffered as a result of the obstruction or arrest. Yet if it happens that any of these burgesses, of either of the towns, or his servant, dares to escape by himself or with his own livestock out of the liberty, taking with him the aforesaid animals (other than his own), in order to avoid paying toll, and this can be clearly proven, then the offender shall pay a fine of two shillings to the bailiffs for his offence; furthermore, the animals will be held under arrest until the bailiffs have been fully paid the fine and the toll. If any servant convicted of such an offence is found not to have the means to pay the two shillings, then his master shall answer to the bailiffs for as much of the two shillings as the servant's [due] wages cover and shall not have the servant in his service while any of the two shillings remains unpaid, nor shall any other burgess take him into his service until the bailiffs are fully satisfied for the offence; and if thereafter he [i.e. the master], or any other burgess of either town, will have him in his service

[The remainder of the transcript is missing.]

DISCUSSION

This case provides an example of the complications that could arise in the context of the conflicting rights of boroughs to exact tolls on commercial transactions, while at the same time claiming (by right of charter grants) exemption for their burgesses from such tolls. Here the concept of toll is more of a levy or tax on a sale, as opposed to an import/export custom, and who paid the toll was something negotiable within the bargain made between seller and buyer. If the seller agreed to pay part of all of the toll, then tried to evade this by claiming exemption through burgess status (perhaps during negotiations hiding that fact from the prospective purchaser), borough authorities – determined to obtain their toll one way or the other – might then demand it of the buyer, who would be rightfully aggrieved. Under the above agreement, the seller was offered the options of backing out of the sale (even after the bargain was agreed), or of deciding it was in his best interests to absorb the additional cost of the toll. A third, but illegal, option was for the buyer to try to get out of town without having to shoulder the additional, unexpected expense of the toll; whether a dramatic flight is envisaged, or escape via fraud – such as a false oath, or disguising newly-purchased beasts among those already owned – is less clear from the document.

Derby was not in a position to claim a general exemption for its citizens from tolls. Its first extant royal charter of liberties was granted by John in 1204. Nottingham on the other hand had been granted by Henry II (ca.1160) the right to collect tolls not only in the borough itself but along an extensive stretch of the River Trent, from Thrumpton to the south-west as far as Newark-on-Trent to the north-east, and other waterways between Rempstone (south) and Retford (27 miles to the north-north-east). It obtained an exemption from toll from Prince John, throughout his earldom, ca.1189, extended throughout the kingdom in 1200, after he became king. Nottingham's right to collect toll having preceded its neighbour Derby's exemption from toll, this would have been a decisive factor had there been a legal battle.

NOTES

"chirograph"

an agreement between two parties in which the text was written twice, once above the other, and the document then cut into the two halves, in a somewhat irregular way that would identify – when the upper and lower halves were fitted back together – each half as an authentic part of the original (to prevent forgery).

"Sandiacre"

Sandiacre lies about halfway between Derby and Nottingham.

Subject: Agreement between London and Winchester regarding payment of tolls Original source: British Library, Add. MS.6036, ff.6-7 (with a slightly variant copy on f.11)

Transcription in: W.H.B. Bird, ed. The Black Book of Winchester, (Winchester: Warren & Son, 1925), 11, 23.

Original language: Latin

Location: London, Winchester

Date: 1304

TRANSLATION

On 23 March 1304 there was a meeting between John Blund, then mayor of London, William de Leyre, John de Wengrave, Thomas Romayn, Walter de Fynchyngfelde, Richard de Gloucestre, Nicholas de Farundoun, John de Dunstaple, Nicholas Pycot, Thomas Sely, Hugh Pourte, aldermen, and John de Burreforthe sheriff, and other citizens on their own behalf and that of the community of the city of London, and Roger de Enkepenne, then mayor of the city of Winchester, and his fellow citizen John de Kyrkeby on behalf of themselves and the community of their city, to negotiate a settlement of disputes that have arisen between them concerning various customs taken at London from Winchester citizens by London bailiffs. In regard to which disagreement, it was agreed the following proposals would take force henceforth. That is, that all citizens of Winchester who belong to its merchant gild shall be exempt in the city of London from pontage, murage and pavage, and all other customs whatsoever levied on their merchandize, except for tronage of wool given in the past, viz. 6d. for the first sack and 5d. for each subsequent sack, and except for the custom on leather hides and woolpells, and similarly the customs taken on the queen's river, from which they cannot be exempted, regardless of on what grounds they make their claim. And that all the citizens of London shall be exempt from all customs at Winchester, including pontage, pavage, murage and all other customs and tolls whatsoever. So that this agreement may be remembered forever, it has been enrolled in the papers of the London Guildhall in the presence of the mayor, aldermen, and citizens, by the hand of William de Hiclynge clerk of the chamber, who wrote this.

DISCUSSION

This copy of a London record (the translation above being a reconciliation of the two versions) was entered into Winchester's book of memoranda in the context of a later document, likewise originally a London record, concerning renewed complaints in 1408 made by the Winchester authorities before the London authorities of distrains made on Winchester citizens to obtain payment of tolls on goods they had bought at London and were carting out. The complaint was of course that this exaction was contrary to the agreement of 1304. In 1407 Winchester had procured a royal writ addressed to the mayor and sheriffs of London stating that Winchester has possessed liberties granted by kings since Henry I, including that "they be exempt from toll, lastage, pesage, passage, cheminage, murage, pavage, quayage, picage, and all other kinds of tolls and customs in perpetuity" [Black Book, p.13], and ordering the London authorities not to harass Winchester men on this matter without first presenting their case to the king. In October 1408 a further writ from the king, issued in response to arguments presented to him by lawyers engaged by Winchester, repeated the tenor of the city liberties and ordered the London sheriffs to appear before him to explain why they had not respected Winchester's exemptions.

The London authorities responded to this situation in November 1408 by ordering that any distrains taken by the sheriff or his officers from Winchester gildsmen should be restored, and no such further action taken in the future unless specifically ordered by the mayor. They reserved the right to make future distrains related to toll-taking in cases where Winchester citizens could not demonstrate that they were exempt; the expectation appears to have been that a citizen present proof of being a member of the merchant gild.

NOTES

"John Blund"

His mayoralty ran from 1301 to 1307.

"John de Wengrave"

Recorder of London from 1304 to 1319.

"pontage, murage and pavage"

Special tolls levied for funding the building or maintenance of bridges, walls and roads, respectively.

"tronage"

A fee/toll for the weighing of bulk merchandize.

"queen's river"

This refers to Queenhithe, a part of the quayside along the Thames that was within the queen's soke (independent jurisdiction); the citizens were not in a position to grant exemption from tolls taken there.

"papers"

Specifically, in Letter Book C.

"pesage"

In the original pondagium, the weighing of goods. However, the writ of October 1408 gives pontagium.

"cheminage"

A toll for obtaining right of way for land travel (whereas passage applied more to water transport).

"picage"

Right to erect a stall from which to sell one's goods; it assumed that ground needed to be broken with a pick to set the stall firmly in place.

TRANSLATION

To all those to whose attention comes these letters of ours, Thomas Waldgrave mayor of the town of Leicester and the whole community of the town [send] greetings. From time immemorial all the tenants of the honour of Leicester, notably the burgesses of the town of Leicester, have been exempt from all kinds of tolls, passage, pavage, lastage, stallage, pesage, tronage, carriage, picage, terrage, and all other types of tolls whatsoever, throughout all England, as is more clearly stated in the charters and other grants made by kings who have been and confirmed by our present king (whom God preserve). Therefore we request all those to whom these letters are presented not to allow their bearer, John de Lyn barker, a burgess of the town of Leicester, when he comes and goes with his merchandize, to be harassed or caused difficulties regarding the above matter, nor to be attached or distrained, to the detriment of our present king (whom God preserve) in regard to his franchise of his duchy of Lancaster; nor any of the burgesses of the town of Leicester, in contravention of their above liberties and franchises. Rather, out of respect for our lord king and by reason of his franchise, please allow John de Lyn, and any other burgess of the town of Leicester, to pass through quit and without taking any toll contrary to the franchises and liberties mentioned above. So that no cause be given to the king nor to ourselves to sue our franchise against anyone in such matters. And because exemptions on grounds of the franchise are claimed by many who have no share in it, we have issued these our letters patent to John de Lyn, as one of the burgesses of the town. Sealed with the common seal of the town, together with the seal of the mayoralty there. Issued at Leicester, 3 February 1420.

DISCUSSION

There are copies in the borough archives of several letters of the same tenor issued during the 1420s. Such were evidently a means of identifying which townsmen were qualified, by citizenship or membership in a merchant guild, for the charter-granted exemption from tolls. However, it is not clear whether it was common to supply such letters to a town's merchants, or whether occasioned by special circumstances, such as in the case of John de Lyn, when fraudulent claims to exemption jeopardized the respect for rights of those who could legitimately claim it.

As a mediatized borough – one not directly under the king's lordship – Leicester's exemption from toll must have been limited for much of the later Middle Ages to the territories that were part of the honour of Leicester. Around the middle of the twelfth century the first so-styled earl of Leicester granted to his burgesses exemption from all customs that might be levied at points in the great forest encompassing the town, and forbade his foresters and other officers to stop the burgesses and their packhorses for such a reason (although a later confirmation suggests this may have been applicable only to timber obtained from the forest – on which see, Origin of some customs at Leicester). This was perhaps a confirmation of a privilege granted by the earl's father when lord of Leicester. Some years earlier, the king himself had granted the earl's men exemption from tolls solely at Oxford. But when King John in 1199 – pursuing a grant of privileges to the earl that included the right to collect toll, pontage, passage, pedage, stallage, tallage and various other revenues – granted the burgesses unhindered travel through the kingdom for purposes of trade, he added the reservation that they should pay legitimate tolls wherever they were due. Although in 1361 the burgesses gained control over tolls collected within Leicester, they still seem to have had no share in the kingdom-wide toll exemptions that the earl himself had received from the king.

When the town came directly under the king's lordship, under the Lancastrians, prospects must have seemed brighter. But it was not until 1416 that Henry V accorded the townsmen freedom from "toll, pontage, picage, murage, pavage, stallage, passage, lastage and carriage", even though his charter claimed they had been exempt from such since time immemorial. This charter helps explain the issuing of letters testimonial in the following decade, as both those qualified and unqualified sought to take advantage of the turn of events.

NOTES

"honour"

I.e. the estates of the earldom.

"passage, carriage"

Fees related to the transportation of goods through or past a customs collection point.

"pavage"

A toll imposed to raise money to support maintenance of the roads.

"lastage"

A toll on the volume of a cargo.

"stallage, picage, terrage"

Fees associated with the assignment of a location from which to sell goods.

"tronage, pesage"

Fees for weighing merchandize. Pesage was a fee paid by the purchaser of goods, the aim apparently being to verify the true weight of the goods being acquired. The purpose of tronage was to ascertain the weight so that the appropriate import/export customs could be assessed, and so the equipment was typically kept at the quayside (see the possible representation on the Elizabethan plan of Yarmouth). These operations were normally undertaken using official weights and the tron, or large beam (to distinguish it from the small beam used for goods measured in avoirdupois).

"barker"

A worker of, and dealer in, leather.

"duchy of Lancaster"

After de Montfort's rebellion, the earldom of Leicester was handed over to Henry III's second son and by that route came under the earldom (later the duchy) of Lancaster, and thereby directly to the king once Henry IV took the throne.

TRANSLATION

Pleas of the Crown holden at Northampton before Geoffrey le Scrop, Lambert de Packingham, John de Cambridge, Thomas de Luthe, and Thomas de Radeclive, the Justices itinerant of our Lord the King there, on the Monday next after the Feast of All Saints in the 3rd year of the reign of King Edward the Third after the Conquest. [Monday 5th Nov 1330]

The Jury present that John Hohecote, Henry de Helidon, Adam de Cotesbroke, Henry Roger, and Pentecost le Deystere, the Bailiffs of the Town of Northampton, take by extortion from all persons coming to the Town of Northampton to sell straw, trusses of straw to cover the Kingsbroth against Fair times, as well within fair times as without. And that the said John, Henry, Adam, Henry, and Pentecost take unjust Tolls at all times of the year from all persons buying or selling cattle; whereas nothing used to be taken out of fair time, and then from dealers only and not from those who bought cattle for stock.

And they took from Thomas de Skalford, who sold one ox, a penny; likewise from the purchaser thereof they took toll. To the great oppression of the people.

Therefore let the Sheriff be commanded that he do cause them to come etc. Afterwards came the aforesaid John de Hohecote and Adam de Cotesbroke and could not deny the aforesaid trespasses presented against them, and made fine with the Lord the King for all trespasses against them presented, each of them at half a mark etc. as appeareth amongst the presentments of the township of Northampton etc. Afterwards came the aforesaid Henry, Henry, and Pentecost and made fine for all trespasses etc. as appeareth amongst the presentments of Northampton.

Concerning new customs etc. The Jury present that Henry Roger and other Bailiffs of the Town of Northampton have newly levied a certain new custom in the Town of Slipton, which is fifteen miles distant from the aforesaid Town of Northampton. Namely of taking from every cart laden with wool, wax, and other merchandizes or goods whatsoever there passing, one penny; and from every horse load, one farthing. To great oppression of the people etc. They know not by what warrant etc. Afterwards came the aforesaid Bailiffs and many others of the Commonalty of the said Town and they say that the custom whereof mention is made in the presentment is a toll pertaining to the Farm of the King's Town of Northampton, and that the Lord the King Henry, great grandfather of the Lord the now King, during the time whilst the Town of Northampton was in his hands, was seised of such like toll to be there taken and likewise the said Bailiffs from the time when they took the aforesaid Town at farm. And they say that they receive the aforesaid Tolls at Slipton, which pertain to the aforesaid Farm, from carts and laden horses which ought to pass with their merchandizes through the Town of Northampton, for which they ought to take Toll in the Town of Northampton, and not otherwise; and they pray that these things may be enquired of by the County. And one William de Tichmerch saith for the King's people that the aforesaid Bailiffs receive there, by their servants thereunto deputed, the aforesaid new custom from all carts and laden horses, as well of the neighbours there passing towards Leicester or Rothwell, or elsewhere to the north parts, and likewise to those passing there towards the south with their corn and other things whatsoever, as of those passing there with merchandizes. And this he offers to prove etc. Therefore let a Jury thereupon come. And the Jury say upon their oath that the aforesaid Henry, Roger, and other the Bailiffs of the town of Northampton have during their times, by their servants taken the aforesaid customs from the carts and laden horses as well of the neighbours as of strangers there passing with their goods and merchandizes at the will of the said servants. Therefore the said Henry is in mercy. And it is commanded to the said Bailiffs that they do in no wise take the aforesaid customs from the neighbours or others there passing, but only from those who avoid the aforesaid Town of Northampton to evade the custom or toll of right due, by reason of the liberty of the aforesaid town, on peril that shall ensue thereon.

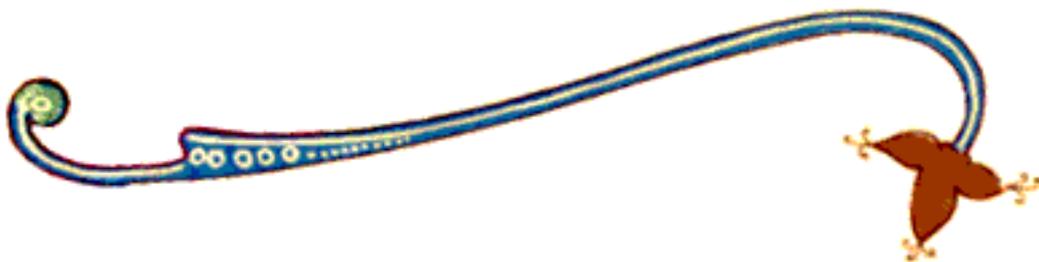

DISCUSSION

These cases suggest that the Northampton authorities were overstepping the mark in the application of their right to collect tolls. The complaint in the first case is that tolls associated originally with the fair had been extended into the rest of the year, and were being taken from both parties to a transaction, a form of double-dipping. A third complaint made at the eyre (not transcribed by Markham) was that during a stay of the king's young sons at Northampton castle, in 1306-07, the town bailiffs had made special prises (requisitions) to supply the princes' household but, after their departure, had continued with those prises. The eyre justices ordered that the prises stop, and that the taking of trusses be restricted to fair time.

In the latter case, the reference made to Henry III as the source of the right to collect the tolls in question may point to the grants of murage and pavage made by the king at different occasions. Although these were of short-term duration, perhaps they had encouraged the authorities in an indefinite but unwarranted continuation. Possibly the first case may stem from such a problem, since the 1252 grant included the right to levy a halfpenny per horseload of straw and the same amount on the sale of horses and cattle.

Slipton was a small village northeast of Northampton. It would seem rather far afield for the Northampton authorities to be levying toll, although those at Nottingham, for example, had toll collection jurisdiction well beyond the town proper. The defence offered by the town bailiffs, and the finding of the court, indicates that the Northampton initiative at Slipton was a pre-emptive toll collection on goods that, if following the main road, ought to travel through Northampton, but whose owners might try to circumvent toll collection by deviating from the main route. Slipton lay near the road from Northampton to Peterborough. However, it also lay near the route from Cambridge to Leicester, which would not have passed through Northampton and it seems that overzealous collectors were not discriminating in the targets for toll collection. The complaint also distinguishes between the passage of long-distance mercantile goods and the produce being taken to market by local growers, noting that the toll-collectors failed or neglected to make the distinction themselves.

Although in the first case the finding was that unwarranted tolls had been levied, in the latter the toll itself was not questioned, only the indiscriminating application of it to local commerce not impinging on Northampton – an application probably reflecting an unwarranted extension of an older practice.

NOTES

"5th Nov 1330"

Sic. It should be 6 November 1329.

"Jury"

This was the jury representing Spelhoe hundred.

"Kingsbroth"

This should be Kyngesbothe, as per the notes on this record made by Sutherland (The Eyre of Northamptonshire, 3-4 Edward III, Selden Society, vol.97, 1983, 244); this may have been the booth where tolls were collected. According to contemporary law reporters' accounts of the eyre, the straw being imported into Northampton was for the purpose of providing a covering for the streets.

"new customs"

The possibly unwarranted introduction of new levies was one of the articles normally enquired into by the eyre.

"Jury"

This was the jury representing Huxloe hundred.

"William de Tichmerch"

Titchmarsh was just three miles east of Slipton, and so it may well be that William was one of the aggrieved parties from whom toll had been taken, or perhaps the local reeve.

"Rothwell"

A village a few miles west of Slipton.

Concerning tolls

They say that thourhtoll and overthuertoll belong to the lord of Torksey between the following places: from Hameldod, a place between Cleston and Neuton, as far as Surtherswath, which is between Kindardeferi and Boterwik; and in the following places: Hameldod, Neuton, Lagtherterton, Torksey on the east side of Holdhagh, Graunge, Marton, Lee, More, Stoketh, Kinardferi, Surtherswath, Scotermore, and between all these places. But now their [collection] is obstructed by the abbot of Wurgo St. Peter at Surswath and Scotermore, at Stoke by the men of Nottingham, and at Kinardferi by the Mowbrays. He ought to receive the following tolls:

London:

They say that no-one from the liberties of London, Lincoln, Nottingham, York, Beverley, nor Torksey is obliged to pay toll to the lord of Torksey. Toll shall be paid on all other goods, chattels, [or] merchandize under the following conditions: viz. that if anyone is prepared to take oath that the cargo is not merchandize or that he intends to keep the goods he has purchased for a year and a day, he is not obliged to pay toll either by land or by water. And it is common knowledge that if tolls are paid on the cargo, the ship transporting the merchandize does not need to pay anything. But if the goods in the ship are exempt from paying toll, the ship ought to pay something for its passage or for the service provided to the ship (unless it is from any of the liberties already mentioned), in the following way:

|---------------------|-----|
| A ship with oars | 4d. |
| A ship without oars | 2d. |
| A small boat | 1d. |

And if the goods in the ship ought to pay toll, they should pay according to the following schedule:

| | |
|-----------------------------|-----------|
| A last of herring shall pay | 4d. |
| 100 large ling | 4d. |
| 100 cod | 2d. |
| 100 small ling | 1d. |
| 100 dried fish | 2d. |
| 100 cod | 2d. |
| Each salmon | halfpenny |
| Every quarter of grain | halfpenny |
| A fother of lead | 4d. |
| A horseload of iron | 2d. |
| A sack of wool | 4d. |
| A tun of wine | 4d. |
| A tun of ashes | 4d. |
| A frail of woad | 4d. |
| A bale of alum | 1d. |
| A pack of " mailed " | 2d. |

Firewood, straw, hay, clay, stones, coal, materials for roofing houses, turves and all similar materials are not subject to toll.

| | |
|------------------|-----|
| A millstone post | 4d. |
| A millstone axle | 2d. |

| | |
|--|-----------|
| A millstone | 4d. |
| A grindstone with a centre-hole bored through it | 4d. |
| And one without a centre-hole | 2d. |
| A clove of teasels | halfpenny |
| Timber weights for the millstone post | 4d. |
| 100 large boards | 4d. |

If any ship is from any [aforementioned] liberty and someone who is not of that liberty has that use of the ship for the year for any payment or the fourth penny, then he who has the use of the ship should pay toll on it in the form already mentioned. If anyone from a liberty owns goods jointly with someone else who is not of a liberty, then toll ought to be paid on all the goods. And it is common knowledge that no goods or merchandize should be unloaded from a ship onto dry land until customs are assessed in the presence of the bailiff, regardless of whether it ought to pay toll or not, and until the bailiff has examined them. Similarly, no goods brought by land are to be transferred to water or loaded into a ship until customs are assessed in the presence of the bailiff. If anyone brings any ship to Torksey and unloads goods and the goods are of the liberty, the ship must pay its toll. If the ship takes on new freight to be taken out [of Torksey], again it must pay toll if the goods are of the liberty.

They say that no merchandize nor any goods coming north by water from Newark are to be put ashore before they reach Torksey. Also, that no goods nor merchandize coming south from Gainsborough are to be put ashore before they reach Torksey. If they [i.e. the ships' masters] do so, the bailiff of Torksey has power in the matter to seize the goods and merchandize that were in the ship, as if an attempt had been made to evade paying toll, and to keep them until they make amends to the bailiff and the lord for that transgression. Goods such as lead and timber are not to be put ashore except in certain [predetermined?] places. Lead is to be laid out in a row, and timber placed in a heap, without [causing] any other blockage. If they are unwilling to do this, the bailiff should undertake it and recover his costs from the goods.

Toll taken by land:

They say that the manner of levying toll [on goods coming] by land is thus: those who cross over the water [at?] Neuton [or] Laghtterton from the east side of Holdehagh, Marton, Lee, [or] More should pay their toll there; but those who pass between Newark and Gainsborough, or in the reverse direction, through the middle of Torksey should pay their toll there, or churchtoll; and also those who cross the Trent at Torksey should pay their toll there. [Toll is to be paid] as indicated below:

|--|-----------|
| A wagon loaded with goods and merchandize of any kind crossing within the liberty or passing through the liberty | 4d. |
| A cart similarly loaded | 2d. |
| A pack-horse | 1d. |
| A small pack | halfpenny |
| A cartload of salt | halfpenny |
| A man carrying a bundle with a "brestbrede" | halfpenny |
| And without " brestbred " or ox or cow | halfpenny |
| 8 sheep | 1d. |
| A horse led by hand | 1d. |
| If it has been borrowed | nothing |
| Every colt in a stud | halfpenny |
| A pig [at least] two years old | halfpenny |
| And within 4 | halfpenny |

DISCUSSION

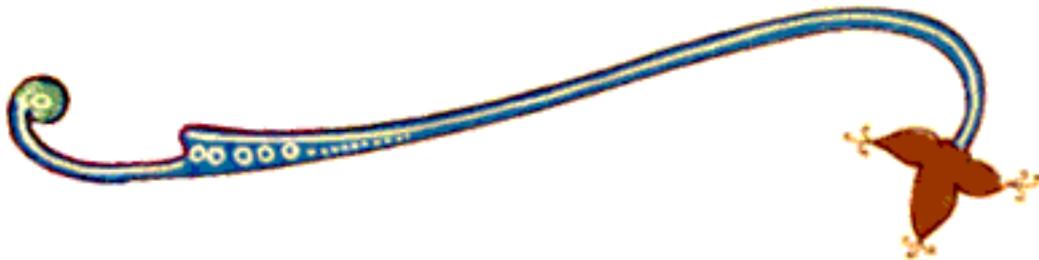

Torksey, Lincolnshire, is situated at the River Trent's junction with the Fosdyke, a Roman cut connecting the Witham (which ran through Lincoln) with the Trent, which itself came northwards from the future site of Nottingham and continued flowing north into the Humber. Regardless of the Roman reasons for creating England's first canal, the Fosdyke was a boon to inland transportation and trade. A settlement was established there in consequence and was important enough to be used in 873 as the base for a Danish army – doubtless because of its location on waterways that facilitated forays by invading forces. By the tenth century it had become one of England's major pottery-making centres, with Torksey ware being sold across the country. It was considered a borough, if a small one, by the time of Domesday. It appears to have had a close relationship with Lincoln, ten miles southeast of Torksey – being described on one occasion as a "suburb" of Lincoln; the Fosdyke allowed Lincoln's trade an alternative route to that via the Witham entering the North Sea at the site of Lincoln's competitor, Boston.

The canal, however, was not maintained well and periodically became so badly silted as to be unusable; in 1121 the Bishop of Lincoln had it scoured to restore its navigability. By the beginning of the fourteenth century the canal appears was becoming impassable again (although perhaps only during the dry period of each year, when its water-level fell), for goods sometimes had to be carted by road between Torksey and Lincoln; the scouring process was repeated in 1335. The Trent, however, was and remained an important inland transportation route between the Midlands and the North of England.

The adverse effects of the Conquest and its aftermath was another contributor to Torksey's fluctuations in fortune: the burgess population dropped by over 50%. Torksey was unable to maintain its early importance into the late Middle Ages.

This document takes the form of an inquisition into what tolls might rightly be taken along a stretch of the Trent by the lord of Torksey, and how the taking of tolls was to be administered. One of the principal features of interest is that the document explicitly deals with some issues that most lists of tolls take for granted, such as the circumstances governing exemptions. The document reflects not only a network of toll-stations along inland waterways, but also the growing number of urban exemptions from such tolls (Nottingham, for example, had its exemption investigated and confirmed by Torksey authorities in 1342), as well as personal exemptions on goods that were not for commercial use (i.e. re-sale) but for personal or household use. At the same time, there was the attempt to restrict loading and unloading of cargos to certain locations where, and situations under which, toll collection could be effectively administered.

NOTES

"thourhtoll and overthuertoll"

My working hypothesis is that these two terms may mean "the water toll" (i.e. on goods transported by river) and "the over the water toll" (goods transported across a bridge over the river – a bridge being the most efficient site for toll collection).

"following places"

The settlements mentioned in the document are scattered along the course of the Trent – all on the east side, as far as I can determine. Apart from Newark-on-Trent (Neuwerke), which lies halfway between Nottingham and Newton-on-Trent, the most southerly appears to be North Clifton (assuming it to be Cleston), a couple of miles above which is Newton-on-Trent (Neuton), with Laugherton (Lagtherterton) lying between Newton and Torksey itself. Marton is less than 5 miles north of Torksey, then comes Lea some 8 miles further. Just north of Lea is Gainsborough, today the largest of the places within the scope of the toll-collecting jurisdiction. At the northern boundary of Gainsborough is Morton (More?) with Stockwith (Stoketh) divided by the Trent into East and West a few miles further north. Continuing along the Trent we reach Owston Ferry, a candidate for Kinardeferi; nearby Susworth (Surtherswath?) does lie between Owston Ferry and West Butterwick (Boterwik). Butterwick and Scotterthorpe (Scotermore?) are towards the northern end of the Trent, where it begins to widen before entering the Humber.

"fother"

A measure of weight; it has been estimated as equivalent to 2100 lbs. avoirdupois, but medieval weights often varied according to time and place.

"frail"

A large wicker basket, commonly used for transporting fruit and woad.

"mailed"

Perhaps refers to chain-link mail, although this is highly speculative.

"clove of teasels"

A clove was a volume in weight. Teasels were used in the cloth-finishing process.

"brestbred"

Perhaps some kind of apparatus strapped around the chest to assist with the carrying of a pack, or possibly something similar to the breast-board used to attach oxen to ploughs?

"borrowed"

My translation "borrowed" assumes the original Latin mutatus is flawed. Mutuatus, borrowed (i.e. the trader is not wealthy enough to own a horse), is more plausible than the vague "altered" or "changed", unless it somehow implies castrated.

TRANSLATION

Here are noted the customs which have traditionally been imposed on things coming to, or being taken out of, London for sale; as was presented to the Barons of the Exchequer by the citizens, at the command of our lord king, while the city was in the hands of the king after the disturbance made in the kingdom in the time of Sir Simon de Montfort, earl of Leicester.

Customs of the city

Scavage

This is the inquisition made in the city of London, by its citizens, concerning the levies and customs that the king has the right to take from merchants and merchandize entering and leaving the city; that is, from those who are subject to customs.

- Forty pence is due as scavage for a load of grain that weighs three hundredweight.

- Sixpence for a load of pepper weighing three and a half hundredweight.
- Eightpence for a load of alum weighing four hundredweight.
- Sixpence is due as scavage for a cargo of sugar, cumin, almonds, brasil, quicksilver, ginger, zedoary, "lake", liquorice, small spices (such as cloves, mace, cubebs, nuts, nutmeg), vermilion, glass, figs, raisins, sumach, sulphur, ivory, cinnamon, gingerbread, rice, turpentine, cotton, whalebone, frankincense, "pioine", anise, dates, chestnuts, orpiment, olive oil, and other kinds of [goods measured by] avoirdupois; of which a cargo should weigh four hundredweight. If there is less than one [full] load, then [the amount of custom is] according to the quantity of the item, down to a quarter [of a load]; that is, threepence for a half load, and a penny halfpenny for a quarter load. The king has the same customs from fine wares associated with spicery, as well as for small seeds, [the amount] according to the weight, and for confectures of spicery.

Levies on Spanish wool and haberdashery

For packs of Spanish wool, "wadmal", mercery, canvas, marten skins, cony skins, furs, linen, fustian, felt, lorimery, fells, haberdashery, squirrel fur, parmentery, shalloons, Rennes cloths, silk cloths, and on other items that are usually in packs, sixpence; for half of a pack, threepence, and for a quarter of a pack, a penny halfpenny.

One penny [is payable on] a dozen of cordwain, one penny the dozen of "godelmynges", one halfpenny the dozen of basan, one halfpenny the pound of silk, one farthing the pound of saffron. Let it be known that this custom is levied only on goods which come from abroad. No customs are due from wax, verdigris, copper, tin, or grey-work, if they do not pass beyond Thames Street towards the north; if they do pass, they shall pay sixpence for a pack, threepence for half a pack, or a penny halfpenny for a quarter of a pack.

Customs on victuals

The customs applicable to the small trades in the market of London:

- Three-farthings is payable for every quantity of poultry brought by packhorse, freemen excepted.
- Every man who brings cheese or poultry, if it is worth fourpence halfpenny, shall pay a halfpenny, freemen excepted.
- If a man on foot brings 100 eggs or more, he shall give five eggs, freemen excepted.
- A man or woman who brings any kind of poultry by packhorse, and unloads it, shall pay three-farthings as stallage. If a man transports it on his back and then sets it on the ground, he shall pay a halfpenny, no matter what his franchise.
- A halfpenny per day is payable for every bread-basket. A bread-basket brought by a baker to the west of the Walbrook is due a penny halfpenny if coming to market on Sunday, but only a halfpenny on other days.
- Every foreign butcher who sells meat in the market shall pay a penny for stallage on Sunday.
- A halfpenny is payable from every cart bringing grain into the city for sale; if it enters by Holborn or the Fleet, one penny is to be paid, freemen excepted.
- Every man who brings grain by packhorse, no matter whether a quarter or a half [quarter], and unloads it shall pay a farthing, no matter what his franchise. If he is a freeman and sells it from his horse, he shall pay nothing.
- A halfpenny is payable from every cart from Bromley or Stepney which comes to the city with bread. A halfpenny or one loaf is payable from a cart bringing bread into the city from some other town, no matter what the franchise [of the owner].
- A halfpenny is payable from a cart bringing earthen pots, no matter what the franchise.
- A farthing is payable from a cart bringing coal for sale, at whatever place the coal is sold, no matter what the franchise.
- A halfpenny is payable from a cart bringing alder wood for sale.
- A halfpenny is payable from a cart bringing timber, with or without the bark, except for squared oak timber (which pays nothing).
- A cart bringing boards for sale, if it brings twenty-five or more, shall give one board; if fewer than that, it gives nothing.

- A cart bringing oak laths shall give one lath. If it brings beech laths it shall give a halfpenny and one lath.
- Twopence is payable from a cart bringing nuts or cheese; twopence halfpenny if it enters by the Fleet or by Holborn.
- Twopence is payable from a cart bringing fish or poultry to West Cheap.
- Twopence is payable from a hired cart coming to the city with wool, hides or other merchandize. Twopence halfpenny if it enters by Holborn, the Fleet, or Aldersgate.
- For every dead Jew [to be] buried in London, threepence halfpenny.
- A halfpenny from every cart bringing bark; if it enters by Holborn or the Fleet, nothing.
- A halfpenny and one bunch of leeks is payable from every cart bringing leeks during Lent.
- Sevenpence halfpenny is payable from a cart carrying woad out of the city, if it carries four quarters or more; if less, it shall pay one penny per quarter.
- A halfpenny is payable from a cart bringing cod, herring or other types of fish.
- A farthing is payable by any man or woman whom brings bread [worth] fourpence halfpenny from St. Albans to sell.

Smithfield customs

These are the customs [payable] at Smithfield:

- One penny for every full-grown cow or bull sold, freemen excepted.
- One penny for every dozen sheep; if there are fewer (or just a single one), a halfpenny.
- If foreign traders bring bulls, cows, sheep or pigs between Martinmas [11 November] and Christmas, they must give the bailiff the third-best beast, or must reach [some other] agreement with the bailiff before entering the county of Middlesex.
- If a bailiff takes from the [Smith]field as scavage a bull or cow priced at 13s.4d or more, he must reimburse the trader 3s.4d for the hide.
- If a foreign trader brings lean pigs for sale between Hokeday and Michaelmas [29 September], he must give the bailiff the third-best pig, unless he pays a fine of sixpence or twelve pence to the bailiff.

Customs of the bridge

These are the customs of the bridge.

- A ship bringing cod, without any other fish, shall give two cod, freemen excepted.
- A ship coming with cod or rays shall give one cod and one ray, freemen excepted.
- A ship coming with herring (fresh or salted) shall give 100 herring, freemen excepted.
- A ship with bulwarks which anchors in the Thames must pay twopence for strandage, freemen excepted.
- A ship bringing sea-bass, conger [eels], mullet, turbot, shad, [or] eels, pays no custom other than twopence for strandage of the ship.
- A ship with bales which anchors in the Thames must pay one penny, freemen excepted.
- A ship bringing mackerel shall give 26 mackerel, freemen excepted. The same [proportion of] custom is to taken by the bailiff from a ship bringing ling or haddock.
- A boat bringing five panniers of whelks shall give one pannier and one halfpenny, freemen excepted. The same custom is to be taken by the bailiff from a ship bringing ling; it is not to pay more for bringing a larger volume.
- If a boat belonging to a foreigner brings ling, mackerel, or haddock, but the fish belong to a freeman of the city, no custom is payable except for a halfpenny for strandage of the boat. If the fish belong to a foreigner, the bailiff may take 26 of the fish and the halfpenny for the boat. If half of the fish belong to a foreigner, he only need pay half of the custom.
- A boat rowed using tholes that comes to Oystergate shall pay one halfpenny, freemen excepted.
- A boat rowed [with oars] within rowlocks that comes to Oystergate shall pay one penny; if a half-share in the boat belongs to a freeman of the city and the other half to a foreigner, the latter is to pay half of the custom – that is, a halfpenny.

- If an outsider buys cod in the city and exports it for resale, he is to give twopence per hundred, one penny for fifty, and a halfpenny for twenty-five, freemen excepted.
- If an outsider buys white herring or red herring in the city, he is to give one halfpenny per thousand of the white, and a farthing per thousand of the other.
- Merchants who bring fish (cod and rays excepted) into the city by land, by packhorse, are to give one fish per dorser and a halfpenny per horse.
- Outsider merchants who buy fish in the city and export it for resale are to give a farthing per horseload.
- If a cart brings a foreigner's salmon into the city, the bailiff may take the second-best salmon as custom, and twopence for the cart. If the salmon belongs to a freeman of the city, the bailiff shall not take any of the fish, only twopence for the cart.
- A cart bringing white or red herring into the city is to give five herring and twopence for the cart, freemen excepted.
- A cart bringing mackerel is to give five mackerel and twopence for the cart, freemen excepted.
- The bailiff may take the same from ling brought by cart.
- A cart bringing cod is to give one cod and twopence for the cart, freemen excepted.
- A cart bringing eels is to pay twopence, but nothing for the fish.
- A halfpenny is payable for a horse bringing apples, pears or other kinds of fruit.
- A halfpenny is payable for a cart bringing other kinds of fruit.

Fees of the bailiff of the bridge

The bailiff may not take anything from a man [carrying goods]. From every boat bringing sprats, if it is not of the franchise of London, the bailiff may have a basketful and one farthing for the boat. From a ship bringing dabs, twenty-six dabs per hundred are due; if it brings fewer [than a hundred] nothing is due, and if greater no more is due than for a hundred. One penny is payable on a porpoise; if it is cut up for selling by retail, the bailiff shall have the entrails, the tail, and the three fins. From a ship bringing conger the bailiff may take the best and the second-best for his fee, based on the highest price set on their sale; if it is from the Cinque Ports [however], nothing is given. Two salmon are due from a Scottish ship bringing salmon; if it brings salmon and cod, one salmon and one cod are due; if salmon and haddock, one salmon and thirteen haddock; and twopence for the ship. The first ship arriving from Yarmouth with white herring, from which full custom is due, shall give 200 herring; any other ship which arrives afterwards shall give 100 herring, freemen excepted.

Billingsgate customs

- Twopence is due from every large ship that comes to shore, for strandage. From a small ship with oarlocks that comes to shore, a penny. From a boat that comes to shore, a halfpenny.
- For two quarters of grain, measured by the king's quarter, a farthing.
- For one coombe of grain coming by water, one penny.
- For every quarter of woad exported from the city by water, a halfpenny.
- For two quarters of sea-coal, measured by the king's quarter, a farthing.
- For every tun of ale exported overseas by outsider merchants, 4d.
- For every thousand herring imported or exported by outsiders, a farthing, freemen excepted.
- If an outsider exports cod from of the city, he is to give twopence per hundred.
- If an outsider merchant exports overseas butter, tallow, or lard, he is to give threepence halfpenny for the first wey and a halfpenny for every additional wey.
- For every wey of cheese exported by an outsider, fourpence.
- For every last of leather exported by an outsider, twelve pence.
- For a dicker of leather exported, twopence.
- For nonpareil leather exported, a halfpenny.
- For every truss of leather tied with cords, fourpence.
- For every truss of any kind of merchandize, large or small, tied with cords, fourpence.
- For every truss of cloth, large or small, exported abroad by an outsider, fourpence.

- For "harpoys" and "fysseponde", a penny farthing.
- For a portion of sulphur, a penny farthing.
- For every tun of wine imported or exported, on which duty is payable, twopence.
- For every tun of honey on which duty is payable, twelve pence.
- From every ship bringing nuts, fourpence.
- For a single store in a ship, fourpence.
- [For] a cargo of nuts, fourpence.
- For every cartload of lead exported by an outsider, fourpence.
- For every hundredweight of iron imported or exported abroad by an outsider, a farthing.
- For every two quarters of onions imported by an outsider, a farthing.
- For every hundred bunches of garlic, a halfpenny.
- For every last of clay and potter's earth imported and exported by an outsider, threepence.
- For every last of barrelled herring [exported] by an outsider, threepence.
- For every hundred of the boards called wainscot, a halfpenny.
- For every hundred of the boards called "Ryghholt", one penny.
- For one ton of flax imported or exported by an outsider, fourpence; if less than a ton, twopence. For flax that comes in bundles, one penny per dozen.
- For every wey of feathers [imported] by an outsider, twopence.
- For horses and other animals exported by an outsider, fourpence a head.
- For a barrel of litmus [imported] by an outsider, a farthing.
- For a hundred stockfish coming from Prussia, a farthing.
- For pottery brought in – that is, tureens, pipkins, patens, earthen pots – or other small wares (other than mentioned above) imported or exported abroad, the bailiff is to take nothing.

It is ordered that no boatman transporting passengers from Billingsgate to Gravesend, or vice versa, is to charge more than twopence per passenger.

DISCUSSION

In the conflict between Henry III and his barons, London's ruling class were satisfied to remain loyal to the king. Popular discontent however surfaced in the form of an uprising in 1263, which led to de Montfort being welcomed into the city and Londoners furnishing part of his army for the victory at Lewes. Following de Montfort's defeat and death in 1265, London's government was seized into the king's hand for several years. It was in this context that the above record was made of the tolls that could be imposed on various merchandize entering the city.

By the latter half of the thirteenth century, London's population may have been approaching as many as 80,000 residents. This provided an important market. The wealthier citizens, along with the residents of the several monasteries and episcopal households in the suburbs, and the members of the royal court, provided a clientele for luxury goods. London was itself an industrial centre for the production of such goods.

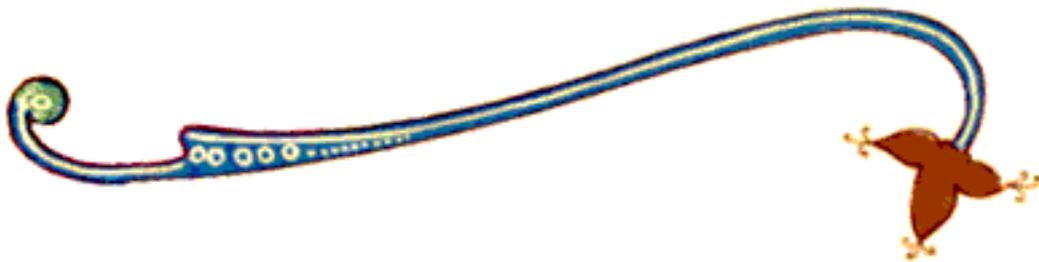

Scavage was a type of import duty collectable from those not citizens (in this case, of London). Half went to the revenues of the sheriffs, while the other half belonged to the citizens who hosted the merchants who brought the goods from which scavage was payable. A further passage, of f.193 of Liber Albus also deals with scavage, but the customs specified there were double those reported to the king; the same being true of the customs on cloths and furs. This is probably because the inquisition of the 1260s ignored the half payable to the hosts.

On some of these items (e.g. wool, cheese, leather, ale), tronage or pesage were also payable, these being fees for weighing merchandize.

The items on which customs were payable give a good sense of merchandize being traded in the city, and of the diet of medieval townspeople. There are represented both luxury goods brought from overseas, and basic foodstuffs and other necessaries – the small trades being those dealing in small quantities (retail) of necessaries – produced in the region around London and brought into the city for sale primarily at Cheapside, although some of the commodities evidently might be sold wherever the seller thought a convenient spot, or wherever buyers might be found. It was assumed that the unloading of goods from a packhorse represented an intention to sell them. Less apparent to the modern eye from the lists is that some of the items listed may have been intended as drugs or medicaments for distribution by apothecaries (a term applied to spicers) or grocers. Spices such as cloves, mace, nutmegs, ginger, cinnamon, almonds, could be used to stimulate the appetite of the sickly. Besides their principal use by the dyeing industry, alum and copperas were applied to wounds (metal sulphates were believed to be antiseptics). Honey was also used to balm wounds – it contains an antibacterial enzyme – and even ink could be used on wounds.

Additional passages following after those above dealt with customs levied at Queenhithe (the earliest harbour/market of the post-Roman city, towards the western end of the walled precinct, in which part the Saxons first settled), the wool market at Woolchurchhaw, and the grain and produce market at Gracechurch, for goods similar to those already noted.

NOTES

General note

The text of the original did not have the various tolls itemized; I have formatted it thus for easier comprehension.

"scavage"

According to Riley, the meaning of scavage derives from the inspection of goods by customs officers; thus it would not so much be a toll as a fee.

"hundredweight"

A medieval hundredweight – 100 lb. (now 112 lb.) – was equivalent to about 45 kg.

"load"

The word here translated "load" was kark, whence our "cargo" and (less commonly used now) "charge"; while those terms are today used in a general sense, they had a more specific use in medieval times – possibly 3 or 4 cwt., as the Liber Albus says at one point – for a kark was given precise definition in the Assize of Weights and Measures.

"alum"

Used in dyeing cloth; it was the most common, easiest to use, and one of the most effective of several metallic salts that could be used to fix the colour a cloth was dyed. Its main source was trade with Italy.

"cumin"

A common spice grown and used in medieval Europe; while it might have been grown in England, supplies were more likely to have come from the Mediterranean.

"almonds"

A very popular element in medieval cookery. Although Palestine was the probable original source for importing them into Europe, the trees came to be cultivated in many European countries.

"brasil"

A wood originating in the East Indies, or an extract therefrom, used for dyeing and in red ink.

"zedoary"

A bitter, aromatic spice originating in the East Indies, with stimulant properties.

"lake"

May perhaps refer to lilac, used by apothecaries. Riley notes that "lak" was used for a fine linen; however, that meaning would seem out of place in this list.

"liquorice"

A sweet root, or the extract therefrom, used by apothecaries; supplies were probably brought from the Mediterranean.

"cubebs"

A plant grown in the East Indies, and probably reached Europe through the Middle East; its fruit was bitter and aromatic, and was used as a pepper.

"vermilion"

Made from cinnabar, which came from the Red Sea; it was purchased through Italian merchants; it was used for dyeing cloth, and for colouring sealing wax.

"sumach"

The leaves, and to some extent the bark, were a source of tannin, for treating leather, while the berries yield a black dye. There are also medicinal uses, but whether these were known during the Middle Ages, I cannot say. Species of the plant were widely distributed throughout Europe, but the likely source at this period was southern Europe.

"cinnamon"

Originated in Asia, but reached Europe through trade with the Middle East.

"frankincense"

A gum from the Middle East, used in incense because of its sweet odour.

"pioine"

The meaning of "pioine" is uncertain; Riley offered various possibilities: prunes; a sweet liquid; seed of the peony; hemp. My inclination is slightly towards peony seeds, which may have been used by apothecaries, or even perhaps as a spice.

"anise"

Used for flavouring both foods and drinks. Native to the eastern Mediterranean, it was also cultivated in Central Europe in the Middle Ages.

"orpiment"

Orpiment (auripigment) was a mineral – an arsenic – used as a yellow dye.

"packs"

The term here translated packs (in regard to cloths, furs etc.) is in the original feez. Riley assumed this was a plural form referring to the tolls, and translated the term as "fixed charge". However, I suspect – in part based also on use of the term in the Norwich list of tolls – that it derives from the Latin fessa, which was a type of measure known to have been applied to furs, and is a singular. Not knowing precisely what the measure was, I have chosen the relatively neutral term "pack" as translation.

"wadmal"

A thick, coarse kind of woollen cloth, made particularly in Iceland and other northern countries.

"mercery"

Although a mercer originally traded in a variety of goods, the term came to refer to specialization in high-quality cloths (e.g. silk).

"lorimery"

Leather worked to make harnesses and bridles. Riley thought the reference to a single, specific item, which he hypothesised to be cloth for covering saddles.

"haberdashery"

Small wares made of cloth; Riley, however, thought the reference to a single specific item, suggesting hapertas or hauberget, a coarse, thick cloth (such as that used for monks' habits).

"parmentery"

Clothing made out of leather

"shalloons"

Originally produced in Châlons, they were loosely woven, lightweight woollen cloths, often used for lining clothes.

"Rennes"

The original Reynes might also be translated at Rheims, but the city of Rennes, Brittany, had a reputation for fine linen in the Middle Ages.

"dozen"

In relation to some goods (e.g. cloth), "dozen" represented a volume rather than a quantity.

"cordwain" "godelmynges"

Cordwain was a soft, fine-grained leather originally produced in Cordoba, originally using goat-skin, and tawed with alum; it was particularly used in shoemaking.

"Godelmynges" appear to have been the same, except using the skins of young animals; Riley suggested this term derived from Godalming, Surrey.

"basan"

Leather made from sheep-skin and tanned using the bark of an oak or larch. It was inferior to cordwain, although unscrupulous cordwainers might sometimes try to pass off basan for cordwain; there was a separate branch of leatherworkers using basan.

"saffron"

Used to produce a yellow dye; it was both grown domestically and imported.

"No customs"

The items from which no customs were due are referred to elsewhere as merchandize brought by German merchants, and presumably relates to exemptions from customs the Hanse towns had acquired from the king .

Evidently they were only exempt from custom if sold on the quayside.

"verdigris"

The meaning of the term in the original, argoil, is uncertain. Riley believed it meant cream of tartar (used in dyeing), but noted that others had interpreted it as potters clay (Fr. argile). Archil (Lat. arguella), a violet dye obtained from a lichen, is a further possibility. However, given the contextualization of the term at London in association with copper and at Ipswich in association with copperas, I favour the translation of verdigris (Lat. argelzarus), a green or blue compound involving copper that is today used as a paint pigment and was used in the cloth-dyeing process in the Middle Ages.

"grey-work"

A type of fur.

"stallage"

Stallage was a fee for the right to set up a stall from which to sell goods. Traders in small quantities of goods might not bother with a stall, or might carry the goods around the streets, like pedlars. Therefore it was considered that unloading of poultry from the horse's back, to display them on the ground, was tantamount to selling from a fixed place and ought to be subject to the equivalent of stallage.

"Walbrook" "West Cheap"

The Walbrook was a stream running between the Thames and the northern stretch of wall, dividing the city into eastern and western halves, each half having its own market – the former one (East Cheap) serving particularly goods brought by the Thames, the latter (West Cheap) more for land-transported goods. The reference here seems to indicate the the toll was applicable only to West Cheap.

"foreign"

In this context, foreign means someone not a freeman of the city.

"Holborn or the Fleet"

The names refer to streets that crossed the River Fleet (ran into the Thames just west of the walled precinct); Fleet street entered the city at Ludgate, and Holborn at Newgate. These were the two western entrances into the city.

"Bromley or Stepney"

Stepney is on the Thames, just east of the city, of which it was considered a suburb. There is a Bromley a few miles south of London, although Riley thought the reference was to an Essex location. Why these two places were treated differently from others, I do not know.

"laths"

A thin plank used for walls and ceilings in house construction.

"Aldersgate"

The original is Allgate. Aldersgate being on the same side of the city as the Fleet and Holborn, Riley preferred this interpretation to Aldgate (which was on the east side of the city).

"buried"

The only official Jewish cemetery in England was in London (although other cities with large Jewish communities did develop cemeteries locally); this toll was likely not on the burial itself, but on carts bringing corpses into the city.

"St. Albans"

St. Albans is well to the north of London. It is interesting that a commodity as common and as perishable as bread might be brought from so far away.

"Smithfield"

(West) Smithfield was the extensive site of the livestock markets, in the northwest suburb.

"Middlesex"

A county eliminated in the late 20th century, it was under the jurisdiction of the London authorities.

"scavage"

A fee/toll paid for the official inspection of goods brought into the city for sale.

"Hokeday"

A moveable feast: the second Tuesday following Easter.

"the bridge"

This is of course London Bridge, the only medieval bridge linking the city with the southern shore of the Thames (there having been a ford and perhaps a bridge in the vicinity of London since before the Romans arrived, it crossing the river near the site of the present Vauxhall bridge, west of the site of the medieval city). The Thames bank on either side of the bridge held a concentration of wharfs and was effectively the city's port at that time. The bridge was a logical place to collect customs and may have been one location where fish were sold, although not the city's principal fishmarket.

"bulwarks"

Scaltres is the original term translated by Riley as bulwarks, which were the protective siding which extended above the upper deck of a ship; here the possession of bulwarks is apparently being used as a criterion for differentiating a larger from a smaller ship.

"strandage"

A fee for use of the beach (strand), in this case for anchorage (or stranding).

"bales"

Rings attached to a ship for tying ropes that supported other elements of the vessel.

"ling"

Riley suspected that ling (merling) might refer to whiting; Tingey followed this in his translation of the Norwich list of tolls. However, the term could have referred to various types of sea-fish.

"panniers"

Large baskets intended for carrying a volume of materials.

"tholes" "rowlocks"

Tholes were wooden pegs set in pairs into the gunwale on each side of a boat, to support oars. Oarlocks, or rowlocks, implied a larger boat.

"Oystergate"

One of the wharfs on the Thames.

"dorser"

A type of basket, of which one was slung over each side of a packhorse.

"Billingsgate"

Perhaps the second oldest of the London harbours, in use by late tenth century. At the time the tolls were recorded in the 1260s, it was not, however, London's fishmarket; it acquired a royal charter recognising market rights in 1327, but was a general market for water-borne goods, and was not exclusively a fishmarket until the post-medieval period.

"coombe"

Half a quarter.

"tun"

A cask holding the equivalent of 2 pipes (or 252 gallons).

"last"

A last was a weight or measure that varied according to the type of material. The term was applied to any pack of goods used to transport merchandise, on which the toll called lastage was levied. In the case of leather, it comprised two hundred hides. Regarding fish, it would probably have comprised several barrels worth; in the case of herring, possibly 12 barrels.

"dicker"

A measure of ten hides.

"nonpareil"

In this context may have meant pieces of leather of different (irregular) sizes.

"truss"

A bale, possibly containing roughly 50 hides.

"harpoys" "fyssheponde"

Harpoys, according to Riley, was a mixture of tallow, wax and tar, used to waterproof the exterior of ships; he was less certain about fyssheponde but suspected it to mean a container in which a catch was stored aboard fishing-vessels (i.e. fish-pound).

"store"

The item containing reference to a "store" (garner), since it does not specify what of, may relate to the preceding and succeeding clauses concerning nuts – unless perhaps the term connotes "storage" rather than "cargo". The term also appears in the lpswich list of customs, applied to nuts and other victuals.

"Ryghholt"

Wood from Riga.

"litmus"

Used as a dyeing agent; it was made from lichens found principally along the Mediterranean coast.

"tureens, pipkins, patens"

A tureen was a large, deep vessel (for broth), whereas pipkins were small earthen pots. Patens were flat dishes.

TRANSLATION

The Hallmoot and statutes of the fishmongers

The men of the hallmoot say that they ought to hold two lawmoots a year; that is, one around St. Martin's feastday [11 November] and the other around Lent. All fishermen who belong to the hallmoot ought to be present. Whoever defaults in appearance shall incur an amercement of 21d. Henceforth that hallmoot should prohibit that any fishmonger buy fresh fish before mass has been celebrated at the Chapel on the Bridge or at St. Martin's church. They also say that fishermen should sell fresh fish [only] after mass, and salt fish [after] prime.

None of the fishmongers should act against free trade in fish beyond the prescribed boundaries. These are the boundaries: the Chapel on the Bridge; Baynard's Castle; Jordan's quay; except for fish set out [publicly] for sale, the same at Barking, Northfleet, Dartford, or any other market.

No-one may buy fish from a ship that is afloat until it has moored.

No-one should declare any fish unless they are his own goods, concerning fish [acquired] for profit or loss.

Men of the said trade are to give their bailiff 26s.8d a year [as salary]; that is, 13s.4d around Christmas, and the remainder around Easter; that is, [in?] farthings, halfpennies and pennies, such as the [toll] collectors are able to collect. The reason for the 26s.8d is because if a member of the hallmoot is impleaded in the [city] husting, the bailiff's duty is to have the plea transferred from there to the husting in the Bridge Street hallmoot, [and his duties also include] distraing their [i. e. fishmongers'] debtors.

The monks of St. Albans are to give the bailiff 13s.4d a year; but the bailiff should go or send for it.

A "spindelers" boat that brings fresh cod or rays shall give from each boat, for every 26 cod and 26 rays, one cod and one ray. If it only carries one type of fish, it shall give two fishes. If it carries ling and some other fish, it shall give half [of the due] of one type and the other half of the other type. If the whole [cargo] is ling, it shall give 26 ling, and a halfpenny for the boat [as wharfage].

A Flemish "hoc" ship gives the same customs for fish, and 2d. for the ship if it drops [anchor] in the Bridge Street soke.

A "mang" boat gives the same customs for fish. One that brings sprats shall give one tandle of sprats, except those of the city of London, which do not pay customs. And for the ship, a farthing.

A ship that brings mackerel shall give 26 mackerel – that is, those from which full customs are due.

[From] a ship that brings fish in dorsers the sergeant may take from each dorser one fish, excepting: cod, rays, conger, dory, turbot, sea-bass, and surmullet.

In the same way, for dorsers brought by land and on horseback, a halfpenny, which is due by tradition.

A boat that brings at least a hundred dabs is to give 26; even if it has more, it need not give more.

A whelk-boat of at least 5 tandles shall give one heaped tandle. If it has more than five tandles, it shall give two heaped tandles, and 1d. for the boat.

One penny is payable on a porpoise; if it is cut up, the bailiff may have the entrails, with the tail and fins in town.

Of conger brought by water, the bailiff shall have as his fee one of the best and another of the second-best, according to what is determined by their sale. If [a boat] is rowed using tholes, it shall pay a halfpenny; if rowed using rowlocks, a penny. If it is from the Cinque Ports, it pays no money.

An oyster-boat rowed using tholes shall pay a halfpenny; if using rowlocks, a penny.

A Scottish ship that brings salmon, [shall give] 2 salmon; if salmon and cod, one salmon and one cod; if salmon and haddock, one salmon and thirteen haddock; if all are haddock, 26 haddock; if all are herring, 100 herring, except on salted herring; and the ship shall pay 2d.

The first herring-laden ship arriving from Yarmouth which ought to pay full custom shall give 200 herring. Other ships that arrive afterwards and which ought to pay full custom shall give 100 herring. From a cart bringing salmon the bailiff may take the second-best, and 2d. for the cart. If it brings mackerel, it shall give 5 mackerel; if it brings ling, it shall give 5 ling; if it brings herring, it shall give 5 herring; and 2d. for the cart. If it brings eels, nothing [is due]; but 2d. for the cart. From a cart which comes to the marketplace, the fishmongers' bailiff shall have a fish, but no money, except in Bridge Street and in the fishmarket in the west.

A ship with bulwarks which anchors owes 2d. A ship with bales which anchors owes 1d.; if it does not anchor, it need give nothing.

Anyone bringing fish by land after mealtime is allowed to warehouse his fish, and the following day to display it in the king's marketplace.

Whoever informs on any member of the hallmoot who shall have gone outside the boundaries to buy fish, he may have half of the confiscated fish and the bailiff the other half.

No stockfishmonger nor apprentice ought to board a ship for purposes of buying fish; nor should any porter, unless summoned.

No outsider should buy [fish by retail] from an outsider.

No outsider should board any whelk-boat unless summoned; rather, the boatman, or the man who owns the whelk-boat, should have them weighed [i.e. before the whelks are sold].

No-one should retail fish on the quayside.

No-one should carry about cooked whelks with the purpose of selling them [in the streets]; whoever does so shall be amerced and his whelks confiscated.

DISCUSSION

The fishmongers' gild, first heard of in the thirteenth century but likely existing by the twelfth, was particularly powerful in London and had its own court (hallmoot) for dealing with cases involving its members – a degree of independence from the city courts (despite the fact that the city sheriffs presided) which, together with abusive or fraudulent business practices, caused a good deal of resentment in the community and was one reason behind reform movements such as that of John de Northampton. Fish being such a staple of the diet of the average medieval town-dweller – because it was plentiful and fast-days of the church often restricted consumption of meat – the accessibility of fish at cheap prices was a matter of public concern.

A set of very similar ordinances, in French, was copied into Liber Albus immediately after those above; they were said to have been enacted ca.1280. There are a number of points of comparison in the document here translated with the list of tolls from mid-thirteenth century, notably the sections concerning tolls levied at London Bridge. Several of the remaining provisions of this document are concerned, in essence, with the forestalling of fish before it had reached the city, or before ships coming to city quays had docked.

Fish brought to the city in carts or on packhorses may well have simply been landed at points higher up the Thames (e.g. Barking, Dartford), to sell what could be sold there, and bring the rest on to London. The wholesale marketing of fish brought by water was expected to be undertaken during the morning; that brought by land could be sold in the afternoon, or put in storage until the next day. A separate set of ordinances required that cargoes of fish arriving at night not be brought ashore until dawn of the following day. The same ordinances emphasised that all fish landed should be exposed to public view, except for that belonging to the masters of the fishmongers' guild, who could (under the surveillance of the sergeant) carry it off to their warehouses, to be brought to the next market and sold.

"lawmoots"

A lawmoot (in some places referred to as a lawday) was a general court session at which all owing suit to the court were expected to attend, and one of the principal purposes was the presentment of offences against the community.

"fishmonger" "fishermen"

The document appears to make a deliberate distinction between piscatores and piscenarii; so my working assumption is that the former refers to fishermen, the latter to fishmongers, although the terms were sometimes used interchangeably.

"prime"

The hour of prime was about 6 a.m.; the restriction on selling salt fish before that hour was elsewhere specified as applying only to fish owned by non-freemen. The mass referred to would have been matins, celebrated just before dawn.

"act against free trade"

This meant forestalling outside the boundaries specified.

"for profit or loss"

I.e. fish intended to be resold, with the hope of making a profit but risk of making a loss. The thrust of this clause is to make it clear that pretending the goods of others to be one's own was prohibited in cases where toll would normally be payable (i.e. on fish acquired for resale, rather than personal consumption).

"duties"

To the list of duties of the bailiff of the fishmongers' gild, the copy of this document in the Liber Custumarum adds "or to do whatever justice dictates."

"13s.4d"

The special fee paid the bailiff by the abbey of St. Albans was for the privilege of buying fish directly from fishermen, so long as it was only for feeding the monks.

"spindelers"

"Spindeler" (spinlere in another copy of this document): query, connection with spinnaker?

"ling"

Riley suspected that ling (merling) might refer to whiting, known to zoologists as Merlangius merlangus; Tingey followed this in his translation of the Norwich list of tolls. However, during the Middle Ages the term could have referred to various types of sea-fish.

"tandle"

A measure, quantity now unknown, specifically applied to fish and shellfish; it appears that 5 tandles – which were probably some form of basket – was a typical capacity of a whelk-boat.

"dorsers"

Baskets designed to be carried on the back (of humans or horses). It seems they held about a bushel.

"tholes" "rowlocks"

Tholes were wooden pegs set in pairs into the gunwale on each side of a boat, to support oars. Oarlocks, or rowlocks, implied a larger boat.

"bulwarks" "bales"

Bulwarks were the protective siding which extended above the upper deck of a ship, bales were rings attached to a ship for tying ropes that supported other elements of the vessel. These features are used here as criteria for differentiating a larger from a smaller ship.

"stockfishmonger"

A dealer in stockfish, which were fish (such as cod) cured by drying them in the cold air, until hard, and then beating them with clubs or "stocks".

"whelks"

Other ordinances specified that whelks could be bought directly from the fishermen.

TRANSLATION

These are the customs belonging to [\[payment of\]](#) the king's farm of the town of Ipswich, to be levied there on various merchandize coming into the town franchise for sale, and on diverse items, namely those on which custom ought to be paid, in the way described below, that is:

Customs of the quay

- For every tun or pipe of wine, vinegar, cider, sour wine, and all other types of liquor brought into the town franchise for sale, 2d. is to be taken for king's custom.
- For every tun or pipe of honey, oil, ointment, or similar type of merchandize, 2d. If it is sold by the gallon, then 4d. is to be taken for every 100 gallons; and for a smaller amount, less, depending on the quantity.
- For every barrel of pitch or tar, 1d.
- For every tun of ale carried or taken out of the town towards the sea or sea-coast for sale, 4d.; that is, if the tun is bought by container. If the tun is bought by measure, then 4d. is payable for every 100 gallons.

- For every tun of woad, 2d.
- For every barrel of ashes, 2d.
- For every tun or pipe of verdigris, [or] copperas, or any other similar type of merchandize, 3d.; if these are to be sold by the hundredweight, then 4d. is to be levied per hundredweight.
- For every ton or pipe of teazel, 2d.; for every "rundelete" or "bastoun" of the same merchandize, a halfpenny.
- For every truss or pack of cloth arriving at the quay tied with cords 4d. is to be levied. For every bundle that is not tied up, 2d. If the truss, pack or bundle is untied and part of it is sold in town, then custom is to be levied for those pieces according the specifications for the cloth market.
- For every truss or pack of canvas tied with cords, 4d. For every bundle not tied up, 2d. For canvas sold by the hundredweight, 4d. per hundredweight.
- For cloths from Coggeshall, Maldon, Colchester, Sudbury, and other cloths bought in the countryside and brought into the town by merchants, to export abroad via the quay – regardless of whether the cloths are in a truss, pack or bundle, or whether tied up or not, or whether in a tun or not – the king's custom is to be paid by the piece on such cloths bought outside for export. That is, for every piece of double-work, which people call "two men's sheet", 1d.; and for every piece of lesser work, which people call "one man's sheet", a halfpenny. But if these types of cloths, previously mentioned, are bought within the town of Ipswich, the correct custom is determined according to the market where the cloths are purchased; and if those cloths are put into a tun for transporting abroad via the quay, 2d. per tun must be paid for them towards the king's custom. Furthermore, for a truss or pack tied with cords, 4d.; and for a bundle not tied up, 2d.
- For every last of wool belonging to a single merchant, 8d.; for half a last, 4d. If there is less than that, then 4d. for every sack or packet.
- For every last of millstones, 8d; for half a last, 4d. If there is less than half a last, then 1d. to be levied for each millstone.

- For every last of smaller millstones, 4d.; for half a last, 2d. If there is less than half a last, then a halfpenny to be levied for every couple.
- For every stone called a "Slipston", a halfpenny; such stones are not assessed by the last.
- For every hundred freestones and black stones called "ragston", 4d.
- For every piece of carved marble – such as coffins, lids, crosses, fonts, and other stones of this type – a halfpenny; that is, from the seller if he is subject to custom, and as much from the buyer if he is a merchant.
- For every hundred mortars, 4d. If there are fewer, then 1d. per dozen is to be levied.
- For every heap of plaster, a halfpenny.
- For every type of merchandize which arrives in bales, 4d. per bale is to be levied. If this is merchandize to be sold and weighed by the hundredweight – such as brasil, alum, almonds, rice, and other such kinds of merchandize – then 4d. is to be levied per hundredweight.
- For every frail of figs, raisins, and all other items put into frails, a halfpenny per frail is to be levied.
- For every hundredweight of grain, 6s.8d.
- For every dozen cordwain (not in bales), 4d.
- For every thousand[weight] of Spanish iron, 4d. if it is sold by the thousand[weight]. For every quintal sold by itself, 1d.
- For every hundredweight of wrought iron, 4d.
- For every hundredweight of Normandy iron, 4d.
- For every quantity of old iron, 2d.
- For every load of lead, 8d.; for every pig, 1d.
- For every hundredweight of tin, brass, and copper, 4d.
- For every barrel of steel, 2d. For every sheaf of steel sold by itself, a farthing from the buyer. For every bundle of steel sold by itself, a halfpenny.
- Regarding osmond, the custom is to be levied in the same way as for lead.
- For every piece of ore of brass, latten or copper, a farthing is to be levied.
- Also, for every thousand white furs, 2s.; for half a thousand,

12d. If there are fewer than half a thousand, then 4d. is to be levied for every bundle.

- For every thousand squirrels' furs and wheels [?], 12d.; for half a thousand, 6d. If there are fewer than half a thousand, then 2d. is to be levied for every bundle.
- For every hundred woollfells or skins being exported, whether in sarpliers or not, 4d.
- For every hundred skins of lambs, badgers, rabbits, foxes, cats, and other similar skins being exported, whether in a bale or not, 4d. If these types of skins are sold by the hundred, at the quayside, or elsewhere in town, then 4d. is to be levied per hundred.
- For every last of cow-hides and horse-hides, 8d.; for half a last, 4d. If there is less than half a last, then 4d. is to be levied for every dicker; and if less than a dicker, a halfpenny is to be levied for every hide.
- Also, for every last of red herring sold together by the last, 4d. from the seller. If there is less than a last, then a halfpenny is to be levied for every thousand.
- For every last of fresh or salt herring, 4d. from the seller (except those that caught the fish themselves).
- For every hundred of any kind of hard fish, 2d.
- For every salmon, a halfpenny.
- For every quintal of whale[meat], 4d.
- Also, for every hundred[weight?] of wax sold by weight, 4d. If they are in a frail tied with cords, 4d. is to be taken per frail.
- For every wey of cheese, butter, and lard sold by itself, 4d. If the butter is stored in bark, a halfpenny is to be levied per piece.
- For every wey of the same merchandize being exported, whether in a tun or not, 4d.
- Also, for every hundred swords, bucklers, targets, and coats of mail, 4d. If there are fewer than that, quantity will determine the amount to be levied from the seller and also from the buyer, if he is a merchant.
- No custom is to be levied on archil, tiles [?], or weld.
- For every hundred boards of Ireland or Esthonia, which are called eavings or wainscot, or from any other similar kind of board, 4d.

- For every hundred of the smaller boards that are called barrel staves or shingles, 1d.
- For every hundred oars, troughs, bowls and other such merchandize carved from timber, 4d.
- For every dozen hats, 1d.
- From every ship with bulwarks, "bauns", and bales, 2d. as [harbourage?].
- From every boat with rowlocks, 1d.
- From every boat with tholes, a halfpenny.
- For each float of nets that are dried on dry ground, 4d. as [strandage?].
- For every whole [carcass of] ham being taken towards the sea-coast, a halfpenny. For the meat by itself, a farthing.
- For every horse being exported, 4d.
- For every bale of woad, 4d. For every quarter of woad, measured by the common measure of the town, a halfpenny (from the seller, that is).
- For every store of grain, onions, garlic, nuts, and other similar types of merchandize, whether in [ware?]houses or in ships, 4d. If the merchants pay for their stores in the houses or the ships, and then the goods are transported by boat to the ship, nothing is to be levied on the boat. But if the ship is loaded outside the boundaries of the town, and the merchants pay nothing for the storage in the ship, then a halfpenny is to be levied for every boat transporting the said goods to the ship.
- For every bunch or quantity of garlic or cockles[?], a halfpenny.
- For every thousand, or bunch of, onions sold by such parcels, a farthing, both from the buyer (if he is a merchant) and from the seller.
- For coarse salt sold by hundredweight, 4d. per hundredweight. If sold in lesser parcels, the levy (that is, from the seller) is to be determined by the quantity.
- For every wey of white salt sold by itself, 1d.
- For every barrel of sturgeon, 2d.
- 2d. is due from every iron-shod cart loaded with wine, millstones, packs, or other merchandize [coming to] the quay or certain other places where customs relating to the quay should be levied.

- From every unshod cart, 1d.
- For a horseload, a halfpenny.
- For a load carried by a man, a farthing.
- For a barrow-load, a farthing.
- From every iron-shod cart loaded with sea-coal, 1d.
- From every unshod cart loaded with the same merchandize, a halfpenny.
- Nothing is due for a horseload of coal or fuller's earth.

Customs of the cloth market

- For every coloured cloth from overseas, 4d.
- For every striped cloth, 2d.
- For coloured cloth from Beverley or Lincoln, and other similar cloths, the same custom is to be levied as from cloths from overseas.
- For cloths from Coggeshall, Colchester, Maldon, Sudbury, and other such English cloths of double-work, which people call "two men's sheet", 1d. is to be levied of each cloth sold by itself, that is [only] from those who ought to pay custom.
- For every piece of long cloth which people call "one man's sheet", a halfpenny. For every piece cut of the same which is longer than an ell and which is sold for 6d. or more, the same is to be taken as for the whole piece. If the piece is of one ell or less and is sold for 1½d., a farthing is to be levied on that piece.
- For every piece of linen cloth, whole or cut, which is sold for 2½d. or more, a farthing is to be levied.
- The same for canvas.
- For every bundle of cloth of double-work, which people call "two men's sheet", transported by horse, unloaded, and displayed for sale, 2d.
- For every bundle of cloth which people call "one man's sheet", transported by horse, unloaded, and displayed for sale, 1d.
- For every bundle of cloth of double-work or lesser work, transported on the back of a man, half as much as for a horseload.
- From every cart coming into town loaded with similar kinds of cloth, which is unloaded and put on sale, 4d. is to be levied.

- For linen cloth or canvas loaded on a cart, a horse, or a man's back, the levy is to be half of the custom previously mentioned as being due from linen.
- For every surcoat or tabard, mantle, cape, or other kind of tailored cloth, sold by itself, a farthing.
- For every other merchandize sold, in this market or in a place associated with this market, for 2½d. or more, a farthing is to be levied for the king's custom.

Customs on hemp

- For hemp, of which the custom belongs to the cloth market, 1d. is to be levied for every cartload, a halfpenny for every horseload, a farthing for every load carried by a man. Of an amount sold for 2½d., a farthing is to be levied.

Customs of the fish market

- For every cart bringing fish or herring into the market for sale, 2d; for a horseload, a halfpenny; for a man's load, a farthing; for a barrow-load, a farthing.
- For every porpoise, 1d.
- For every salmon, a farthing.
- For every barrel of sturgeon or whale[meat], the same custom as is levied at the quay.

Customs of the wool market

- For every cartload of wool, woolfells, cow-hides or horse-hides, 2d.; for a horseload, a halfpenny; for a man's load, a farthing. For that which is sold for 2½d., a farthing is to be levied.

Customs of the cheese market

Concerning cheese, levy is to be made on cartloads, horseloads, man's loads, barrowloads, and other small parcels, in the same way as for the wool market. Custom is to be levied on these and other things pertaining to this market according to quantity, as with other markets. Let it be known that the custom on flax seed and hemp belongs to the cheese market, along with the custom on earthenware pots. In this market, [amount omitted] is levied on every cartload of pots, a farthing on a man's load, and a farthing on a barrowload.

Customs of the timber market

- For every cartload of tubs, troughs, bowls, cups, ladders, and other such merchandize that is called woodwork, 2d. is to be levied. For a horseload of the same merchandize, and of baskets, vats[?], spades, and similar things of this type, a halfpenny. For a man's load, a farthing.
- For every cartload of timber, boards, laths, and rods, a halfpenny.
- For every cartload of hurdles and splints, a farthing. For every cartload sold, a farthing from the seller.
- From every stall from which people sell cords [of firewood], 3d. a year. Let it be known that this stallage belongs to the timber market.
- For every pair of cartwheels, 1d.; that is, a halfpenny from the seller and a halfpenny from the buyer.

Customs on broom

For each cartload of broom, 1 bunch, which belongs to the bailiffs.

Customs of the bread market

- From all of those bakers subject to customs who come frequently to the market to sell their bread, three farthings is due for three days in the week – that is, Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday. If they bring their bread to market on Monday, Tuesday and Thursday, but stay away on the Wednesday, Friday, or Saturday, they are nonetheless to pay the full custom. If they come only one day a week, then only a farthing is to be taken from them; for two days, a halfpenny; and for three days, three farthings.
- For every market stall held by a burgess, 6d. is payable annually, by even portions at Michaelmas and Easter, for occupying common land. From every outsider for his stall, 3d. annually at the same terms, and no more, and that is for their weekly customs.

- Bakers subject to customs who sell bread from their own houses are to be charged customs as applicable, or should make an [advance] agreement for a specific [sum] annually.

Customs of the meat market

- For every carcass of beef, cow, bullock, or heifer purchased in the town, a halfpenny is to be levied. If the beast is purchased outside the town, then three farthings are to be levied on the carcass.
- For every scalded [carcass of] pork or carcass of mutton or veal, a farthing; that is, if the beast is purchased outside the town. If it is purchased in the town and no custom has been paid on the initial sale, then a halfpenny is to be levied on the scalding or carcass; but if the custom was paid, only a farthing is to be taken of the sale.

Customs of the livestock market

- For every horse sold, 1d. from the seller and 1d. from the buyer.
- For every bull, cow, bullock, or heifer of more than a year in age, a halfpenny from the seller and a halfpenny from the buyer.
- For every pig, sheep, or calf (sucklings excluded), a farthing from the seller and a farthing from the buyer.

These customs belong to the meat market.

Let it be known that customs of the quay are to be levied from all merchandize that comes to the town by water and is sold inland, [whether] put in storage or not, as far as the lane extending from the watercourse of Botflood, along the side of the road leading south as far as Colhill, and from there on both sides of the street as far as the principal residence once belonging to John Bolle, in front of St. Stephen's cemetery; from there via the lane which extends from the cemetery to Brook Street, and from the end of that lane southwards on both sides of the street as far as the lane that leads beyond the town ditch towards Abbotscroft. Customs are to be levied in those places, along the lanes and roads mentioned as far down as the quay. On all other merchandize, coming out of the countryside to be sold in town, customs are to be levied according to the above-mentioned markets in the town. That is: grain at the grain market; livestock at the meat market; wool, fells, and hides at the wool market, with other things pertaining to that same market. And so on, regarding all other markets in the town, according to the merchandize – each according to the appropriate market in which that merchandize ought to be sold in the town, and as it has so been in the town from ancient times.

And let it be known that all kinds of saleable merchandize which come by land or by water to the town of Ipswich, or to a place belonging to the town, before Michaelmas or on that day before noon, regardless of whether the merchandize is to be taken out of town again or not, are subject to customs applied to the year past. Customs levied on that coming after the hour of noon on Michaelmas belong to the year following. The same applies to all things pertaining to the office of the chief bailiffs of the town at their changeover.

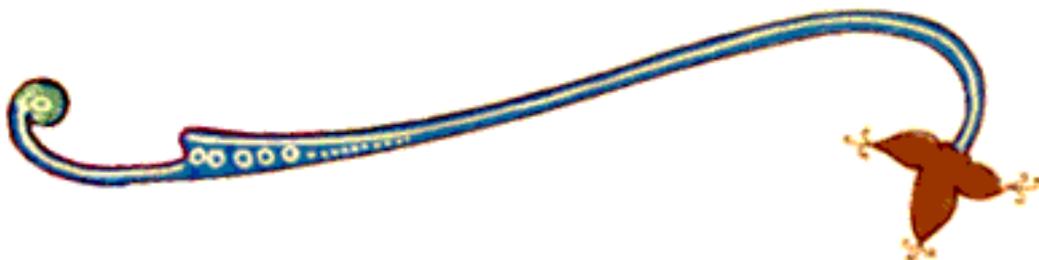

Regarding all types of merchandize arriving in town by water to be sold, the masters of the ships are to take oath as to the quantity and parcels of the goods, and on that basis are the correct customs to be levied. If, because the merchants are disbelieved, examination has to be made and it is found otherwise [\[than the quantity declared\]](#), the undeclared merchandize should be confiscated.

DISCUSSION

The Ipswich tolls provide a roughly contemporary comparison with those of London. There are sufficient similarities between the two lists that a detailed analytical comparison might suggest the influence of one on the other, or some common source on both, each then undergoing local adaptation and development.

Here as in the London lists, it is clearly noted that tolls were leviable on merchandize being imported or exported for resale, as opposed to goods for personal or household consumption. However, the latter were not automatically exempt. For example, in 1256 several individuals with estates in the locality purchased foreign burgess status in order to obtain freedom from toll on produce grown on their lands or goods bought for their own use; this status did not subject them to being at scot and lot as full citizenship would have. At about the same time the priors of Holy Trinity and St. Peter both purchased something similar that did subject them to scot and lot, yet was not considered the same as full citizenship. In 1274 it was made clear by a local ordinance that foreign burgess status was not heritable, and that it entailed only the toll exemptions indicated above; only those at scot and lot had exemption on all goods.

It can be seen that carts and packhorses were the principal means for overland transportation of merchandize. Wheelbarrows were not as common as carts or packhorses, but were nonetheless one alternative presumably for relatively short-distance travel; the London customs do not mention that option. Similarly, goods carried on one's own back likely applied mostly to small-scale producers in the neighbouring countryside, or to itinerant hawkers.

NOTES

General note

The text of the original did not have the various tolls itemized; I have formatted it thus for easier comprehension.

"tun"

A cask holding the equivalent of 2 pipes (or 252 gallons).

"ashes"

Used in fulling cloth.

"verdigris"

The meaning of the term in the original, argoil, is uncertain. Riley believed it meant cream of tartar, but noted that others have interpreted it as potters clay (Fr. argile). Archil (Lat. arguella), a violet dye obtained from a lichen, is a further possibility. However, given the contextualization of the term at London in association with copper and at Ipswich in association with copperas, I favour the translation of verdigris (Lat. argelzarus), a green or blue compound involving copper that is today used as a paint pigment and was used in the cloth-dyeing process in the Middle Ages.

"copperas"

Coperose may have been used to refer to any vitriol (a sulphate, such as of copper, iron or zinc), or specifically to the green iron sulphate known today as copperas, which was used in dyeing as a mordant, and possibly in ink-making.

"teazel"

A plant whose seed case is covered in sharp points, like a thistle; this made it a useful tool for raising the nap on woollen cloth.

"rundelete" "bastoun"

A rondelet was a small cask, and a bastoun probably something similar.

"last"

A weight or measure that varied according to the type of material. E.g. in the case of leather, it comprised two hundred hides, and in the case of herring probably 12 barrels.

"millstones"

The term here translated millstone (Lat. mola), meolys in the original, may alternatively be a type of bag (Lat. mala) used for packing merchandize, particularly cloth, or it may even mean honey (Lat. mel). The contexts in which meolys is placed make either the stone or the bag the more credible options.

"Slipston" "freestones" "ragston"

Slipston may have been a silkstone. Free stone and rags tone were basic quarried stone; the rags tone being of inferior quality, the upper layer of stone beneath which lay the free stone, although here they are assigned the same value for customs purposes.

"brasil"

A wood originating in the East Indies, or an extract therefrom, used for dyeing and in red ink.

"alum"

Used in dyeing cloth, it was the most common, easiest to use, and one of the most effective of several metallic salts that could be applied to fix the colour a cloth was dyed.

"frail"

A large basket made of wicker or rushes, commonly used for transporting fruit and woad.

"cordwain"

A soft, fine-grained leather originally produced in Cordoba.

"thousand" "quintal"

A thousandweight must have been half a ton. A quintal was a measure equivalent to 100 lb., which makes it difficult to explain why that term was used here instead of the usual hundredweight.

"load"

The term here translated as "load" was karre, possibly in its origins referring to a cartload (Lat. carcata); in the London list, kark was the term used. According to Riley, the load comprised 30 pigs (bars). The total weight would have been approximately 2100 lb.

"osmond"

An iron-bearing ore which came from Sweden.

"ore"

The use of "ore" (oure in the original) seems inappropriate here, since it refers to a natural mineral bearing metallic or other substances, whereas brass and latten were both man-made alloys (latten, imported from Germany, being similar to brass in its makeup and used for monumental brasses). "Ore" is perhaps being used to distinguish the alloy in its raw form.

"bundle"

In the context of furs, the word here translated as bundle is tymber in the original; this was a measure comprising 40 furs. White furs were from small animals such as squirrels or ermines.

"squirrels' furs and wheels"

The term here translated as squirrels' furs (popel stredlinges) had a more precise meaning in the Middle Ages, referring to fur from the backs of squirrels during a certain season (probably April to September). What rotes meant in this context is unclear; wheels would appear to be the literal translation – and the 15th century translator of this document used that term (although he may have been as much in the dark as I); perhaps it was a metaphor for the entire squirrel skin, which when spread flat might have seemed like a spoked wheel.

"sarpliers"

A sarplier was special packaging for wool; the amount was equivalent to half a sack.

"dicker"

A measure of ten hides.

"archil, tiles or weld"

I am uncertain about the translation of De lege vidz corkel ne de teyle a treefes ne de welde. Weld was a yellow dye from a plant found in Germany and France; this suggests that corkel should be rendered archil (or orchil), which was a violet dye – see the Winchester list of tolls for such a translation of kork. In this context, "tiles" seems an unlikely translation of teyle a treefes. Lege might perhaps refer to a measure (legena, used for gallon or sometimes for dry measures).

"bulwarks" "bales" "rowlocks" "tholes"

For the significance of these terms in assessing the capacities of watercraft, see the notes to the London list of customs on fish.

"cockles"

The term here speculatively translated cockles is cokayle in the original, although the context makes cockles unlikely. On the other hand, it seems equally unlikely that a halfpenny toll would be due on each bunch of garlic, when in London this amount was levied on a hundred bunches.

"striped cloth"

Long striped cloths (cloths of "rays") were imported from the Low Countries at this time, although later made domestically.

"ell"

An ell was a measure of length about 45 inches.

"tabard"

Like a surcoat, a short tunic worn atop other clothing.

"laths"

Thin planks used as infill between the main timbers of walls, ceilings, and roofs in house construction.

"belongs to the bailiffs"

The customs on broom was a revenue assigned to remunerate the city bailiffs.

"For every market stall"

The 15th-century English translation reversed the fees, so that burgesses owed 3d. a year, and non-burgesses 6d. a year. This would seem more plausible, unless the original intent of this slightly confused passage was that non-burgesses pay a 3d. annual licence fee, then weekly customs on top of that. The latter hypothesis is supported by the earlier reference to the "bakers subject to customs", which would have meant non-burgesses.

"meat market"

The meat market customs indicate that the normal procedure was to bring live animals to market and slaughter them upon demand. A toll would normally be paid on the live animals, when imported into town, and an additional toll on the sale of the carcass.

"scalded"

The application of escaudinge to a pork carcass was to remove bristles from the outer skin of swine.

"the quay"

The topographical description of the boundaries of the marketing area attached to the quay essentially defined the south-eastern quadrant of the town; stalls could have been set up anywhere along the sides of the streets in this quadrant.

"Michaelmas"

September 29th marked the close of the official year – that is, when a new set of bailiffs replaced that which had been in office for the past year – and therefore the close of the fiscal year.

"masters"

It appears that the "masters of the ships" were not shipmasters in the sense of captains, but the merchants who owned or leased space in the vessels.

- Two tallages are payable on herring, one on fresh and the other on salt herring, each on 21 December.
- Two tallages are payable on wool, from outsiders, one before Pentecost, the other after.

DISCUSSION

At least some of the entries on the dorse of this document appear to have been later additions: not tolls per se but sources of revenue for the city. This is apparent for the items under the sub-heading regarding the bailiffs' farm – use of the term formerly suggests the additions may have been made after sheriffs took over responsibility for collection of revenues related to the fee farm. It also appears true for the preceding item, which must be a licence fee for brewing, just as the communal payment from the bakers was for a licence to bake.

NOTES

"last"

A last was a weight or measure that varied according to the type of material. In the case of herring, it comprised possibly 12 barrels.

"ling"

Tingey followed Riley in translating merlyng as whiting; but the term could be applied to various kinds of sea-fish.

"packs"

Translation of fez as "pack" is a hypothesis, based on possible Latin sources: fesella (used for certain types of containers) or fessa.

"dozen"

In relation to some goods (e.g. cloth), "dozen" represented a volume rather than a quantity.

"cordwain"

A soft, fine-grained leather originally produced in Cordoba, originally using goatskin.

"load"

The word here translated "load" was carke, whence our "cargo" and (less commonly used now) "charge"; while those terms are today used in a general sense, they had a more specific use in medieval times – possibly 3 or 4 cwt. according to London's Liber Albus.

"alum"

Used in dyeing cloth; it was the most common, easiest to use, and one of the most effective of several metallic salts that could be used to fix the colour a cloth was dyed. Its main source was trade with Italy.

"cumin"

A common spice grown and used in medieval Europe; while it might have been grown in England, supplies were more likely to have come from the Mediterranean.

"brasil"

A wood originating in the East Indies, or an extract therefrom, used for dyeing and in red ink.

"buckes tynes"

This term occurs twice in the list, without the meaning being apparent from context. Buckets and tubs would be a long-shot translation. Since the first reference is to them being bound (in a bundle?), and the second measures them by the brace (? brage assuming the Latin brachium), which refers to timber, it appears that the tines – a term used today for the prongs of a fork – could have been some kind of stake. The term tines has, however, also been applied to the pointed part of an antler, which would explain "buck".

"smack" "hulk" "buss" "cog"

A smack was a small, single-masted boat, typically used for fishing or coastal transport. A buss was a broad-beamed, two-masted, 50-70 ton vessel, also used for fishing (particularly herring). A hulk was a larger vessel and the type of ship most commonly used for cargo transport in the Middle Ages. A cog was another, smaller (single-masted) type of cargo vessel; it had been the most common type until superseded by the hulk. The cog was a northern design (derived from the Norse knarr), whereas the nef (a term used in this list, but translated simply as "ship", since it became a generic term for ships) was a Mediterranean design for a trading vessel. Blending design elements from these two types produced the carrack, which was the predominant trading ship by the close of the Middle Ages.

Coins usually of gold, but sometimes silver, and varying in value from 10s. to 20s.; tolls involving such large amounts must surely have been annual licences (as the case of the salt-laden cart suggests). This was an international coinage used in commerce.

"pack of garlic"

A tentative translation of le feez de aux. Regarding feez, see the note above. In the absence of a better alternative, and since garlic is not mentioned elsewhere in the list, it is here assumed that aux corresponds to the modern ails.

"dicker"

A measure of ten hides.

"backpack"

Le feez d'un homme is here translated as backpack on the assumption that the feez (see above) would have been transported on a man's back.

"sux"

Tingey rendered sux as "sugar", but that does not appear likely in the context; nor does "juice" (Lat. suxus).

"sheaf"

A sheaf of steel comprised 30 pieces.

"hawser"

A heavy rope or cable used to for towing, mooring, or anchoring a ship.

"hauberk" "haubergeon"

A hauberk was a mail shirt that also extended to cover the legs; this was the principal element of armour before plate was introduced. A haubergeon was a shorter version.

"fotmal"

A measure of lead, one-thirteenth of a fother (perhaps the amount here referred to as a load). Today, 70 lbs., but perhaps up to twice as much in the medieval period, depending on the weight of a fother.

"parmentery"

Parmentery was clothing made out of leather; Tingey identifies a chef, or cheef, as 14 ells.

"bundle"

In regard to the sable furs, the word here translated as bundle is tymbre in the original; this was a measure comprising 40 furs. In regard to the sheep skins, the original of bundle is bynd, which comprised 32 skins.

"arnement"

Some kind of colouring used in ink.

"bast"

A tough fibre obtained from plants such as flax or hemp and used to make rope.

"badges"

The term here translated "badges" is in the original eymes. Tingey translated this as "weights", but I tentatively associate the term with the Latin esmallum, on the guess that these may have been pilgrims' badges.

"floats"

It is hypothesised here that flotes may refer to floats for nets. Without explanation, Tingey translates the term as "skeins of wool", but suggests float-wood as an alternative.

"ray"

A striped cloth.

"grey-work"

A type of fur.

"hazel-wood"

Coudres may possibly refer to hazel-nuts rather than the wood itself.

"brace"

A hypothetical translation of braqe.

"parnez"

Tingey translates parnez as pieces of woodwork, but on what authority I do not know.

"four terms"

Michaelmas, Hilary, Easter and Trinity.

"farm of the water"

Probably a lease of collection of tolls on ships passing along the river.

Keywords: medieval Winchester tolls customs carts hardware dye guilds dyers tanners shoemakers fees

Subject: Tolls collected at the Winchester gates

Original source: Winchester College archives, custumal of Winchester

Transcription in: J. S. Furley, City Government of Winchester from the Records of the XIV & XV Centuries, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1923, pp.173-74.

Original language: French

Location: Winchester

Date: ca. 1270s

TRANSLATION

It is at the gates of Winchester, where the town bailiffs levy customs from those outside of the franchise from whom it is due, that each cart carrying grain for sale owes a halfpenny as custom each time that it comes; and a farthing for a horseload.

Each cart carrying iron or steel, 2d.; and 1d. for a horseload.

Each cart carrying new seats for carts, harnesses, reins or traces owes 2d. as custom; and 1d. for a horseload.

Each cart loaded with millstones, 4d.; and each cart carrying grindstones, 2d.

Each cart carrying tin or lead for sale, 4d.; and 2d. for a horseload.

Each cart carrying archil for dyeing wool, 2d.; and 1d. for a horseload.

1d. custom is due for sickles and scythes coming by cart, and a halfpenny for a horseload.

Each cart carrying tanned hides for sale owes 2d.; and 1d. for a horseload.

For madder coming by cart for sale, 2d.; and 1d. for a horseload.

Each cart carrying woad for sale, 4d.; and 1d. [sic] for a horseload.

Each country-dweller who brings into the city ashes which are applied with woad owes 6d. a year to the king's custom, and 1d. to the clerk for enrolling his name, unless he comes only once a year.

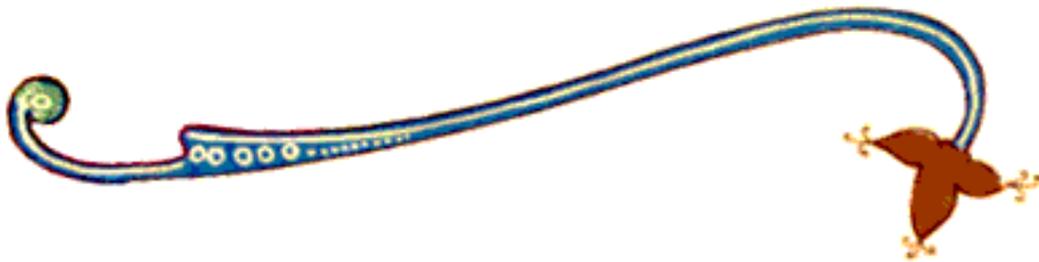

It is customary for the dyer's gild of the city to elect by common agreement two reputable and reliable men to be sworn to assess [the value of] the woad brought by outsider merchants for sale in the town, and reliably perform the assessment for [purposes of] selling and buying.

Each tanner who has a stall in the high street of Winchester owes 2s. per year for [the part of] the road that he occupies, and 1d. to the clerk by way of tangible. Each woman selling suet or lard by retail owes 1d. on the eve of Easter [Monday?], by way of smergable.

Each shoemaker who makes shoes from new cowhide owes the town 2d. by way of scogable. These usages apply to those who are of the franchise as well as to others.

DISCUSSION

The final entries in this section of the custumal are not strictly part of the list of tolls, but have an indirect relationship. Three are rather cases of trading licences, although in the first case the licence fees are stated as being put towards the revenue from customs. The fourth relates to a method of determining the value of imported merchandize, although probably rather for the purpose of a market price than the amount of toll (which was determined by quantity, not quality).

NOTES

"archil"

A purple or violet dye; korc in the original.

"madder"

A red dye.

"woad"

A blue dye.

"ashes"

Ashes (for which we would today use the term potash) were used to clean cloth prior to dyeing.

"stall"

The term here translated as "stall" is in the original bord, suggesting the very basic nature of such a stall; it may even connote boards attached below street-level windows of houses in the street.

"tangable" "smergable"

Tangable was a customary fee due from tanners, while smergable was a similar fee due from sellers of fatty or greasy products such as lard, tallow, suet, butter, cheese, etc. (use of the term venderesse indicating that this was a trade typically practised by women).

"scogable"

Presumably a license fee related to shoemaking.

 - For every cart-load of saltwater fish for sale, a penny.
 - For every horse-load of saltwater fish for sale, a halfpenny.
 - For every salmon for sale, a farthing.
 - For every dozen lampreys for sale, a penny.
 - For every cask of sturgeon for sale, a halfpenny.
 - For every thousand herring for sale, a farthing.
 - For every horseload of ashes for sale, a halfpenny.
 - For every horseload of honey for sale, a penny.
 - For every sack of wool for sale, twopence.
 - For every cart-load of tan for sale, weekly, a penny.
 - For a hundredweight of any goods sold by weight, a penny.
 - For every wey of tallow or fat for sale, a penny.
 - For every quarter of woad for sale, twopence.
 - For two thousand garlic or onions for sale, a halfpenny.
 - For every bale of cordwain for sale, threepence.
 - For every hundred boards for sale, a halfpenny.
 - For every millstone for sale, a halfpenny.
 - For every hundred faggots for sale, a farthing.
 - For every cart-load of brushwood or timber for sale, weekly, a halfpenny.
 - For every hundredweight of tin, brass or copper for sale, twopence.
 - For every bale of any merchandize for sale worth over 10s., a halfpenny.
 - For every cask of wine for sale, three halfpence.

- For all merchandize for sale not mentioned here that is worth 5s. or more, a farthing.

We therefore command that you may take the aforesaid customs up to the end of five years, but when that term is ended the customs shall entirely cease and be abolished. In which thing etc. lasting for the said five years, witness the king at Donypas, the 4th October.

DISCUSSION

Murage was much in vogue during the late thirteenth and fourteenth centuries as a way for towns to finance the heavy expenses of expanding and maintaining their fortifications. Northampton's central position, geographically, in England also often made it one focus of twelfth- and thirteenth-century power-struggles between national factions. In 1216 much of the town had been burned to the ground. In 1224 a grant in the name of Henry III (then in his minority) was made allowing Northampton to finance wall-building by collecting for three years special tolls on goods being brought to the weekly market; specification focused on livestock, with a generic clause to cover other merchandize. This murage grant was reissued in 1252 for a two-year term; its list was more detailed than that of 1224, but not as extensive as in the 1301 grant, and the only items of note covered in 1252 that one might be surprised to find missing in 1301 were salted meat and flax. Permission to collect special tolls for purposes of paving the town was given in 1282.

The 1301 murage seems to have been directly targeted at extending the walls to incorporate suburbs, notably a church and some open land associated with the town fair, one of the more important ones in England. Since most, if not all, of the items listed here would already have been subject to local tolls, for purpose of the revenues needed for the fee farm, it must be assumed that the levies listed took the form of a surtax. That practically every item includes the words "for sale" is a reminder that these tolls were on goods being brought for retail or wholesale in the town market, and were not imposed on goods being brought for personal or household use.

NOTES

General note

The text of the original did not have the various tolls itemized; I have formatted it thus for easier comprehension.

"grey-work"

A kind of pelt from some small animal.

"worsted"

A type of cloth distinct from the high class woollen cloths. It could be made from lower grade wool, which made East Anglia suitable for its production. Because worsted did not need fulling, production focused particularly in Norfolk, whose rivers were not suitable for fulling.

"Aylsham"

A Norfolk village involved in clothmaking from at least the eleventh century, and by 1300 had an established reputation for its linen.

"ashes"

Ashes (for which we would today use the term potash) were used to clean cloth prior to dyeing.

"cordwain"

A leather treated by a preparation that originated in Cordoba, Spain.

"weekly"

It is not clear why the qualifier "weekly" was added to some items; possibly payment of the toll gave licence to import as much as was desired over the course of a week.

- For ten stones of hemp, a farthing.
- For ten gallons of oil, a halfpenny.
- For every other thing, not otherwise specified, brought for sale that is worth more than two shillings, a farthing.

DISCUSSION

According to Rogers, this document dated from the reign of Edward III. Oxford, however, had a stone wall built in the early thirteenth century; so, if Rogers' dating is correct, this murage would presumably have been for repairs and maintenance.

In comparison to the lists of merchandize making its way to or through London and Ipswich, the list above reflects the fact that most of Oxford's imports and exports travelled by land-routes.

NOTES

"Worstead"

Worstead was a Norfolk village, and one of the main areas of settlement of Flemish immigrants, which helped it develop into a clothmaking centre. The cloth that took its name from the village was, however, a lower-grade cloth.

"Drigaylis"

Alum, copperas, and verdigris were used in the dyeing process, and therefore Drigaylis is likely to have been either a dye or a mordant. A hypothetical translation, assuming the transcription is accurate, might be "dried gale" – the dried bark of the gale shrub having been used as a yellow dye, as well as a tan.

"cart-hurdles"

Attachments to the sides of a cart, to increase its loading capacity.

"Aberden"

Perhaps the name for a kind of fish?

The customs from ten weeks in 1304.

DISCUSSION

Sandwich was one of the Cinque Ports, and was one of the busier ports serving international trade, although nowhere near the scale of London, of course. Unlike the trade of the north-eastern ports, that of the southern coast ports involved more merchants from France and Italy; the Italians in particular made heavy use of Sandwich in the fourteenth century for shipping wool.

This document appears to be a record of local tolls imposed, both on goods and on ships (for anchorage, or for passing through the port), as well as on merchandize brought by road – if the references to horseloads imply the actual mode of transportation, rather than just quantities – and tolls imposed on outsiders for retailing in the weekly market. It is not specified whether the goods were being exported or imported; probably some of both – it was of no difference for purpose of the tolls – although most of the items look like imports.

NOTES

"quintals"

A quintal was a measure equivalent to 100 lb.

"basan"

Leather made from sheep-skin; inferior to cordwain.

"thousandweight"

Presumably half a ton.

"Wytsand"

Whitstable?

"frails"

A frail was a large wicker basket, commonly used for transporting fruit and woad.

"dickers"

A dicker (possibly from the Latin decuria) was a measure of ten hides.

"ferling"

A term perhaps derived from the French ferler, to tie or wrap something up; does not seem to fit the context well, but better than the alternative hypothesis of an association with "furlong".

"alum"

Used in dyeing cloth.

TRANSLATION

First, that all persons who are not burgesses and freemen of the town of Bristol and who bring there wool, woollen cloth, iron, wood, wine, salt, madder, grain, oil, wax or any other merchandize of avoirdupois should take it to a place specifically designated (by the chamberlain then in office, upon the recommendation of the mayor and common council) as the sole location for the advertisement and sale of all such goods. They are to display and sell the same there alone, and not in any other private location. For which place of sale a location has now been assigned by decision of the mayor, sheriff and common council: a place in the Back of Bristol called Spicers Hall, in which there once lived a notable and respectable merchant of the town called Robert Sturmy, whom has recently been taken into the bosom of God.

Also, that all kinds of woollen cloth and other merchandize that are to be measured and weighed within the town shall be measured and weighed [\[during the transaction\]](#) between buyer and seller (if neither is a burgess) by certain persons assigned and appointed by the chamberlains, upon recommendation from the mayor and common council.

The provision by the chamberlains then in office of a place for the sale of merchandize has been, and is, for the convenience and benefit of those who bring such merchandize here and sell it. The upkeep and maintenance of that place for such a use would not be possible without considerable expenses and expenditures on repairs and improvements.

Therefore, it has been the custom since ancient times that every outsider who is not a freeman of the town and who brings there any merchandize for advertisement and sale should pay, for the convenience and benefit in so doing, a monetary duty dictated by the type, quantity and variety of the merchandize they have brought, and according to the length of time they keep the goods in town for showing and selling it. That is:

- For every whole woollen cloth put up for sale or being [stored] there for eight days or less, 1d.
- For every 4 coloured narrow cloths put up for sale or being [stored] there for eight days or less, 1d.
- For every frieze cloth put up for sale or being [stored] there for eight days or less, ½d.
- For every piece of kersey put up for sale or being [stored] there for eight days or less, ½d.
- For every pack of Barnstaple cloth, Kendals, small friezes, Kidwelly cloth, and all other narrow cloths, where the pack contains 20 dozen, put up for sale or being [stored] there for eight days or less, 2d.
- For every sack of wool put up for sale or being [stored] there for eight days or less, 4d.
- For every ton of iron put up for sale in the weigh-house associated with the same place [i.e. Spicers Hall] or being [stored] there for eight days or less, 4d.
- For every tun of wine, oil, honey or other merchandize in casks put up for sale or being [stored] there for eight days or less, 4d.
- For every butt of Malmsey, Tyre, Romney or other sweet wine put up for sale or being [stored] there for eight days or less, 4d.

- For every hundredweight of wax put up for sale or being [stored] there for eight days or less, 1d. If that wax remains on sale there for a longer period than eight days, then ½d is to be paid to the chamberlains for every week that it remains.
- For every pipe of grain put up for sale or being [stored] there for eight days or less, 20d. No additional payment is due the chamberlains even if the grain remains there for longer.
- For every bale of madder or alum put up for sale or being [stored] there for eight days or less, 1d. No additional payment is due the chamberlains even though the madder or alum remain there for longer.
- For every load of beaver [skins] put up for sale or being [stored] there for eight days or less, 2d; no additional payment is due the chamberlains even though the beaver [skins] remain there for longer.
- For every hundredweight of bowstaves put up for sale or being [stored] there for eight days or less, 2d. No additional payment is due the chamberlains even though the bowstaves remain there for longer.
- For every tun of fruit put up for sale or being [stored] there for eight days or less, 4d. No additional payment is due the chamberlains even though the fruit remains there for longer.
- For every hundredweight of canvas put up for sale or being [stored] there for eight days or less, 1d.
- For every piece of "crestcloth" put up for sale or being [stored] there for eight days or less, ½d. No additional payment is due the chamberlains even though the cloth remains there for longer.

Should any of these goods – other than wax, grain, madder, alum, liquorice, beans, bowstaves, fruit, canvas, and crestcloth – remain in the hall for a longer period than is indicated above, then the duty payable on it will be increased according to the length of time and the type of merchandize remaining there.

DISCUSSION

This list of tolls is part of a set of local ordinances (the core of which are also given above) dated 1459. The preamble claims them to be a reaffirmation of by-laws in effect since "time beyond memory", but whose enforcement has been neglected by the busy bailiffs, with a result of loss in revenue from "tolles Custumes and other dueties and exaxcions due". The tolls apply to outsider merchants who are not freemen (it having been possible for non-burgesses to purchase the franchise, in order to obtain commercial privileges). The closing section of the ordinances prohibited burgesses and other residents of the town from allowing the merchandize of outsiders to be stored, displayed, or put up for sale in their houses or hostelries, upon penalty of a 40s. fine.

Since the stated purpose of the tolls was cover the costs of upkeep of Spicers Hall, they were presumably extraordinary imposts. They evidently apply both to goods imported from abroad and those brought into Bristol from other locations in England.

In the first half of the fifteenth century Bristol was one of the principal centres for the import/export trade. Wine from Gascony, still politically tied to England, was the leading item among its imports, and cloth among its exports (again particularly to Gascony) – the prosperity of the town had long been based primarily upon the manufacture and export of cloth. Grain was also prominent among its exports. To a lesser extent goods were imported from Spain and Portugal, such as wax, fruit, iron, dyes, and spices. However, after a peak in the 1440s Bristol's trade figures were dropping during the '50s, largely due to the loss of Gascony to France, and fell to a low in the '60s, forcing Bristol merchants to give more attention to the Iberian markets. The special tolls imposed in 1459, over and above any import/export duties, could not have helped encouraged merchants to use Bristol as their gateway to England. Although Bristol's trade revived later in the century, in the longer term much of its cloth export business shifted to London.

NOTES

General note

The text of the original did not have the various tolls itemized; I have formatted it thus for easier comprehension.

"madder"

A red dye.

"avoirdupois"

I.e. goods sold by weight.

"Back"

The Back was a secondary quayside facility on the Avon (as opposed to the main quayside on the Frome) – see map.

"Spicers Hall"

It must have been acquired by the town in 1459, after its owner Robert Sturmy, a spicer and former mayor, was killed when his three ships were, returning from a successful trading mission to the Levant, raided and captured by a Genoese fleet.

"frieze"

A coarse woollen cloth, with nap on one side.

"kersey"

A type of cloth produced (originally) at the Suffolk village of that name; it was a cheaper kind of cloth.

"dozen"

The term "dozen", when applied to cloth, does not represent (as it appears) a quantity, but a length: a dozen was a cloth of approximately 12 ells (about 13-14 yards).

"Malmsey"

A madeira brought from Portugal.

"alum"

Used in dyeing cloth; it was the most common, easiest to use, and one of the most effective of several metallic salts that could be applied to fix the colour a cloth was dyed.

"crestcloth"

Elsewhere referred to as "crossecloth".

Not only by deceit on the part of merchants who are citizens of this city, by importing and exporting various goods and merchandize belonging to other men under guise of being their own goods and merchandize, and on the part of other citizens of the city in appropriating and declaring various kinds of grain to have been purchased by them in other parts of this kingdom of England, at their own risk. But also by dyers of the city importing to and exporting from this city wool, cloth and yarn belonging to various country-dwellers, without paying toll and murage; and also by making deceitful agreements with outsiders [\[for the latter\]](#) to transport various goods and merchandize to a certain place near the franchise of this city, and then the citizens to take responsibility for them from there into the city, with the intent of evading payment of toll and murage of the city, contrary to the grants and confirmations of the king and his ancestors and also contrary to the ordinances and customs of this city. Therefore, for the correction of this situation, it is ordained and established in the way and form that follows, by the advice and full agreement of the whole community of the city:

First, that if any merchant who is a freeman of this city exports to be sold in other parts of this kingdom, or imports from any part of this kingdom, by water or by land, iron, oil, tar, wine, wax, soap, woad, madder, alum, tin, lead, or any merchandize of whatever kind at all, [he] shall take oath upon a book that they are his own personal goods and merchandize, being imported or exported at his own risk. So that, if they happen through any cause to be destroyed or lost, by land or by water, the loss falls solely upon himself and not on any other person. And [he shall swear] that they have not been bought or sold with the intent of evading or defrauding, by any kind of deceit, the officers of this city of toll or murage or anything payable to the city.

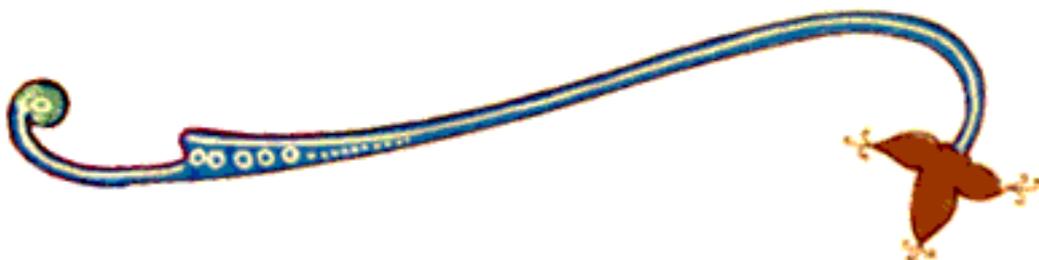

Also, if any freeman of this city buys any kind of grain in the countryside with the agreement that it shall be brought into this city at his cost and risk, that both the seller (if he comes to the city) and the buyer shall take oath upon a book that the bargain and contract was honestly made, without intent to [commit] fraud and deceit in the way already mentioned.

Also, should it happen at any time in the future that any freeman of this city buy or sell any kind of goods or merchandize on the condition of delivering them at a place close to the boundaries of the franchise of this city, with the intent – through the agreement made between him and the other party – to defraud or deceive the officers of this city of toll or murage, or [should he] make any false oath regarding any goods or merchandize to be bought or sold, and this is proven against him, he shall pay twice the [normal] amount of toll and murage on those goods and merchandize, and furthermore be disfranchised, and not readmitted to the franchise without the agreement of the entire council of the chamber, or the majority of the same.

Also, that all dyers who are citizens of this city and who import any kind of wool, cloth or yarn to be dyed within this city, henceforth pay toll and murage – according to the form and intent of the grants and confirmations of the same, granted by our sovereign lord the king and his ancestors, and also according to the customs and ordinances of this city – when it is brought in, in the same way that outsider owners would do if they imported it themselves, but nothing when they export it. Given that if any person or persons bring or send any wool, cloth, or yarn to this city to be dyed for their own personal clothing, or that of their household servants, as indicated by an oath to be taken by the owner or the bringer (whether the dyer or someone else), no toll or murage is payable.

DISCUSSION

In the absence of effective detective methods, the principal medieval remedy for evasion of import and export tolls (of which murage was simply one specialized form) – as for the deterrence or discovery of other crimes – relied on the efficacy of holy oaths to persuade people, fearful it was hoped of eternal damnation, to honest behaviour. There are ample examples that some people were prepared to swear false oaths – although others respected their power – and a recognition of this led to the backup penalty of monetary fine. It is interesting that dyers were particularly singled out for attention as evaders of toll; several of the types of merchandize mentioned by name – besides the wool, cloth and yarn – were items associated with their industry.

Laws and liberties: the urban constitution

It is not clear whether, before the twelfth century, towns had any officially recognized powers relating to communal self-government, or any special privileges that definitively distinguished the personal status of their inhabitants from those of non-urban areas, with the possible exceptions of holding property in exchange for money rents rather than personal services, and (less certainly) in exemptions from paying tolls on merchandise. However, there was certainly some differentiation of town and countryside within the national administrative system.

The folk moot must have provided a mechanism for the discussion of local concerns in a way that allowed for expression of aspirations and ambitions. Merchant guilds, where they existed, likely provided another and perhaps more important focus for such discussions, and even for the momentum behind the acquisition of royal charters, since they may already have been instrumental in the local regulation of commercial affairs, and since their members were those townspeople with the most to gain; this would help explain why such guilds were among the earlier privileges to be confirmed by charter. Later, attention turned more to building up the jurisdiction of the town court, where it was under the presidency of officers elected by the community, and/or to establishing mayors and councils as administrative authorities with no direct accountability to higher powers.

Certain aspects of urban administration, society and economic affairs were influenced by local customs, which varied from place to place. But the character, origin and antiquity of such customs is difficult to judge in the absence of written records; royal charters make reference to their existence, but without (in most cases) specifically indicating what they were. Only so much can be gleaned on this subject from the Domesday Book, which gives our best single view of towns prior to the appearance of royal bureaucratic records series in the twelfth century.

That century too is hardly rich in written records relevant to urban history. There are a few documents in the form of royal charter grants to a handful of towns – not all of them accepted unquestioningly by historians as authentic – and the Exchequer Pipe Rolls (recording information about the farm and other payments made from the towns). But, other than some private charters related to real estate transactions, no documents directly from the towns themselves until the very end of the century. It does not appear, and we should not be too surprised at the fact, that any effort was made to record local customs until local self-government – and perhaps more than local government, local bureaucracy – started to take shape as the thirteenth century progressed. By which time we cannot be certain to what extent the formulated customs reflect earlier practice.

The consequence of this paucity of documentation is that, while we are able to reconstruct with some confidence the broad framework of the development of the urban constitution in its early period, we have little direct evidence of the thinking behind that course of development. The account of the setting up of administrative mechanisms at Ipswich in 1200 – itself prompted by the grant of a royal charter – is a rare and thereby important window onto urban affairs even though, since known only from a later copy, not entirely free of suspicion. Consequently, historians must rely heavily on hypothesis to piece together the fragmentary evidence.

Charters

One of the fundamental sources of evidence about the borough constitution are royal charters granting liberties (the term franchises being more commonly used today): privileges related principally to aspects of self-government, i.e. independence from other administrative systems or jurisdictions, and special rights that gave consideration to the particular character and needs of an urban community. The grants were made usually in return for a lump-sum payment and agreement by the representatives of the local community to make a yearly payment – the fee farm – to compensate the king for revenues he would be giving up by turning over administration powers to the borough, e.g. market tolls. Paralleling the charters of liberties granted by the king were similar grants made by lesser lords – known as "mesne lords" because they stood as intermediaries in lordship between the king and his subjects – to boroughs they controlled. Typically these lords, or the burgesses themselves, would seek confirmation from the king of such grants.

The earliest charters of liberties were granted by Henry I (upper left) and Henry II (upper right), cautiously allowing towns some responsibility for their own affairs. Richard I (lower left) and John (lower right), in need of money, were more liberal in selling towns the privileges they sought. Late 15th century statuary from the choir screen in York Minster.

Early students of English urban history relied heavily on these charters as indicators of the scope of self-government and as causes of urban growth. Today, historians place much less emphasis on such documents, no longer considering them the principal instruments defining urban status, although this is perhaps partly a reaction against the over-emphasis given by earlier generations. While the formal concessions of privileges by the king, or other lord of the borough, were valuable tools in the process of urban development, they were not indispensable, and in some ways were more markers of a stage in that development, consolidating powers which had sometimes been informally exercised (or usurped) prior to their official recognition in the charters. One example is the privilege known as "return of writs", whereby the county sheriff could not personally carry out royal directives that applied to towns, but had to pass the written commands along to the town officials, who then had to make a written return confirming that they had fulfilled the instructions. Some historians made much of this supposed advance in freedom, and it is true that there were a flurry of such grants in the mid-1250s, although that owes something to Henry III's need, in view of the growing baronial opposition, to curry favour with his towns. However, it is now known that this procedure was in practice prior to the charter grants. In that light the grants appear more to formalize an existing situation, or even to control its applicability via definition. The Quo Warranto enquiries begun in the late thirteenth century to investigate the franchises claimed by local landlords and authorities gave additional motivation to towns to have their claims recognized via royal charters; apart from the instance mentioned above, the charters of Henry III and Edward I in fact did not extend much beyond acknowledging the powers and privileges granted by their predecessors.

The initiative for charters, whether they confirmed existing rights or granted new ones, came largely from the towns themselves; the gains made by some towns, notably London, appear to have stimulated copycat efforts by others. While much of what they permitted was in the interest of the development of local government within the broader framework of a national system of government answerable to the monarchy, England's kings were anxious to avoid stimulating the level of autonomy found in some places in continental Europe. Charter terms, if not their wording, were most probably – particularly in the later period – drafted by town representatives, or at least reflected what the townsmen asked for in written petitions (few of which have survived); although we should envisage charters as a product of negotiation between local and central governments, so that the end-result served the interests of both. But because the final text of the charters was drawn up by clerks of the central government, which had an interest both in controlling the extent of urban independence and in ensuring some consistency in the powers accorded to the different boroughs, and because of a strong tendency to use charters granted to the earlier recipients as models for those granted to later recipients, historians have to beware of taking the precise wording at face value.

Nonetheless, the earliest royal charters to towns are important sources of evidence simply because of the paucity of documentation produced by, or surviving from, the towns themselves, especially prior to the fourteenth century. Many of the later charters were little more than reiterations of the earlier, sometimes with a few additions, largely because towns felt it advisable to purchase inspections and confirmations of their privileges from each new king coming to the throne. Only in this way could towns perpetuate their rights before formal incorporation – and even after incorporation made renewal unnecessary, attachment to tradition prompted towns to continue to seek royal confirmations. Royal charters were, in essence, the legal warrant or mandate by the country's highest authority for the existence of borough government and for the scope of its authority (prior to the regularization of borough powers through the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835). These charters were usually issued under the great seal. However, grants of minor privileges or mere confirmations of charters came increasingly to be issued as letters patent.

The charters are perhaps most useful for giving us an overview of the stages in evolution of the borough constitution, and of the growing ambitions of the borough community to assert control of its internal affairs and eliminate the interference of "foreign" authorities, such as shire officials or other officers of the royal administration. As a generalization, we can say that the early charters, of twelfth and thirteenth centuries, acted to differentiate town and countryside in terms of distinctive rights (particularly tenurial rights), to establish the basic mechanisms for administration (e.g. court, officers, merchant gild), to begin the process of making those mechanisms semi-independent of external authorities, and to foster the centralization of commerce in towns through advantageous privileges. Later charters of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, if not dealing with local issues, added only a few significant developments, by:

- strengthening the privileged trading status;
- recognizing the corporate character of urban government;
- improving borough finances, in part through circumvention of the statute of mortmain and general strengthening of the borough's ability to hold property corporately; and
- expanding the scope of independent judicial jurisdiction (and the hierarchy of urban officialdom needed to take on new responsibilities)

At the same time they integrated towns more into the emerging system of national administration, while widening the growing gulf between rulers and ruled by giving support to constitutional forms which undermined democratic principles. It is important we not confuse "self-government" with "autonomy"; while factions in one or two towns at points in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries may have harboured notions of setting themselves up as communes on the continental model, the mainstream of constitutional development was in the direction of urban authorities taking on administrative responsibilities that freed them from outside interference by certain officials, but made them more directly accountable to the king.

Customs

In the broader sense, "customs" refers to a set of both traditional privileges and traditional obligations, the latter largely in the form of monetary payments, although services are also evidenced. The administration of the privileges in most cases was associated with tolls, judicial fines, rents, or licence fees which found their way into royal coffers. "Customs" is found in documents sometimes referring to the dues, and sometimes to the privileges which were for generations preserved in communal memory, until the acquisition of local self-government provided the impetus and the administrative mechanisms to write them down. By that time it has become difficult to be sure which of the customs are ancient, which recent; which hark back to Anglo-Saxon times, and which may have been imported by the Normans.

It is also difficult to know to what extent the customs were of purely local derivation. Certainly the numerous customals that have survived to us display some individuality, eclecticism, and idiosyncrasy. Yet there are enough similarities from town to town to suggest at least indirect influence, through an exchange of knowledge – perhaps no more than the result of the travelling merchant as agent of communication – and in some cases deliberate imitation, although direct copying from one town's customal to another's is rarely apparent. In some cases, customs appear to hark back to Anglo-Saxon or Danish law and this may explain some of the commonality between urban usages.

If charters of liberties provided a framework for the borough constitution, it was for the customals compiled by the burgesses themselves – supplemented by later by-laws (usually referred to as ordinances) – to act as the evolving codex that served as a reference tool for administrators, particularly those presiding over the town courts. Customals incorporate a range of material:

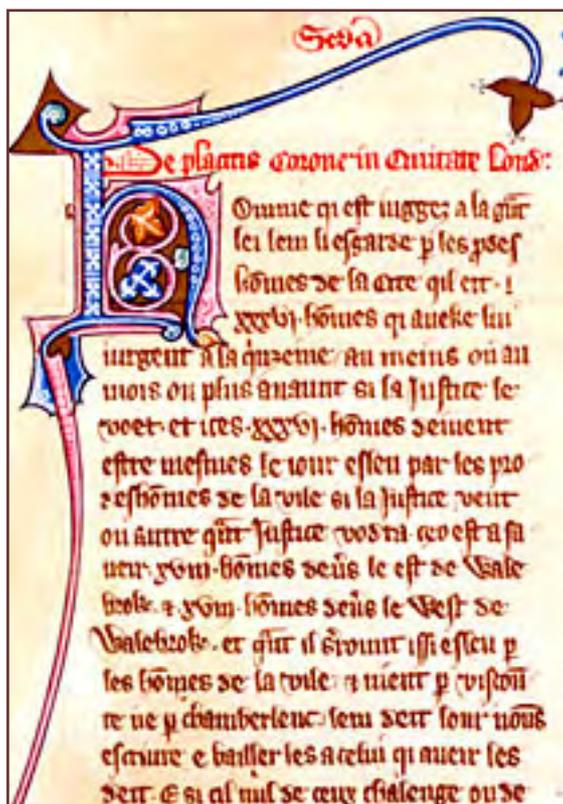

- local usages which, if not ancient, had an origin only hazily remembered, if at all;
- aspects of common law given a local spin;
- elaborations on or interpretations of chartered franchises;
- ordinances formulated by borough governments, closer to the time of the compilation of the customal, to address specific problems.

Sometimes the production of an important set of ordinances provided the impetus for a new edition of a customal to be drawn up. Most customals that have come down to us are editions of earlier compilations, and may even have been selective in what they chose to set down. That which was straightforward, well established, and common knowledge may not have been considered in need of registering.

Examples of entire customals such – from Norwich, Ipswich and Maldon – are given elsewhere on this site. Some of the early royal charters referred to, and endorsed, existing customary laws without feeling the need to spell out what was already common knowledge to the grantees. Although knowledge might become blurred or subject to changing perspective over time. Ipswich provides us both with an instance of the setting down on parchment of local laws, perhaps from the beginning of urban self-government, and with the creation of a new edition (after the original was lost) out of fear that laws held only in memory were subject to distortion.

Eventually the local customs that governed so many aspects of urban life were superseded as the monarchy sought to establish a national framework of law and legal administration. But for the period when medieval towns were at their apex, perhaps no other single type of document provides us with so fascinating a view of urban life.

Part of a page from the London Liber Albus (Book 1, pt.2, chapter 47), early 14th century, French, stating one of the city customs concerning legal procedures. For a less ornate example, see Exeter's customal.

TRANSLATION

Henry, by the grace of God King of England and duke of Normandy, to the archbishop of Canterbury, bishops, abbots, earls, barons, justices, sheriffs and all his loyal subjects, French or English, throughout England, greetings. Know that I have granted to my citizens of London for themselves and their heirs that they may hold the shrievalty of London and Middlesex of me and my heirs for a farm of £300 by tale. The citizens may appoint as sheriff whomever they want from among themselves and as judge whomever they want from among themselves to take charge pleas of the crown and supervise their conduct; no-one else shall be judge over the men of London. The citizens shall not plead outside the walls of the city in any plea. They are exempted from scot and lot, Danegeld, and murdrum, and none of them need undertake [\[trial by battle\]](#). If any citizen is accused in a plea of the crown, the Londoner may defend himself by an oath to be adjudicated in the city. Within the walls of the city no-one need be billeted, not [\[members\]](#) of my household nor anyone else, [\[nor\]](#) is any billet to be taken by force. All London men and their goods are to be exempt from and free of toll, passage, lastage, and all other customs, throughout all England and the seaports. The churches, barons, and citizens may have and hold, properly and peacefully, their sokes with all customs, on condition that visitors given hospitality in the sokes pay no customs, except to him whose soke it is or to the officer whom he has appointed there. A Londoner may not be penalized by an amercement greater than his were, that is, 100s; I refer to pleas which [have a penalty that] is pecuniary. Furthermore, miskening is not to be [applicable] in the husting or the folkmoot, nor in any other pleas within the city. A husting may be held once a week, that is, on Monday. I will ensure my citizens have [justice regarding] their lands, pledges and debts, inside the city and outside. Concerning lands for which they bring a complaint before me, I shall uphold their rights according to the law of the city. If anyone exacts toll or customs from citizens of London, the citizens may in the city recover, from [members of] the borough or town where the toll or customs were taken, the same amount given by a Londoner for toll, and applicable damages. All debtors who owe debts to citizens must repay them, or in [the court of] London offer defence that they are not indebted. If they are unwilling to repay the debt or to come and defend themselves, then the citizens to whom the debts are owed may make distraint within the city, from [any member of] the borough or town or county in which the debtor resides. The citizens may have their hunting rights in the fullest and best form they were had by their ancestors, that is, in the Chilterns, Middlesex and Surrey. Witnesses: bishop of Winchester, Robert fitz Richer, Hugh Bigot, Alfred de Totnes, William de Albini, Hubert the queen's chamberlain, William de Montfichet, Hangulf de Tanei, John Belet, and Robert fitz Siward. [Given] at Westminster.

DISCUSSION

London's farm (i.e. the estimated total of the various revenues due the king) was £300 at the time of Domesday, but by 1130 had risen to just over £525, a sum whose collection may have required extortionate measures to achieve, particularly in the context of a serious fire in the city which had just occurred and must have reduced the citizens' financial means. The collectors of the revenues that went towards the farm failed substantially to meet the required sum in 1130. These revenues were collected by sheriffs over whose appointment the citizens had no control, until that same year when evidence suggests the Londoners had persuaded the king to turn over responsibility for the farm, with concomitant election of the sheriff, to them temporarily.

Such were the circumstances believed to have produced, within the next year or so (a recent theory on the date favours 1133), the charter attributed to Henry I; this restored the farm to its traditional amount, confirmed the grant the farm (of the small county containing London) to the citizens, and gave them the right to elect the collectors as well as a measure of judicial independence in the form of electing a justiciar, a local office which had proliferated during the reign of William Rufus. Henry, who had seized the throne over the claims of an older brother (and has even been suspected of assassinating of his predecessor) and by 1130 was looking for support for the unprecedented succession of a daughter to the throne, was desirous of approval from any quarter. This, together perhaps with a wish to avoid the spectre of the revolutionary commune which had recently plagued Flanders, may have been sufficient motivation for Henry to satisfy some of the ambitions of his kingdom's most important town.

Overall, historians accept that the customs identified in the charter are quite credible for the date represented by the grant. Yet the generous terms of the charter – from a king not renowned for giving something for nothing, and not duplicated for any other town – regarding the substantial reduction of the farm (seemingly in perpetuity), grant of the shrievalty, and the apparently extensive jurisdiction of the justiciar, have given rise to concerns that the charter might be a forgery, or have undergone later interpolations, or even actually be a grant by Stephen later changed to attribute it to the more authoritative Henry I. Careful study of the document has raised the level of doubt by identifying a number of small issues that look suspicious; none of them insuperable, however.

No original of the charter has survived for us. The text is known through a large number of copies none of which appears to have avoided corruption. The earliest version – in a rambling collection of twelfth-century laws, national and local, that was compiled during the conflict between King John and his barons, and useful to the latter party in forcing the king to make concessions – is one of the more corrupt. There is evidence that by this time, or shortly afterwards, the charter had already gone missing. This loss need not itself be a major cause of suspicion, given the informality of archival practices in a time when there was no structured urban bureaucracy, given the disruptions of the Anarchy (from which the capital did not emerge unscathed), and given the fact that not a few charters of Henry II refer back to grants of liberties made by Henry I for which no original documentation has survived.

In defence of the authenticity of the charter, the reasons why Henry might have been prepared to conciliate London are indicated above. It may also be noted that many towns had their farms reduced in the decades following Domesday (although London's was not the only one to increase), so a reduction of London's – in the face of possibly strong arguments as to its unreasonably high level – is not incredible. Despite Henry's attempt to garner support for his chosen successor, it was to Stephen that London quickly gave its support in the contest for the throne. Yet neither Stephen nor Matilda appear to have paid any attention to the terms of Henry's charter; both gave the shrievalty of Middlesex to Geoffrey de Mandeville, in an attempt to win his support. In the same year (1141) London resorted to an attempt to create a commune that asserted its rights; this might have created a situation in which Stephen could have issued a charter later attributed to Henry.

Henry II's charter to London of ca.1155, whose authenticity is not questioned, was basically a confirmation of the Henry I charter. A comparison of the two strongly suggests the latter, whether genuine or forgery, was written first. Henry II, however, was not inclined to generosity, and may have had a grudge against London for its actions against his mother. While accepting the authenticity of his grandfather's grants, he reigned back on their terms, omitting control of the farm (which, when evidence reappears, shows the farm at a £500+ level) and grant of the elected officers. Among lesser differences is the substitution of exemption from brudtoll, childwite, ieresgive and scot-ale (see Northampton's charter), in place of Danegeld and scot and lot – a credible update, Danegeld (12d per hide per year) having become irrelevant as a tribute to occupying forces.

On the whole, historians are prepared to give Henry I's charter the benefit of the doubt; the most contentious issue is the level of the farm, which may represent revisionism. It was left for Henry II's sons – the one in need of money for crusading, the other pressured by a new outbreak of the assertive commune in London and baronial opposition throughout the realm – to satisfy the full ambitions reflected in a document which almost certainly was drafted in the second quarter of the twelfth century.

NOTES

"scot and lot" "Danegeld"

Scot and lot (the "and lot" not appearing in all versions) was a kind of taxation; the term sometimes seems to be used generically in medieval documents, but here it may refer to a particular levy since it is distinguished from Danegeld. The latter was originally raised for tribute to keep the Danes from invading southern England but, after the Danish threat disappeared, the king found other excuses to continue periodic levies of this tax on real estate.

"murdrum"

A murder-fine, a penalty imposed on the entire community when a murder could not be solved; the Leges Henrici Primi prescribed a fine of 46 marks if the guilty party was not captured within a week. See Medieval Sourcebook.

"trial by battle"

Trial by combat was a judicial duel, in which accused and accuser fought with weapons until one was killed or surrendered. If the defeated party was the accused, he stood convicted of the crime; if the accuser, the accused was judged innocent. Exemptions from this mode of trial were common features of early royal charters to towns; the exemption may have applied particularly to cases under the jurisdiction of royal courts, with local custom perhaps already excluding battle as an option (e.g. the Ipswich custumal, although we cannot be certain of the antiquity of its prohibition). London's is the first known exemption and perhaps set the example for other towns to follow.

"toll" "lastage"

Toll and lastage were levies on merchandize, the latter being on ship cargoes, perhaps derived from a quantity called a "last".

"sokes"

Collections of jurisdictions, independent in some regards from the main jurisdiction within which they lay. They relate to the "tenurial heterogeneity" of boroughs, whose roots lie partly in the manorial system; different tenants held under different landlords. The tenancies might, or might not, be concentrated in particular areas. Chertsey Abbey, the Cnihtengild, and the queen, for example were among holders of sokes within London at this period.

"were"

Under Anglo-Saxon law, the were, or wergild, was the financial compensation due to the kin of a slain man from his slayer. The amount varied according to the social status of the deceased. The wergild of a London citizen was greater than that of the Anglo-Saxon ceorl (free man), but less than that of a thegn. The object of this clause in the charter was to prevent townsmen being fined to ruination.

"miskenning"

Miskenning was making a mistake in the correct formula necessary for stating a plea in court, or in the facts given when stating a plea; such a mistake might forfeit the case for the pleader, lead to the case being transferred to a higher court, or at least result in a fine. It is probably the payment of the fine that the king is waiving here. The Leges Henrici Primi specifically identify London as a place where miskenning was rank, perhaps because of the large influx of French settlers, who would have had special difficulty with Anglo-Saxon legal formulae.

"Chilterns, Middlesex and Surrey"

FitzStephen's Description of London gives a slightly different list of the territories in which Londoners had hunting rights.

TRANSLATION

Henry, by the grace of God King of England, Duke of Normandy and Aquitaine, etc. Know that I have granted and confirmed to my citizens of Oxford their liberties, customs, laws and immunities which they had in the time of my grandfather, King Henry. Namely, a merchant gild with all liberties and customs, in lands, woods, pastures and other appurtenances; with the condition that anyone not belonging to their gild may not trade in any merchandize in the city or its suburb, unless he was accustomed to in the time of my grandfather, King Henry. Furthermore, I have granted and confirmed that they may be quit of tolls, passage and all customs throughout England and Normandy, [whether] by land, by river, by seashore, "by land and by strand". And they may have all other customs, liberties, and laws which the community and citizens of London have. And that at my feast they may serve me with staff of my butlery, and may act jointly with them concerning merchandizing inside London, and outside, and in all places. And if they have any doubts or differences of opinion concerning any judgement that they have to render, they may send messengers to London on the matter and whatever the Londoners judge to be correct they may take as established. If any charge is brought against them outside the city they need not answer it there; no matter what plea is made against them, they may prove their case according to the laws and customs of London, and not otherwise, for they and the citizens of London are of one and the same custom, law and liberty. It is therefore my wish etc. that they have and hold the aforesaid liberties, laws and customs, and their tenures, properly and peacefully etc., with sac and soc, tol and theam, infangenetheof, and with all other liberties, customs and immunities as best they ever had them in the time of my grandfather, King Henry, and just as my citizens of London have them. Witnesses: Thomas the chancellor, Reginald earl of Cornwall, H. earl of Norfolk etc.

DISCUSSION

This charter predates by over forty years the community acquiring the town in fee farm. As one of the earlier grants to boroughs it, like Richard I's charter to Northampton in 1189 (and yet unlike Henry's charter to Nottingham, further afield), prescribed London as the model on which to draft new laws, or even to alter existing local customs. Oxford in turn served as a model for other towns, such as Lynn. In fact, even as early as ca.1088/1107 Oxford was acting as a model, for Burford's lord granted the little Oxfordshire town a gild with the same privileges as the merchant gild of Oxford.

Further confirmation that Oxford's merchant gild existed prior to Henry's charter comes from a deed of ca.1147 in which "the community of the city and the gild of merchants" made a grant to Oseney abbey; the deed also refers to the portmanmoot (where the decision to make the grant was taken), although this has no mention in Henry II's charter, and to the alderman – presumably the merchant gild alderman – who appears to be a leader of the community; the alderman identified happened to be a powerful local landowner and keeper of Oxford's castle, rather than a merchant, although this choice of leadership may have been prompted by the civil war. Reeves of Oxford are likewise heard of in the first half of the 12th century (although this does not mean they were chosen by the community). It is evident then that we cannot rely solely on royal charters to fully portray the state of local organization or government, nor should we expect to. Nor should too much emphasis be placed on the acquisition of the fee farm as a defining step in local self-government. In 1191, eight years before the fee farm was acquired, another grant by the the community and merchant gild had affixed to it a seal inscribed "the common seal of all the citizens of the city of Oxford" (something evidently not possessed in 1147); among the initial witnesses were two aldermen and two reeves.

NOTES

"strand"

The reference is to beaching or anchoring off the beach (strand), for which a toll was payable; see Customs charged on imports to and exports from London.

"my feast"

The king's "feast" refers to the state dinner preceding the day of coronation; since the king could not grant this privilege for himself, only for his successors, it may be that other state dinners are also intended. The clause that follows appears to be grammatically connected with the coronation clause; its meaning is not evident, however, unless the citizens not only served at the feast but helped provision it as well – although such a role is not evidenced anywhere. Possibly it was originally a separate clause from which one or more words were accidentally omitted during the process of making later copies. Evidence of the Oxford community's role, shared with the citizens of London, of taking over the duties of the butler at the coronation feast is given in a document of 1461, which narrates how the mayor, accompanied by six other townsmen, claimed from the High Steward to right to so serve at the coronation of Edward IV, with the result that "the butler delivered an apron to each of the burgesses and instructed them well in performing the duties, and told them to give him or any of his staff commands and they would be obeyed; and so they were." [my modernization, from H.E. Salter, ed. Munimenta Civitatis Oxonie, (1920), 223]. Curiously, however, a detailed account (in London's Liber Custumarum) of the ceremonials surrounding the coronation of Richard II, which records numerous claims – most by nobles – to perform some role during the ceremony, includes a grant to London to aid the Chief Butler in serving at the feast, but makes no mention of any similar claim by Oxford. The men of the Cinque Ports also had a role, by holding a canopy over the king during the coronation.

"sac and soc" "tol and theam" "infangenetheof"

Sac and soc were different kinds of jurisdiction, incorporating the right to hold courts to try cases and to take the revenues resulting from the same. For tol and team and infangthef, see the notes to Henry II's charter to Nottingham.

TRANSLATION

Henry, King of England, Duke of Normandy and Aquitaine, Count of Anjou, to his archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, justices, sheriffs, officers and all loyal subjects throughout England, French and English, greetings. Know that I have granted, and by this charter confirm, to the burgesses of Nottingham all those free customs which they had in the time of my grandfather, King Henry. Which is to say: tol and them; infangenetheof; and the collection of tolls – as fully as in the borough of Nottingham – from Thrumpton as far as Newark, including on all [\[goods\]](#) crossing the Trent, and on the other side of the watercourse beyond Rempston as far as the water of Retford in the north. Moreover, the men of Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire ought to come to the borough of Nottingham each Friday and Saturday, with their wagons and packhorses; nor should anyone manufacture dyed cloth within a radius of 10 leagues of Nottingham, except in the borough of Nottingham. If anyone, from whatever place he originates, lives in the borough of Nottingham for a year and a day during a time of peace, without [\[anyone laying\]](#) claim [\[to him\]](#), no-one shall have any lordship over him afterwards except the king. If any burgess buys land in his neighbourhood and has possession of it for an entire year and a day, without claim [to it] by the kin of the vendor (if they are in England), his ownership of it may not afterwards be challenged. Nor shall any burgess be answerable to a charge made by the reeve of the borough of Nottingham, unless there is a plaintiff in the case. Whoever resides in the borough, no matter what fee he is in, ought to contribute with the burgesses to tallages and to making up borough defaults. Also, all those who come to Nottingham marketplace between Friday evening and Saturday evening shall not be subject to distraint, unless for [payment towards] the king's farm. And the right of passage along the Trent should be free to navigation to the width of one perch on either side of midstream. It is my will and firm command that the burgesses shall have and hold the aforesaid customs properly, peacefully, freely, quietly, honorably, fully, and wholly, as they had them in the time of King Henry my grandfather. Witnesses: Richard de Humes constable, William de Braosio, William de Caisneto, William de Lanvallei, Ralph sheriff of Nottingham. [Given] at York.

DISCUSSION

Henry II was cautious in the amount of liberty he granted to English boroughs, wishing to avoid anything similar to the "revolutionary" communes that had caused political strife on mainland Europe. He did little more than continue a policy begun by Henry I. He was prepared to confirm privileges which some towns claimed to have received from his grandfather, or to grant the same types of privileges to other towns, on condition of an annual payment (farm), but ensured that this was a strictly revocable arrangement. It was not in Henry II's nature to surrender his powers to others. Nonetheless, his reign did see a large number of charters to towns, furthering their ambitions at least a little. When, at the very end of his reign, Henry gave Nottingham into the lordship of his son, John, the latter confirmed the terms of his father's charter, and added new privileges: right to a merchant guild, exemption from toll, fee farm and the associated right to elect a reeve.

A comparison of this document to the contemporary grant to Oxford is useful in indicating how certain liberties were common features of charters, while others were specific to local needs.

NOTES

"tol and theam"

I have encountered considerable variance in the interpretation of "tol and theam", a combination typically found together (like sac and soc). L.J. Downer, in his edition of the Leges Henrici Primi defined tol as "the right to receive a tax on the sale of goods within the privileged person's property" and theam as "taking of the profits where a person charged with wrongfully possessing goods was able to vouch to warranty". Bishop Stubbs, in a similar vein, had defined theam as the right to compel the person in whose possession stolen or lost property was found to identify the person from whom he received it, and this definition was followed by Ballard in his study of borough charters, and has passed its way down into ORB's Guide to Medieval Terms. Christopher Brooke described tol and theam as the right to levy tolls on the sale of cattle and the right of a court to try cases of cattle-theft, in which he was probably following Harmer's study of Anglo-Saxon writs (1952), defining tol as the right of an estate-owner to take a toll from sales of cattle or other goods that happened on his estate; and theam as the right to profits (i.e. a fine) from a case in which someone accused of unlawful possession of cattle or other goods could vouch his warrantor (i.e. pass answerability along to the person from whom he acquired the goods). It is unknown if tol was used in the Anglo-Saxon period to refer to the imposition of a tax on the passage of goods through one's property. Stubbs did not differentiate between tol and thelonium, although their separate inclusion in the same list in the Nottingham charter suggests they were not, at that time, perceived as the same thing. The pairing of tol and theam is probably because the witnessed payment of toll on a sale provided some assurance of the honesty of the transaction. That the perception of meanings could change, however, is shown by a late 14th century entry in Colchester's Red Parchment Book indicating that some jurists of that time thought theam was the right of a lord to own the children of his villeins, except that if any villein had lived in a town for a year and a day and had been received into the community (i.e. entered the franchise or the gild), he became free. The same source defined tol as an exemption for a lord and his villeins from paying tolls on goods they bought or sold in all markets. London's Liber Memorandum has a set of shorter definitions that support those of the Red Parchment Book.

"infangenetheof"

Infangthef was the right of a court to try thieves caught within the region of its jurisdiction, notably those caught red-handed (and, since the punishment was hanging, in effect the right to a gallows). Outfangthef, on the other hand, was the right to pursue thieves beyond the region of jurisdiction, and was a liberty accorded to few boroughs.

"men of Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire"

The purpose of the clause referring to these men was to designate the borough as an authorized marketplace for those counties, seeming to imply that no other markets were to operate within that region on the specified days – just as the clause that followed protected the borough's control of cloth manufacture by prohibiting rival industry within a 30-mile radius.

"the kin of the vendor"

The pre-emptive rights of kin to property, under certain circumstances, are exemplified in chapters of the Norwich and Fordwich customals.

"borough defaults"

The phrase here translated as referring to borough defaults is a little vague in the Latin, but most likely refers to communal answerability for the entire amount of a tax or other levy, regardless of defaults of individual members in contributing their share.

"subject to distraint"

The distraint from which temporary protection was accorded, to those coming to the Saturday market, may have related to private grievances in cases of withernam; but the reference to the farm indicates that it also related to public misdeeds, such as avoidance of tolls, which deprived the borough of revenue needed to pay the farm.

"one perch"

Approximately 17 feet.

TRANSLATION

Richard, by the grace of God King of England, Duke of Normandy [and] Aquitaine, Count of Anjou, to his archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, barons, justices, sheriffs, and all officers and loyal subjects, French and English, greetings. Know that we have granted to our burgesses of Northampton that none of them – except our officers and money-minters – need answer any plea [introduced in any court] outside the walls of the borough of Northampton, except pleas concerning lands held outside [the town]. We have granted to them freedom from murdrum within the borough and in the portsoken, that none of them need undertake [trial by] battle, that in pleas within the jurisdiction of the Crown they may defend themselves according to the custom of the city of London, and that within the walls of the town no-one may take lodging by force or through command of the Marshal. We have also granted this: that all burgesses of Northampton are exempt from toll and lastage throughout England and the sea-ports. And that none of them receive judgement of [paying] an amercement except as determined by the law which our citizens of London have. Miskening is not to be [applicable] in any plea [tried] in the borough. And that a husting may be held once a week; and that they have a legal right to their lands and tenures and to their pledges and debts, regardless of who is answerable to them [for the same]. With regard to those lands and tenures that are within the borough, justice shall be done to them according to the [legal] customs of the borough; and for all debts incurred or pledges made at Northampton, the pleas shall be held in Northampton. If anyone anywhere in England takes toll or custom from Northampton men and afterwards fails to rectify this, the reeve of Northampton may take retribution for the same at Northampton. Furthermore, to improve things in the borough, we have granted that they are exempt from brudtol, childwite, heresgive and scot-ale; the reeve of Northampton, nor any other bailiff, may not make any scotale. These aforementioned customs we have granted them along with all other liberties and free customs which our citizens of London had or have, when they had them best or most freely according to the liberties of London and laws of the borough of Northampton. It is our will and firm command that they and their heirs have and hold all these aforesaid things hereditarily of us and our heirs, in return for £120 by tale from the town of Northampton and all its appurtenances [i.e. the portsoken], paid at our Exchequer at Michaelmas term by the hands of the reeve of Northampton. The burgesses of Northampton may appoint as reeve for the year whomever they want from among themselves, so long as he is suitable to us and them. Witnesses: Hugh bishop of Durham, John bishop of Norwich, Hubert bishop of Salisbury, Earl Alber', William earl of Arundel, Richard earl of Clare, Hamelin earl of Warenne, Walter fitz Rodbert. Given at [Bury] St. Edmunds on 18 November 1189, by the hands of our Chancellor, William bishop Elect of Ely.

DISCUSSION

Hamtun was a settlement of some consequence in Mercia, the Danelaw, and then as one of Edward the Elder's burhs; after the unification of England it was capital of a shire. Its fortunes rose even higher after the Conquest, in part due to its strategic midway position between England's capital, Winchester, and the effective capital of the north, York; a castle and a parallel community of Norman settlers were established there. The king himself was often at Northampton, and had residences in the vicinity; he shared lordship of the borough with the earl of Northampton. Four years before the grant of Richard's charter, with its earl recently dead, Northampton's burgesses had successfully negotiated with Henry II (whom ten years earlier they had supported when his son rebelled) to take away from royal officials control of collecting their farm; almost every year thereafter to about the end of the century two men, almost certainly reeves, are found accounting at the Exchequer for the farm, on behalf of the burgesses, although whether elected or appointed by the king we cannot say. Richard I's charter made this a permanent state of affairs, acknowledging the burgesses right to choose at least one, if not both, of the reeves.

In contrast to Henry II's reticence to grant too much self-government to boroughs, his sons – in need of money or support, for one reason or another – were more open to persuasion (whereas Henry III, more assertive of monarchic power, reverted to the policy of confirmation only). That this charter of 1189 was the first royal grant of liberties to Northampton is evident from the fact that subsequent inspections and confirmations of the borough liberties by later kings, repeating the terms of their predecessors' grants, always begin with the charter of Richard I, which itself makes no reference to any grant of liberties by his predecessors, although his charter is very similar to that granted by Henry II to London ca.1155.

Northampton's first custumal was compiled at about the same time as the charter grant, raising the possibility that the town may have responded to the grant with a process of setting up mechanisms of government similar to that which fortuitously has left a detailed record for Ipswich.

This was a fairly standard set of royal concessions for the initial period of introduction of urban self-government. For example, Colchester's royal charter of the same year had a number of the same clauses, while an even more similar charter was granted to Norwich in 1194. The burgesses obtained what was essentially a confirmation of the same terms by Richard's successor, John, the most notable alteration being that the right to elect a reeve was qualified so that the townsmen would agree ("by common counsel") on two of the more law-abiding and sensible of their number, to be presented to the Chief Justice as reeves, and not to be removed from office (within the term for which elected) while they conducted themselves properly, except by a communal decision; evidence from the Pipe Rolls suggests that the reference to two reeves was not an amendment but a clarification of what had for some years been the actual situation in Northampton. Four coroners were also to be elected, to keep an eye on the good government of the reeves. Those same additions were part of the royal charter to Ipswich in the same year. The Pipe Rolls indicate that Northampton was paying a farm to the Exchequer, through reeves (possibly elected), for several years before the grant of this charter – in fact the burgesses were farming the borough from the sheriff at the time of Domesday; the main changes that Richard's charter made was, it is believed, to make the farm a perpetual right of the borough and to give royal blessing to community election of reeves.

NOTES

"murdrum"

A murder-fine, a penalty imposed on the entire community when a murder could not be solved; the Leges Henrici Primi prescribed a fine of 46 marks if the guilty party was not captured within a week. See Medieval Sourcebook.

"portsoken"

The portsoken – the soke (or area of jurisdiction) of the port – comprised the lands outside the walls whose residents were answerable in Nottingham's court.

"trial by battle"

Trial by combat was a judicial duel, in which accused and accuser fought with weapons until one was killed or surrendered. If the defeated party was the accused, he stood convicted of the crime; if the accuser, the accused was judged innocent. Exemptions from this mode of trial were common features of early royal charters to towns; the exemption may have applied particularly to cases under the jurisdiction of royal courts, with local custom perhaps already excluding battle as an option (e.g. the lpswich custumal, although we cannot be certain of the antiquity of its prohibition).

"take lodging by force"

This refers to billeting; the king's marshals were officers who had to arrange lodgings for the royal court, when it travelled around the country. The aim with this clause may have been to ensure that burgesses could refuse to provide billets, unless they were compensated financially to their satisfaction.

"toll and lastage"

These were levies on merchandize, the latter being on ship cargoes, perhaps derived from a quantity called a "last".

"judgement of paying an amercement"

The reference to this judicial penalty relates to the limitation of the fine to an amount within the means of the convicted party to pay.

"miskening"

Miskening was making a mistake in the correct formula necessary for stating a plea in court, or in the facts given when stating a plea; such a mistake might forfeit the case for the pleader, or at least result in a fine. It is probably the payment of the fine that the king is waiving here.

"husting"

Use of the term husting likely shows the influence of a London model.

Conventional translations of this clause imply that the holding of the husting was to be limited to no more than once a week, and James Tait accepted this interpretation in his important study of borough constitutional development.

However, in my opinion the intent of this clause was to sanction a weekly court (on a par with the London husting), as opposed to having borough judicial administration rely on the hundred court, which convened monthly. The placement after the husting clause of the clause relating to lands and debts may be deliberate – hence I have grammatically connected them in my translation – since the intent was to confirm the burgesses' right to sue anyone, lord or commoner, for property (real or moveable) being illegally withheld from them, and this was in most cases (as the charter goes on to detail) a jurisdiction of the borough court. What I have here translated as "pledges" (vadia) most probably refers to contractual agreements made between burgesses.

Consuetudines is being used in the document in two senses: the customary payments imposed on merchandize brought into the town for sale (i.e. tolls), and the customary laws developed or applied at the local level of government.

"retribution"

The financial "retribution" that the Northampton authorities could exact from anyone associated with those (mainly referring to other jurisdictions) who demanded the payment of tolls from Northampton men – who had earlier in the charter been exempted from such exactions – is expressed in the charter by the term namium (distrain), referring to the process of withernam (actually a counter-distrain). Before this could be done, however, the authorities representing the injured townsman had to advise their counterparts of the offending town of their privilege of freedom of toll, in the hope of obtaining compensation. The borough copy of the charter of 1189 was used – as an endorsement by the London authorities in 1361 indicates – to prove to other towns Northampton burgesses' exemption from toll.

"brudtol, childwite, heresgive and scot-ale"

Although Markham defined brudtol as a toll for crossing a bridge (later known as pontage), I prefer an alternative explanation: a fee payable to the lord of a bond-woman when a freeman married her, which better fits this context (dealing with freedom from feudal dues). Childwite was compensation due a lord for impregnating his bond-woman without his permission. Heresgive (or yeresgive in John's confirmation charter) is less certain. According to Markham it was "a compulsory new year's gift to the sovereign"; Bishop Stubbs defined it as a payment made by burgesses to a royal official (although probably only on the basis of seeing the term in borough charters, without actually knowing what it meant), while Ballard interpreted it simply as a new year's gift without attempting to identify a recipient. Another possibility is that it may have been a compulsory gift to one's lord when his first son was born. Scot-ale is a term whose meaning is obscure – or, rather, it appears to have been applied in diverse ways. In its most fundamental sense it appears to be some kind of a tax (as in scot and lot) on the selling or brewing of ale. However, it was also – as in the case here – a fund-raising device used by a lord or by his officers and taking the form of a traditional drinking party in which the "guests" invited – attendance being compulsory – had to make contributions, perhaps as an inflated price for their ale, with the proceeds being used by officials for their own purposes. Although there is evidence from London that urban authorities might licence scot-ales for approved purposes, the populace considered such forms of exaction extortionate and it was probably popular protest that led to their abolition.

"by tale"

A method of calculating a financial amount, as opposed to the method called "blank".

TRANSLATION

Ralph earl of Chester to all his barons, constables, bailiffs, officers, liege-men and friends, French and English, both present and future, greetings. Know that I have granted and given, and by this charter confirm, to my burgesses of Coventry all things written down in this charter. That is, that the burgesses and their heirs may hold [their property] properly, honorably, peacefully, and in free burgage of me and my heirs, as well, as securely, and as freely as they held in the time of my father or any of my ancestors. I grant them all free and good laws which the burgesses of Lincoln have, at their best and most free. I prohibit and forbid my constables from bringing them [i.e. burgesses] into the castle to plead a case, but they [i.e. the burgesses] may freely have their portmoot in which to deal justly with all pleas concerning me and them. Furthermore, they may elect on my behalf, [to serve] under me and over them as judge, anyone from among themselves who is familiar with [their] laws and customs, who can govern them reasonably and by my advice without any excuses, and faithfully assure my rights. If it happens that anyone incurs an amercement [payable] to me, the fine assessed by my bailiff and the faithful burgesses of the court should be reasonable. I order that any merchants attracted to the town to trade be treated peacefully and no-one shall do them injury or implead them unjustly. But if any outsider merchant does anything improper in the town he shall be brought before the judge in the portmoot. Witnesses: Roger constable of Chester, Robert de Mohaut steward, Ralph de Meisnilwarin, Peter Rouaat, Simon Thuschet, Thomas Despenser, Joel de Lovin, William Marshal, Joel Berenger, Philip de Horreby, Roger de Camville, Roger de Busserville, Willam Picot, William de Hardredes Hill, Warin de Vernun and many others at Coventry.

DISCUSSION

Before the Conquest the site of Coventry was part of the estates held by the famous Countess Godiva, and an abbey was founded there ca.1043. It is possible a modest market settlement arose at the monastery gates in the years following; but, if so, it was apparently not significant enough for Domesday to pay it any attention. Yet by the end of the century the Bishop of Chester had moved his see to Coventry, acquired the abbey from the king and become the titular abbot, with effective leadership of the monastic community being by the prior. At some point, possibly the late eleventh century, the estates of Godiva came into the hands of the earl of Chester, and around the earl's castle a second trading settlement grew up, fostered by the earl's grant of burgage tenure. The abbey later claimed that it was a soke independent from the earl's estates (a response to Earl Ranulph II's attempts to assert his authority over both parts of Coventry), although whether this had real foundation or was based solely on charters now known to be forgeries is uncertain. The division between the "Earl's part" and the "Prior's part" of Coventry, together with Ranulph II's transfer of his principal base of operations to Coventry as a central location from which to consolidate his sphere of influence in the midlands, provide the background to the charter grants above.

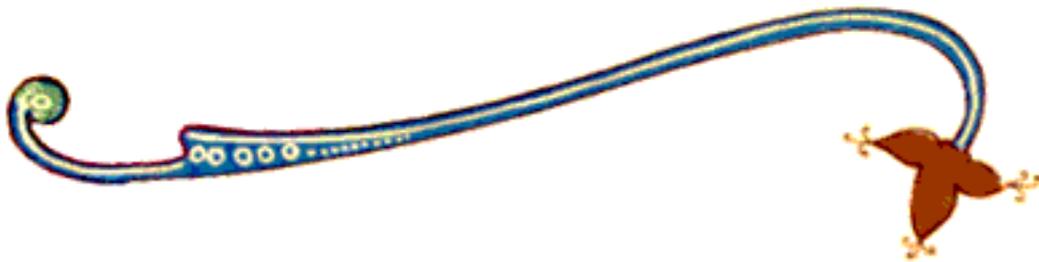

Presumably the charter of Ranulph III, grandson of Ranulph II, was granted to the half of the town which lay within his lordship, although there is nothing in it that states so, and it may have been directed at the entire burgess community, part of the policy of ignoring the prior's claims. More important, the charter is essentially – although unacknowledgedly – a renewal of that granted by Ranulph II ca.1140/50, itself known only from the confirmation sought by the burgesses from Henry II in 1182, while Ranulph III was in his minority and the town was under a royal custodian. There are, however, some minor but not insignificant differences.

Ranulph II's charter referred back to a grant of burgage tenure in the time of his own father. It established a town court (portmanmoot) and allowed the burgesses to adopt the local laws of Lincoln. And it aimed at developing the town's economy by offering protection to visiting merchants (as in the above document) and, to any who would establish a residence in the town, a two-year exemption from paying any kind of dues from the time they began to build. That the latter clause was omitted in Ranulph III's charter suggests that the incentive had done its work and was no longer needed. Another difference is that Ranulph II's charter set a 12d. ceiling on amercements assessable in the portmoot, as well as the provision for a reduction in amercement should 12 neighbours testify to the convicted party's inability to pay. The abandonment of these specifications – in favour of the more general statement that amercements should not be unreasonable – in Ranulph III's charter suggests, Peter Coss has argued, that they may have been unwarranted additions (interpolations) to Ranulph II's actual terms, made by the burgesses in 1182, then suppressed once Ranulph III had emerged from his minority. Professor Coss suspects that the clause granting an elected justiciar was also an interpolation by the burgesses, on the grounds that there was virtually no precedent for such an urban officer in the time of Ranulph II – in fact, the only precedent was a London charter whose equivalent clause has itself been suspected as a forgery. However, there were such officers for the earldom, so it may simply have been a case of expressing a concept with a term familiar to the earl (see notes below), while the part of this clause emphasising the officer's responsibility to the earl is not something the burgesses needed, or would have been expected, to fabricate. Whether or not that clause was an interpolation, Ranulph III let it stand; although his revision of the clause concerning limitation on amercements did emphasize the role of the bailiff, we cannot be certain that this was not simply another way of referring to the justiciar (no officer of that name appearing in court witness lists of the thirteenth century).

Ranulph II's charter was one of the earliest granted by mesne lords to their towns, and shows a borough at the initial stage of moving towards self-government, focused around the court – there being no sign of a merchant guild such as that whose existence was recognized in Henry III's charter of 1267 to the prior's half of the town and which later had a strong role in Coventry. The possible fabrications added for an unwitting Henry II's approval – it perhaps being significant that neither original nor copy of the text of Ranulph II's charter has survived – reflect burgess ambitions to improve their situation at a time when their lord was not in a position to object. Ranulph III's renewal demonstrates both some alteration in the situation since mid-twelfth century and also reassertion of lordly authority. The only change he made in favour of the burgesses was to word more strongly the clause disabling the constable of the castle from trying cases involving burgesses. Thus, in all, the charter and its history offer revealing documentation of the incipience of an urban constitution in the twelfth century.

NOTES

"Lincoln"

The selection of Lincoln as a blanket model for the laws allowed to Coventry burgesses was due to the fact that the Earl Ranulph II was also lord of Lincoln. When assigning a model, no specification of the model's laws or liberties was explicitly given; borough authorities are sometimes seen consulting their counterparts in the model town to obtain further information or clarification on a point of law or administration.

"judge"

The reference to a judge under that name (justicia) is unusual, but is doubtless a generic term intended for a communally elected officer to preside in the borough court; elsewhere such an officer might be called a "bailiff", but here the officer had to be distinguished from the bailiff appointed by the earl.

"witnesses"

Besides those witnesses specifically so identified, several were officers of the earl – such as Philip de Orreby and Ralph de Mainwaring – while others were local landholders with Coventry interests (e.g. William de Hartshill, William de Picot, Roger de Camville, Roger de Busherville).

TRANSLATION

This indenture made between the noble lord John, king of Castile and Leon, and Duke of Lancaster, on the one hand, and the mayor, burgesses and community of the town of Leicester, on the other hand, evidences that the Duke has granted and farmed to the mayor, burgesses and commonalty, the bailiwick of the town and its suburbs. Including all types of executions to be made within the same by the bailiffs deputed by them, both of writs of the king and of any other executions whatsoever within the town and suburbs. Together with all kinds of revenues from portmoots, courts of the fair and the market of the town and suburbs, and any other courts whatsoever within the town and suburbs, to be held by them or their deputies. [Together] with all kinds or rents, leases, and [other such] revenues within the town and suburbs. [Together] with the possessions of fugitives and felons, waif and stray, [and any] fines and amercements imposed before them or their deputies in the town. Excluding rents and leases of ovens, mills, and watercourses, and the rents leviabie by the porter of the castle, as were accustomed to be levied in the past. And reserving to the duke and his heirs: the escheats of free tenements; his court held in Leicester castle every three weeks; summonses, attachments, distresses, and all other kinds of executions ordered by that same court and to be made or levied by the porter of the castle throughout the town and suburbs. In addition, the duke has granted to the mayor, burgesses and community and their successors the custody of all kinds of prisoners arrested in the town and suburbs, whether for felonies or for trespasses, to be guarded according to the law, just as in the past was the responsibility of the duke's bailiffs.

The mayor, burgesses, community and their successors are to have and to hold all these powers and revenues indicated above, other than those excluded above, and only for the term of ten years – this term beginning on 29 September following the date of this document. For such, they are to pay annually to the duke and his heirs, through his receiver at Leicester who is then in office, £80 in cash in equal portions at the feasts of the Purification of Our Lady, Whitsuntide, and Michaelmas. On condition that at any time that the farm of £80 may be in arrears, wholly or in part, at any of those due dates, it is permissible for the duke and his heirs and their officers to distrain the mayor, burgesses and community, and each of them [individually], and to drive or carry off and to keep the distress taken, until they have been satisfied for the arrears of the farm. Should it happen that the farm be in arrears for a month following the due dates indicated, the mayor, burgesses and community by this document agree and commit themselves and their successors to pay the duke and his heirs one hundred shillings above the farm stated above, for every payment period which is thus in arrears, throughout the term of the ten years.

The duke grants to the mayor, burgesses and community that they may have large timbers from the duke's woods, in order to build new shops that may be rented out for the profit of the mayor, burgesses and community during the aforementioned term of ten years, and after that period [the profit] of the duke and his heirs. He also grants that they may have large timbers from the same woods for improvements and repairs to the shops and shambles which are at present rented out in the marketplace of the town. And that the two bailiffs who are elected in the town by the mayor, burgesses and community, shall have clothing of his livery at the times when he makes a general handout of livery.

In witness to which, the duke has set his seal to the one part of this indenture, and the mayor, burgesses and community have set their common seal to the other part of the indenture. Given at Leicester on 20 August 1375.

DISCUSSION

The emphasis in this grant is not on the delegation of authority or jurisdiction so much as the leasing of revenues in return for an annual lump sum payment. The collection of these revenues entailed jurisdiction. Revenues and jurisdiction were two sides of the same coin. A community sought jurisdiction in order to have more direct control over matters that affected its self-interests, well-being, and prosperity. As towns grew, their industry and commerce flourished, and immigrants were attracted, jurisdiction offered the prospect of increased revenues. If the community could acquire the jurisdiction-revenues for a fixed annual payment, it could capitalize on the growing profit margin, channeling some of those profits into community improvements and strengthened self-government.

After the death of Simon de Montfort, earl of Leicester, at Evesham (1265), the king gave the lordship of Leicester to one of his sons, and it thereby became part of the earldom of Lancaster. As they had in the thirteenth century (see Origins of some customs at Leicester), the burgesses of the fourteenth century town continued to chip away at their obligations to their seigneur, negotiating on matters such as pasture rights, customary payments, revenues due the lord from the fair (stallage, fair court fines), and various market tolls. These negotiations met with mixed success.

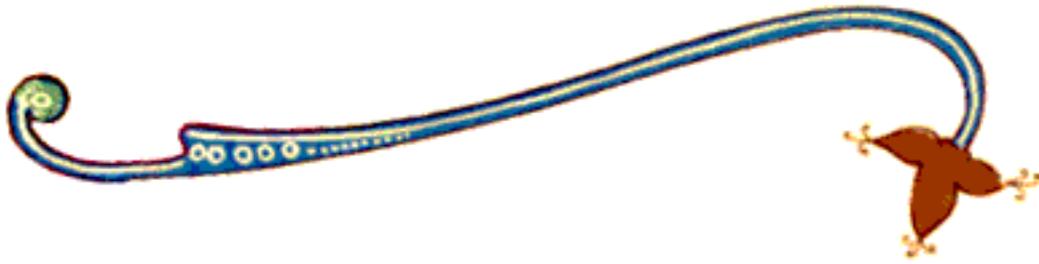

New negotiations with John of Gaunt were on a more ambitious scale, with the burgesses seeking to farm a group of revenues and jurisdictions from the duke. This was hardly ambitious on the scale of general urban development, however, as most towns of comparable size and importance had already obtained that degree of self-government through fee farm grants, typically including the right to elect administrative officers. Because of the restricted nature of his lordship over Leicester, however, John of Gaunt was unable (even had he been willing) to give his burgesses of Leicester a grant of perpetual fee farm. Instead the burgesses acquired, during a ten-year lease, direct control over the borough courts and market, and the revenues issuing from them. This included the right to elect the town bailiffs who were responsible for administration of the same, although the duke made it clear that the bailiffs remained essentially answerable to him, by clothing them in his household uniform.

Whether this arrangement was actually to the fiscal advantage of the town is open to question. At this period the mayoral government, to cover its operating expenses, was relying on a small but growing number of rents, a very modest profit from fines for infringements of borough ordinances or the assize of bread, and (primarily) on fees for membership in the merchant guild, supplemented by the occasional local tax imposed when need required, which was often. The mayor was the accountant; but, apparently as a result of the 1375 grant, chamberlains took over this responsibility – whether they were new officers, or the guild's financial officers in an expanded role is more difficult to say – and the mayor focused on accounting for the revenues that had to address the annual farm.

The only such account for the farm to have survived to us is that of 1377/78. Already it refers to substantial arrears due from the very first term under the lease; perhaps the burgesses had not yet been able to take advantage of prospective new revenues from building new shops, for in 1378/79 the mayor and portmanmoot ordered the bailiffs to do their best in finding tenants for the shops. The account also shows that the burgesses had already broken the terms of the lease, with regard to escheats: they had taken revenues from properties that ought to have escheated, and now owed over £10 to the duke, who had presumably learned what was going on and insisted on his rights – but there were perhaps mitigating circumstances (lack of new rents?), as the duke subsequently forgave them the full amount. Nonetheless, at the end of this account they continued to owe the duke the original arrears, although were able to pay the full £80 for 1377/78. In the years that followed, there seem to have been further adjustments in the borough's accounting system, but precisely what is hidden by a disappearance of financial records from this period.

It does not appear that the burgesses obtained a renewal of the farm in 1385. We know only that in 1404 they obtained from his son, as Henry IV, a 20-year lease on slightly more restrictive terms and for £90 a year. In 1423 Henry V's widow renewed the lease for ten more years, at the original £80. Other surviving evidence suggests that in the 1390s and 1440s there was no lease in effect.

NOTES

"indenture"

A written agreement, named for the fact that two copies were made on the same membrane of parchment, then were cut apart in a zig-zag fashion, to create the effect of indentations. This made it difficult for either party to alter the terms of the agreement via forgery – the authenticity of one part of the agreement could be checked by matching its indents against those of the other part.

"bailiwick"

A scope of authority.

"executions"

The carrying out of legal and administrative instructions.

"courts of the fair and the market"

This would refer to piepowder proceedings.

"waif and stray"

Beasts that were caught roaming loose.

"escheats"

Properties which fell vacant due to the failure of heirs or the loss of rights of the tenant due to conviction (or outlawry) for a crime, and consequently reverted to the lord of the land.

"receiver"

The Receiver of the honour of Leicester.

"drive"

The original is chacer, which would seem to apply to distraint of animals.

"livery"

Articles of clothing and/or decorative items worn to indicate affiliation with some party or source of authority, similar to a uniform. Associated with "bastard feudalism", and with the factionalism that plagued England in the fifteenth century.

TRANSLATION

To our lord king and his council, the mayor, bailiffs, and community of the town of Bristol present that the town is situated partly in the county of Gloucestershire and partly in the county of Somerset, thirty miles in distance via mucky and rutted roads from the towns of Gloucester and Ilchester where the assizes, county courts, sessions, nisi prius, and other inquests in those two counties are held, presided over by justices, sheriffs and escheators. To which assizes, sessions, county courts and inquests the burgesses of the town are obliged to make troublesome journeys on a daily basis, keeping them from their commercial activities and reducing them to poverty. May it therefore please our noble lord to grant: that the town with its suburbs, as the boundaries and limits are [at present] defined, be permanently separated and excluded in all regards from those two counties; that they have the power to have and elect annually from among themselves a sheriff and escheator; and that this sheriff and this escheator be explicitly given the same powers, jurisdiction, and independence in regard to their office that other sheriffs and escheators have in other counties.

Also, just as our lord king has confirmed in their charters that no burgess of the town need plead or be impleaded outside the walls of the town, as a county may it please our lord king to specify these general terms, that is: that, in regard either to their tenures within the town and suburbs or to any act committed or to be committed within the town and suburbs, no burgess of the town and suburbs implead or be impleaded before any judge outside the town, nor in regard to any matter of contracts, agreements, debts, trespasses, or other acts. Nor that they may be convicted by outsiders, but only by their fellow burgesses within the town. And that the burgesses, their heirs and successors who are burgesses of the same town, may have cognizance of all types of pleas, both those concerning lands, tenements, rents and tenures within the town and suburbs, and those concerning contracts, agreements, debts, trespasses, other pleas and suits, and anything else done or occurring in whatever manner within the town and suburbs and concerning whatever persons. And to have the power to punish – by amercement, fine or imprisonment – wrongdoers, those who disturb the peace, labourers, workmen, and craftsmen infringing the statutes; to have and to hold before the mayor and bailiffs within the town, forever, and to have executed the judgements made before them in whatever of the abovesaid pleas or cases. So that no justice of the king or his heirs appointed to preside at assizes, juries, certifications, or attainders in the said two counties, of either bench, or any other justices appointed to oyer and terminer, or to keeping the peace, or for holding any other inquest whatsoever, [nor] sheriffs or escheators of the said counties, nor any other minister whatsoever of the king or his heirs, have any cognizance within, or meddle or interfere with, the town or suburbs – not regarding tenures within that town and suburbs, nor regarding contracts, agreements, trespasses, pleas, suits or any other thing whatsoever committed or to be committed, occurring or to occur, regardless of the standing or social position of the parties, claimants or tenants, plaintiffs or defendants – unless the matter directly concerns the king or his heirs. But that henceforth the Chancery of the king and his heirs shall write, by writs of right patent, to the mayor and bailiffs of the town [ordering] that they give proper justice to the parties claimant or plaintiff concerning lands, tenements, rents and tenures within the town and suburbs. And that anyone, claimant or plaintiff, in all sorts of actions for laying claim to lands, tenements, rents or any other kinds of tenures within the town or suburbs may bring a plea by the said writ of right patent, by laying a specific complaint according to the form and nature of any royal writ, as well as [have] an assize of novel disseisin, mort d'ancestor, certifications and attainders, as well as other kinds of writ concerning pleas of lands or tenements to be actioned at their choice. And that all kinds of other pleas of contracts, agreements, debts, trespasses or other personal actions be brought before the mayor, bailiffs, or sheriffs by bills and complaints. So that all kinds of pleas, both real or personal, be held and brought to conclusion before the mayor, bailiffs, and sheriff in the way indicated above, and not otherwise.

And that the mayor of the town then in office may have the power to record the recognizance of deeds and all other kinds of writings relating to lands, tenements, rents and tenures within the town and suburbs, including those consented to by married women who are explicitly examined on the matter in full court session of the Gildhall of the town, as well as by anyone else. And to register in the rolls of the Gildhall such deeds and writings openly recognized as described above, so that from that time forward those deeds and writings are considered to be on record against [any challenge from] any persons whatsoever, forever.

And that the mayor may have the power to take probates of wills relating to bequests of lands and tenements in the town and suburbs, to make public proclamation of such wills and bequests in full court session of the Gildhall, and to register them in the rolls of the Gildhall. So that, after such registration and proclamation of the bequests are a matter of [public] record, the mayor may then have the power to put the bequests into execution.

And that the mayor, bailiffs, and sheriff then in office may be allowed to render account by qualified attornies, appointed by letters patent under the seal of the community of the town, before the barons of the king's Exchequer regarding all kinds of accounts and debts involving the mayor, bailiffs, and sheriff or the community of the town. And that those attornies for rendering account, by virtue of those letters, be accepted there by the barons.

Also, provision is made in their charters confirmed by the king that the burgesses of the town and their successors, upon the election of their mayor in the town (except in time of war), shall present the mayor so elected to the constable of the castle of the town, who shall accept him. May it please the king to grant that, in cases where the constable then in office is absent at the time of the mayoral election or, despite being present, refuses to receive the mayor elected, then the newly elected mayor may take his oath before his predecessor in the mayoralty of the previous year, in the Gildhall in front of the community of the town; so that by that oath he may be excused [from acceptance by the constable] for the year.

Also that neither the burgesses nor their successors may be provoked, molested, or in any way troubled before the steward or clerk of the market of the household of the king or his heirs in relation to infringements of the assize or testing of wines, bread, ale, or other foodstuffs in the town or suburbs, or in regard to defective yardsticks, balances, weights or measures of any kind, or for any other kind of trespass or fault committed or to be committed within the town and suburbs beyond the pale, before the arrival of the steward marshall in these parts. But that the mayor and bailiffs of the town may by themselves have cognizance, testing, correction and punishment in all such instances of defaults.

Also that they may have the custody of the town prison and have infangthef and outfangthef, and pass judgements in such cases, and that all prisoners arrested within the town and held in the prison there, for whatever felonies committed within the town and suburbs, may be delivered within the same town, before the mayor, bailiffs, and coroners of the town, and nowhere else. And if anyone is caught in possession of stolen goods within the boundaries of the town and a charge is readily brought against such felons, that such prisoners may then be quickly delivered before the mayor, bailiffs, and coroners, as has been the practice in times past, and that they may put into effect the judgements passed on them.

Also that there be no officers or officials [empowered] within the town except those ordained by the mayor and bailiffs – the which officers and officials are to serve the mayor and bailiffs at their need, well and loyally performing the duties of their office. And that the mayor and bailiffs may have the power to remove such officers and officials when necessary and put other suitable men in their place, without obstruction from the king or his heirs.

Also, if there should be any problem with or defect in any of the customs held and enjoyed from time immemorial in the town and suburbs, or [one] newly arising therefrom, for which no solution has yet been legislated, that the mayor, bailiffs and their successors, with the approval with the most prominent townsmen, may have the power to legislate and put in place a suitable remedy in such cases, consonant with reason and good faith, and beneficial both to the community of the town and to others visiting the town. And that, to meet the needs and requirements of the town, the mayor, bailiffs and most prominent members of the community of the town, and their successors who are burgesses of that town, may by their common consent assess tallages among themselves – on their goods within the town and suburbs, as well as on their rents, on crafts, merchandize, or in any other way, as seems best to them – and raise those [taxes] without any hindrance from the king or his heirs, or their justices or any of their officials. And that the money raised from such tallages be kept in the safekeeping of two reputable townsmen elected by common agreement for that purpose; and that [the money] in their custody be expended for the necessities and requirements of the town when need arises. Those men shall account [for revenues and expenditures] before the mayor, bailiffs, and others elected for that purpose by the community.

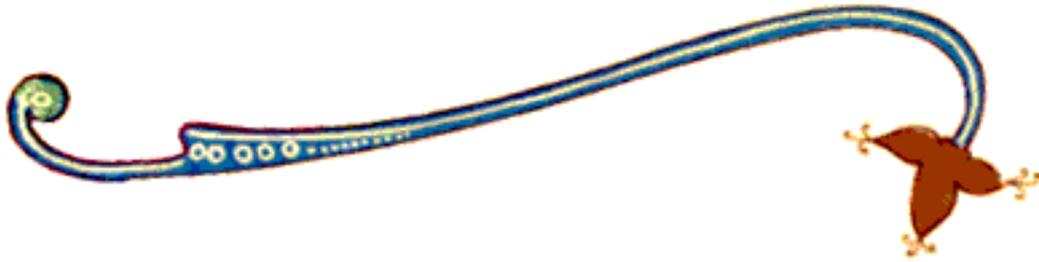

DISCUSSION

This document illustrates how the initiative for charters of liberties came from the burgesses who, by the fourteenth century, were virtually drafting the terms (doubtless with legal advice, as the language of the petition reflects) they wanted to see in a charter. This petition, itself of unknown date, resulted in the royal charter of 8 August 1373; although the petition was in French, the charter was in the more formal Latin of legal records.

Prior to the royal charter granted in response to this petition, Bristol was a town divided, geographically and administratively, by the River Avon. The parishes to the west and north of the river lay in Gloucestershire, while those south of the river were in Somerset. The charter of 1373 gave Bristol and its suburbs jurisdiction independent from those county authorities, making it a county in its own right.

The acquisition of county status was one of the few significant enhancements in status or jurisdiction that towns acquired after the early fourteenth century, by which time the general limits of their powers of self-government had obtained shape. County status was often associated with, or a prelude to, incorporation. London, always precocious, had long had the equivalent of county status. Bristol was the first of England's other major towns to achieve this. York, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Norwich and Lincoln took the same route during the decades that followed. County status was another step along the road to excluding external authorities from involvement in borough internal affairs.

Most of what was being sought by the Bristol authorities was the right to exercise certain jurisdictions internally, without the participation or intervention of external officials. Less evident as a motivation for the charter was the need to obtain royal approval for elements of the local constitution, in the context of discord between rulers and ruled; the powers of taxation, legislative reform, and (perhaps) appointment of sergeants, likely stemmed from this.

NOTES

"nisi prius"

A legal term, representing the first two words of a certain type of royal writ initiating a court proceeding; the words thus became associated with a particular kind of royal judicial commission which the writ authorized to operate locally, instead of cases being referred to the central courts at Westminster. Today the term is used to refer to almost any court of original jurisdiction (as opposed to an appeal court).

"escheators"

Officials responsible for investigating cases of escheat.

"either bench"

I.e. King's Bench or Common Bench.

"oyer and terminer"

A royal judicial commission given power to "hear and determine" cases locally.

"mort d'ancestor"

The assize of mort d'ancestor (established 1176) provided legal relief for an heir whose claim to a real estate inheritance faced a challenge; the assize aimed at determining whether the ancestor was in possession of the disputed property at the time of his death – if so, the heir's claim was validated until the challenger could take other legal measures to uphold his own rights.

"consented to by married women"

Regarding the wife's consent, see for example the Ipswich custumal.

"accept him"

Take his oath of allegiance to the king and confirm him in office.

"take his oath before his predecessor"

In course of time, this became the practice, of which an illustration survives from a century later.

"infangthef and outfangthef"

Infangthef was the right of a court to try thieves caught within the region of its jurisdiction, notably those caught red-handed (and, since the punishment was hanging, in effect the right to a gallows). Outfangthef, on the other hand, was the right to pursue thieves beyond the region of jurisdiction, and was a liberty accorded to few boroughs.

"delivered"

Turned over to judicial hearings.

"officers and officials"

The reference here is primarily to the town sergeants, in contrast to similar officers of external authorities.

TRANSLATION

[The document begins with a recital of the previous charter of liberties, 1414, and a confirmation of all privileges and powers already possessed by the borough.]

Furthermore ... we have granted and by this document have confirmed, on behalf of ourselves, our heirs and successors, to the present burgesses of the town of Nottingham (which is and has long been in a certain sense corporate) and to the heirs and successors of those burgesses, [who shall be] burgesses of the same town, in perpetuity, that the town may now and forever be corporate [in the behalf] of the mayor and burgesses. The mayor and burgesses and their successors, mayors and burgesses of the town thus incorporated, shall be a community forever corporate, in fact and in name, under the name of the Mayor and Burgesses of the town of Nottingham. They may have a perpetual succession. The mayor and burgesses of the town, and their successors, may have the ability and capability in law under that name to prosecute and defend any pleas, suits, complaints, and claims, as well as any kind of real, personal, or mixed actions, moved or to be moved by them or against them in any kind of court of ourself, our heirs or successors, or of any other at all, as well as before us, our heirs or successors, wherever we shall be, in our Chancery or before any justices or judges, spiritual or temporal. They may plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered to in the same. The mayor and burgesses of the town, and their successors, under that name may acquire and hold in for themselves and their successors, lands, tenements, possessions, and hereditaments, in perpetuity.

In addition ... we have granted, on behalf of ourselves and our heirs and successors, to the present burgesses of the town and their successors, [who shall be] burgesses of the same town, in perpetuity, that the town of Nottingham and its precincts as far as they extend and are enforced, which up to now have existed and were contained within Nottinghamshire, shall as of 15 September next become separate, distinct, and divided from that county, and in all regards be completely independent forever, both on land and on water, with the exception of our castle in Nottingham and our messuage called the King's Hall containing our gaol for Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire. The town of Nottingham and its precincts as far as they extend and are enforced (with the exceptions already made) shall be known as and treated as the County of the town of Nottingham.

The present burgesses of the town and their successors, [who shall be] burgesses of the same town, in perpetuity, may also have two sheriffs in the town and its precincts, elected from among their number, instead of the two bailiffs of the town, as well as the shrievalty of the town and its precincts [etc.]. These sheriffs are to be elected and made in the following way: viz., the mayor and burgesses of the town may on 15 September next elect from among themselves two burgesses of the town as sheriffs of that town and its precincts [etc.], in place of two bailiffs of the town. These sheriffs are to hold and occupy the office of the shrievalty of the town and its precincts [etc.] until Michaelmas next and during that day, until on that same day two other burgesses of the town are elected by the mayor and burgesses of the town as sheriffs of the town and its precincts [etc.] for the year to follow. From that time forward, the sheriffs of the town and its precincts [etc.] are to be elected and made every Michaelmas in perpetuity in the following way; viz., each year the mayor and burgesses who are of the town of Nottingham at that time shall elect from among themselves, in place of the two bailiffs of the town, two suitable persons as sheriffs of the town and its precincts [etc.], using the same procedure that they were accustomed to use in the past for [electing] the bailiffs. The burgesses elected in that way as sheriffs of the town and its precincts [etc.], immediately after having been elected, are to take oath before the town's mayor of that time to exercise properly and lawfully the office of sheriff of the county; they shall not go outside the town to take their oath. The names of which sheriffs are each year to be sent, under the seal of the mayoralty of the town of Nottingham, to the Chancery of ourself, our heirs and successors, within twelve days following the election.

Each burgess of the town of Nottingham hereafter elected as mayor, by right of the same and as soon as he shall be elected as mayor of the town, as well as the present mayor, shall from this time forward be the escheator of ourself, our heirs and successors, within the town and its precincts during the entire term in which the burgess remains in the mayoralty of the town. At no time in the future shall there in any way be, or be made, any other escheator or sheriff in the town of Nottingham and its precincts [etc.] except as are made (as already mentioned) from the burgesses of the town. The escheator and sheriffs of the town, and their successors in perpetuity, shall hold within the town and its precincts [etc.] the same power, jurisdiction, authority, privileges, and whatever else pertains to the offices of escheator and sheriff, that other escheators and sheriffs of ourself, our heirs and successors, have or shall have or ought to have anywhere else within our kingdom of England. Each and every writ, precept and mandate of the sort which before this time ought to have been, or was accustomed to be, in any way served or executed by the sheriffs of Nottinghamshire or by the bailiffs of the town, within that town or its precincts, is in the future – from 15 September onwards – to be directed, delivered, and handed over to the sheriffs of the town of Nottingham. From now on, in perpetuity, those who are at any point sheriffs of the town and its precincts are to hold their county [court] of the County of the town of Nottingham and its precincts [etc.] each Monday from month to month, in the same manner and form in which other of our sheriffs hold their county [courts] elsewhere within our kingdom, or as other sheriffs of ourself, our heirs and successors, shall hold or ought to hold their county [courts] elsewhere in our kingdom.

The present burgesses of the town and their successors in perpetuity may at their pleasure have a court there for all contracts, covenants, trespasses (whether committed against the peace or otherwise), and other things, causes, and matters whatsoever and however arising or coming about within the town and its precincts [etc.], to be held from day to day in the town Guildhall before the mayor of the town, or his deputy, and the sheriffs of the town then in office. From 15 September the mayor of the town then in office, or his deputy, and the sheriffs of the town then in office have the power and authority to hear and determine in that court all kinds of pleas, suits, causes, complaints, and claims, as well as any kind of real, personal, or mixed actions, moved or to be moved within the town and its liberty and precincts [etc.], whether in the presence of ourself, our heirs and successors, or in the absence of ourself, our heirs and successors; together with all revenues of that court which are in any way forthcoming or produced, from now into the future, to be paid to the use of the sheriffs of the town then in office, without any interference or hindrance whatever from ourself, our heirs or successors, our or their justices, Steward or Marshall of the Household, escheators, sheriffs, or other of our or their bailiffs or officers. The same Steward or Marshall shall, from now into the future, in no way intervene in the jurisdiction over pleas of contracts, covenants, trespasses, things, causes, or matters which arise or come about within the town or its liberty and precincts [etc.], nor may any them interfere in any other way.

The escheator and sheriffs of the town of Nottingham then in office may each year make their individual proffers and account before the Treasurer and Barons of the Exchequer of ourself, our heirs and successors, by attornies of the escheator and sheriffs of the town individually deputed or to be deputed for that purpose by letters patent under the seals of office of the same escheator and sheriffs of the town, regarding everything for which they are accountable relating to the offices of escheator and sheriffs of the town. Those attornies are to be allowed by the Treasurer and Barons to make the proffer and render account in the place of the escheator and sheriffs, according to the force and effect of these our letters, without the escheator or sheriffs of the town of Nottingham, or their successors, or any of them, being obliged or forced to come out of the town in person to account for anything within the responsibility of his office or the office of any of them ... Everyone who becomes escheator of the town of Nottingham, every year forever, shall immediately after his appointment take an oath in the town, and not elsewhere, before the coroners, or one of them, then being in office, to well and faithfully perform his duties. It is not to be required of the escheator of the town of Nottingham, or his successors, to come and give his oath at any place outside the town before anyone else; on condition that each year, within twelve days of the election of the mayor of the town, the name of the escheator is certified, under the seal of the mayoralty of the town of Nottingham, at the Exchequer

We have also granted ... to the present burgesses of the town of Nottingham and their successors in perpetuity the belongings of all persons condemned, convicted or in any other way attainted of any felony, murder, or other offence ... and of any other persons outlawed for any reason ... as well as goods disavowed by felons and deodands discovered and found within the town of Nottingham and its precincts [etc.]. The present burgesses of the town and their successors may also have in perpetuity all amerancements, redemptions, dues forfeited or to be forfeited, and all fines for trespasses and any other kinds of delinquencies, negligences, misprisions, and contempts; as well as fines for licences to concord ... and all revenues, fines, and amerancements from any kinds of pledges and manucaptors of any person living in the town of Nottingham

In addition, we have granted ... to the present burgesses of the town of Nottingham and their successors in perpetuity that the same burgesses, and their heirs and successors, may from time to time elect from among their number seven aldermen, of which aldermen one shall always be elected to the mayoralty of the town and shall be mayor of the town. These aldermen thus elected shall be and remain in the office of alderman of the town for life ... unless they, or any of them, by his special request made to the rest of the burgesses of the town who then are, or for some notable cause, is removed from his, or their, aldermanship by the mayor and the burgesses of the town at that time. [In the case] that an alderman is removed, or dies, or otherwise withdraws from his office of alderman, the mayor and burgesses of the town at that time, and their heirs and successors in perpetuity, have full power and authority under the terms of this document to elect another from their number as alderman of the town in place of the alderman who dies, or withdraws, or is removed The aldermen of the town then in office shall be justices of ourself, our heirs and successors, for keeping the peace within the town, its liberty and precincts [etc.], in perpetuity. Those seven aldermen, or six, five, four, or three of them – of whom it is our wish that the mayor of the town then in office be one – have full power and authority to inquire into, hear and determine felonies, murders, trespasses and misprisions of all kinds, as well as all kinds of other causes, complaints, contempts, and wrongdoings, and whatever other things pertain or may or ought to pertain in the future to any Justices of the Peace within our kingdom of England, to hear, inquire into, and determine, or in any way correct, within the town and its liberty and precincts [etc.] any matter that arises or comes about, and to correct and punish the same, as fully and completely as have or shall in the future have the Keepers of the Peace, the justices assigned (and to be assigned) to hear and determine felonies, trespasses and other wrongdoings, and the justices of servants, labourers and other craftsmen in Nottinghamshire or elsewhere within our kingdom of England, outside the town and its liberty.

... furthermore they may have in perpetuity all types of fines, forfeits, and amercements made or to be made, forfeited or to be forfeited, before any of the aldermen, mayor of the town, or the Keepers of the Peace ... to be levied and received by their own officers, for the assistance and support of the heavy costs borne daily by the town or occurring and arising in the town. The present burgesses of the town of Nottingham and their heirs and successors may also have in perpetuity all victuals forfeited within the town and its precincts according to the law of England; that is, bread, wine and ale, and any other victuals, other than those that are merchandize.

[The next clause explicitly excludes certain royal officers from exercising any judicial jurisdiction within the town].

... the aldermen of that town who are in office have the right to use gowns, headware and cloaks of a single style and livery, together with furs and linings suitable for those cloaks, in the same way and manner that they are used by the mayor and aldermen of our city of London, notwithstanding the Statute of Liveries of Clothing and Headware or any other statute or ordinance issued before this time.

[The final clauses reaffirm the obligation of the town's escheator and sheriffs to account in the Exchequer for all borough revenues due the king, and that the town shall continue to enjoy any past chartered privileges and powers not specifically mentioned in the present document.]

... Witnessed by the king at Winchester, 28 June [1449].

DISCUSSION

Charters of the period of borough incorporation – with a few exceptions, the fifteenth century – are much in contrast with the early (twelfth century) royal grants of liberties to towns, which were more concise and less weighed down by tediously repetitive legalese.

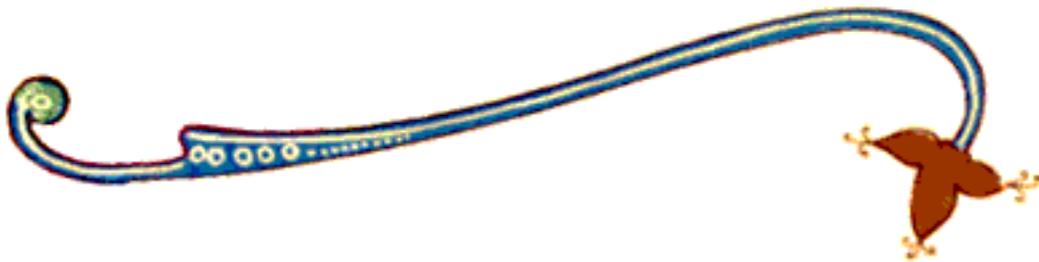

Incorporation provided the climax of urban efforts for governmental independence, not from the king or his authority, but from the authority of other of his officers not directly affiliated with the town – most notably the county sheriff. Consequently, the grant of incorporation often went hand-in-hand with the grant of county status for the borough and its suburban region; or at least one followed closely upon the other. This was the climax to the long effort towards independence from county authorities which had begun with Nottingham's acquisition of the fee farm in the late twelfth century.

Nottingham's charter of incorporation was fairly typical of those granted to other towns in the decades before and after it, and a logical continuation of the direction taken by royal charters to the borough in the fourteenth century. Henry IV's charter of 1399 had very much paved the way for the formal charter of incorporation, by granting cognisance of all pleas, rights to all fines and amercements from the borough courts, the power of justices of the peace and of labourers to the city executives, and prohibiting county justices from interfering in borough legal jurisdiction (except in cases of felony).

Furthermore, although royal recognition of the corporate character of a borough is traditionally characterized according to five key rights, these were probably of lesser significance to boroughs at the time of incorporation (since the boroughs had largely been exercising such rights for some time), than were the expanded powers given to the officers at the apex of borough government.

Consequently, the 1449 charter's original contributions to the development of Nottingham's constitution - and the same generalization may be made of other borough charters of incorporation of this period - were more in the realm of royal approval of the movement towards "closed corporations". In the case of Nottingham's charter this is represented principally by life tenancy of the powerful office of alderman; the aldermen were the more senior members of the town council. The charter is less typical in its specification of what was to be done in the event of dismissal or resignation of an alderman, but this concern may have been elevated at Nottingham due to its relatively small number of aldermen.

NOTES

"mayor"

Nottingham had a mayor and two bailiffs at the head of its government since 1284; previously the French and English halves of the borough had each had their own bailiff.

"as far as they extend"

The phrase "as far as they extend and are enforced (with the exceptions already made)" is repeated several times in this section of the charter; even though the formulaic character of this document is an important feature in its own right, I have removed the repetitions to make for easier reading.

"escheator"

The escheator was a royal officer whose duty was to uphold the king's ultimate title in lands over which lordship otherwise became vacant, through the failure of heirs or the loss of rights of the tenant due to conviction (or outlawry) for a crime.

"writ, precept and mandate"

These were written instruments by which the king communicated his wishes, instructions or commands, via his officers – who either acted upon them, or delivered them to others to act upon. They are all often referred to by the generic term "writ".

"goods disavowed"

This refers to any items of which an accused person was found in possession, but (to avoid being accused of their theft) disowned – even though they might actually have been his legitimate belongings.

"deodands"

In a legal context, these were the instruments of someone's death, which were forfeit to the crown when the death was ruled by misadventure (e.g. a horse that threw its rider).

"licences to concord"

A licence to concord concerned a real estate transaction effected through a fictitious suit; by pre-arrangement, one or both of the parties contributed to paying the "fine" due the king for a settlement of the suit.

"Keepers of the Peace"

These royal commissioners were originally local magnates assigned temporarily in each county to preserving order, apprehending criminals, and bringing them before the royal justices; in 1368, however, their power was extended to acting as judges in cases of felony and lesser crimes.

"justices of servants, labourers and other craftsmen"

The office of Justice of Labourers was established in 1351, because the Black Death, by carrying off much of the labour force, was enabling the remainder to demand higher wages. The Statute of Labourers aimed at enforcing maximum wages. It was renewed a few years after the Peasants' Revolt, and provisions were also made for examination of craft guilds, which it was feared provided a vehicle for organizing social subversion; in 1437 all guilds were required to register with Justices of the Peace or local authorities.

DISCUSSION

This list of expenditures was perhaps copied from a chamberlains roll not now extant, or (since the roll of February 1442 to February 1443 has survived but does not contain this information) from a separately compiled account specific to this business – probably one presented by Ridley and Girlyngton. Percy concluded, probably correctly, that the business was to obtain the royal charter of confirmation of April 1442. While the largest expenditure was the payment to the king, it was necessary to grease the bureaucratic wheels; the advice of lawyers accustomed to dealing with the central bureaucracy, and the fees or gifts to bureaucrats were all part of this. First the ear of the king had to be obtained. Once the terms of the charter were negotiated, the document to be taken to York had to be drawn up (in this case, basically the copying of earlier charters, with some additions), the king's seal had to be applied to the document validate it, and a copy had to be made on the charter rolls that remained at Westminster as a reference tool and a check against future fraud or forgery.

NOTES

"Thomas Ridley and William Girlyngton"

Both recent mayors, these men were the representatives of York at parliament; it made sense that they would be mandated to negotiate for a new charter while in London – in fact, they may have been selected for parliament because it was desired to send leading townsmen to obtain the charter.

"John Shirwod"

It was common at this period to employ the town clerk on this type of business since it required someone trustworthy and capable, with legal ability. John Shirwood is usually stated (without authority) as having been appointed to that post in February 1442, but I suspect he may have held it since 1437. He remained in the post almost continuously until 1470.

"Peter Erden"

Peter Erden, or Arden, was one of the lawyers retained annually by the city.

"Nicholas Girlyngton"

Girlyngton was one of the city lawyers from the mid-1450s into the 1460s. Likely a relative of William Girlyngton, at the time of the above document he may conceivably have been apprenticing in the law in London.

"James Hopwod"

Hopwood was perhaps a London-based lawyer.

"Cardinal of York"

York's archbishop, John Kempe, had been appointed a cardinal in 1439.

TRANSLATION

Juliana widow of Henry de Lungeville claims from Richard de la Porte one-third of a tenement, three shops, and six shillings and eightpence in rents, with appurtenances, in Northampton as dower right.

Richard comes. Upon which the mayor and and bailiffs of the town of Northampton appear by their attorney Richard Blount and state that those tenements which [\[are claimed by Juliana\]](#) are in the town of Northampton and that King Henry the great-grandfather of the present king granted by charter to the burgess of Northampton that none of them (other than moneyers and royal officers) need plead outside the walls of the borough of Northampton in any plea except those concerning tenements outside [\[the borough\]](#). And that the same King Henry granted and confirmed to his burgesses of Northampton by another charter that they might have infangthef, and none of them might be impleaded outside the walls of the borough of Northampton except in regard to external tenements, nor for any trespass committed within the borough unless the matter concerns the rights or person of the king; and that they could exercise the franchise of infangthef and certain other liberties specified in the latter charter whenever they wished, even if at other times they did not exercise them. This King Henry also granted to them that they and their heirs might have all the liberties previously granted them by the charters of himself and his predecessors, kings of England, insofar as that they had been reasonably exercised up to this time. Which two charters of King Henry, King Edward the grandfather of the present king by his charter (which they produce) granted and by reciting it confirmed. In addition he granted for himself and his heirs to his burgesses that they, their heirs and successors could elect every year at Michaelmas from among their own number a mayor and two bailiffs, presenting at the king's Exchequer within the week following that feastday the one whom they have thus elected as mayor, so that he may there take an oath to carry out faithfully those duties that belong to the office of mayor of the town; which mayor and bailiffs should hold and administer all pleas related to the liberty of the town, just as the town bailiffs were accustomed to do in times past. On these grounds, by virtue of the charters of King Henry and their confirmation by King Edward, they seek cognizance of this plea before themselves within the walls of the town.

Richard de Aldeburgh, who sues for the king, says that this plea ought not to be transferred to their court within the town. Because, he says, they claim cognizance of this plea before themselves by the charters of King Henry and the confirmation of King Edward. Granted that in the first charter of King Henry it specifies that none of them need plead outside the walls of the borough in any plea except those concerning tenements outside etc., and similarly in the second charter of the same king it specifies that none of them might be impleaded outside the walls of the borough except in regard to external tenements, nor for any trespass committed in the borough unless the matter concerns the rights or person of the king; and granted that in the charter of confirmation of King Edward it specifies that the mayor and bailiffs may hold and administer all pleas related to the liberty of the town, just as the town bailiffs were accustomed to do in times past. Yet nowhere in those charters or the confirmation do we find it granted that they have cognizance of this kind of plea [i.e. dower] before themselves within the walls of the town. He further says that in the last eyre here both common pleas and pleas of the crown were dealt with by the justices in eyre and also, since that time, pleas of assizes have been dealt with before the justices appointed for that, and not before the mayor and bailiffs. Therefore he requests judgement be given for the king.

The date of 27 November is assigned for the parties and for the mayor, bailiffs and community to return here.

On which day the parties and the mayor and bailiffs come in person. On behalf of themselves and the community they disavow the claim made by their attorney for having cognizance of the plea before the mayor and bailiffs; they request that the justices come to the town's Guildhall and there take cognizance of pleas of this kind and do justice to the parties. But because it is determined by the justices from inspection of the roll of attorneys admitted here in the eyre that the mayor, bailiffs and community of the town appointed Richard Blount to claim, prosecute and defend their franchises on their behalf, they cannot now change the claim made by their attorney. And since it is not found from inspection of the aforesaid charters and confirmation that they have been granted cognizance of pleas of this kind, whilst similar inspection of the rolls of the [\[previous\]](#) justices in eyre shows that the same sort of plea was dealt with by those justices in eyre – and not before the mayor and bailiffs – it is decided that the case in question shall remain here and that the franchise of cognizance of pleas of this kind is to be seized into the king's hand.

The sheriff was ordered to summon all who had been coroners in this county since the last eyre up to the present, if they were still living – or, if they had died, their heirs or executors, or the tenants of their lands and tenements – in order to hand over their rolls and provide answers to those matters related to the office of coroner. With regard to those who had been coroners of the town of Northampton, the sheriff reported back that he had passed along the writ [\[of summons\]](#) to the bailiffs of the liberty of the town of Northampton, who responded that Isabelle the wife of John de Hemyngton and the heir of William de Stormesworth, who was recently coroner, and John son of Henry son of Robert Sauce, the heir of Robert the other coroner, have nothing in the way of inherited [possessions] by which they can be summoned [i.e. obliged to come], nor are any others the tenants of their lands. Consequently the sheriff is ordered to have the mayor, community and town bailiffs appear, in order to answer etc.

Subsequently, the mayor, community and bailiffs came. Being asked how coroners are selected in the town of Northampton, they say that among other franchises which King Henry great-grandfather of the present king granted to them, and which King Edward grandfather of the present king confirmed, by the charter and confirmation which they produce in evidence, it was granted to them that they might elect from among their own number four coroners to perform within the town those duties belonging to the coroner's office. They go on to say that in that way they have been accustomed to elect coroners in the town since the time of the grant and confirmation.

Richard de Aldeburgh, who sues for the king, says that since the mayor, bailiffs and community acknowledge that they elect the coroners in the way indicated, and since the court has determined from the response made by those bailiffs to the sheriff that the heirs of William de Stormesworth and Robert Sauce have nothing by way of inheritance from William or Robert the coroners elected by the mayor and community, nor are there other executors or tenants of their lands and tenements who can or ought to answer for those coroners, it is thereby evident enough that those coroners were insufficiently qualified. He requests on behalf of the king that the mayor and community be held responsible for them and, through their [i.e. the coroners'] default, be answerable to the king both for the coroners' rolls and for other circumstances relevant to the performance of the coroner's office.

The mayor, community, and bailiffs say that although one coroner might suffice for the town, because many of the townsmen are merchants and frequently travel abroad to distant lands to conduct their commercial affairs, it has therefore been their custom to elect four coroners, so that those coroners who have stayed at home can take responsibility for all the duties of the coroner in the absence of the others and make record of the same in their rolls. When the absent coroners return home, they have copied onto their rolls, from the rolls of the coroners who remained at home, all the pleas of the crown that arose during their absence, so that everything that is entered in the rolls of one coroner appears in all their rolls. They say that during the term of office of William de Stormesworth and Robert Sauce there were two other coroners, Robert de Bedeford and John le Waydour, whose rolls have been turned over to this court by the hands of the mayor and bailiffs, along with the other coroners' rolls from the time of the last eyre up to the present. They say, at their peril, that in those [rolls] are contained everything touching [the rights and jurisdiction of] the crown that occurred within the town since the last eyre; so complete are they that nothing is missing from them which is required for the sessions of the pleas of the crown to proceed.

Richard de Aldeburgh makes the further request for the king that the rolls be inspected and examined. As a result of this inspection and examination, it is found that on 30 April 1311 Walter de Longestaunton of Cambridgeshire, arrested on suspicion of theft of some wax, appeared in full session of the court of the town of Northampton and confessed to having broken into the church of Goldington next Bedford by night and having stolen from it candles and wax worth 2s. He was consequently hanged.

Also, on 14 June 1294 Simon son of Bella le Mire of Manby and William fitz Simon of Manby were arrested in the town of Northampton at the suit of Thomas de Hulton, for the death of John Chapeleyn servant of Master William of Manby in Lindsey; they appeared in full session in Northampton on the same day and admitted to having killed John on Master William's manor at Manby in Lindsey on 2 June of that year and of plundering [from the corpse] forty shillings, six silver brooches, a coat of burel, and a tunic of perse. He was consequently hanged.

Also, on 13 September of the same year Reginald fitz Robert of Wyewell in Herefordshire, arrested at the suit of John le Caretere of Kislingbury (his pledges: Peter de Eston and Robert de Maneby of Kislingbury) in possession of a blue cloth overcoat, a russet tunic, a hood, and a pair of russet shoes, appeared in full session in Northampton and admitted to having broken into the house of John le Caretere in Kislingbury and stolen from it a blue overcoat and the other items mentioned on 2 September of that year. He was consequently hanged.

Also, on 8 November of the same year Henry fitz Nigel of Little Doddington in Northamptonshire, arrested in possession of a ploughshare and two coulters, appeared in full session and, asked how he came into possession of the ploughshare and coulter, said that he had stolen them from Northamptonshire fields between the town of Northampton and Abington. He was consequently hanged.

Also, on 18 April 1295 Ralph Sale of Hardwick, arrested at the suit of William Scarlet bailiff of Warwick, appeared in full session and admitted that he was a thief and had broken out of Warwick gaol and escaped prior to 30 November 1294. He was consequently hanged.

Richard de Aldeburgh, for the king, requests judgement on the grounds that they who were elected by the community [i.e. the mayor and bailiffs], in derogation of the privileges of the king and his crown, took upon themselves by their own presumption, under colour of the franchise of infangthef granted them by the present king's predecessors, jurisdiction over the life and limb of so many loyal subjects of the king. He requests that their franchise of infangthef, along with all their other franchises, be forfeited by seizure into the king's hand.

The mayor, bailiffs and community – questioned on this matter as to why they presumed to pass judgement on the aforesaid Walter, Simon son of Bella, William fitz Simon, Reginald, Henry, and Ralph in their court within the town of Northampton and condemn them to be hanged, thereby usurping from king and crown royal power in such matters – cannot deny what has been stated, nor that they had passed judgement on Walter and the others without any warrant and against the law and custom of the kingdom, as is more fully described in the rolls of the coroners whom they elected and which they by their own hands and at their own peril turned over to the court (as already mentioned). Yet, they say, despite the fact that they or some of them have wrongly and negligently applied the franchise of infangthef, that does not make it right to deprive them of the other franchises granted them by charter, whose application they have not infringed, and they request that they might keep their other franchises.

Upon which the community, mayor and bailiffs are asked who presides over pleas of the crown in their court of the town of Northampton. They say it is mayor, coroners, and bailiffs.

Because the mayor, community, and bailiffs, under colour of the franchise of infangthef, have condemned to be executed within the town so many loyal subjects of the king, for felonies committed outside their jurisdiction, in derogation of the king's crown and his royal privileges, it is decided that the franchise of infangthef along with the offices of mayor, bailiffs, and coroners of the town are to be taken into the king's hand. But it is impossible for the town and its other franchises to be administered, for the common good of the people gathering there, without capable administrators, unless officers are appointed to serve in the offices in that town. Therefore after consideration by the court, it is ordered that a keeper of the town of Northampton now be appointed. And the king commanded the justices there to admit Robert de Arderne as keeper of the town And John Waydour and William de Tekne were assigned to the office of coroner, and Pentecost de Morton and John Caudroun as bailiffs. All of whom having taken oath before the justices to execute their duties faithfully, the offices were committed to them.

DISCUSSION

What the king could give, the king could take away. Many towns experienced periods during which their chartered liberties were suspended – sometimes for serious offences, sometimes for provocations that appear slight. (For an example, see "Hanging without due process".)

Eyres had a mandate to investigate local government and its exercise of powers delegated by the king. The aggressive (one is almost tempted to say bloody-minded) efforts of the king's justices and lawyers of the Northamptonshire eyre to carry out their mandate presented a peril to local government in Northampton. The king's officials seem to have been bound and determined to seize local government powers into the king's hand.

At this period the eyre was on its last legs as a mechanism for maintaining law and order. The last eyre in Northamptonshire had taken place in 1285. Edward I had suspended the use of eyres in 1294, partly (or ostensibly) because of their unpopularity, but also because he was turning his attentions to war with France and Scotland, which would absorb him for the next decade. That period saw a serious decline in rule by law; one contributor being Edward's preparedness to pardon felons in return for military service, a policy continued by Edward II. The latter's reign added domestic strife that further increased lawlessness. Other judicial mechanisms – commissions of trailbaston and appointments of special keepers of the peace – had little effect. Edward II tried to revive the eyre, but his motives were suspect. After his overthrow, parliament (1328) complained of widespread crime, subversion of the law, and oppressive and extortionate actions of officials.

Those acting in the name of Edward III decided to give the eyre another try. The commissions to visit Northamptonshire and a few other counties were considered an experiment which, if successful, would be a prelude to a nationwide itineration. The justices were given broad powers of investigation allowing them to conduct a thorough review of local administration, and thereby (it was hoped) re-establish public order and good government. The eyre session held in Northampton lasted from November 1329 to June 1330. The idea of a nationwide effort was subsequently abandoned, however. Eyres were still unpopular, not least with local authorities, whose administrations were disrupted. Local communities did not like them either: commerce suffered disruption as some market activities were suspended; justices, lawyers, the various juries of localities, and the representatives of each locality, all had to be boarded without remuneration to the hosts; and communities were subject to multiple fines as well as having to hire lawyers and attempt to win the favour of court officials through "gifts". In 1334 Kent paid 1000 marks (£666.13s.4d) to escape having an eyre. The attempt to hold an eyre in London in 1341 led to riots and the eyre had to be suspended after two weeks.

The official account of the attention given by the 1329 eyre to the borough of Northampton clearly indicates why local authorities must have dreaded such an event. As usual, the official record itself is somewhat dry. But by this time in the history of the eyre, the development of the legal profession had resulted in law reporters attending eyres, to take notes on the conduct of cases and precedents that might serve to instruct law students. The revival of the eyre, in a location reasonably accessible to their Westminster base, attracted several reporters to Northampton, and almost two dozen versions of their reports of the eyre have survived. They give us a closer look at the legal arguments behind the official record of proceedings, although each report varies somewhat from the others in summarizing and interpreting the arguments.

The borough authorities' interventional challenge over cognizance of dower claims provided the first opportunity for the eyre to put Northampton's franchises under scrutiny. It was in retrospect foolish of the town authorities to try to have the dower case transferred, particularly given that eyres usually dealt with common pleas involving disputes over real estate. However, the town was used to making this kind of claim in other royal courts and having it allowed. Or perhaps, since Henry III's charter allowed Northampton to model its liberties on those of London, the Northampton authorities were hoping to exclude the eyre from common pleas entirely, as was the case in London.

If so, it was a futile hope. The eyre officials were determined to resist any efforts to obstruct their authority and mandate. In particular the justices had in mind their Quo Warranto mandate, requiring them (they maintained) not merely to accept at face value a claim of jurisdiction, but to investigate the validity of that claim and whether the jurisdiction had been exceeded or misapplied. This rendered ineffective the borough's attempt to support its claim of jurisdiction over dower by presenting precedents where the king's justices of King's Bench and Common Pleas had allowed the borough's cognizance. From the perspective of the eyre officials, the issue in hand was not merely the dower case itself but the town's claim of jurisdiction in such cases. The crown officials backed the town lawyers into a corner, forcing the town authorities to modify their position. The latter recognized that the justices were determined to try the case so, instead of insisting on their own jurisdiction, they tried simply to protect the charter franchise allowing such cases to be tried only within the town (which would have restored jurisdiction to the borough officials after the departure of the justices). But it was too late for backtracking. The court was on its way to removing the borough's judicial jurisdiction.

There followed hard on a challenge over the coroners' records – an issue which had been a source of argument during the preliminaries to the eyre, when the justices had repeatedly warned the borough authorities to produce the coroners' rolls. They had already, at that stage, threatened that fraudulent withholding of records could result in permanent confiscation of the borough franchises, whereas admitting to loss of records due to negligence would result only in temporary forfeiture. Producing the records of past officers posed problems for Northampton's authorities, as it did in other towns. Archival practices at this period were undeveloped in most towns; the perception of corporate records, in this period prior to formal incorporation (despite the justices' opinion that the community was corporately answerable for the records of its officers), was applied mainly to the most important documents – such as royal charters – and the rolls compiled during the term of office of specific officials might or might not find their way into a communal archive.

There was nothing unreasonable in the justices' expectation that all the rolls of every one of Northampton's coroners should be presented for review. This was, after all, part of the rationale for compiling those records. If the claim of the borough was true that all cases investigated by the coroners were copied onto each coroner's roll, then its defence that the eyre did not need a full set of rolls was valid. But the court could not know this to be the case without examining all the rolls.

In the end, however, it was the matter of jurisdiction in cases of infangthef that provided the means for bringing the town under the thumb of the eyre. Examination of the coroners' rolls turned up several cases in which town authorities had abused infangthef by hanging felons whose crimes had been committed outside their area of authority. The borough's attempt to limit forfeiture to the abused franchise was defeated – indeed, one cannot help suspect that the wholesale seizure of local government powers was a goal from the beginning. By seizing the borough offices into the king's hand as well – not just because of infangthef but also because of the earlier dispute over claim of cognizance of pleas of land before the town court (both matters reaching judgement point, it appears, on 27 November) – the justices created the pretext for turning local government over to a royal custodian. Chief Justice Scrope then dismissed the mayor. He had the bailiffs turn in their rods of office, but then reappointed them under the custodianship. As for the coroners, he informed them only two would be needed, and dismissed the surplus pair. Four days a mandate was obtained from the king appointing Sir Robert de Arderne, who had recently served as a justice of pleas of the Forest, to the position of keeper. This strategy must have ensured the eyre could proceed without any further obstructionism from the town.

Some at least of the legal reporters saw in this a precedent, establishing that any exercise of a franchise that exceeds its scope, so that people suffered as if from an oppression, must result not only in the forfeiture of the franchise but the attachment of the officers administering the franchise, and furthermore the confiscation of all of the franchises within the jurisdiction of such officers, until they could make fine with the king for restoration.

Not until August 1330, a few weeks after the eyre had finished its work, did the king allow the townsmen to regain the liberties of local government, by paying a fine of £20.

NOTES

"state"

Blount himself was not permitted to present legal arguments before the justices; other, recognized "pleaders" acted in that capacity on the town's behalf.

"charter"

The charter of Henry III referred to is that of 1227 which, with regard to external pleading, simply reiterates the charter of 1189. The second charter referred to is that of 1257, while that of Edward I was granted in 1299; the latter, being the latest and therefore fullest grant of privileges, powers and exemptions, also served as the workhorse, in terms of it being presented before justices when need be. The borough authorities seem to have gone well beyond what was necessary for claiming jurisdiction over the case of dower at hand, perhaps because in an earlier case of dower they had made the same claim of cognizance, by referring only to the charter clause referring to no pleading outside the town, and had run into problems with the court as a result. However, judging from one reporter's account, the borough authorities may have initially made their claim in this case exclusively on the basis of the same clause, but after this became the subject of legal arguments there was examination of other clauses in the charters. Just possibly there was something sinister behind that more extensive citation from the charters; it may have been an initiative of the court itself – for it was the claim of the franchise of infangthef, not related to the Lungeville vs. Porte case, that subsequently proved the lever by which the court could disempower local government; the law reporters seem to have perceived a connection between the two attacks on Northampton's liberties.

"infangthef"

The right of a court to try thieves caught within the region of its jurisdiction, notably those caught red-handed (and, since the punishment was hanging, in effect the right to a gallows).

"Richard de Aldeburgh"

The king's sergeant in the eyre, with special responsibility for prosecuting pleas of Quo Warranto and other civil pleas in which the king's interests were involved.

"cognizance of this kind of plea"

According to the reporters, Aldeburgh's initial line of attack was that Edward I had granted the mayor and bailiffs cognizance over pleas related to the franchises of the borough, but that dower was not a plea related to a franchise but a plea related to real estate; therefore, he argued, the borough's past cognizance of such cases was a usurpation of royal prerogative and that jurisdiction should be seized into the king's hand. This would appear a fragile argument – perhaps not to the legalistic minds of that time! – since dower cases were clearly pleas related to real estate (Bracton had certainly classified it thus), and besides royal charters clearly indicated that real estate pleas be tried within the town. Argument therefore turned to an attack on the undetailed terminology of early royal charters (later ones becoming more legalistic in tone), in particular the question of whether the jurisdictional rights claimed by the borough had been held from time immemorial or from the time of a specific grant. The crown lawyers, with agreement from the chief justice, argued that Edward I's grant that mayor and bailiffs have the same jurisdiction held by the previous bailiffs implied a "time immemorial" basis for the jurisdiction, since it did not specify the point when ballival jurisdiction commenced; but that the town's lawyers were making their claim for cognizance on the basis of a specific grant (Henry III's charters) – i.e. time within mind. The change in form of government between the time of Henry III and Edward I, from a mayoral to ballival executive, presented further openings for attack.

"disavow the claim"

According to the law reports, this was not the immediate strategy. Aldeburgh opened with the argument that although Henry III's charter permitted pleas of land be held within the town, it did not specify that they be held by the mayor and bailiffs (Aldeburgh was evidently sticking to his differentiation between pleas of land and pleas of franchises). At this point the mayor, speaking through one of the pleaders representing the town, stated that it had been in claiming the cognizance of pleas of land within the town, it had been the intent of borough authorities that such pleas be heard by the king's justices; if the town attorney had given the impression that the pleas were to be heard by mayor and bailiffs, then he had misrepresented the town's intent. Chief Justice Scrope's retort was that the borough authorities could not make the second claim because it was contrary to the first, which was now a matter of record; but by making the second they had admitted that the first claim was untenable. This left the borough without a leg to stand on.

"passed along the writ"

It was one of the franchises of the borough that they had "return of writs", i.e. the sheriff could not intrude on the jurisdiction of the town authorities but had to forward to them any commands placed upon him by royal writ, with the authorities then taking responsibility for fulfillment and reporting to the sheriff accordingly.

"insufficiently qualified"

It was coming to be expected, explicitly (and was possibly implicit at an earlier period), that persons chosen to the higher urban offices be men of sufficient substance that their possessions would provide compensation for any fines they incurred as a result of malfeasance; lesser officers were instead expected to find guarantors who themselves might have to provide compensation.

"at their peril"

I.e. they are prepared to stand to judgement on this matter.

"burel"

A coarse woollen cloth, typically worn by servants or peasants, while perse was a cloth of dark greyish-blue colour.

"Kislingbury"

The village is in Northamptonshire, a little southwest of Northampton.

"coulters"

A coultter is the smaller blade that cuts the ground ahead of the ploughshare.

"Chief Justice Scrope"

Geoffrey Scrope had a distinguished career in the royal judicial service. He was the king's chief legal representative (i.e. prosecutor) in the London eyre of 1321 and, as a perceived agent of the Despencers, Londoners sought his blood during the October 1326 rebellion against Edward II. Under the Despenser government he was promoted to Justice of the Common Bench (1323) and then to Chief Justice of the King's Bench (1324-38). Despite his associations with the Despencers and Edward II, he was able to retain office under the regency of Isabella and Mortimer, and again after Edward III seized the reins of power; he was simply an able and loyal servant of the crown. Possibly he may have been one of the planners of the revival of the eyre in 1329, although this is debated.

TRANSLATION

These are the laws and customs which the burgesses of Newcastle upon Tyne had in the time of Henry, king of England, and ought to have. Burgesses may distrain upon outsiders in the marketplace or outside it, in their houses or outside them, and within the borough and outside it, without the permission of the reeve, unless the county court is in session in the borough or [the outsiders] are [serving] in the army or castle-guard. A burgess may not make distraint on another burgess without permission from the reeve. If a burgess makes in the borough a loan of anything of his to outsiders, the debtor shall return it to him if he acknowledges [the debt]; if he denies [the debt] he should answer to justice in the borough. Pleas which are initiated in the borough should be tried and brought to conclusion there, except those which belong to the crown. If any burgess is accused in a suit, he shall not plead outside the borough unless the court fails [to do justice]. Nor, except in matters involving the crown, should he defend without day and term [being assigned] unless first he falls into error in his pleading. If a ship comes to harbour at Tynemouth, then wishes to depart, the burgesses may [first] buy whatever they wish [of its cargo]. If a plea arises between a burgess and a [travelling] merchant, it is to be brought to conclusion before the third ebb-tide. Merchandize of whatever kind brought by sea ought to be put ashore, except for salt, while herring should be sold in the ship. If anyone holds land in burgage for a year and a day, lawfully and without claim [against it], he is [thereafter] not answerable to any claimant, except one who has been out of the kingdom or who was a child not old enough to bring legal action. If a burgess has a son [living] with him, the son shall share in the liberty of his father. If a villein comes to reside in the borough and lives there for a year and a day as if a burgess, he may stay in the borough forever, unless he or his lord had previously announced that he would reside only for a set term. If anyone accuses a burgess of anything, he cannot [prosecute by] combat with the burgess, but the burgess may defend himself by his law, unless [the accusation] is of treason whereby he is obliged to defend himself by battle. Nor can a burgess do combat against an outsider, unless he first quits the burgage. No merchant, unless a burgess, can inside [or outside] the town buy wool, leather, or other merchandize from anyone except burgesses. If a burgess commits a wrong, he shall give 6 ounces [of silver] to the reeve. There is no merchet, heriot, blodwit, nor stengesdint in the borough. Any burgess may have his own oven and hand-mill if he wishes, saving the rights of the king's oven. If a woman commits a wrong concerning bread or ale, no one should interfere except the reeve. If she commits the wrong twice, let her penalty be chastisement. If she commits wrong a third time, she is to be brought to justice. No-one except a burgess may buy cloth for the purpose of dyeing, nor make or cut [cloth]. A burgess may give or sell his land, unless [his right to] it is challenged, and go freely and peacefully wherever he wishes.

DISCUSSION

As its name indicates, Newcastle began as a settlement servicing the Norman castle build to guard a crossing of the Tyne. Within a century it had its own distinctive society and economy, as revealed in the list of customs above. Three different versions of the customal are known. That which Johnson believed the oldest is very similar to the customs of a group of Scottish boroughs – Newcastle at times (including the second quarter of the 12th century) having been under Scottish rule. The other versions were copied into the Percy Chartulary (pub. Selden Society, v.117, p.333) and a charter granted ca. 1180s to the borough of Wearmouth (Co. Durham), by its lord the bishop of Durham. The early charters of English kings granted to Newcastle, by John and Henry III, confirmed existing customs of the town from the time of Henry II. It is presumably the above customs that were meant, although the reference in the opening sentence to King Henry is more likely to Henry I.

The Newcastle-upon-Tyne customal provides an early specification of the laws referred to only generally in charters. Few documents so well illustrate the interrelationship between charters of liberties and customals. So much does this document resemble a charter's recitation of privileges granted, as opposed to an itemized or capitularized customal, that Ballard adopted it as such in his comparative study of the earliest group of charters of liberties. The existence of this early customal, which survives in several versions, has led to Newcastle's development as a borough being described as "precocious" (Edward Miller, "Rulers of Thirteenth Century Towns: The Cases of York and Newcastle upon Tyne," Thirteenth Century England I: Proceedings of the Newcastle Upon Tyne Conference 1985, Woodbridge: Boydell Press, 1986, 129). Although tempore Henry II the Newcastle customs did serve as a model for those granted to lesser towns in the north-east (Gateshead, Hartlepool, and Wearmouth), the seeming precocity may be an illusion consequent to the scarcity of written evidence of early borough customs. It is worth comparing these customs with those of the burgesses of Bury St. Edmunds, from a similar period.

NOTES

"had in the time of Henry"

The Percy version states that the laws were granted by Henry I to the burgesses, but this may be a scribal assumption.

"distrain upon outsiders"

The principle regarding distrain was that burgesses had to capitalize on almost any opportunity to compel outsiders – who were not usually accessible – to answer to legal actions brought against them. Whereas, the burgess' person and property were always on hand, and therefore distraint against them should go through due process. The Percy version identifies the outsiders more explicitly as country-dwellers, and clarifies that they may not be distrained if they have come to the borough to attend the county court. The Wearmouth allows as exemption from distraint only that the outsiders have come to town on business of the bishop, but this is evidently an adaptation of the original to Wearmouth circumstances (it being clear from other evidence that the laws had been edited with that in mind).

"a loan of anything of his to outsiders"

To the clause concerning loans to outsiders, the Wearmouth version adds the proviso that "burgesses not use this privilege to vex villeins unjustly" – reflecting what was later a growing tendency to use litigation as a pressure tactic – but again this may be a Wearmouth adaptation.

"error in his pleading"

This refers to miskinning.

"buy whatever they wish"

It was not uncommon for towns to claim a pre-emptive right over cargoes of ships which moored, however temporarily, within their boundaries. The Percy version incorporates a scribal error in adding "not" to "wishes to depart" and it is this version which found its way into Ballard's compilation. The Wearmouth version substitutes Wearmouth for Tynemouth.

"travelling"

This qualifier before merchant is made explicit in the other versions.

"sold in the ship"

The Wearmouth version gave the option for herring to be brought ashore to be sold in town.

"the son shall share"

Concerning the son's right to share in the burgess privileges of his father, the Percy and Wearmouth versions more explicitly state that this is while the son still lives under the same roof: "while in his house, at his table".

"villein comes to reside"

The alternate versions are rephrased to clarify the contrast between an (escaped?) villein who remains a year and a day without challenge by any lord, and a villein whose lord has given him licence to reside in town temporarily (e.g. in order to trade on behalf of his lord).

"quits the burgage"

This seems to imply that a man had first to give up his burgess status before he was allowed to choose judicial combat as a defence. The other versions extend the exceptions to include any serious felony (i.e. presumably punishable by death), while the Wearmouth version specifies the preferred defence of a burgess as compurgation by 36 supporters.

"or outside"

The version of the laws found in the Scottish boroughs includes "outside the town" among the prohibited locations, and the PRO version appears from the wording to have accidentally omitted this. The Percy version specifies the locations as "neither in the marketplace nor in the countryside"; presumably the immediate countryside within the jurisdictional boundaries of the borough were intended, since it is hard to see how a borough could control the actions of a merchant outside its jurisdiction.

"6 ounces of silver"

According to Johnson, this was worth 10s. Judging from the equivalent, more explicit clause used by the Scottish boroughs, it relates to a ceiling on the amount the borough court could fine a burgess.

"merchet, heriot, blodwit, nor stengesdint"

Merchet was a fee for a lord's permission for his villein's daughter to marry, and heriot a death duty payable to the lord of a deceased villein. Towns were anxious to be free of dues or services associated with agricultural communities. Blodwit was a fine for an assault drawing blood. Stengesdint was a fine for striking with a stick (i.e. causing injury without drawing blood).

"oven and hand-mill"

The point about personal ovens and hand-mills was that there were typically communal facilities for baking and, especially, milling that burgesses were expected to use (since the revenues therefrom went towards paying the borough farm). The Percy version omits the proviso about the king's rights, while the Wearmouth version substitutes the rights of the bishop.

"wrong concerning bread or ale"

This related to breaking the assizes of bread and ale, first set down in writing in the time of Henry II. The Newcastle customs indicate that a first offence met with a warning, a second offence with a stern, public warning, but on the third the offender would be brought before the court for punishment. Women were much involved in selling the products of their baking and brewing; the Percy and Wearmouth versions, however, do not specify a sex of the offenders, and they seem to leave it to the discretion of the reeve as to whether a small fine was required for the first and second offence.

"justice"

A later version adds that the punishment due the offender will be decided by communal decision of the burgesses.

"cut"

Probably meaning cut a cloth into smaller pieces in order to retail it.

"give or sell his land"

The Wearmouth version is more explicit in stating that the right to dispose of real estate was a freedom from requiring any licence from a lord or from obtaining the advance agreement of one's heirs. In contrast to the latter freedom, at Nottingham heirs were permitted to redeem property sold by a relative, even against the purchaser's will, so long as they promised in the gildhall to pay the purchaser, within a year and a day, the price he had given for the property; compensation for improvements to or deterioration of the property since its sale might also be negotiated.

TRANSLATION

Anselm, by the grace of God Abbot of St. Edmund's, to all his barons and men, French and English, and all their successors, greetings. This is to notify you that the following are the customs which the burgesses of St. Edmund's have proven before me in my court that they held in the time of King Edward, in the time of King William and his sons William and Henry, and in the time of my predecessors – that is, Abbot Baldwin and other abbots – and which I have granted and confirmed to them with the permission of the entire convent of St. Edmund's.

Accordingly, their custom is to provide annually 8 men for the 4 night-watches to guard the town, and on the feast of St. Edmund [20 November] 16 men for the 4 gates – that is two men during the day and the same number overnight – and similarly during the 12 days of Christmas. They are also to provide 4 gatekeepers annually for the 4 gates. The fifth gate, however, (that is, the east gate) is under direct control of the abbot. But if construction is to take place on the gates, the sacrist is to provide the materials and the burgesses are to work them.

When the ditch surrounding the town needs to be repaired, if the abbey's knights and free sokemen work on it, then the burgesses will work on it just like the knights or sokemen; for that task is not more the responsibility of the burgesses than the knights.

Whoever holds tenements in the town of St. Edmund as burgage land is to pay the reeve each year for each tenement a halfpenny at [each of] the two terms: Whitsun and Martinmas.

Furthermore, they are not obliged to go outside the town of St. Edmund, not to the hundred court or the county court, nor to any plea that is brought before a court, other than to their portmanmoot.

If any burgess holds land in the town of St. Edmund by inheritance, or if he has bought it or acquired it legally in the town or in the marketplace, and he has possession of it for a year and a day without challenge, and is able to prove that by the testimony of burgesses, afterwards he need not answer to anyone who makes a claim against the property.

But if need forces him to it, he may sell that land to whomever he wishes within the fief of St. Edmund's without requiring any permission from the reeve, his [own] wife, his sons, or the rest of his relatives, so long as he has no son or close relative who wishes and is able to pay him the same price as anyone else for it.

If someone lends his money to anyone, whether inside or outside town, and is not able to get it back on the due date, and this [loan] has been acknowledged in the town, he may apply distrain in order to have it. But if he has a pledge for [repayment of] the same and holds on to it for an entire year and a day, and the debtor denies the debt or is unwilling to repay, and this is proven, he may in the presence of reliable witnesses sell the pledge for whatever he can, and from that amount take the money due him. But if it is more [than he is owed], he shall hand over [the balance] to the debtor. If on the other hand he is unable to obtain all his money from the sale, he may again apply distrain for the shortfall.

If someone acquires land in the town that is customarily held by burgage, regardless of who he may be, he is to make the customary payments due by tradition from that land.

These are the witnesses: Prior Talbot, Sired, Ednoth, Ording, Gorelm, Hervey the sacrist, Adam the steward, Wulward the clerk, Gilbert son of Fulcer, William son of Ailbold, Ralph de Lodnes, Gilbert de Lodnes, Richard de Lodnes, Roger de Gersing, Ralph de Bukeham, Hugh de Kersing, Robert de Haltsted, Ailbric de Capeles, Ailmer de Hwatefelde, Leomer de Berningeham, Berard his nephew, Brian, Oswald, William son of Peter, Romald Leo, Ralph the constable, Osbern the butler, Geoffrey de Meleford, John de Valle, Robert Malet.

DISCUSSION

Ca.630 a monastery was founded by the East Anglian king Sigeberht at a small settlement called Bedricsworth, which developed into a royal vill; Sigeberht himself retired into the monastery. The fate of that monastery in the face of the Danish invasion is uncertain, but about half a century after the torture and murder of King Edmund, killed (870) by Danish captors who had defeated his forces, the king's body was moved to the Bedricsworth and a church founded to house the shrine. He was already considered a martyr and a saint, and the presence of his shrine added something to the existing importance of Bedricsworth in East Anglia. In 945 another King Edmund granted the chapel containing the shrine control over the town and its suburbs, so that revenues from the same could support the shrine, and in the years that followed the foundation is seen acquiring substantial landholdings by donation or bequest. The presence of a mint in the town by the late tenth century is further evidence of how it was prospering. It also served as the administrative centre for West Suffolk, comprising eight and a half hundreds (the town being one and a half of those), whose populations convened at a folk moot on a hill called Thinghoe, just north of the town.

The Anglo-Saxon town was probably gathered around a north-south route (Northgate/Southgate) which ran past Thinghoe, and focused on a crossroads at the junction with Eastgate, the section of which at the junction was later known as Le Mustowe Strete, suggesting the location there of the meeting-place of the town moot, possibly in a cemetery of the church housing St. Edmund's tomb. This area was offered some protection on three sides by the rivers Linnet and Lark. The unprotected western side much later was protected by a wall, linking Northgate and Westgate, probably preceded by a ditch-rampart fortification; Southgate, as the likely focus of the pre-abbey settlement, may also have had such fortifications supplementing the protection from the water-barriers.

Around 1020 the shrine, serviced by a community of secular clerics, was superseded by a new monastic foundation of Benedictines, transferred from Ely and St. Benet's of Holme, possibly an initiative of Cnut to gain legitimacy in the eyes of his newly-conquered subjects. The new abbey took over control of the town and suburbs, an area which came to be known as the banleuca. In 1044 Edward the Confessor gave the abbot even wider authority, over eight and a half hundreds and over the manor of Mildenhall; this area became known as the liberty of St. Edmund's. It had previously been under the lordship of his mother, Emma, disgraced the previous year for treason, and now Edward had to find a new lord without upsetting the balance of power in East Anglia; he settled for the abbey (whose abbot he expected to be able to nominate), even though this meant placing extensive jurisdiction and its revenues outside direct royal control. He later (1065) transferred jurisdiction of the royal mint to the abbey; while another grant of the Confessor, of date unknown, gave the abbey permission to tax its men when the king taxed his. The name Bedricsworth was now giving way to "St. Edmund's borough". The needs of the abbey generated increasing employment for the town's labourers, craftsmen and administrators (Domesday mentioning 13 reeves living in the town who were responsible for managing abbey lands), and business for its traders.

That St. Edmund was virtually a national saint ensured that the king continued to favour the abbey and ensure its interests were protected. The wealth and power accumulated by the abbey, in part through further gifts of land, as well as from visitation by pilgrims to St. Edmund's shrine, in turn spurred the economic development of the town, which was a market centre for the region needs and a source of goods and services to the abbey. Just before the Conquest, the newly-appointed Abbot Baldwin initiated a major programme to rebuild the abbey and also planned an expansion of the town, 342 new houses being built over the next two decades; as a Frenchman he was able to weather the political changes at the Conquest, and import fellow countrymen as new settlers. These projects were continued by his predecessors into the next century. It may have been at this time that the abbey precinct expanded across Southgate to disconnect it from Northgate; the purpose of the new sector of the town may have been in part to relocate those residents displaced by the abbey expansion, but it was doubtless also to attract new settlers.

This building programme provided rents and service obligations to the abbey. The Norman grid of a planned town is evident in the street pattern of central Bury St. Edmunds. The new town was equipped with its own marketplace, likewise a source of income to the abbey through ground rents and tolls; this marketplace was, in the thirteenth century, acquiring pre-eminence over the marketplace of the older part of town, on the south side of the abbey. The section of town south of the abbey likely represents the focus of habitation for the pre-Conquest residents.

The town may have had borough status before the Conquest, although the Domesday entry does not specify that nor does it refer to the inhabitants as burgesses. A grant of William Rufus spoke of the abbot's rights infra burgum et extra indicating the intra-mural area had some distinction in status. A charter of Henry I (ca.1102) confirmed to the abbey and the burgesses all liberties they had possessed in the first half of the eleventh century. Whether this, or some initiative originating from the abbey, was the causative factor that made the town free, as Jocelin de Brakelond referred to it in his chronicle, is hard to say; but evidently the townspeople within the walls had rid themselves of some manorial services, via commutation, before the period of which Jocelin writes, and were differentiated from the suburban residents in such regards. The prosperity coming from local commerce and industry, contrasted with the fact of the abbey's extensive control over economic and administrative affairs, stimulated the townspeople's inclinations to free themselves from what they viewed as the oppressive elements of the abbey's lordship, draining money out of the community while obstructing entrepreneurial ambitions.

The charter of Abbot Anselm – essentially just a recognition of borough customs, rather than the concession of new privileges or powers – was probably that for which the townsmen are recorded by Jocelin de Brakelond as purchasing from Abbot Sampson a confirmation in the 1190s. It is worth comparing these customs with those of the Newcastle burgesses, from a similar period.

NOTES

I have reformatted the document into separate clauses to make for easier reading.

"Anselm"

Anselm was abbot 1121-48, except for a brief period when he was elected as Bishop of London in the late 1130s, but returned to the abbacy after the election was overturned by the Pope.

"Abbot Baldwin"

Baldwin became abbot in 1065; it is quite plausible that, as part of his programme for expanding the town, he would have been concerned with defining the special privileges of the burgesses.

"gates"

By the late 13th century we have clear evidence of the town being divided into five wards, each being an area in the vicinity of and associated with one of the five entrances (gate not necessarily implying, at the period of Anselm's charter, an elaborate stone structure, although clearly there was some kind of physical barrier). Northgate and Southgate lay on the original main thoroughfare and may have had wards from an early period; Southgate was densely settled and the several watercourses there encouraged the presence of industry (e.g. fulling). Eastgate was a small ward under the direct administration of the abbot (or rather, the abbey sacrist), its gate the closest (adjacent) to the abbey precinct and perhaps for this reason controlled directly by the abbey – although the fact that it lay on the Yarmouth-London route may have been another incentive. Westgate ward was relatively sparsely populated, despite incorporating part of the planned town developed soon after the Conquest; the importance of the west gate was perhaps more that through it lay the road to London. Northgate ward was likewise relatively sparsely settled. Risbygate ward – the name suggesting this entrance was not of early importance – may not have been in existence prior to the foundation of the new town and its marketplace; not surprisingly, however, the ward became densely populated, and Risbygate served to link the town with what became a populous suburb.

"knights"

Those who held property in the liberty of St. Edmund's by knight's tenure, it being customary for such tenants to contribute to the maintenance of local fortifications.

"sokemen"

Those who held land by socage tenure, a jurisdictional bond between lord and man based on services provided in return for land, as opposed to personal homage (commendatio). In this period the sokemen class was particularly in evidence in East Anglia.

"responsibility"

The gist of this clause, a little confusing at first glance, is that the burgesses were only prepared to undertake maintenance of the defensive ditch if the other abbey tenants contributed too.

"permission from the reeve"

The reason for this seems to have been to ensure that any feudal services associated with the property were clearly conveyed to the new tenant.

"son or close relative"

This right of pre-emption by kin was not uncommon (e.g. see the Nottingham charter), but normally applied to land of patrimonial inheritance.

"acknowledged"

Most likely refers to a formal recognizance of the debt, at time of it being contracted, before the authorities.

TRANSLATION

After the death of Abbot Hugh, the keepers of the abbacy wanted to remove the reeves of the town of St. Edmund from office and use their authority to appoint new ones, claiming that this was the right of the king, in whose hand the abbacy was. We, however, sent messengers to Sir Ralph de Glanville, then justiciar, complaining about this. He replied that he was well aware that £40 was payable each year from the town to our sacrist, namely for [\[providing\]](#) lighting for the church; and, he said, Abbot Hugh at his own initiative and privately, without the agreement of the convent, had given the ballivalty to whomever he wished, whenever he wished, while upholding the £40 due the altar. Consequently it was not to be wondered at if the king's bailiffs demanded the same right for the king....

Upon his return, our messenger reported to us what he had heard and seen; we, somewhat reluctantly but with little option, reached a common decision – despite the opposition of our sub-sacrist Samson – that we would do our best to have the old reeves of the town removed by joint agreement of the convent and the keepers of the abbacy. But when Samson was made abbot he, not forgetful of the injury done to the convent, on the day following Easter Sunday after his election had convened in our chapter-house knights, clerics, and a crowd of burgesses. And, in front of them all, he stated that the town belonged to the convent and to the altar, namely for providing lighting for the church, and that he wished to restore the ancient custom that the reeveship of the town and other things belonging to the convent should be dealt with in the convent's presence and with its consent.

Within the following hour two burgesses, Godfrey and Nicholas, were named as reeves; after some debate over from whose hand they should receive the horn, which was called the "moothorn", they received it in the end from the hands of the prior, who (after the abbot) is in charge of all conventual affairs. Those two reeves remained in the ballivalty for several years without interruption, until they were accused of negligence in their duty of administering the king's justice. Following their removal, Hugh the sacrist – at the proposal of the abbot himself, so that the convent's concerns over this issue be eased – took the town into his own hand and appointed new officers to answer to him for the reeveship. But in process of time (I don't know how), the appointment of new reeves later took place elsewhere than in the chapter-house, and without [\[consulting\]](#) the convent.

In the tenth year of Abbot Samson's abbacy [\[1191/92\]](#), by communal decision of our chapter, we complained to the abbot in his court, saying that the payments and revenues from all the goods of towns and boroughs of England were growing and increasing to the profit of their possessors and the benefit of their lords – with the exception of this town, which customarily pays £40 and this has never been re-evaluated. The burgesses of the town were at fault here, for they held in the marketplace many significant encroachments, in terms of shops, booths and stalls, without the consent of the convent and solely by grant of the town reeves, who were the annual farmers and in essence the servants of the sacrist, removable [\[from office\]](#) at his pleasure.

However, when the burgesses were summoned they answered that they were in the king's assize, nor did they wish to respond, to the prejudice of their charters and the town franchises, concerning tenements that they and their forefathers had held honestly and peacefully for a year and a day without challenge. They stated that it was a long-standing custom that the reeves might, without consulting the convent, grant plots of land in the marketplace for shops and booths in return for a rent to be paid annually to the reeves. This we denied, expressing the wish that the abbot dispossess them of those tenements which they held without warrant. But the abbot told us in private (coming to our council as if he were one of us) that he wanted to uphold our rights insofar as he could, but that he had to act in accordance with judicial process and could not without a court decision dispossess free men of lands or rents they had held, whether justly or unjustly, for several years. If he did so, he said, an assize of the realm would lead to him being liable to amercement by the king.

The burgesses, after discussing the matter among themselves, in the interests of peace offered the convent a payment of 100s. in return for keeping the tenements they had long possessed. We did not wish to agree to this, preferring to postpone the dispute in the hope that, perhaps, in the time of a future abbot we might either recover all our rights or change the location of the market. And so the issue went unresolved for several years.

After the abbot had returned from Germany, the burgesses offered him £40, petitioning for his confirmation of the town franchises under the same terms in which his predecessors, Anselm, Ording, and Hugh, had confirmed them. Abbot Samson graciously gave his approval to this request. Although we moaned and groaned about this, a charter was drawn up for them just as had been promised; since it would have shamed him and caused confusion if he had failed to fulfill his promise, we did not wish to argue with him or make him angry. Once they had the charter from Abbot Sampson and the convent, the burgesses had increased confidence that they would never during Samson's abbacy lose their tenements or their franchises; consequently they were never thereafter inclined to renew their previous offer to give the payment of 100s. mentioned above. But the abbot, finally paying heed to the situation, gathered together the burgesses [before him] on the matter and told them that, unless they made peace with the convent, he would prohibit them from erecting booths in the marketplace of St. Edmund's. They answered that they were willing to give each year a silken cope or some other adornment worth 100s., as they had previously promised, but only on condition that they be freed forever from the tithing penny which the sacrist rigorously exacted from them. But the abbot and the sacrist rejected this, and therefore the dispute was once again left unresolved. Indeed, up to the present we are still deprived of that 100s., just as the old saying goes: "He that will not when he may, when he will he shall have nay."

On the day after Christmas there took place in the cemetery gatherings, arguments and brawls between the abbot's servants and the burgesses of the town: words led to blows, punches to wounds and bloodshed. When the abbot heard of this he, after calling before him in private certain persons who had gathered at the spectacle but had held themselves apart, ordered written down the names of the offenders, all of whom he had summoned to appear before him on 30 December in the chapel of St. Denis to answer the charge. Meanwhile he did not invite any burgesses to his table, as was previously his custom during the first five days of Christmas.

On the appointed day, having heard the testimony under oath of sixteen law-abiding men, the abbot pronounced: "It is evident that these wrongdoers have broken the canon latae sententiae. But since both sides are composed of laymen and they therefore do not understand how much of an outrage it is to have committed such sacrilege, I will excommunicate these by name and publicly, to make others that much more afraid [of committing the same]; and, so that justice is seen to be fully done, I will begin with my own domestics and servants." This was carried out, once we had put on our stoles and lit candles. They all went out of the church and, after being advised [what to do], they stripped and, completely naked except for their breeches, prostrated themselves in front of the church door. When the abbot's assessors, both monks and clerics, came to him and tearfully informed him that more than a hundred men were lying naked in that way, tears came to the abbot's eyes too. Although his countenance and his words reflected the rigour of the law, and he concealed the pity he felt, he wanted to be persuaded by his counsellors to absolve the penitents, knowing that mercy is more commendable than punishment and that the Church embraces all who are penitent. After they had all been severely scourged and absolved, they all swore to abide by the judgement of the Church for the sacrilege committed. So on the following day a penance was assigned them according to canon law, and the abbot exhorted them to return to unity and concord, threatening terrible things to all those who instigated discord by word or by deed. He had a public proclamation made forbidding gatherings or spectacles in the cemetery. And so, peace among everyone having been restored, in the days that followed the burgesses feasted with their lord the abbot with great rejoicing.

Many people were surprised at changes made to customs, at the orders or with the permission of Abbot Samson. From the time when the town of St. Edmund was given the name and liberty of a borough, the tenant of each house had been accustomed to pay the cellarer a penny at the beginning of August towards the [cost of] reaping the grainfields – this customary payment was called "repselver". Before the town was given its liberty, all of them used to participate in the reaping, as if serfs; only the houses of knights, chaplains, and servants of the court were exempt from these obligations.

Over the course of time, the cellarer spared certain of the wealthier men of the town, exacting nothing from them. The other burgesses, seeing this, began to say publicly that no-one who owned his own house ought to pay that penny, only those who rented houses belonging to others. Subsequently they all acted together to petition for this liberty, approaching the abbot on the matter and offering him an annual payment in lieu of that exaction. The abbot gave thought to how the cellarer had to go through the town in an undignified manner to collect the "repselver", and how he had to cause securities to be taken from the houses of the poor – sometimes three-legged stools, sometimes doors, sometimes other items in everyday use – and how old women would come out brandishing their distaffs to threaten and curse the cellarer and his men. Then he announced his decision that every year, at the portmanmoot session just before the beginning of August, the reeve should hand over to the cellarer twenty shillings [raised] by the burgesses, who designated a revenue source for paying it.

It was thus arranged, and confirmed by our charter. They were also given an exemption from a certain custom called "sorpeni", in return for 4 shillings to be paid at the same time of year. For the cellarer was accustomed to receive a penny per year for every cow belonging to a townsman that was led out and put to pasture, except for cows belonging to chaplains or servants of the court, which he was accustomed to impound, involving a great deal of bother.

When the abbot reported this in chapter the convent was at first indignant and disgruntled; the sub-prior, Benedict, gave a response in chapter on the matter on behalf of everyone, saying: "Abbot Ordning, he who lies right there, would not have done such a thing for five hundred marks of silver." This made the abbot angry and he postponed discussion of the matter for the time being.

Also, a serious dispute took place between Roger the cellarer and Hugh the sacrist concerning things related to their spheres of jurisdiction, in that the sacrist refused to make available the town gaol to the cellarer for locking up thieves arrested on lands under the cellarer's jurisdiction. This often caused difficulties for the cellarer who, when thieves escaped, would be blamed for a failure of justice.

It happened that a certain free tenant of the cellarer, known as Ketel, who lived outside the [town] gate was accused of theft, defeated in [trial by] combat, and hung. The convent was distressed by the reproaches of the burgesses, who said that if that man had resided within the borough the matter would not have come to a combat, but he would have acquitted himself by the oaths of his neighbours, as is the franchise belonging to those who live in the borough. Once the abbot and the more sensible members of the convent recognized this and considered that that all men, whether [living] inside or outside the borough, are our men, and that the same franchises should be enjoyed by everyone within the banleuca, except for the villeins of Hardwick and their like, after deliberation they took steps to make it so.

The abbot therefore, wishing to lay the disputes to rest through a clear specification of the scope of responsibility of the sacrist and cellarer, seemingly supporting the position of the sacrist, ordered that the servants of the town reeve and the servants of the cellarer should jointly go into the lands under the cellarer's jurisdiction to arrest thieves and other wrong-doers, and that the reeve should have half of the money due from the imprisonment and custody, and for his labour. Also that the cellarer's court should convene in the portmanmoot, and any judgements should be given there by common counsel. It was further decreed that the cellarer's men should come to the tollhouse just like everyone else, there to renew their pledges, be registered on the reeve's roll, and pay the reeve the penny known as "borthselver" – of which the cellarer might receive half, although at present he receives nothing from any of this. This was all done so that everyone could enjoy equal privileges. But the burgesses continue to declare that those living in the suburbs should not be exempt from paying market tolls unless they are members of the merchant gild. And nowadays the reeve appropriates to himself the pleas and fines related to the cellarer's areas of jurisdiction, to which the abbot turns a blind eye.

The ancient customs of the cellarer, as we have seen, were as follows:

- The cellarer had a property with barns nearby Scurun's Well, where he was accustomed to hold formal sessions of his court dealing with theft and all other pleas and lawsuits. There too he would put his men in [frank]pledge, have this registered, and renew [the procedure] every year, whereby he received income such as that the reeve received via the portmanmoot. That property, together with the adjoining garden (now held by the infirmarer), was the manor-house of Bedric, who was in ancient times lord of the town – which is why it was called Bedricsworth – and his demesne fields are now part of the cellarer's demesne. However, that which is now called "averland" was the land of his villeins.
- The lands that he and his men held totalled nine hundred acres, which are still fields belonging to the town; the service due from which, when the town was made free, was divided into two parts, so that the sacrist or the reeve receive a rent (that is, twopence per acre), while the cellarer have plough-service and other services (that is, the ploughing of one rood per acre without food – a custom still in force today).

- The cellarer was to have the folds where all men of the town are obliged to keep their sheep (a custom still in force), except for the steward who has his own fold.
- He was to have "averpenny" (that is, 2d. per thirty acres), a custom altered before the death of Abbot Hugh, when Gilbert de Alveden was cellarer.
- It used to be that the men of the town, at the orders of the cellarer, had to go to Lakenheath and perform transportation service by bringing back eels from Southrey; but often, returning empty-handed, they went to that bother without any benefit to the cellarer. Consequently an agreement was made between them that henceforth the men might remain at home, [in return for which] they would pay annually one penny per thirty acres. However, nowadays those lands have been divided up into so many plots that it is difficult to know from whom the payment is due – I have seen the cellarer collect as much as 27d. one year, but now he is barely able to get 10½d.
- The cellarer used to have control over the roads outside town, so that no-one was allowed to dig them up for chalk or clay without a licence from him.
- He was accustomed to call upon the fullers of the town to lend him cloths for transporting his salt. If they failed, he could prohibit them from making use of the river and might confiscate any sheets that were found there. These customs are still in force today.
- Anyone buying grain or other goods from the cellarer used not to have to pay toll at the town gate when he departed, which enabled the cellarer to sell his goods at a higher price, and this is still the practice.
- The cellarer customarily levies a toll on flax at the time when it is wheeled out [of the fields]; that is, one bundle per load.
- The cellarer used, as he ought, to be the sole person to have a free bull in the town fields; now several persons have them.
- When someone transferred burgage land to the convent as alms, and it was assigned to the cellarer or some other official, that land would be exempted thereafter from hawgable – particularly if [assigned] to the cellarer, because of the importance of his office (since he is the second-in-command in the monastery) or for respect due the convent, since the situation of those who provide us with food should be given support. But the abbot's position is that this custom is unfair, since by it the sacrist loses the rents due him.

- The cellarer used to warrant the servants of the court that they were exempt from scot and tallage; but this is no longer the case, since the burgesses claim that the servants, while they may be exempted insofar as they are servants, are not so when they have burgage tenements in the town and they or their wives buy or sell openly in the market.
- The cellarer used to be free to collect all the manure from every street, for his own use, except that in front of the houses of those who hold averland – they alone being permitted to collect and keep the dung. This custom was undermined little by little in the time of Abbot Hugh until Denis and Roger de Hehingeham were cellarers; they, intent on restoring the ancient custom, seized burgesses' carts that were loaded with dung and made them unload. But because many burgesses protested this and prevailed [in the dispute], everyone collects the dung near his own property and poor people sell theirs whenever and to whom they wish.
- The cellarer customarily has a certain privilege in the marketplace of the town: that he or his buyers should – if the abbot is not in residence – have [the right of] first purchase of all foodstuffs for the use of the convent. The buyers of the abbot or those of the cellarer, whichever arrive first in the market (whether the former before the latter, or vice versa), may buy first; but if they are both present at the same time, priority is given to the abbot's buyers. Similarly, at times when herring is for sale, the abbot's buyers may always buy a hundred herring for a halfpenny cheaper than others pay; likewise for the cellarer and his buyers. Or if a load of fish or other foodstuffs should arrive first at the court, or come into the market, and if the goods have not been unloaded from the horse or the cart, the cellarer or his buyers may buy the entire load and carry it away without paying toll on it.

.... when a certain person had a look at my text and read of so many good acts, he called me a flatterer of the abbot ... saying that I had suppressed or passed over certain facts When I asked him what kind of things, he replied: "Are you not aware that the abbot gives to whomever he pleases escheats of land that are part of the demesne of the convent, and [the marriage of] girls and widows who are heiresses to lands, whether in the town of St. Edmund or outside it? Are you not aware that abbot diverts to his own court suits and pleas initiated by the king's writ concerning claims to lands which belong to the convent's fief, especially those suits from which income derives [for the court], while those from which there is no income he leaves for the cellarer or sacristan or other officials?"

To which I replied ... that every lord of a fief from which homage is due ought rightfully to have its escheats when they occur within a fief from which he had received homage. For the same reason, [he has the rights to] a general aid from the burgesses, to the wardship of boys, and to the giving in marriage of widows and girls, in those fiefs from which he has received homage.... However, in the town of St. Edmund the custom exists – because of it being a borough – that the closest relative might have wardship of a boy along with his inheritance, until [he reaches] the age of majority.

DISCUSSION

Charters granting franchises are apt to make us see the growth of urban self-administration as an episodic affair, proceeding from plateau to plateau. But it may be that in the absence of other, less formal records, we lack a picture of a more ad hoc, gradualistic emergence of urban independence from external authority. Townsmen were likely lobbying or agitating for, or even usurping, powers in advance of their formal grant.

We are fortunate that, in the case of Bury St. Edmunds, there is a window into this period, in the form of a chronicle written by one of the monks, Jocelin de Brakelond, of the events relating to the abbey in the closing decades of the twelfth century and opening years of the next, a time of change for the abbey during the abbacy of Samson, a capable administrator under whose tutelage Jocelin had been a novice and under whom as abbot he served in several capacities. The chronicle (particularly the passages extracted above), with the surprising amount of attention it gives to everyday matters, throws light in several passages on the way the town was governed, the character of a burgh society under seigneurial control, and the tools and tactics employed by the townsmen at this early period in the process of the struggle for administrative autonomy – tactics which included recognition of mutual interest, peaceful negotiation, passive resistance, and outright violence. It suggests how townsmen acquired privileges piecemeal; such advantages might be consolidated later by embodiment in a charter.

The abbey was established in the eleventh century, taking over custodianship of the shrine to national martyr, St. Edmund, a former king. It was given by Edward the Confessor extensive authority over what was equivalent to a shire, with the town once known as Bedricsworth as the administrative and commercial centre (for further information, see "Recognition by an abbot of the customs of his burgesses"). The townsmen thus came under the lordship of the abbey. The Church generally proved a more conservative lord to boroughs than did the king, whose interests were better served – up to a point – by encouraging the development of local autonomy.

The Abbot of St. Edmund's was a very powerful figure and obliged to protect the rights, privileges and revenues of his house. However, it was less the abbot who was the town's master than the convent, and particularly the sacrist and cellarer of the conventual community. At the risk of oversimplifying, the sacrist had jurisdiction over the intramural population, while the cellarer's jurisdiction was in the suburbs, agricultural in character. The sacrist was responsible for levying the town rents and other local taxes, and the town reeves were appointed by and answerable to him. Since the reeves presided over the portmanmoot and the leet court, supervised the marketplaces and assizes, and collected tolls, this prevented the burgesses from asserting themselves through an elected executive and the town courts. They relied, perhaps more heavily than most other towns, on a merchant guild as an expression of self-regulation and as the voice of that segment of the community with the greatest interest in freeing the town from abbey jurisdiction; the guild became a focus of opposition to the abbey. The cellarer's authority, although focused more on the suburbs, was likewise a source of annoyance to the townspeople: his preoccupation with agricultural activities allowed him to claim precedence when buying in the market, and to provide exemption from borough tolls for those buying abbey produce (giving him a competitive advantage over town merchants, or allowing him to raise his prices above those of the townsmen). As well he supervised the fulfillment of labour services, or collection of payments in lieu of services. The cellarer also had a court, for administering justice over the suburban tenants of the abbey.

It is evident that, by the late twelfth century, Bury's burgesses already had some of the freedoms or institutions that were associated with the development of distinctive and autonomous urban communities:

- it had customs distinguishing it from mainstream society: e.g. trial by inquest had replaced trial by combat, wardship was in the hands of kin rather than a feudal lord;
- some manorial services of an agricultural nature had been superseded by a monetary payment;
- some customary payments of town to lord had been aggregated under an annual farm of £40, although this was in the hands of the reeves, rather than the burgesses;
- the burgesses (as opposed to the townsmen – applied to residents of the banleuca) were defining themselves as those who held property by burgage tenure and were at scot and lot (contributing to communal taxations and participating in market activities); whether membership of the merchant gild was a pre-requisite for burgess status is less clear, although extra-mural residents could acquire certain burgess rights (exemption from tolls) by joining the gild;
- there was some agency of communal organization or representation – almost certainly the merchant gild – that could speak on the burgesses' behalf, defend the burgesses special rights (as opposed to those living in the suburbs), and that had a treasury from which it purchased the property whose rents would pay the annual farm in lieu of repselver.

On the other hand, they had no control over the courts – key institutions of local government – or the election of the presidents of the court (the bailiffs), and they continued to be subjected to certain manorial services.

The dispute over the rents from market stalls indicates how the burgesses were trying to assert independence from the abbey, or rather to buy off the convent's claim to direct influence over the level of those rents. In this matter the abbot opposed the burgesses' ambitions, although he may have later made a private arrangement with the burgesses accepting the money (see below). However, Abbot Samson, aiming to put both the administration and the finances of the monastery back on a firmer footing, was amenable to meeting at least some of the burgesses demands to convert customary dues into an annual payment, similar in principle if on a smaller scale than the fee farm that other boroughs, subject to the king, were negotiating for at the same period. The precedents he set likely encouraged the burgesses to hope that, after acquiring more economic independence, they could move on to win administrative independence.

Despite the freedoms granted by Abbot Samson, the abbey on the whole fought hard to prevent the borough from acquiring any substantive independence from its lordship. The monks were themselves somewhat at odds with Samson in the concessions he made to the burgesses. Even Jocelin, who knew Samson well and had some respect and admiration for him, became increasingly critical of him during the course of compiling the chronicle. Jocelin held several administrative posts through which he doubtless felt the effects of the rather autocratic Samson's decisions; those posts are believed to include that of cellarer ca.1198-1200, which would explain why Jocelin takes pains to list those of the cellarer's jurisdictions and revenue sources that had been undermined. After Samson's death, the monks appear to have reasserted themselves and presented the new abbot (appointed 1215) with their equivalent of the "Magna Carta" (see Antonia Gransden, "A Democratic Movement in the Abbey of Bury St. Edmunds in the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries," Journal of Ecclesiastical History, vol.26 (1975), 25-39). Several clauses of this relate to changes in borough-abbey relations effected by Samson:

- The town reeve was to be appointed by the sacrist and convent, without the abbot's consent being required, with the prior and sacrist responsible for handing over the moothorn and keys of office to the new incumbents.
- Girls and widows who held property in the borough by a type of tenure which enabled escheats were to be given in marriage by the convent, without the abbot being involved.
- An annual payment of 100s. handed over to the abbot privately by the borough reeve be restored to the convent.
- The cellarer was to be allowed, without impediment from the sacrist or reeves, to use the town prison to hold thieves caught on his fief.

The abbey's unwillingness to loosen its leash on the burgesses – and, to be fair, we should remember that the abbey's prosperity depended on it scrupulously protecting its jurisdictional rights – became increasingly frustrating for the burgesses. They, as the town became a centre of the cloth industry and trade, were less dependent on the abbey as a source of business, but still lacked the administrative autonomy that might help them take full advantage of commerce. Taking advantage of the weakening of national powers during the civil war, the young men of Bury organized themselves into a gild (1264) with the goal of removing the town from the abbey's control. Although abortive, it set the scene for further efforts of open rebellion during the late thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries, as a frustrated urban populace formed a commune to strive – unsuccessfully – to throw off the yoke of ecclesiastical overlordship.

NOTES

"Abbot Hugh"

Abbot 1157-1180, predecessor to Sampson (who became abbot in 1182).

"keepers of the abbacy"

Note that it was not the abbey per se that had come into the king's hand as a result of the interregnum following the abbot's death; it was the office of abbot and the privileges and jurisdictions associated with that office.

"moothorn"

The moothorn served both as a symbol of office and also as a practical device for summoning burgesses to attend the moot.

"revenues from all the goods of towns"

This passage (exitus omnium bonarum villarum) could also be translated as "revenues from all good [i.e. prospering?] towns", but I am here assuming that what we have is an oblique reference to tolls and/or taxes, while redditus (here translated as "income") may refer to specifically to rents or more generally to the customary dues the burgesses paid the abbey.

"possessors"

I.e. since the lords of the towns are mentioned separately, possessors may refer to the farmers of borough revenues – it being common at this time for royal or seigneurial officers, or private entrepreneurs, to farm those revenues.

"encroachments"

I.e. they had set up new market stalls (some of which may have acquired a measure of permanence) without the annual payment to the abbey being adjusted to take account of the rents or stallage due. It appears from what follows that the reeves, as the farmers of the borough, would have been the beneficiaries of the new rents.

"in the king's assize"

I.e. under the jurisdiction of the king, probably on the grounds of Henry I's charter (albeit that, technically, this was not addressed to the burgesses per se, but to the abbey and its burgesses). It was a common ploy for boroughs trying to break free of seigneurial jurisdiction to appeal to the king; but in the case of disputes at Bury St. Edmund's the king almost invariably supported the rights of the abbey.

"year and a day"

It was commonly the custom in boroughs that a year and a day's unchallenged tenure of a borough property gave secure title. See the Fordwich customs for instances of the significance of a year and a day.

"payment of 100s."

It is not clear whether this was to be an annual increment to the farm or a one-time payment in return for recognition of the right of the burgesses to hold the encroachments. The latter is more likely, since the former would surely have won the approval of the convent. Later events may suggest that the burgesses had been thinking of an annual increment; but the terms under which they renewed negotiations, upping the ante, could also be used to argue against this.

"tithing penny"

Payable at the view of frankpledge.

"gatherings, brawls and arguments"

Butler argued, from the use of spectaculum (usually applied to a performance) to characterize the events, that the assembly in the cemetery was to witness wrestling matches, and perhaps other sports. It is plausible that what began as a friendly competition could, given the antagonistic relations between borough and abbey, have deteriorated into real hostilities.

"latae sententiae"

The offence was one of sacrilege; that is, the abbot was less concerned with the violence itself than with the fact it took place on the consecrated ground of a cemetery.

"repselver"

Silver (money) for reaping, dues reflecting the commutation of personal service for that task

"servants of the court"

Lay servants of the abbey (curia here probably meaning religious house), possibly referring to the serfs who worked the abbey fields.

"spared certain of the wealthier men"

Whether this was done because the cellarer wished to maintain good relations with the merchants who supplied the abbey, or whether some of the more powerful townsmen were refusing to pay, was probably beyond the scope of Jocelin's knowledge, for he stated that he would only put down on parchment that which he personally saw or heard.

"only those who rented houses"

The evidence is too slim to draw a firm conclusion, but one might infer from this that membership in the enfranchised community was already premised on owning a house in the town.

"securities to be taken"

I.e. pledges for payment of the repselver at a later date.

"distaff"

A stick used in spinning wool into thread, a role usually performed by women, particularly poorer women or spinsters.

"revenue source"

In the record of the charter itself, of which a copy has survived, it is specified that the the burgesses would pay the 20s. from rents collected from buildings they erected on land they bought (from a tanner) in the marketplace; these rents were assigned in perpetuity to the ballivalty, whose incumbents would be responsible for their collection.

"sorpeni"

Scorpenny, a fee for pasturage (Latin pascherium), was also paid for through the same rents that covered the repselver.

"which he was accustomed to impound, involving a great deal of bother"

It is unclear from the original whether these phrases apply just to the cows of the chaplains and servants, or to all the cows. It seems likely that impounding would apply to cows found on pastureland without having the right to be there; but inparcare might also be interpreted as putting the townsmen's cows out to graze in a secure (enclosed) pasture. The bother involved – possibly implying labour and/or difficulty – could refer to distinguishing the ineligible cows from those eligible; or, perhaps more likely, to the whole activity of pasturing the cows as well as collecting the dues, thereby offering a rationale for the abbot's decision.

"chapter"

The gathering of the monks to address convent business.

"Abbot Ording"

Ording, who was buried in the chapter house, had died fifty years earlier, so it may be doubted if Benedict's outburst was for anything more than effect.

"town gaol"

The gaol was facing the marketplace, backing onto the town wall (although in the period of Jocelin's chronicle, it is more likely the defences were in the form of rampart and ditch than stone walls). It was under the jurisdiction of the sacrist, who appointed the gaoler. As running the gaol was a source of revenues (through fees charged the prisoners), the sacrist was presumably reluctant to share them with the cellarer.

"common counsel"

This presumably meant that the presiding officers of the cellarer's court and of the portmanmoot would sit together in judgement.

"tollhouse"

The tollhouse was another building situated facing the Great Market in the new town. There the reeves collected rents and other dues from the abbey tenants, along with market tolls.

"renew their pledges"

H. E. Butler, whose edition and translation of the Chronicle was published in 1949, believed this referred to the requirement of each man to find guarantors for his being in tithing and thereby subject to view of frankpledge. This seems to be supported by information from the passage that follows, about the cellarer's sources of revenue, but the vague phrase might just possibly refer to finding guarantors for payment of rent due the abbey, or even to a form of franchise entrance.

"borthselver"

H.T. Riley associated borthselver with stallage (i.e. a payment for setting up a board in the market).

"at present" "nowadays"

Jocelin is evidently speaking here of the way the balance of power had shifted in the rivalry between sacrist and cellarer between the time of the abbot's settlement and the time at which he was writing the chronicle – sometime after 1202, the date of the latest events dealt with in the chronicle.

"as follows"

Presentation of the cellarer's rights and dues as a bulleted list is my own arrangement, to make it easier to read what is otherwise a long chapter written by Jocelin.

"averland"

Land held in return for provision of avaragium, a transportation service by livestock. Averpenny was the payment representing commutation of the service.

"one rood per acre without food"

I.e. that each tenant be obliged to do that much ploughing, without the cellarer having the obligation to provide meals. Although these services applied to suburban lands and tenants, many of the burgesses residing within the fortified circuit also held lands in the suburbs.

"load"

The Latin, cerna, refers to a measure specific to flax; since the flax was being carted off, we can guess that the measure would be equivalent to a cartload.

"second-in-command"

Literally "second father" (secundus pater), after the Abbot. This claim seems an unwarranted opinion of Jocelin; the prior was the abbot's deputy and the sacrist might have disputed with the cellarer as to who was next in precedence.

"warrant the servants"

I.e. if the abbey servants were harassed or prosecuted for failing to contribute to local taxes, the cellarer would back up their claim of exemption. At this period, the townspeople did not contribute to royal taxes, but the king had granted the abbey the right to tax its tenants when the king taxed his.

"escheats"

Lands whose tenants died without heirs or were convicted of felony were returned into the hands of the the tenant's lord.

"age of majority"

usque ad annos discretionis, the years in which he can make sound decisions for himself.

Inquisition made by the jurors named below, that is, William of St. Laud, Willard de Lincoln, William Baudewin, Alexander Debonere, James Motun, William Gamel, William Hod, Peter Palmar, Nicholas le Burgeis, Robert Drueri, William Loueman, William Balle, Henry fitz Richard, Ralph Fode, William le Chapmon, and Thomas Geraun, concerning the payments called gavelpence and pontage, by what right and for what reason they were first given and taken.

Who say under oath that, in the time of Robert de Medland, earl of Leicester, it happened that two kinsmen – that is, Nicholas son of Hakon and Geoffrey son of Nicholas of Leicester – made wager of battle for a certain piece of land, concerning which they were in a legal dispute. They fought from just after dawn until noon and beyond. As they were engaging in combat together in this way, one of them drove back the other as far as a certain small ditch and, as [the other] stood at the edge of the ditch and risked falling into it, his kinsman said to him: "Careful you don't fall into the ditch that is behind you". And there was at once such a great outcry and uproar from those sitting and standing around that their noise was heard by the earl as far away as the castle; he then made enquiry why there was such a clamour, and was told that two kinsmen were engaged in judicial combat over a piece of land and that one had driven the other back as far as a certain small ditch, and as the one stood at the edge of the ditch and risked falling into it, the other warned him.

The burgesses then, moved indeed by pity, made an agreement with the earl that they would pay him threepence a year from each house whose gable faced onto the high street, on condition that he grant them that from that time forward all pleas concerning them be tried and judged by the 24 jurats who had been established in Leicester since ancient times. This was granted them by the earl, and this was how the payment called gavelpence first came to be levied. That Earl Robert was succeeded, after his death, by his son and heir Robert who, for the benefit of the soul of his father completely remitted the payment called gavelpence, and by his charter quitclaimed it in perpetuity. That particular charter, along with many other documents and charters, was given into the custody of a certain burgess and clerk called Lambert, against whom evildoers arose by night, because he was thought to be wealthy, and they burned down his houses and also his feet [sic] together with the aforesaid charter and many other writings.

At a later time there was a certain clerk called Simon Maudut in the town of Leicester who, for a period after the death of that Robert earl of Leicester who had made the charter of quitclaim, was farming the office of provost of Leicester and he extortionately collected, through his own willfulness and personal force, the payments called gavelpence, distraining all those who resisted paying, saying that they should show him the quitclaim that warranted their resistance – for he knew perfectly well that this quitclaim was burnt. And it is for this reason that they are paid to this very day.

This inquisition was held in the presence of Roger de Ekden, then bailiff, Peter fitz Roger, then mayor of Leicester, Ralph Oliver, Richard de Campeden, and many others, on 17 March 1253.

Inquisition made by the same jurors before the same Roger,

Peter and others concerning pontage at Leicester:

Who say under oath that, in the time of the same Earl Robert, the forest around Leicester was so large, heavy, and dense, that it was barely possible to travel along the paths through that forest, because of the large number of dead trees fallen down and boughs blown down by wind. By the decision and consent of the earl and his council, it was then permitted to those who wished to go looking for dead wood that they might have six cartloads for a penny, a horseload a week for a halfpenny, and a man's load a week for a farthing. These payments were initially collected at the exit to the woods, but later between the outskirts of the town and the woods, and eventually the money was collected at the town bridges of Leicester; there at first there was a certain warden called Penkrich, at whose request the earl subsequently granted him a plot of land next to the bridge, to build upon, so that it would be more convenient for him to collect those tolls there. For a long time thereafter this Penkrich collected the payments, not only those customarily levied on dead wood but also on green wood and wood for sale, and afterwards this [practice] came to be treated as a custom.

So that the truth of this finding is more apparent and evident, it can clearly be seen from the fact that no outsiders bringing wood or timber – whoever they might be, or from whatever regions they come, whether from the forest of Arden, or Cannock Chase, or Needwood forest – pay nor ever were accustomed to pay any pontage, excepting those [coming] from Leicester's forest.

DISCUSSION

In historians' perhaps ultimately futile consideration of whether "burgess" had a precise, technical application in the eleventh century, one criterion suggested as a defining feature has been the obligation of some town-dwellers to pay (normally to the king) certain customary dues that had, or had acquired, a distinctively urban character. These included tolls on goods brought to the town for sale and fixed rents for town properties. The former might be collected at various points of entry into the town or its market, including bridges, where such levies had names such as bridge-silver or pontage (a term usually applied to tolls levied to finance bridge maintenance). The latter were typically referred to as landgable or hawgable. "Gable" derives from an Anglo-Saxon term for a gift or tribute, and the gavelpence which was the subject of the Leicester inquest was essentially a version of hawgable; although it is possible to infer from the jurors' story that the original meaning of "gable" had been forgotten and was thought to be associated with the gable of the house from which hawgable rent was due.

Leicester has a long history, as a Roman base and one of the key boroughs of the Danelaw. It was held mainly by the king at the time of Domesday Book but, whereas most long-established boroughs were kept within the king's hand, Henry I turned over his lordship to Robert de Beaumont, Count of Meulan – probably the Robert de Medland mentioned in this document – who founded a dynasty of the Earls of Leicester, although it is not clear whether he had that title himself. This "mesne lordship" (i.e. intermediating between the community and the ultimate lordship of the king) put Leicester at a disadvantage compared to similarly sized and well-situated towns under the direct lordship of the king. The king saw both economic and political advantages in granting a certain measure of self-government to towns, whereas mesne lords had less to gain and tended to be more conservative with regard to surrendering revenues and authority in return for a fee-farm; Leicester was unable to obtain such a lease of local jurisdiction until 1375 (see "Grant of farm by a mesne lord").

We must view these two judicial inquiries in the larger context of Leicester's efforts to break free from the dominion of the earl.

The purported remission of gavelpence assumes that the interests of the community were being represented by particular individuals; and handing over to Lambert the quitclaim, apparently with other town documents, equally suggests some mechanism for communal decision-making and representation. There was a mechanism in place, in the form of the merchant gild; Robert de Beaumont formally recognized this gild early in the twelfth century, in a charter stating that it gild had existed since the time of William I, although we should not trust too much in such statements. It could simply have been that Lambert (as a resident perceived as wealthy) had a relatively sturdy and secure house, but a more likely reason for assigning important evidences to Lambert's safekeeping would have been that he was an officer of the merchant gild. Although the earliest surviving gild roll does not date earlier than 1196, the character of that record suggests it was neither exceptional nor the earliest in a series. The gild likely had kept records for a much longer period and would have had some approach to archiving them.

Robert II confirmed his father's recognition of the merchant gild in a charter whose principal aim was to grant the burgesses freedom from having to pay suit to any manorial or other court outside the town; instead the earl acknowledged the burgesses' right to have their cases heard in the community churchyard, probably referring to the location of the portmanmoot (reminding us of a similar situation at Ipswich); the church was not named but was possibly St. Nicholas, an early foundation of unusual size which has led to the suggestion it may have been built for a Mercian bishop, and opposite whose churchyard a moot hall was built in the latter half of the thirteenth century. The merchant gild, although its principal duty was to protect and support the mercantile interests within the community, remained for some time – rather longer than in most other large towns – an important institution for furthering the aspirations of the community as a whole, not least because the portmanmoot could not be an effective tool in that regard, since the earl's provost presided over it and the revenues it generated went to the earl. The gild had its own periodic meetings at which minor transgressions and some infringements of local custom could be judged.

Unable to obtain control over the election of the provosts (bailiffs) of the town, Leicester resorted, around 1250, to giving the gild alderman a second hat to wear: that of mayor, an office more representative of the community as a whole. The mayor came to co-preside over the portmanmoot, and it is probably in that setting that the inquisitions recorded here were held. Although there is no extant record that the earl officially sanctioned any right to elect a mayor, he acquiesced on condition that the burgesses presented newly-elected mayors to him for confirmation. But there is indication in 1257-58 of some difficulty surrounding the mayoralty, since particular efforts were made to consult the earl on the mayoral elections.

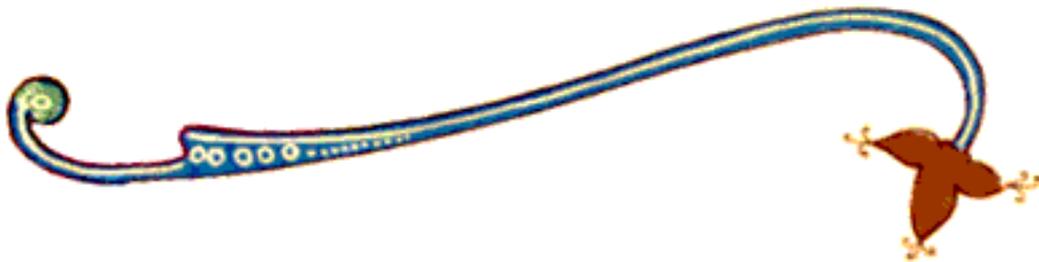

Possibly the mayoralty, or the limits of its powers, had become a bone of contention, as was the case at Lynn around the same period. Creation of a mayor was likely part of a broader initiative to commute traditional obligations to the earl into an annual farm. In the year before the inquisitions, a tax had been levied on the community to pay for anticipated costs when the king's justices itinerant came to the town, which may imply that the town was pursuing legal avenues in that forum. And during 1253-54 the merchant gild was displaying particular vigour in disciplining offenders against community interests.

To the modern eye the two inquisitions appear a ploy to establish a legal record registering the burgesses' interpretation of events, which they might then use to their advantage in negotiations with the earl; or perhaps one should rather say the interpretation of a selected group of burgesses among whom numbered several leading citizens possibly associated with the party interested in winning greater independence from feudal lordship. There are clearly elements of historical fact in the events recounted by the inquisition jury. It seems probable, however, that the story of the judicial combat itself was a local legend (although perhaps preserving a memory of some actual occurrence) which later became associated as an explanation for the custom of hawgable; the two elements may even have been tied together, through collusion of the jurors, specifically for the inquest, in order to suggest that the burgesses had agreed – we may infer, under a certain compulsion – to paying hawgable to the earl in return for the right to the medieval equivalent of trial by jury rather than the hated judicial combat. Whether the explanation of pontage by reference to a special toll on dead wood is likewise some kind of confusion cannot be said, but again it reflects a common burgess belief that, over time, legitimate levies might expand into unwarranted exactions. We should remember, however, that while we today might find the connections between, for example, the duel, the crowd's uproar (possibly a riot), and the agreement with the earl, tenuous – even though each individual event may have hold the memory of an actual occurrence – evidently to medieval people the connected sequence was plausible enough. What we may have here is not so much fabrication of events but temporal compression to suggest or emphasize their association.

Despite the possible intrusion of legend into these accounts, they nonetheless reflect some key features of the effort towards urban self-determination. Certainly both hawgable and exemption from combat were both features that historians have considered characteristics of borough status. But the introduction of the story of a specific duel was a device aimed at suggesting to the court that extenuating circumstances had forced them to concede a financial obligation they would not otherwise have incurred. The burgesses' belief that the earl's officers – provost and bridge-keeper – were exceeding their duties to the point of extortion is also a common feature in urban struggles for independence; the stories presented to explain the levies to which the burgesses objected are less important to us than the fact that the burgesses wished to rid themselves of those obligations to their overlord.

Following the findings of the inquisitions, the community authorities levied a special tax on residents to raise money to buy from the earl (ca.1254) a perpetual remittance of pontage, alias "briggessilvir", and gavelpence. The inquisitions may have been held to establish a rationale for such an initiative, or a legal record suggesting that earl's right to gavelpence and pontage was questionable, thus creating a stronger case for the burgesses prior to their entry into negotiations with the earl. The money raised would have been used to pay a lump sum to persuade the earl to issue his charter of remittance, and/or to help buy local properties whose annual rents were handed over to the earl as compensation for his loss of the traditional revenues.

NOTES

"jurors"

Of the jurors: William de St. Lo was one of the earliest holders of the mayoralty, having previously served as alderman of the merchant gild (1230s) and even earlier as one of the gild councillors (ca.1225); Willard de Lincoln entered the merchant gild in the 1220s, was one of its councillors ca.1225, and was one of the provosts in 1239 and again ca.1250; William Baldwin (d. ca.1258) had likewise sat on the gild council ca.1225; Alexander le Debonair, a member of the merchant gild since 1243, acted as mayor's deputy in 1257 and held the mayoralty himself from 1270-75; Ralph Fode became a member of the merchant gild in 1240; William Balle appears to have entered the merchant gild in 1242; James Motun bought a length of cloth from the gild in 1251, and was evidently a gildsman, as too was Nicholas Burgeys who later appears as a member of the town/gild council. It appears almost as though the jurors were listed in the order of their social status.

"earl of Leicester"

Robert de Beaumont acquired interests in Leicester at the beginning of the twelfth century, when one of its lords mortgaged his property to Beaumont to finance participation in a crusade and then died in that venture. He increased his interests through favouritism from Henry I, of whom he was one of the leading counsellors, and by marrying his daughter to the son of another shareholder in the lordship. His son Robert the Hunchback was the first lord of Leicester known for certain to have held the title of earl (1118-1168); since he did not inherit the lordship of Meulan, it is less likely he was the Robert who was lord at the time of the trial by combat. Robert II became Henry I's Justiciar and, as such, regent during the king's absences abroad.

"wager of battle"

Wager of battle refers to trial by battle, a form of judicial determination which burgesses normally preferred to avoid.

"high street"

The principal road through Leicester, leading between the north and south entrances through the wall (and earlier through the burh fortifications; a cross street ran between east and west entrances, but the high street looks like the earliest nucleus of habitation.

"24 jurats"

The existence of a town council of 24 jurats, their core task to administer local laws by judging cases in the town court, is clearly evidenced in the 1270s, and – as the example of Ipswich suggests – such a body may well have been around for decades. It was probably the same group as the merchant gild council of 24, mentioned as early as 1225. But it would be stretching the evidence too far to connect either of these 24 with a possible group of pre-Conquest "lawmen" such as are known to have existed in several other towns that, like Leicester, came under Danish control or influence.

"Simon Maudut"

A William son of Simon Maudit joined the merchant gild of Leicester in 1209.

TRANSLATION

These are the customs which the mayor and community of Fordwich have enjoyed since ancient times and continue to enjoy.

First, they claim that within that liberty no hundred court [session] shall be held between the Nativity of the Blessed Mary [8 September] and the Monday following the festival of St. Andrew the Apostle [30 November]. On which day they shall present before the steward of the Abbot of St. Augustine, Canterbury, or his deputy all the customs written below together with other franchises embodied in its charter. That day shall be for a view of frankpledge, but no pleas of land are to be heard on that day.

No hundred court is held after summons has been issued to the barons, regarding service to the king, nor while some of their liberty should happen to be [absent] in that service. Nor shall they hold any hundred court is they are summoned to the king's parliament or to the Shepway court. No hundred court shall be held except once every three weeks, and then with reasonable advance warning [to parties], viz. 3 days, but 15 days advance summons for those who are party to a plea of land. And no hundred court shall be held on any day other than a Monday.

They claim that no hundred court shall be held, nor shall judgement be pronounced in any plea other than in the hundred court, without the mayor and 12 jurats of the town being present. That no freeman of the liberty is to be amerced at any hundred court held in that town because of his absence, so long as the mayor and 12 jurats shall be involved in rendering judgement, except in the case of the hundred held, as mentioned, on the Monday following the festival of St. Andrew the Apostle – on which day anyone defaulting [in appearance] may be amerced up to 6d. And that if anyone of the liberty shall be put on any inquisition [jury] and defaults [in appearance], so that he is subject to amercement, that amercement is to be assessed by his peers and levied in the same way.

They claim that in all crown pleas arising within the liberty in which an outsider has brought a suit against any freeman regarding lands or tenements that are within the liberty, that freeman shall be allowed a certain number of delays, viz. 3 summonses, 3 essoins, and 3 defaults [in appearance]. And in pleas of debt, trespass, contracts and other civil pleas between freeman and freeman they may have as many delays as in the pleas of land. But if an outsider has brought a suit against any freeman in a plea of debt, trespass, contract or any other civil plea, the freeman shall defend from day to day, and hour to hour.

They claim that if a man wishes to alienate lands or tenements within the liberty in which his wife has rights, then the wife is to appear in person before the mayor and jurats of the town and be examined in their presence (as is the practice in the king's court). And then, immediately after her declaration, according to the way and custom of the town, her wishes in that regard are to be enrolled and may serve in perpetuity as a record of the legal decision between the parties.

They claim that every man and woman of the liberty may bequeath all lands and tenements they have acquired within the liberty and that they may make their testaments concerning those bequests in the presence of the mayor, bailiff, and jurats – if they are able to be there. If they cannot find the time, then before at least 3 jurats of the town who can if necessary duly prove the last will of the deceased at another time – within a year and a day after the death of the deceased – before the mayor, bailiff, and community. If he or they to whom the lands or tenements are thus bequeathed is or are unwilling to prove the testament before the mayor, bailiff, and community within a year and a day, the property shall remain forever with whomever has the right to them by way of heredity, as if they had not been bequeathed. If there are those who are suddenly overtaken by illness, so that they are unable to draw up testaments regarding such acquisitions, then they may declare their wishes orally before the mayor or at least 2 jurats and they shall receive approval and be fulfilled as if they were legacies made in a testament.

Moreover, if there are those of the liberty who die intestate, their goods and possessions are to come into the hands of the mayor and jurats, for disposal on behalf of the deceased as they consider it most expedient for the benefit of the souls of the deceased, without the intervention in such matters on any grounds by any ordinary of the Church.

They claim that if any man or woman wishes to sell his or her lands and tenements in the liberty, according to the custom of the town he or she should first offer them to the closest blood relative. If he or she should sell them to anyone else of the liberty or an outsider, before thus offering them to the nearest kin, and that blood relative, in the presence of the mayor and jurats, shows his money to the seller in an amount equal to what the latter is able to get from the other, the seller shall discount the blood relative 12d. in the pound. If that close kin is known to be in distant parts at the time of the sale and purchase of those lands and tenements, whenever he returns home (if within a year and a day) he may come before the mayor and jurats and claim the same terms of sale according to the custom of the liberty. If that is the case, because of his absence for so long a time, he shall have a respite of 40 days in paying the price in the original terms of sale made between the other parties. If he who had obtained possession refuses to accept the relative's claim, then the latter shall immediately enter into the lands or tenements by view of the mayor and jurats; on condition, however, that he satisfy the purchaser for the whole price that he previously paid for the lands and tenements, within that period or at the end of the 40 days at the latest.

They claim that, regarding lands and tenements within the liberty that are put up for sale, freemen of the town should, if they wish, have the first chance to acquire them, before outsiders.

They claim that no-one may despoil, of the revenues issuing therefrom, the lands or tenements within the liberty belonging to children of the town. All minors who are underage shall be nurtured, after the death of their ancestors, by the mayor of the town and not by any others who contest for the right. According to the custom of the town, sufficient surety is to be provided for answering to the mayor, when they [i.e. the heirs] reach their majority, for their possessions and other things that rightfully belong to them, and for providing for their material needs as is necessary and required in similar cases.

They claim that if a thief who has committed a felony outside the liberty is prosecuted for that felony within the liberty, those who wish to prosecute him for the felony may lay an accusation before the mayor, bailiff, and jurats and thus proceed against the felon to the point of judgement until he is acquitted or convicted according to the custom of the town. After his conviction, the felon shall forfeit his possessions (if he has any) to the king, who is lord of the town.

They claim that if a thief is arrested for any felony committed outside the liberty and those who are escorting the shackled thief bring him into the liberty without permission from the mayor, bailiff, and jurats of the town, then the bailiff, together with mayor and jurats, is to take the thief into custody and hold him in the king's prison within the liberty, until those who thus brought the thief have paid a fine of 10s. for "le vorueng", of which half [goes] to the abbot and the other half to the community of the town. After they have paid the fine, the bailiff, together with the mayor and jurats, is to escort the thief to the boundary of the liberty and there hand him over to those who previously had custody of him. Similarly, if someone has brought a shackled felon to the boundary of the liberty, wishes to enter the liberty, and requests permission from the mayor, bailiff, and jurats, then the mayor, bailiff, and jurats may lead the felon, unshackled, through the interior of the liberty to the [far] boundary of the liberty and there without delay hand him back to those men who previously had custody.

They claim that if any informer who is an outsider accuses any man from the liberty of any felony – regardless of whether the felony was committed inside or outside the liberty – the informer is to enter the liberty with all the equipment allowed to an informer. When he enters the town he is to be led to the river called the Stour and is to stand therein, at a point where the water comes up to his navel, with his equipment in the manner of an informer, ready to uphold his accusation [by combat]. And the freeman who has been accused, dressed in a garment called a "scorrie" and with an instrument called an "ore" 3 yards long, is to come along the river in a two-bench boat until he is facing the informer. That boat is to be tied up to the quay with a rope and he shall fight with the informer until the contest between them is decided.

They claim that if any misfortune should happen within the liberty so that someone is feloniously killed or falls from a house or a tree, or such a thing suddenly occurs by any other similar kind of misfortune, the king's coroner shall not because of that enter the liberty but, instead of the coroner, the mayor, bailiff, and jurats shall have view of the felony or misfortune; and the forfeited possessions [of the felon] and deodands, if there are any, are forfeit to the king.

They claim that if any freeman or outsider is arrested or indicted for a felony outside or inside the liberty and flees to a church within the liberty, the mayor and community may not by any means take him into custody so long as he stays inside that church. Should he succeed in escaping from the church within a period of 40 days, [neither] the mayor nor the community are liable to pay any compensation for that escape. If at the end of the 40 days, or earlier, he wishes to abjure the liberty, the mayor, bailiff, and jurats are to escort the felon to the boundary of the town liberty and there hear his abjuration according to the custom of the liberty.

They claim that if any man or woman of the liberty buys stolen goods, either inside or outside the liberty, and someone lays a claim to the item as his own property, but the purchaser can legitimately prove with the third hand that the item was bought in good faith and without complicity, then he who has laid claim to the item may have it back, if he wishes, by satisfying the purchaser for the same amount he had previously paid for the item; otherwise the buyer may keep the item as his own. If in such a case the man or woman is found on a second occasion to have bought any item thus and has been prosecuted as aforesaid, he or she is to prove with the sixth hand that the item was bought in good faith under all the aforesaid circumstances, and thus shall enjoy his franchise. If on a third occasion he is challenged on such a purchase, then he is to prove with the 12th hand that the item was bought in good faith; and if he is able to prove it thus, then let it be just as it is said above. Otherwise, if he is not able to prove it by that method, then judgement shall be given according to the law of the land.

They claim that the king shall not have suit in any case within the liberty.

They claim that if any waif or stray should come into the liberty, he who takes custody of it is to have an announcement made of the fact in the church within the liberty on three [successive] Sundays, in case someone wishes to lay claim to it. If after the announcement is made no-one wishes to put in a claim, then it is to remain in his custody for a year and a day; and after that year and a day one more announcement is to be made in the church, as indicated. If someone then lays claim to it and proves it with the third hand in front of the mayor and jurats, he who had custody of it for that period is to be fully reimbursed for all expenses he incurred during the entire period, after which he is to hand it over to the claimant without delay. But if no-one wishes to lay claim after the announcement is made, then it is to be sold and the expenses he has incurred up to then are to be repaid, and of whatever remains beyond the expenses one half shall go to the king and the other half to the community of the town.

They claim that ten days after they have elected the mayor of the town, the mayor, bailiff, and those jurats who are available are to examine all measures of length and weight within the town and, if they find some measures that are defective in length or weight, those [who own the measures] that are defective are to be amerced according to the custom of the town, of which half goes to the king and the other half to the community of the town.

They claim that any ale-wife who wishes to brew within the liberty should be amerced no more than 2d. for an entire year, which amercement is to be paid to the king.

They claim [that there is] no "kerbrech" within the liberty.

They claim that if some ale-wife brews unwholesome ale within the liberty or [sells it] at a price lower than it ought to be and is brought before the mayor, bailiff, and jurats on this charge, the ale-wife is to be amerced up to 11d., of which half goes to the king and the other half to the community of the town. And if she should be found guilty of this on a second occasion, she is to be amerced up to 22d., of which half to the king and the other half to the community. And if she should be found guilty a third time she is to renounce her role as an ale-wife for a year and a day and even then may not return to it without permission from the mayor, bailiff, and jurats.

They claim that all the following are freemen of the town, viz.: those who marry any freeman or freewoman of the town; whoever is born within the liberty; and also, they who purchase the liberty.

They claim that if someone should wish to share in their liberty, he may reside for a year and a day and, if the mayor and community are satisfied that he is honest and well-behaved and if he wishes to remain longer among them in the liberty, he may pay 11d. to have the liberty, of which half goes to the king and the other half to the community of the town.

They claim that no bailiff from outside may make attachments within the liberty, other than the bailiff of the town or, in his default, an officer of the warden of the Cinque Ports.

They claim all the above free customs along with others which they cannot at the moment bring to mind, which we and our predecessors have from time immemorial up to the present day used and enjoyed, together with other franchises more fully set out in our charters, so that we on behalf of ourselves and our heirs in future times without any kind of challenge in regard to the same may uphold them and henceforth forever be capable of governing [\[ourselves\]](#).

Concerning the rights of the abbot there regarding anyone arriving with a cargo of fish who seeks permission to dock at the port of Fordwich: since the abbot is lord of both the town and the port, it is his custom and right to make the first purchase if he wishes.

They claim that the mayor and jurats should be at the service of, and look after, merchants and everyone else coming to the town, to the best of their ability. So that if the lord's bailiff might wish to take from them or from their merchandize excessive tolls or perhaps seeks to oppress them in some other way, the mayor and jurats shall go to the bailiff and ask him that he not commit this kind of extortion to the detriment of the king's town. If after being requested he is unwilling to desist, and those merchants or others coming afterwards want justice against the bailiff in the king's court or before the warden of the Cinque Ports, the community ought to provide them with assistance and advice and, when the time comes, bear witness to the injury the bailiff has caused them. Even if the merchants coming after cannot or do not want to do so, the mayor and jurats ought to take counsel together and have written down all unjust exactions of this type and all wrongs that they see him [\[commit\]](#). And if that bailiff is determined to commit other abuses against the liberty and the community, those of his wrongs which they can verify they are to confront him with and take an adversarial stance against the misbehaving outsider. Better, however, for the mayor and bailiff to get on well together because each, through friendly relations and reciprocal communication, could then undertake his duties in a better, more informed, and easier fashion. To accomplish that purpose, so that it is clearly understood what the bailiff ought rightfully to perform, his official duties are as follows: he ought to collect, in person or by a deputy assigned by him, the tolls due to the Abbot of St. Augustine, Canterbury, as specified in his list of tolls, since the king has granted him his royal prerogative within the liberty insofar as he holds the town of the king, and not otherwise. It is well-known that he ought not to collect tolls from certain persons, viz.: from any of the freemen of the Cinque Ports or their members; from those men of the liberty of the city of Canterbury who are at scot and lot within the city; from men of London who are at scot and lot within the walls of their city; from men of the Archbishop of Canterbury who reside on the archbishop's lands; from men of the hundred of Middleton who reside in the hundred; from men of the Abbot of Battle; from men of the Abbot of St. Albans. Any other merchants whatsoever, no matter when or how often they come into the liberty, ought to be subject to paying tolls there depending on the quantity of their merchandize, as set out in the bailiff's list of tolls. If any bailiff or anyone else infringes this against the franchise, our warden of the Cinque Ports will whenever necessary be on the lookout for injuries committed against the community and the liberty, under penalty of £10 to his profit.

They claim that whenever and as often as the town of Fordwich is without a bailiff of the Abbot of the monastery of St. Augustine, Canterbury (who has rule over the town under the king), he may send one of his own men – whomever he wishes to select to occupy the ballivalty – with letters patent under the communal seal of the monastery and other letters from the abbot himself requiring the acquiescence of the mayor and community. Which letters having been read out before the mayor and community, the bailiff ought at the direction of the mayor to take his oath [of office] before the mayor, jurats, and the whole community, in the following fashion:

I, J.[ohn] or W.[illiam], intend to be true and faithful to our lord king of England and his heirs, and to my lord the Abbot and Convent of St. Augustine, Canterbury and their successors, and faithfully to exercise the office of bailiff and uphold the dignity of my office, saving however all articles of the franchise of the town, guarding against any diminution thereof. So help me the holy saints, etc.

And then he is to receive the white rod [of office] from the abbot's steward, if he is present, and if not, from the mayor. It is said that the community may appoint a bailiff from among themselves and that they are to obey him in all matters that fall under his office and ballivalty. Otherwise the ballivalty is not to be occupied until what is stated above has been fully performed. The bailiff has the power to receive all complaints that arise within the town in all matters of law, whether involving freemen or outsiders; and, depending on the nature of the lawsuit, may make attachments or summonses, grant bail, or do whatever else is appropriate to the cases.

If however the plaintiff or the defendant should be an outsider, or if both parties are outsiders, the plea ought to be held according to its type before the mayor, bailiff, and jurats of the town, from day to day and hour to hour, because all outsiders ought to have justice in the town within three days in all pleas, except for pleas of land and pleas of the crown.

It is also permitted to both plaintiff or defendant to appoint an attorney [with power] to win or lose before the mayor and bailiff, or before the mayor without the bailiff, in all pleas except for pleas of land – for attornies in such cases should not be recognized [by the court] except in full hundred session. However, those who are outsiders ought to receive justice and answer to the law whether before the attorney of the mayor and bailiff or in their presence. The same ought to hold true when a freeman is involved in a suit with outsider, regardless of whether that outsider is the plaintiff or defendant, because a freeman going up against another freeman does not have to plead in the absence of the mayor or bailiff, and for this particular reason it is desirable to have a bailiff who resides within the liberty. The bailiff or his deputy, when they receive such a complaint, is obliged to inform the mayor or his deputy, so that he may be present on a day specified to preside over the plea, together his jurats who ought to come, as mentioned.

It is the duty of the bailiff or his sergeant in these types of pleas to make reasonable distrain on the defendant to oblige him to answer. So that if the lawsuit should be one involving a large debt then a large distrain may be taken; if on the other hand it is a lesser matter then the amount of the distrain taken is to be proportionate to the offence committed – [for example?] if a mariner should bring an action against his [ship]master for unjust detinue of 20s. then the master may be distrained by his ship's sail, or by its cable or anchors, so long as other sufficient distrains can be found in the same ship. The bailiff should receive 4d. for taking this kind of distrain, on water or on land, and amercements from those who are convicted, which are to be paid to the abbot. On the other hand, it is the custom for him not to take anything for distrains made on land, other than the amercements from those convicted, since the abbot ought to look after the interests of the plaintiff in regard to those amercements.

DISCUSSION

After the establishment of a Saxon kingdom in Kent, the old Roman town of Canterbury was made its capital, and it subsequently became the base for a re-Christianization effort; but in both cases its role during the early and middle Saxon periods was largely administrative, rather than as a centre of commerce. The Kentish kings founded a group of ports/market centres to facilitate the cross-Channel trade with France in luxury items, and the building of Canterbury cathedral and St. Augustine's Abbey likewise required the import of high-quality building materials, from France and the Isle of Wight. Fordwich was the most prominent of these deliberately founded centres, serving as Canterbury's outpost. Another was Sandwich, also located on the same estuary, but at the coast.

To the northeast of Canterbury, beyond the abbey and the ancient church of St. Martin, was a wide stretch of gravel that terminated at the highest navigable point on a broad estuarine channel, predecessor to the River Stour. It was at that point, where there was also a ford across the channel, that a wik was founded – probably by the king – on the southern side of the channel and a quay built, as a point for landing goods and probably for selling them. On the far side of the channel, a royal residence probably offered fortified protection in case of need. Commercial activity at this Fordewicum is evidenced from the seventh century, although the first mention of the place by name was in 675. In the next century we hear of the king exempting monasteries from the shipping tolls that were collected, on his behalf, at Fordwich.

Fordwich appears to have been under the jurisdiction of Canterbury: the king and (later) the earl shared jurisdiction, while the cathedral itself had some jurisdiction there – its own quay, with adjacent property, later the subject of disputes with the abbey. The abbey also had landed interests in Fordwich and expanded these, acquiring from Edward the Confessor in 1055 all his lands and associated jurisdiction in the town. A new abbot granted this away to the sheriff soon after the Conquest. But control soon returned to the hands of the abbey, as the Conqueror's half-brother Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, granted away the authority that had come to him from the pre-Conquest earl, and as the sheriff restored to the abbey his part of the lordship, perhaps as late as 1111. The situation seems a little confused, but in Domesday Fordwich is referred to as a "small borough" in which most burgage plots (73) were held of the abbey. It remained under the abbey's lordship until the Dissolution. Despite its modest size, it was one of only a handful of boroughs and important enough to have hundred status.

However, the narrowing and silting of the Stour contributed to its decline. In fact, it lost in 1880 its borough status, which was only restored in relatively recent times, and its present-day claim to fame is still as England's smallest borough.

The Domesday Monachorum, a survey contemporary with the king's Domesday, but dealing only with the possessions of the Church in Kent, confirms the king's Domesday in showing that the archbishop held 7 burgage plots in Fordwich which had withdrawn their service, but goes on to indicate that this service was naval in character. This has led historians to wonder whether Fordwich was already, at that time, an affiliate of the Cinque Ports (whose special jurisdictional privileges were held through naval service to the king), through association with Sandwich, a full member of the league. We know that Fordwich was a "corporate member" through Sandwich in the thirteenth century. Yet, in the charter Fordwich was granted by Henry II (1184), the privileges obtained were typical of normal boroughs, and had none of the special features associated with the Cinque Ports; furthermore, the charter included the grant of a Merchant Guild, an institution not found in any of the Cinque Ports. It has been argued (K.M.E. Murray, The Constitutional History of the Cinque Ports, 1935) that Fordwich perhaps had been a member of Sandwich ca.1066, but the default of ship service from the archbishop's tenants led to the abbot banning his own tenants from providing the service; as a result of which Fordwich's membership lapsed, to be renewed in the thirteenth century when Fordwich was in contest with the abbey and needed the support that the king's Warden of the Cinque Ports was prepared to give to member towns against their overlords. Whether or not that was the case, Fordwich did become an associate member of the Cinque Ports under its more thriving neighbour Sandwich, became in some regards subordinate to Sandwich, and reshaped its constitution somewhat to be more consistent with that of Sandwich.

Not much survives of the medieval records of Fordwich. Perhaps the most important document is the custumal, which has survived in several variants.

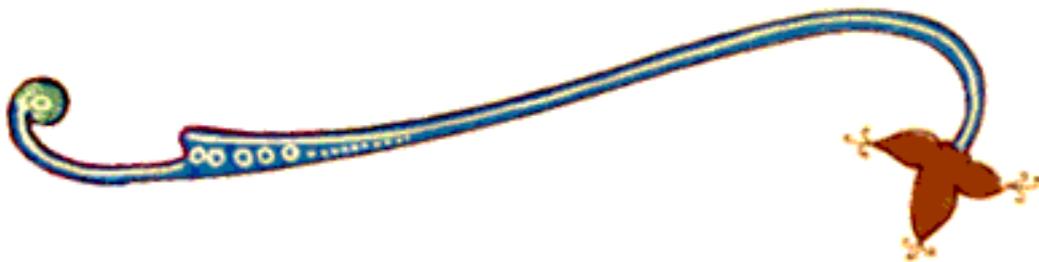

With so many rival authorities claiming jurisdictions in the town – the abbey, Canterbury, Sandwich – a record of the town's rights and local laws was an important document. The version above is probably a selection from the full custumal, representing chapters of particular interest or concern to the Abbot of St. Augustines; the use of the third person plural at the beginning of each chapter suggests a scribal modification of the original, although the scribe seems on one occasion (one of the later chapters, laying general claim to franchises) to have lapsed into quoting from the source of the copy, using the first person plural. On the other hand, perhaps there is a connection between this document and the annual declaration of town customs before the abbot's steward in the hundred court.

The register, known as the Black Book, into which the abbot had the chapters copied dates from the late 13th century, a period in which the town was involved in disputes with the abbey over issues related to local jurisdiction and administration. Some of the capitula have an adjacent marginal annotation "to be noted", while others have more detailed annotations indicating jurisdictions the subject of dispute between town and abbot. It is evident from the chapter regarding abuses by the abbot's bailiff that the collection of local tolls was a sore point, and the chapter emphasises (the townsmen's perspective) that the abbot has this right only by grant of the king, possibly a veiled threat. It may be noted that the record of this document in the Black Book is followed by a statement of the abbot's rights within the town.

At least one of the three other known versions also appears to have been drafted for the benefit of the abbey, and dates from the early fifteenth century. The other two copies date from the late fourteenth century and the second half of the fifteenth. The former may also have been a version produced for the abbey, or some other external authority. The latter is the fullest copy, but strongly shows evidence of having modelled or remodelled customs after those of Sandwich.

The custumal reflects some of the local idiosyncracies in applying customary law. The seemingly bizarre chapter concerning trial by combat between an "approver" and the one he accuses, for example. A similar idiosyncrasy, mentioned in another version of the custumal, was that condemned felons were to be taken from the abbot's court to the Thiefswell where, their hands bound with a rope going underneath their legs so that their knees were in a bending position, they were thrown (by the accuser) into the well to drown. Or again, any man elected mayor or jurat who persisted in refusing to accept office was to be punished by having his house pulled down, a custom found in at least one other Cinque Port (Dover). The affiliation with the Cinque Ports likely explains some of the peculiarities in terms of exemption from the general judicial system of the realm (e.g. abjurations being related to the liberty rather than the realm, deodands going to the town rather than the king, the exclusion the coroner in investigating suspicious deaths or of ecclesiastical ordinaries in matters of testaments). This affiliation did not lessen Fordwich's subordination to its lord, the abbot of St. Augustine's, but was a stick that could be waved at the abbey in some circumstances.

NOTES

"the Nativity of the Blessed Mary and the Monday following the festival of St. Andrew the Apostle"

The period of late September to the end of November was when the herring fishery and Yarmouth fair (over which the Cinque Ports claimed jurisdiction).

"service to the king"

This refers to the naval service provided by the barons (i.e. burgesses) of the Cinque Ports to the king.

"Shepway court"

Shepway was the general court of the Cinque Ports, at which representatives of all member towns had to present suit annually and at which parliamentary-style business of the league as a whole was conducted. Presided over by the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, the king's representative, the court exerted the authority of the king over the members of the league, moderating an otherwise relatively high degree of independence of the league from royal jurisdiction. The league's own court, in which it expressed self-government, was the Brodhull.

"day to day, and hour to hour"

This provision reflects the spirit of mercantile law in piepowder courts, in which speedy trial was assured to satisfy an outsider who could not remain in town for the duration of a long trial.

"be examined"

On this, see also the Ipswich custumal.

"acquired"

This refers to real estate acquired by gift or purchase, as opposed to inherited.

"bailiff"

The bailiff was the abbot's representative in town government and president of the hundred court (which helps explain the limitations placed on that institution by the custumal).

"ordinary"

An ecclesiastical official with authority in administrative matters.

"closest blood relative"

For a comparison, see the chapter dealing with pre-emption in the Norwich custumal.

"king's prison"

At the end of the 19th century, Alice Green pointed out that the "king's prison" was in fact "a filthy hole of nine feet square which still exists." (Town Life in the Fifteenth Century, vol.1, p.412.)

"le vorueng"

This old Anglo-Saxon word (more usually forfeng) is found elsewhere in the context of a reward for the rescue of stolen goods; but here is evidently used, in similar fashion, as a payment for the redemption of forfeited property.

"equipment"

The weaponry required for a combat to determine whether his accusation is to be considered true.

"scorrie"

Other versions have skorpe or skorye; Bateson associated this with an Old English word for "clothing", but evidently something more specific is intended here.

"instrument"

Given the context and the size of the "instrument" one can only suspect an oar is meant; whether this was intended to serve as a weapon is uncertain.

"two-bench boat"

What is transcribed by the editors as postis and has been interpreted as meaning "a boat with two posts" is in other versions of the custumal thoftis, whose meaning Bateson identifies as rower's bench; the version of the custumal she used, however, states 3 benches.

"fight with the informer"

Alice Green believed this passage implied that the freeman would fight from the boat with the oar. This is by no means clear; yet the whole passage tends to give the impression of some attempt to weight the combat in favour of the member of the community. Fighting while standing waist-deep in water could not have been easy, particularly if the informer were weighted down with equipment; and fighting from a rowboat or with an oar may not have been as challenging as might be thought, for a community whose members were, in many cases, experienced on the water. Whether having the combat take place in the water was a way of putting the informer at a disadvantage, or whether there was some jurisdictional symbolism, I cannot say.

"view of the felony"

I.e. view of the corpse (that term being substituted in the 14th century version).

"deodands"

In a legal context, these were the instruments of someone's death, which were forfeit to the crown when the death was ruled by misadventure (e.g. a horse that threw its rider).

"prove with the third/sixth/12th hand"

I.e. with that number of supporters of an oath of innocence (e.g. see the practice in London), or compurgation. By contrast with a purchaser of stolen goods, an accused thief had to find 36 compurgators to prove his innocence, according to the 15th century custom of Fordwich.

"waif or stray"

This refers to straying beasts.

"one half shall go to the king"

An annotation above the word "king" indicates that the abbot believed that this half of the amercement should go to him.

"ale-wife"

A female brewster. The "amercement" was in effect no more than a licence fee.

"kerbrech"

I have not yet determined the meaning of "kerbrech", unless it is perhaps a variant of burgbrice, a fine for breach of the peace within a borough.

"bailiff from outside"

The bailiff of the town was in fact the bailiff of an external lord (the abbot) and therefore considered an outsider, rather than a member of the community.

"Cinque Ports or their members"

Each of the principal ports had affiliates who obtained membership in the league through them.

"reside"

A colloquialism is used to convey this concept: qui sunt iacentes et levantes et eorum olla cocta). Literally, "those who go to bed and get up and have their pots and cots" (or possibly who "malt their ale").

"when or how often"

The point of this phrase was to indicate that toll-collection was not suspended at any times of the year (e.g. during fairs), nor was the toll a kind of licence payable only once a year.

"detinue"

An action in which the plaintiff complains that the defendant is in possession of the plaintiff's property and will not return it; possession by the defendant would have come about lawfully (as opposed to by theft), but the plaintiff claims the right to immediate repossession, although technically it was possible for the plaintiff never actually to have had possession. Detinue was usually applied to one or more specific identifiable items of property; however, cases are found where it seems to apply to a debt, in the sense for example of wages due, perhaps because a plea of detinue (unlike debt) allowed for claim of damages over and above the money owed.

"on water or on land"

This seems to be contradicted by what follows. Possibly the inclusion of "on land" in the first instance was a scribal error; the 15th century version of the custumal omits it. The reason for the 4d. fee was apparently (to judge from a similar specification in the Sandwich custumal) to pay for a boat and labour to convey the distrained items to shore.

[1. Earl John's charter to Dublin]

John, lord of Ireland, count of Mortain, to all his men and those friendly towards him, French, English, Irish, and Welsh, present and future, greetings.

Know that I have given and granted, and by this my charter have confirmed, to my citizens of Dublin – both those residing inside and outside the walls, as far as the town limits – that they may have [jurisdiction within] those boundaries that were perambulated by reputable citizens under oath by order of my father, King Henry. That is: on the east side of Dublin, the southern part of the pasture-land that stretches as far as the gate of St. Kevin's church, and from there by the road as far as Kilmerecagan, and then along the land boundary from Donnybrook to the [River] Dodder, and from the Dodder as far as the sea (that is, to Clarade next the sea), and from Clarade as far as Renniuelan.

And on the west side of Dublin from the church of St. Patrick through the valley as far as Karnanclonegunethe, and from there as far as the boundary of the land of Kilmainham, and beyond the watercourse of Kilmainham near the River Liffey, as far as the ford at Kilmehanoc, and beyond the watercourse of the River Liffey towards the north through Ennocneganhoc, and then as far as the barns of Holy Trinity, and from those barns as far as the gallows. And thus along the boundary between Clonliffe and Crinan as far as the [River] Tolka. And from there as far as the church of St. Mary of Oxmantown.

And that they are to have all the liberties and free customs written below.

Those liberties that I have granted them are the following:

[clause 1] That no citizen of Dublin need plead outside the town walls concerning any plea other than those relating to external tenements which do not fall under the jurisdiction of the hundred [court] of the town.

[clause 2] That they may be exempt from murdrum within the town boundaries.

[clause 3] That no citizen need undertake [trial by] battle on any accusation which someone makes against him in the city [court]; instead he may clear himself through the oath of 40 law-abiding men of the city.

[clause 4] That no-one may, against the will of the citizens, take a billet within the walls by requisition or by assignment of the marshal.

[clause 5] That they are to be exempt from toll, lastage, passage, pontage, and all other customs throughout the territory over which I have authority.

[clause 6] That no-one be sentenced to a monetary amercement except according to the law [administered] by the hundred; that is, a fine of 40s., of which he who is amerced shall be excused of half, and shall pay the other half of the amercement. With the exceptions of three [causes for] amercements: for [infringement of the assizes of] bread or ale, or for [failing to perform] nightwatch; which amercements are of 2s.6d, of which half may be pardoned, and the other half handed over as the amercement.

[clause 7] That the hundred [court] may be held as often as once a week.

[clause 8] That no-one may fail in a plea through miskening.

[clause 9] That they may have rights to their lands and land-holdings, to things they pledge, and to debts [owed them] throughout all territory under my authority, whoever shall owe them.

[clause 10] That they may distrain their debtors by seizing goods [they have] in Dublin.

[clause 11] That, in regard to lands and land-holdings they have within the town, justice is to be done to them according to the custom of the city.

[clause 12] That in regard to debts entered into in the city and things given as security there, [related] pleas are to be held in the city, [and conducted] according to city custom.

[clause 13] That if anyone anywhere within the territory under my authority takes toll from men of the city, unless it is given back after demand having been made for its return, the reeve of the city may seize related goods and distraint for the restoration.

[clause 14] That no outsider merchant may buy grain, hides, or wool within the city from outsiders, but only from citizens.

[clause 15] That no outsider may retail wine, except from a ship. But I reserve the right that, from every ship which happens to come there with wine, my bailiff (as my lieutenant) may choose two tuns of wine – whichever he wishes – for my use, for 40s.: that is, one [from the cargo] ahead of the mast for 20s., the second from behind the mast for 20s. And he is to take nothing further from the ship, unless the merchant is agreeable.

[clause 16] That no outsider is to retail cloth in the city.

[clause 17] That no outsider merchant is to remain in town with his merchandize, for purposes of selling it, for more than 40 days.

[clause 18] Also, that no citizen of Dublin anywhere within my territory or jurisdiction is to have his goods seized or be distrained for any debt of which he is not the debtor or the guarantor.

[clause 19] That they, or their sons, daughters or widows, may marry without [requiring] permission from their lords.

[clause 20] Also, that none of those who are lords of their outside lands may on that basis have wardship or bestowal [in marriage] of their sons, daughters or widows, but only custody of the properties that are in their lordship, until they [i.e. the children] come of age.

[clause 21] That no acknowledgement of lordship may be made in the city.

[clause 22] That they may have all their legitimate guilds, just as the burgesses of Bristol are accustomed to have, or had in the best of times.

[clause 23] That no citizen is to be compelled against his will to stand bail for anyone, even if he is living on the latter's land.

[clause 24] I have also granted to them that they may dispose at will of all real estate held, both inside and outside the walls, as far as the [town] boundaries, according to common agreement of the city: dwellings, gardens, structures upon the river, and elsewhere, wherever they may be in the town; holding them in free burgage – that is, for the landgable rent that they pay inside the walls.

[clause 25] I have also granted that any of them may make improvements, such as within their means, in terms of constructing buildings wherever they may wish upon the river, so long as this is not to the damage of the citizens or the town.

[clause 26] Also that they may have and hold all vacant plots and land that are contained within the boundaries mentioned, to build on as they wish.

[clause 27] I have also granted them that neither Templar nor Hospitaller may have more than one single man or dwelling within those boundaries that is exempt from the communal dues of the city.

All these things I have granted, reserving that all those who have, outside the walls up to the boundary limits, lands and tenures [held] by my charter may not dispose of them in the same way that others are disposed of, but (like other citizens) are to be subject to all city customs.

Wherefore it is my firm wish and command that my citizens of Dublin and their heirs who succeed them may have and hold all liberties and free customs written above, from myself and my heirs, as well and as fully as they ever possessed them, when at their peak, securely, peaceful and honorably, without any obstruction or interference that anyone might cause against them.

Witnesses: Stephen Ridell my chancellor, Walter de Dunestamuill, William de Kahaignes my steward, Theobald Walter the butler, Hamon de Valoniis, Ingelram de Pratellis, David Wallens, Richard de Ruuers, Fulk de Cantelleu, William fitz Ricard, Gilbert de Angulo, Roger Tyrell, Master Benedict, Master Peter Canute. [Given] at London, 15 May 1192.

The citizens of Dublin claim to have the liberties written below

First, they claim to have all liberties and free customs that the burgesses of Bristol have, as is indicated in a certain charter of Henry, king of England, father of king John, which was confirmed by a charter of his son John.

Also that they are exempt from toll, passage, and pontage throughout the king's lands, as well as of all customs. And that they may have all their liberties and exemptions, fully and honorably, just like [other] free and loyal men of the king.

And that they may have the city of Dublin, with its provostry and all other things pertaining to it.

Also [as clause 1 of the 1192 charter].

Also [as clause 2 of the 1192 charter].

Also [as clause 3 of the 1192 charter].

And [as clause 4 of the 1192 charter].

And [as clause 6 of the 1192 charter].

Also, that the hundred [court] be held once a fortnight.

Also [as clause 8 of the 1192 charter].

Also [as clause 9 of the 1192 charter].

And [as clause 10 of the 1192 charter].

And [as clause 12 of the 1192 charter].

Also [as clause 13 of the 1192 charter].

And [as clause 14 of the 1192 charter].

Also that no outsider retail wine from a ship, except for what is due regarding requisitioning of wine for the king.

And [as clause 16 of the 1192 charter].

Also [as clause 17 of the 1192 charter].

Also [as clause 18 of the 1192 charter].

And [as clause 19 of the 1192 charter].

Also [as clause 20 of the 1192 charter].

Also [as clause 21 of the 1192 charter].

Also [as clause 22 of the 1192 charter].

Also [as clause 23 of the 1192 charter].

And [as clause 24 of the 1192 charter].

Also [as clause 25 of the 1192 charter].

And [as clause 26 of the 1192 charter].

And [as clause 27 of the 1192 charter].

And that they may have an annual fair, as the king's charter acknowledges.

And that they may elect a mayor from among themselves, as [the king's charter] etc.

By communal decision on 24 September 1305 it was established that if anyone whose is qualified to be mayor absents himself without good reason on Michaelmas, he must give £10 towards repairs to the guildhall.

If anyone who might be elected as bailiff absents himself without good reason, he must give forty shillings.

And similarly if anyone who could be elected rent-collector absents himself, he must give twenty shillings.

And if the mayor is unwilling to levy these [fines], they are to be deducted from his salary.

It is further ordained that henceforth there are to be three nightwatchmen in the city, of whom one is to be in charge of [the sector] from Gormund's Gate to the great bridge, and thereby along the entire riverside as far as the small tower opposite the St. Olave's church, and [along] Cook Street as far as the gate mentioned.

The [sector of the] second nightwatchman begins at the New Gate, and from there along the high street, as far as the new tollhouse, and [then] as far as St. Patrick's Gate, including Rupelle Street and three lanes – viz. St. Audoenus lane, Gilmeholmok lane, and another lane leading to the house of Thomas le Marechal.

The third nightwatchman has charge from the new tollhouse, along the high street as far as Dame's Gate, and to the gate of the residence of master John de Kerdif, throughout the fishmarket, as far as St. Olave's tower, including two adjacent lanes, of which one stretches from the church of St. John in Boue Street as far as the gate in Tavern Street.

And each nightwatchman is to have three deputies accompanying him every night, and that nightwatchman shall be the fourth member of the party that day; if he refuses he shall be amerced sixpence.

Also, it is ordained that widows who are capable shall participate in the nightwatch, just as others of the neighbourhood, without any objections.

Also, it is ordained that they shall be as watchful for fires in shops as in houses.

Also that mayors and bailiffs do not have to participate in the nightwatch during times of crisis, [such as] when there is war.

Also, that every nightwatchman report all offences to the bailiffs, if they discover any.

Regulations ordained by the common council of the city of Dublin

It is established by the common council that if anyone speaks disparagingly of, or in any [other] way offends against, the mayor in any location outside the guildhall or tollhouse, he must give him 40s., and he is to be amerced by the bailiffs according to the seriousness of the offence, that is up to the amount of 20s.

If anyone speaks disparagingly of, or in any way offends against, the mayor while he is on the bench, he must give him £10.

If anyone speaks disparagingly of, or in any way offends against, a bailiff, he must give him 10s., and he is to be amerced by the bailiffs as above.

If a jurat speaks disparagingly of, or in any way offends against, his [fellow] jurat, he must give him 5s.

Also if one neighbour [does the same] against another, he must give him 2s.

It is established that the mayor may hold a council meeting once a week, on the Friday, or any other day if need requires it.

No butcher may buy or sell meat without first having come before the bailiffs and presented good and secure pledges that he will make amends and be answerable for his actions.

No baker is to bake bread without stamping it with his own seal; if he contravenes this, the bread is to be confiscated and he to be amerced.

A good quality goose is to sell for 2d.

Two good quality rabbits for three-halfpence; two of middling quality for 1d.

Three chickens for a penny.

A good quality hen for 1d.

Two good quality plovers for 1d.; three of middling quality for 1d.

Two good quality woodcocks for 1d.; three of middling quality for 1d.

Fish are not to be taken out of fish-ponds, but only from the sea or the river.

The same applies to butchers, upon pain of forfeiting them to the city.

If someone is lawfully summonsed and fails to appear, unless he is able to present a reasonable excuse, he is to be amerced 20d. If the mayor is reluctant to levy that money, he is to be compelled to pay it himself, and it is to be put towards [maintenance of] the city wall. For no reason is it to be pardoned.

If anyone brings a suit and proves before the bailiffs his right to a debt owed him, the one from whom the debt is sought shall not have a [right of] summons.

No-one is to share in the liberties of the city unless he pays towards aids and tallages, according to his means, just like other citizens residing in the city.

Meat is to be sold from stalls; if a butchers sells it elsewhere, the meat is to be confiscated and he amerced.

No sheep's pell is to be sold or worked in the city; if worked, then he who worked it shall be subject to amercement, and the fur worked treated as fake.

The same is to be done with regard to fraudulent cloth and inaccurate weights.

Let a record be made of the day when a ship arrives at the quay in the port carrying outsiders; they are to sell their merchandize within 40 days of the date recorded. From that point they may stay in the city, if they wish, for 40 days and no more, without permission from the mayor and bailiffs.

No ship is to have any cargo of merchandize unloaded until it has been assessed for customs purposes.

No-one is to retail salt from a ship.

No-one is to buy from foreigners – not at Dalkey nor elsewhere – wine, iron, salt, nor any other merchandize so as to forestall the city. If someone does so, he is to be amerced 20s. on the first occasion. If he does so a second time, he is to be amerced 40s. If a third time, he is to surrender the freedom of the city for a year and a day. With the exception of a ship which intends to unload elsewhere than in the port of Dublin.

No ale-wife is to use straw in her brewing; if she is found brewing with straw, she shall give 20s. as the amercement.

No regrater or regratress is to buy fish except after the third [hour], nor to forestall the city of fish, meat or any other foodstuff. He or she who does so is to be imprisoned for 40 days, or to give up that livelihood for a year and a day.

No baker is to buy grain outside the gates of the city, nor elsewhere, but only in the city marketplace; if he does so, he is to be amerced up to 20s.

No regrater is to buy hides except in the king's marketplace; whoever does so is to be imprisoned for 40 days. In regard to hides, it is to be understood that every hide has a value of threepence.

Lepers are not to come inside the city walls.

Everyone is to clean the street in front of his home; should he fail to do so, he is to be amerced twelve pence.

Fish are to be sold from the fish-stalls and not elsewhere from benches.

Fires are not to be lit in any shop unless it is [at least] ten feet wide.

If the sergeants whose duties include the killing of [stray] pigs are unwilling to do so, they are to be imprisoned for forty days.

No outhouse in the city may have a drainage channel that is open, upon fine of twenty shillings.

Should it happen that a house catches fire inside, and the fire or its flames are not seen [to spread] outside before the fire dies out, he [i.e. the householder] is to be amerced 20s.

And if the flames are seen [to spread] outside, he is to be amerced 40s.

And if the neighbourhood is set on fire by anyone, he is to be seized bodily and cast into the middle of the fire.

[No] woad-dealer, nor any outsider, may buy the hides off freshly butchered carcasses, nor may any butcher sell such fresh hides to outsiders.

No merchant of Chester may sell salt from a ship, but must unload it and have it put in storage before selling it.

There is no need to say anything here about the weighing of bread, but let such matters be handled as they were in times past.

Concerning the weaving of a cloth of a single colour, of 32 ells in length, 16d. [is the fee] for all work done.

For each ell of burel woven, three-farthings for all work done.

For fulling a cloth of 32 ells in length, 3s.

If the cloth is longer than 32 ells, the charge is by the ell.

It is established that each workman engaged in fulling shall have 2d. a day [as wages].

For dyeing a cloth of 32 ells, 3d. per ell.

For carding a stone of wool, 1d.

For transporting a tun of wine from the river as far as any house outside the walls, 3d.

And to within the walls, as far as the church of Holy Trinity, or an equivalent distance, 4d.

And as far as the high street, or elsewhere [passing] through the city, or an equivalent or greater distance (that is, within the walls), 6d.

For loading a tun in a ship, 4d.

For loading a tun onto a cart, 3d.

To porters, for each wey of salt carried as far as the city marketplace, 3d. For a wey of iron carried as far as that marketplace, 3½d.

If any rascal says something slanderous about any man or woman of good reputation, he is to be imprisoned for 40 days.

If a woman is discovered making ale of substandard quality, on the first occasion she is to be amerced 15d. On the second occasion, 2s.6d. At the third offence she is to give up that livelihood for a year and a day.

No currier is to cure leather beneath solars; if one does so, he is to be put in prison.

No-one is to receive fish in his house from any stranger, for purposes of selling it; if such is discovered, he is to forfeit all the fish.

DISCUSSION

Dublin's name, like that of King's Lynn, has its derivation from a Celtic term for a pool (linn) of water which formed, in part due to tidal erosion, where the River Poddle joined the River Liffey, in turn emptying into the bay which was, in those times, closer to the centre of Dublin than it is today. By the eighth century there were Gaelic settlements on either side of the Poddle, one apparently with the name of Dublin. The "dark pool" after which it was named offered a safe haven with good proximity to the sea for the ships of the Vikings, who had begun to raid the Irish coast from the late eighth century, and access to the rich hinterland via the rivers. Some established a fortified base there in 841, from which to conduct raids elsewhere along the Irish or Scottish coast. Although Dublin was conquered by an Irish alliance, the Norse reasserted themselves and ca.917 established a new settlement beside their earlier base, to become the centre of a Viking kingdom stretching along the coast. Relying in part on the growth of local industries, it developed trading relations with other Norse bases along Ireland's east coast, with England (Northumbria and York, itself the seat of a Viking kingdom), and with western English ports, notably Bristol. It has been argued that Dublin, lying on the south bank of the Liffey, can be considered as a town from the point of this resettlement.

From the late eleventh century, Dublin became subordinated to Irish kings, but the political situation in Ireland was one of fragmented authority. With the Pope's approval, Henry II intervened in Irish affairs in 1170 by allowing one of the warring Irish kings to recruit Anglo-Norman allies, and then in the following year, and eager to escape the furour following the murder of Becket, by leading additional troops himself in an invasion. The Irish gradually submitted to Henry and the lieutenants he left behind to continue the conquest. While granting Irish lands to his Norman barons, Henry reserved Dublin and other towns under his jurisdiction.

In 1171 or 1172 Henry granted the city itself to "his men of Bristol", although as indicated by a roll of names of (apparently) members of the merchant gild, dating to the late twelfth or early thirteenth century, Dublin attracted colonists from many towns in England – particularly the more westerly – and southern Wales. The Norse and Irish residents of Dublin were obliged to relocate to a site outside the walls, on the north bank of the Liffey, thus excluding them from a role in development of urban institutions; meanwhile the intra-mural property was divided up into burgage plots for the new settlers. Subsequently the area between the wall (itself dating to ca.1100) and the riverside was reclaimed for settlement and in order to establish a quayside that would accommodate the English ships, which had a deeper draught than Norse vessels, and in the latter stages of rebuilding the walls – a necessity in the often tense political situation – they were extended to protect this riverfront suburb, probably in the early fourteenth century.

The grant of Dublin to Bristol men included the right to all liberties and customs to which they had been entitled in Bristol, thus providing a model for constitutional development. In 1183 Bristol came under the lordship of Henry's son John, by right of marriage. Henry sent John to Ireland as his governor in 1185; although John's failure in the role led to his recall, he retained the lordship. He therefore retained a strong interest in Irish affairs, not least in the Dubliners who were his men. The charter of 1192 identified explicitly the various jurisdictions and privileges that the citizens might exercise through local government, although to what extent these were grants or just recognitions is more difficult to say. This was a relatively full set of privileges, as appropriate for the centre of the English colonization effort, in which Dublin held a position similar to that of London in England. Modelled on a charter John had granted to Bristol ca.1188 (with additions), it can be seen as part of a broader policy of extending English institutions and practices to Ireland. As can be seen from the later compilation of city liberties, the charters of Henry II and John formed the basis of the city constitution.

Those basic privileges were supplemented, in the later listings of liberties and ordinances (probably compiled in the early fourteenth century, as part of a book of memoranda), by responses to much the same concerns that can be seen in English towns:

- providing for the security of the community at night;
- discouraging negligent or irresponsible behaviours that could lead to unsanitary conditions or the outbreak of fires;
- assuring that necessaries, notably victuals, were sold only in open market and were of good quality and reasonable price;
- creating conditions that gave advantages to local traders over visiting merchants;
- ensuring that all citizens were prepared to perform communal duties;
- encouraging special respect for local authority.

NOTES

"perambulated"

Perambulations were periodic formal tours – on foot or horseback – of urban boundaries by officials, intended to assert and remind. The sporadic records of such events do not make it clear whether these were conducted regularly as a matter of form, or perhaps were prompted by some challenge or uncertainty. Probably the motive varied from place to place, but by the close of the Middle Ages a perambulation – now having become an elaborate ceremony – seems to have been taking place about every three years. The route of the perambulation in 1488 was as follows. The procession left the inner city via Dame's Gate, the city's eastern gate, and travelled along the Steine (a long piece of land marked by a tall stone, said to have been erected by the Vikings) passing the priory of All Saints (and the Thingmount, although this is not mentioned) en route. Then along the bank of the Liffey as far as Ringsend, and continuing along the southern strand as far as it went. They then backtracked to Merrion and headed west to Our Lady's Well, then proceeded to Simmonscourt, where they traversed the green and crossed a ford at Donnybrook. From there they went to St. Kevin's Gate, and then headed north as far as the road by St. Sepulchre's, heading past that and St. Patrick's. The route is then more difficult to identify, as it refers to lands or houses of individuals, rather than landmarks. At length they made their way through the Combe (the valley mentioned in 1192) and then via Cow Lane to Dolphin's Barn. From there past Kilmainham to Glasnevin, passing the gallows of St. Mary's abbey, and to the Tolka. Crossing which, they headed south towards the sea, then followed the Liffey back to the abbey grounds (where the abbot unsuccessfully challenged the accuracy of that part of the route).

"reputable citizens"

The original, per sacramentum proborum virorum de civitate may indicate that certain citizens performed the perambulation under an oath to do the job honestly, or possibly that the boundaries were attested to by a kind of jury.

"Kilmerecaregan"

Samuel Fitzpatrick identified this as "Kilmakergan (between Ranelagh and Leeson Park)".

"Renniuelan"

Ringsend, a point of land projecting out into the bay and used for the herring fishery.

"Karnanclonegunethe"

The district now known as Dolphin's Barn, named after a 13th century family Dolfyn, according to Francis Ball.

"gallows"

Assuming furcas to refer to this, rather than a crossroads or fork in the road, the description of the boundary seems to have moved from west to east, for the city gallows were located east of the settlement, just beyond the hill where the Norse held their communal gatherings (Thingmount); but these were perhaps a different gallows, as the 1488 itinerary suggests.

"Oxmantown"

This is a corruption of the medieval name Houstmanebi (Ostmanby); it refers to the location at which the Norse (Easterlings – men from the East) were resettled.

"murdrum"

A murder-fine, a penalty imposed on the entire community when a murder could not be solved; the Leges Henrici Primi prescribed a fine of 46 marks if the guilty party was not captured within a week. See Medieval Sourcebook.

"trial by battle"

Trial by combat was a judicial duel, in which accused and accuser fought with weapons until one was killed or surrendered. If the defeated party was the accused, he stood convicted of the crime; if the accuser, the accused was judged innocent. Exemptions from this mode of trial were common features of early royal charters to towns; the exemption may have applied particularly to cases under the jurisdiction of royal courts, with local custom perhaps already excluding battle as an option (e.g. the ipswich custumal, although we cannot be certain of the antiquity of its prohibition).

"exempt from toll"

Exemption was the core element of a second charter that Henry II had granted to the colonists, although he had been able to extend it throughout England, Wales, Ireland and Normandy.

"lastage, passage, pontage"

Special tolls on mercantile cargoes.

"shall be excused"

The courts had discretionary powers to reduce an amercement or even waive it (notably in cases of poverty), and it was commonly done, except where the convicted party proved hostile to the court's authority, in cases of repeat offences, or for certain offences against the community considered heinous.

"miskening"

This was making a mistake in the correct formula necessary for stating a plea in court, or in the facts given when stating a plea; such a mistake might forfeit the case for the pleader, lead to the case being transferred to a higher court, or at least result in a fine.

"things they pledge"

Items they surrender temporarily as guarantees for fulfilling legal obligations.

"related goods"

I.e. those of the individual who took the toll or, failing that, other members of the community where toll was taken.

"retail wine"

The original habeat tabernam de vino refers not to holding a tavern in the later sense of a building, but of setting out wine for sale in some specific place.

"retail"

vendat ... ad decisionem, literally to sell cloths which had been cut into smaller pieces.

"acknowledgement of lordship"

I.e. that no citizen could become the vassal of a lord in such a way as to lose his free status.

"legitimate"

I infer from the original racionabiles that this clause recognized existing guilds (such as the merchant guild), and possibly permitted the formation of future guilds by communal agreement, without giving any support to unauthorized attempts by interest groups to form guilds.

"common agreement of the city"

This probably refers to any customs or bylaws made by the city to govern real estate transactions.

"gardens"

Not in the modern ornamental or recreational sense, but in the sense of land where plants or trees were grown to furnish domestic or commercial needs.

"upon the river"

I am uncertain whether super ripam may refer to structures such as quays (over the water) or warehouses (beside the river), and so have opted for an ambiguous translation; the reference to the risk of damage makes me favour quays, however, as these might be potential obstructions to river traffic. It should be kept in mind that this clause, as with many others in the charter, was derived almost verbatim from the 1188 charter to Bristol, and so we should not look for special local significance to Dublin.

"communal dues" "city customs"

The use of consuetudinibus in these contexts probably refers to the customary payments due from each member of, or household in, the community. This clause limited the number of non-contributory residents or tenements.

"provostry"

This refers to the right to an (elected) executive officer to govern the city, granted by John in 1215 as a concomitant of the grant of fee farm.

"fair"

This was granted in the 1215 charter and was to last for two weeks in May.

"mayor"

In 1229 the citizens were able to obtain this right (or recognition of a fact) by forgiving a debt of £312 owed them for supporting a military campaign of the king's justiciar; the wealthier citizens who had loaned this money were to recoup to via a tax on the Dublin community. Such a concession might not have been obtained without so strong a financial incentive, for just a few years later Bristol was refused the right to elect a mayor (even though it appears to have been doing so, without official countenance, for over a decade).

"Michaelmas"

29 September was a common date set for election, or assumption of office, of urban executives.

"deputies"

Vigilantes; whether paid assistants or unpaid citizens doing communal duty is not evident.

"common council"

A council of 24 jurats was in existence; a "common council" in the more technical sense of a lower chamber is not known to have existed until later in the fourteenth century.

"on the bench"

I.e. sitting in the guildhall (or tollhouse?) in the performance of his duties.

"£10"

An ordinance the following year halved this penalty, but added a 10s. penalty for those trying to avoid election as jurat.

"make amends"

I.e. in the event of him being convicted of any occupational abuse.

"summonsed"

I.e. the defendant shall not be able to delay the case by claiming he received no official summons to court.

"sheep's pell"

furura de multone may refer to a particular low-quality type of wool-pell, such as that of a wether, or perhaps the use of the pell to line clothing.

"fraudulent cloth"

The reference is either to the quality of the cloth (or its finishing) or to non-standard sizes of the pieces.

"forestall the city"

I.e. pre-empt the right of fellow citizens to purchase a share of the cargo, by arranging to buy it before it reached the city port.

"third hour"

The third hour after dawn was likely when the market opened for trading.

"benches"

The Latin super scamellum might be translated "from [other] stalls", although there is clearly some differentiation being made with the stallagiis piscium, leading me to think that scamellum is being used to refer to smaller, more portable furniture on which fish might be displayed for sale.

"shop"

The term selda refers to a structure more elaborate than a stall, in that it was more enclosed, but not necessarily part of a permanent edifice.

"the killing of pigs"

Public proclamation was made quarterly that no-one should allow pigs to roam loose. A pig found loose meant a fine for its owner on the first two occasions; if found loose a third time, the pig could be killed.

"set afire by anyone"

In the context of the previous two clauses, this clause may refer less to arson than to the spread of fire from the offender's own house (the charge being negligence causing damage). The person responsible for the fire could, if apprehended at the scene, be cast into it by the city sergeant; if the culprit fled but was subsequently captured and proved responsible for the fire, it was a hanging offence. This reflects the seriousness of fire in a society without effective means of fire suppression. A marginal note indicates that at some later date the offender was permitted to commute the harsh punishment by paying a fine of 100s.

"woad-dealer"

If this is the correct translation of waydarius here, it is probably because woad was imported mostly by merchants of Normandy, Picardy, and the Hanse; the alternative translation of "widower" would be implausible in this context.

"put in storage"

hospitetur may refer to a practice of hosting by local merchants.

"ells"

An ell was a measure of length about 45 inches.

"burel"

A coarse woollen cloth.

"tun"

A large cask of about 252 gallons capacity.

"solars"

The upper (living) quarters of a house, often jettied.

TRANSLATION

Whoever wishes to make a good choice of a sovereign governor, having station and jurisdiction, should pay attention to the points that follow.

1. The three foundations on which the government of towns should be based.

All lordships, all stations, are delegated by the sovereign Father [i.e. the Pope]. Within the holy establishment of the things of this age, he wishes that the government of cities should be supported on three pillars: that is, justice, reverence, and love. A governor should have justice so firmly set within his heart that he does right to everyone, and does not show favour to one side or the other. For Solomon says that a just king will never bring misfortune. Reverence is the part of burgesses and subjects, for it above all other things of the world is most compatible with the merits of faith, and overcomes all hardships. It is for this reason that the Apostles say "Honour your Lord." Love ought to exist in one party and the other. For the sovereign ought to love his subjects wholeheartedly and with a clear faith, and look after the common profit of the city and all its people by day and by night. On the other side, the subjects should love their sovereign loyally and honestly, and give him advice and support to maintain him in office. For, in that he is only one man among their number, he could not do or accomplish anything without them. Because the mayor or the governor is, as it were, the head of the citizens, and everyone wants to have a sound head – for, when the head is ailing all the members become afflicted in consequence – and because above all they should make sure that they have such a governor as will lead them in the right direction, according to right, reason, and justice, they should not select him by lot or by luck, but through the foresight of wise and informed counsel. In which selection, they should pay attention to 12 things.

2. Twelve things to consider when making an election.

The first is, as Aristotle says, that men acquire wisdom through long experience of many things, and no-one can acquire such experience except through a long life. Thus it appears that young men cannot be wise, even though they have the means to gain knowledge. For this reason Solomon says that it is bad for a country to have a young king. Nonetheless, a man may be of great age yet little sense; for which reason the burgesses should choose a sovereign who is young in neither one nor the other.

The second is, that they give consideration not to his or his family's power, but to the nobility of his heart and to the honourableness of his behaviour and his life, and to his ability to perform virtuous acts in his household and in his other positions of authority. For the house should gain renown for a good master, not the master for a good house. If his nobility comes not only from his family connections but also from his strength [of character] and his heart, his worth is that much more complete.

The third is, that he be just. For Tully says that intelligence without justice is not intelligence, but malevolence, and that nothing can be worthwhile without justice.

The fourth thing is, that he have sufficient ability and subtlety of understanding to determine the whole truth in things, to easily understand and know what is the right thing to do, and to perceive the reason behind things. For to be deceived through lack of knowledge can lead to disaster.

The fifth is, that he have strength and resolve from greatness of heart, rather than from malevolence or vainglory; and that he not readily believe anything anyone tells him. There was once a city of which no-one could be the ruler unless he were the best. As long as this custom lasted, nothing but good happened to the community – for he who does not think more of himself than he is worth ought to be honoured for what he is worth. For a person should not be considered a reputable man because of his status, but because of what he does. The wise man prefers to be [\[judged\]](#) a lord by his acts than by his looks.

The sixth is, that he not be driven by avarice or by other desires. For these are two things which lead to a sovereign's downfall. It is very dishonourable, for one who does not allow himself to give way to fear, to be overcome by greed; or, for one who does not allow himself to be defeated by great challenges, to be conquered by his desires. Rather, a man must diligently guard against being too covetous of position; for very often it turns out that such men are not the most suitable.

The seventh is, that he be a good speaker. For it is required of a governor that he speak better than anyone else, since all the world believes to be wise he who speaks wisely. But above all it is necessary that he guard against saying too much, for garulity leads to indiscretion. Just as a single [\[out-of-tune\]](#) string can make an entire lute sound discordant, so one unfortunate word can be the undoing of a rational argument.

The eighth is, that he not spend extravagantly, nor deplete or waste his resources. For all who do so have to resort to robbery or plunder. Nonetheless, he should not shun that vice [\[of spending\]](#) to such a degree that he becomes too much the reverse or too parsimonious – for this is the thing that places the worst stain on the reputation of a ruler.

The ninth is, that he not be too quick-tempered, and that he not let his anger or foul moods last too long. For when anger governs a ruler it is like a thunderbolt which allows no time for truth to be told or a just judgement made.

The tenth is, that he be rich and magnanimous. For if he is well-endowed with other virtues, it is likely that he will not have been corrupted by money. Nonetheless, I have more praise for the good poor man than for an evil rich one.

The eleventh is, that he not hold any other office. For it cannot be believed that one man might be capable of [exercising] two, nor of more than the government of a populace.

The twelfth is the most important of all: that he keep faith with God and the people. For without faith and without loyalty, upright [government] is never maintained.

3. Concerning discords and hostilities that arise in cities through the negligence of rulers.

These [above] virtues, and others, are what good citizens ought to take into account before electing their mayor – that is, he should possess many virtues and few vices. Yet most people do not pay attention to his manners nor his virtues, but confine themselves to the wealth and power he commands, and are often misled as a result. The reason that fighting and hatred have so greatly increased, here and in other cities and towns, is because of division within the community and different preferences of the burgesses, who are [split] into two parties.

Whichever [party] loses, even though it is to the benefit of the other, it is inevitable that ill-will results. On the other hand, if the governor is not very wise, he may incur the resentment and bad opinion of those who elected him, to the point that those from whom he hoped for support prove to be his undoing.

4. The procedure by which a new mayor ought to be chosen, when an election must be held.

When the time comes to elect a new governor for the coming year, the sovereign should call together the council of reputable men of the town who are most familiar with its constitution. The choice should be made on their advice, according to the ordinance already established. If, however, the citizens wish to have as governor for the coming year the same man who was so during the past year, I recommend that he not undertake the government if he can honorably avoid it. For a second term in office is unlikely to win widespread support.

5. The manner in which a mayor ought to conduct himself and act towards those over whom he rules, on his last day in power when he must resign his office.

When the last day of his term of office arrives, he should call together the good men of the community and, to win the citizens' love and goodwill, say a few gracious and agreeable words to them: remind them of the benefits they have acquired during his term; thank them for the support and respect they have shown to him and his [officers?]; dedicate himself and all his efforts throughout his life to the honour of the community; and request the chamberlain, and other worthies [i.e. of local government], that all [legal] disputes and pleas introduced before him during his term be brought to a conclusion through just judgements. And, the better to win over the hearts of the people, he should say that if anyone, contrary to his [burgess'] oath, has committed an offence against him through ignorance, negligence, or any other reason, he forgives him – unless it be a murderer, robber, or other wrongdoer convicted by the town for offending against the well-being of the community. On no account should he forget to say that if he has done anything beneficial to the community, he is well satisfied; and that concerning any offence he may have committed, unreasonably or contrary to town laws, he is very sorry about it and is ready to make amends as best he can, to the greatest and the least, at any time. Then, he should pray God to give them such a governor who is wiser and can lead them better than he was able to during his term; and then commend them, great and small, to God and offer them his thanks and good wishes.

6. The manner in which every good mayor should conduct himself among his subjects, during the term of his mayoralty.

Keep in mind, you who govern the city, the holy oath you made when you took the office of your rule. Keep in mind the law and its injunctions, and do not forget God and the saints; rather, go often to church and pray to God for yourself and your subjects. For the prophet David says that unless the Lord watches over the city, they labour in vain who guard it. [Therefore?] Honour the pastors of Holy Church; for God himself said: "He who receiveth you, receiveth me."

Be religious and manifest your faith, for there is no better thing in an earthly prince than to have righteous and true belief; it is written, "When a just king sits on the throne, no evil can assail him." For this [reason], protect the Church, the house of God. Protect widows and orphans, for it is written, "Be defenders of widows and orphans"; that is, you should defend their rights against wicked acts of the powerful, [but] not to the extent that the powerful lose their rights because of the tears of the weak. For you have under your protection the great, the small, and the middling. Therefore it is incumbent:

- that you take office with a pure heart and good intentions;
- that your hands to be clean [of any offence] towards anyone, before God and before the law;
- that you defend community property, and give to each what belongs to him;
- that you ensure to the best of your ability that there be neither hostilities nor disputes among your subjects;
- and, if there is, that you show no favouritism to one side over the other, not for money, nor for women, nor for anything else;
- that you listen diligently to pleas and complaints;
- that you bring petty quarrels to a swift resolution, without [aggravating] strife;
- that you carry out all [duties] written in the books and ordinances of the town;
- that you maintain community works and structures, and have repaired the bridges, roads, ditches and other things.

Do not allow wrongdoers to escape without punishment; in particular you should be uncompromising in passing sentence – according to the law and the usages of the town – on murderers, traitors, those who rape maidens, and who commit other such crimes. Control your officers in such a way that they do no wrong to anyone. Keep around you such counsellors as are good and wise, men of principle, and loyal to yourself. Behave so as to seem terrible to the bad, and agreeable to the good. Furthermore, take care that you remain well-endowed with virtues and free of vices.

You should beware of [committing] those things [i.e. vices] which you command others to guard against; according to the words of the Apostle: "Henceforth I will chasten my body and bring it into subjection, so that it be not damned for chastening others." Cato says that it is an awful thing for a master to have an accusation turned back against himself; yet, to tell the truth, whoever so turns it deserves praise. For to speak fair yet behave badly only serves to condemn oneself by one's own words. From now on you should guard against drunkenness, pride, anger, deceitfulness, avarice, covetousness, and lewdness. For each of these is a mortal sin in God's eyes, and can easily result in a governor falling from power.

In particular you should beware of talking too much. For he who says little, but says it well, is considered a wise man; talkativeness always reveals flaws. You should also beware of laughing too much; for it is written that laughter comes from the mouth of a fool. Despite this, you may laugh and amuse yourself well enough upon occasion, but not in such a way as a child or a woman, nor laughter as seems feigned or contemptuous. He who is good at other things will be that much more held in awe if he presents a serious countenance, particularly when he is sitting in judgement. Also, you should not sing your own praises, even though good folk praise you; and do not be annoyed if bad folk fail to praise you. Beware of charlatans who flatter you to your face. Rely on your own opinion of yourself, rather than that of others. And be as sorry to be praised by bad folk as you would be by your own bad deeds.

Also, guard against justice being bought for money, for the law forbids it. Also, ensure that you keep yourself detached from your subjects, or you will arouse resentment or suspicion. Also, beware of desiring offerings from any whom you govern; for a man who receives a gift or a service has sold his freedom, and acquires from it an obligation just like a debt.

7. The differences that experts have found between governors.

According to what wise masters say, there tend to be great differences among governors, with some preferring to be feared than loved, and others wishing more to be loved than feared. Those who are feared wish to be known for great rigourness; because they want to appear stern and severe, they inflict on their subjects harsh punishments and suffering – for by so doing they imagine that men will fear them the more. The masters prove this by the arguments of Seneca, who says: that withholding punishment corrupts cities; that [tolerating] an abundance of wrongdoers encourages habits of wrongdoing; that he who is made to suffer harshly loses the resolve of his malevolence; that mild behaviour from a ruler dispels a malefactor's feelings of shame; that [a man] more fears a punishment imposed by his ruler than [one imposed] by his friend; that the more openly that suffering is inflicted, the more others profit from the example; and that everyone dreads the severe, the tough-minded, and punishment.

Against this [line of argument], others say that it is more effective to be loved than feared, since love cannot exist without fear, but fear may well exist without love. Tully says that there is no surer way in the world to protect one's situation than being loved, nothing more dreadful than to be feared. For anyone hates him whom he fears, and he whom everyone hates is apt to come to ruin; no riches can withstand the hatred of many. Cruelty is an enemy of [human] nature. It is inevitable that someone will fear him or those by whom he wishes to be feared; power that relies on fear never lasts long. Each punishment should be inflicted without injustice, not for [the benefit of] the ruler, but for the good of the community; nor should it be more than warranted by the offence. Nor ought anyone to be condemned for the crimes of others. No government should be irrational or negligent.

Tully says, "Beware that you do nothing for which you cannot show the reason." Seneca says that he does wrong who caters to his reputation rather than to his conscience; and that cruelty is nothing more than hard-heartedness and [satisfaction in] heavy punishments. For which reason I say that he who is immoderate is cruel. Plato says that a wise man does not pass sentence because an offence was committed, but so that it not be committed again thereafter.

8. The difference between a king and a tyrant.

What difference is there between a king and a tyrant? They are equal in fortune and power. But the tyrant commits bloody deeds for his own gratification, whereas the king does it out of necessity. The one is loved, the other feared – the latter considered comparable to a bad father who every day openly beats and is severe with his child. The surest safeguard in the world is the love of the citizens, something that gives rise to the most wonderful thing in this worldly life: that everyone wishes you to live [forever]. Those words are the key to understanding this debate. For clemency, which is the opposite of cruelty, is the curbing of the heart in regard to the pain it can inflict. Tully says that the best characteristics in a ruler are clemency and pity, if they are associated with justice; without which, the city cannot be governed.

Seneca says, "When it is my time to sit in judgement in the city, I discover so many vices among the populace that, to cure the evils, it is necessary that some be remedied through reprimand, others by exile and banishment, others by pain, others by poverty [i.e. heavy fines], and others by harsh punishment. Although I have to go ahead and condemn them, I will not proceed through anger or cruelty; rather, I proceed through the course of law, according to the guidance of wise men – a way of judgement not motivated by contempt or by anger against evil-doers."

It is not appropriate for a governor either to be wholly cruel or always showing clemency. For it is as cruel to pardon everyone as it is to pardon no-one. But it is an act of high clemency to confound offenders by pardoning them. Therefore I say that no-one should pardon a misdeed; for the judge condemns himself by absolving an wrong-doer. At the same time, he should not be too cruel; for no punishment should be greater than the crime [warrants], or should be inflicted on the innocent. For if [such] a penalty is [inflicted] corporally, then it is homicide; and if monetary, restitution ought to be made.

DISCUSSION

This extract from London's Liber Custumarum (Book of Customs), a reference-book style compilation, was not an English product but taken from Li Livres dou Trésor, an encyclopedic and widely-circulated work written (ca.1265) in French by a Florentine moralist and conservative populist, Brunetto Latini (d. 1294), who was later mentor to Dante. Latini trained as a notary and served the Republic of Florence, during a turbulent time in its political history, as secretary (i.e. head of its chancellery) as well as advisor, ambassador and once on the chief executive body of the city. He therefore had a strong sense both of urban administration and of civic community – which he considered the fundamental expression of politics – as opposed to an aristocratic form of government, in which he saw no inherent political virtues. His Trésor, however, was written during a period of exile, before he became a leading member of the Florentine administration, and was coloured by his own experience of partisan strife in Italian cities.

The Trésor was translated into other languages. It was targeted at an audience of townspeople – both rulers and ruled. Latini had doubtless seen executive office taken by men whom he, as one schooled in administration, considered wanting in governmental experience. Although wide-ranging, the Trésor's preoccupation was with the political and ethical problems faced by urban government, and for the most part it dealt with the subject from a very practical, if conservative, standpoint. He accepted the natural stratifications of society, and saw it as the role of the ruler to achieve a balance between the interests of the different groups. He emphasised particularly adherence to the rule of law as a counter to decision-making of a more arbitrary nature based on personal partialities, partisanship, or emotional inclinations, which he considered the trademark of a tyrant. As an educated man and a professional administrator himself, he favoured the selection of rulers from a meliocracy of the wisest and most capable, and believed that the uneducated masses were susceptible to deceit by eminent men who were more show than substance.

Not surprising, then, that this primer came to the attention of the London authorities, although how is less easy to explain; perhaps one of the orders of friars, who were known for their intellectual pursuits, was the importing agency. Nor surprising that it interested the authorities, or at least one member, enough to copy into a volume apparently known as the Liber Legum Antiquorum Regum (Book of Laws of Ancient Kings), which was in post-medieval times dismantled and parts bound up with parts of a similarly dismantled Liber Custumarum. Both volumes, like the Trésor, bear witness to attention being paid to the craft and the professionalization of government, and their compilation may have been associated with the administrative reforms of the 1320s. Perhaps an initiative, it has been argued, of chamberlain Andrew Horn and town clerk Hugh de Waltham. Horn is suspected to have been not only a compiler of the Liber Custumarum, but a set of guidelines to prepare the city to face a dreaded eyre, a chronicle of London, and an idiosyncratic legal treatise; at his death in 1328 he bequeathed the city archives some of those works, along with other historical and legal works. Waltham spent the last 45 years of his life in the city bureaucracy and oversaw a number of reforms in administrative record-keeping; he married into the aldermannic class and acquired substantial property in the city.

These may have been the men who felt that Latini's treatise captured their own perspective on what made for good urban government; the political perspective of Latini is not incompatible with that expressed in the Mirror of Justices of which Horn may have been the author. The version in the Liber Custumarum is imperfect, in that it has been edited somewhat, parts rearranged slightly, and other parts omitted, according to what was considered applicable to the local situation; but it is the version London's rulers had for their guidance. The London transcriber, seeing it as a useful manual or code of conduct for the election of London's mayors and for their moral behaviour during their term of office, also substituted in the earlier chapters Meyre for the original terms (notably podestà) used to denote persons of authority, and made other minor changes to remove the geographic and historical context of the original.

Although Latini was writing from his experience of the Italian communal regimes of mid-13th century – an environment which gave rise to a number of treatises on civic government – evidently the concepts he conveyed were harmonious with political philosophy, such as it was, in English towns. A number are also expressed within the customs and ordinances of London and other towns, such as for example the obligation of a ruler to protect widows and orphans; we should beware, however, of inferring from that evidence any direct influence – both sources simply indicate political ideology of the period. At the same time, we should remember that, even though only an extract was copied into official London records, the administration or one of its members had presumably owned a complete copy of the Trésor, with all the other political advice it dispensed, perhaps since years before the compilation of the Liber Legum Antiquorum Regum.

A separate indication of the concern of Londoners for the characteristics of their rulers – perhaps even an echo of Latini's recommendations – is seen in the discussion in city records of the nature of aldermannic office and the requirements for its candidates:

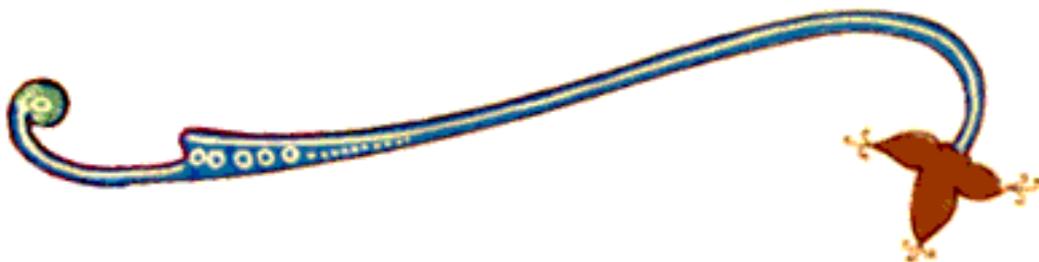

"For no-one is to be accepted as an alderman unless he has no physical deformities, is sensible and judicious in his thinking, is well-to-do, morally sound, trustworthy, and free – there being no suggestion whatsoever of a low-born or servile background. This to avoid any disgrace or scandal that, should he be susceptible to reproach because of his ancestry, might reflect shame on the other aldermen and the whole city."

Liber Albus [ed. Riley, 1859, p.33, my translation]

And the author of the late thirteenth century London chronicle in Liber de Antiquis Legibus also expresses political attitudes – attributing them to some of his fellow Londoners – compatible with Latini's philosophy.

Towards the close of the Middle Ages we see a further reflection of the virtues of good government. The facade of the south porch of the Guildhall was adorned with statues representing Law, Learning, Justice, Discipline, Temperance and Fortitude.

Given that a number of towns consulted the London authorities and archives on constitutional matters – such as Lynn and Norwich in the context of constitutional disputes of the early 15th century – it is not impossible that Latini's advice came to their attention. We may perhaps see a reflection of this in the mayoral speeches, similar to that proposed by Latini, recorded in Lynn's assembly records of the 1420s and in the account of mayoral elections in Ricart's Kalendar.

NOTES

"sovereign"

Soverain here has not the restrictive sense in which we use it today, to refer to a king or queen, but means "supreme ruler" in the sense of a town's or city's chief executive officer (as opposed to other, non-supreme, rulers – such as members of the urban council).

"station and jurisdiction"

Dignete is the actual term used in the original, which I have translated in this document as "station" or "position"; the term refers to the dignity, or social respect, associated with high office. The term which I have rendered as "jurisdiction" in the title, and also elsewhere (in its verb form) as "delegated", is in the original "baillie", whence a bailiff.

"Solomon says"

Riley was uncertain to what the first attribution to Solomon refers. It might perhaps be 1 Kings 1:52 "And Solomon said, If he will shew himself a worthy man, there shall not an hair of him fall to the earth: but if wickedness shall be found in him, he shall die." The second attribution to Solomon is, Riley believes, from Ecclesiastes 10:16 "Woe to thee, O land, when thy king is a child, and thy princes eat in the morning!"

"the Apostles say"

Riley believed the attribution to the Apostle to be an allusion to 1 Peter 2:17 "Honour all men. Love the brotherhood. Fear God. Honour the king."

"head"

The head-body metaphor was a common one in medieval political theory.

"lute"

The term in the original for which I have substituted "lute" (as something more readily intelligible to the modern reader) is "cytole" – an instrument, similar in shape to a lute, except for having a flat back (which may make it one of the ancestors of the guitar).

"reputable men"

Beyond what I have proposed as the characteristics connoted by prodeshommes, the term as used here is further qualified by reference to them being the townsmen the most knowledgeable about the city's laws (a characteristic to be expected of councillors); this phrase is very similar to one used a few years later in the preface to the redrafted Ipswich customal. See also my definition of the related term discretiores.

"David says"

Latini's paraphrase of David is from the opening of Psalm 127: "Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it: except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain."

"it is written"

Riley believes the quotation about a just king to be an allusion to Proverbs 20:8 "A king that sitteth in the throne of judgment scattereth away all evil with his eyes."

"it is incumbent"

The various responsibilities of a ruler are not in the original presented as an itemized list; I have rendered them so here to improve readability.

"words of the Apostle"

Riley identifies the allusion as to 1 Corinthians 9:27 "But I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection: lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway."

"it is written"

Riley identified Ecclesiastes 7:6 "For as the crackling of thorns under a pot, so is the laughter of the fool: this also is vanity."

"keep yourself detached"

The point here seems to be that, were the ruler to be seen to be too companionable with some of those he rules, it might lead to suspicion of favouritism and to faction (Edward II provides an example of this in action).

"Cruelty"

Cruelte here means cruelty not (in most instances) in the most common modern sense of causing pain and suffering for delight or through indifference, so much as the merciless infliction of corporal punishment. It is in this sense that a ruler might be fier – a term here translated, severally, as rigorous, stern or harsh – or motivated by orgueil, pride in the sense of a belief in one's moral superiority, which causes one to be contemptuous of law-breakers.

"high clemency"

This sentence seems to be at odds with the rest of the paragraph. Riley thought the text defective here. But perhaps Latini was being sarcastic (unlikely), or meant that true clemency comes from avoiding the mistake of granting pardons. Latini partly had in mind, in this paragraph, the influence of eminent men in obtaining pardon for their crimes; hence his earlier admonition to the ruler not to maintain close personal friendships during his term of office, which might encourage him to bend the law to help out friends.

"legal treatise"

The authorship of Mirror of Justices is uncertain; Horn's name is certainly connected with it, but whether as author or as possessor of a copy is not clear. Although the work acquired some attention in the post-medieval period, only the single medieval copy is known, increasing the probability the work is of Horn's authorship. It is a strange perspective on English common law, full of contradictions, with much being presented as the reverse of the actual situation – truly a mirror image. Its editor, Maitland, was mystified as to whether it might have been intended as some kind of satire written by a too-clever young man in possession of that dangerous commodity, a little learning; or whether a diatribe against the administration of royal officials, couched for safety's sake in a romanticized treatise of what the author thought the law ought to be. If indeed written by Horn at an early stage of his life, before he had acquired the wisdom suggested by his later compilations, it was perhaps a revival of that youthful mixture of mischievousness and idealism which led him, as he approached a state when he would be beyond the reach of worldly authorities, to pass along Mirror of Justices to the civic authorities, to make of it what they would.

On 2 March 1352 at the morningspeech held in the Leicester gildhall, Robert de Coventria, mercer of Leicester, was accused before William le Goldsmyth then mayor of Leicester, Thomas de le Grove bailiff, John Hayward receiver, [\[and 21 others named, probably all jurats\]](#), of having been summoned to the gildhall by order of the mayor and jurats, by William Aldyth the sergeant of the mayor, jurats and community, and having contemptuously refused to obey the summons. Therefore they ruled that he should be deprived of his gild [\[membership\]](#). At this, Robert pledged a hundred shillings for his offence, which was respited contingent upon [\[future good\]](#) behaviour, except for 6s.8d, for the payment of which he has as guarantors John de Tirlyngton and Nicholas Hendeman.

[\[October 1355:\]](#) Richard Norman, one of the jurats, was accused of a trespass against the mayor, in the form of inappropriate comments. For which offence he pledged to the mayor a pipe of wine, \[payment of] which is respited.

[...]

[November 1355:] Robert de Wylughby was accused before John de Petlyng then mayor of Leicester, Geoffrey de Kent, William le Goldsmyth, William de Dunstable, Robert Porter, John Coc, Thomas de Beby, John de Louseby, William de Sitheston, and Roger de le Waynhous, jurats, and others that he uttered inappropriate comments against his gild. He could not deny this, and therefore pledged a hundred shillings, [payment of] which is respited contingent upon him never again offending against mayor and community.

[...]

On 18 March [1356], John Sabyn goldsmith was accused in the gildhall before John de Petlyng mayor and the jurats and others of the community that he and his son James unjustly assaulted the town crier because, under the orders of the mayor, he arrested their pigs which were causing a great nuisance by wandering in the street. John Sabyn appeared and denied it as regards himself, but could not deny it as regards James having committed the offence. For whom John Sabyn pledged 20s., [which is] respited contingent upon him never again offending against the mayor or jurats.

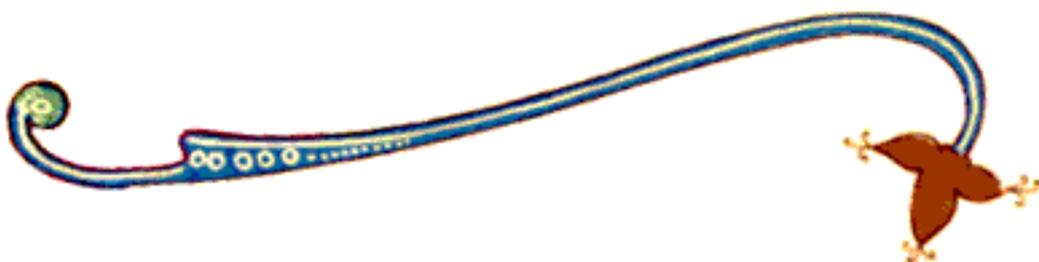

[...]

[May 1356:] John le Cu of Leicester was accused before John de Petlyng then mayor of Leicester, [named] jurats, and many other members of the community, that he sold wine contrary to an ordinance of the mayor and jurats, [publicly] proclaimed. In regard to which, John de Petlyng mayor came to John Coc's tavern with his colleagues and other members of the community and beseeched him to sell at 10d. a gallon, in the proper way according to the ordinance. But he [i.e. Coc] refused to be brought to heel by him, instead raising the hue many times on the mayor, without just cause, in the hearing of all who had come with him. And such was the finding a jury of reputable and law-abiding men. He could not deny it, but admitted it and offered a pledge in amends. In regard to which the jurats passed sentence that if he ever again was convicted by his peers of offending against any mayor of the town, he should pay a tun of win, lose his gild [membership], and be expelled from the office of jurat; which tun of wine is respited based on security given by John Coc.

DISCUSSION

These several instances, all from the same court roll, all reflect the stern disapproval of resistance to authority, whether it be through disobedience, assault, or insult. It was naturally important to clamp down hard on any opposition or resistance to local officers, in order to maintain public respect for authority; the executive officers were delegates of the king, or some other lord, and lesser officers similarly shared in the not-quite sacrosanctity that was due to the source of the delegated authority. As the Late Middle Ages wore on, there was a growing consciousness in urban society of the dignity of office and that any actions or words against officer-bearers were unacceptable. We therefore see more cases being recorded. Such offences were punishable by in fines or, in cases of unrepentant offenders, disfranchisement, imprisonment, or even exile from the town; e.g. see by-laws on this subject in the Ipswich custumal and Maldon custumal. Most offenders admitted their sin and, by submitting to authority, had their punishments remitted or deferred, contingent upon future good behaviour.

NOTES

"morningspeech"

The name given to assemblies of the gildsmen, which by this period had become essentially business meetings of local government.

"jurats"

The town council.

"arrested their pigs"

Earlier in the mayoral year, an ordinance had been passed prohibiting any pigs from wandering on the high streets, and allowing them to be loose in the lanes only if they were ringed; upon penalty of paying 1d. per foot of the beast. It need hardly be said that this was by no means the earliest Leicester ordinance against loose pigs.

"John le Cu"

John Cook's error was not an obstacle to him becoming mayor himself in 1360.

[1. 1355]

William Heyward senior came here into the gildhall that day [18 December] and admitted that he had committed an offence against the mayor and community and the leet affeerors, in that he imputed that the leet affeerors and others of the town of Lynn had falsely and maliciously assessed fines in the leet that were unreasonable beyond measure. Upon which he offered to the mayor and community compensation of £10. Of which, at the instance of Sir John de Ufford, £9 were remitted to him and 20s. were paid. And he found pledges for his [future] good behaviour, viz. Reginald de Sisterne and Thomas de Bukworth, under penalty of paying £10 to the community if William offended against the mayor and community or their officers on a future occasion.

William Heyward senior came here into the gildhall on 13 January 1363 and admitted that he had committed an offence against the community, in that after an argument had arisen between William and a certain servant of John de Bokenham, Thomas Drewe the town mayor of Lynn, intervened to calm down the dispute, setting a date for them to effect a reconciliation, to which the parties agreed. And mayor Thomas, by authority of his office, ordered those parties that neither of them do any harm or injury towards the other before that date, to which they likewise agreed. [But] before that date William came with force [and armed] etc. and insulted John's servant and aimed to beat him. For that offence, he offered the community £20. And because, on another occasion of an offence against the community – that is, in during the term of William de Swanton – he had pledged to the community £10 should he offend again, the community consequently now took 40s. from William and he became indebted to the community in the sum of £7, payable to the community without any [prospect of] it being reduced or pardoned. The whole community was in agreement that if he ever offended against the community again, nothing of the fine would be remitted. [His] pledges: Reginald de Sisterne and Roger de Byntre.

DISCUSSION

Criticism of even lesser officials could be little tolerated in a political environment where authorities depended much on consensual submission to rule, rather than coercion, and social control involved promoting a belief in the communal good and loyalty to the community. Cases such as this show that submission to the authority of local officers could not be taken for granted, and that firm action was needed to reinforce authority by public submission of penitent offenders or stern punishment of the recalcitrant. A balance between severity and clemency was what Latini recommended as the surest way to establish authority while keeping the goodwill of the people.

Spreading gossip in the streets or taverns could shape neighbourhood opinion and give a focus to underlying dissatisfaction among the ruled or bring about disharmony with the community. To ensure no disruption to the normally peaceful status quo, it was advisable to deal with criticism severely. Extreme cases in which an offender showed no contrition nor preparedness to submit to disciplining could be punished by disfranchisement, or even imprisonment where physical assault was involved. Anticipating this risk, most offenders chose to show themselves repentant by admitting their fault and voluntarily offering a fine, typically a monetary payment or a volume of wine. As submission was what the authorities most wanted, a contrite offender would usually be required to pay only a portion of what he offered, with the right to collect the remainder held over the offender's head as security for future good behaviour.

A man with as low a temper threshold as Heyward appears to have been was fortunate to have had the patronage of Reginald de Systeme, an elderly burgess who had on a number of occasions served on the town council between the 1340s to 60s. This may have influenced the authorities towards leniency.

NOTES

"affeerors"

These were a jury appointed to assess fines on those convicted by the leet court of an offence against the community.

TRANSLATION

These are provisions made together with the underwritten articles by the mayor and whole commonalty of the city of Lincoln for keeping the peace of our Lord the King and for the perpetual observance of the liberties and improvements hereunder mentioned (that is to say)

That the commonalty shall by their common council elect a mayor from year to year of their own election; and that no mayor shall be elected unless he shall before be assessed to the public taxes, with other citizens of the said city; and that the mayor shall remain in his mayoralty so long as it pleases him and the commonalty; And that the same mayor shall be discharged of all taxes due and talliaiges and of all other customs belonging to the city so long as he shall be mayor (saving the precept of our Lord the King in all things); And also that it shall be lawful for such mayor to take his hansels within the city and without, except of the citizens of Lincoln and their sons, and all those who pay scot and lot in the said city and ought not to be anselled within the county of Lincoln;

And further it is provided that the commonalty with the advice of the mayor shall choose twelve fit and discreet men to be judges of the said city, but that those twelve men shall be assessed to the public taxes and dues, and to all royal customs with other citizens of the said city;

And it is further provided that the said citizens shall have bailiffs every year of their own election, and that those bailiffs shall faithfully discharge the fee farm rent of our Lord the King at the end of the year; And if they don't do so the mayor and commonalty shall distrain such bailiffs by their lands and chattels until the fee farm rent of our Lord the King be fully paid; And that if any damage happens to the city thro' default of paying the fee farm rent of our Lord the King such damage shall be made good to the city out of the chattels of the said bailiffs; And those bailiffs ought to have two clerks and four sergeants who shall be presented before the mayor and commonalty at the feast of St. Michael;

And that there shall be no weigher of goods unless he is elected by the common council and that the persons so elected shall take their corporal oath upon the Holy Evangelists faithfully and firmly to fulfil all these things and to keep and observe the customs of the city;

And if it shall happen that the mayor or any bailiff shall be called into question unjustly for supporting the rights of the city the commonalty shall defend them within the city and without to the utmost of their power; And also shall faithfully restrain the mayor and bailiffs within their own liberties of the said city;

And it is further provided that four men worthy of trust shall be elected from amongst the citizens by a free election at the feast of St. Michael to keep an account of outgoing talliages and arrears belonging to the city; and that they have one chest and four keys; And that they shall render up their account to the city at the end of the year;

Also it is provided for the keeping of the peace of our Lord the King that they who ought shall appoint two men out of each parish of the city worthy of trust to search their own parishes once a month; And that no person shall lodge a stranger more than one night unless he shall bring him forth to public view on the morrow if it shall be necessary; And if any person in any parish shall be suspected and he cannot find pledges he shall be sent out of town until he can find pledges; And if the said two men will not search their respective parishes as aforesaid, they shall remain in the mercy of the city, and the names of the aforesaid men shall be set down in writing, to be in the keeping of the mayor, and at the feast of St. Michael there shall be other two such men appointed to succeed to the office; And if a disturbance of the city and a tumult and clamour happens, and the mayor and bailiffs attend, all the commonalty ought to prosecute them to the keeping of the peace of our Lord the King, and of the city;

And it is further provided that those who choose to defend themselves by the liberty of the city shall be assessed, together with the commonalty, to all taxes dues and royal customs belonging to the city; And if any person of the city shall oppose the mayor and commonalty concerning any matter of a public nature by them enacted, he shall be in the mercy of the city; And it shall be lawful for the mayor and citizens to distrain him for his amercement until he shall make them satisfaction according to the greatness of his offence; And if reasonable summons's have been issued by command of the mayor and commonalty, he who withdraws himself, and does not appear, shall be amerced to the amount of 2s., unless he can suggest some reasonable cause by way of excuse.

DISCUSSION

This set of extracts from the "Provisions", a document of uncertain date but whose handwriting was described by its transcriber as late thirteenth century, is fairly typical of the constitutional documents being drawn up by many towns in the late thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries. It seems the document was being referred to, by mid-fourteenth century, as the "Constitutions". Such documents restated existing arrangements for urban government, perhaps with some elaborations, and added new provisions aimed in part at ensuring greater accountability of the rulers.

Often these documents were the outcome of complaints of misgovernment, and in that sense might be considered reforms. Soon after coming to the throne, Edward I initiated an investigation of unprecedented scope throughout England into various abuses (stimulated in part by the breakdown of law and order during the civil war of the latter part of Henry III's reign), including local maladministration and the extent of local jurisdiction. The enquiries held in the hundreds in 1274 and 1279, which were subsequently followed up during the rest of his reign and those of his son and grandson by Quo Warranto proceedings and inclusion of such matters in the general eyres, brought out into the open many grievances, whether warranted or not. Henry III's efforts to extract greater revenues from his towns, followed by the national struggle for power, with its consequent reforms and counter-reforms, as well as the internal political divisions it engendered within the ranks of urban society, all helped place stress on the relationship of rulers and ruled.

Lincoln was no exception. The support it gave to the Montfortian party led to a huge fine and (when this was not paid in full) a royal enquiry in 1267, which provided an opportunity for public complaints to emerge, including that:

- Postponements of the weekly court sessions had, by delaying judicial cases, impacted the court fines that went towards the city fee farm (thereby jeopardizing city liberties, if the fee farm could not be paid).
- Certain of the city rulers had, without consulting the community, assigned an annual payment to the earl of Richmond of £10, out of tronage collected from Lincoln merchants attending the Boston fair.
- Rents of certain market stalls, which should have been put towards the fee farm, had been diverted to other uses.
- Taxes had been levied, but there had been no accounting for the proceeds.
- Certain who had been residents for over a year had been obliged to purchase freeman status despite being at scot and lot.
- That many citizens had refused to contribute to the fine imposed by the king.

On the last point, a separate legal dispute reveals further grievances. Thomas de Beaufou, the mayor of 1266/67, complained that he had paid £110 towards the fine on behalf of the citizens, but had not been reimbursed. His successor and others, the defendants, counter-charged that Thomas had collected city revenues that did not find their way into the common purse. The disputing parties agreed to call it quits.

In the national investigations of 1274/75, three separate juries of Lincoln townsmen – representing the "magnates", those of secondary rank, and the lesser people of the city – made presentments to the inquests. Complaints of oppressive government emerged, such as mayoral high-handedness in making important decisions without consulting the community, preferential treatment accorded some citizens in the assessment of local taxes, embezzlement of tallage and murage, while the middle jury also complained of the burdens of office-holding. The matter of the earl of Richmond was raised again, with the implication that those who decided to pay him did so because it was in their interest as merchants. Similarly, a different ex-mayor was accused of having given to a Beverley burgess freedom from toll as part of the dowry of his daughter, whom the burgess married. The underlying complaint here seems to have been a dispute with Beverley as to whether its men should be liable to tolls when they came to trade at Lincoln (tolls being the most important source of revenue for paying the fee farm); the mayor's action may disguise a closer definition of citizenship rights by the city government, if we consider that it was often the case in towns that a man could acquire citizenship through marriage to the daughter of a citizen. The earlier complaint of requiring even those at scot and lot to purchase citizenship seems indicative of some evolution in the rules governing the right to the franchise. All three juries also complained of damage to local trade through the acts of outsiders, and it may be noted that, following the stipulations regarding the government of the city, the Provisions went on to specify limitations on the commercial activities of external merchants within Lincoln.

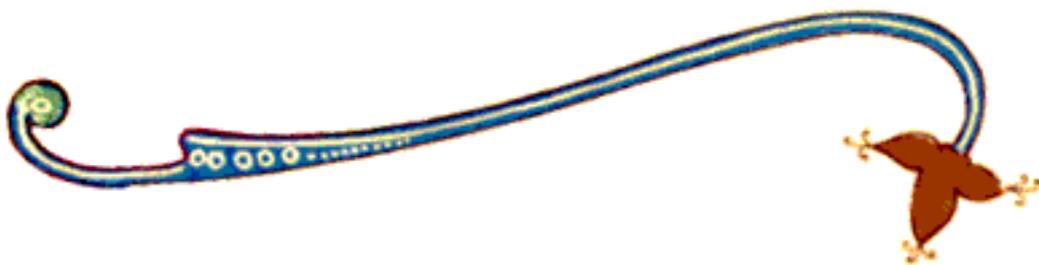

Again, in 1290, we hear complaints of government made by the poor men of Lincoln against the rich men. Among other unspecified grievances, for whose investigation and settlement of discords the king appointed commissioners, the complaints were that the rich men had recently leased the city tronage (i.e. weighing of goods) without obtaining the agreement of the poor first; that 200 marks were paid to the king, out of the pockets of the poor, through distraint by the rich, as a fine for concealment of goods of condemned Jews, even though it was the rich who had been convicted of this crime and ought to have paid themselves; and that the rich had taken upon themselves the authority, apparently without consultation, of unduly assessing and collected tallages from the poor. The complaints of maladministration were taken seriously enough for the city to be taken into the king's hand; this meant that local government and associated charter-based privileges (e.g. the fee farm) were suspended and the city was placed under a warden appointed by the king. This situation lasted throughout the 1290s and must have been what compelled the parties to the constitutional settlement in the document above. Self-government was restored in 1301, and the king issued letters patent confirming the earlier chartered liberties of the city.

That the distrust between ruled and rulers was not so easily removed, is suggested in 1350 when the gild of St. Michael on the Hill, dedicated to Corpus Christi, was founded in Lincoln. What is described, in a report to the king in 1389, in terms otherwise typical enough of a socio-religious gild, contains atypical stipulations aimed at preventing the gild from being taken over by the more powerful and influential townsmen:

Whoever seeks to be received into the gild, being of the same rank as the bretheren and sisteren who founded it, namely, of the rank of common and middling folks, shall be charged to be faithful to the gild, and shall bear his share of its burdens. And whereas this gild was founded by folks of common and middling rank, it is ordained that no one of the rank of mayor or bailiff shall become a member of the gild, unless he is found to be of humble, good, and honest conversation, and is admitted by the choice and common assent of the bretheren and sisteren of the gild. And one shall meddle in any matter, unless specially summoned; nor shall such a one take on himself any office in the gild. He shall, on his admission, be sworn before the bretheren and sisteren, to maintain and to keep the ordinance of the gild. And no one shall have any claim to office in this gild on account of the honour and dignity of his personal rank.

NOTES

"mayor"

The earliest reference to a mayor at Lincoln is in 1206, and the creation of the office likely followed soon after the king's charter of 1200, granting some measure of self-government, notably through two elected bailiffs and four coroners, whose role (as at Ipswich) was to deal with legal jurisdiction in cases where rights or revenues of the Crown were implicated, and to ensure the bailiffs administered justice with an even hand. Prior to the mayor, the officer closest to being a communal representative, with no special accountability to the king (such as the bailiffs had), was the alderman of the merchant gild; the incumbent at the time the charter was obtained is, probably significantly, seen as the first holder of the mayoralty: Adam fitz Reginald. This transfer of leadership, not from one group to another but from an old to a new office, is also suggested by the fact that we no longer hear of the alderman after 1217. The two offices were, however, quite separate, not two faces of the same coin. The excitement and newfound confidence of the citizens, along with the probability that Adam was instrumental in negotiating for the city's new privileges, led to him retaining the mayoralty for at least a decade (a similar situation can be seen at London), and most of his successors throughout the century held the office for multi-year periods. That there may have been no custom of annual election for at least part of the century is also suggested by the action of the citizens in 1210, paying a fee to obtain royal approval for the mayoralty and the right to have Adam as their mayor for as long as he was acceptable to the king. Adam only lost office when he incurred the wrath of the king for supporting the rebellious barons. Following the promulgation of the Provisions, however, it was uncommon for a man to serve more than one consecutive annual term as mayor.

"assessed to the public taxes"

I.e. the mayor had to be a citizen (one who shared the common burden of contributing to city taxation).

"hansels"

Lyon is reported by Hill as explaining this term as "a customary present made to the mayor out of a commodity brought by strangers into the city for sale." However, what it seems to be is a fee for the right to trade in the city without paying local tolls, along the same lines as the hanse referred to at Ipswich in 1200. Just as at Ipswich this came to be, as the century progressed, primarily a payment made by outsiders or immigrants, so at Lincoln it was like a licence fee due from those who did not otherwise gain trading rights by being freemen of the city. Those of the county who "ought not to be anelled" were probably those who came to buy only for household needs, and/or burgesses of other towns with the royally-granted right of freedom from toll; or possibly the men of Torksey which, as a settlement very close to Lincoln, contributed to royal taxes imposed on the city. While not clear, the Lincoln reference may indicate that the mayor not only collected these payments but applied them to his own use – that is, they were either a perk of the job or, more likely, a revenue used to cover the mayoral salary. If the latter is true, it is easy to see how mayors might be tempted to bolster the revenue source by demanding townsmen pay the hanse; although such an action may have been a move towards closer definition of which residents were and were not entitled to citizenship status.

"scot and lot"

As early as the mid-12th century we see membership in the Lincoln trading community (as organized in a merchant guild) being defined by contribution towards royal taxation, and the phrase scot and lot is in essence the same concept. The cases of Ipswich and Leicester suggest that such guilds made also have had a one-time and probably modest entry fee. As a generalization, it was at a later period that freeman's status in towns was acquired, if not by patrimony, through payment of a fee sufficiently large to be restrictive.

"twelve men"

Other evidence from the thirteenth century suggests the existence of a city council of twenty-four townsmen, although it is not certain how formal a part of the constitution this was. Such a body is also seen in the fourteenth century. The reference to twelve "judges" here is puzzling. Since the original text is lost, we cannot know whether the Latin referred to the group (of the same number) of judices or "lawmen" who had some judicial authority in eleventh-century Lincoln. Or whether it was a group within the 24, later to be identified with the aldermen, as Hill suspected. In the context of the constitutional settlement, it would not be extraordinary to find the 24 split, with one half drawn from the ruling elite and the other half chosen by the community; although this is speculative, in the absence of information about how the council was chosen, it does seem to have been the case by 1392. Lists of membership of the 24 in the early fourteenth century (when the number of members actually varied between 18 and 30) suggest that men who had held the mayoralty found a permanent place in the council thereafter.

"of their own election"

The 1200 charter specified that the bailiffs hold office during good conduct, with provision for the citizens to replace them through communal decision; judging from those of the names we know of the bailiffs at this period, it looks as though the citizens interpreted the charter from the beginning as permitting annual election. The explicit reference to annual election in the above document may be nothing more than a pro forma reiteration, or it may suggest some undermining of the communal election process.

"chattels of the said bailiffs"

This kind of personal liability for matters sometimes beyond the control of the officials was the kind of thing serving as a disincentive for office-holding by any but the wealthier townsmen; by the late fourteenth century it was contributing to reluctance even on the part of such qualified men to take up the burden.

"two clerks and four sergeants"

These offices existed from at least 1202. In fact, the city government was sufficiently elaborate at that time that it is not hard to imagine Lincoln having gone through much the same process recorded at Ipswich for setting up local government, with the mayor a slightly later addition to the structure.

"four men"

Later called the chamberlains.

"postponements"

This possibly referred to the effect of essoins in delaying the resolution of pleas.

"earl of Richmond"

This complaint was put forward again in 1275. The queen's uncle, the earl of Richmond, had been involved in a dispute with Lincoln in 1265, complaining of tolls paid by men of Boston, which was under his lordship, when they brought wares to the city. As lord of Boston, he could control access of Lincoln cargoes to the North Sea via the River Witham and Lincoln merchant's participation in the important Boston fair; he was thus in a position to extort the £10 as his cut of the tronage. Those who made this concession defended themselves against the community complaint that it was that or lose access to the fair.

"burdens of office-holding"

The jurors stated that the bailiffs were impoverished by the problems involved in raising the fee farm of £180; during the suspension of liberties in the 1290s, when the bailiffs accounted not for a set sum but for whatever moneys were actually received, revenues did not meet the amount set as the fee farm.

"mayor's action"

However, possibly he had not followed due process. A clause of the provisions not given above specified that "no foreigner shall have the freedom of the city unless he shall receive it in the presence of the mayor and commonalty."

[1. Election of city officials]

[The mayoral election]

The mayor, aldermen and bailiffs, and all other officers or officials of the city are elected according to the following manner and method. That is, on 3 February, when the mayor is to be elected, the commons of the city are to assemble in the Guildhall according to custom, and the mayor who was in office for the past year shall nominate two or three of the aldermen, and the commons shall elect one of these aldermen to be their mayor in the coming year. The which alderman thus elected as their mayor, if he is then in the city, is to be administered his oath [of office] individually, in front of the commons in the Guildhall, according to the form that follows below. [...] If he is not then in the city, he is to take his oath as indicated above, before the community in the Guildhall, the day immediately following his return to the city. The mayor is to have the government of the city, subject only to the king, for the year to follow, and as city custom dictates the mayor is to receive £50 for the year, to cover the costs and expenses of himself and his officers.

Next all the aldermen and the 24 of the common council who are present will make their oath in the manner indicated below. Then the common clerk will read out the oath of the commons, as written below, in the manner and form that follows; that being done, all of the commons are to raise their hands [in indication] that they will fulfill the oath. The mayor for the time to come, according to the custom of the city, in order to preserve peace and tranquillity within the city, has the discretionary power to arrest and imprison disturbers of the peace and other offenders for rebellious behaviour, misdeeds, rumourmongering, and other offences, without facing any legal action or impeachment for the same afterwards; should he be impeached or accused in court of any such action, he is to be defended at the cost of the community.

The mayor's oath

Hear this, good people, that I will be faithful and loyal to our lord king, and will preserve and protect the city for the king and his heirs. And the freedoms, rights, laws, usages, and customs of the same I will in all regards maintain and promote, will see right done equally to rich and to poor, and will not fail in this for any reason, so help me God and the saints.

The oath of the thirty-six members of the council

You swear that you will ready to respond to the mayor's command, as often as you are summoned and commanded, to give him advice, assistance, support and to back him up in all matters, out of love for the mayor and the city and for its benefit.

The oath of the commons made to the mayor

The members of the community of the city are to raise their hands and swear to the mayor to support him in the performance of his own oath as above, in all respects, to the best of their ability.

Chamberlains

Also, on the same day, after the mayor has been elected in the manner indicated above, all the aldermen and the twenty-four who are then present in the Guildhall shall go from the Guildhall to the council chamber. There they shall elect three reputable men, chosen from the most worthy and most judicious in the city, to be chamberlains for the year following. Who, once elected as chamberlains, are to take their oaths before the mayor in the council chamber in the form that follows.

The oath of the three chamberlains

You swear that you will be ready [to perform] all things that you are able, that you will faithfully levy and receive all dues, arrears of tallages, and other debts owing to the community. And [you will] provide acquittances to those from whom you receive [debts], and act for the profit and advantage of the community, and the money that you receive you will well and truly expend and put to use towards the needs of the city. And you will faithfully render account of receipts, to the best of your ability and knowledge, when it is required and demanded of you, so help you God and all the saints.

In addition the mayor, aldermen and twenty-four of the common council there elect two wardens for the Ouse Bridge and two others for the Fosse Bridge. Which bridgemasters are to be sworn [into office] before the mayor and chamberlains in the chamber, in the manner that follows. The wardens are to have charge and administration of those bridges and the tenements belonging to the bridges, under the supervision of the mayor and his chamberlains then in office.

[The oath of the bridgemasters follows. The duties specified were to administer the chapel on the Ouse Bridge and its personnel, the rents relating to properties on or assigned to the bridge, and expenditures on the chapel, and to render an account of receipts and expenditures before the community in the Guildhall on 3 February, with mayor, aldermen and councillors as the auditors. No mention is made of the Foss Bridge, but doubtless its bridgemasters were administered the same oath mutatis mutandis.]

The chamber

On the Monday following 3 February the common clerk and all the mayor's sergeants for the year following are to be elected in the Guildhall by the mayor, aldermen, and by the mentioned above. Should it be the case that any of them dies within that year, or is dismissed for any reasonable cause or as just desserts, then the mayor then in office shall appoint another officer in place of he who has offended or died, to hold [the office] until 3 February. All these officers are to be sworn before the commons on the same Monday, in the manner that follows.

[The oath of the sergeants follows. Its essence was that they would obey all commands of the mayor, issuing summonses and making attachments when required, without any fraud or deceit.]

Aldermen

Aldermen are to be elected by the mayor and the aldermen then in office, within forty days following a death or discharge for any reasonable cause, as jointly agreed by mayor and aldermen, so that the number of aldermen be made up within that forty days. The aldermen thus elected are to take the same oath in the same manner as the thirty-six councillors as indicated above. The aldermen have the power under the customs of the city to commit troublemakers and other offenders to the custody of the sheriffs of the city, to be held until they have been suitably punished.

Also, after anyone has been elected alderman and is sworn, and the office has been occupied, it is ordained and instituted that forever after, according to the custom of the city, he is not to be impanelled or nominated to serve on any inquest [jury] within the city nor [any external jury in cases] concerning the liberties of the city.

Also, the mayor, aldermen and twenty-four of the common council of the city have been accustomed to elect three reputable men of the city to occupy and perform the office of coroners. That is to say, one of the three operating between the Ouse and the Foss, another on the far side of the Ouse, and another on the far side of the Foss. The three persons are to be well qualified individuals, capable and of good reputation. After they have been elected to the office of coroners, they are to be sworn before the mayor, council and community to perform their duties faithfully and fully in the county in the manner that follows.

Sheriffs or bailiffs

It is the custom within the city that on 21 September there will be elected within the city Guildhall three good, loyal, reputable men, to occupy and perform the office of bailiffs – all those who have previously filled and performed that office being excepted and excluded –; and, having duly accepted the responsibilities of that office, the bailiffs thus elected are to be presented to the community. If they are suitable to the commons, they are to be accepted by the community. The bailiffs are to take oath before the mayor, in the courthouse or in some other location within the city, as the mayor pleases. On an annual basis, the bailiffs pay to the king's Exchquer, and are accountable for, the farm of the city, and for the bailiwick of Ainsty (according to city custom); for which purpose the bailiffs must have all the revenues and assets belonging to the office since ancient times. The bailiffs may freely elect all their officers, servants and [sub-] bailiffs, both those within the city and those within the bailiwick of Ainsty, along with the gaolers of the gaols associated with their office, at their will and pleasure so long as there is no infringement of ordinances made in regard to those servants by the city council, as law prescribes. The bailiffs are to come into their office, through indentures made between them and their predecessors, on 29 September, at the first strike of Vespers sounded at the church of St. Michael near the Ouse bridge. To carry out and accomplish these matters in the manner indicated, each of the pair is to find and present two suitable men as their pledges.

Then, on 18 May 1396, King Richard authorized and granted power to the citizens, their heirs and successors to elect two reputable men of the city as sheriffs in place of the three bailiffs. Which sheriffs are to be elected on 21 September each year; and after their election each is to find two pledges, and is to be sworn in the same manner as the bailiffs used to be. The names of these sheriffs, once elected, is to be presented each year at the king's Chancery, under the common seal of the city.

[2. Frequency of re-election of mayors, and date of election of chamberlains]

Memorandum that on 9 February 1372, before John de Gysburne, then mayor of the city of York, and the entire community assembled in their Guildhall that day, it was agreed, ordained and approved that, regardless of what was previously ordained regarding the election of the mayor of the city both in ancient times and at present, from this day forth during a period of eight years no citizen of the city, no matter what his status or position, may be elected mayor of the city nor bear the responsibility or duties of the mayoralty for more than one year, until the said eight years have run their course and eight [other] citizens of the community have shouldered the office and maintained it. And that no mayor take as his salary more than £20 for undertaking the office of mayor. And whenever the mayor at the time surrenders his office to the community [...]

Concerning the election of chamberlains at the Purification

Memorandum that on 3 February 1375, by consent of the entire community in their Guildhall, assembled there that day for the election of their mayor, it was agreed, ordained, and instituted that all the chamberlains who are customarily elected on 21 September, when the bailiffs are elected, are henceforth to be elected on 3 February, the same day that the city mayor is elected and sworn. This so that mayors and chamberlains may take up their official duties together, and carry out what they must do (in regard to receipts, expenses, and payments of the city) and close out their terms together, the one with the other, notwithstanding any ordinance made in ancient times.

DISCUSSION

The civic register now known as Memorandum Book ^{A/Y} was begun in 1377 by the town clerk for purposes of ready reference. Copies of many existing records were made in the volume; perhaps some previously unwritten customs were included. The original source of information about elections clearly dates after 1375 but before 1396, but the version in the register was amended to bring it up to date with the constitutional changes of the 1390s. It may well have been those changes that prompted the copying, and updating, of the electoral information into what is considered the custumal section of the register, at some point in the second half of the 1390s.

Prior to 1396, and since about 1213, the government of York was in the hands of a mayor and three bailiffs, the latter focusing on aspects of administration from which flowed revenues destined for the Exchequer via the fee farm. By 1289 chamberlains had been introduced into city officialdom; in the late fourteenth century they were three in number, although in earlier and later periods four appears to have been the norm. All these were elected officials. In typically shadowy fashion, a town council evolved and by the 1370s had sophisticated to the point where we perceive a three-tiered system: at the top the 12 aldermen who had all borne the office of mayor or bailiff and thus represented an elite of experience within the upper council; associated with them, a group of 24 men of similar socio-economic status, but with less governmental experience; and finally a still-hazy lower council of 48, less frequently assembled, intended to ensure the community at large was represented at meetings where decisions would require community approval.

The method of mayoral election at York was the reverse of that at London, where it was the commons who nominated candidates and the mayor and aldermen who made the final selection from the nominees. But the effect was probably pretty much the same in either case, with the ruling elite exercising a significant degree of control over the choice of mayors. The extent of popular participation in elections at York is likely to have undergone the same gradual restriction that is evidenced in other of England's chief cities. We cannot imagine that the entire community attended elections on every occasion, although when the populace was aroused the attendance could exceed the capacity of even as large a guildhall as London's, as the Northampton affair showed. The York Guildhall had less capacity, although of course the community was smaller; but there is no reason to believe that elections were generally attended by a large proportion of those enfranchised. It came to be seen as appropriate for community participation in elections to be managed through a representation principle, although the effort to find a viable principle of representation itself proved difficult.

It is not clear how the 24 councillors were chosen. Based on a description of the shrieval election in 1418, the sheriffs were elected by "those to whom the election of new city sheriffs belongs" [Memo. Book, II, 74] apparently the common council, since the mayor and community were said to remain in the main hall of the Guildhall, while the electors withdrew to an inner chamber. On that occasion the sheriffs chosen were a mercer who was one of the 24 and a potter who was not. About a week later, an ordinance was passed specifying that the 24 were to be chosen only from those who had previously served as sheriffs; only in the absence of sufficient candidates so qualified could an alternate choice be made.

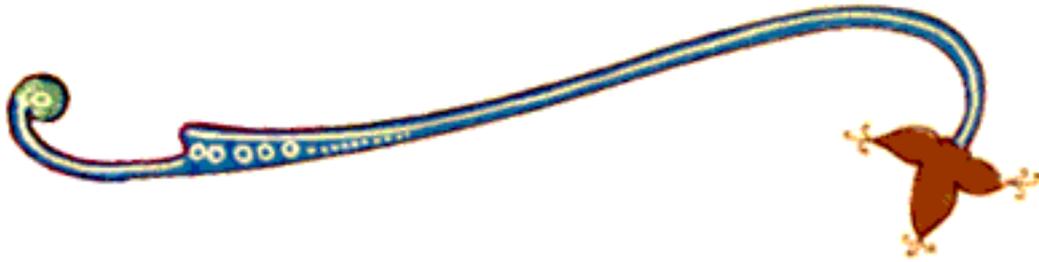

Nor is it clear who elected the bailiffs, although evidently it was not the commons. Probably the bailiffs to be were chosen by those about to leave office, as was the case in 1357. The sheriffs, on the other hand, were in the fifteenth century elected by mayor and council, with the community again having the opportunity to confirm the choice.

The provision for an 8-year interval between a man holding mayoralties was the outcome of political conflict in the city, with Gisburne as the reformer who, ironically, had just been re-elected to his second consecutive term in the mayoralty. Several mayors had held the office repeatedly earlier in the century. So tenuous was the hold of the reformers on government that Gisburne had to break his own rule by accepting election to the mayoralty again in 1379, and then again in 1380. Nor did his successors show respect for this principle, or for its extension in 1392 that no man be re-elected until other aldermen who had not yet served had done their tour of duty; it was not until the second decade of the fifteenth century that a trend begins for the mayoralty to be spread among a larger group, with few men serving more than once and (with one exception) no consecutive re-elections throughout the remainder of the century.

In the period of intense political rivalries of the 1370s and early '80s, it is tempting to conclude that the intent of the restriction was to prevent any individual becoming entrenched in local government through an extended hold on the mayoralty. However, rotation of the office through a larger number of individuals also spread the burden – the financial burden was the excuse given for the abolition of mayoral re-election at London earlier in the century, although this too was at a time of political conflict. In 1426 it was enacted at London that no-one could be re-elected to the mayoralty until seven years had elapsed following the end of his term. Northampton, with a tradition of modelling itself after London, passed a similar ordinance in 1437 with terminology hinting at easing the burdensome duty; a further ordinance in 1448 noted the "grievous expenses and costs" incurred by the mayors, exceeding their salaries, and provided additional relief via perpetual exemption from licence fees for domestic brewing and from participation in watch and ward duties. The early decades of the fifteenth century had seen a number of cases of re-election to a second term and the mayor in 1437, John Sprigy, had himself been one of the 'victims'; during the remainder of the century, the seven-year hiatus was respected. The 1430s also saw it decreed in London that no-one should be expected to have to serve a third term; as at York, throughout the rest of the century holding the mayoralty more than once was far less common than in the earlier period. In 1426 at Salisbury an ordinance specified that whoever served as mayor should not be called upon to serve again until a five-year interval had elapsed, and the impression given is that this was to protect those subject to election; in 1451 it was ruled that a mayor could not be nominated for re-election for the succeeding term.

The mayoral salary (perhaps more properly considered a fee, since it was originally a one-time payment at the conclusion of the term of office, although later appears to have been paid in instalments) was not perceived as adequately offsetting the personal costs incurred by holding the mayoralty. It had been at £20 since at least 1364. But mayors often received "rewards", intended to compensate them for out-of-pocket expenses, which tended to increase as there were more demands on administration, particularly in the area of hospitality and gift-giving to court favour, and as the mayors needed assistants at least some of whose costs they were expected to cover; such rewards could be quite large. There was growing concern over the salaries and expenses of borough officers, particularly the mayor, as these were normally the largest item of expenditure in the budget; likely this concern, or even resentment on the part of the poorer citizens, translated into political discontent and charges of official corruption or fiscal mismanagement.

NOTES

"bailiffs"

Sheriffs were substituted for bailiffs when York was given county status in 1396, which therefore marks the upper limit in date for the early part of the text.

"3 February"

This date for the beginning and end of the fiscal and administrative year was unusual. In most towns August or September (especially Michaelmas) were the norm, partly because this matched the Exchequer year and was therefore useful in terms of accounting for the fee farm; by the 15th century, typically, elections were often taking place in August, but the officers-elect did not take up office until Michaelmas. At York and Coventry, however, Candlemas (the Purification of the Virgin Mary) was the focal point; 3 February, St. Blaise's day, was the day following Candlemas. Initially the chamberlains and bailiffs were elected in September, but it would have been more convenient for the mayoral and camerarian years to coincide, and this adjustment was made by the above ordinance of 1375. In 1490 the election was moved into January, but assumption of office remained at St. Blaise's day.

"individually"

The original term is apartement, which I take to intend a contrast with other oaths being administered collectively.

"rumourmongering"

This I assume to be the gist of paroles, although it might also refer to slander.

"at the cost of the community"

See a similar provision for the governors of Beverley in 1345, and it appears to have been the case in some, if not many, other towns.

"council chamber"

This was located down the street, atop the Ouse Bridge.

"the power"

The magisterial power of arrest seems to be the major distinction between aldermen and other councillors.

"operating"

The term in the original, demourant, might refer to residence, but I suspect the intent here was to define boundaries of jurisdiction. However, it may have been that the concern was rather to have a coroner reasonably close at hand to where a crime was committed, so that he might be called to the crime scene while the trail was yet hot.

"Ainsty"

City jurisdiction extended over a sizable area, anciently known as a wapentake, to the west and south of the city, known as The Ainsty. In the early 13th century the citizens were claiming that such jurisdiction had been accorded them when King John granted them by charter the city and all its appurtenances. After a challenge, the royal government eventually allowed this, and the city held it at farm thereafter; however, when York became a county, the Ainsty was not initially a part of that territory.

"to the community"

Damage to the following section of the manuscript made it hard to transcribe, but it appears that the departing mayor was expected to make a commitment of loyalty to his successor.

Election of the mayor of the town of Lynn on Monday, 29 September 1354 by John Wythe, John de Brunham, Hamon de Cokesford, Geoffrey Hautboys, William de Swantone, John de Thiersforde, Thomas de Botkesham, Thomas Cooke, Laurence de Reppes, Thomas Baret, Reginald de Sisterne, and Nicholas de Swerdestone, under oath. Which men so sworn elected: William de Biteringe as mayor; Simon de Guntone, William de Elingham, Henry Elys, and John de Bokenham as chamberlains; Richard Frere as clerk; Stephen Cooke as bailiff; Geoffrey Drewe, John de Cokesforde, William de Bruntone, Robert Braunche, Thomas Drewe, Thomas Rythwis, John de Couteshale, Anselm Braunche, Robert de Cokesford, John de Sustede, John de Fyncham, and Clement de Aldeburgh as councillors. But William made the point, in front of the community, that he was weary from having held the mayoralty for the last two years; he added that, if God kept him alive, in good health, and worry-free, he planned to proceed with a pilgrimage to St. James in the coming year. He requested that the community excuse him for this year from the burden of the mayoralty, which it wished him to assume. Subsequently, that is on the Wednesday following, the community having assembled for this matter, it was agreed and decided that another reputable man might be elected to the office for the coming year, allowing that whichever burgess should be elected to the mayoralty for this year, he should have £20 from the community as his salary. The sworn men indicated above elected John de Couteshale as mayor. Who has been administered the oath related to the performance of his duties.

DISCUSSION

We can see from this instance that, at this period in Lynn at least, men did not run for office in the way that we would understand it. While some might desire and seek positions of power, others might be nominated and elected contrary to their preference, to offices perceived as an obligation to the community but potentially burdensome. Although it was not uncommon in Lynn during the fourteenth century for a man to be re-elected to the mayoralty for a second consecutive term, a third term was unheard of and Bitering had cause to seek to be released, whether or not his pilgrimage excuse was true or not. It was more likely he felt he had borne the burden of public duty long enough, or perhaps he was even concerned about arousing political jealousies among his peers. He did not shirk future duty, however, serving in the mayoralty twice more before his death.

Bitering may not have been alone in his wish not to be subjected to re-election. A week before the 1358 elections, ordinances were passed exempting any man from being re-elected to the mayoralty within two years after a term of office – it would be twenty years before a single infringement began a slippage, and at an unknown date (possibly 1395) it was cancelled. On the other hand, the same ordinances imposed a fine of £20 upon anyone refusing election to the mayoralty. A fine of 40d. was imposed for any councillor who failed to come, when summoned, to offer advice and assistance to the mayor; the reason for this was because of defaults in attendance, themselves a reflection of the burdensomeness of office-holding.

The 1350s were a period of experimentation that stretched into the reign of Richard II; the electors would sometimes choose the full complement of 24 councillors (or jurats) and sometimes would choose only 12, to whom either the electoral committee would be joined, or the 12 would co-opt 12 more, to form the 24 jurats for that year. The combining of councillors and electors was almost certainly, but not explicitly as in some years, the case in 1354. The variations within these themes require more detailed study before we can fully understand the staffing and character of the town council. How the electors were themselves chosen in this period is not addressed in the terse records of proceedings at electoral assemblies. But just two years earlier a settlement between the bishop of Norwich, lord of the town, and the townsmen over the question of the right of the latter to elect a mayor, stated that the mayor would be elected by the burgesses; whether or not the electors were chosen by the assembly, it seems likely that the electoral committee originated as an efficient device to represent the burgesses at large, rather than any attempt to limit popular participation in elections. Townspeople were less concerned with the character than with the quality of government.

As can be seen from the biographies, most of the electors and jurats were drawn from the same group of middling or prosperous townsmen, a group repeatedly in those roles in this period. Political office was restricted to those who had entered the franchise or the merchant gild – that is, those who had taken an oath of loyalty to the community. Within that select group only some had the strong sense of community responsibility, the positive inclination (as opposed to acquiescence) to exercise authority, the level of wealth and support (e.g. servants and apprentices) that would allow them to take time away from their businesses, and the monetary reserves that would allow them to bear the financial risks attached to certain offices. There must have been a relatively small pool of candidates – men who in addition had demonstrated their ability and/or reliability through past service in lesser roles such as capital pledge, tax assessor and collector, and particularly chamberlain – from which jurats could be chosen. The pool was large enough to allow for some variation in the list of jurats from year to year; but those willing to serve repeatedly and particularly those whose accumulated experience (notably ex-mayors) was invaluable to the borough were usually re-elected as a matter of form. For mid-fourteenth century Lynn, it is risky to resort to the argument of conscious monopolization of office to explain the repetition in the lists from year to year. And yet the effective monopolization may, during the course of the second half of the century, have become a habit and in time perceived as a right, paving the way for constitutional change and consequent political conflict at the beginning of the fifteenth century.

NOTES

"John Wythe"

Jurat for most of the period from 1357/58 to 1375/76, but often because the 12 electors were associated, as councillors, with the 12 men they elected; i.e. a junior jurat.

"Geoffrey de Hautboys"

A vintner and ship-owner, he was jurat in 1350/51 and 1353/54, but his career was cut short by his death in 1355 during a visit to Southampton.

"Thomas Baret"

Chamberlain in 1349/50, he was an elector on several occasions in the '50s and '60s, but never a jurat. He had purchased membership in the merchant gild in 1334, but was a trader of modest means.

"Clement de Aldeburgh"

Jurat in 1346/47, 1350/51, and 1354/55, he also served as bailiff in 1348/49.

"pilgrimage to St. James"

The sepulchre of the apostle St. James in Compostella, Spain, although its authenticity is today doubted, was one of the principal pilgrimage destinations in the Middle Ages.

[1. Avoidance of office]

Ordinance [7 October 1446]: By agreement of the mayor and the whole community, if any burgess who is nominated (with the assent of the mayor and the burgesses) for election as mayor leaves, or evades, or absents himself because of that, or otherwise makes representations to any person or persons to be excused from holding office, and this is duly proven, then he is to forfeit 40s. [payable] to the Hall and be disfranchised.

[2. Prohibition of outside influence in elections]

[8 August 1449] The mayor and the whole community enact that none of them is to obtain from any lord or any other outsider a letter [of support] for having any office that belongs to the election of the whole community, under penalty of 100s.

[3. Disciplinary action against critics of borough government]

To be noted [24 November 1453]: William More went into the public marketplace of the town and, in the hearing of outsiders, made threats and tirades against the ordinances and statutes of the Gild Hall of the town. For which reason William Hunt, John Sawyer, Thomas Clerke hosier, John West, and John Chamberleyn, burgesses, who had been mayors of the Hall, decided that because of his defiant attitude William should pay to the Hall within a month the penalty of 40s. sterling in good and legal coin. But because he acts contritely, he is forgiven 40d.

To be noted: On 25 January 1454, John Calman, a brother of the Gild, and John Lynd, a fuller who is not a member, came and publicly acknowledged a slander they spoke about William Rede, mayor of the Gild, said wrongly and untruthfully, and they submitted themselves and acknowledged that what they said was untrue, and swore upon a book to the opposite of their slander and asked forgiveness from the mayor against whom the slander was uttered. For William Rede had brought testimonial letters from the monastery at Evesham, where he was born, sealed with the convent's seal and the seals of the most important men of the town, to the effect that he was free-born and of good character.

[4. Avoidance of office]

To be noted: Memorandum that the writ which John West purchased to excuse and discharge him from his election as mayor on 25 September 1461 was disallowed by Thomas Clerke draper, then mayor, and all the burgesses of the gild, insofar as it was purchased contrary to the custom, rules, and usage of that gild.

[5. Failure to attend community meetings]

Ordinance: On 30 September [1463] a decision was made by William Lynacre, then mayor, and former mayors Thomas Beke, John Sawyer, William Rede, William Pernecote, John West, and John Chamberlayne, with the agreement and consent of all the burgesses then present, that whatever burgess defaults [in appearance] at any of the morrowspeeches it pleases the mayor to call during his term, and [likewise] all of his successors, without having special permission from the mayor then in office, is to be amerced 6d.; to be levied by the cofferers then in office. Should it be that any of such burgesses enter the hall while the mayor is in session, then the burgess may have his 6d. reduced to 4d. And that this will be adhered to they bind themselves by the oath that they have made to the gild.

[6. Spreading the burden of office]

[1474] It is agreed by the mayor and the burgesses of the hall of the Gild of Reading that no man who has been mayor there shall be re-elected within 4 years after the year in which he was mayor.

[7. Avoidance of office]

Ordinance: On 18 October 1486, John Langham, mayor of the borough of Reading, and the burgesses of the same agreed and decided that if any burgess residing in the town stays away or absents himself on the day when the mayor is elected, unless he has been given special permission from the mayor then in office, he is to forfeit 10s. to the Hall. It is also agreed and decided that if any of the burgesses nominated and chosen by election avoids, stays away, or is absent at the time he would customarily be presented before the Abbot, lord of Reading, in the customary place, he is to forfeit, lose and pay to the Hall £6.13s.4d, to be fully paid without him being forgiven, released or pardoned from it in any way.

[8. Penalties on those disloyal to the community]

On 10 December 1498, during the mayoralty of Richard Cleche, this enactment and statute was made by the consent and agreement of all the comburgesses of the Gild of the borough of Reading. That if there is any burgess who belongs to the Gild who acts contrary in any regard to what he ought according to his oath [as burgess], and this is duly proven, then he is to be publicly disgraced and expelled from the Gild, driven or flung out – if necessary turned head-over-heels, and a portrait of him made and his name written over it.

Also, that if any burgess decides to accept any office – such as constable or warden or any other office – unless this is by the election and choice of the mayor and his comburgesses, anyone so doing at any time is to be expelled from the Gild, in the manner indicated above.

On the same date mayor Richard Cleche dismissed Robert Benett and John Tornour from the office of constable, they having been elected and chosen by the Abbot and not by the mayor, nor by his predecessors, nor yet any of the comburgesses of the gild.

DISCUSSION

Although prohibitions or penalties, related to townsmen who sought to avoid their civic duties by bearing office, were not uncommon, at Reading there may have been particular reasons why some burgesses were reluctant to take on the challenge in the fifteenth century. The borough had been engaged, and would be into the next century, in a periodic battle with its lord, the abbot of Reading, over control of local government.

Reading had been a settlement of some importance since the ninth century, and was recognized as a royal borough in Domesday. But Henry I in 1125 granted the borough, as an endowment, to the abbey he had founded a few years earlier; its abbot thereafter had control over commercial affairs in the town, appointment of the borough executive, licencing of retail activities, and administration of justice, among other powers. The townsmen relied on their merchant gild as a mechanism for organization and self-determination, and the abbot tried to suppress this source of opposition. Their struggle with the abbot to wrest away from him control of such matters was protracted and often violent; in 1253, for example, they were accused of ambushing the abbot's bailiffs and obstructing them from performing their duties, while in the following year it was the abbot's servants who were in hot water for killing obstructive townsmen. The contest erupted periodically at points over the next two centuries.

Around the opening of the fourteenth century, the burgesses had created a mayoralty, the first known officeholder dating to 1302 and, as seems not to have been uncommon when this new office was introduced into towns, apparently holding office for several years. The mayor was essentially the warden, or master, of the Merchant Gild wearing another hat, and the first known mayor was said to have been elected by community assent. This may, or may not, indicate that the abbot's right of annual appointment of the head of the gild, established by a settlement between gild and abbot in 1254, was in abeyance. The abbey's hold over the town may have been waning at this time, for it had financial problems, and in 1302 the burgesses were also resisting the abbot's right (again confirmed in 1254) to impose taxations on the town. In that scenario, the mayoralty could have been created as a direct challenge, as appears to have been the case in some other towns where the burgesses were battling for independence from an overlord. The abbot does not seem to have ever formally recognised the mayoralty per se, preferring the term "warden" for the gild officer and in the fifteenth century heaping scorn on the mayoralty.

In 1351, during one of the periodic legal battles, the community sought freedom from the abbot's overlordship by claiming to have long been a royal borough, and to have been electing a mayor as head of its Merchant Gild since before 1125 (a claim we have no reason to take seriously – the earliest reference we have to the gildhall is ca. 1204-15, although it was no novelty at that date). Control over election of the town constables was another of the key issues at that time. That issue came to the fore again in 1417, with some success for the burgesses, who then proceeded to assert themselves by building a new gildhall. A more combative abbot, Thomas Henley, came into office in 1430, and was able to hold the townsmen in check.

After that abbot's death in 1446, the battle was renewed and continued into the sixteenth century. It was important for those leading the opposition to the abbot to protect their interests and to keep their fellow burgesses loyal to the cause, motivating or disciplining them. Some burgesses at least must have preferred to steer clear of trouble, while possibly among the unenfranchised residents there was some support for the lord of the town against a government over which they had no influence, as was the case at Lynn. We cannot know precisely whether the causes for criticizing the mayor and his government in 1453-54 were political or personal, but they could not be glossed over. The battle with the abbot and perhaps with factions internal to the borough called for stout-hearted men to accept the burden of office. The number of townsmen qualified for office was small; Henrietta Haynes has reckoned that there were fewer than 50 members of the gild around this period ["Reading Borough to 1638", Victoria History of the County of Berkshire, vol.3, 1923]. This difficulty may have been compounded by reluctance among some of the members to take on repeatedly the role of mayor, in those challenging times. The 1474 specification limiting re-election was subsequently annulled – both the enactment and the annulment may reflect difficulty in finding men willing to serve. A small number of names were dominating the nominations year after year.

We do not have a satisfactorily clear picture of the contest, but fortunes on either side seem to have waxed and waned. In the 1490s the abbot refused to appoint any town nominee to the mayoralty. At the election just before Michaelmas 1492, three nominees were put forward, but no-one was confirmed in the mayoralty by the abbot, and the same impasse seems to have continued for the following three or four years. In 1497, the election being delayed until late October, from the three nominees it was the burgesses who were said to choose, by "free election", their leader for the next year; this officer was now referred to as master of the gild, the mayoralty under that title having been abandoned, perhaps as a concession to the abbot if the title "mayor" were seen as an irritant, or perhaps because past changes in title of the gild leader had created legal openings for the abbot's counsel in challenging gild efforts to assert independence. The same occurred the following year, when the burgesses were said to have unanimously agreed that they would obey the master in all things, just as they had previously obeyed the mayor. But after peace was restored between abbot and gild in 1499, the title mayor quickly crept back in. By 1511 the quarrel had exhausted itself, and the abbot had once more been conceded the final election from the three nominees, as well as exercising traditional jurisdiction in the borough. The burgesses had to wait for the Dissolution before they could obtain self-government.

NOTES

"nominated"

At the mayoral election held two weeks earlier, three persons received nominations. Whether the ordinance was prompted by one or more of them trying to avoid election is unknown. Three nominees was standard for the mayoral elections at this period; the Abbot of Reading, as lord of the town, picked one of them at Michaelmas. A century earlier the practice had been for the abbot to nominate the mayor.

"free-born"

Evidently part of the slander had been to call the mayor a bondsman, a common insult in towns.

"morrow speeches"

A name applied to assemblies of gild members, held in the morning.

"cofferers"

I.e. the financial officers (more usually known as treasurers or chamberlains).

"enactment and statute"

It appears to have been enacted in haste and/or anger, and was later annulled.

"portrait of him"

The transcription here is a little uncertain. However, it appears that the intent was to put up a "wanted poster", identifying the offender, as a further way of shaming him.

"created a mayoralty"

Although Henry III's charter of 1253 was directed to the mayor and burgesses of the merchant gild, it is risky to rely on the royal bureaucracy as an accurate source of information about the details of local government.

First, it is agreed to by the bailiffs and community of the town of Shrewsbury regarding the annual election of bailiffs and other town officials, from this time forth in perpetuity, that the two bailiffs of the town then in office shall, upon the day for electing the said officials – that is, the Friday following St. Giles' day in September – in front of the community take a public oath upon a [holy] book, administered by the town clerk then in office, that they shall openly in the town's guildhall, honestly and without any favouritism, choose 25 persons from the most honest and impartial commoners, burgesses, residents, permanent householders, and contributors to all kinds of levies within the town, using the form and procedure that follows. Without being influenced by gift, promises, bribe, friendship, favouritism, envy, enmity, or relationship regarding any person, nor for any other cause, by fraud, malice, collusion, or prior agreement by the bailiffs or any one of them, or by anyone else done in their names, they are not to fail to choose the said 25 persons from the best qualified and impartial commoners, in the fashion mentioned above, from those who are present in the guildhall at the time of the election (so long as there are sufficient qualified persons present to permit the election to be made); excepting those who have occupied the office of bailiff and those who were chosen to make the election the previous year. The bailiffs are not to choose the said 25 persons from some document already drawn up. The which 25 persons so chosen shall make the election under oath, sworn in the same manner as the bailiffs' was and administered by the town clerk. Then the town clerk is to question each under oath whether they, or any of them, have been suborned to choose any particular person for any office that falls under the election. If this examination discovers any person or persons to have been suborned, then he or they are to be removed and another qualified and impartial burgess of the town, in the said manner sworn and determined not to have been suborned, is to be put in his place. Then the 25 persons are to proceed, as already mentioned, with the election of two bailiffs for the coming year, [chosen] from the most honest, impartial, and qualified burgesses of the town, who are most competent to rule and govern the town properly and honestly according to the laws, customs and usages of the town. Each of the bailiffs who shall be so chosen is to possess £10 in lands or rents either in fee simple or for the term of his life, or his own possessions to the value of £100. Each of the bailiffs is to be a resident burgess, permanently domiciled, a householder, and contributors to to all kinds of levies within the town. If the 25 persons choose one or more bailiffs who do not meet the above qualifications, then each of them is to forfeit 20s. to the town community. If they cannot agree on who to elect, then the choice will be decided by the majority of the 25. If that majority chooses one or more bailiffs who do not meet the above qualifications, then each of that majority is to forfeit the said sum of 20s., to be levied by the bailiffs at that time in office, to the use of the community. Nor are the 25 persons to choose any official from their own number, but from other qualified and capable burgesses, as described previously. They are not to choose anyone for the office of bailiff who has been bailiff within the three previous years, upon penalty of forfeiting the said sum of 20s., levied as already indicated. And henceforth they are to choose no-one to the office of the 6 men after that person has already held the office of bailiff of the town, upon penalty of 20s. each, levied as already indicated.

The said 25 persons, under oath as already mentioned, are to choose 6 men who are called cessors, each of whom shall have [an income of] 26s.8d annually (beyond reprises) from lands or rents in fee simple or for the term of his life, or his own possessions to the value of £10, and is to be a bona fide burgess and resident of the town. [Which cessors are] to hold and occupy, from this time forward, the office responsible for receiving all kinds of communal revenues which come, or ought to come, annually to the communal Exchequer of the town, and faithfully and honestly administer those moneys for the profit of the community.

The said 25 persons shall choose, by their oath sworn in the manner already mentioned, two coroners for the town, [who are to be] qualified burgesses resident in the town, to occupy the office of coroner within the town and its franchise. The coroners are to oversee the community projects of the town during their term of office, to ensure they are properly carried out from time to time, in a reasonable and honest fashion, for the benefit of the community. Anyone who has been coroner for a year is not to be elected again to that office for the three years immediately following. Nor is anyone who has been one of the 6 men for a year to be elected again to that office for the three years immediately following. No-one who has served in the offices of coroner of 6 men within the town is to occupy the office of sergeant henceforth, upon penalty of 40s. upon each one [of the 25?], to be levied from each and every one by the bailiffs then in office, for the profit of the community.

It is agreed to that no-one is to speak with the 25 persons – neither past or future bailiffs, nor anyone else – once they have taken their oath and been examined in the manner already mentioned, and have been tasked with making the election; nor is to go with them into whatever place where the election shall be made. With the exception of the common clerk of the town then in office (or who shall be in future); and he is to take oath upon a book that he will not suborn, or have suborned, any of them to choose anyone particular for an office. So is he to behave until they or a majority of them have agreed [on their choices] in the way already indicated. They are not, nor is any one of them, to go out of the place to where the town clerk takes them for making the election, until the election has been made; upon penalty of 40s. from each of them, to be levied by the bailiffs then in office, for community use.

It is agreed to that the town bailiffs who are newly elected each year shall take oath upon a book in the presence of the community of the town, before they take up their office: that they shall be faithful and loyal to the king and his heirs; that they will honestly and properly maintain his peace within the town, and administer and govern the assizes of all kinds of foodstuffs within the town and its franchise; that they will do justice to poor as well as to rich; and that they will perform all the duties of the office honestly, to the utmost of their wisdom and ability, according to the laws, customs and usages of the town.

It is agreed to that the said 6 men, once elected in the manner already mentioned, shall publicly take oath upon a book, before the community: that every day assigned by the bailiffs and the 6 men for receiving community revenues they shall go to the communal Exchequer and there receive all such revenues as are brought there by various persons, and honestly and properly keep those moneys secure; also that they shall honestly and properly oversee all expenses and costs made by the bailiffs for the benefit and esteem of the town; and also to assist and advise the bailiffs for the benefit of the community.

The coroners who are elected annually are to take a public oath in the manner already mentioned: that they shall honestly and properly fulfill the duties of coroner within the town and franchise; oversee the communal projects of the town; and honestly and properly write down, or have written down, the details of those projects – where and when they were carried out, associated expenses and costs – and on a weekly basis deliver them to the bailiffs and 6 men in the town Exchequer. If any person disobeys and does the contrary, and will not comply with the aforesaid ordinance, he is to forfeit 40s., to be levied by the bailiffs then in office, to the use of the community. If the bailiffs are negligent and fail to levy that penalty, as aforesaid, each is to forfeit 66s.8d., [of which one-third is to go] to the use of the community, one-third to the king, and one-third to whoever sues the bailiffs on behalf of the king.

Those who have been, or shall in future be, bailiffs are each to have and take for their year's term of office a fee of 100s. and a gown worth

20s. (and no more). The steward of the town then in office is to have and take annually 40s. for his fee and a gown of the same style as the bailiffs', worth 20s. Each of the 6 men in office now or in the future is to have and take for his annual fee a gown worth 13s.4d for their labour. The common clerk of the town in office now or in the future is to have and take annually for his fee 40s. and a gown worth 13s.4d. of the same style as those of the 6 men. Also, the coroners in office now or in the future are to have and take from the community revenues, for their labour in overseeing the town projects, 12d. per week throughout the year, to be divided evenly between them. The bailiffs in office now or in the future are to be reimbursed for all reasonable expenses and costs incurred by them for the benefit and esteem of the town, at the time they render account; on condition that it has been confirmed by the 6 men (or at least 3 of them) that the expenses and costs have truly been incurred for the purposes indicated, otherwise their claims are not to be allowed.

It is agreed to that the bailiffs who will take office may appoint two town sergeants, from individuals for whom they are prepared to be answerable. A third town sergeant is to be chosen annually by the 25 persons, on election day; he is to be a bona fide burgess, qualified, resident, and contributor to all kinds of levies within the town. The sergeant is to be warden of the town gate called the Castle Gate. The third sergeant is also to be responsible for collection of the town rents, honestly delivering the same to the 6 men in the Exchequer on (at the latest) the day when the bailiffs and 6 men go over the accounts, and rendering a true account of the same. He is to receive annually for that labour 20s. from the community revenues, from the hands of the 6 men, and answer for everything that pertains to his duties. On the condition that this sergeant is to find suitable guarantors regarding levying the money assigned by the bailiffs for him to collect, and regarding turning it over to the 6 men in the communal Exchequer and rendering an honest account before the bailiffs and 6 men in the Exchequer, when they require him to do so; and regarding him being responsive and obedient to the bailiffs and their orders, as he ought to be. If that sergeant is unable to find guarantors for that purpose, in order to protect the bailiffs from being answerable, then the bailiffs may choose and appoint any sergeant for whom they will be answerable, at their own risk. Those sergeants are to render a proper and honest account of all issues and estreats of the court, after the end of every third court session. Also of fines from brewsters who, when they sell ale, break the assize customarily enforced in the town since ancient times; [they are to account] at the end of every quarter, or within that period if it is so ordered or required by the bailiffs and 6 men then in office. Also of all other revenues that are part of their duty to collect and ought to be put towards the common profit, [they are to account] at the end of each year, before the day when the bailiffs and 6 men go over the accounts.

Before they can take up office, the sergeants are to take oath upon a book before the bailiffs and 6 men then in office, in the community Exchequer, that each and every one of them: shall be faithful and loyal to the bailiffs, commoners, and franchises of the town; treat both poor and rich fairly; collect all moneys that the bailiffs assign them as their duty to levy, in the form of estreats or other revenues, for the profit of the community; render honest account of the same to the bailiffs and 6 men when they so require it; and be attendant on and obedient to the bailiffs, as they ought to be in their office. Each of them is to have and take annually, from community revenues, 26s.8d and a gown priced 10s. The sergeants are to be removed from office at the end of each year, along with the other officers. None of the sergeants is to occupy that office within the town [on terms] contrary to these ordinances, upon penalty of 133s.4d to be levied from each of them by the bailiffs then in office, to community use.

It is agreed to by the bailiffs and community that those who have been, or shall in future be, bailiffs and 6 men of the town shall henceforth choose and appoint tollreeves, from the most honest and most capable persons they can find, to collect the tolls and customs that ought to be taken at the town gate for community profit. Before they can occupy the office of tollreeve, they are to take oath upon a book, in the community Exchequer before the bailiffs and 6 men: to be faithful to the bailiffs and commoners of the town; and to bring to the community Exchequer of the town, whenever required by the bailiffs and 6 men, all revenues that they are supposed to collect for community profit. Once sworn, the tollreeves may receive and keep safe all the customs money sometimes called "sergeants' fees" that ought rightly to be collected at the gates, putting this money aside separately and then producing it and handing it over in the Exchequer, in the manner already mentioned, without fraud, conspiracy, or deceit [to withhold any], to be received and recorded annually in its own right. If any omission or deceit on the part of the tollreeves, or any one of them, is discovered and proven true before the bailiffs and 6 men, they are to be removed from office by the bailiffs and 6 men whenever so found in fault, and others put in their places. Furthermore, when legally convicted of the same, each is to forfeit 40s. and is to be imprisoned, without prospect of bail or mainprise, until that amount is raised and paid to the 6 men for community profit. If the bailiffs who were in office, or shall be in the future, do not impose the penalty specified in this article, then each of them is to forfeit 100s.; of which two-thirds go to the king, and one-third to the community.

It is agreed to be the bailiffs and community that no bailiff of the town shall henceforth receive or have in keeping any rents, customs, fines, nor other incomes or revenues that belong to the community. Rather these are to be taken to the community Exchequer and there paid and delivered to the 6 men, who may have the safekeeping of the same. Those who have been, or shall in future be, bailiffs may not reduce or waive any duties payable to the community without consulting and obtaining the agreement of the 6 men, or at least 3 of them, upon penalty of paying double the amount they have waived.

It is agreed to by the bailiffs and community that the bailiffs and 6 men shall render to auditors chosen annually by the community, under oath administered by the auditors, an accurate and honest account of all rents, revenues, and other profits already mentioned. The bailiffs are to carry out, or have carried out, their responsibility to the best of their knowledge – without any fraud, conspiracy or deceit – in bringing, or having brought, into the hands of the 6 men all rents, revenues, fines, and other profits that go, or ought to go, to the profit of the community during the year that they occupy the office of bailiff. Those 6 men are to have safekeeping of those community goods that remain at the close of every accounting, until the election day, when they should bring it before the commons in the guildhall and there be informed by the commons who shall [thereafter] have the keeping of the same, for community profit. If any future bailiff of the town obstructs or disturbs the 6 men in their safekeeping of the community goods, he is to forfeit £10; of which two-thirds go to the king, and one-third to the community. The auditors who are chosen by the community, according to a long-established process, to audit the accounts of the bailiffs and 6 men concerning community goods received by the 6 men, are henceforth after their election to take oath upon a book, administered by the common clerk, before the community to accept or reject them [i.e. the accounts] according to the form of the accounts, at their honest discretion. The bailiffs then in office are to have three peals of the community bell rung, to summon the commons together to choose the auditors. Henceforth the auditors are not to be chosen based on some petition drawn up, to the deceit of the community. Similarly, burgesses who are chosen to go to Parliament are henceforth to be chosen by the commons, in the same way and manner that the auditors are.

It is agreed to by the bailiffs and community that no bailiff during his term of office may buy or sell by retail any kind of foodstuffs, [nor] by means of collusion or underhandedness, contrary to parliamentary statutes and ordinances dealing with such cases. If he acts, personally or by others, contrary to those statutes and ordinances he is to forfeit – over and above the penalty specified in the statutes and ordinances – £20; of which two-thirds go to the king, and one-third to the community.

It is agreed to by the bailiffs and community that all distresses that remain in safekeeping among the community goods, not having been recovered by replevin, on the day when the bailiffs and 6 men, past or future, have to render their account are to be shown to the auditors during the accounting and they are to make a record of what distresses remain; with a view to them being handed over by the bailiffs and 6 men to their successors chosen for the year following, by indenture, on the Monday following election day, without further delay, for the profit of the community. No bailiff is to act contrary to the ordinance contained in this article, upon penalty of forfeiting 40s., two-thirds to the king and one-third to the community.

It is agreed to by the bailiffs and community that whenever the town bailiffs, past or future, make a public proclamation (as has long been the custom) that all burgesses of the town should come to the town guildhall, or send their sergeants to instruct individuals to come to the bailiffs for purposes of the good rule, government, and welfare of the town, if anyone stays away and refuses to respond to such proclamations or instructions, without a reasonable and good cause for being excused, he shall forfeit and lose to the community 12d., to be levied from his goods and possessions by the bailiffs, without any remission, for the profit of the community. If the bailiffs are negligent in thus levying the penalty, they are to forfeit 2s.; of which two-thirds to the king and one-third to the community.

It is agreed to by the bailiffs and community that if any burgess or resident of the town is attached by any of the sergeants, in relation to any personal action within the town, that they are not to take him to gaol nor demand any fee from him if he can find within the town or franchise sufficient guarantors for his coming to answer to the king or to the other party, depending on the requirements of the case, at whatever time is assigned him by the bailiffs in office now or in the future. If any sergeant does the contrary to this ordinance, he shall forfeit 20s. to the community, to be levied by the bailiffs then in office. And every time that any of the sergeants acts contrary to this ordinance he is to forfeit 20s., to be levied from him as already indicated. If then bailiffs then in office fail to levy the penalty found to be warranted, they are to forfeit 100s.; of which two-thirds to the king and one-third to the community.

It is agreed to by the bailiffs and community that, if any burgess of the town or franchise is being vexatiously sued or in any other way harassed so as to be in danger of losing his goods in relation to communal business of the town, and proper examination finds this indeed to be the case so that the bailiffs and community know it to be true, then the community goods may be used to defend him or them, or preserve them from any [\[personal\]](#) losses. If the bailiff or bailiffs are negligent in this and will not use their power and such of the community goods as seems reasonable to reimburse, by the hands of the 6 men, him or them thus vexed for reasonable expenses and costs in defending himself or themselves (assuming there to be sufficient goods in the communal treasury of the town), then the bailiff or bailiffs are to forfeit the penalty that follows in this ordinance: that is, each of the bailiffs, if they or either of them is found at fault, is to forfeit 40s.; of which two-thirds to the king and one-third to the community.

It is agreed to by the bailiffs and community, that if any person or persons creates any disturbance in infringement of the king's peace within the town, and this is duly proved by verdict of 12 qualified and impartial persons of the town, and [he is] duly convicted of the same according to the custom of the town, before the bailiffs then in office in the guildhall, then he or they are each to forfeit 3s.4d, to be levied by the bailiffs for the use of the community, without any remission. If any person or persons commit an assault, striking any man in infringement of the king's peace within the town, and this is duly proved as already indicated, he is to forfeit 3s.4d, to be levied in the manner indicated. If any person or persons draw blood when assaulting someone, in infringement of the king's peace within the town, and this is duly proved as already indicated, he or they are each to forfeit 6s.8d, to be levied in the manner indicated. If the bailiffs then in office do not impose those penalties, so that such a penalty shall in the future happen to be lost, then they are to forfeit double the amount of the penalty; of which two-thirds to the king and one-third to the community.

It is agreed to by the bailiffs and community that the common seal of the town be kept in the common coffer, as has been the case in the past; and that 4 respectable men of the town, chosen by the commons, shall have the 4 keys to the locks in their safekeeping. Neither the bailiffs, those now in office or those to be, nor anyone else is to remove the seal from the coffer for purposes of sealing any grant made to any person by the bailiffs and community, without the consent of 24 respectable men, burgesses of the town; they are to oversee the removal of the seal, sealings, and the restoration of the seal into the coffer. All documents belonging to the community of the town that exist now or shall exist in future are to be put into the coffer, and safeguarded and administered in the manner indicated. If anyone acts contrary to the ordinance contained in this article, he is to forfeit £20; of which two-thirds to the king and one-third to the community. Also, the account rolls of the bailiffs and 6 men then in office are from year to year to be deposited as [official] record, indented between the bailiffs and 6 men, as one party, and the auditors chosen annually to audit the accounts of the bailiffs and 6 men, as the other party. And all burgess rolls, community compositions, and court rolls are to be placed and kept in that coffer.

It is agreed to by the bailiffs and community, for the good rule and government of the town in the future, that the bailiffs and community and their successors shall choose 12 respectable men [who are] burgesses, residents, and the most qualified and judicious men of the town, to be permanent assistants to the bailiffs then in office, giving them good advice beneficial to the community whenever they are summoned to come to the bailiffs in the guildhall. They are to remain as such for life, unless they have to be discharged from the office due to some reason deserving it by judgement of the bailiffs and community. If any of them dies or is discharged, then another qualified and deserving burgess of the town is to be chosen in his place by the bailiffs and commons; he is to take oath upon a book to be faithful to the bailiffs and community and to his franchise. If any of them absent themselves without good cause, when summoned by the bailiffs, or either of them or by any of their sergeants, and refuses to come to the bailiffs for the purpose mentioned, then he is to forfeit 3s.4d to the community of the town, to be levied from his goods and possessions by the bailiffs then in office, without any remission. If the bailiffs then in office are negligent in levying the penalty, they are to forfeit 6s.8d; of which two-thirds to the king and one-third to the community.

It is agreed to by the bailiffs and community that if any burgess or resident of the town interferes with or opposes any of the above ordinances, through collusion, conspiracy or any other method, or directly or indirectly stirs up any opposition to or interference with any of these ordinances in the future, or obstructs or prevents the bailiffs then in office from levying the penalties prescribed above as forfeits, then he is to be deprived of all offices and of his freedom within the town, for life; nor is he to be made free, nor listened to, nor have a voice in any common assembly regarding any matter that concerns the community. If in the future any man who is chosen to the office of bailiff refuses that office after being duly elected to it, in the manner already indicated, he is to forfeit £26.13s.4d, to be levied from his lands, goods and possessions by the bailiffs then in office, for the profit of the community. If the bailiffs then in office do not carry out the stipulations made in this article, failing to levy the penalty mentioned so that the penalty is lost (unless they are obstructed from doing it), then each of them is to forfeit £40; of which two-thirds to the king and one-third to the community.

If any person or persons who are subjected to forfeiting various penalties to the town community, as indicated in the above articles, lack the means to pay such penalties, then the town bailiffs then in office are to arrest them – if they can be found within the town or franchise – and commit them to prison, to be kept securely there until they have made an agreement [for payment] of the penalties to the community.

If the town bailiffs, or either of them, or any other person who is (due to the above ordinances) subjected to a penalty payable to the king, is for that reason indicted before the king or his council or any of his justices, he or they are to be tried as to whether guilty or not of [the offence giving rise to] the penalty by 12 qualified and impartial burgesses of the town and franchise, and not by anyone else.

It is agreed to by the bailiffs and community that henceforth on every day when the bailiffs, 6 men, coroners, and other town officers are elected, all the above articles and ordinances shall be read out loud before the commons, by the common clerk of the town then in office, before any action is taken regarding the elections. This is so that all the commons shall hear and know the good rules for government of the town contained in the ordinances, and can shun and avoid the offences clearly identified in the articles and ordinances.

DISCUSSION

The late fourteenth and first half of the fifteenth centuries were a period of constitutional upheaval in many towns, as urban societies tried to come to terms with changes – rooted partly in changes in the economy and the national legal system – that had stimulated social differentiation, so that a "ruling class" had become more evident within society. These changes had undermined the sense of communal welfare and created concern that the interests of the rulers, or of specific groups or even individuals within the ruling class, were different from the best interests of the community as a whole and might lead to administrative abuses. Such concerns were not new, for they are apparent in the late thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries, but they seem to have had a new vigour towards the end of the Middle Ages, as the ruled sensed their last vestiges of authority slipping from their grasp and tried to reassert some control.

So it was at Shrewsbury, where the 1380s were marked by internal constitutional conflict. An agreement in 1389 dictated that bailiffs, coroners and cessors be elected by a jury of 25 – a device that, from one perspective, allowed the community through representation to have a say in the choice of its officers, and from the other perspective prevented unruly elections in which the community at large might participate in the voting. The bailiffs were to choose their own sergeants.

These were basically the terms of the 1433 ordinances, evidently one of the "community compositions" referred to within the text, except for:

- the community choosing a third sergeant with specific responsibilities for collecting certain communal revenues
- specifications aimed at avoid the choices made by the 25 being unduly influenced by others
- specifications of those eligible and those ineligible for offices

It was also not uncommon for one constitutional composition, often imposed by a particular party in power, to be modified or even overturned later. In some cases this can be seen as the result of other interests taking control of local government, although in others it may simply have been further tinkering to resolve difficulties. One key feature of the 1433 constitution, however, was the effort to have it receive the authority of parliament, thereby making it difficult to overturn simply by local decision.

This constitutional composition is fairly typical of those of other towns in its broad areas of concern: methods of electing officers, candidates' qualifications, financial accountability, proper performance of duties, and checks on the potential for misgovernment. The unusually detailed provisions for electoral procedures, handling of borough revenues and particular circumstances related to those matters, may be suspected of addressing specific problems encountered in past elections since 1389.

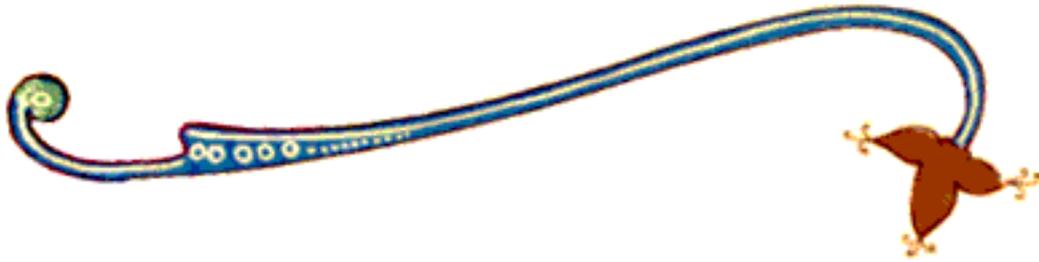

The 1433 constitution was likely a compromise between competing political viewpoints. The document takes care to emphasize the community as the source of authority and the owner of revenues, archives, etc. On the other hand we see the tell-tale signs creeping in of an institutionalized separation of ruling class and ruled, in the town councillors who are appointed for life, in contrast to the emphasis on annual elections for other officers.

In 1444 Shrewsbury again petitioned parliament to give its approval to a set of constitutional ordinances, in many regards the same as those of 1433 (which were claimed in 1444 as having brought peace and harmony to the town), but with some key differences. For instance, the 25 electors were now to be chosen not by the bailiffs, but by two members of the lower council of 24, those two members were themselves to be selected by the bailiffs. Thus the electoral process was becoming more complex, in an attempt to ensure elections could not be rigged.

The 1444 constitutions overall represent an elaboration of their predecessors, doubtless attempting to plug holes in the 1433 set, as well as to add elements missing in 1433, but also evidence continuation of the undermining of democratic principles. The life-council of 12 had now dignified themselves through the title "aldermen" and vacancies in their ranks were to be filled by their own choice. The "24 commoners" a group mentioned only peripherally in the 1433 document (unless we assume that the "commons" frequently referred to were already the community as represented by the lower council) has come more to the fore, as a second council elected by the community – a further reflection of the growing socio-political divide within the community. However, that the members of this council also had been elected for life, and would fill vacancies in its ranks by their own choice, effectively put this body outside democratic control, despite the fact that it was expected to speak for the community (whose other members could no longer speak directly during assembly debates).

These restrictions on what was previously a more 'democratic' form of government were probably made palatable to the community by including among the ordinances controls over the administration of borough finances – for example, in 1443 we also hear of a new financial officer, the chamberlain, although the 6 men continue to have a role – and regulations regarding officers' fees; both matters addressing popular concerns over believed corruption in government. A closer comparison between the two documents would throw further light on the directions in which local government was heading.

NOTES

"St. Giles day"

The first of September.

"contributor to all kinds of levies"

I.e. at scot and lot.

"to possess"

The financial requirement was for an income of £10 to be received from the property or rents – either owned by the candidate or held as a life interest (e.g. as a widower holding property of his late wife), or a larger amount in moveables which would qualify those merchants whose wealth was invested in stock rather than land.

"cessors"

They were responsible for the collection and expenditure of community money, and were thus like officers called in most towns treasurers or chamberlains. Cessor was applied to tax-collectors, while essor was used for officers of the Exchequer (the financial office of government). "Assessors" would be a modern term that is associated.

"reprises"

This refers to the deductions from income, such as rents resolute due on real estate.

"Castle Gate"

The northern entrance to the town, immediately beside the castle.

"issues and estreats"

Largely, the fines and amercements imposed by the court, which it typically fell to sergeants to collect.

"replevin"

This was what a defendant in a legal action, whose possessions had been distrained to pressure him to answer to justice, had to do to get back the impounded articles: he had to appear before the authorities and provide guarantees that he would come to court to defend.

"indenture"

An agreement written out in a sufficient number of copies that each party to the agreement had a copy. They were called indentures because typically the copies were written on a single membrane of parchment, which was then cut between the copies in a wavy or zig-zag line, so that the future fitting together of the pieces (if necessary because of legal challenge) would prove the pieces were genuine parts of the original.

"burgess rolls"

Records of men who purchased burgess status, which accorded them the privileges associated with the chartered liberties of the borough. The rolls record the names of entrants, the fees they paid to purchase entrance, and the names of their offspring (since only offspring born after entrance were entitled to inherit burgess status without payment of a fee).

"and of his freedom"

Being deprived of freedom does not here mean imprisonment, but loss of the special privileges of a freeman, i.e. disfranchisement.

TRANSLATION

It is the case that there have always been mayors in this respectable town, since the Conquest and earlier. After Bristol castle was founded and built by the noble earl of Gloucester, Robert Consul the bastard son of King Henry Beauclerk, the youngest son of William the Conqueror, each year on Michaelmas day [\[September 29\]](#) the mayors of that time used to go there and at the gate of Bristol castle receive their office and take their oath [\[of office\]](#) before the constable of the castle. This custom continued until the blessed prince King Edward III came [\[to the throne\]](#); he, among other franchises that he kindly granted, through his charters exempted and exonerated the mayors from receiving their office from the constable at the castle gate; instead providing in the same that from that time forward each mayor would on Michaelmas day receive office and take oath before his predecessor in the Bristol Guildhall, in the presence of all of the community who were there. For which reason it has ever since been the custom that the four sergeants who attend the mayor shall, on St. Giles' day, the first day of September, forewarn all the respectable men of the council of Bristol to come to their council chamber in the Guildhall on September 15, for the election of their mayor and other officers for the year to follow, each of them upon penalty of £10 [for default] (as was ordained in the time of Stephen le Spycer, who was mayor in 1344). Once they – the mayor, the sheriff, and all their colleagues – are seated in the council chamber, the mayor first exhorts each and every one of them, with a Paternoster and an Ave, to pray for the Holy Ghost to influence the election. After which, the mayor is first to declare his vote for some respectable member of the company, and the sheriff follows suit, and so all those present are canvassed, each man giving his vote as he wishes; all being recorded by the town clerk, on the basis of which he reports and identifies the one who has most votes. Which person who has been duly elected mayor gets up from where he is sitting and takes a seat on the right side of the outgoing mayor. And after any further discussions at that time, certain of the company shall provide an honour escort for him when he returns to his home.

All this being done, the person elected mayor shall have opportunity, until Michaelmas day following (on whatever day it may fall that year) to make provision for his household and the respectable decoration of his house, in as pleasing a fashion as he can. The mayor-elect, accompanied by the sheriff and his colleagues of the council, who go to his house to escort him to the Guildhall, shall then proceed to the hall in as solemn and dignified a manner as he can arrange, to his own credit and for the honour and praise of the entire town. Which is to say that if he has previously served as mayor, he is to come in his robe of office – that is, his fur-lined scarlet cloak, with his black velour hood or black velvet cap, and all those who have served as mayor in the same costume and livery, with cloaks. If he has not previously been mayor, then he is to come in his scarlet gown, without a cloak, and all others who have been mayor in the same attire, but their servants may carry their cloaks after them. After the common bell has stopped ringing, the outgoing mayor, standing with solemnity on the high dais of the Guildhall, makes his farewell to his colleagues and all the commoners who are present, in the following fashion:

Honourable gentlemen, my friends, you will recall that on this day, twelve months ago, I, although unworthy, was sworn into the office of mayor of this proud city for the year now past. If, sirs, I have wilfully or through negligence treated any man or woman unjustly or unscrupulously, I beg them to approach me, and I am prepared to put to rights any wrong I have done them, either by compensation if I possess the means, or else by asking their forgiveness with the utmost sincerity, trusting in God that they shall [thereafter] have no further cause for complaint.

Furthermore, gentlemen and friends, I cannot thank you as much as you deserve for your kindness, in that you have at all times respected and obeyed the laws of our liege lord the king and my orders given in his name. For which, since I myself am not in a position to assure it to you, I pray that almighty God will reward you with as much happiness, prosperity and peace as common folk and true Christians ever had.

Furthermore, gentlemen and friends, here is a respectable man, A.B., chosen to be our mayor for the year coming, who – through God's grace and his own great wisdom – will improve and correct all matters that I, with my limited abilities, have not been able to address or bring to a conclusion. Honourable gentlemen and friends, may the Holy Trinity bless you all and long keep you prosperous, peaceful and contented, and be with you always. Amen.

After this is done, still standing on the high dais of the Guildhall, in front of all the commons, the outgoing mayor is to hold a book before the mayor-elect, and the town clerk is to stand up with his book and read out the mayor's oath and the duties of office, in the following manner:

Now hear this, A.B. my predecessor as mayor, and all the good people of Bristol, that I, R.S., shall be true and faithful to King Edward the Fourth, king of England, our supreme liege lord, and to his heirs and successors, and to the best of my ability I shall protect and preserve this his town of Bristol for him and his heirs and successors. I shall preserve and uphold the peace of this town to the best of my ability. I shall reprimand and discipline those who behave badly or commit wrongs, as law and reason require, to the best of my ability. I shall to the best of my ability uphold in the town all those franchises and free customs which are good, while all bad customs and errors I shall put aside and abolish. I shall to the best of my ability preserve, maintain and protect the rights of widows and orphans of this town. I shall well and truly serve the king in the office of escheator of the county of Bristol. I shall work with all my skill and ability to the profit of the king in all things that are my duties require, and I shall faithfully uphold his rights in whatever belongs to the Crown. I shall not consent to the transgression, nor be involved in the concealment, of the king's rights or franchises. Wherever I know of the rights of the Crown being concealed or withheld – whether regarding lands, rents, franchises, or suits – I shall do my utmost to counteract and correct this; and, if I should be unable, I shall inform the king or those members of his council who I know will convey the information to the king. I shall treat the people under my jurisdiction honestly and justly, and give justice to every man – as much to the poor as to the rich – in all duties I must perform. Not for gift, love, friendship, promises, nor hate, shall I do wrong to any man, nor infringe any man's rights. I shall accept nothing as a result of which the king might suffer a loss, or his rights be infringed. I shall hold my inquests in public places, not in private, and then by indenture, as required by the Statute of Escheators. [see note] I shall be painstaking and diligent in suppressing, stopping and eliminating any kind of heresy or erroneous beliefs, commonly called lollardries, within my jurisdiction from time to time, to the best of my ability. And I shall assist the Ordinaries and Commissaries of Holy Church, supporting and siding with them at all times, in all just causes, whenever requested to by those Ordinaries or Commissaries. I shall also help, support and side with the Prior and his brethren, the priests of the house of the Kalendars of Bristol, in all actions I, as its patron, can lawfully and honestly undertake, regarding the verification and protection of the rents, lands and tenements belonging to that house, saving the rights of every man. I shall also uphold, preserve and maintain all commendable ordinances that have been made and enforced in the past by previous mayors, aldermen, sheriffs, and the common council of the town, if not [since] revoked or repealed; [see note] as well as all that shall be made in the future, until the time that they may be revoked or repealed by the mayor, aldermen, sheriffs, and common council of the town then in office, to the best of my ability and well and truly. I shall give justice to every man, as much to the poor as to the rich. And all other things that are part of the duties of the mayor and of the escheator I will perform faithfully. So help me God at the holy doom.

And then he kisses the book.

Following this, the outgoing mayor delivers to the new mayor the king's sword, his [ceremonial] hat, and the casket containing the seal of the office, the seal of the statute of the staple, the seal of the statute merchant, as well as other authentic seals. Then the two mayors exchange places, after which they proceed from the hall. The whole company is to escort the new mayor to his house, with trumpeters and clareners, in as respectable, serious, and joyous a fashion as can be accomplished; and there they are to leave the new mayor, and then escort home the outgoing mayor.

It has been the custom on that Michaelmas day for the greater part of the council to dine with both mayors; that is, a large number of them with the new mayor, and others with the old mayor – in particular, all officials are to dine with the old mayor. After dinner, the whole council is to assemble at the High Cross, from where the new and old mayors, with the whole company, walk in a dignified fashion to St. Michael's church to make an offering. Thereafter they return to the new mayor's house, where they take cakebread and wine. And then, each man bids farewell to the mayor and returns home to evensong.

It has also been the custom that on the day after Michaelmas the new mayor, the sheriff and certain of their colleagues go to the Counter and summon before them the bailiffs, town clerk, steward, and all the sergeants of Bristol, together with the gatekeepers of the town. From the Counter they proceed to the Guildhall, where they take their oaths [of office] in the terms contained in the Red Book made a long time ago by the decision of the community of Bristol and to be preserved forever. Immediately after which, one of the bailiffs is to go, by the mayor's command, to preside over the market court.

It has also been the custom that on the third day after Michaelmas, after oaths have been administered to all other officers, the mayor shall summon before him the most venerable of his colleagues on the council, so that they may accompany him to the Guildhall, where are to be read out publicly the sheriff's commission, the dedimus potestatem, and the writ of attendance. Following which the sheriff is to take his oath, in the terms given in a schedule sent from the king, enclosed within the dedimus potestatem (if it has arrived by then).

Similarly, on the same occasion, the commission of the mayor of the staple is to be read out, together with the dedimus potestatem, and the mayor is to take his oath upon the same, in the terms given in a schedule enclosed within the dedimus potestatem (if it has arrived by then). And the same for the two constables [of the staple].

It has also been the custom for the mayor, on the same day, to summon before him all his sergeants and have them bring their sureties. Who are to be obligated with them towards the mayor, each in a bond of £10 or £13.6.8d [guaranteeing] their [i.e. the sergeants'] good behaviour and faithful execution of their duties during the year, both in the staple court and elsewhere, in regard to conscientiousness in levying and honesty in handing over, to the mayor or to such persons to whom recoveries belong as their right, all kinds of fines, revenues, amercements, penalties, and executions [of judgements] made and recovered at any time in the mayor's court.

Similarly, at the same time, they summon before them [sic] the sheriff's sergeants, who are to put up a bond in the same way to the bailiffs, for the year to come.

It has also been the custom, on the fourth day following Michaelmas, that the new mayor has summoned to come before him at the Counter all the chantry priests with whom agreements are registered in the Red Book – that is, the priests [of the chantries] of Everard le Frenshe, Richard Spicer, John Spicer, John Stoke, Walter Frampton, Edmond Blanket, Thomas Halleweye, John Burton, William Canynges, John Shipward, and Thomas Rowley – so that they can take oath to observe faithfully the terms of the agreements. Their oaths are to be taken in the following way; that is, each of them is to lay his left hand upon the book, and his right hand upon his breast, and to swear the oath by the holy gospel and by words used in holy services.

It has also been the custom, on that fourth day after Michaelmas and in the days following, for the mayor to have summoned to appear before him all the masters of the bakers, brewers, butchers and other crafts of the town. Thereafter they go and assemble [the craftsmen] at their halls or other customary [meeting] places, for purposes of electing their masters for the coming year. Then to bring those masters and present them before the mayor, where they are to take their oaths in the mayor's presence, in the terms indicated in the Red Book.

Following which, the mayor is to command each of his sergeants – and ensure they comply – to bring before him from each ward of Bristol as many honest and suitable persons as each ward demands and rightfully requires (according to the discretion of the mayor) to be sworn as constables for the year coming.

It has also been the custom in the town that the following Saturday, after the market court session has concluded, the mayor will have proclaimed within the town all the articles of communal regulations concerning victuallers and other [market?] matters ordained in times past by the decision of the community of Bristol. After which, the mayor is to proceed to the holding of his court [to hear] all kinds of actions brought before the mayor and sheriff in person, or before the bailiffs then in office. And then to designate and announce the days for assizes and real actions concerning real estate, in a form that includes that all plaintiffs and defendants, claimants and tenants, who have any litigation before the mayor and sheriff of Bristol, or the mayor and bailiffs of Bristol, regarding any assize or other real actions should appear on the date assigned them at the Bristol Guildhall.

It has also been the custom that within a month after Michaelmas day, the mayor, sheriff and bailiffs of Bristol shall hold a lawday in the Guildhall, summoning thereto (by the town clerk of the town) first the entire council of Bristol, without any amerancements, and next summoning all freeholders and common suitors, upon penalty of amerancement, and finally to summon the constables of every ward. And then proceeding to the inquests. Once the town clerk has made a record of the lawday, within 7 or 8 days after that the mayor, sheriff and bailiffs are to hold the affeering day, and on that basis the town clerk is to compile his estreats for the bailiffs, keeping a register of the same to remain in the mayor's keeping, as has been the practice and custom since ancient times.

DISCUSSION

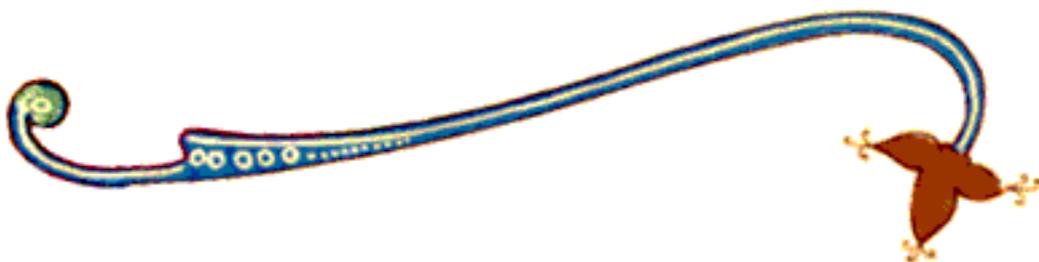

This account was produced by newly-appointed town clerk Robert Ricart, at the request of the mayor then in office, as part of a larger reference work intended to provide guidance to Bristol officials in performing their duties. William Spencer, the mayor in question, had been elected to his third and final (non-consecutive) term in office in 1479 when he commissioned the work from Ricart. This is therefore accepted as the year when the book of "various chronicles, customs, laws, liberties and other memoranda and things necessary [to have recorded]", to be known as the Maire of Bristowe is Register, or ellis the Maire is Kalender was planned out and commenced. The compilation doubtless was made over a period of time, and later clerks made a few post-medieval additions.

The manual for mayoral administration provides a relatively intimate look at the annual renewal of local government, its formalized procedures, and its institutions. This level of detail was not something generally committed to writing until towards the close of the Middle Ages, and cannot be taken as evidence for the early period of local self-government. Ricart goes on, after the account of electoral procedures and the initial activities to re-empower other agencies of local administration, to identify other duties of the mayor. Those included ceremonial events and attending the obits of benefactors of the town, holding the assizes of bread and ale, regulating of the price of firewood during the winter season, supervising commerce in coal, auditing the accounts of William Canynges' chantries in St. Mary, Redcliffe, and presiding over weekday court sessions.

The audacious declaration that Bristol had been governed by mayors since pre-Conquest times is not atypical of urban legend, but even the chronicle and list of officers that Ricart compiled cannot extend the names of mayors before 1217 (and the list becomes increasingly unreliable the further back in time it extends), and there is independent evidence suggesting that Bristol first began to elect mayors ca.1216, even though the king refused for some decades to give official countenance to a mayor answerable to the community rather than to him. However, we must allow for the perception that the mayor was simply the successor of the reeve who had indeed taken a leading role in local government since Anglo-Saxon times. Historians do, on the other hand, concur that the great stone keep was probably built by Robert earl of Gloucester, although possibly to strengthen an earlier fortification.

An illustration of the swearing-in of the mayor-elect was made for inclusion in the mayor's register. I have elsewhere shown and interpreted this (on the hypothesis that it represents events of 1479). It is interesting to compare the outgoing mayor's valedictory speech with the recommendations on this subject by Latini, in section 5 of his treatise on the proper qualities and behaviour of rulers; although there are similarities, we cannot conclude with certainty that there was either a direct or indirect influence. There are other points of agreement between the two documents (e.g. upholding the rights of widows and orphans), but again this could reflect a common medieval attitude, rather than direct influence of Latini on English political thought.

"in the same attire"

The aim here was for the mayor-elect not to be outdressed by his fellows, as well as to indicate unity.

"book"

This would probably have been the Bible, although in some towns an unidentified book was kept for the specific purpose of oaths, while in others a register of the town liberties and ordinances may have been used.

"escheator"

An official responsible for investigating cases of escheat (lands forfeitable to the king for various reasons).

"county of Bristol"

Bristol obtained county status in 1373.

"accept nothing"

The inference here is probably to bribery, although the medieval line on this was slightly different to the modern one.

"see note"

The following passage, from "I shall be painstaking" to "the rights of every man" has been placed within parentheses by the editor, without explanation. This type of clause is quite unusual in oaths of urban officers, and possibly represents some kind of interpolation, although the reference to lollardries indicates the passage cannot be earlier than late 14th century, and the way in which the term is used suggests more an early to mid-15th century date. In the post-medieval period, there was a good deal of tinkering with the mayoral oath, and the medieval version is also likely to have undergone changes over time – the final clauses of the oath seem to evidence such.

"Ordinaries and Commissaries"

An ordinary was an ecclesiastical official whose office entailed ongoing administrative or judicial functions, while a commissary was someone delegated with such duties for a temporary period in order to address a specific circumstance (i.e. a commissioner). Both investigated cases of heresy.

"Kalendars"

In part because of the name Ricart proposed for this book (see above), there has been speculation as to the nature of the Kalendars gild. Ricart is suspected to have himself been a lay brother of the gild, or otherwise employed by the church (All Saints) with which the gild was associated. The early history of this socio-religious gild is shrouded in legend; it may have had a role in educating converted Jews in Christian beliefs. A set of regulations for the gild, of which we have only a 15th-century copy, were said to have been approved by an early 13th-century Bishop of Worcester; these are remarkable more for their date (if genuine) than for demonstrating roles and activities other than were typically associated with socio-religious guilds. Its early existence, the fact it was primarily for priests but also open to lay townspeople, and its acquisition of property in Bristol may all help explain why local government seems to have taken it under its wing, and why the Little Red Book of Bristol incorporates copies of a number of records relating to the guild. In the 1460s it built a library – presumably to house a collection of documents that had been growing over time – which was open to public consultation. A post-medieval account of the guild stated that it served an archival function, holding the town records and those of other guilds across England, but this appears unfounded and perhaps a colourful misinterpretation of an inquisition of 1318 into the loss of the guild's own records. The application of Kalendars to the guild and to the mayor's register may simply be coincidence; the guild name may have derived from meetings held on the kalends of each month.

"see note"

The passage from "as well as" to "well and truly" has been placed within parentheses by the editor, without explanation, but possibly indicative of some interpolation. The sentence that follows repeats a promise already made.

"statute of the staple" "statute merchant"

The mayor was ex officio the executive officer of the staple organization (certain towns being designated as staples, viz. the requisite points through which certain goods had to be exported or imported, beginning in 1353), and again responsible ex officio for administration of the statute merchant, which provided an official venue before which recognizance could be made of mercantile debts.

"clareners"

The term derives from a wind instrument that was considered a kind of trumpet but perhaps was more similar to a shawm.

"Counter"

The place where the mayor and bureaucratic officers carried on the day-to-day business of the town.

"Red Book"

An extensive series of 14th century oaths of office are recorded in the Little Red Book ff.17-21; the editor of the published transcript, Francis Bickley, believed it to have been begun ca.1344. These oaths reflect the breadth of municipal bureaucracy and municipal responsibilities in a large town of this period; oaths are recorded for the mayor, bailiffs, stewards (financial officers), recorder (legal advisor), town clerk, clerk of the Tundere (the original borough court, its name a corruption of "hundred"), mayor's sergeants, king's sergeants (serving the bailiffs presiding in the Tundere), constables of the peace, coroner, sergeant of marine (supervising the quayside), testament provers (probably ad hoc rather than a formal office), gatekeepers, craft wardens, assayers of weights and measures, woad brokers (supervisors of commerce in this item), woad porters, toll collector, gaoler, wine porter, and common surveyor (supervisor of public works). For comparison with the version given by Ricart, the mayor's oath is as follows: "Now hear this, sir Constable and good people, that I A. de B. will be faithful and loyal to our lord king Edward and his heirs. To the best of my ability I shall faithfully protect and preserve this his town of Bristol for him and his heirs and for my lady Queen Philippa, to which lady this town has been granted for her lifetime. I shall preserve and firmly uphold the peace of this town to the best of my ability. I shall reprimand and discipline those who behave foolishly or commit wrongs, according to law and reason, to the best of my ability. I shall uphold and protect in the town the franchises and free customs that are good. Bad customs and errors I shall put aside and abolish, to the best of my ability. I shall to the best of my ability preserve, maintain and protect the rights of widows and orphans of this town. I shall to the best of my ability do right even-handedly to all folk, rich or poor, citizens or outsiders, without acting contrarily due to love, malevolence, or any other cause. And that I shall not grant the franchise, nor permit it to be granted, to any outsider without a fee of £10 being paid to the community, so help me God and his saints." (The last clause being an evident interpolation, which was later crossed out).

"third day"

Possibly inclusive.

"dedimus potestatem"

A royal writ delegating authority to the sheriff.

"execution of their duties"

This somewhat convoluted sentence (not atypical for documents in medieval legalese or bureaucratese) refers to the role of sergeants in enforcing court judgements via the collection of fines or restoration of goods or moneys awarded to a party; as this type of officer seems to have been particularly susceptible to bribery, it was common to require guarantors of good performance.

"agreements"

Several of the specific agreements are found in the Little Red Book, ff.77-90. Local governments were often given responsibility by testators for overseeing the maintenance of chantries, often in return for material rewards or benefits. Those agreements mentioned here that are in the Little Red Book date to the second half of the fourteenth century, while another on ff.157-59 is dated 1453; two agreements from the first half of the fourteenth century are not mentioned and the chantries were presumably no longer being maintained by Ricart's time.

"masters"

I.e. the guild wardens, responsible for supervising the craft regulations and reporting irregularities to urban authorities.

"terms indicated in the Red Book"

Oaths of wardens of the weavers, girdlers, tanners, and shoemakers are found in the Little Red Book among the oaths of urban officials (see note above), and may have sufficed as models for the oaths of other craft wardens, mutatis mutandis.

"market court"

Our knowledge of the evolution of medieval Bristol courts is murky, but it is possible that the market court was a special session of the hundred court dealing with mercantile suits (perhaps piepowder) and may even have convened in or near the marketplace, where the Tolsey court was based.

"assizes and real actions"

Disputes involving real estate; assizes being a particular form of legal proceeding, involving a jury, to address certain types of disputes over property.

"lawday"

On a few occasions each year a general court session was held at which were bound to appear all who owed suit, i.e. anyone holding property within the town – unless it were of an independent franchise within the town boundaries, such as (in Bristol's case) the franchises of the Knights Hospitaller (known as the Temple Fee) and of St. Augustine's Abbey; as opposed to more regular court sessions where only parties involved in litigation were obliged to turn up. In some places, these general assemblies provided a convenient occasion for matters such as view of frankpledge, presentment of offences against the community (constables often taking responsibility for ward presentments), and the assizes of bread, ale.

"without any amercements"

This would appear to mean that the councillors (in that role) were not subject to amercement for failure to appear, unlike individuals who owed suit to the court (i.e. were obliged to bring any related complaints before this court, or similarly were answerable to any complaints or actions regarding, or responsible for any dues from, such property).

"affeering" "estreats"

The assessment of fines on the offences, usually undertaken by a jury of affeerors; the town clerk would then add the assessments to the court record, as well as compile a list of offenders and their fines (estreats) that the bailiffs' (king's) sergeants would use for collection and accounting purposes.

TRANSLATION

The mayor and his colleagues have been informed, in writing and by other means, that our sovereign lord the king and certain of his nobles have learned of various inappropriate behaviours, particularly among the community of this town, that took place in times past at their Common Halls. They have been so displeased by the same that, unless a remedy is found, it is likely to result in the permanent loss and undoing of the principal liberties and franchises of this town, which God forbid! Not only that, but such rumours and talk are spreading throughout the country that, as they grow, are likely to reflect dishonourably on and to the discredit of the body of this town and every member of the same.

To remedy and correct that situation, this act and ordinance was conceived and proposed through the counsel, deliberation, and judgement of mayor Richard Gillot and all his colleagues then [\[in office\]](#) in the town of Leicester, with the general and freely given assent, consent, and agreement of all the commons of the town assembled together.

At a communal assembly held at Leicester on 16 October 1467, during the mayoralty of Richard Gillot, by the assent and agreement of the mayor and his colleagues and all the commons who were present there, it is ordained, agreed, established and enacted in the following form that, if any person or persons enter and remain within the gildhall while any communal assembly is being held, or shall be held, including the day of electing the mayor along with all other communal assemblies, unless they are enfranchised (that is, have entered the Chapman's Gild), then he or they, every one of them, is forthwith to be committed to prison at the mayor's command. To remain there for 40 days, at the mayor's pleasure, paying 40d. to the chamberlains then in office towards town revenues before he can be released from prison, without remission or pardon of any part [\[of this sentence\]](#).

It is also ordained, agreed and enacted that if any person or persons, no matter what his status or authority, calls out the name of one of the mayor's colleagues for the office of mayor, prior to the mayor commanding the [\[town\]](#) crier to cry a "Hear ye!" and to read out the ordinance made previously, and declaring the right to hold an election, and discharging his duties in this regard according to the ancient custom long-time used, he shall pay a similar penalty and fine as indicated above.

If any person, no matter what his status, acts contrary [\[to proper procedures\]](#) at any communal assembly, at every instance he shall be fined 6s.8d [\[payable\]](#) to the chamber and levied by the chamberlain then in office, and shall also be imprisoned for 40 days at the mayor's pleasure.

Should it happen that any mayor, at any communal assembly held during the term of his mayoralty is believed and known for certain to be negligent in carrying out these ordinances according to the terms specified above, then every time that this comes about the mayor is to forfeit 20s. to the chamber, which is to be deducted by the chamberlains from the mayor's salary, and duly accounted for at the time they present their accounts of the town revenues.

DISCUSSION

By this period in Leicester's history, the Merchant Guild on which the burgesses had originally relied as an agency for furthering their ambitions, expressing group will, and exercising internal discipline, along with the borough portmanmoot, had long since given way to instruments of mayoral administration, notably to the Common Hall as the local legislative organism. This community meeting was dominated by the mayor and his "Brethren of the Bench" (a reference to their judicial functions), meaning the 24 jurats or comburgesses; it is significant that the titles "brethren", as applied originally to gildsmen, and "burgesses" were now obtaining a special meaning associated with those townsmen of status and power, to whom decision-making was becoming increasingly restricted. After 1464, when Edward IV granted the town the right to choose local justices of the peace, their sessions in their turn began to draw business away from the mayor's court, although this did not disempower the mayor as he was an ex officio member of that Bench; since the J.P.s were to be elected from the "more discreet" of the 24, it simply created a new elite within the existing elite in local government. They also took over functions formerly exercised by the populace through frankpledge juries.

In October 1466, the town authorities ordered that henceforth only residents who were enfranchised (i.e. those who had, by purchase or birthright, membership in the Merchant Guild) could come into the gildhall, or mayor's hall, during a Common Hall session, upon penalty of imprisonment. The remaining portmanmoot characteristic of the Common Hall, allowing any member of the community to attend when the most important items of business were addressed, was thus purged. A year later the ordinance given above insisted and expanded upon this restriction, suggesting that the original may have met with resistance or non-compliance; the ordinance opens with an attempt at a justification, bearing a veiled threat of royal intervention and loss of the borough liberties, perhaps indicating that opponents included enfranchised townsmen more likely to suffer from such an outcome.

Further implication of political disharmony is seen in 1477, when mayor John Reynolde had an ordinance issued requiring "that none of the Brethren should in relation to any matter or issue in any way, privately or publicly, criticize, censure, or slander any of their fellows, by word or by action, but that all of them, whether inside or outside [the common hall] speak well of each other" [Bateson, 298], upon penalty of a fine or, if refusing to submit to discipline, expulsion from the council. If there were a dispute between any of the brethren, they were to submit it to the binding arbitration of the mayor and the masters of Corpus Christi gild. The brethren were also instructed to do their utmost to speak only favourably of the mayor, and to act against anyone speaking ill of him. Furthermore they were ordered not to disclose to anyone the matters discussed privately by the council, particularly as regarded elections of mayor or parliamentary burgesses. It was in this year that the mayor transferred to the brethren the co-optation of new members to fill vacancies in their number, and the earliest Book of the Mayoralty, recording business meetings of mayor and council, was also begun this year – a further indication of changes afoot.

Again in 1484 we hear of troublemakers in Leicester – this time a wide range, including rumour-mongers, vagabonds, brawlers, rioters, and whores – in the context of measures to impose greater order, by dividing the town into twelve wards (a change from the four quarters previously existing) and having twelve of the Brethren given the status of ward aldermen to deal with such offenders. While this initiative can be seen in the context of a disturbed nation, it has its own significance given the general direction being taken at Leicester. The aldermen were given summary powers over anyone breaking the peace and could bring offenders before the mayor without the need to resort to the older, inefficient method of presentment in the leet court; they were also each assigned a constable to enforce their orders. A set of ordinances in 1488 continues the theme with prohibitions against any townsman prosecuting another in any court but the mayor's, and in penalties set for brawling in a variety of circumstances.

In 1489 a further step was taken towards keeping order at meetings of the borough authorities, and towards quashing community participation in assemblies, resulting in the substitution of a lower council in place of public attendance. The Common Hall, as a vehicle for community consultation, completed the transition to what we know today as a town council. At the beginning of that year an act of Parliament had been prompted by alleged disputes in corporate boroughs – Northampton and Leicester being mentioned specifically, and both towns put a copy of the act into their local archives – blamed on the participation of:

"such a multitude of residents who are of little means or self-control and lacking in gravity, judgement, wisdom or reason, who often outnumber in assemblies others who are known to be judicious, serious and well-behaved, [and who] have by sheer numbers and through faction, interjections, and headstrong behaviour carried out in the assemblies caused serious problems, disunity, and discord among themselves." [C. Markham, The Records of the Borough of Northampton, 1898, vol.1, 101-02]

The act required the creation of a body of 48 of the wiser, more judicious and well-behaved townsmen to participate in elections in lieu of the community at large.

An order from Henry VII in July, perhaps obtained by the corporation to strengthen its hand in implementing the change, stated that:

"We have been informed that at every election of the mayor there, or of burgesses for parliament, or at the assessment of any legitimate taxations, the commonalty of our town, both poor and rich, have assembled at your Common Hall. And that certain persons who are of little means or intelligence and who contribute nothing – or very little – towards the costs incurred in such activities, have involved themselves through their interjections and headstrong behaviour, to the subversion not only of the good government of our town but potentially to frequent breaches of the peace and other nuisances, increasing the misery and causing the downfall and decline of our town, and greatly discouraging you the governors there. To reform the same, with the intent that good government and stable order may be ensured there henceforward, we wish and directly instruct and command you, the mayor, bailiff, and 24 comburgesses of our town, both presently in office and to come in the future, that at all communal congregations and assemblies held there in the future, whether for the election of the mayor, of the justices of the peace, and of the burgesses for parliament, or for the assessment of any legitimate taxations or other purpose, you together choose and summon to join you our bailiff of the town and only 48 of the wisest and most reliable commoners who are residents there, according to your discretion, and no more. And [all of] you are then to deal with and resolve all matters that arise among you, according to what your reason and conscience tell you is most just and expedient."

[Bateson, 324-25]

It must have been at this time that the town clerk revised the ordinance of 1467, replacing "unless they are enfranchised (that is, have entered the Chapman's Gild)" with "except those who are members of the 48". The view that townsmen of lesser status were unfit to participate, in even the slightest way, in local decision-making is explicit here, but implicit in the ordinance of 1467. Furthermore, the 48 were not even to be chosen by the community they were intended to represent, and they probably had little real power, compared to the 24.

As was the case in several if not many towns, when the role of the community at large in local government began to be formally hemmed in or excluded entirely, Leicester experienced an outbreak of popular opposition. We need not see this as an expression of pure democratic sentiment, given that the townspeople had for over a century and longer been quite content to leave most of the power and decision-making in the hands of a relative few of the leading citizens. But the undermining of the principle of community authority, removing the element of choice to participate or not, must have been disquieting to some, who were prepared to excite the populace on the issue. That disquiet could have been occasioned by the concern that a closed corporation might the more easily be dominated by a particular interest group – the group in power at the time; we cannot discount the possibility of faction within the ruling group, as was a factor in the political conflict at London, Lynn and elsewhere.

One of the chamberlains of the 1488/89 year, William Burdet, was a ringleader and was evidently agitating for a renewed communal role in the mayoral election; although disciplinary measures had been taken against him, they had not been effective – he was still seen as a threat a few days prior to the election, when the members of the 24 were obliged to take an oath that they would not accept the mayoralty (or any other office) should the community tried to hold a rogue election, upon penalty of dismissal from the council. The anticipation of trouble was well-founded, for on 21 September 1489 the town council elected a mayor, and the community elected another, Thomas Toutheby, who evidently accepted the election despite the oath taken. This impasse was resolved in a fashion similar to that at Lynn in 1414 and 1415: the king's intervention was solicited, and he appointed someone other than the two rival nominees. Since his choice was to continue the mayor of the previous year in office, Thomas Davy, it was tantamount to a victory for the closed corporation.

That it was not until 21 September 1490 that the corporation moved to expel Toutheby from the council – Davy's final official act before vacating the mayoralty, in which reference was made to Reynolde's ordinances of 1477 – suggests either that a false spirit of reconciliation had been maintained in the interim, or that Toutheby's faction had continued its opposition. At the same time, financial penalties were imposed on anyone who in the future refused to accept election (by the council) as mayor or chamberlain. We know of no further resistance to the closing of the corporation, eliminating the right of participation (however little practised) of the community in local decision-making.

NOTES

"colleagues"

The original has brethren, meaning his peers in government, the councillors.

"Chapman's Gild"

The merchant gild, which was in Leicester the community of freemen.

"ordinance made previously"

Possibly this means the ordinance of October 1466, but more likely the restatement of that ordinance made in the document above.

"Corpus Christi gild"

The gild had a close connection with the borough government; at this period it is likely that most members of the corporation were also brethren of the gild; by the close of the century the Common Hall was being held in the the gild's hall.

"bailiff"

Although in 1375 the burgesses had obtained the right from the borough's seigneurial lord to elect each year a pair of bailiffs, this had not been obtained in perpetuity. In the mid-1430s, the lord (now the king) had resumed this right and was appointing a single bailiff for multi-year terms.

"Thomas Toutheby"

He had already held the mayoralty once; perhaps significantly, in the year following Reynolde's term. The prominence this gave him resulted in him being one of the local J.P.s for a few years and among the first aldermen appointed in 1484.

TRANSLATION

Three Northampton men were indicted on the grounds that, because of a sworn alliance made among themselves, they had entered the house of a man who was a coroner of the town, had beaten him, trampled on him, and dragged him by the hair out of the house, and made him come the following day to the Gildhall where they removed him from his office of coroner and made him take an oath that he would never again hold office in the town unless it was by the king's command. They were asked how they wanted to clear themselves. They asked permission to take counsel, which was granted to them by grace [\[of the court\]](#).

Having discussed among themselves, they returned and pleaded "not guilty" as to the sworn alliance, and "not guilty" as to the battery. Regarding removal of the man from office, they said that the sheriff received a writ from the king [\[ordering\]](#) a new coroner to be made, and they said that the sheriff delivered the writ to the town bailiff.

Pursuant to this writ, because of his malfeasance, since he was suspected of various misdeeds and since he was the incumbent of several offices, so that it would not be possible for him to give proper attention to that office [of coroner], they thus removed him, without committing any other wrong. As for the oath that he took, he did so of his own free will.

It was ordered that an inquest [jury] be assembled on the following day. On that day:

SCROPE. At the opening of the eyre we promised to be gracious in matters falling within our discretion, saving our duty as justices. We are still willing to be so. Therefore, consider whether you wish to pay a fine – it would be better to pay a fine [voluntarily] than to risk a conviction by the 12 [jurors] or to have the twelve perjure themselves.

They [i.e. the accused] were nervous, but they persisted in their not guilty plea regarding the alliance and the battery; and, as to the removal from office, they wished to submit themselves to the king's grace and begged the justices to be gracious to them. The justices asked each of them separately what he was prepared to pay [as a fine]. One of them offered 6s.8d.

SCROPE. For offences such as this, or less bad, Sir Hervey imposed fines of £40, £26.13s.4d, and £66.13s.4d on people who owned lands worth no more than £10 [a year].

Scrope demanded he pay £40. The accused offered 40s.

SCROPE. You shall not pay less than £6.13s.4d.

Another paid a fine of 30s., and the third 13s.4d. because they were poor.

DISCUSSION

Such was the account of this case made by law reporters, attending the court to record practice and precedents that could be of guidance to law students and practitioners of the law. The official enrolment in the eyre rolls throws some additional light. It identifies as the victim Walter de Pateshull, the mayor of Northampton at the time of the incident, and the conspirators as a larger party than the three men indicated by the reporters: Simon de Laushull, also a former mayor (1326-28), William Elys, John de Staunford junior, Adam de Naylesworth, Richard de Stratford, Robert de Stormesworth, Robert Mangeben, Thomas de Leycestre junior, Walter de Multon cordwainer, William son of Richard de Stratford (who had fled), and John de Naylesworth chaplain.

Despite the accused's defence that Pateshull was unfit to be coroner and a pluralist, what we more likely have here is political opponents, with the party out of power afraid that the party in power was obtaining too much power through pluralism. The lawlessness and national political strife of Edward II's reign encouraged, and even fostered, force and violence as tools of political conflict in towns. It will be noted that the conspirators were not in a position to oust Pateshull from power entirely – despite the charges of official misconduct, which were not pursued here or on other occasion in the eyre – but resorted to obtaining a writ from the king to have someone elected coroner in place of Pateshull. The patent rolls indicate that the king issued such a writ on 26 August 1323, on the grounds that Pateshull could not attend to the duties of coroner because he was clerk to the bailiffs of Northampton. The fact that the conspirators were able to intimidate Pateshull, by death threats, to renounce the coroner's office in an open court session in the town hall, also reflects the political (rather than personal) character of the conflict. Since Pateshull's oath not to exercise office in the town was unless the king commanded or the community agreed to his appointment, there may be some underlying grievance about the manner of Pateshull's appointment to the coroner's office – perhaps even to the mayoralty – for Northampton claimed to elect its coroners.

The negotiations as to fines were preceded by the threat of imprisonment. The ringleader, Simon de Laushull, was the one who paid £6.13s.4d. His accomplices paid smaller fines, ranging from 40s. to 6s.8d, except that Walter de Multon (despite already being in prison on the charge of having broken into a shop and stolen two dozen pairs of shoes – for which he was acquitted), was not fined because he was poor; it was often easier to let the poor off, rather than commit them to prison indefinitely for a fine they could not pay. Richard de Stratford also was not fined, he having shrewdly purchased on 12 March 1327 a royal pardon for all crimes committed before that date; a not uncommon strategy during this period. It had been just a few days before the date of that pardon that the king appointed a commission of oyer and terminer to investigate a complaint by William Trussel that 20 men – including Pateshull and other prominent Northampton men (including other ex-mayors) – had ransacked his property at Flore (a village a few miles west of Northampton). Pateshull himself is found taking out political insurance, in the form of a royal protection for one year, in August 1331.

NOTES

"perjure themselves"

I.e. if the jury, through favouritism to their fellow townsmen, declared the accused innocent. Scrope may have feared such an acquittal likely, given that Laushull must have been a man of local influence, and so thought it better to persuade the accused to pay fines voluntarily.

"Sir Hervey"

Hervey de Stanton was another of the king's justices.

[1. Petition complaining of obstruction of the hue and cry, ca.1330s or 1340s]

To our lord the king, his burgesses of Oxford attest that when, as often happens in the town, hue and cry is raised because of acts committed against the peace, and the people of the community, in accordance with the law and custom of the realm, come to arrest the offenders and felons so as to preserve the peace, the Chancellor of Oxford on the pretext of his office causes those people who have come to protect the peace to become caught up in and aggrieved by coercions and censures of Holy Church, and some of them through [legal] process made before himself are banished from the town. [This acts] to the great impediment of the common people and the support of lawless elements. For which they ask a remedy.

[2. Petition for the authority to attach troublemakers, ca.1330s]

To our lord the king, his loyal subjects the mayor and community of the town of Oxford request aid. Because many homicides, assaults and other disturbances contrary to the peace are made from one day to the next in the town of Oxford by the students living there, would it please the king in his goodness for purpose of preserving the peace to grant by charter to the mayor and community that they have the power, when such things are done contrary to the peace, to have their officers attach the culprits to answer to the law before his justices and officers (as is done in other cities, boroughs and towns), notwithstanding any contradictory privilege granted to the University.

[3. The riot on St. Scholastica's day, 1355]

These are the injuries down to the mayor, bailiffs and community of the town of Oxford by the students of the university of that town.

First, on 10 February [1355], after dinner, Walter Spryngeheuse, Roger de Chesterfeld and other students came to the tavern called Swindlestock, where they took a quart of wine and threw it in the face of the tavernkeeper, John Croydon; and then they beat John with the quart [pot], without any cause. Upon which the town bailiffs came and requested them to make amends and reparation in a proper fashion. But they refused to make amends or reparation for their offence; instead they poured out of the tavern and soon after appeared at the Carfax with bows and arrows and other weapons, ready to cause trouble. The bailiffs seized the bows and arrows, but the students made a great hub-bub and were very argumentative. Consequently the mayor, bailiffs and sergeants went to the Chancellor of the University and asked him to have the troublemakers arrested and to help do his part to preserve the peace. He did nothing of what was asked him. After the mayor, bailiffs and sergeants left the Chancellor, there came two hundred or more students, armed as if for war, and they confronted and assaulted the mayor, bailiffs and sergeants, wounding some of them so badly that it is doubtful they will survive; and then they killed a child of about 14 years of age and threatened to set the city on fire. The next morning, while the mayor, bailiffs and all the good folk of the town had gone to Woodstock to complain to the king of these injuries, those students came with a force equal to a king's and with a plan in mind, seized the gatekeepers of the town, closed the gates, fought with shields and weapons, set fires in various parts of the town, broke into and robbed various houses of laymen, and wounded or killed several people. Because of which disturbance, involving fire and fighting, the people of the community rose up in support and defence of the town.

DISCUSSION

By the time of the Norman conquest, Oxford was already promising to become one of England's leading towns, the sheep-grazing lands in the area making it a natural centre for the wool trade and the cloth industry; its prosperity was furthered by the presence of consumer groups in the form of two monasteries and a sizable Jewish community. The town's natural course of development, in terms of acquiring control of its own internal affairs along the lines of other towns, was however checked by the emergence of a university by the close of the twelfth century. Formal colleges were endowed in the next century, a chancellor appointed to head the loose confederation, and the students and teachers – mostly lodging with townsmen or in houses rented within the town – became a sizable minority within the urban population. Thereafter it was the disharmonious town-gown relations that dominated the central course of Oxford's history.

The exercise of jurisdiction in Oxford was an awkward matter because the town proper and the university were competitors of about equal strength; what the university lacked in size it made up for by having the protection and support of the king, who periodically gave more powers to the university, often at the expense of the town. It was like two separate communities within the same town, each vying for dominance. The main areas under dispute were control over trade and commerce (which impacted the scholars as consumers) and jurisdiction over legal matters; the power to assess rents on houses rented by the scholars was another touchy issue.

The Chancellor had his own court, whose jurisdictional scope was resented by the town authorities. The Chancellor's privileges included the right to banish from the town those he considered undesirables, and to excommunicate those who defied his authority. His court had jurisdiction over certain cases in which a member of the university was one of the parties, thus depriving the town court of income from fines. After town-gown disputes at the end of the thirteenth century, a settlement extended this to all trespasses in which scholars were involved. One consequence of this jurisdiction was that townsmen were sometimes tempted to involve (fraudulently) scholars in their legal disputes in order to have the case tried by the Chancellor's court.

The thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries were in fact punctuated by conflicts between town and university, not infrequently erupting into violence, followed by settlements that invariably strengthened the university. Salter noted that difficulty in dating the first of the three documents above stemmed from the fact that this type of complaint was frequently being made by the town authorities, and particularly during a period of town-gown conflict towards the mid-point of the century. The second is also difficult to date; Salter suggested that 1335, a year of town-gown disturbances, might be a candidate.

If the town authorities had many complaints about interference with or obstruction of their powers or rights, the university authorities made at least as many complaints on their side. On one occasion when tempers reached boiling point, the St. Scholastica's Day riot, or massacre as it is sometimes exaggeratedly called, occurred. The document translated here of course represents the town authorities' perspective, aiming at placing blame for what happened on provocations by the students. The "resistance" of the townspeople, prompted by raising hue and cry, was organized by several leading townsmen; they recruited help from residents of the surrounding countryside, whose forces broke through the west gate, closed by the students. Over the next three days there were repeated assaults on and plundering of various university buildings; several students were killed.

The king and the Bishop of Lincoln both intervened, the latter placing the town under interdict until 1356, and the former demanding both town and university surrender their charters of liberties. The king continued to favour the university. A new charter granted to the town in July excluded from the restoration of liberties some key privileges: market assizes, investigations of forestalling or of sale of bad meat or fish, punishment of carrying arms in town, control over street-cleaning, and taxation of scholars' servants. The transfer of these powers to the university were a severe blow to local government. In addition, the king deposed the mayor, who was thrown into prison, and the bailiffs, required the townspeople to restore all possessions plundered from the university, and imposed damages of £250. In a final settlement in 1357, the mayor, bailiffs and aldermen were subjected to the further humiliation of having to attend a service in the university's church every St. Scholastica day and make an offering of 1d. each on that occasion, as a gesture of submission.

The 1355 riot exhausted the town's efforts to dominate the university and relations actually improved thereafter – or at least were more subdued; resentment continuing to find outlets in disputes, but rarely reaching the point of violence.

Bill delivered to King Edward III by the hands of the men of the town of Cirencester, alleging that in many respects dom. William Hereward, Abbot of Cirencester, and his predecessors as abbot of that place, have usurped [\[the rights of\]](#) the king and his predecessors as kings of England, as appears in the bill written below. [\[1342\]](#)

Let it be remembered that in 1133, when King Henry I who was king of England founded an order of canons in Cirencester, he also founded a hospital of St. John in the town for the infirm poor to pray for him and for his successors as kings of England. To help sustain them he endowed them with one-third of all his tithes from his demesne in Cirencester and all the tithes of underwood from his forest of Oakley, which at that time was wooded and full of deer. He assigned to the poor [residents] a warden-chaplain to celebrate a mass in the hospital before them each day, for his soul and those of his heirs, in perpetuity; and to support that individual he assigned him the allowance equivalent to that a canon would receive in all regards – in bread, ale, and cooked food – which allowance was to be provided by the abbey. Concerning which tithes, chantry and allowance those infirm poor and the chaplain who celebrated their mass were in possession, to support the chantry and prayers for the souls of the kings mentioned above, since the foundation of their house. But in the tenth year of the reign of King Richard, when he had given the canons his manor of Cirencester with the Seven Hundreds, because of the extensive powers that they acquired through this grant, they having complained to the king about the chantry in the hospital for a long time, they then sold [appointments to] the chantry – sometimes to priests for £40 and sometimes to laymen for £60, contrary to the intentions of the royal founders of the hospital. Whereby the king and his ancestors and the infirm poor there were deprived of their daily mass in the hospital; and also the frank-almoign [granted by] the king was sold and the divine services extinguished for lack of support. Furthermore, the abbot then in office established in the hospital a sisterhood of women under an order associated with that of the abbey canons, and they engaged in sex in the hospital with the sisters who lived therein, as a result of which the charitable character of the hospital was badly blemished.

Furthermore, a house of St. Lawrence was founded there in the town of Cirencester for people suffering from leprosy, being endowed with lands for its support and with a warden assigned to assist them. The abbot then in office, having dismissed the warden and evicted him from the house, established in the house a brothel, the women taking their children with them into the house. And thus that charitable foundation was lost, and [the purpose of] the house confounded, and it was continued in sin. Concerning which, may it please the king and his council to order a remedy.

Also, whereas King Richard gave to the abbot and convent of Cirencester the manor of Cirencester with Minety, which is part of that manor, and with the 7 hundreds, the hamlet of Cirencester was not a part of that manor, for it is a borough in its own right, as can be found from the records of the Exchequer. Which town and borough the abbot has annexed to the manor and has treated all the ancient demesne as if it were part of the manor, contrary to the charter which is the proof [of status] and by which the king was accustomed in times past to receive from the abbot £100 annually as the farm of the town of Cirencester. Of which farm of £100 the king now has nothing, but has for a long time lost the rent, to the detriment of himself and his crown.

Also, the abbot has unwarrantedly appropriated to himself the parish church of the town of Cirencester, to the detriment of the king and his crown.

Also, the abbot illegally and unwarrantedly holds pleas of the crown, encroaching on royal jurisdiction, to the disinheritation of the king and his crown.

Also, King Henry had granted by his charter to the burgesses of Cirencester that they hold their land freely, with the same franchises as the burgesses of Winchester; which charter has been lost due to a deceitful warden who had the charter in his safekeeping. Of which charter the burgesses have only a transcript, and they beg you, most honourable lord king of England, that by your grace you will grant them another charter of such freedoms.

Also, the abbot has granted an annual pension of £40 to the sister of the archbishop of Canterbury, to protect him and the evil initiatives he was undertaking contrary to reason and to the rights of the king and his crown.

May it please the king and his council to recall and enquire into how one master Nicholas de Stratton, who pursued the above matters before the king, was killed by the abbot of Cirencester and his council of that time for bringing the suit; so that no man dares sue [him] for fear of death.

Also, when the abbot of Cirencester leased from King Richard his manor along with the 7 hundreds, he had only three carucates of land in demesne and £10 in rents of assize. Thereafter, because of the extensive power he acquired through that grant, he purchased all the tenancies of the people of the king's manor that there were in that demesne. So that he built up: 26 carucates of land in Cirencester, worth £200 annually along with court profits; acquisitions within the town and the 7 hundreds that are worth £100 annually along with pleas of the crown; meadow and pastureland worth £40 annually; the vill of Minety which is part of the manor and worth £60 annually, along with the forest at Minety and the pleas of the crown there – which King Richard had reserved for himself, his heirs and his crown in Cirencester, in Minety, and in the 7 hundreds.

You can see, sire, that the manor of Cirencester, the vill of Minety, and the 7 hundreds all taken together are worth £500 a year.

Inquisition taken upon writ in the king's Chancery, before Robert Parvynke the king's Chancellor, on 8 April 1342.

Robert Barbast and his fellows, under oath, say that the manor of Cirencester together with the vill of Minety, which is part of that manor, with the seven hundreds is one major part of it and pays £30 annually to the Exchequer, as evidenced by the charter of King Richard who, in the ninth year of his reign, gave the manor with its appurtenances of Minety and the seven hundreds, to the order of canons of Cirencester as a charitable endowment in perpetuity.

Moreover, they say to you that the borough of Cirencester is another major part of it and throughout that whole time was in no way an appurtenance to the manor of Cirencester, and was accustomed to pay a farm of £100 to the Exchequer. Of which borough and farm King Henry I was in possession throughout his reign and at his death, and after him King Henry II was in possession throughout his reign and at his death, and after him King Richard was in possession throughout his reign and at his death, and after him King John was in possession of the borough and the farm of £100 in the first year of his reign, just as his predecessors received it. Of which £100 our present king has had nothing, because Abbot Hugh of Cirencester in the tenth year of King John's reign usurped to himself the borough without warrant from the king or any of his heirs, thus disinheriting the king and his crown.

Also, they say that one plot of pasture called Crondles, which is of 60 acres and worth 60s. a year, belongs to the borough. Which piece of land used to be common to the borough, occupied by their beasts, in support of the farm of the borough. Which piece of land Henry Clerebaud, Abbot of Cirencester, encroached on in the eighth year of the reign of King Edward the grandfather of our present king, and had the land enclosed with a wall to the detriment of the king, the borough, and those who had common thereon. And they tell you that Abbot Hugh of Cirencester made an encroachment against King John in the fourth year of his reign, by building houses in the middle of the marketplace of the borough, which are worth 10s. annually; and Abbot Adam of Cirencester made an encroachment against King Edward the father of our present king by building in the same place on the highway ten houses, which are worth 20s. annually.

And they tell you that Abbot Roger of Cirencester made an encroachment against King Henry the son of King John by taking over 20 burgages in the borough which belonged to William Noel, Henry Primat, Nicholas Babbe, Richard Boilond, John Mey and other burgesses, in the fortieth year of King Henry and thereafter; they are worth 100s. a year. Henry Hamptonet, Abbot of Cirencester, made an encroachment against King Edward the grandfather of our present king in the 30th year of his reign and thereafter by taking over the burgages of Adam de Lewes, William Bisle, William Anbecil, John de Baudynton, William atte Elme, Robert de Cruddewelle and others of the borough; which are worth £25 annually.

They also tell you that Abbot Adam of Cirencester made an encroachment against King Edward the father of our present king in the second year of his reign, by an abatement on the provost's court of the borough, to which the burgesses owed suit; and he used coercion to make the burgesses pay suit to his manor court, to the detriment of the king and the borough.

Also they say that the abbots of Cirencester have encroached against them on the church of St. John Baptist of Cirencester, along with the chapels of Baunton and Wiggold, without any grant from the king who is the true patron; and they tell you that King John had possession of the patronage of that church with the chapels and formerly presented the church and chapels to a Norman, his clerk, master Gauthier de Poundeveske.

As for pleas of the crown, they say to you that Abbot Hugh made an encroachment against King John in the fourth year of his reign, by presuming to have a fair in the borough on the day of the Translation of St. Thomas [7 July], without permission from any king; which is worth 40s. annually.

Also in that same period, Abbot Hugh and his successors held markets in the borough on two days of each week – Monday and Friday – throughout the year; which markets are worth 100s. annually. And it is their custom to have custody of a prison for residents of the borough and outsiders.

Concerning the forest of Minety they made no assart, but they killed off all the deer in the Oakley forest in the tenth year of the reign of King John. Abbot Hugh of Cirencester cleared a hundred acres of Oakley forest by installing Adam Wynesnok and Reinald atte Wode; which is worth 16s.8d annually, at 2d. an acre.

Also, they tell you that King Henry I founded a hospital dedicated to St. John in Cirencester and gave the hospital one-third of the tithes from his demesne in Cirencster and each week of the year three cartloads of underwood taken from his forest of Oakley; and he assigned a chaplain-warden of the hospital to celebrate mass each day in the oratory of the hospital in the presence of the infirm poor, for the souls of the king and his heirs, and he gave the chaplain an allowance from Cirencester abbey in the form of provision of bread, ale and cooked food, in the quantity that a canon receives daily. The present abbot, and others before him, deprived the hospital of those tithes, following the second year of King Henry, son of King John, and for a long time appointed laymen as wardens of the hospital, taking [money] from these wardens for having the wardenship for the term of their lives – for example, £20 from Henry le Chauntur and £13.6.8d from other laymen – contrary to the intent behind the foundation of the house, and in this way they abated the king's chantry for a long time, although in the recent past a widow of Cirencester by the name of Alice de Weston gave £60 to the present abbot of Cirencester to have a chantry in the hospital to celebrate for her, as is demonstrated by a charter which they can present in evidence.

As regards a house of St. Laurence, recently founded in Cirencester for lepers, they say to you that this was founded by one Edith, lady of Wiggold, who held of the king the land on which the hospital was founded. She died without heirs. The lepers were accustomed to be supported in part from the alms of the townspeople, and partly from lands and rents that good people gave to the house by charter; the which [charters] were taken possession of and carried off by Abbot Adam and his council. Friar John de Baudynton who was appointed master of the house by Adam, Bishop of Worcester, in the ninth year of the present king's reign was evicted from the house by the abbot and his council and a sisterhood established in the house. Their lands are worth 40s. a year, with one acre of meadow which lies next to Clerkesmead; on which meadow the abbot encroached, enclosing it in the 10th year of our present king's reign.

Also, they say to you that master Nicholas de Stratton who recently brought a suit for the king against the abbot of Cirencester on the above matters was beaten up in the town of Cirencester by William Clerbaud, John Medford and John Cruddewelle, the abbot's people, and subsequently for the same reason was killed in Wiltshire by them and others who abetted them.

Also, they say to you that John de Denemewe, Richard Gascoigne and Robert de Cornewaille, prisoners of the king were removed from the prison of Somerton by king's writ and taken to Cirencester gaol. From there, chained and tied together, they led out of Cirencester prison and in the highway, without having received judgement, were beheaded by Sir Robert de Astone, the abbot's steward, Philip Batel and Roger le Hattere.

Our lord King Henry I gave to the burgesses of Cirencester a charter of liberties in the following words:

Henry, by the grace of God King of England, Lord of Ireland, Duke of Normandy and Aquitaine, and Count of Anjou, to his archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, barons, justices, foresters, sheriffs, reeves, ministers, all bailiffs, and his loyal subjects, greetings. Know that we have granted to our burgesses of Cirencester that they be exempt from toll, murage, pontage, pavage, lastage, and all other customary payments throughout all our land in England, Normandy, Wales and Ireland, wherever they and their goods travel to. Wherefore we wish and order that they have all liberties, exemptions, and free customs as fully and honorably as our free and loyal subjects have so far had, free and undisturbed, such as our burgesses of Winchester or others of our kingdom. Wherefore we wish that they be exempt from toll, murage, pontage, lastage, pavage, and all other customary payments, as mentioned above, and we forbid anyone from interfering with that contrary to this our charter, upon penalty of forfeiting £10.

And they say to you, Sire, that John Boylond, a former burgess of Cirencester, had the safekeeping of this charter, and in the 20th year of the reign of King Edward, grandfather of our present king, Henry Clerbaud, Abbot of Cirencester, took the charter from him after giving John Boylond a large gift; and then he had it burned.

We beg you, most honoured lord, for the sake of charity, if it please you, to look into the encroachments thus made by the abbot to suppress the liberties of your burgesses and your borough; and [consider] the distressing action your burgesses have brought against the abbot concerning the awful enclosures and improper encroachments that he and his canons have committed against you in regard to your borough and farm, as mentioned above, to the detriment and disinheritance of your crown. And that it please you, by your grace, to grant and give us a charter of our liberties, as indicated above, in the same tenor of our original charter, which King Henry I gave us.

Note concerning the merchant gild. Which was revoked before Sir William Hankford, Chief Justice of England, in [...]

Henry, by the grace of God King of England and France and Lord of Ireland, to his archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, dukes, earls, barons, justices, sheriffs, provosts, ministers, all bailiffs, and his loyal subjects, greetings. Know that we, giving careful consideration to what we owe our well-beloved subjects, the men of the town of Cirencester, for the sincere devotion they have shown in many ways towards ourself after we took up the reins of government, wish on those grounds to reward our subjects with our gracious favour. By our special grace we have therefore granted to those men, for ourself and our heirs, insofar as is within our power, the liberties and privileges written below.

Viz. that they, their heirs and successors may in perpetuity have within that town a merchant gild, with each and every liberty, privilege, and custom belonging to a merchant gild. The same men, their heirs and successors, may in perpetuity assemble each year on 7 January in a certain place within the town to be defined by them, to nominate and appoint by mutual consent and assent a master and such other governors, officers and ministers of the gild, whatever and however many seems to them best for government of the gild. Also, they and their heirs and successors in the gild are to be in perpetuity free and quit of:

- all suits to [courts of] shires, hundreds and wapentakes;
- murdrum and larceny;
- aids of sheriffs, foresters, of any other of our bailiffs, and all other things pertaining to them, including the guarding and building of castles;
- toll, pontage, passage, pavage, lastage, quayage, stallage, murage, fossage, picage, carriage, pesage, and cheminage, on all their goods, items, and merchandize throughout our kingdom of England and other places over which we have power, whether [travelling] by land or sea, wherever such liberties can be applied.

In addition, we grant to the same men that the master or governor of the gild and one clerk deputed by them may have full power and authority to take within the gild whatever recognizances of debt are made before them according to the tenor of the Statute of Acton Burnell. The master, or governor, and the clerk may in perpetuity provide certification, under the seal assigned for that purpose, to our and our heirs' Chancery of the names of those making the recognizances following the year the payment is made, as per the recognizances made before them.

In addition, the gild's master, or governor, then in office, whether in the presence of ourself or our heirs or in our absence, may conduct within the gild the testing and assize of bread, wine and ale and any other victuals, as well as measuring and weighing, and all other things pertaining or relating to the office of clerk of the market of the household of ourself and our heirs. He may correct and punish offenders or defaulters in those parts (whether in the presence of ourself or our heirs or in our absence). He may in perpetuity levy, collect, have and hold the ameracements and revenues stemming from the same, towards the costs of governing the gild well and to help defray the expenses of those then being gildsmen and their heirs and successors, saving the just rights of anyone.

Wherefore it is our wish and binding command, on behalf of ourself and our heirs, that the gildsmen and their heirs and successors in perpetuity have, in the manner expressed above, all the above liberties and exemptions and may full implement and enjoy each and every one in the way indicated, without interference or hindrance from ourself, our heirs, our justices, escheators, sheriffs, or any other of our bailiffs or ministers whatever. Witnesses: the venerable father Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England, Richard, Archbishop of York, primate of England, Robert, Bishop of London, Henry, Bishop of Lincoln, our chancellor, Guy, Bishop of St. David's, our treasurer, Sir William Heron, steward of our household, Thomas Langeley, keeper of our privy seal, and others. Given by our hand at Westminster on 14 July 1403.

Recital of various charters dealing with the manor of Cirencester and its appurtenances [1418]

We have reviewed the written documents and the proceedings of the case which came before us in our Chancery as a result of our writ of Scire facias between the abbot of Cirencester and the men of the town of Cirencester, for the purpose of those men showing what reasons they had or could state as to why the charter made out to them – to the extent that it be detrimental or prejudicial to the liberties, privileges, immunities, franchises, customs or other rights granted or suitable to be granted in whatever way to the abbot – should not be revoked and cancelled. Which case was sent before us for examination shortly after we had summoned it before us in our Chancery through these words:

[Given at] Gloucester. Memorandum that the venerable father Henry, bishop of Winchester, chancellor of the king, by his own hands delivered here in the court, in this term, a certain writ of Scire facias, endorsed by the sheriff of Gloucestershire to whom addressed, as follows: Henry, by the grace of God King of England and France and Lord of Ireland, to the sheriff of Gloucestershire, greetings. Richard I, sometime king of England, our ancestor, by his charter gave, granted and confirmed to God, the church of St. Mary of Cirencester, and the canons regular serving God there, in perpetual almoign freely given, for the soul of his father's grandfather Henry I who founded that place, for the soul of King Richard's own father, and for the salvation of King Richard, the queen mother Eleanor, his brothers, and all the deceased faithful, (among other things) his entire manor of Cirencester with all appurtenances and with the vill of Minety, which is part of that manor, and with the Seven Hundreds belonging with all their appurtenances to the manor and its farm, to be held of King Richard and his successors in perpetuity for thirty pounds a year in place of all services, to be paid each year at the Exchequer. Accordingly, it was his wish and his binding command that the canons might, in return for the aforementioned thirty pounds annually, entirely have and hold forever the entire manor of Cirencester, with the vill of Minety that is part of it, and with all its appurtenances, freely, undisturbed, peacefully, and properly. Along with all liberties and free customs which the manor had in the time of King Richard's predecessors, including sac and soc, tol and theam, infangthef and outfangthef, hamsoken, grithbrich, bloodwite, murdrum, forestalling, "flemenstrit", [trial by] ordeal, [power of] arrest in all locations (both red-handed and after-the-fact), and with all [court] cases which have been or may be; and that they be free and quit of all scot or geld, and of all aids to the king, sheriffs and all their officers, and of hidage, danegeld, horngeld, summage, scutage, military service, [accountability to] shires and hundreds, pleas and suits, and other things mentioned in the charter. And that the chattels of thieves and amercements which may come about through forfeitures for murders or anything else may belong to the canons, along with the judicial jurisdiction that the manor has customarily had. Lord Edward, formerly king of England, our great-grandfather, having approved these gifts, grants, confirmations, liberties, wishes and orders, acquittances and quitclaims, on behalf of himself and his heirs, insofar as he had the power within the limits of the law, accepted, approved, and by his charter granted and confirmed them, among other things. Furthermore, recently the abbot and convent of that place, under the name of the abbot and convent of Cirencester, gave to understand to our great-grandfather among other things that King Richard, formerly king of England, by his charter had given and granted the then abbot and convent of that place the manor of Circencester with its appurtenances, along with the Seven Hundreds and everything else pertaining to the same, in pure and perpetual almoign. And Lord John, sometime king of England, our ancestor, afterward confirmed the gift and grant made by King Richard through his charter. On the authority of which gifts, grants and confirmations by the former kings Richard and John, the abbot and convent and their predecessors always – from the time the charters were drawn up and confirmed, up to the making of the charter of our great-grandfather – had possession of the vills of Cirencester and Minety, which make up the manor of Cirencester, along with view of frankpledge, return of writs, infangthef, and the custody of prisons within the vills and hundreds mentioned, just as belongs to them in the Seven Hundreds (of which the vills of Cirencester and Minety were as if one hundred). Also, the abbot and convent and their predecessors levied a tallage on their tenants in the vills of Cirencester and Minety, just as if tenants of ancient demesne, when our great-grandfather or his ancestors tallaged his demesne and boroughs. They hold two markets each week, on Monday and Friday, in the town of Cirencester and from the time mentioned above have been accustomed to take and receive within the vill, throughout the week, reasonable tolls for all kinds of merchandize sold there.

[The document then reiterates the same rights, in the context of their confirmation by Edward III, Richard II and Henry IV.]

Furthermore, Lord John, sometime king of England, our ancestor granted and confirmed by his charter, which was confirmed by our father, to the then abbot and convent of Cirencester that they and their successors might have in perpetuity a fair each year at Cirencester, lasting from 24 to 31 October, with all liberties pertaining to such a fair. Afterwards, our ancestor Henry III, formerly king of England, granted and confirmed by his charter, likewise confirmed by our father, to the then abbot and convent of Cirencester that they and their heirs might have in perpetuity another fair at their manor of Cirencester, lasting eight days – that is, from 6 to 13 July – with all liberties and free customs pertaining to such a fair. As is more fully set out in the charters, letters and confirmations already mentioned.

And now John, the present abbot of that place, has petitioned us that, whereas the manor is part of the ancient demesne of our kingdom of England, the present abbot and all his predecessors as abbots from the time that the charter of Richard I was drawn up, as a jurisdiction of his church of St. Mary of Cirencester and of his lordship of the manor, vills and hundreds, have had:

- view of frankpledge in those vills;
- return of writs and execution of those writs;
- custody of prisons within those vills and hundreds;
- a hundred [court] and a court held every three weeks in the vill of Cirencester in a certain house situated in the middle of the vill called the Tolseld;
- a court for view of frankpledge in that vill held twice a year;
- the suits of all of his tenants within those vills, the hundred, and the court every three weeks;
- as well as from each and every of his tenants and other residents within the vills who are customarily obliged by English law, upon advance notice, to perform suit at the view of frankpledge at the biannual court for the view of frankpledge, before his steward, provosts, or bailiffs presiding;
- pleas of prevention of distraint, defaults of debtors, agreements and other contracts, and personal disputes of whatever kind arising within the vills and hundreds;
- the testing and assize of bread, wine and ale, along with other victuals of whatever kind;
- weighing and measuring within the vills;
- correction and punishment of offences and defaults of the inhabitants in those parts;

- the fines, amercements and all revenues stemming from the same, to his own use;
- tallages, villeinage, labour, customs, and the services of each and every of his tenants within those vills who hold by villein tenure;

according to the custom of the manor from the time aforesaid, among other things such as belong to a manor since time immemorial.

Similarly, the present abbot and all his predecessors who were abbots of that place have had and possessed: the markets and fairs mentioned above within the vill of Cirencester; reason toll within the vill throughout the week from whatever merchandize and are things are sold in the town, according to the tenor and effect of the aforementioned charters made to that end; with picage, stallage, and a court of piepowder [held] from hour to hour within the vill of Cirencester, as often as is necessary or whenever convenient, before the steward, provost, or bailiffs of the present abbot and his predecessors at any given time; with all other liberties, amercements, revenues and profits belonging to or associated with the market and fair, since the time that these charters were drawn up, among other liberties, privileges, franchises, immunities, and other customs contained in those charters. And all liberties, privileges, franchises, immunities, customs, correction, and punishments that they shall have fully used and enjoyed; and fines, amercements, revenues, tallages, villeinage, labour, services, and other profits, that they shall have had and received, peacefully and undisturbed, by virtue of the charters and confirmations mentioned.

Until lately, the present abbot, as regards the liberties, privileges, franchises, immunities, customs, correction, and punishments, fines and amercements, revenues, tallages, villeinage, labour, services and other profits, and other of his rights within the vills and hundreds, such as have existed up until now, has in many regards been worried, wearied, vexed, and impeded by the men of the vill of Cirencester on the grounds of a certain charter of our father, by which he granted to those men for himself and his heirs, insofar as he had the power, by the name of the "well-beloved subjects, his men of Cirencester", that they, their heirs and successors might have in perpetuity within the vill of Cirencester a merchant gild, with each and every liberty, privilege and custom belonging to a merchant gild [recites the substance of the grant of 1403]. Particularly because the men of the vill of Cirencester holding land there by villeinage from the present abbot, together with others living in the vill who are obligated to perform suit at the view of frankpledge as mentioned above, have united themselves in the gild and – on the grounds of the charter that our father issued to them – claim to be exempt from paying suit as tenants to the hundred court and the court held every three weeks by the abbot, and those same tenants and other residents [likewise concerning] their suit at the abbot's view of frankpledge held in the vill of Cirencester. They have denied having to perform suit, and so deny to the present day. In a certain court of piepowder there, before the master or governor of the pretended gild, held from hour to hour and day to day, whenever it suits them, they have entertained pleas concerning disputes, personal contracts, and other matters arising within the vill. The amercements and other revenues stemming from such pleas they have, contrary to the will of the present abbot, levied and received to the use and advantage of those men of the vill of Cirencester who have united in that gild. They have taken upon themselves the testing and assize of bread, wine, ale and all other victuals, as well as measuring and weighing within the vill of Cirencester, in regard to whatever persons are admitted into the gild, and the correction and punishment of offences or defaults that occur in those parts; and the amercements and other revenues stemming from the same they have levied and received to the use of their people, and so receive to the present day. Those men of Cirencester admitted into the gild [refuse to render?] the labour and services due from those who are tenants of villein lands and tenements held of the present abbot, or reasonable tolls from merchandize sold in the vill of Cirencester by men of the gild, or reasonable payments for picage and stallage on the ground of the present abbot in the vill [... the remainder is missing]

DISCUSSION

Corinium was established by the Romans on the road from Exeter into the Midlands; it was a fortified administrative centre for a tribal area and also served as a market centre for grain and wool produced by the Roman villas in the Cotswolds. Prosperous and successful, by the fourth century it was the second largest town in Roman Britain. After the Romans departed, it continued to serve as the capital for a British principedom, and was later a prize contested between Wessex and Mercia and a base for the invading Danes, the centre of a region subsequently known as the Seven Hundreds of Cirencester. In the eleventh century it was a royal vill, where the king occasionally stayed, and a market was established there. With that kind of heritage, it might have been expected to develop into a borough. But this ambition was to be thwarted.

Like Reading, Cirencester began its transition from royal to monastic overlordship as a result of Henry I's foundation of an abbey. There had in fact been an order of secular canons established there prior to the Conquest, but early in the twelfth century they were superseded by Augustinians, and in 1117 the king began to build a new monastery for them. Progress allowed for the first abbot to be consecrated in 1131, and two years later the king turned over to them the properties the secular canons had once held, which included (among lands in several counties of southwestern and central England) two carucates of land in Cirencester, a one-third share of the tolls from the Sunday market, two-thirds of the tithes from his royal demesne in Cirencester, and the entire tithe of the parish. To this, the king added, from his own demesne, a third carucate and Oakley wood, but kept the rest of his manor in his own hands. The charter effecting this made a passing reference to burgesses living there, although at that period the term was used loosely; the Pipe Rolls also used this terminology when royal taxes were collected there, and there were other indications that the community was on its way to being recognized as a borough.

The character of the community, and the extent of the abbey's jurisdiction over it, had become a sore point during the latter half of the century. The residents complained to the king, who ordered the abbot not to harass the king's men of Cirencester in regard to free tenements they held of him, nor to try to exact customs or services from them beyond those to which the residents were obligated prior to the charter of 1133. However, the abbey had taken the manor of Cirencester from the Henry II at fee farm, and in 1190 this was solidified when the abbey paid Richard I a lump sum of £100 for a perpetual grant whereby it was bound to pay a farm of £30 a year for the town and manor of Cirencester. The townsmen again raised the alarm, but the king now took the abbey's side and fined them for bringing a false charge. Further investigations of their complaints during John's reign likewise failed to reverse the tide, and the abbot solidified his jurisdiction by obtaining a grant excluding the sheriff from intervening in most local affairs and (1222) permission to build a gaol. In 1215 the abbey had been granted a fair each October, and in 1253 a second fair in the summer was granted. At this period the abbot appears to have controlled all sources of revenues and was tapping into the profits of local commerce; the townsmen doubtless felt frustrated, when they saw around them other communities of like size obtaining measures of self-government that allowed the channelling of commercial profits back into the community.

Although the abbot appears to have allowed the king's justices to be advised, in 1221, that Cirencester was a borough, it subsequently became the policy of the abbey to deny that Cirencester was anything but a rural manor entirely subject to the abbot's overlordship. Matters came to a head at the opening of the fourteenth century – again as at Reading, a period when the abbey had been weakened financially by years of maladministration. In 1301 the "poor men" of Cirencester obtained a royal commission to investigate their complaints that abbot Henry de Hamptonet and his officers had been extorting money from them through unjust distraint, had broken into the houses of some and assaulted and imprisoned the tenants or carried off their possessions, and had impounded or driven off some of their livestock. Part of the rationale behind the abbey intrusions had been, it appears, that the townspeople were trying to evade manorial obligations to have their grain ground at the lord's mills, and were using private handmills; the abbey officers had therefore sought to confiscate or destroy that equipment. The commissioners, however, concluded in 1305 that Cirencester belonged to the abbot and he was justified in exercising his lordship; the townsmen were forced to pay a large fine. In 1308, the abbot took a further step, quashing the townsmen's attempts to route legal actions through their own court, and obliging them to attend his own court. The next battle was fought over the abbot's right to tallage the Cirencester residents. In 1312 the townsmen engaged a lawyer, Nicholas de Stratton, to sue the abbot on their behalf on this issue; their representative was subsequently murdered, if we are to believe the townsmen, by the abbot's supporters, the abbot's rights of tallage were eventually upheld in court and reinforced by a new charter obtained from Edward II (1321) confirming the abbey's jurisdiction.

The heavy costs of these losses appear to have quietened the townsmen for a while, but growing prosperity from the wool-trade enabled them to recover. The above list of grievances of 1342 is the next sign of renewed contest. The list begin with what must have seemed a shrewd move to the complainants, by casting aspersions on the abbot's actions that had, it was alleged, adversely affected the health of the souls of the kings of England, by depriving them of the prayers of the poor residents of the hospital of St. John. The aim must have been to immediately demonstrate to Edward III that not only the townsmen's but also his own interests were at stake in this matter. At the same time, the townsmen were casting doubt on the moral character, and thereby the credibility, of the abbot and his monks. The charges of moral depravity were not pursued when the townsmen were summoned to Chancery to put their case; either they could not be proven, or they had done their job in capturing the king's attention. The townsmen instead relied on charges that past abbots had usurped revenues which should be going to the crown. Another political strategem appears to have been to draw the king's attention to Abbot Hereward's association with the family of the archbishop of Canterbury. The archbishop, John de Stratford, was brother to Robert de Stratford, the king's Chancellor, who was currently in the bad books of the king, being blamed troubled royal finances. Again, by creating a tie to issues directly of interest to the king, it was hoped to obtain a hearing from him.

The abbot was ordered to respond in the king's court to these charges. At that hearing, in April 1342, the townsmen summoned argued under oath that there existed within Cirencester a borough, which was not the same (as the abbot argued) as the vill of Cirencester that was a part of the royal manor over which the abbot now had lordship. They reiterated charges of encroachments on royal rights, although their account incorporated inaccuracies. The abbot produced past royal documents to support his claims but, despite demands from the king's counsel, refused to produce the 1133 charter making reference to burgesses. Meanwhile, the townsmen were claiming to have received from Henry I a charter which, in its tenor, was the kind of document granted to a borough. The text as cited has errors which indicate it was either an attempt to deceive the king or that, if the townsmen had ever received any such grant (and that more likely a king later than Henry I), the original text had been corrupted or was being misrepresented. Most likely it was a forgery, perhaps inspired by a grant of Henry II to Gloucester.

What chance the townsmen's arguments had of swaying the king we shall never know. Abbot Hereward decided it was politic to tip the balance, by a payment of £300 to the king; this persuaded the latter to suspend the legal proceedings, obtain the verdict of a local jury which supported the abbot's contention, and then confirm the abbey's jurisdiction in more explicit terms, accompanied by a promise that the abbot never need in the future be brought to court on claims that there was a borough in Cirencester. Historians have continued to debate whether Cirencester was in fact a borough or not [for the pro argument, see H.P.R. Finberg, "The Genesis of the Gloucestershire Towns", pp.52-88 in Gloucestershire Studies, Leicester: University Press, 1957; Ross, in his edition of the cartulary, argues for the con side].

Disappointed in their hope for support from above, and with the victorious abbot rebuilding the finances of the abbey, the townsmen turned inwards. They formed the gild of Holy Trinity, ostensibly for socio-religious purposes, but probably as a means to regenerate some solidarity within the community for their political ambitions. We hear of the abbey experiencing difficulties, following the Black Death and the labour shortage it caused, in exacting services from its tenants; and in 1385 some townspeople attacked the abbey. But the townsmen's moment did not come again until the opening of Henry IV's reign. They were instrumental in crushing the rebellion of the earls of Kent and Salisbury, and so won Henry's gratitude. Emboldened, the townsmen began to refuse to submit to the abbot's jurisdiction and raised a fund to fuel a new legal battle. Henry repaid his debt first by entertaining renewed complaints against the abbey, in which it was argued that the town of Cirencester had not been part of the manor until in 1208 the abbot forced the townsmen to perform villein service. Although the king felt unable to act against the abbey on the grounds of old claims, he did, in 1403, authorize the townsmen to establish a merchant gild (or perhaps more likely gave recognition to jurisdictional authority already being appropriated by the townsmen acting communally through the Trinity Gild); this despite an inquisition that declared such a gild would be contrary to the abbot's jurisdiction. The effect must have been to authorize a large degree of self-government; the grant not only gave some control over commerce, it also implied judicial independence and provided the basis for the townsmen to refuse to attend the abbot's court.

The victory was short-lived. The abbot obtained a new confirmation of abbey liberties and territories in 1409, and the following year of the fairs. Although an attempt to further restore his authority in 1413 resulted in a riot and his officers receiving a beating, he was able to capitalize on the accession of Henry V, obtaining a new confirmation of his jurisdiction, and successfully suing 104 townsmen for having withdrawn their services over a period of 13 years; he was awarded £6,000 in damages, but agreed the following year that the king could pardon this. In 1418 he obtained from Henry V a reversal of the grant of 1403, and the abolition of the merchant gild; the final document given above represents the revocation and affirmation of the abbey's control of the powers previously accorded the gild. Subsequent efforts to break free of the abbot's lordship came to nothing; Cirencester was not to gain self-government until the nineteenth century.

Ross states that in a "very limited sense Cirencester may perhaps be regarded as a borough: but few boroughs can have left so faint a mark on English municipal development." [op.cit., xl.]. However, it seems not at all improbable that Cirencester would have developed much as other middle-ranking boroughs did during the Middle Ages, had it not been for its inability to break free of the abbey's overlordship. As a royal manor on ancient demesne, its inhabitants had likely enjoyed at one time certain privileges that are an indicator of evolving borough status. But the intermediation of the abbey, interested in the inhabitants as tenants and men owing them services, established an obstacle. Some towns were able to overcome such obstacles, sometimes resorting to near-revolution, others were able to make sufficient headway to establish borough status during the course of the Middle Ages. Cirencester was not so fortunate.

NOTES

General note

Where the text is itemized in bulleted lists, this is my own rendering of the original, for the purpose of improving legibility.

"town"

The term in the original is "ville" in the French, villa in the Latin; this is important (bearing in mind that the dispute revolved around whether Cirencester was a borough) since that term did not necessarily imply borough status, but could also be used for "vill". The distinction between "town" and "borough" in this case is particularly significant. Such terms were used imprecisely during the High Middle Ages, apparently meaning one thing on one occasion, something else on another.

In my translations here, as regards the status of Cirencester, I render the term as "town" in documents representing the viewpoint of the residents, but as "vill" in the document representing the abbey perspective.

"hospital of St. John"

The townsmen's statement is the only evidence we have concerning its foundation, but it is not unlikely that Henry I may have been the founder. Whether a chantry was founded at the same time is less clear; in 1319 the bishop of Worcester had granted the master and poor residents permission to have a priest to say mass, on the grounds that many were too old or frail to go to the parish church. At that point the abbot also gave permission, stating that his predecessors had built the hospital and that he therefore had full power over appointments to the mastership. Despite the townsmen's claims, in 1348 the king confirmed abbey control of the hospital.

"Seven Hundreds"

A group of hundreds surrounding Cirencester; essentially, the southern Cotswolds.

"frank-almoign"

The grant of an allowance, by way of alms, from the abbey to the hospital chaplain.

"house of St. Lawrence"

The founder identified by the townsmen was Edith Bisset, and the encroaching abbot was names, somewhat ironically given the general context, Adam Brokenborough. In 1348 the king confirmed that the hospital was under abbey jurisdiction.

"brothel"

The original has un sororite des femmes bordel ores et tenent lors enfauns ovesqes eaux. Behind the complainants' deliberately black interpretation may lie the establishment of an almshouse for unmarried mothers.

"borough"

A ville burgh' as the original has it.

"to protect him"

The original has pour maintenir lui, but the implication seems to be that the pension was some kind of bribe to curry favour with the archbishop and his family, so that a blind eye would be turned to the abbot's (alleged) illegal activities.

"carucates"

A measure for land area, also known as a hide, roughly equivalent to 120 acres; like many medieval measures, the amount in practice probably varied from place to place, time to time. For detailed discussion see Maitland, Domesday Book and Beyond.

"encroachment"

More commonly known in the Middle Ages as a purpresture, this was an act of trespass on the rights, jurisdiction or property of another, by taking possession unlawfully. Blocking public access to communal land, by means of erecting a structure, or creating an enclosure or other obstacle, was a type of nuisance encroachment commonly the subject of complaint in towns. Encroachment on the rights of the king was a more serious matter.

"owed suit"

The obligation of a tenant to be answerable in the court of the lord of the property, on any legal matter related to the tenure, and to seek justice for any such matters in that same court.

"assart"

The clearing of woodlands, in order to turn it into farmland or pasture; this required a licence from the lord of the property. Henry I's charter of 1133 had reserved assarts to himself.

"Somerton"

Possibly Summertown at Oxford.

"lord of Ireland"

John was in fact the first king so styled.

"Duke of Normandy and Aquitaine, and Count of Anjou"

Henry I did not use this set of titles, unlike Henry II (compare to the opening of his charter to Nottingham). Nor did Henry I use the royal "we" (compare to his charter to London).

"wapentakes"

An ancient administrative unit associated with the Danelaw, essentially equivalent to an Anglo-Saxon hundred.

"murdrum and larceny"

These refer to fines imposed on the community for unsolved crimes, murdrum referring to homicides.

"toll" etc.

These various items dealt with special tolls that could be levied on the transportation of merchandize (e.g. when crossing a bridge, or travelling along a road), to the landing of merchandize (e.g. quayage, or lastage -- a toll per last of cargo), to setting up the merchandize for sale (stallage, picage), or to collections intended to defray community costs on facilities helping foster trade (such as paving streets, or building protective walls or ditches). Further information on the individual items may be found in the notes to documents in the Tolls and customs section.

"recognizances of debt"

Acknowledgements of debts contracted, usually for a business purpose.

"sac and soc, tol and theam, infangthef and outfangthef"

These were kinds of jurisdiction and associated revenues. For discussion see notes to the Oxford charter and Nottingham charter.

"grithbrich"

Breaking of the peace.

"bloodwite"

Compensation for an assault in which blood is drawn, paid to the administrator of justice as opposed to that due the victim or victim's kin.

"hidage"

A land tax on the basic agricultural unit, the hide.

"danegeld"

A land tax, originating in payments of tribute to the Danish invader, but continued by the Norman kings.

"summage"

Provision of the service of transport by pack-animals.

"scutage"

A cash payment in lieu of military service (i.e. commutation).

"Tolseld"

A seat of local administration, the name deriving from the "shop" where tolls were collected. Local government at Norwich and Yarmouth was based in the Tolbooth and Tolhouse, respectively, while at Lynn those elements of administration in the hands of its lord were run from the Tolbooth.

"defaults"

Probably referring to the failure of residents to perform communal obligations or act responsibly towards the community.

"picage, stallage"

Fees associated with the assignment of a location from which to sell goods.

"judicial independence"

Based on the charter of Henry IV, the townsmen claimed before the king's justices in 1418 that the gild's court had "cognizance of all kinds of pleas involving merchants in matters relating to commerce, such as debts, trespasses, contractual agreements, and accounts, as well as any other thing pertaining or relating to merchants and merchandize; those of course relating to servants or apprentices quitting or leaving the service of their masters [before the end of the contracted term]; and also frauds and collusions committed, along with any other deceptions or offences done against the king's peace; together with all personal and other actions, except those in which the Crown has an interest, such as treason, felony, trespasses made by force and arms, murders, rapes of women, conspiracy, and others of that sort." [Charles Gross, ed., Select Cases Concerning the Law Merchant, A.D. 1239-1633, vol.II, Selden Society, vol.46 (1929), xcix; my translation.]

TRANSLATION

[1. Indenture related to the election of 12 keepers, 1345]

This indenture is testimony to the fact that the community of the town of Beverley has elected 12 men of the town – that is, William de Kelsterne, Richard de Luda, Thomas Harald, Robert de Humbleton, John de Walton spicer, John Clerk, William de Dalton, Thomas Coppandale, John de Warton, Robert de Walton tanner, John de Cotyngham, Walter Barker – who have taken oath to administer the town from 25 April 1345 to the same date in the following year.

Those same 12 men, or [at least] seven of them, are invested with special powers to:

- receive each and all revenues belonging to the community, collect community rents, and appraise and lease wasteland, houses, meadows, pastures, and all other things related to the community, throughout that whole period, for the benefit of the community;

- give presents and gratuities, and pay expenses and salaries, whenever it seems to them to the advantage of the community;
- on behalf of the community, audit, approve and sign off on accounts of all receipts and revenues and other things concerning the community [collected] prior to the time of making this document;
- take care of all details concerning other matters which seem to them advantageous and profitable for the community.

Each of the 12, or seven of them, now elected shall be allowed, without any argument, by the 12 elected in the following year, whatever costs they declare under oath to have been expended by, or imposed on, them. Furthermore, should any lawsuit be brought against the 12 or their clerk or sergeant, or any of them individually be brought before the courts in relation to official duties or any other business undertaken on behalf of the community, all their [legal] costs will be reimbursed by the community.

Should it chance to happen that in the town there are any impositions to be levied, the 12 men are to have all the burgesses of the town forewarned to be at the common hall on a specified day, so that those levies be made with their agreement and consent, and then per pound.

If the burgesses of the town disdain to come or, by pre-arrangement, refuse to agree [to a levy], then it is permissible for the twelve to impose and raise the levy per pound under oath as best they can.

And let it be known that the 12 men now elected, or seven of them, during the month before the time indicated above [i.e. the end of their term of office] are to have all burgesses of the town forewarned that they should elect, with the agreement of those 12 men, another 12 men qualified to administer the town in the year following.

If any of the 12 then elected disdains or rejects that office, he is to pay 40s. immediately to the community without any argument or remission.

If any of the 12 now elected disdains to come to the common hall to deal with community business, when forewarned by the common sergeant, as often as he so absents himself without a good excuse he is to pay 12d. to the community. And any other of our burgesses of the town who is thus forewarned yet disdains to come is to pay, on each occasion, 6d. to the community in the same fashion.

Should it happen that in [regard to] any distrain [made by] the 12 men, or seven of them, or our common sergeant, any member of the community – whether one of those 12 men or some other burgess – is found to resist or be uncooperative, or effects a rescue, he is to pay 6s.8d to the community immediately, without remission.

Similarly, it is permitted for the 12, or seven of them, to distrain on a daily basis any thus found to be resistant or uncooperative, by all their goods and possessions wherever they may be found, making the distrain and carrying or driving away and detaining the distrained items, until full satisfaction is made to the community of all arrears, debts, demands, and revenues that belong to the community.

If the 12, or seven of them, cannot by such means make any member of the community answer to justice in such matters, they shall have all the burgesses of the town forewarned [to come] on a specified day to the common hall to assist the 12 or seven to bring to justice he who is rebellious and defiant; moreover, further remedy may be decided and acted upon against such rebels and defiers, whenever and as often as necessary for the benefit of the community.

If the burgesses of the town disdain or are reluctant to involve themselves in such matters, then it is permitted for the 12 to resign from their office, and be exonerated from all obligations, actions or demands that the community might place upon them, as regards further administration of the town.

[These provisions are followed by two ordinances, unrelated except insofar as it fell to the 12 to enforce them. One prohibits dung from being placed on any thoroughfare along which carts travelled, and the second restricts the sale of cloth to the Dings.]

2. The 'Magna Carta' of the community

To all faithful Christians who see this charter, greetings in God from Richard de Louthe, John Tirwhit the son of Adam Tirwhit, Adam Coppandale the son of William Coppandale senior, Peter Lombard, William de Lokyngton, Peter de Staynton, John Spicer, Thomas Gerwais, Alexander Cras, Robert de Befort, Thomas de Scroveton, and John de Wragby, elected by the common consent and assent of the community of the town of Beverley to administer that town and the town customs and statutes for the present year, that is, from 25 April 1359 to the same date in the year following.

Know that we, in our gildhall at Beverley, anciently called the Hanshouse, in the presence of the entire community of the town, have reviewed and have made public declaration of certain statutes and customs approved and used from time immemorial, the tenor of which is as follows:

That each year on 25 April the 12 elected to administer the town for the past year, in the presence of the whole community (having been given advance notice of the event), shall name 18 of the more reputable and qualified members of the community [present] in the gildhall, excluding those who have been keepers of the town during the three years preceding the nomination. From which eighteen the community shall elect 12 to administer the town in the coming year.

Which 12, once elected and sworn [into office], or seven of them when the entire group is unable to be present, are to have full power: to collect the farms, rents, and the ancient dues of the town; to uphold and enforce the ancient customs and statutes; to discipline and punish, according to their discretion, those who rebel or offend against [the same]; when necessary, to formulate and put into effect new ordinances and statutes with the consent of the community; and to collect, in the boxes used in the past for this, the loans and assessments such as were anciently in the town, viz.:

[There follows a list of local tolls on various types of merchandize, levied at the point of sale, and on vehicles bringing cargoes by land or water, along with licence fees for retailing or industrial activities, and also a household tax on burgesses based on rent values. These were evidently major sources of revenue supporting local government.]

Those statutes and ordinances, made by the above-mentioned elected 12, we acknowledge, approve and ratify, on behalf of ourselves, our heirs and successors, to endure in perpetuity. So that, if anyone who is or shall be a member of our community puts into effect or attempts anything contrary to those statutes, he is to give the community £10, to be raised by the twelve then in office through distraint, and also he is to lose all his franchise as a burgess within the town.

If anyone elected by the community, through the above method of nomination, to the keepership of the town refuses to accept office, then he is to be obliged to pay the community 40s., to be raised through distraint by the community itself or by the keepers of the community then in office.

If any of the 12 elected does not come to the common hall on community business, when forewarned by the common sergeant of the town, as often as he so absents himself without a good excuse he is to pay 12d. to the community. And any other burgess of the town who is forewarned yet does not come is to pay, on each occasion, 6d. to the community raised by distraint in the same fashion.

If it seems advisable to those 12 elected to impose levies in the town, the 12 men are to have all burgesses of the town forewarned to be at the common hall on a specified day, so that those levies be made with the agreement of the entire community (if they all come), and that per pound. If they do not come or refuse to agree to a levy, then it is permissible for the twelve to impose the levy per pound under oath and raise it as best they can.

Also, those 12 thus elected and sworn in, or seven of them, shall have special power to:

- receive each and all revenues belonging to the community, collect community rents, and appraise and lease wasteland, houses, meadows, pastures, and all other things related to the community, throughout that whole period, for the benefit of the community;

- give presents and gratuities, and pay expenses and salaries, whenever it seems to them to the advantage of the community;
- on behalf of the community, audit, approve and sign off on all items and expenditures, and other things concerning the community, prior to the time of making this document;
- take care of all details concerning other matters which seem to them advantageous and profitable for the community.

Each of the 12, or seven of them, now elected shall be allowed, without any argument, by the 12 elected in the following year, whatever costs they declare under oath to have been expended or paid out by them.

Furthermore, should any lawsuit be brought against the 12, or any of them, or their clerk or sergeant, or any of them [sic] be brought before the courts in relation to official duties or anything undertaken on behalf of the community, all their [legal] costs will be reimbursed by the community.

Should it happen that in [regard to] any distraint [made by] the 12 men, or seven of them, or the sergeant of the community, any member of the community – whether one of those 12 men or some other burgess – is found to resist, or effects a rescue, he is to pay 6s.8d to the community immediately, without remission. Similarly, it is permitted for the 12, or seven of them, to distraint on a daily basis any thus found to be resistant, by all their goods and possessions wherever they may be found, making the distraint and carrying or driving away and detaining the distrained items, until full satisfaction is made to the community for all offences [committed against it, and] of all arrears, demands, and revenues that belong to the community.

If the 12, or seven of them, cannot by such means make any member of the community answer to justice in such matters, they shall have all the burgesses of the town forewarned [to come] to the common hall – that is, on a specified day – to assist the 12 or seven to bring to justice he who is rebellious and defiant; moreover, further remedy may be decided and imposed against such rebels and defiers, whenever and as often as necessary for the benefit of the community.

[There follows the ordinance prohibiting dung from being placed in the streets.]

And these ordinances or statutes shall hold good.

In testimony of which, we have appended to this document our common seal of the community. And, to better ensure its validity, we have arranged for the seal of the venerable canons of the chapter of St. John of Beverley to be appended to the document.

3. Charter for the election of 12 keepers of the town of Beverley

Richard, by the grace of God etc., to each and every of the reputable men and the burgesses of the town of Beverley, greetings.

Because of the absence of good government, excesses are often committed among the inhabitants and commons of cities and towns, evils arise, scope is given to scandal and risk of various kinds, and the peaceful way of life is unintentionally put at jeopardy. As is known with some notoriety, all such excesses, evils, and perils have been the case in the town of Beverley, more in recent days than is usual, due principally to the breakdown of good government. For that town has traditionally, by an ancient and accepted custom which has been in effect there uninterrupted for fifty years, been peacefully governed and ruled by 12 reputable men of that town, elected annually on 25 April at the town gildhall by the common agreement of the burgesses of the town. But that custom among you has been abruptly changed. In place of those 12 reputable men, you have newly instituted and appointed an alderman and two chamberlains to rule and govern the town during the present year. And this arrangement – which has not been seen in the town for fifty years or more, except on one or two rare occasions, and was then abolished by the common agreement of the then burgesses of the town, for its better government – you intend to maintain and continue, even though an administration involving the 12 men is much more effective for good government of the town.

Which arrangement, if continued, we have been persuaded, will clearly result in the utter downfall of that town and the disinheritance of its burgesses.

We, out of the special devotion we have to Christ's glorious confessor St. John, whose body was transferred to the minster of that town, wishing nothing more than to restore a tranquil and peaceable way of life to the town and out of our grace to provide for the better administration of the town and for rectification of defects in administration there,

Direct and command you, and every one of you, as strictly as we can and on the faith and allegiance you owe us, that on 25 April next at your gildhall with one accord you assemble peacefully, as is the custom. And that – after all the matters have been read out in your presence and understood, and have been given due and serious consideration, you setting aside your arguments and disagreements on any of these issues – you put in place and duly institute in the town such a form of rule, administration and government that the town and our people there may be better and more tranquilly ruled and governed, our peace there kept, and amity among you can be more assuredly preserved, both in the present and in future years. To this end, conduct yourselves towards one another in a respectful and amicable fashion, as was the case in earlier times in the town when things were better and well-ordered. And, to ensure peace and tranquillity among you, suppress any rebels and opponents, as well as the authors, instigators or fomenters of quarrels or dissension and their supporters, if such there are, by whatever ways and means are at hand, to restrain them from their malicious activities.

In no respect fail in this, if you have regard for us and our honour, and wish to avoid our severe displeasure and the perpetual forfeiture of all your liberties.

Witnessed by myself at Westminster, 18 March 1382.

DISCUSSION

Advisory councils seem to have been a standard feature of borough government, probably long before their existence was formally acknowledged within the written constitution. What was valued about them was that the choice of members lay solely with the townsmen and the councillors were therefore (in theory) answerable only to the townsmen. Normally councils existed, according to recorded stipulations, to support the executive officers, particularly in giving counsel. Whether this role disguises a more powerful mechanism of urban administration – that is, the power not merely of advising, but of deciding – is difficult to say; only in the fifteenth century do records become detailed enough to portray voting on issues, and even then we have explicit evidence for a very few towns.

The development of conciliar bodies owes something to roles played by juries in legal administration, something to a natural tendency for certain townsmen most interested in influencing the direction of local affairs to coalesce into a formal group, and something to the need for community opinion to be consulted by the borough executive before important decisions were taken. It may be that the executive officers were no more than the first among equals; certainly their office tended to rotate largely among the group who furnished councillors, insofar as our evidence – very sketchy at best for the thirteenth century, and weak until mid-fourteenth century – allows us to say. Or it may be that the executives took the real initiative after consulting councillors. The dynamic doubtless varied from town to town and period to period.

Beverley evidence argues for the importance of a council, by presenting the unusual case of an executive-less council. It is in part because of this that the role of the council is spelled out in more detail than is the case in most other towns. But this may also owe something to a power-struggle between two forces in the town, one preferring the council as its administrative tool, and the other an aldermannic administration.

The origins of Beverley – a town more important in the Middle Ages than it is today, with the eleventh largest urban population in 1377 (insofar as we can rely on the Poll Tax figures) – can be associated with the foundation of a monastery there by the early eighth century. Bishop John of York retired there and died there in 721. Archaeology has revealed modest settlement in the vicinity at some point in that century. By the early tenth century John's tomb had a reputation for miracle-working and attracted the attention of King Athelstan, who endowed a secular college there; this had grown into an important minster, with St. John of Beverley's bones translated to a new shrine, by the time of Edward the Confessor, who acknowledged the archbishop of York as sole lord of the town. Both the presence of the monastic community and pilgrimage to the shrine of St. John did much for local trade and the development of an urban community, and the cult of the saint continued to draw royal benevolence and royal concern when there was any disturbance of the peace there, amplified by the fact that sanctuary status had been accorded not only to the minster but the whole town and its environs. This status attracted fugitives to the town, most of them guilty or suspected of homicide, and so introduced a dangerous element; one of the leaders of the unrest in Beverley in 1381, Henry Newark, was a sanctuary man.

The archbishop had extensive judicial jurisdiction within Beverley, even over pleas of the Crown; one consequence being that Beverley's affairs feature relatively little in the core national records. He also had a good deal of control over local commerce, notably in the collection of tolls; rents were likewise a source of revenue that belonged to him. Most tolls were farmed out to the townsmen in the twelfth century, and rents in the mid-fifteenth century. Despite this, for most of the later Middle Ages much local administration was in the hands of his officers, notably a steward and a bailiff. These positions were held in the thirteenth century by clerics and later increasingly by laymen; in the case of the steward mainly by local gentry, while the ballivalty was sometimes held by townsmen, but the office was clearly answerable to the archbishop and could not represent the interests of the borough community. The archbishop's bailiff was the executive office that, in non-mediatised towns, would have been the head of urban government elected by the townspeople. The minster chapter likewise had its officials in the town, notably a provost, steward, and bailiff, with authority over the estate particularly assigned to the minster. There were inevitably points of conflict between the town and the archbishop or chapter over matters of jurisdiction, mainly territorial.

In the early twelfth century Archbishop Thurstan had granted the town the same liberties as the citizens of York (except insofar as they might conflict with the rights of the minster), including a merchant gild; Henry I promptly confirmed this grant and added freedom from toll throughout Yorkshire for the townsmen. Ca.1130 a further charter from Thurstan restated and expanded on his first, granting the townsmen the farm of local tolls, acknowledging rights of toll-free access into and out of the town, and confirming the gild under the name of Hanshus, where the burgesses might "formulate statutes ... for the improvement of the town" [Beverley Town Documents, 132] just as the York men did in their Hanshouse. We must assume that this town gild provided the mechanism for local administration, including the collection of tolls.

If we can believe the above injunction issued by Richard II, which was evidently based on information supplied by the faction supporting conciliar rule in Beverley, it was in the early fourteenth century that an important change in government took place; a group of 12 men, a few decades later known as keepers (and later still as governors), came to challenge the role of the gild and its alderman as the vehicle speaking for community interests. We do not know how, or from what, this group emerged. It was probably an evolutionary rather than revolutionary transition, with some division of responsibilities, but by the 1330s the council appears to have been staking a claim as the foremost institution of local government, not without resistance.

The first two documents translated above reflect stages in the development of this conciliar government. Leach stated that the constitutional provisions of 1345 were repeated verbatim in those of 1359, and in the same order, but in fact there are a number of often significant differences; which is why I have seen fit to present both here. The 1345 constitutional provisions were likely only a formal statement, or restatement, in writing of what may have been in effect for years or even decades. Stating the powers of the 12, as in the early section of the 1359 document, either was or became a standard procedure at elections: in effect commissioning the newly-elected officials. Possibly the 1345 indenture represents such a commission, although it has more the character of a set of constitutional provisions agreed upon by official and electorate. Within the borough customal is a template, said to date from the 1370s, for the keepers' commission from the community, using some of the same terminology as in the earlier indenture. From this it appears that it had been the practice for some time for a formal written commission to be drawn up upon the election of each new set of keepers. I am not aware of other instances of such a formal arrangement, reliance normally being placed on the swearing-in ceremony to invest elected officers with power and to place restrictions on them.

The royal injunction of 1382, in its passing reference to a couple of instances over the previous half-century in which aldermannic government had been instituted instead of the council, is doubtless downplaying the extent of the opposition. We know of one occasion, in 1356, where a riot by several hundred townsmen aimed at disrupting an election of the keepers; the complaint made to the king about this suggests that the conciliar form of government was itself the reason for opposition, and that this opposition, described as a sworn conspiracy, involved a substantial portion of the populace. There may have been a definite division within the community in this regard; or perhaps reversion to the older form of community representation occurred when popular dissatisfaction surfaced about conciliar actions or, more likely, exactions – it may be noted that the constitutional provisions did not allow the burgesses to veto local taxes, only to have input on how they were assessed. Political conflict could be read into the 1345 document in the section on local taxation, where certain terminology indicates an anticipated difficulty in getting all the townspeople to respect the authority of the council, and in the document's general preoccupation with dealing with burgesses resisting that authority. Those same charged terms are absent from the 1359 version of that clause (although it is risky drawing conclusions solely from changes in terminology), and the emphasis shifts somewhat from dealing with uncooperative burgesses to ensuring the keepers perform their duties – the absence of the resignation clause being notable. This may suggest that the keepers were now more secure in their position, despite the riot of 1356, although the elaboration of electoral procedures could point to settlements of contentious issues.

Events later in the century indicate that the battle was far from over, as the third document illustrates. The great revolt of 1381 was a phenomenon primarily rural and particularly, but not exclusively, associated with southern and eastern England. But across the country twenty or so urban communities, or groups within those communities, took advantage of the situation to try to further their own interests, by expressing dissatisfaction with local constitutional arrangements, gaining ground against political opponents, or settling scores. We cannot explain the urban upheavals purely as a response to the peasants' uprising, however, for some began earlier. But they were the product of the disturbed conditions, the rumours, the same general dissatisfaction with the status quo and particularly with government at all levels, and which the poll-tax of 1377 had done something to help bring to boiling point. While the 1382 charter makes no reference to the larger events that had just occurred across the country, those mighty disturbances must have been fresh in the mind of the king and his officials when the 1382 charter was drafted.

In several cases the aim of rebellious urban communities was to wrest power away from ecclesiastical overlords. Resentment against the ecclesiastical officials was an element in the Beverley disturbances, but combined with the old internal political divisions; members of the lesser crafts sought to displace the leading burgesses who dominated the council, some of whom were also holding offices associated with ecclesiastical overlordship. It would have been natural for the malcontents to turn to an official, presumably still existing (as the gild continued to exist) if much reduced in power, who had a heritage of championing the communal cause. The man chosen to hold the post, Richard de Middleton, had already served as a keeper in 1377/78; it may be significant or coincidence that, with the three-year hiatus prescribed, he would have been eligible for re-election as a keeper in 1381. Possibly we may see here underlying popular discontent brought to a head by a division in the ranks of the urban elite, or some personal ambition, making available a leader – just as seen in the political struggles at London and Lynn; a further parallel with those towns being in the reliance on executive office to oppose an elite in power. The reformers did not abandon the conciliar principle, however, instead providing for a group of 24 to advise the aldermen; whether a new council, or an expanded version of the 12 is unknown. This reform, or populist, party represented a large portion of the community, with the lesser craftsmen and retailers prominent, while their opponents were characterized as the "great and better endowed burgesses".

For at least ten months prior to the issue of the king's charter, the two opposing factions had "waged unrelenting legal as well as violent battle with one another" [R.B. Dobson, "The Risings in York, Beverley and Scarborough, 1380-1381", The English Rising of 1381, ed. R.H. Hilton and T. H. Aston, Cambridge, 1984, 124]. Judging from the accusations brought by the reformers, the alleged oppressive and extortionate government of the keepers had been arousing resentment since at least 1363, through unwarranted tolls on retail and craft activities, excessive levies, embezzlement, and perversions of justice. The transfer of power to an aldermannic government seems to have been effected on election day (25 April) of 1381; in the absence of information on those events, we can only imagine that it was not done quietly. Middleton was supported by Henry de Newark and Thomas White, his chamberlains, and a clerk Richard de Boston, at whom Professor Dobson points the finger as the possible lead mover of the faction; possibly Boston acted as the administration's recorder (legal advisor and head of the clerical department), a position known to have been established on this occasion.

The displaced keepers attempted a counter-coup: on 30 April, Adam Coppandale led a group on a raid of the Guildhall, from which they removed charters, other town records, and communal treasures; they were likely after the borough seal, but this they failed to secure. Thomas de Beverley was another leader of this group, who, like Coppandale, came from a wealthy and influential family long-established in the town, and he was steward of both the archbishop and the chapter; the archbishop and chapter were at odds at this time, and these facts may help explain why the reformers sought the archbishop's support in their struggle. Coppandale and Beverley had been collectors of the unpopular poll-tax in the town. Middleton and his followers retaliated against the raid by evicting some of their opponents from their homes unless they agreed to put up bonds guaranteeing they would abide by a judgement on the political differences, to be made by the archbishop. By the beginning of the summer they appear to have consolidated their control of the town, but unable to prevent further violent outbursts. Coppandale and other of his associates removed to London, partly for safety's sake (although it was alleged that some of the reformers pursued them there, armed, to issue more threats), and partly to be able to put their case before parliament.

In April and May 1382 Coppandale and his colleagues acquired royal pardons for any actions committed before 14 December 1381, and this assisted them to obtain acquittal for the charges laid against them. The situation continued to be disturbed in Beverley; in April the archbishop's bailiff had been ordered to arrest Newark, White and Boston, but reported back that he could not, as this would have put him at risk of his life. In June the archbishop and the sheriff of Norfolk, with an armed retinue, came to the town and took pledges from both factions to assure they would keep the peace. In October the townsmen were able to obtain a general pardon for the disturbances, upon guaranteeing they would pay the huge fine of £733.6s.8d. A few members of either faction were excluded from the pardon, including Richard de Boston. This may have sealed his fate, as he was subsequently murdered, seemingly an act of reprisal.

The introduction or elevation of chamberlains in borough officialdom is often connected with political and/or financial reforms, and the fact that it is seen fit to mention those officers explicitly here (despite that they had not an executive authority comparable to alderman or council) is indicative of financial grievances behind the reforms underway at Beverley. Those grievances are indicated in charges laid at the door of John Erghom, a Coppandale supporter who pursued against Middleton and his followers a campaign of intimidation while the power-struggle was underway and of reprisals after some semblance of peace had been restored in mid-1382, not stopping short at murder. Erghom was indicted before the king's justices in 1385 for a long list of crimes, including the exactions, intimidation, and assaults mentioned above; he too sidestepped the issue thanks to a pardon he had wisely purchased in November 1382.

Once the division became increasingly violent, it had not been difficult to obtain the king's intervention. Although his injunction of March 1382 expresses a preference for conciliar government and disapproval of aldermannic rule, this likely only mirrors the opinions of the conciliar party which was making the complaint. Richard did not go so far as to order explicitly a restoration of conciliar rule – it seems to be the heading assigned by a later clerk, entering the document into the fifteenth-century register, that is principally responsible for leading historians to this erroneous conclusion; he simply required the townsmen to agree among themselves on whatever settlement would restore peace and order. What actually happened is unknown, due to lack of records. But an aldermannic government was re-elected in April 1382, and one of the few surviving financial accounts from the town, for 1386, reveals that alderman and chamberlains were in power both that and the previous year; the earliest evidence for the keepers being back in control is from 1391. Yet some compromise may have been reached, for the men holding aldermannic and camerarian office in 1386 were among the original opponents of the reformers in 1381; the old elite had, with or without the acquiescence of the community, regained its hold on power. This paved the way for a quiet reversion to conciliar rule.

NOTES

"seven of them"

l.e. a quorum.

"presents and gratuities"

These were considered politic to win or keep the favour of persons of power, or their representatives, and are a common feature of medieval financial accounts.

"impositions to be levied"

This phrase (misae ponantur) refers to internal taxations, rather than those imposed by an external source, based on the revised wording in 1359.

"per pound"

It is not clear whether this refers to an assessment based on the estimated monetary value of real estate and/or moveables, or on the weight of commercial goods in stock.

"disdain, pre-arrangement"

The terms in the original are contempserint (an act of deliberation, so "disdains" rather than "neglects") and collusionem, both suggesting that the council could not rely on the loyalty or obedience of the entire citizenry.

"resist or be uncooperative"

This I take to be the gist of rebellis seu remissus.

"the Dings"

A hall in the centre of the marketplace, originally the urban base for archiepiscopal administration, but from 1282 rented by the town, after the archbishop had relocated.

"Adam Tirwhit"

He had been a keeper in 1344/45.

"William Coppandale"

He had been a keeper in 1347/48. Adam Coppandale featured prominently in complaints made by the reformers against the conciliar elite in 1381, and was one of the chamberlains of 1385.

"have made public declaration"

A slightly presumptuous interpretation of recitasse, but what likely took place was a public reading, either to obtain communal reconfirmation or to indicate that the statutes were still in effect.

"to pay the community 40s."

The early fifteenth century custom in the Great Guild Book indicates that in 1370 a perceived loophole in this legislation was filled, by specifying that those who were fined for refusing office could not then claim exemption from office for the next two years (on the grounds that a man could not be re-elected more than once every three years), but were eligible for election in the following year.

"under oath"

Tax-assessors were typically sworn to give honest assessments, without prejudice or favouritism towards any individual; it seems here that the assessment was one of the duties assigned to the 12 itself (rather than a separate body of assessors as would more usually be the case) although perhaps this was only in the circumstance of a lack of cooperation from other townsmen.

"rescue"

I.e. illegally removes, through stealth or force, the distrained items from impoundment.

"a daily basis"

I.e. progressively, with additional impoundments being made until the offending party submits to justice. Often the impoundments were in the form of livestock (household goods being more difficult to get at, if the offender chose to bar doors and windows), which is why there is reference to driving away the distrains.

"demands"

This probably refers to fines or other payments that are the outcome of judicial convictions.

"all the matters"

The vague term premissis probably refers to available documentation, and might include this injunction of the king, but also and more importantly the town's constitutional ordinances.

"keepers"

The 12 keepers, or governors as they came to be known during the 15th century, were the town council, similar to Ipswich's capital portmen and Maldon's wardemen but, from the early 14th century, the sole source of governmental authority – Beverley not having, with the exception of brief experimental intervals, a chief executive officer at the head of its urban administration (except insofar as the merchant gild's alderman represented burgess interests in 12th and 13th centuries).

"Richard de Middleton"

Thus Horrox and Dobson, although Leach states that Thomas Middleton was the alderman, and Richard a bailiff in 1381.

"the previous year"

This fact, combined with a royal writ of late May 1381 showing the king as already concerned about a division within the Beverley community, indicates that renewal of the constitutional struggle was not directly influenced by the Peasant's Revolt, which had not quite begun. The reason for the complaint to the king was not the election of an alderman and chamberlains, but the response of the conciliar faction in removing the town treasury and archives from the gildhall a few days after the election. The deterioration of hostilities into murders may have owed something to the national disruption, however.

Law and lawlessness

The preservation of order and the protection of individuals and their property from illegal acts are a fundamental part of the mandate of government, and therefore the mechanisms for policing society and administration of justice are important to the success of any government.

While we must remember that official records, since many relate to legal proceedings of some kind or other, paint an unbalanced picture of medieval English society, it is not too unfair as a generalization to say that the Middle Ages were a violent time. This in the sense that there was little respect for the abstract concept of rule by law (i.e. law-abiding behaviour), and its psychological restraints; many people resorted cold-bloodedly to physical force to achieve their self-interested ends, or were quick to express anger through violence. The great majority of offences complained of to the courts were assaults and petty larcenies. Excessive drinking and competitive recreations could also play a factor in the propensity for brawling or worse.

Late medieval England was in fact notorious throughout Europe for its high crime rate. Adherence to the law seems to have fluctuated, contingent upon a number of factors, but most particularly the ability or vigour of the king in upholding the law and punish offenders. Increased lawlessness is a characteristic of royal minorities or periods when English society was disrupted by civil war or corruption at the highest levels. On the other hand, even when the king was a strong character, his absence abroad fighting wars also tended to give scope to lawlessness at home.

Another factor was that the example for those in lower ranks of society was set by those in the upper echelons. We see clear examples of this during the reign of Edward II, and again in the fifteenth century – perhaps the most lawless period for later medieval England – when feuding lords maintained their supporters in illegal activities and were willing to pervert the course of justice to protect them from legal retribution.

The counterbalance to lawlessness was less respect for the law per se, than a desire for social order. The relatively complex character of urban society, with its disparities and with people constantly interacting in complex ways, made the administration of law a key problem for urban government; not for nothing were courts frequently the central institution of that government.

Development of the legal system

During the course of the High and Late Middle Ages, there was steady growth in the rules, procedures and instruments of the legal and judicial systems. Besides the central courts administered by royal officials, the king's travelling justices, the county courts, and the various seigneurial jurisdictions, there were a variety of levels of local judicial administration affecting medieval towns. At the risk of oversimplifying, at the root of the judicial system were the courts of the county (or shire) and the hundreds (subdivisions of the shire). Other jurisdictions might be considered special, requiring specific authorization – this included the king's central courts – so that particular types of cases might be heard elsewhere, or individual cases be withdrawn to a different court.

In Anglo-Saxon society, much of what was "law" was essentially custom, and the administration of law was undertaken by the populace through the folkmoot, sometimes through guidance from small bodies of "doomsmen" about whom we know little. Solving a crime could, however, be difficult and frequently came down to the good or bad opinion that the community had of the accused, or to the judgement of God – through the swearing of solemn oaths or the ordeals of fire or water.

Crime detection was equally problematic. In a non-bureaucratized society, personal relationships were the basis for behavioural control. There was much reliance on self-policing within communities through the mechanism of the "borh", in which a group of (typically) twelve men acted as mutual sureties or pledges for each other's behaviour; they might bring a delinquent member to justice, but also support a member wrongly accused or faced with paying compensation for a crime. The effectiveness of this association lay firstly in its voluntary nature (so that one person did not have to stand borh for another, if the latter was known to be of bad character) and secondly in the fact that the members of each group – perhaps originally kin, but certainly later involving friends and neighbours – had close social bonds and interacted regularly in everyday life; these factors were psychological deterrents to deviant behaviour.

After the Conquest, the new rulers of England made efforts to introduce new methods of judicial administration, without entirely abandoning what they had inherited from their predecessors. Courts of special jurisdiction – such as those of boroughs – continued to administer customary law. Custom was elaborated through new precedents which contributed to the development of common law – that is, the customs (processes and remedies) of the king's court that were gradually spread across the country as a national standard – and set the scene for cases to come increasingly under royal jurisdiction. Sessions of royal justices in the shire courts administered the common law. Henry I introduced itineration to assert his fiscal rights, sending judicial delegates to visit the counties to ensure that the crown was compensated for any breaches of royal rights and privileges. The royal justices' principal task was to uphold common law, while at the same time allowing for local custom, insofar as it did not conflict with common law.

It was in part the prospect of income from judicial fines that encouraged Henry II towards regularizing a system of judicial circuits through the localities to preside over cases involving infringements of the king's peace – the list of crimes considered to fall under this banner expanding over time – as well as to undertake other duties such as investigating local officials' performance of their duties. (On procedures for conducting an eyre, see Bracton). The system of circuits, or iters or eyres as they were known, reached their peak of activity and fullest scope, in terms of number of offences investigated, under Henry III. Not until Edward I's time, however, was there a serious attempt to actually create new legislation through royal statutes. By that time the eyres had become bogged down with the volume of business with which they had to deal; it had already, by 1258, become the unwritten convention that no county be visited more than once every seven years. By the end of the century, the eyre had ceased to be an important part of the judicial system, and attempts to revive it in the first half of the fourteenth century proved abortive.

Popular judgement remained in effect at the lowest level of judicial administration, which was leet jurisdiction. A leet was a geographical area – sometimes a subdivision of a hundred – that may originally have served as a unit for organizing military conscription, but also came to refer to an area of jurisdiction. In places this came to be fused with a crime detection mechanism imitative of the borh, but lacking its voluntary nature: the tithing, collectively responsible for identifying any illegal acts of any of its members, was a compulsory grouping in which the membership was dictated from above. This was the system that the Normans called frankpledge, and it was this that leet courts administered.

Some aspects of customary law were enforced through this system, which was adapted to incorporate administration of the Assizes of Bread, Beer and Wine and, to a lesser extent, the Assize of Arms.

This kind of jurisdiction was usually exercised once a year, sometimes more, and usually at dates consistent within each borough from year to year. It is slightly misleading to talk about leet courts in that there tended not to be a specific court for administration of frankpledge. It was more commonly handled as special sessions of an existing court, sometimes sufficiently distinguished from normal court business to warrant their own records (as at Norwich or Lynn), but sometimes not (as at Colchester). Some relatively well-documented urban examples are from:

- Norwich, which had a relatively highly-developed system, and was subject to the only detailed case-study of leet administration, by William Hudson;
- Lynn, where leet jurisdiction, based on the constabularies, was one bone of contention between burgesses and the Bishop of Norwich;
- Colchester, where thrice-yearly sessions known as lawhundreds included, but were not restricted to, frankpledge matters with the exception of concerns over tithing.

Similar jurisdiction, over minor criminal cases, was exercised in London via the wardmotes presided over by the aldermen. At Coventry the leet appears to have been a fundamental unit of local administration but, when seen in the fifteenth century, had so much merged with other administrative elements that the original frankpledge system is not much in evidence. Similarly, at Nottingham the remnant of leet jurisdiction had, by the late fourteenth century, evolved into an institution called the Great Tourn.

Although frankpledge juries might occasionally make accusations of homicide, such cases were initially reported to and investigated by the coroner. In cases other than accidental death, if he, or the capital pledges, could identify a culprit then an arrest would be made if possible, and the accused tried by king's judges. Similarly, cases of theft might be reported by tithingmen but would be referred to the town court for closer investigation before any judgement was passed; here too the coroners might play a judicial role, for they were not (as today) restricted to investigating suspicious deaths, but were more generally keepers of pleas of the crown. It was more the minor cases of trespass, encroachments, property disputes, assault, petty theft, and debt that the borough courts handled – precisely the minor matters the royal courts preferred to avoid, if they could.

The fourteenth century saw further expansion in the scope and predominance of common law, and the continued evolution of a more complex hierarchy of courts, with the royal courts at Westminster at their apex. Quo Warranto proceedings of the late thirteenth century had already made customary law administered in boroughs more dependent on the authority of the king. The plague of mid-fourteenth century added impetus to the development of a royally-controlled judicial system; the challenge of keeping social order after the disruption, and particularly of enforcing the Statute of Labourers, which addressed the problems resulting from the death of a third of the labour force, resulted in justices of the peace – already the subject of experiment in the early fourteenth century – becoming a fixed part of the judicial landscape. Towards the end of the century and in the fifteenth, J.P. powers were given to urban executives, thus bringing the boroughs even more into the mainstream of the administration of justice.

Despite popular distaste for the legal system, because of its expense, protracted process, and vulnerability to manipulation, the fourteenth century saw an increase in litigiousness, as avenues opened up for people to complain about any perceived wrong, and as the royal courts opened themselves up to appeals of even minor cases from lower courts. The customary jurisdiction of the boroughs was thus undermined.

Crime detection

There being no police force in medieval England, detection was either a matter of individuals bringing complaints, juries denouncing crimes some time after the fact, or hue-and-cry being raised to alert neighbourhoods to an offence in progress or freshly committed. Raising the hue was an obligation of the parish in which a crime was discovered; failure to raise the neighbourhood in pursuit of a criminal exposed it to the liability of a fine. The concept of communal responsibility also found expression in that neighbours of victims of a crime might be expected to appear in court, as either potential suspects or likely witnesses, and in the responsibility of a frankpledge or of a whole ward to report crimes. All male adults were required to take oaths periodically not to commit crimes themselves, nor to harbour, sustain or aid criminals, but to report any criminal – or person giving aid to a criminal – of whom they were aware; as well, they were required to be cautious about acting as hosts of strangers. Parishes were often used as units of communal responsibility for crime reporting; their leading members might be expected to keep an eye on suspicious characters residing within the parish, and parishes were the logical units for taking responsibility for guarding felons who sought to evade justice by taking sanctuary in churches. However, as the later Middle Ages wore on, the concept of collective responsibility for the actions of the members of the group was undermined by changes the structure of social relations.

Henry II, combatting lawlessness engendered by the anarchy which had preceded him, did not create but regularized some policing measures through the Assizes of Clarendon and Northampton. He and his successors increasingly asserted jurisdiction over offences previously tried by shire, hundred or seigneurial courts, this jurisdiction being expressed through the royal courts and their "branches" as the eyres of the itinerant royal justices effectively were, through assizes and special judicial commissions held across the country, and through local courts (including those of many towns) presided over by urban executives who were at least partly answerable to the king. Henry also placed a reliance on juries to make presentments of crimes, and other juries to give verdicts as to guilt or innocence. Another aspect of his extended influence over the administration of justice was that complaints of offences could be made directly to his court, to obtain writs instructing local officers or courts to ensure the complainant received justice. Royal writs, which had many purposes, were another tool for asserting central authority over courts in the regions, by issuing commands or authorizations.

Royal grants of chartered liberties to towns, while in one sense they created franchises that gave certain exemptions from outside jurisdiction, in another they were simply transferring responsibilities from external royal officers to officials chosen by the burgesses. Sheriffs, for example, were increasingly barred from direct interference in urban judicial administration; instead they could only ensure royal writs were passed along to urban officials. Thus, from the perspective of the Crown, these grants became part of the larger effort to create a national system of administration and law enforcement that linked the centre with the localities. Coroners, for example, were important officers in a number of boroughs; their core duty was to investigate sudden deaths, but they also enquired into felonies, a category encompassing theft, rape, and homicide. Their inquests were often able to throw light upon circumstances surrounding a crime.

Contrary to the picture painted by late twentieth century authors of historical fiction, there were no officials who had responsibility for crime investigation at all comparable with modern detectives. Coroners were expected to examine corpses and to interview witnesses to homicides, and thereby to try to identify perpetrators of and accessories to the crimes. But this was through the mechanism of an inquest convened, frequently, at the scene of the crime, not through any extended investigative process involving the systematic accumulation of evidence (despite the occasional requirement to use blood traces, footprints etc. to identify the scene of a crime, if the body had been removed); speed was of the essence if an arrest was to be hoped for. Failing an arrest, the coroner's aim was to identify everyone implicated, or potentially implicated, and attach them to appear before the justices for further examination. Even towards the close of the Middle Ages, when borough bureaucracies were expanding, officials with police-type duties were well outnumbered by the lawless elements – whether troublemakers or professional criminals – in towns.

Even though many seigneurial franchises remained to limit the power of the Crown, both the common law (interpreted and elaborated by the king's justices) and the concept of the king's peace were gradually extended to bring a number of offences within their scope. By the time of Bracton (mid-13th century) the theory was being propounded that the king alone was the source of all legal jurisdiction. Royal keepers, and later justices, of the peace became a mechanism for investigating alleged infringements. Breaking the peace was a charge frequently brought by juries to the attention of borough courts; and, by the fifteenth century, urban executives were being closely integrated into the administration of the peace.

Those guilty of homicide – whether intentional or accidental – and theft often pre-empted crime detection by fleeing; even the innocent sometimes fled, in panic or fear of being convicted unjustly. Courts often ruled on accused parties in their absence, with outlawry the normal consequence of a conviction. Some fled to the sanctuary of churches, after which there were three possible outcomes: acquittal; escape and flight; or abjuring the realm (confession followed by banishment).

The judicial process

The process of legal trials was a complex one with numerous variations, and altered during the High/Late Middle Ages, so that any summary is susceptible to those errors to which generalization is prone. In many regards the medieval process was not dissimilar from the legal process today. The modern distinction between criminal and civil cases existed implicitly in medieval England, although it was the Norman and Angevin kings who initiated developments which led to serious crimes – notably homicide and other felonies – coming under the purview of courts which were essentially under royal jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of town courts was principally over minor offences and civil actions, the latter covering primarily actions involving real estate (e.g. questions of rightful possession) or trespasses against individuals (e.g. debt, breaches of contract). The treatment of such cases might vary from town to town depending on different local customs.

Cases were generally begun by an accusation made by an individual, normally the alleged victim, or by a jury – a group so named because they took an oath to tell the truth. In default of a prosecuting party, the authorities might sometimes insist on a crime being heard in the courts, if it appeared that the king's peace had been broken. Parties to a case generally had to find guarantors: complainants to assure the court that a charge would be followed up, and defendants to assure the court they would appear to answer a charge. Should either party neglect to appear, their guarantors were liable to be fined.

Those accused of serious crimes, such as homicide or felony, might be ordered by the court to be arrested to face trial. However, prison facilities in most towns being very limited, the more common practice – particularly in civil cases – was to summon the accused to the next court session to answer a charge. If the accused failed to appear on that date, guarantors faced the court's wrath and/or the goods of the accused were ordered to be distrained to pressure the accused into appearing. Distrainment was often not a very effective measure to persuade offenders to submit themselves to justice. If repeated distrainment failed to have effect, arrest (if possible) might be ordered or, in civil cases, the distrained goods might be delivered to the accuser seeking compensation for an alleged injury; outlawry was restricted to courts higher than those of urban status. On the other hand, once the accused appeared to make an initial response to the charge, and to present guarantors who would offer the court assurance that the accused would defend, the case was considered to have begun; the process might then be subject to a series of delays through essoins from either party.

There were a number of ways in which proof of guilt or innocence might be determined, after any effort had been made by a party to obtain summary judgement on grounds of some legal technicality.

- One was by concrete evidence, such as documents having the force of law; e.g. witnessed or sealed recognizances or acquittances of debt, tally sticks (whose notches also provided evidence of an amount due, admissible evidence in a largely non-literate society), indentured contracts, or official records. If these could be produced, and were not themselves subject to challenge as forgery, they would take precedence over any other kinds of proof.
- A second way was the examination of witnesses, although this does not seem to have been a common procedure in most types of cases.
- A related method was trial by inquest or jury of other kind, some of whose members might have direct knowledge of matters pertinent to the case, or indirect knowledge (hearsay), or simply some knowledge of the characters or reputations of the parties to the case. Such bodies may have been selected from individuals expected to have, or to be able to enquire about, some of the facts in the case – because, for example, residents of the vicinity of the crime, or because active in society.
- A less satisfactory (from the modern perspective) method of proof was compurgation, in which the accused "waged/made/did his law" by swearing to his innocence, and usually (but not universally) having others swear a supporting oath; the plaintiff might also, in some cases, have to make a similar oath to the guilt of the accused. This method increasingly came to be restricted to civil cases, because the possibility of false oaths threatened to undermine the punishment of crimes of violence. Use of juries gradually came to be preferred to compurgation.

- Another method used in medieval England – determining guilt or innocence through armed combat of plaintiff and defendant – was one of those legal traditions from which the non-militaristic townsmen obtained exemptions as soon as they could. London's Liber Albus explicitly recognizes the inherent unfairness in this method of trial. Trial by ordeal was, by the end of the twelfth century, only applicable in towns if the defendant opted for that method, and it disappeared entirely from the judicial process in the early thirteenth century.

Special provisions were made for speedy justice in cases where visiting merchants were a party, or where occupants complained of being recently dispossessed of their dwellings. The Law Merchant originated (outside England) with regulations of guilds and at fairs, where men met for only brief periods and on-the-spot justice was a necessity. Another special situation involving merchants, and again particularly merchants temporarily visited other places to trade, concerned withernam, a retribution procedure echoing the ancient principle that all members of a community – in origin, a community defined by kinship – were potentially answerable for the wrongdoings of one of their members. (On this principle, see the charters of London, Nottingham and Northampton).

Punishment

Civil or criminal cases were, on the whole, considered by the Anglo-Saxons to be personal matters, and the basic punishment was financial compensation to victims, or their kin. The Normans introduced the bringing of accusations by "appeal" of the victim, but this remained essentially personal.

Breaking the king's peace was a concept that expanded, making it possible for the crown to act as plaintiff in the absence of any other.

Bracton provides an interesting passage on the kinds of punishments under the following broad categories:

- execution or mutilation;
- banishment;
- bodily restraint;
- physical abuse;
- removal of authority or privileges;
- fine.

No less interesting is that he proceeds to identify the mitigating factors that might lead judges to show clemency or reduce sentences, such as intent (e.g. the difference between murder and accidental homicide), motive, relative status of the offender and the injured party, age, time (e.g. theft by day vs. theft by night), and degree of violence involved.

Imprisonment, the most common punishment for criminals today, was in the Middle Ages less a punitive tool than a means of detaining accused persons until their cases could be heard – particularly if the accused could not find bail (normally two or more persons who would guarantee the accused's appearance at trial) or the crime was too serious to grant bail, e.g. red-handed theft, homicide – or holding convicted persons until they paid their fines, or at least found guarantors for their doing so. In the latter context imprisonment had a coercive rather than a deterrent purpose.

Gaojing convicted offenders became more common towards the close of the Middle Ages, as new legislation addressing new forms of crime began to prescribe imprisonment as a punishment. And as bail became a less reliable assurance of an accused party appearing for trial, as the frankpledge system declined and social relations became less rigid. Still the intent was not to persuade wrongdoers to mend their ways, but instead simply to remove them from society.

Many inmates were debtors, incarcerated until they or outside supporters raised enough money to repay the creditors, along with the sometimes exorbitant fees gaolers charged prisoners for supplies or services. Imprisonment of felons, on the other hand, was usually unnecessary, since they were executed – not only murderers, but thieves, if what they had stolen was worth more than a shilling. Minor thefts (i.e. under a shilling) might warrant a brief stay in prison, but such cases were often dismissed. Those who killed while insane might be held in the king's prison during the king's pleasure, while those guilty of homicide by reason of self-defence were also held in prison, until they had been able to petition for and obtain a royal pardon.

A growing frequency of sentences of imprisonment – although it never became the principal form of medieval punishment – necessitated an increase in prison space; or perhaps it was the growing number of gaols that encouraged greater application of incarceration. Most towns of any size probably had at least one gaol since the twelfth century. In the later Middle Ages some had more than one; these were usually small prisons, often in the town hall or in some tower that was part of the urban defences. Where the number or size of spaces allowed it, there might be some effort at segregating prisoners in terms of the gravity of their crimes, their social status, or their sex. This may suggest some concern about harm or corruption to lesser offenders if they were mixed in with hardened criminals.

York, although its subject is imprisonment of Jacobite rebels, gives some idea of how spaces within a city gate could be used as gaols.

Royal prisons were generally more secure than town prisons, judging from the number of escapes from the latter, which were often adaptations of other structures or modest constructions that may not have been difficult to break out of. Escapees tended to be professional criminals seeking to make themselves scarce, or those liable to execution. For lesser offenders, it was better to bide your time until you could pay your fine or buy a royal pardon. Life in gaol was not so intolerable for those able to pay the gaoler for comforts or services. Those who had neither money nor generous friends or relatives, on the other hand, were left to their own devices and many doubtless succumbed to starvation or disease. An escape to sanctuary from Norwich gaol ca.1286 required one accused thief to carry another on his back, since the latter's foot had rotted away, due to long imprisonment. The number of deaths in prison may have been one of the best deterrents to lawbreaking.

Financial compensation to victims or fines payable to (or confiscation of property by) the authorities, and execution were more common punishments in a society where there was no very effective prison system. Indeed, both national and local authorities liking for the judicial system as a source of income may have been a disincentive to develop a prison system. Fines were either set at the discretion of the judges, or assessed by a special jury; in either case, the social status of the offender – that is, the ability to pay – was usually taken into account. For minor crimes, the poor were often forgiven their fines, although whether this was a matter of mercy or simple recognition that there was no prospect of payment is not easy to judge. For the wealthy, purchase of royal pardons for serious crimes was an option. There was a saying in the late Middle Ages that poor men were hanged by the neck, rich men by the purse. Some viewed pardons pre-emptively; that is, they purchased them in anticipation of being tried at some point for past, or even future, crimes. The very frequent granting of pardons in the late fourteenth and fifteenth centuries was a cause of repeated public complaint.

Other than execution, corporal punishment after the Norman period and before the Tudors was relatively uncommon, while that involving terror or mutilation was rare (although lawless elements seem to have used mutilation for intimidation purposes). It was in fact more common in the towns, relying on customs that were somewhat conservative, than in rural areas, where it was perhaps not in the best interests of lords to remove the hand, eye or other useful part of their labourers. Similarly, whereas hanging was the normal method of execution throughout the country, in towns there are instances of other methods: examples include burning alive, throwing into a well or over a cliff or into the harbour at high tide, and a crude form of the guillotine. Hanging itself was a matter of strangulation, not neck-breaking. For some of those fortunate enough to survive sometimes hours of being thus hung, revival after being taken down might lead to a royal pardon on the assumption that a miracle had occurred. For those guilty of the most heinous crimes (e.g. traitors), drawing and evisceration were associated with a brief hanging, and then the body was cut up, tarred, and its parts displayed atop town gates as a warning to others.

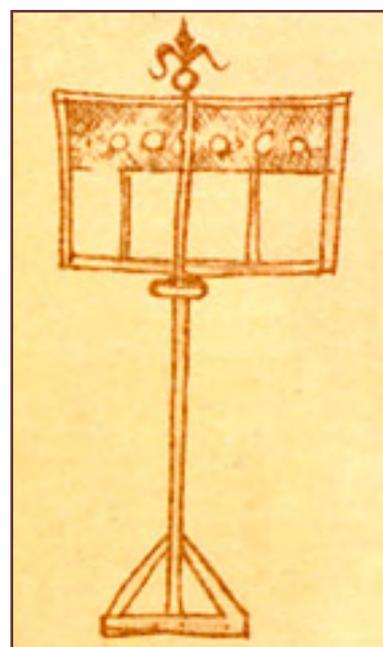

Quite a few minor offences against the community were, however, often punished by local courts through some form of public humiliation or exposure, often combined with physical pain or discomfort. Most common was the pillory, or its equivalent for women (notably whores and brothel-keepers) the thewe, and the hurdle, while the cucking stool was used to hold scolds in a state of embarrassment in a public place; stocks were not so common in the Middle Ages, nor was ducking. A branding, a public flogging, or amputation of part of the body were likewise uncommon, but not unknown, punishments in towns. Imprisonment for specific short periods as a deterrent, or longer periods until a rebellious offending party submitted to authority and made amends, might also be used as a means to punish lesser offences. For less serious offences, or first-time offenders, it might be considered sufficient to do damage only to the offender's reputation, and set a public example; someone selling bad food or drink, for instance, might be required to eat or drink samples in public, and/or the bad drink might be poured over his or her head. Or, in a London case of 1364, a perjurer was imprisoned for a few days, then brought out into a public session of the husting, where forced to stand on a stool, bareheaded, and his crime publicly proclaimed.

Several forms of punishment involved exile from society, either from the immediate community or from the realm. Abjuration was a possibility in cases of homicides or thieves, but only if the accused were able to win sanctuary first. Offences against the community, where not crimes subject to common law, might be punished by deprivation of the franchise (in cases of freemen) or of the right to practice a craft or trade, or the medieval equivalent of "being sent to Coventry" (i.e. social excommunication). Outlawry was another form of being made an outcast, but less a punishment than a deferral of execution until a criminal convicted in absentia fell into the hands of the authorities. Children under 12, too young to be in frankpledge (which put them "within the law"), could not be outlawed. Women likewise were considered not to be directly under the law; instead of being outlawed, however, they could be "waived", a form of social abandonment which denied them the protection of the law. In non-capital cases, if defendants had no means with which to pay a fine, the authorities might prefer to banish them from the town – imprisonment being an alternative that would have incurred costs to the community.

Justice being uncertain in a society where detective and judicial systems relied more on guesswork than evidence, those who could sought to lessen their punishments by claiming "benefit of clergy": the right, by being in holy orders – and there were many who were in lesser orders – to be tried, judged and (if convicted) punished by ecclesiastical courts, since punishments there were lighter. This was one of the Church privileges that Becket gave his life to defend against Henry II's judicial reforms.

The legal profession

The emergence of the legal profession in medieval England is a subject on which historians do not yet have a complete picture. It is most commonly studied in the context of the royal courts centralized at Westminster, because they were long-established, complex and sophisticated, and well-documented. Or studies have focused on the highest levels of the profession (justices and sergeants-at-law). Relatively little attention has been paid to lawyers operating in localities such as boroughs.

In the Anglo-Saxon and Norman periods, reliance was placed on juries to know local custom and be able to pronounce judgements on wrongdoers. In some places we see signs of a group known as "doomsmen" who appear to have been almost professional judges/jurymen; there are hints that the role was hereditary. More typically, sheriffs were court judges, but did little more than preside over court proceedings. Under Henry II, however, judges began to have the authority to give verdicts, and a nucleus of legal experts began to form, serving as the royal justices itinerant, holding eyres (the term meaning "journey") in different parts of the country.

In boroughs the courts were presided over by the chief officers, who could be expected to have some knowledge of local laws, since those were the foundation of their administration. Such little evidence as we have for the early period of borough courts suggests that some men represented themselves, or sought support from fellow townsmen who were not trained lawyers but (through experience in local administration or even by having been involved as a party in litigation) had acquired some knowledge of the workings of the legal system, or from clerks who had at least some experience of a notarial type. In Norman England it was expected that parties would speak for themselves, and restrictions were placed on the use of substitutes to plead on their behalf; those substitutes might often be relatives, friends, or servants. As new laws were made by the new regime, litigation increased in volume and in technical complexity, the national courts emerged at Westminster and had to set new precedents under the new laws, and the administration of law required a more complex and more regular system of judicial administration across the country, an environment was created that fostered the development of professional lawyers.

In the thirteenth century there was no formal education for becoming a lawyer (a function later performed by the Inns of Court). Apprenticeship, or simply observation of and gradual involvement in legal processes, could lead a man into the practice of law, full-time or part-time. London, as the focus of the king's courts, was the logical place to pursue the informal education, if one could afford it. If not, experience of the local courts could lead to a career in law. The ritual involved in making an accusation or a defence could demand a certain amount of expertise, and the work of royal justices (compiled by Bracton) and of law reporters in producing texts that would be of use to students of the law reflects the awareness of the need for a profession. In the twelfth and early thirteenth century, it was impossible to find enough professional judges to staff the eyres, and they had to be supplemented by others. But in the second half of the century that we begin to see professional attorneys active not only in the central courts and the eyres, but also in local courts.

Professionalization was given impetus by the increasingly complex nature of litigation – not least the various devices for securing and protecting property rights (e.g. enfeoffments to use) – as well as by changes in court practice that allowed, in some types of case, parties to appear by attorney rather than in person. The use of lawyers to speak for one in court became the rule, rather than the exception. The possibility of avoiding the courts by submitting disputes to arbitration did not necessarily lessen the demand for professional lawyers; any settlements were best drafted by legal experts. Merchants required legal assistance as credit arrangements became more complex. And boroughs retained professional lawyers and/or expected their town clerks to be adept in legal matters, having the need to deal more and more with the king's courts.

However, we should not overemphasize the development of the legal profession. The other side of the coin was that a shortage of trained administrators of the law meant that the king had to rely overmuch on the aristocracy for local administration of the courts. Yet this was the class whose members were most prone to take the law into their own hands, or to manipulate legal institutions to gain their own ends. In the final resort, the sometimes strenuous efforts by England's medieval kings and their advisors to build an effective legal system was not enough: it could not keep pace with social and economic changes, nor could it win sufficient respect and support from the power-holding groups in society.

What a wardmoot is, etc.

It is called a wardmoot on the grounds that it is an assembly by summons of the whole populace of one ward, there being present its headman, the alderman or his lieutenant, for the purpose of correcting faults, or removing nuisances, and for furthering the benefit of that ward. What we call a "wardmoot" the Romans called a "plebiscite"; it was anciently called a "folk moot" among the Saxons. The aldermen have been accustomed to hold their wardmoots at least once, or twice, or many times a year, by virtue of a warrant sent to them by the mayor then in office. Through which it has been the practice to enquire into the degree of peace and tranquillity within each ward, and for the alderman to correct faults presented.

The customary process for holding a wardmoot in London is as follows. After receiving the warrant, the alderman is to order his beadle to summon all male householders and rent-payers in his ward to appear before him at a certain date and time – that is, the day following such a summons – at a certain location within the ward, so that a wardmoot may be held. The names of whom, once they have been summoned, the beadle shall have written down on a certain roll; that is, the freemen of the city living in the ward listed together, and the rent-payers who are not freemen listed together. When they have gathered together at the hour assigned, the alderman with the more prominent men of the ward having seated themselves in their places, the alderman's clerk is to order the beadle to call for quiet, on the alderman's behalf. That being done, the clerk should read out publicly the warrant, and then he should read out to the beadle the names written in the roll, with the beadle calling them out again in a loud voice, so that anyone not responding to his name (because of failure to be present) is to be noted down and amerced at least 4d. Then the beadle is to present to the alderman a panel, put together by the ward constables, of reputable men of the ward by whom the inquest ought to be made; which selection the alderman has the power to alter, if he thinks it expedient. Once that is done, all the articles concerning the wardmoot, which have been recorded on folio 30 of Part Two of Book Three of this volume, are to be read out to the jurors. And then the alderman is to assign the jurors a specific date on which to make their presentments [of offences]. On which [day] the jurors are to present their findings in the form of an indenture, of which one part is to remain with the alderman and the other part with the ward [jury?]. The alderman ought to report what is on his part to the mayor at his next General Court, so that, by seeing and picking out those things that fall to the mayor and city to punish, the indenture can be handed back to him for the other matters to be dealt with.

At the wardmoot the alderman and the reputable men of the ward, as well as the jurors, ought to elect constables, scavagers, ale-conners, a beadle, and other officers – who, at the General Court already mentioned, shall take their respective oaths of office, as recorded on folio 26 of Part Two of Book Three of this volume. It has also been the custom for the alderman to have the beadle draw up a special inventory of hostellers, brewers, bakers, cooks, victuallers, and hucksters residing in the ward. Bakers may also obtain their marks there, of which markings there are examples among the aldermannic records; in relation to which transaction, each baker is to pay the alderman 4d., unless it happens that he has – before the alderman, within the ward (and not elsewhere) – previously paid for an exemplification of his mark. It has also been the custom for the aldermen to seal the measures and weights [used] within their wards, and condemn those that are not sealed; taking for the sealing [a fee] for their own use, such as the Chamber of the city now takes. For indeed their measures made of bronze must in each ward accord with the royal standards of the city. And at the wardmoot those who are not freemen of the city and who have not been previously sworn to it should be placed in frankpledge, notwithstanding that they may have been received into it elsewhere, in some other ward. They shall swear the oath, etc., which is required for admittance into frankpledge [as in] folio 26 of Part Two of Book Three of this volume. Each person so received shall give a penny to the clerk for his admission. If anyone to whom this applies stays away from the wardmoot, that person is to pay 4d. to the alderman, unless the person is a knight, esquire, woman, apprentice in the law, or cleric, or someone who does not reside in the city.

The alderman ought personally to preside over and pass sentence on all faults and nuisances in the ward, as presented by the jurors; except perhaps any problematic matters that arise or those falling under the jurisdiction of the Chamber – with such matters the mayor and the chamberlain, in conjunction with the sheriffs and other officers, will concern themselves. If the alderman finds the officers under him to be remiss or negligent, he is to warn them to mend their ways; if they are unwilling to do so, he may within reason reprimand or punish them, or refer the matter to the mayor, who should rectify the problem appropriately.

DISCUSSION

In a city with as large a population as London, a mass assembly of the residents – in folkmoot – must have been an unwieldy tool; by the time London's local government was producing its own records, the role of the folkmoot had been relegated to a limited number of meetings more for informational purposes than communal decision-making. Most towns of any size were subdivided into wards, to make matters of policing (and to a lesser extent judicial administration) more manageable. From the earliest time that we can see this system in operation in London, it had 24 wards – a 25th being added in 1394, when a particularly large ward was divided in two. The actual number of wards has a symbolical significance, if we may judge from the suspicious frequency with which the numbers 12 and 24 figured in urban administration. However, the wards themselves, which vary considerably in size, may reflect foci of settlement in Anglo-Saxon London, at an early period before the consolidation into a single administration – a situation similar, perhaps, to that of Norwich, evolving from a complex of neighbouring settlements into a single borough; the precise ward boundaries may not have been fixed until around the eleventh century.

Each ward was essentially a hundred, and the wardmoots were the equivalents of the hundred courts elsewhere in the country; just as a hundred court was a subordinate to its shire court, the wardmoot might be considered to have a similar relationship to the folkmoot, except that the latter had been depowered and largely superseded in London by the more efficient mechanism of the husting court. Ancient law specified that a hundred would have an alderman as its head man. Under the Anglo-Saxon kings the title was applied to a nobleman responsible for administering a shire. However, after that official's replacement, under the Danish monarchy, by the earl (with actual administrative duties being taken up in due course by the king's shire-reeve), the title of alderman fell into disuse. It reappeared locally either in a devalued form, or in a generalized form simply meaning "senior man". This re-emergence may in fact have begun in London, at a time when the Anglo-Saxon ealdorman had not been forgotten, to give prestige to the leaders of the local settlements; one of the London wards, Aldermanbury, means "the burh of the alderman". London writers, with their penchant for drawing parallels between London and ancient Rome, compared the aldermen to Roman senators, although noting that the aldermen were advanced more in wisdom than in age; they also, because of the judicial role of aldermen, assumed a link between them and the lawmen (or doomsmen) of pre-Conquest England. There are no grounds for thinking that the office of alderman in any way derived from either senators or lawmen, but the comparisons are not unhelpful.

The offences investigated by the alderman through his wardmoot (referred to in the text as being elsewhere recorded in Liber Albus) were as follows:

- if there had been, since the last moot, disturbances of the peace or riots;
- if there were any undesirables residing in the ward: lepers, outlaws, criminals, persons of ill-repute, or those not in frankpledge in that ward;
- if any women residing in the ward were prostitutes, or of known immoral behaviour, or persistent scolds;
- if there were any fire hazards, such ovens, hearths or furnaces that were defective (apparently defined as placement near combustible materials), or use of illegal fuels – only wood and charcoal being permitted;
- (on a related theme) if any house were roofed with flammable materials such as reeds or straw, as opposed to the approved tiles, lead or stone;
- if there had been breaches of the assize of ale;
- if keepers of taverns or hostelries were hosting gamblers or other troublemakers after curfew;
- if there were any hucksters in the ward;
- if anyone threw out dung into the streets, or put it in front of the houses of others;
- if the keeping of pigs or cattle on urban property was causing a nuisance for neighbours;
- if any usurious transactions had been conducted since the last moot (the scope of usury extending beyond simple money-lending to some kinds of brokerage in commercial transactions);
- if there had been any encroachments in the streets, in the city ditches, on the city walls, on the Thames, or on communal land;
- if bakers were all baking only the type of bread for which they were qualified;
- if anyone had been wandering about in a suspicious manner after curfew;
- if any city officer had abused his powers through extortionate or violent behaviour, or was encouraging parties to sue each other (in order to profit from the fees associated with legal actions);
- if any employer was paying illegally high wages to workers in the construction trades;
- if any tavern's ale-stake (which was the sign of business) was longer or projected out further than the law allowed.

Contrast with the articles investigated by the eyre, and offences against the community at Leicester (in preparation).

NOTES

"plebiscite"

Strictly speaking, decrees issued by the Concilium Plebis (assembly of the common people), a democratic legislative body organized into tribal divisions; but here the term is used for the assembly itself. It was part of the legends surrounding London that its heritage stretched back to Roman civilization and beyond.

"folk moot"

In fact the general folk moot of Londoners, which at an earlier date met at need in St. Paul's churchyard and was still summoned together by the tolling of the bell of St. Paul's, now met only three times a year for specific items of business: the swearing-in of the city sheriffs at the Guildhall, at Michaelmas; the arrangements for winter watch and ward, at Christmas; and to go over matters related to fire prevention and suppression, on 24 June in anticipation of the dry, hot season. Legislative/judicial business once in the sphere of the folk moot had long since been transferred to the more manageable institution of the husting.

"beadle"

The beadle performed for the alderman the same types of police duties that sergeants performed for mayor and sheriffs – but with emphasis more on detection than enforcement.

"rent-payers"

The Latin servientes mercenarios in this context would make most sense as "those owing service by way of rent-paying". However, the alternate famulorum mercenariorum in the next sentence suggests the term could mean "trading agents" (i.e. external lords' representatives, residing in London in order to undertake buying and selling on behalf of their masters).

"inquest"

Inquest is here used in the general sense of judicial enquiry, rather than the more specific sense of coroner's inquest to which the term tends today to be applied.

"General Court"

This would have been one of the principal sessions of the mayor's court.

"scavagers"

Minor officials responsible for the city fabric: supervising that pavements were in good repair, that streets were kept clean, and that chimneys or furnaces were not fire hazards. "Scavage" could also apply to the inspection of merchandize brought into London by outsiders.

"ale-conners"

Minor officials who supervised brewing and fast food trades in regard to their sale of ale, to ensure the quality and fair price of the product.

"special inventory"

These types of occupations were those most likely to be involved in breaches of the assizes, and a inventory of those engaged in the occupations would have been a handy check-list.

"hucksters"

Petty retailers (usually women – the noun is the feminine form) – street vendors; the offence perhaps being less their activity but whether they were carrying it out without licence.

"marks"

The stamps used to identify the bread of a particular baker, to make it easier to identify the culprit if a loaf were found to be of inferior quality or excessive price (it may be noted that, when accused, bakers often defended by claiming that the defective loaf was not of their making).

"seal"

To ensure their compliance with official standards, weights and measures had to be examined, tested and – if they matched the standards – an official seal was applied to them to show their use was authorized. The fee the alderman charged for this went into his own pocket – a form of compensation (in lieu of salary) for his service to the city.

"Chamber"

The Chamber was essentially the bureaucratic core of city government, presided over by the mayor; many if not all bureaucratic officers received user fees to supplement their official salaries.

"made of bronze"

The original de aere facta may perhaps mean "of fixed proportions".

"oath"

The oath of those received into frankpledge required: allegiance to the king; keeping of the peace; preparedness to assist borough officials in arresting wrongdoers; preparedness to participate in city watches; adhering to the regulations the wardmoot was obliged to uphold; and resisting or reporting any conspiracy uncovered.

You shall well and truly make enquiry and present all manner of brawls [and] bloodshed [with] daggers, swords, bills, knives, and all kinds of weapons. And staves used against the peace. And of attachments rescued from bailiffs or their officers. And of all harbourers [of suspected criminals, prostitutes etc.]. [Of offences] against the assizes [of bread, ale and wine]. And of all housebreaking. And those who eavesdrop under men's windows. And of all common scolds and common night-wanderers and of all common Sunday diners, all who breakfast at the time of divine services and sermons. And everyone who buys foodstuffs – such as eggs, butter and cheese and other other victuals – before they reach the market designated for [their sale], and that you shall present all persons so doing. Also you shall make enquiry and presentments at the time of the leets. And at all times you shall make honest enquiry and honest presentment of these articles, and everything else that pertains to the office [of tithingman], and will not allow friendship, bribe, or obligation to any person [to cause you] to do other than your best in disclosing [offences] etc. And their ale is to comprise 12 gallons of clear ale according to the mayor's proclamation, and that they make presentment of all ale-houses and drinking-houses that are not licenced according to the act of the king's parliament made on that subject, and are to present all who behave poorly by playing at dice, cards, bowls and other illegal games. [You are to make presentment] of all obstructions and dunghills in the streets which cause nuisance. And that you go to see that all brewers brew good, wholesome ale suitable to be drunk by men and that their [brewing-]tubs are in good condition, and that they use only sealed measures to sell [ale].

DISCUSSION

The tithingman, as the leader of a unit of those sworn to frankpledge within a community, took the lead in enquiring among the members of his unit (or more broadly), into things that needed to be reported to the authorities.

NOTES

"bills"

A pike with a hook-shaped blade.

"attachments rescued"

The rescue of attachments refers to goods distrained by city officers to oblige someone to answer to justice, but subsequently and illegally recovered by the owners by subterfuge, theft or force.

"common"

Common in this context means habitual.

"Sunday diners"

The offence of Sunday diners and breakfasters was that they should have been attending church instead of feasting. The section "all who breakfast ... all persons so doing" is an interpolation in a later hand, but the concern with forestalling is typical of the later Middle Ages as a whole.

"And their ale"

The section from "And their ale ..." to the close of the oath is a later interpolation. This section seems to begin mid-sentence.

TRANSLATION

Let it also be known that the mayor and citizens say that no-one may be like a citizen in the city, staying there and having [the benefits of] its laws, for more than three nights without finding two guarantors, and thus being in frankpledge. Should he lodge in the city for one night longer in that way [i.e. without guarantors], and then commit a felony or some other breach of the king's peace, and not answer to justice, the alderman in whose ward he was ought to be amerced for accepting him in the ward when not in frankpledge.

DISCUSSION

Here frankpledge is not associated with a tithing system, per se, but applies essentially the same concept in requiring those outside the tithing system to find guarantors of behaviour. Those guarantors would be subject to a fine if the person for whom they vouched failed to appear in court to answer an accusation, so care was taken in legal records to note the names of guarantors. It was the responsibility of the alderman to know of anyone staying in his ward who was not in frankpledge, and the responsibility of ward residents to report such individuals to the alderman; if judicial satisfaction could not be obtained from a defaulting defendant without guarantors, the alderman and the whole ward could be fined. The period of three nights was to distinguish persons staying in London from those passing through; certain groups exempt from finding guarantors were identified in an ordinance made as a result of the 1244 eyre: merchants from outside the city; travellers; household servants of magnates, come to buy provisions or conduct business for their masters; and persons involved in cases before the king's court.

"ward"

Referring to the system of aldermannic wards into which the city was divided for administrative purposes (although it is possible the wards may reflect earlier nuclei of Anglo-Saxon settlement).

[1. Jury presentments from three constabularies]

Inquisition held on 5 June 1309 before William Schilling, Peter de Folsham and Elias de Warham, constables of Lynn, by jurors William de Qwinberwe, John de Rellesham, John de Esex carpenter, Richard de Englelond, Adam de Geyton, William de Bauseye, Alexander de Honewrth, John de Wigemer, Peter Mercator, John de Brumholme, Richard de Dersyngham, Peter de Fornesete. Who say under oath that a certain Helen de Swanton is a thief and a robber and harbours thieves who come to stay with her during the night, notably a particular thief by the name of Adam son of Thomas le Blower of Wiggenhall who has been proven to be a thief and robber. They also say that on the day immediately before this inquisition William Giffage and five associates, assigned to the nightwatch for preserving the king's peace, encountered in the middle of the night a certain person of Wiggenhall by the name of [blank]; he refusing to surrender peacefully, they pursued him to the entrance of the church and wounded him there, for which the constables commit them to trial. They also say that Kamma the wife of Michael Culling harbours thieves and whores. They also say that Matilda de Banham is a thief and a robber and harbours thieves and whores. They also say that Matilda Clauda is a thief and a robber and harbours thieves and whores. They also say that a certain woman named Grace is a thief and a robber and harbours thieves and whores. On the basis of whose [testimony] under oath concerning the aforesaid wrongdoers and harbourers, the constables submit this [document] to you under their seals of office.

[2. Jury presentments from a single constabulary]

Inquisition held on 13 July 1314 before Nicholas Bretun, constable, by jurors Simon Rust, Warren de Ryppis, William de Pykenham, John Sefowel, William de Newton, William atte Both, John de Walepol, Richard Ingeland, Nicholas Estrich, Richard de Dersyngham, Godfrey Schilling, Thomas de Ryburwg, John de Somersham. Who say under oath that Hugh Wakewo of Ely is a night prowler, the culprit in many robberies, and was present on the night of 3 July at the death of Gerard de Wyldishouse, who was killed that night outside the gate of Richard de Swerdiston. Richard de Swerdiston, Robert Donsete and John de Yskisham were on hand that night and took from Harold Swart and his associates, against their will, 14s. of silver, a tunic [worth] 6s., a pole-axe?, and a double-headed axe?. They also say that John son of Geoffrey de Mereseye, on 4 July, carried off by theft 7 yards of say and a crossbow from a certain ship belonging to men of Estland. They also say that John son of Martin de Bek is a thief and is guilty of multiple robberies and murders. They also say that John Aleman of Terrington is a thief and was present at the death of the man mentioned above who was killed and at many other robberies. They also say that John Wylingg mariner is a thief who committed a robbery in the ship called the Margaret. They also say that Stephen [blank] from the ship Walter of Aldemouth is a culprit in the death of the man mentioned above who was killed. They also say that William Broun was in a ship called Rosewold and carried off by theft a portion of the silver, cloth, and other goods belonging to that ship. They also say that Clement Drewe and Roger Katour were guilty of the aforementioned death and robberies. They also say that Thomas Brekerop committed a theft, carrying off a luff worth 6s.8d from the ship of Reyner Blok of Lubeck.

DISCUSSION

Medieval Lynn was divided into constabularies, as the basis for community policing, as well as taxation; the importance of the constables is reflected in the fact that leading burgesses filled the office. However, in contrast to the situation in London with the aldermen, Lynn's constables did not do double duty in terms of having both judicial and political roles.

The purpose of the constabulary inquisitions was not to try crimes, but simply to gather information about them, for forwarding to competent judicial authorities. Whether that higher authority was the bishop's steward, president of the leet court, or the king's itinerant justices is harder to say, since at this period judicial jurisdiction was a subject of dispute between burgesses and bishop. Surviving records suggest, however, that the leet concerned itself only with minor offences and nuisances, not with even the reporting of felonies. The inquisition records have the appearance of schedules that were attached at some point to some larger judicial record. The 1314 document has 3 seals appended. Lynn also had coroners, but their investigations (being into freshly-committed crimes) were more detailed.

It will be noted that an international port like Lynn faced policing problems in regard to ships from other ports either being targets for crime or bringing to town committers of crimes.

NOTES

"commit them to trial"

I.e. the nightwatch were given notice that their action would have to be put before a higher authority.

"13 July 1314"

The date given by Mrs. Owen is 5 July 1309. However, my own notes from viewing this document indicate the date as 1314. As The Making of King's Lynn includes an unfortunate number of incorrect dates, I have decided to trust my own notes in this case. I have likewise corrected a few of the personal names in the documents, based on my own reading of the original.

"pole-axe" "double-headed axe"

My translations here are tentative, based partly on the context and the hypothesis that Swerdiston et al. may have been trying to apprehend the murderers/robbers. What is here transcribed as policiam might be a pole-axe (pollexam), or less likely a thimble (pollicium) or, even less plausibly, a thumb (pollicem). What is transcribed as "duble heyke" I have translated on association with hachia (axe, sometimes hakka).

"say"

A fine cloth, somewhat like serge.

"Estland"

A generalized term referring to northern Germany and the Baltic; visiting merchants or sailors from that area were usually from towns of the Hanseatic League.

"luff"

A boom used by a tacking sail.

Leet of Conesford, 8 February 1288

Berstreet [sub-leet]

Geoffrey de Howe harboured William de Stirston, who was not in tithing. William Calf in mercy for showing great contempt to the bailiffs by refusing to take oath [as a capital pledge]; afterwards he swore [his oath]. William de Denne has harboured Robert de Howe, son of Alexander de Brakendenne, for two years. He is consequently in mercy because he [Robert?] was out of tithing. Robert de Mendham (sworn), William Godynow (sworn), Henry Pope (sworn), Geoffrey de Howe (discharged), Edmund de Stafford (sworn), Geoffrey fitz Baldwin (sworn), John de Ashill (sworn), Henry de Hoyland (sworn), Simon le Prude (sworn), Simon fitz Ranulph (sworn), Eudo de Tybenham (sworn), William Calf (sworn), Thomas le Neve (sworn), who present on their oath that John the servant of Robert Cann drew blood from Ralph de Aslakton baker. They say that Beatrice la Qwyte and her associate Acilia habitually steal fleece from sheep and removed the fleece from the sheep of John Molle chaplain, and they stole a surcoat priced at 40d. from the house of Henry Gylur; they carried off the fleeces and surcoat to the house of Geoffrey Munne, who knew about the felony and harboured them. They say also that Richard Cokard is a thief and habitually steals geese and hens, and has been a thief for seven years. Also they present Robert Scot and the husband of Emma le Hauteyn for the same. They also present that Beatrice daughter of Robert Beumund raised the hue and it was pursued as far as the Tolbooth. They present also that Henry de Caumbys is a thief, and they consider him suspicious, and that he acts contrary to the peace, and that he is well-dressed and no-one knows by what means [he can afford good clothes], and he is always wandering around at night. They also present that the Prioress of Carrow and Robert Gerveys of Bracondale use the greenery in the city ditches as pasturage and have pigs and sheep there in the keeping of swineherds and shepherds. They also present that Thomas le Schowthere, residing by Trowse bridge, buys grain before it reaches the market, with the result that etc. [i.e. the bailiffs lose the toll payable from the importer of the grain]. Roger de Clakeston for the same. Robert Gerveys of Bracondale for the same. Geoffrey Ringolf for the same. They present that all brewers sell contrary to the assize. They also say that Adam de Barsham drew blood from Matilda le Ledbettere. Adam also drew blood from William son of Richard de Gontorth. John Gylur drew blood from Geoffrey Munne. They say that all fishermen and poulterers have bought before the hour etc. [i.e. when the market opened for trading]. They also present that Vincent and Adam de Saham dug up the highway at the Old Swinemarket. Nicholas de Reymerston made an encroachment eighteen feet long and three inches wide. They also say that John de Ely linendraper sells beer for a penny. They also say that Thomas Gerveys skinner and Walter Hee have fuller's blocks for conducting fraudulent work on old clothes. They also present that Walter Hee has an unsealed measure so that those measures make a gallon [sic]. They also say that Roger Burgeys broke down the door of Simon le Prude. They also say that John Qwytt, John Hert senior of Trowse, Walter Hunne, Stephen le Carecter, John Croke, Walter Bely, and John Strike sell unwholesome meat. John Pekok baker drew blood from Ralph the servant of Richard de Aylesham at the bakery of Peter de Wyleby. They also say that the anchorite of All Saints has blocked up the Cockey so that no-one can cross over it there. They also say that Roger de Lakenham has sold Jewish meat known as trephah. They also say that Humphrey de Alderford drew blood from Alexander Cully with a cudgel and Alexander raised the hue. They also say that Ralph de Mangrene blocked the highway for 6 feet of its width opposite his stall, so that carts cannot get past there. Roger Beumund has an extremely unpleasant dunghill. William de Kesewyk for the same. Martin le Rede, lodging with Richard de Aylesham, is out of tithing. John Keye [is] out of tithing. Roger son of Richard de Aylesham [is] out of tithing. Henry de Bekles chaplain raised the hue on William de Lakenham in the parish of St. Martin. Marion, wife of Roger de Corston, raised the hue on Reginald de Lakenham in the same parish. Gundredale Puddingwyf raised the hue on William le Linnite. Richard de Hemenhale raped Hawisia Balle. Hamo the smith of Trowse bought grain, with the result that the bailiffs etc. The wife of Thomas le Cordewaner raised the hue on Reginald de Lakenham. They say that the poulterers and fishermen (as above). They present also that the wife of Andrew Skeppere, who lodges in the house of William de Buretoft, is a thief and stole from the house of William de Lakenham butcher a surcoat priced at 12d. And she is habitually doing this kind of thing. They present also that Robert Scot habitually climbs over walls at night and breaks through walls [of houses?] and carries out other felonies.

[Other types of offences presented in this roll, ibid, 1-19, include:]

- Nicholas le Jay wounded a certain clerk, an outsider, and cut off two of the clerk's fingers, and the hue was raised there and Nicholas was captured and imprisoned on a charge by Hugh de Bromholm, constable of the leet, and Ernald [de Castro, who wounded Hugh during the pursuit] and others escaped.
- All the alewives sell two gallons for a penny and two gallons for a penny-halfpenny.
- The lodgers in the renter of master Godfrey de Norton have a window that is a nuisance [i.e. probably an impediment] to passers-by and pedestrians on the highway.
- The servant of Robert de Daleby found a cow and led it away, but they don't know to where.
- Master Roger de Gernemutha brought a plea of debt against Richard de Melton in the Court Christian, contrary to the king's prohibition.

- Master Alan de Freton caused an obstruction in the river with dung and ashes, contrary to the king's prohibition.
- John Howard of Surlingham has goods belonging to him at the house of Margaret Sumeres in the parish of St. Peter Southgate and trades in the city, yet is not in tithing nor in the franchise of Norwich.
- Ralph Perconal found and keeps a plank cast up by the river and has not turned it over to the bailiffs.
- Roger de Lakenham drew blood from Richard Warinhale and the wife of Richard Warinhale raised the hue, [but] they did not bring the matter to court but reached a private settlement among themselves.
- Men of Sprowston who sell sausages and puddings knowingly buy poor quality pigs and sell in Norwich market the said sausages and puddings which are unfit for human consumption.
- Roger de Nedham smith habitually raises the hue on his servants, night and day, and has done this constantly since the last leet.
- Walter Jolyf has made a watercourse where none ever existed before, across [the property of] William Bele and to the nuisance of William, his neighbour.
- Geoffrey de Lenn sold a poorly-tanned hide to Richard de Knapton junior, and habitually does that kind of thing.
- The daughter of John de Sculthorpe by night stole a bucket and rope from the house of Hugh de Castro and [planned to?] deposit them in the Jewry. Ralph Brid and Lucas de Brunne encountered her en route to the Jewry and took the rope and bucket out of her hands and kept them until Hugh de Castro gave [them] five pence; and they said they found them pawned in the Jewry.
- Emma de Ashwell bought 6 coombs of corn from the servant of the parson of Pulham and, because she did not receive a heaped measure she withholds a halfpenny from him Emma de Ashwell and the wife of Martin Whiteside regularly refuse [to buy] razed measures of corn and malt.
- The tanners have a gild among themselves, so that if any member wrongs another the complaint is to be made to the alderman, with the result that the bailiffs etc. [i.e. are deprived of their authority and of revenues from court fines].

- All cooks and pastry-cooks re-heat pasties and meat on the second and third days.
- Isabella who lodges next to the Cockey in a renter of Geoffrey Costinoble harbours a certain woman whom they believe a thief and they suspect her [i.e. Isabella] for harbouring [thieves].
- Thomas, formerly the servant of William de Intwodde, habitually receives stolen goods at Yarmouth and brings them to Norwich to sell; sometimes he says that these goods are feathers.
- John Janne bought eight drowned sheep from Alan de Catton and sold them as if good meat.
- Roger le Caly, Gerard le Especer and his sons John and William hold a market at the gate of Holy Trinity to the damage of the community marketplace.
- The servant of Mabel, wife of Henry le Scriven, climbed up a gutter [i.e. drainpipe] of Geoffrey de Wyleby and removed and carried of lead placed there priced at 1d.
- Robert le Fuler spends much yet has nothing from which [to spend] and he wanders about at night; a bad opinion is held of him because it must have been he who stole John de Ingham's goods from his tavern in Cookrowe.... Robert le Fuler is acquainted with thieves and cutpurses and he receives rewards from them to prevent them being arrested.

DISCUSSION

These extracts from the record of the leet session held at Lent give a sense of the range of offences and misdemeanours committed by townspeople or outsiders or strangers. The injured party might be an individual or the community in general. Sometimes the report was not of a specific crime, but simply of suspicious behaviour (e.g. Henry de Campesse). Some offences were serious enough to require referring to a higher court, such as the eyre – the accused were ordered arrested. Most were punishable by moderate fines, ranging – to judge from a roll of amercements from 1288/89 – from 12d. to 6s.8d.

The lightest fines were for being out of tithing – a very common offence – raising hue and cry, or for jurors who failed to present offences; while the heaviest were for serious market offences such as being engaged in trade without being a freeman or forestalling. But there were not fixed fines for different offences; circumstances surrounding the particular offence, the number of offences, and the capability of the offender to pay were taken into consideration; thus for example one man not in tithing was fined 2s. because he had married while in that condition, while the bailiffs cancelled some fines because of the poverty of the offenders. The repeated blanket accusations against brewers, cooks, fishermen, etc., show however that the fines were not sufficient deterrent and were perhaps perceived simply as the price of doing (illicit) business.

The record of the presentment of offences in each sub-leet, by a 12-man jury selected from the principal tithingmen (or "capital pledges") of each sub-leet, usually began with a list of those selected to take the juror's oath, followed by a list of the offences they reported. The offences identified prior to the listing of jurors seems in part associated with the process of selection: one juror was disqualified because himself an offender (which put him in a conflict of interest), while another initially refused to serve on the jury – informing on friends or neighbours doubtless not being popular, while jurors were themselves subject to fines if an offence came to notice that they did not report – but changed his mind when threatened with amercement. On the other hand, part of these initial presentments may have had to do with administration of the tithing system itself, since two of the three are concerned with men not affiliated with tithings. The few other examples of this that occur in the roll support this hypothesis up to a point.

It appears that the presentments of the juries were accepted at face value, unless clear evidence to the contrary appeared. The capital pledges had presumably consulted with members of their tithing before bringing forward accusations at the view of frankpledge, and there is slight evidence that the jury as a whole needed to support accusations by any of its members. There is no evidence of witnesses being sought. While accused parties may have had the opportunity to defend themselves, it was not a given that they would be present at the session at all; the word of an individual against that of a group of twelve townsmen would not have counted for much. On the other hand, there are several cases where fines were cancelled because the bailiffs concluded that the accusation was without substance, and in one case a capital pledge was fined for false accusation against a woman concerning a crime committed within his sub-leet, after the bailiffs (apparently) cross-checked with the accused's tithing denied her involvement.

NOTES

"Robert Scot and the husband of Emma le Hauteyn"

The pair were more specifically charged by the jury for Southern Conesford sub-leet: that they robbed the servant of Robert le Parchiminer of fourpence farthing, just south of Norwich in Bracondale.

"Robert Gerveys"

The Southern Conesford jury also accused Robert Gerveys (likely a tenant of Carrow Priory) of forestalling corn, probably in Bracondale which was just on the other side of the defensive perimeter.

"all brewers"

The blanket charge against brewers indicates both how commonly the assize of ale was ignored, and how taken for granted it was in the community that the terms of the assize would be infringed.

"fishermen and poulterers"

The crime of the fishermen and poulterers, as indicated more clearly by the same charge brought by another sub-leet's jury, was that they bought up meat and fish coming to the market in order to control the supply and raise prices. The seriousness of this offence, in terms of its aggravation to the community, is reflected in the fact that several juries separately presented it.

"encroachment"

An encroachment, or purpresture, was an act of trespassing onto private or public property, as part of (for example) constructing or extending a building or its appurtenance, digging a drain, etc.

"fuller's blocks"

These, Hudson explains, were likely troughs in which old clothing – possibly stolen clothing, the law suspected – was beaten to raise the cloth (a treatment similar to fulling); which, when combined with other alterations, might make them appear new.

"trephah"

Meat unacceptable for consumption according to Jewish dietary laws. Jewish butchers sold any such meat to Christian butchers, but prejudice grew against it among Christians and it evidently became an offence to sell such meat to Christians.

"Court Christian"

The Court Christian could claim jurisdiction in matters with obvious religious overtones, such as marriage or testaments, but this would not normally extend to pleas of debt.

"private settlement"

Thus forestalling the course of justice and depriving the court of revenue in fines.

"tanners have a gild"

The complaint about a tanners' gild was based on a clause in the royal charter of liberties granted in 1256, that "No gild may henceforth be held in the city to the detriment of the city."

"market"

The concern about the private market, which was evidently on Tombland (Holy Trinity being the cathedral) relates to the ongoing disputes between the city and the priory as to jurisdiction on Tombland, where the Prior claimed the right to hold a market.

[1. A break-in]

An inquisition taken, according to the requirements of the Statute of Winchester, before John Wyth king's coroner of the town of Oxford, Richard de Waleden bailiff of the same, Andrew de Pirye, Thomas de Henxeye and Ralph de Stoke, constables of that town, on 25 August 1305, by the oath of Geoffrey de Henxeye, Thomas de Morton, Gilbert de Ros, William de Sancta Frideswyda, Rogert le Lacemaker, Geoffrey Langeford, John de Lenne, Henry de Abindon tailor, Thomas de Wesenham, Nicholas Brutes, William Wynderhout, John Fikeys, William le Fletcher, Thomas de Boys, John Scot, Richard le Cha, Thomas de Walton, Adam de Padenhall, William le Barber, Nicholas de Radinge, John le Beste, Walter de Sancto Aldato, and Roger le Sherman, jurors to enquire into which evildoers and disturbers of the peace kicked down the door of Edith de Denyses in St. Aldate parish in the dark of night on 24 August 1305, entered Edith's house that same night, broke open a certain chest that they found there, removed and carried off goods found in that chest

(viz. 2 tablecloths, 2 towels, and 9s. in cash), and similarly broke into another strongbox, according to Edith.

All the jurors state under oath that on that date around the hour of vespers Edith told her neighbours that a certain clerk, whose name she did not reveal, had physically threatened her so that she dared not sleep in her own home that night. Consequently she took all her linens, woollens, and all her other possessions and carried them out of there; later she went to the house of Seuy the goldsmith and stayed there overnight. They also state that, after she had left her house, 8 clerks coming from their sport in Cowmede approached her house. One of them went up to her door and beat on it with his hand. When that failed to open it, he drew back a little, took a run at it, and struck the door with his foot, so that it opened. They say however, under oath, that they have no idea of the names of any of that party. Furthermore, they say that if any damage was done, or if any chest or strongbox were broken open, or any goods or possessions were removed from the house, they have no idea who was guilty of it unless it was his [i.e. the door-breaker's] followers. Asked who those followers were, they say under oath that they do not know any of their names, nor do they know of any other guilty party unless she herself.

In testimony of which, the jurors have put their seals to this [record of the] inquisition.

[2. Crimes reported by frankpledge jury]

An inquisition taken at Oxford before Thomas Coventre mayor of the town, Thomas Dagvile and John Michell bailiffs of the town, Thomas Gibbys, William Offord and John Shawe aldermen of the town, for the view of frankpledge held there 27 April 1428 by the oath of John Barton, Robert Walford, Thomas Gare, John Boseworth, Thomas Sprigge, Stephen Gosselin, John Leper, Geoffrey Morice, Henry Sadel, William Person, Roger Olney, and Philip Caspi. They say under oath that on 29 September 1427 William Squyer manciple of Oxford in Oxfordshire feloniously raped Joan the wife of Henry Cappelani at Oxford and feloniously robbed Henry of 3 silver spoons worth 6s. and other goods to the value of £13.6s.8d. They say that on 29 December 1427 student John Crosse of Mollington in Oxfordshire lay in wait at Oxford for the purpose of robbing the public and, in that regard, waylaid Thomas Dagvile, feloniously robbing him of a scarlet hood worth 10s. They say that William Whitechurch, Thomas Spratt, Hugh Thomas and Geoffrey Taylur regularly prowl by night and waylay pedestrians. They say that on 22 March 1428 at Oxford James Jope of Oxford in Oxfordshire, a student, and parson of Mixbury, kitted out as if for war, along with many other clerks, assaulted Richard Barthelot one of the king's officers of Oxford when he was performing his official duties, and feloniously robbed Richard of a black hood worth 6s. They say that John Lodewyth is a common harbourer of thieves. They say that John Hynbert is a common regrator of leather. They say that on 2 August 1426 at Oxford William Collyng clerk of Oxford in Oxfordshire and John Hugat student of Oxford in Oxfordshire broke into the king's prison of the town of Oxford, entered it, and feloniously took out Thomas Thorsby, who was there for various felonies. Also that Hugh Basseling is a common thief. That say that John Olde is a common harbourer of thieves. Also that on 6 October last at Oxford Robert Beverly student of Oxford in Oxfordshire feloniously raped [\[the remainder is lost\]](#).

DISCUSSION

Felonies and other breaches of the peace were the general responsibility of the town authorities to investigate, although trial and punishment (if culpable parties could be identified and apprehended) was a matter for the king's justices until powers of justices of the peace were granted to urban officials. As with coroners' inquests, the purpose of the jury was to provide any evidence its members might know, or that they might believe from the testimony of other witnesses, if such there were.

In the first case, an ad hoc inquisition was held to investigate a break-in while memory of the event was still fresh. In the second, one of the periodic "views of frankpledge" put on record a series of crimes that had occurred since the last view.

On an unrelated note, observe the differences in the style of jurors last names between the two periods, reflecting the transition from differentiators to fixed surnames.

NOTES

"clerks coming from their sport"

The clerks who had been at play in the meadow were doubtless university students.

"followers"

Much hinges here upon the translation of sectatores suos whom the jury suggests may have been responsible for the theft. Rogers seems to have thought this referred to "companions" of Edith, perhaps meaning her servants or tenants. However, if she had servants or tenants she would surely have felt less nervous about sleeping in her home that night, and their names could surely have been provided by Edith. Therefore I rather think the jury was referring to the group of clerks who accompanied the one who broke down the door; whether he was the same who had earlier threatened Edith, we cannot know.

"manciple"

An officer of a university college whose duties were similar to those of a steward, e. g. ensuring the household was provisioned.

"Richard Barthelot"

Barthelot was probably a town sergeant

Concerning those who resist authority

No-one is to behave in a defiant fashion, in word or deed, towards the sergeants or bailiffs of the city. Nor is anyone to interfere with their execution of judgements, attachments, distresses, or other tasks that are ordered or fall to the bailiffs to perform, upon penalty of imprisonment. If however someone believes that he has been wronged by the bailiff, let him bring a complaint about it to his superiors and obtain restitution from those who are authorized to put matters right.

Concerning night wanderers

It is also prohibited for anyone to have the audacity to be found roving or wandering around the city streets after curfew has been sounded at St. Martin le Grand and St. Lawrence, or at Barking church, [\[armed\]](#) with sword or buckler or any other weapon with which mischief may be done (whereby there may be suspicion of evil intent), or in any other way. Unless he is a great lord or some other trustworthy man of good reputation, or someone from their household for whom they will vouch, who goes before them with a guiding light. If someone is found abroad contrary to the tenor of the aforesaid, without a good reason for coming into town at a late hour, he is to be taken by the keepers of the peace and put in the Tun, which is assigned for such offenders. The day after let him be [formally] arrested and brought before the city mayor and aldermen. And if they find that offenders have infringed [curfew] and are in the habit of doing so, let them be punished.

Concerning the closing of tavern and brewhouse doors at the specified time

Because such persons wandering around at night typically frequent taverns and congregate there more than at other places, seeking shelter there and biding their time in wait for an opportunity to do mischief, it is prohibited for anyone to keep a tavern selling wine or ale open after the hour of curfew. Rather, they are to keep their taverns closed after that hour; nor are they to have anyone sitting or lying around there. No-one is to receive into his own house, by night or day, someone [coming] from a public tavern, other than persons for whom he is prepared to be answerable regarding the king's peace.

If it is found that any taverner does otherwise, on the first occasion he is to provide a surety in the form of his tavern's hanap, or some other suitable item found there, and is to be amerced 40d. If he is found to offend a second time, he is to be amerced 6s.8d, and on a third occasion 10s. At the fourth instance the fine payable is to be doubled, that is, 20s. And on the fifth occasion, he is to renounce his occupation in the city forever. If any taverner receives any troublemaker, knowing of his offences, he is to be committed to the same prison as all receivers of felons. Provision has been made for every alderman to make diligent enquiry through his wardmoot concerning wrongdoers coming into and living in his ward; if any such are discovered through the presentment and indictment of the good people of the ward, let them be attached by their bodies as soon as possible – and that by the alderman, if the sheriffs or their bailiffs are not available. If they are present, however, they are to do it under direction of the alderman. And [the offenders] are to be brought before the mayor and aldermen and be interrogated regarding that of which they have been accused or what has been presented against them. Those who cannot clear themselves are to be punished by imprisonment, or by some other punishment (at the discretion [of the mayor and aldermen]) as demanded by the offence.

Every alderman is to hold his wardmoot, and [address] all the points which have been addressed in times past, four times a year.

Concerning the peace and those who flee to churches

It is ordained for the safekeeping of the city that from now on there shall be a warden appointed by the king, instead of a mayor, and the sheriffs and aldermen [shall be appointed] by the Barons of the Exchequer. They are to take an oath of obedience to the king, to keep watch and ward and maintain the peace in the manner in which they shall be instructed: that is, to preserve the peace by night and by day and to arrange for the watches and the guards to take action, according to the points written below. The sheriffs, aldermen and the entire populace are to be obedient to the warden.

In order to preserve the peace in the city, the king wishes and commands that if any felony is committed within the city, or any breach of his peace, that anyone nearby when such an offence or felony occurs, or who hears, sees or knows of a felony or breach of his peace, shall do whatever is within his power to arrest or attach such felons or offenders. If he has not the means to do so straight away, he is to raise hue-and-cry on the wrongdoers. Upon which, the king wishes and commands, all those who are nearby and hear the cry shall come to [where] the cry [is being made] in order to capture and arrest such felons and wrongdoers. Once they are taken, let them be handed over to the king's bailiffs. Whoever does not respond to the raising of a hue-and-cry is to be heavily amerced.

If it happens that any felon escapes to a church before he can be taken, the people of the ward in which stands the church where the felon has put himself are to keep watch upon the felon, until it has been arranged for him to leave the kingdom. If the people of the ward are not sufficient [for this], let them be helped by the people of the nearest neighbouring wards, as decided and advised by the warden of the city – allowing that no-one be unreasonably burdened with such watch.

Concerning offenders

The king wishes it understood by all that no liberty or ancient custom is valid that might cause this ordinance not to be observed. Those who are convicted of offences such as battery or [assault] drawing blood, where death or maiming are not the outcome, may be punished by a fine and, particularly, imprisonment, at the discretion of those who judge the offence – so that the severity of the punishment makes others afraid to offend. They should always have regard to the seriousness of the offence, the extent of the guilt, and whether they are habitual offenders or not.

Everyone is to take care not to raise hue-and-cry on any brawl in the city, by day or by night, without good reason. If any does [without cause] and is convicted of the same, let him be punished according to the offence.

If any wrongdoer escapes from a church, those who were supposed to be keeping watch on him will forfeit 100s. to the king for [failing to prevent] the escape; this applies to escapes from city churches. For escapes from Newgate, let things be as they were in the past.

Concerning criminals who lie low

Some people make for the city from overseas, and some from those same lands seek shelter and refuge there after being exiled from their own country or removing themselves because of grave offences or as other punishment. Suchlike make themselves brokers, hostellers, and lodging-house keepers in the city, serving denizens and foreigners, as if they were honest, law-abiding men and freemen of the city. Yet some of these seem to have nothing better to do than spend their time going up and down the streets – more by night than by day – are well attired and fitted out, and dine on expensive delicacies. They follow no trade, do not engage in commerce, nor do they own lands or tenements, to provide themselves with a livelihood. [They have] no friends who seek them out, and they are constantly changing their place of residence. Persons such as this are the source of many of the troubles in the city. Hence this provision, that no-one from a foreign land (or any other person) may run a lodging-house or a hostelry within the city unless: he is admitted as a freeman of the city and it is verified by the warden, mayor and aldermen that he is an honest and law-abiding man, or he has favourable testimonials from the place from which he comes; that he left there and came here under proper circumstances; that he can find reliable sureties, amenable to judgements executable by the city bailiffs, regarding being answerable to the king's peace, and to the citizens for avoiding doing any harm to the city.

If it should happen that someone from a foreign land, on the basis of the sureties he has found or of the franchise granted him by the city, is to become a hosteler or lodging-house keeper in the city, he is to make arrangements to reside in the heart of the city, as previously indicated. Let them cease and desist from any contrary practice within 40 days of the date that these articles are read out and made public in the city. And if anyone is found in contravention of what is indicated above after those 40 days, he is to lose the franchise in perpetuity and, furthermore, be punished by imprisonment according to the gravity of the offence.

Concerning thieves and whores

Thieves and other rash or mischievous persons are received and hosted more frequently and more commonly in the houses of women of ill repute in the city than elsewhere, whereby crimes and murders [committed] by persons so received often occur, to the great harm and scandal of the people of the city. The king therefore wishes and commands that henceforth no prostitute live within the walls of the city. If any is found hereafter living and receiving guests within the city, she is to be imprisoned for 40 days. The warden is to have enquiry made throughout the city, using whatever methods he considers to be most effective, into where such women are received and who they are. Once they have been found, let them be assigned a certain district. None of them may henceforth wear miniver [or cendal] on her dress or her hood; if any does so, she is to forfeit the miniver or cendal to whichever sergeant finds and captures such a woman dressed thus.

Concerning watch and ward in the city

To safeguard and maintain his peace the king wishes that, whenever it is necessary, a nightwatch be set within the city in the appropriate manner. That is, in each ward there are to be chosen a certain number of persons, according to the size of the ward, and depending on the size of the crowds being then in town. Such persons are to be strong, and able to defend themselves properly, being well armed. They are to be nominated by the people of the ward to its alderman, before whom they shall take oath to well and truly perform watch and ward and, without descending to favouritism because of bribe or affinity, to arrest and attach those who go about and are active at night, contrary to the peace and to the tenor of the proclamation; and faithfully to bring them before the warden or the mayor. By whom such persons are to be punished, according to their offence. All innkeepers and householders in the ward, with the exception of the king's officers, are to contribute towards the support of those persons [of the watch]. If anyone of those sworn persons who make up the watch is convicted of failing to perform that duty properly, or of showing leniency (due to corruption, affinity, forbearance, or any other reason) to someone who ought to have been arrested or attached for an offence, he is to be punished by imprisonment, at the discretion of the warden and aldermen, according to the gravity of the offence. What weapons they are to be provided with for keeping guard is the decision of the city warden; they are to be purchased at the cost of the residents of the wards.

DISCUSSION

The table of contents to this part of the Liber Albus has a preamble indicating that some of the regulations were made by Edward I, after he seized the city liberties in 1285. Some of the specifications were much the same as those in the Statute of Winchester, enacted about the same time. Some of the London regulations were said to remain in force after the liberties were later restored to the citizens.

The 1260s had been a period of political strife in the city, reflecting the discord within the nation as a whole. But 1272 brought to the throne a man intent on restoring order and discipline to the realm, and asserting royal authority over the nation. King Edward, rightly or wrongly, perceived London as a hotbed of disorder, where criminals were escaping justice because of a failure to hold assizes and inquests properly.

The eyre of 1276 does indeed suggest either a change in attitude or laxness among London authorities, who informed the justices that it was not obligatory for hue-and-cry to be raised when a homicide had occurred; although men in the vicinity of the crime should try to arrest the culprit, even that was optional. The justices had not liked that assertion. Records of thirteenth century eyres likewise identify a number of sanctuary-takers, or prisoners, who managed to escape the sometimes less-than-watchful eye of authority.

At the beginning of the 1280s, a new mayor Henry le Waleys, with the king's approval, instituted a series of reforms aimed at strengthening police and judicial systems. This did not sit well with the aldermen, who replaced Waleys with a more traditionalist mayor. Edward responded by appointing a commission to investigate the state of order in London. When the traditionalists protested, the king seized the city liberties and appointed a warden in 1285. The royal officers in charge of London reworked Waleys' reforms and published a set of new ordinances, with police regulations looming large, although changes to the commercial environment were more revolutionary in attacking citizens' monopolistic privileges. The aim was to bring London's legal and administrative procedures more in line with the national system.

Those regulations from and including "Concerning the peace and those who flee to churches" were the ones attributed to Edward I's people, while those preceding were likely from the earlier reforms of Waleys.

Over the course of the next decade, the resistance of citizens to the new situation gradually stiffened. But it took the near-revolt of 1297, led by the Earls of Norfolk and Hereford, to bring national dissatisfaction to a head, before Edward could be persuaded to restore London's self-government (1299). Despite that, many of the changes wrought under the royal administration were lasting.

NOTES

"buckler"

A small, round shield intended for practice or lightly-armed combat; came to be carried by troublemakers.

"Tun"

The Tun was one of the city prisons, its name from its round (cask-like) shape; built in 1283 at Cornhill, it was intended particularly for vagrants and persons committing offences against morality.

"hanap"

Riley argues persuasively that this was a large drinking cup with handles, adding that the modern "hamper" derives from a container used originally to transport such cups.

"guards"

The term here translated "guard" is geyte which seems to be associated with waits, later used to refer to musicians; the connection perhaps being horns that guards may have carried to sound the hours.

"Newgate"

The largest of the city prisons.

"prostitute"

The original is femme coursable, "woman providing a service".

"district"

The original is marche, which may refer to limitations of movement or to a 'marketplace' – an area in which they may conduct business.

"miniver"

The white or spotted fur from a small animal, used to line garments. "Or cendal" is omitted here but appears in the copy in the Liber Custumarum; cendal was a type of fine linen or inferior silk, again typically used for lining.

"innkeepers"

Innkeepers seem to have received special mention because they were perceived (at least by the king) as the hosts of transients who were likely to cause trouble, or themselves as of dubious behaviour – one of the ordinances identifies some innkeepers as foreign criminals who had fled their own country and settled in London.

Concerning keeping the peace

For the purpose of protecting and preserving the king's peace in the city of London and its suburbs, the king and his council have, with the assent of the mayor, aldermen and community of the city of London, made ordinances as follows. That no-one be so bold as to wander about the city or suburbs after the hour of curfew has been rung at the church of St. Mary-le-Bow, unless he is a man of known and good reputation, or his servant, [going about] for a good cause, and then with a light. The which curfew is to be rung at the church when day turns into night. If anyone is found wandering contrary to this ordinance, he is to be captured and sent to Newgate prison, remaining there until he has paid a fine to the city for his defiance and can find reliable guarantors for his [future] good behaviour.

No-one is to go about armed

Also, that no-one, regardless of status, is to go about armed in the city or its suburbs, nor bear arms by day or night, except for: the squires of the great lords of the land, who carry the swords of their masters when accompanying them; the sergeants-at-arms of the king, queen, prince, and the other children of the king; the city officials and persons who, at their command, go about in their company to assist them in preserving and upholding the peace. Upon penalty as mentioned [i.e. imprisonment?] and the confiscation of their weapons and armour.

Concerning innkeepers

Also, that every keeper of an inn or a lodging-house is to have his guests warned to leave their weapons in the houses where they are lodging. If they fail to do so, and someone is found bearing arms contrary to the proclamation, due to lack of warning from his host, that host is to be punished by imprisonment and a fine to be determined by the mayor and aldermen.

Concerning the power to arrest felons and wrongdoers

Also, that every man of good standing and reputation within the city, whether alderman or commoner, has the authority in the absence of [city] officials to arrest felons and wrongdoers and to take them to the houses of the sheriffs, so that those wrongdoers can receive the punishment due them.

No-one is to draw sword or knife

Also, in order to keep the peace better and to help discourage people from breaking the peace, it is ordained that no-one is to draw a sword, or knife, or other weapon, [upon penalty of] paying 6s.8d or being imprisoned at Newgate for 15 days – so long as he does not use it. But if he draws blood from someone, he is to pay 20s. to the city or be imprisoned for 40 days.

If he strikes someone with his fist without drawing blood, he is to pay 3s. to the city or be imprisoned for 8 days. If he draws blood with his fist, he is to pay 3s.4d to the city or be imprisoned for 12 days. Such offenders are to find reliable guarantors for their good behaviour before they can be released. Notwithstanding these [punishments], those against whom the offences were committed may recover [damages] through the legal process. Offences involving the shedding of blood, in breach of the king's peace, are to be tried from day to day before the sheriffs, without any essoins or other delays.

Concerning proper watches for [preserving] the peace

Also, that each alderman arrange within his ward for proper and suitable nightwatches, so that the peace can be better preserved. So that if some evil occurs through default of the nightwatch, the alderman and the whole community of that ward remedy the situation, at their peril [should they fail]. Each alderman is to have the names of all those who are inhabitants, or who lodge with residents, in his ward, as well as of those who are put in private places to work with the others.

DISCUSSION

The reference to the Prince of Wales dates these ordinances to the third quarter of the fourteenth century; Riley confidently indicates a date of 1364.

Eighty years after Edward I had tried to impose on London controls to combat lawlessness (see "Ordinances for policing the city"), much the same concerns were still being addressed, as the above ordinances illustrate. The role of the nightwatch remained an important one, for much of the crime and violence occurred after dark, and was thanks to men of no fixed abode – inns and lodging-houses perceived as usual as dens for criminals. Hue-and-cry has disappeared (although it remained on the law books elsewhere in England up to the 19th century), but the citizen's arrest remains an important adjunct to formal policing and the community continues to have a role in suppressing disorder. The wards were at least as important, and probably more so, as the focus for police activities; the ward aldermen by now had staffs that included beadles and sergeants, whose duties included police activities.

NOTES

"St. Mary-le-Bow"

The "great bells of Bow" were fairly centrally located in medieval London. Different churches were used to sound the curfew at different periods.

"Newgate"

The largest of the city prisons.

"squires"

The term here rendered as "squires" is vadletes, which might be better translated as valets or grooms, were not those terms today restricted to menservants with fairly specialized duties.

TRANSLATION

Your poor and grieving petitioner Margery Ludlow, widow of Thomas Ludlow, one of the sergeants of the town of Oxford, makes a complaint to Your Highness that late in the day on 23 December, one John Wells in his own house at that time (now in your prison of Bocardo, convicted of felony) killed one Robert Phylipson and straight away fled into the church. He thereafter found mainprise and was set at large, before the felony was reported to your coroners there. After it was reported and investigated, your bailiffs and fee-farmers there, together with your sergeants including the aforesaid Thomas Ludlow, in execution of the law entered the house of John Wells on 7 January last. John Wells, feloniously and in violent infringement of your laws, killed your sergeant Thomas Ludlow and inflicted an almost fatal wound on David Dier, one of your bailiffs and fee-farmers there, among other assaults and woundings. Whereupon John Wells again fled into the church, where contrary to the law he refused to make any acceptable confession to the coroners for purposes of abjuration. This being made known by the coroners to your constables there, they seized John Wells and brought him out of the church to your prison of Bocardo.

Some now are making strenuous efforts to have John Wells put back into the church, which will result in numerous difficulties and troublesome expenses both to your grieving petitioner and to many others, unless Your Grace is informed of the way things stand. Therefore your poor petitioner, in all humility, beseeches Your Highness to show his grace through due execution of your laws and punishment of such murders, by ordering that royal letters be sent to Oxford – both to those who have spiritual jurisdiction and to those with secular jurisdiction – for the quashing of those efforts, for the reverence of almighty God, to whom your petitioners shall always pray for your royal majesty to live long and prosper.

DISCUSSION

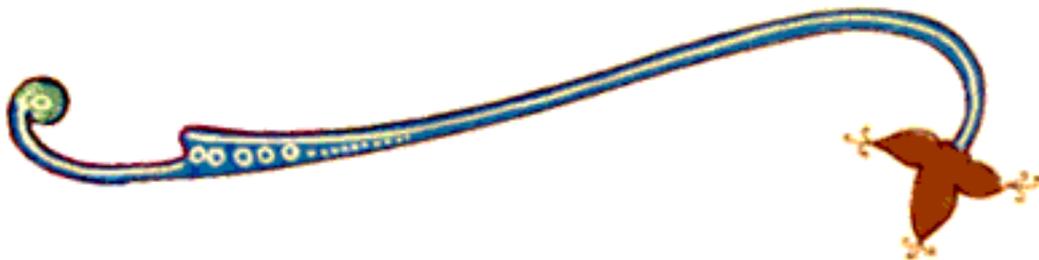

The idea that those wrongly accused of a crime could appeal to divine justice by seeking sanctuary at sacred places existed in some pre-Christian societies, particularly those with underdeveloped juridical systems. Christianity added the concepts that all law derived from God (who was therefore the ultimate source of justice and mercy) and that sinners could be redeemed through repentance. From the fourth century, bishops were accorded some rights to intervene in civil trials and to request pardons or sentence reductions for criminals. At the Council of Orange (432) a territorial dimension was added, by the decision that the sanctity of churches demanded that anyone taking refuge there could not be delivered up to the authorities. From the beginning secular authorities tried to place restrictions on the right of sanctuary, and occasionally violated it.

In Anglo-Saxon England the purpose of sanctuary was to allow criminals a limited amount of time to negotiate monetary compensation in lieu of corporal punishment. Habitual criminals, or those already convicted of a crime, were not intended to benefit. The Danish and the Norman kings continued their Anglo-Saxon predecessors' respect of sanctuary. It was not until the twelfth century, however, that sanctuary became bound up with a new procedure: abjuration of the realm, whereby criminals were allowed to confess their sins and go into exile, in return for their lives being spared. This procedure, perhaps influenced by outlawry (itself a form of exile from society), was a compromise solution to the stalemate in which the secular authorities needed to punish criminals, but the Church had the obligation to defend the sanctity of its territory.

By the late Middle Ages, sanctuary had become a thorn in the side of the developing legal system. The period of sanctuary was, in theory, limited to forty days, after which the refugee was supposed either to surrender to the authorities or abjure. However, after the forty days had elapsed, authorities were at a loss to know what to do, except to keep a guard on the church in which sanctuary had been taken. The parish whose members had to undertake this guard duty found it burdensome, not least because they were subject to fine in the event of escapes, which were not uncommon. For habitual criminals escape may have been preferred to abjuring, in itself a punitive procedure risking murder en route to exile and little future prospects in the place of exile. Furthermore, the prospect of sanctuary was believed to be encouraging crime in urban areas, where churches were numerous: debtors used it as a means of evading creditors, thieves used sanctuaries as bases for nightly raids, convicted criminals who escaped from prison often headed for churches. Occasionally frustrated authorities entered churches to drag criminals out to punishment, some incidents turning so violent that church-state relations were strained as a result. Where criminals survived their forced removal, the Church insisted on them being returned to sanctuary.

Margery Ludlow, along with Robert Phylipson's sister who also sent a similar petition to the king, had cause to expect support from the king – although we do not know the outcome of this case. Henry VII was unsympathetic to sanctuary rights; his son restricted sanctuary to a limited number of places and substituted a form of imprisonment for abjuration.

TRANSLATION

[Trial and punishment of a thief]

John the son of Thomas of Rothwell near Pontefract was caught red-handed in Leicester, in the house of Henry Dowel of Leicester, on the accusation of John Dun, with a Coggeshall cloak and a red fur-lined hood. He was taken to the portmanmoot court held on 18 August 1320 and there brought to trial on the accusation of theft made by John [Dun]. He stated that he was in possession of the cloak and hood by the agency of Henry's maid and that he did not steal them. On that [defence] he submitted himself to an inquest, which said under oath that he was guilty of the theft. Consequently he was hanged. The cloak and cap were delivered to John for laying the charge. He [i.e. the thief] had no possessions.

[Investigation of a homicide]

At evening was falling on 27 June 1327, there arose an argument between William Hauberk of Scalford and William the son of John le Blake of Leicester, in John le Blake's house. They took the quarrel between them out into the street, where they insulted each other in the vilest terms, with the result that William le Blake stabbed William Hauberk with a knife on the left breast, piercing his heart; he died of the wound immediately. John le Sponere was the first to find the corpse and he straight away raised the hue as far as the four town gates of Leicester. The townspeople assembling, together with the frankpledge, the coroner and bailiff of Leicester were summoned. Before whom was held an inquest, which says that it suspects no-one of the death except from William le Blake, who had fled immediately after committing the deed. He had no possessions nor was he in tithing, because he was a clerk.

DISCUSSION

These represent two of numerous records of crimes consigned to parchment by the coroner. The coroner was an officer who conducted investigations into "pleas of the crown", notably thefts and homicides, but potentially any crime from which a fine or amercement might be due the king – even in cases of accidental death there would likely be some object, instrument or animal associated with the cause that was forfeit to the crown. The coroner had to make a record of what he discovered; this might involve, as at Ipswich, keeping duplicate records of cases tried in the borough court. He did not try the crimes, strictly speaking (although in Ipswich, and conceivably elsewhere, may have assisted borough executives in reaching judicial decisions) but determined to which authorities they should be referred. In most cases these were royal justices, usually in eyre; the infrequent visits of the eyre to any locality meant that the coroner's records could play a valuable role in identifying crimes and suspects.

The record of these cases, as of most, are brief and to the point: a crime was reported, an inquest gave a verdict, the criminal was punished if in hand, there is a report on whether the criminal had property that would be forfeit to the crown.

[Revenge killing]

It happened that on the evening of Thursday, 7 March 1297 a certain William de Neushom a groom of Sir John de Ketegreins died in a certain guesthouse where Sir John had lodged the previous Tuesday, in the parish of St. Martin, Oxford. The following morning, on 8 March, he was examined by the coroner and was found to have a wound on the front of his head, 4 inches wide, 6 inches long, and one inch deep. An inquest was held the same day by the oath of: Nicholas de Overton, Thomas de Boleworth, Roger de Wallingford, Walter de Wycombe, John le Longe salt-dealer, William de Oseney, and John de Abindon, jurors from St. Martin's parish; Walter de Witneye, Robert de Bampton, John Bishop butcher, William le Orfevere, Philip le Gaunter, John de Hakeburn, Robert Smart, jurors from All Saints' parish; William de Brehull, John de Tywe, John Payn, Robert Kepeharm, Hugh le Bastiller, and Thomas le Marshall, jurors of St. Aldate's parish; John de Ardern, Richard le Espicer, John de Weston, Geoffrey le Mercer, Richard de Otyndon, and Alexander de Bloxham, jurors of St. Peter's in the Bailey parish.

And all the jurors say under oath that on Tuesday, 5 March 1297 William de Neushom and others of the household of Sir John de Ketegreins came in a hurry to the butchers market after curfew and saw John Beneyt junior standing between two stalls and urinating. William de Neushom drew his sword and with its point slashed John Beneyt across the front of his head. John at once raised hue and cry, went into the house of John Beneyt senior, and looked for his sword. Then he, together with John Beneyt senior and John de Walteford followed them to the guesthouse to which Sir John de Ketegreins, William de Neushom, and his colleagues had retreated from them. In the fight that ensued between them John Beneyt junior, answering force with force, struck William on the head and gave him that wound of which he died on the date mentioned, although he received all the last rites. The jurors say that no-one else is guilty of the death except for John Beneyt junior because, they point out, John Beneyt senior and John de Walteford came only in response to the hue and cry that had been raised, for purposes of protecting the king's peace. John Beneyt junior was arrested and was held in gaol until he could be delivered to trial.

[Killing of a prostitute]

It happened on Sunday, 26 April 1299 that Margery de Hereford died in a certain house in St. Aldate's parish, Oxford. The same day an examination was made by John de Oseneye coroner and she was found to have a wound beside her left breast, one inch wide and 5 inches deep. On the same day an inquest was held before the coroner, by the oath of: Thomas le Marescall, John Bishop, Thomas le Parmenter, John de Twye, Thomas le Turnur, Hugh le Pastiler, and Geoffrey de Langeford, jurors of St. Aldate's parish; William Chaunterel, William le Halte shoemaker, Thomas de Weseham, Gilbert de Dos, John Sewy, and John le Tayllor, jurors of St. Frideswide parish; William le Fletcher, Ralph le Wall, Geoffrey le Sutor, Walter le Cha, William le Plomer, and Thomas de Sutton, jurors of St. Michael Southgate parish; John de Goseford, William de Barton, John de Barton, Richard le Baker, Roger de Haleghton, and Nicholas de Forsthull, jurors of St. Thomas the Martyr parish. All the jurors say under oath that the previous Friday a certain clerk, whose name they do not know, around the hour of curfew led Margery to the king's hall and there had sex with her; and because she asked him for her fee, he drew a knife and wounded her by her left breast, so that she died, but she had all the last rites. The clerk immediately escaped from there, so that he could not be arrested nor could his identity be determined.

[A midsummer's eve revel disturbed]

It happened that on 21 August 1306, around midday, Gilbert de Foxlee clerk died in his lodgings in the parish of St. Peter's in the East, Oxford. The following day he was examined by Thomas Lisewys the king's coroner of the town of Oxford and found to have a wound in his left shin, below the knee, 4 inches in diameter and one and a half inches deep. An inquest was thereupon held before the coroner, by the oath of etc. [names not transcribed]. They say under oath that on the evening of the festival of the Nativity of St. John Baptist [23 June] previous, the tailors of Oxford and other townsmen who were with them, spent the whole night in their shops, singing and entertaining themselves with harps, viols and various other instruments, as is their practice and the custom there and elsewhere regarding the celebration of that festival. After midnight, when they did not expect anyone to be wandering in the streets, they and the others who were with them left the shops and took their choir out into the high street heading for the drapery. As they were enjoying themselves, they suddenly came upon Gilbert de Foxlee with his sword drawn and naked in his hand. He immediately started to argue with them, demanding to join their choir. Since they had among their number some persons of note, they approached him and asked him to go away and not cause anyone any trouble. Gilbert was not prepared to agree to this, but broke away from them and then dogged their footsteps, hurling insults at a certain William de Cleydon and threatening to cut off his hand with his sword unless William promptly surrendered to him his place in the choir. At this, Henry de Beumont crusader [?], Thomas de Bloxham, William de Leye servant, John de Leye, and William de Cleydon rushed Gilbert; Henry gave him a wound on the right arm with his sword, Thomas stabbed him in the back with a dagger, while William de Cleydon felled him with a blow to the head. Immediately after, William de Leye, with a hatchet called a "sparsh", gave Gilbert the wound on his left leg, by the knee, from which he died on 21 August – he having lived for 8 weeks and 2½ days and having received all the last rites.

DISCUSSION

To give a sense of the range of causes of death investigated by the coroner, the following is a synopsis of the other crimes reported in coroners' rolls (Oxford City Documents, 150-74), although probably representing only items selected by the transcribers. Two things may be noted. First, that students appear to have been involved in most of these incidents. Although this selection of extracts may reflect a bias of Twyne or Rogers, the eyre of 1285 paints a similar picture, and it is evident that the behaviour of some of the university students was a serious aggravation to the borough authorities. Second, that many of the homicides occurred after curfew. We can see from these inquests that evidence must have been sought by the coroners, as quickly as possible after examination of the scene of the crime, from bystanders or others, and that it was left to the jury to weigh the evidence and declare, under oath, what they considered to be the facts.

- 4 February 1297, John Metescharp died after having on 2 February been shot by an arrow when he responded to a hue and cry raised against three clerks (probably students) who were going through the streets around curfew, armed with swords and bows, and assaulting any pedestrians they encountered. The culprits escaped.
- 20 January 1298, Thomas Yve found Robert de la Marche tawyer dead outside a house near the north gate and immediately raised hue. Around twilight the previous evening he had ventured outside the north gate, where he encountered four Irish clerks (probably students). For reasons not explained, one stabbed Robert with a knife under his left arm; the attacker fled, but the others of the group were later arrested.
- 17 June 1298, William de Heyworth died of a hatchet wound to the skull, a wound received on 27 May from an assault by Reginald le Messer, a poor resident of the Hospital of St. John; Reginald had meanwhile fled.
- 23 April 1300, Roger the son of Emma de Hereford having been found dead the previous day, the inquest found that Emma had, along with many other poor people, been present at a distribution of food at the house of the Archdeacon of Buckinghamshire on the 21st. The throng of the crowd knocked her down and she was trampled underfoot. She miscarried a stillborn son the following day. No blame was assigned.

- 2 August 1300, William de Bangor, an Irish clerk was found dead near a dam of the Abbey of Osney by Richard de Hayle, who raised hue. William had no marks on him and the jury concluded he had drowned while trying to bathe in the river Thames. Death by misadventure.
- 17 August 1300, Gervase Maddak, a Welsh youth, having been found dead in St. Edward's Hall, the jury found that he had finally succumbed to a wound received back in February, when he had been struck on the head by a cudgel wielded by Robert le Porter of Winchenden while visiting an inn. The culprit had fled – where no-one knew – leaving behind his cudgel.
- 16 December 1300, John de Rypon was found dead at curfew time by Thomas Yvo, who raised hue. An inquest the following day found that John had become involved in a war of words with Richard de Malteby, who with his cudgel struck John on the head, killing him. Richard had escaped.
- 22 December 1300, an inquest on the body of Henry de Bokingeam, a clerk found dead the same day with one wound in his skull, attributed to a hatchet, and a second below his left eye, attributed to a knife, concluded that Henry had been set upon by thieves unknown while on his way into town.
- 5 January 1301, Robert de Honniton clerk died after lingering since 31 December when he had climbed up the bell-tower of St. Michael's church with some notion of helping ring the bells, but fell out of an opening and, landing on his right side, received so much damage that by the time he died his right side was badly swollen and blackened.
- 26 June 1301, the bodies of two men – Simon le Fevre and Alan son of William le Strange, were found in a field in the suburbs of Oxford, by Alice de Coventre, who raised hue. Both had deep head wounds. The jury's findings were that the pair had been leaving Oxford at twilight, to return to Wolgaricote (a village where at least one of them lived), and were crossing the field when attacked by thieves; who those thieves were or what had become of them, the jury had no idea.

- 7 December 1301, Hugh Russel, a Welsh clerk, succumbed in his lodgings to a lung-piercing wound he had received four days previously, as a result of an argument in which he had become embroiled with Master Elias de Monte Gomorry. After wounding Hugh with a knife, Elias had fled.
- 7 December 1301, the body of John de Neushom, a clerk and a schoolmaster, was pulled from the river Cherwell, his wife Isabella having been the first finder. The inquest found that after lunch on a previous day he had gone off in search of switches to use when punishing his pupils. Having climbed up a willow tree near a millpond, to cut off suitable branches, he fell in the water and drowned.
- 9 December 1301, John de Hampslape, a clerk from Northamptonshire, was found dead in Cat Street with a knife wound to the heart, Willliam le Schovelere the finder having raised hue. The jury determined that on the previous day around the hour of curfew John had come out of the room where he lodged, on the north side of "the great school", in order to urinate, when he heard an argument underway between two fellow clerks who lodged in a room on the south side of the school. Upon investigating, John saw one of the clerks, Nicholas de la Marche, draw a knife with the intent of attacking the other clerk, Thomas de Horncastel. John thrust himself between the two to try to prevent violence, only to receive the blow intended for Thomas. Because this happened at night, no hue was raised at that time, and Nicholas was able to effect an escape.
- 12 August 1302, John the son of John Godfrey of Benseye was found dead in the river Thames, the first finder having raised hue. The jury found that on the previous day he and others had spent the day mowing a meadow in sunny weather and, because it was a hot day, had drunk quite a bit and become inebriated. In that state he had decided to cross the Thames in a ramshackle boat, in order to return to his lodgings on the other bank. As he tried to step into the boat, he fell overboard and drowned.
- 14 June 1303, John de Osgodeby clerk was found dead in the street with multiple wounds to his head, probably from a sword. The jury's verdict was that on the previous day, around curfew time, John crossed paths with Nicholas de Vylers an Irish clerk, Thomas de Weldon clerk, and Thomas' servant John le Northern. They set upon the victim with their swords and, killing him, fled.

- 29 May 1307, the body of John the son of Sir Miles Stapleton was found in his lodgings; the finder raising hue, the coroner came quickly to view the body and discovered two wounds, a deep wound 3 inches wide in the back next to the spine and a second on the right shoulder. An inquest was immediately summoned and the jurors' conclusion from the investigation was that on the previous day, around the hour of vespers, John (a clerk) was walking along the street adjacent to the city wall on the east side of Oxford when he encountered Robert de Knotton scribe, John Saxendale, Nicholas de Kirkham, and John de Eboraco, all three clerks, friar William de Fimmore, and Richard le Citoler. The group set upon John and he received the knife-wound on his shoulder from Knotton and the sword-wound in the back from Saxendale. John used his remaining strength to break free of them and ran into the high street near the East Gate, where he collapsed. Later some friends of his, coming back into town from the suburban fields where they had been engaged in some sport, found John still alive and carried him back to his lodgings, where he died soon after. Following this verdict, Knotton and Saxendale were arrested and imprisoned, but their accomplices – whom the jurors considered willing accessories to the homicide – were not to be found.
- 4 May 1314, Henry de Insula clerk was found dead in Grope Lane, the finder raising hue. The inquest held the same day found that, around midday on that date, two factions of clerks [i.e. students] had a "rumble" in St. John's Street and Grope Lane – one faction representing those from the northern part of town, and the other those from southern and western parts. Both groups were armed with swords, bucklers, bows and arrows and other weapons and were clearly looking for a fight. During the fight Robert de Bridlyngton and four other students positioned themselves in the upper room of a hall facing onto St. John's Street, from where they could shoot arrows through the window into Grope Lane. One of Bridlyngton's arrows struck Henry in the back and killed him. The jurors blamed the whole group for inciting Bridlyngton. Although not specified, it appears that the group had escaped arrest.
- 4 May 1314, David de Kirkby was another victim of the above clash, his body also being found in Grope Lane. He had been attacked by several adversaries, receiving a blow to the head from a falchion (a short sword whose blade curves towards its point) wielded by John de Benton, a leg wound from the sword of William de la Hyde, and a dagger wound under his left arm from William de Astele; it was believed that the last of those wounds had proved the fatal one. Again the attackers seem to have evaded the hands of the law.

- 8 May 1314, Matthew de Kentheleyke of Wales died in Brendhall (a building associated with one of the colleges), and the coroners held an inquest the same day. It reached the conclusion that, late in the day on 2 May, Matthew had encountered John de Fulney in the street near Brendhall and, an argument ensuing, John had drawn his knife and stabbed Matthew, killing him.
- 20 July 1319, Lucas de Morton was found dead in his house. The inquest jurors determined that on the evening before Lucas had left his house to use the privy in Cat Street when there arrived a group of clerks from the northern part of town, including Elyas Hubberthorp, and clerks from the southern part, with a view to a gang fight. Elyas, believing Lucas to be a member of the opposing gang, struck him on the head with a sword. He was evidently carried back to his own house and given the last rites there.
- 20 October 1321, William the son of John de Harwendon took sanctuary in the church of St. Mary's for fear of being arrested. He confessed to the coroners of horsetheft and then took oath before them that he would leave England; they assigned him Southampton as the port of departure. William's possessions, forfeited, were given to the Prior of St. Frideswide's, as he had jurisdiction during the time of the fair.
- 26 December 1321, John Potum's corpse was found in one of the Oxford halls, the finder raising hue, and an inquest being held soon after the arrival of the coroners. It was discovered that Master John de Seton had a grudge against Potum, because of some previous argument they had, and on the previous night had stabbed Potum with a knife.
- 15 February 1322, John de Bellocampo was found dead in one of the Merton college halls, the finder raising hue. The inquest blamed a fellow student, William de Stodhelm, who the previous night, after an argument between them, pulled a knife and stabbed John to the heart, then disappeared.

- 5 April 1322, William de Aslebury was found dead in one of the university halls. The inquest jury found that, eight days earlier, in the morning, William while still in bed took his knife and stabbed himself in the stomach. No reason for the suicide was given.
- 30 June 1325, an inquest was held on the body of Gilbert de Crofton clerk. It found that on 25 June at the hour of vespers and great fight took place between students of the northern part of town and those of the western part, just inside the North Gate of the town. In that conflict, Stephen de Caperugge stabbed Gilbert in the back with a knife. The seriously wounded Gilbert staggered off to Smithgate, where Roger le Norden finished him off with an arrow to the head. The killers apparently escaped.

NOTES

"inches"

The coroner was required to determine and record the size of a wound, on which part of the body, and by what kind of weapon it was inflicted. Such things could help determine first, whether the death was accidental, a suicide or a homicide, and second (if a homicide), how serious a charge should be brought, and whether a defendant could be released on bail or not.

"king's hall"

This may refer to one of the university colleges; the clerk was probably a student.

"crusader"

"Crusader" is in the transcription cruisor, but perhaps this was a transcription error and should be cissor or even cervisiarius?

"sparsh"

Possibly a spartha, a type of battle-axe

"from which he died"

Possibly it was gangrene that eventually killed Gilbert.

"1325"

Rogers has the year as 1322, but the date (Sunday the day after SS. Peter and Paul) indicates 1325 the nearest year when the day after that festival fell on a Sunday.

TRANSLATION

Adam Roem accused John Buquente of felony and robbery and proposed to prove the charge as a member of the franchise of London. John denied everything and waived his freeman's rights, offering to defend himself by his body. Adam said that he would not lose his franchise for John – for no freeman had to do combat if he did not wish. It was then decided [by the court] that John must do his law, himself being the eighteenth [oath-taker]; for, since both belonged to the franchise, no battle had to be undertaken unless they both wished it, regardless of what the law [of the land] prescribed. For through that [method] the strong man could bring down the weak, the young man the old; for the elderly and the feeble would not be able to make proof by battle against the strong and the young.

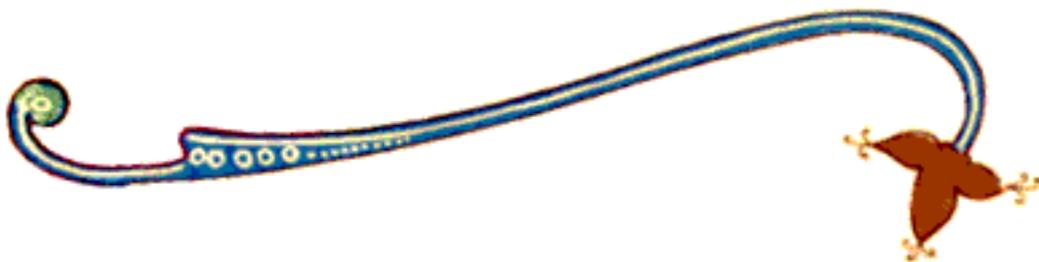

DISCUSSION

This was a case reviewed by the London eyre of 1244.

Roem's intent was to prove his accusation according to the methods prescribed by the city constitution, regarding a freeman's rights to wage his law. The charter of Henry I exempted the citizens of London from having to undergo trial by combat. Adam's refusal was likely motivated by fear that he could not triumph through such a method. The court prescribed compurgation by eighteen hands (the accused's being the eighteenth) as the appropriate method for determining the charge. The passage concludes with part of the rationale for townsmen wishing to avoid trial by combat: a pragmatic view, compared to the notion that God would give strength to the party in the right. Compurgation may not have been the best approach to justice, but it was fairer than combat, particularly for townsmen who were relatively untrained in martial arts.

For another instance of trial by battle, see a case at Leicester which purportedly moved the burgesses to seek from the lord of the borough an exemption from that method of judicial determination.

NOTES

"do his law"

Defending oneself by having eighteen persons swear to one's innocence (without direct reference to any evidence in the case) was the requirement of the "Middle Law", a method of trying crimes falling under the category of "mayhem". The defendant had to swear to his or her innocence three separate times, each other followed by a supporting oath from six of the compurgators

TRANSLATION

[Making distress]

Firstly, it often happens that when a man has brought a plea of debt or trespass against another it takes six months to a year before he can get the accused to answer [in court], partly because the bailiffs' distress is ineffectual, [partly] because they [i.e. the accused] hide away their possessions in rooms or elsewhere so that no-one can distrain them, and [partly] because they avoid being amerced for their defaults [in appearing in court]. To correct this, it is decided that when one man brings a complaint of debt or of goods wrongfully taken or withheld against a resident of the town, if the accused is absent he is to be summoned in the presence of two neighbours to appear at the next court session to give answer. If he fails to come to that session, a simple distress is to be made until he attaches himself by guarantors to be at the next session. If he refuses to find guarantors, or finds the guarantors but still does not come, let it be ordered to distraint him to appear at the third session by the great distress, by whatever of his can be found, inside or outside his house. Even if he hides away or shuts up his possessions in a room or elsewhere, the bailiff may – in the presence of the neighbours – enter everywhere in order to distraint him until he answers to justice. And if he had found guarantors for his appearance, they are to be amerced for failing to have him there on the day appointed, unless they can show good reason why they did not. The same procedure regarding distresses is to apply in cases of trespass, except that guarantors are to be found from the very beginning. After the accused has made his defaults and then is forced to come by the great distress effected against him, he is to be amerced, unless he can excuse his defaults by saying that he was out of town, or did not know about the suit, or was prevented for some other reason, and is willing to take oath to that.

[Having law]

On the day that the parties first meet in court, the defendant may if he wishes declare "Have law" and, by that, obtain an adjournment as was previously the custom. However, a declaration of "Have law" in a case means that a delay cannot be granted more than once. When he has declared "Have law", he must find pledges or put his stall up as surety, if he has a stall, that he will come to the next court session, as was previously the custom. If he still does not come, he may be distrainted by the great distress, as mentioned above, until he comes. And when he comes he is to be amerced if he cannot excuse his defaults.

[Failure to defend]

It was the custom in times past, when the parties had to plead and the plaintiff had stated his accusation, that if as soon as the words had come out of the plaintiff's mouth the defendant did not say "thwart nay" he was considered not to have offered a defence, which was called "swarless". He was then not allowed to speak [\[in his defence\]](#), nor ask for advice, nor have any man who knew legal procedure speak for him; so that many lost [\[their cases\]](#) through ignorance of legal procedure. For this reason it is now decided that, when the parties appear for purpose of pleading, the plaintiff should without challenge or interruption clearly state his accusation personally, if he knows how, or (if not) by someone who is assigned for that, so that the suit is not terminated or jeopardized by forgetting to specify the time [when the offence occurred] or by any other circumstance. But if the defendant asks for specification of time or any other detail necessary to ensure his better response to the accusation, let the specification be made at that time without challenge. Then, once the plaintiff has made the accusation, the defendant may have a reasonable amount of time to reply, so that he is not caught off guard. If he wishes to consult with counsel, he may have permission to do so and return to say what he thinks may best serve him – all without challenge or interruption – by himself or, if he lacks the knowledge, by someone else assigned to that. If he thinks that his initial response was insufficient, he may take another position if he is prepared to hold to it and receive judgement thereon. If it happens that when the plaintiff has stated his case the defendant cannot deny the accusation made against him, or refuses to answer even after being reprimanded by the bailiff (unless he can state a good reason why he should not respond), he may be considered as not offering a defence and as swarless, as was the custom in the past.

[Naming compurgators where an accusation is refuted]

It was previously the custom that the defendant could not make any answer to the plaintiff's accusation except to admit everything or to say "thwart nay" to everything. If he responded with denial, he had to perform his law with himself as the sixth hand. Then his adversary, or someone on his behalf, would choose persons to undertake [the oath] with him who were neither favourable nor hostile to the other party. If he [i.e. the defendant] could not do his law with those persons named, then he would be convicted of the charge, whether it was true or false. Because of this it is now decided that, in a plea of debt, if the defendant denies it and the plaintiff has proof of the debt in the form of a tally or live witnesses, he is to be given the chance to prove his case. So that, if he has only a tally or witnesses, let him take oath first, followed by the witnesses he presents; the witnesses are to be examined about what they heard and saw, if they were present when the debt was incurred or the tally made. According to what they verify, let him recover his debt or lose [his case]. It is to be ensured that the witnesses are law-abiding persons, not suspicious customers nor paid to give false evidence. If he calls witnesses who, for reasons of favouritism or malice, fail to tell the truth, they are to be distrained by the bailiff to come and tell the truth, and are to be examined as already mentioned. Alternatively if the parties agree to put their case before an inquest of neighbours who know the truth of the matter, let an inquest be held. If the plaintiff has only his own word [to support his accusation], the defendant is to be at his law by as many good and law-abiding persons as the court decides, but not [suspicious] customers or those paid to make false oaths. And if he performs his law on the day assigned him, he is to be acquitted. If he fails, he is to be convicted of the accusation. Pleas of trespass proceed in the same fashion: if the defendant says "thwart nay", he is to be at his law and perform it in the same way. No-one is henceforth to be distrained to do his law by the persons named, as was the custom previously. If the defendant in a plea of trespass wishes to submit his case to an inquest, let the inquest be made by suitable persons, excluding his enemies. If on the day assigned for the inquest the defendant fails to appear, he is to be distrained to appear at the next court session. If he fails to appear at that session, let the inquest be taken in his absence, and judgement given and executed.

[Pleading through attornies]

Because it has not been the custom for attornies to be taken except in court, and in the presence of the parties, and then only by the plaintiff, so that as a result many people have lost their cases, it is decided that either party may, if desired, appoint an attorney, regardless of whether his adversary is present or absent. The attorney is to be received [by the court] in the place of the party, to act as he would himself act, except only in doing law. That is, in those cases which can be pleaded by attorney. This [appointment is to be made] before two jurats who can bear witness to [the authority of] the attorney, if necessary.

[No-one to be distrained unless a pledge, mainpernor or debtor]

Because it has previously been the custom to distrain a neighbour to produce his neighbour, it is now decided that no-one is to be distrained on someone else's behalf unless he was his pledge or mainpernor, or there is some other reason why he should be distrained for him. It is also ordered that the mayor and all the jurats who are in town, unless they have a reason for being prevented, be at all court sessions to give justice and pass judgement. If a man is amerced, [the amount of] the amercement should be assessed the same day or the following, and that by the jurats and according to his wealth and his offence – not arbitrarily by the bailiff. No jurat or bailiff who is responsible for doing justice or passing judgement is to assist with pleading or act as an advocate, unless it is on his own behalf or for one of his relatives – in which circumstance, he is not to participate in passing judgement.

DISCUSSION

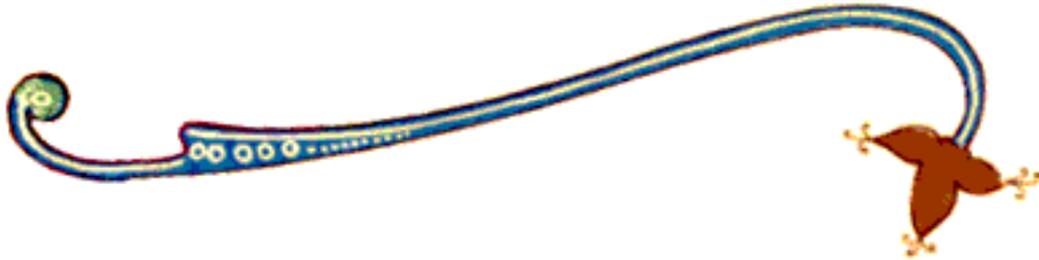

These reforms, along with others not included here, were part of a charter issued by Leicester's lord, Earl Edmund Crouchback, although whether the initiative came from the Earl – or perhaps even his brother, Edward I, himself a great legal reformer (see polic_lond3.doc) – or from the townspeople cannot be said. But many of the reforms are reminiscent of those found in other towns during this period, the result of popular complaints about misgovernment.

Some of the reforms were actually reversions to an earlier state of affairs, changes in legal procedures having made it easier for defendants to delay answering to justice. For example, in one of the ordinances not included above, the older custom of forfal (a Danish term meaning a delay) was substituted for essoins; the reason is not clear, but probably the forfal either reduced the period of delay or could be used less repetitively than essoins. Another of the ordinances not included above denied plaintiffs the right to make three defaults in appearance before proceeding with prosecuting their cases; instead, the failure of a plaintiff to prosecute at the court session assigned to the case would result in it being dismissed.

On the other hand, some customs were abolished. One, prohibiting a man from introducing a complaint in court while he himself was the subject of such a complaint, had resulted in the abuse that if an offender could get to the authorities before his victim and lay an accusation against the victim, this would delay the victim being able to bring an accusation.

Note the indications that townsmen might avail themselves of legal advisors to help them through the technical business of pleading a case. In fact, the reforms expand the right to either party in a case.

Titles of the capitulae come from a fourteenth century copy of the reforms.

NOTES

"neighbours"

Neighbours were called upon to act as witnesses to the actions of the officers, to ensure they were properly carried out.

"simple distress" "great distress"

Legal terminology. The former was seizure of any single item that could easily be laid hands on, without breaking into the accused's property; the latter involved seizure of any and all possessions, even if this necessitated forced entrance.

"Have law"

Defending by claiming the right to "Have law" meant proposing to defend oneself by waging one's law.

"stall"

The meaning of "stall" here is not certain. Mary Bateson thought that it referred to the instalment of a debt due. However, a court record of 1274, prohibiting any defendant in a plea of debt from pretending to give up his stall, suggests to me that the market stalls of townsmen could serve as security, with the threat of its confiscation used to force a townsman into court; to avoid this pressure, some might pretend to turn over their stalls to others (taking possession back after the pressure had disappeared).

"thwart nay" "swarless"

"Thwart nay" was a Scandinavian term (reflecting that Leicester was once part of the Danelaw) meaning that the defendant "completely denied" the charge.

"Swarless" shows a similar origin and means that the defendant had made no answer to the charge.

"perform his law"

The method of defence by compurgation is here similar to the Third Law of London, where lesser offences could be defended by a seven-handed oath.

"tally"

A material record of the incurrence of a debt, typically in the form of a notched stick.

"jurats"

The 24 jurats were in effect a town council, assisting the mayor in the portmanmoot (town court).

"relatives"

The term here translated "relatives" is in the original aliez (translated as "allies" by Bateson) and may perhaps extend to friends or business associates too. That phrase is an interpolation, although Miss Bateson does not indicate if contemporary with the original.

TRANSLATION

Concerning the wager of law

Once the parties have settled on [trial by] inquest, those parties cannot be called to answer until the inquest has been summoned. An inquest can be summoned either at the suit of the defendant or at the suit of the plaintiff. In pleas of debt, the defendant may wage his law – that he owes nothing to the plaintiff – as city custom prescribes; that is, if he is enfranchised within the city, or a resident of the city, [he may do his law] with the seventh hand, himself being one. These defendants may do their law in court as soon as such law has been waged, if they have the persons ready. Otherwise they shall be assigned a day for doing their law at the next court session following.

If the defendant is an outsider, a stranger, and not a resident of the city, he may straight away wage and do his law with the third hand, himself being one, that he owes nothing to the plaintiff, and thereby be acquitted. If he does not have two men ready to take the oath with him, then, at the request of the plaintiff, the defendant must go in the custody of a sergeant of the court to the 6 churches nearest to the Guildhall and, in those same churches, swear that the oath he made in the Guildhall was a true one. Following which, the defendant shall be brought back to the Guildhall and be judged acquitted (and the plaintiff will be amerced).

The same method is to be used in other personal actions where wager of law is acceptable. Where women are impleaded in such cases and wage their law, they may do their law with men or with women, whatever they wish.

If a man who is enfranchised within the city is impleaded for carrying off goods, under the charge of trespass, or for battery in which blood is not shed nor any injury evident, or for any other trespass alleged to be a breach of the peace, that freeman who is impleaded may wage and do his law with the seventh hand to prove he is not guilty, as city custom prescribes (as indicated above).

DISCUSSION

This passage well shows that the swearing of holy oaths could be taken very seriously in the Late Middle Ages. Although doubtless some people were sufficiently irreligious to perjure themselves, it was assumed that the fear of divine punishment – whether in this life or the hereafter – for taking a holy oath in vain would discourage true Christians from perjury. Thus, even if a defendant swore to his innocence in court, he (or she – the power of oaths being a matter of belief, without discrimination to sex) might be reluctant to damn himself further by repeating lies under oath in a place of God. The same concept applied to compurgation: it was recognized that a guilty party might, from desperation, commit perjury, but far less likely that a set of oath-helpers would all take the same risk. Hence the reason that, the more serious the crime, the larger the number of compurgators necessary; this was not a majority decision scenario – if a single one of the compurgators drew back from swearing the supporting oath, it was tantamount to a conviction. A successful defence led to the assumption that a wrongful charge had been laid by the plaintiff, who was consequently "in mercy" (i.e. fined by the court for wasting its time); see the Leicester example.

NOTES

"wage his law"

Wager of law here, in essence, means setting in motion (or selecting) a defence by compurgation.

"seventh hand"

The seventh hand refers to the number of compurgators necessary in a case such as this, of minor seriousness (as under the "Third Law"). The defendant would first swear that he did not owe any debt to the plaintiff; then his oath-helpers would swear that the defendant's oath was credible; unlike in cases of criminal action, the defendant could choose his own compurgators.

"third hand"

The reference to a three-handed oath in the case of outsiders (since many pleas of debt were bound to arise between Londoners and visiting merchants) has been challenged as a clerical error, stemming from the "Third Law" which prescribed a seven-handed oath for minor criminal cases. However, despite the fact that local judicial procedure would tend to place more trust in the credibility of a resident than that of a stranger, the reason for the reduced number of compurgators was clearly that a visitor could not be expected to find as many supporters in a place foreign to him.

"impleaded"

To be impleaded was to have a suit brought against one in court.

[1258] William Sturdy brings a complaint against John Folebarbe, that to his damage and his embarrassment, and despite the gild [law], he refused him a lot [in a sale] of fish, whereby the community suffered damage. Regarding the contempt [of gild law], [he seeks] a cask of ale; and, because he unwillingly suffered damage and embarrassment, 5s.

John denied the whole thing, word for word, and waged his law; concerning which John left and, returning, sat between Nicholas fitz Humfrey and Geoffrey de Nottingham who might help him in doing his law. And John, not wishing to do his law, pledged a cask of ale; pledges: [2 named]. He pledged to William his craft; pledges [2 named].

DISCUSSION

These records of legal disputes tried before the gild authorities, who had some jurisdiction over the behaviour of their members, are each a series of entries recording the progress of the cases. That the defendants resorted to only a three-handed oath (i.e. the defendant swore to his innocence and his pledges then swore that he was telling the truth) reflects that the crimes were not serious. It may seem unfair that, Dodeman having successfully made his defence, the plaintiff was automatically condemned. However, the case of Sturdy vs. Folebarbe suggests that even a three-handed oath was not necessarily easy to achieve if, as may have been the situation here, either the defendant or his proposed compurgators (between whom he sat) was reluctant to take a false oath. For further background on this process, see the London custom.

"gild"

The gild referred to is the merchant gild; detention of goods was in itself an offence, but that the offence was against one gildsman by another compounded the matter.

"russet"

A type of cloth.

"ells"

An ell was a measure that might vary but usually a little over a yard in length; the Latin ulna it is often translated as "yard".

"pledged to William his craft"

Folebarbe's pledging of his craft to the plaintiff is plausibly explained by Mary Bateson as a guarantee to give up his craft for a year and a day if he failed to make good on compensation.

[Charge of beating causing abortion]

Isabella, the wife of Serlo, accuses William Bertone of having beaten and ill-treated her in her house on 26 April 1242, as a result of which she gave birth prematurely to a [still-born] son. That he did this malevolently and in breach of the king's peace she offers to prove by whatever [process] the court considers appropriate. William comes and declares himself innocent, denying that he committed the assault, a felony, or anything against the king's peace; she has accused him out of malice and hatred. On which [defence] he puts himself on the verdict of the mayor and citizens of London. The chamberlain and sheriffs are asked if they saw the still-born child. The sheriffs say they did not. The chamberlain says that he saw the child with its skull shattered, its left arm broken in two places, and the whole body blackened by that beating. Because the chamberlain, who has a record, has given that testimony, it does not seem to the justices that [the accused] can clear himself by the verdict of mayor and citizens; particularly in cases of homicide, where someone prosecutes or where there exists a strong suspicion [of guilt], no-one should be allowed to put himself on their verdict. Thereafter William came and put himself on the Great Law, and the justice took pledges from him. He may therefore wage his law and defend himself with thirty-six hands, of which eighteen are to be chosen from one side of the Walbrook and eighteen from the other side. They are to be selected the following day in the folk moot at St. Paul's, in the presence of mayor and aldermen but the absence of chamberlain and sheriffs. He is to come with his law [i.e. oath-helpers] eight days after the selection, by permission of the justices at the request of the barons. Otherwise he would have had to come on the day after [the selection], since this was found to have been the procedure in the last eyre, in the case of John Herlizun.

Pledges of [performing] the law: William de Haliwelle, Augustine de Haddestoke, Robert Herlicun, John Shouke, James Beaupyne, Roger le Demur, Ralph de Balesham, Richard le Rous diller, Stephen le Paumer, Simon le Teinturer, Godefrey le Frutur, Richard de la Mare. On the following day 36 were chosen at the folk moot in the manner specified; that is: from the east side of the Walbrook, Richard le Brayere, Abel de Colecestre, John de Ramesey, William Cocus, William de Oystresgate, Benedict de Waltham, William Scot, Warin Vinetarius, Richard Rad, Alexander de Waleworthe, Roger fitz William, Thomas Pertriche, Walter de Coggeshale, Geoffrey Canele, William de Lenne, John Souke, Robert Scot tailor, and Geoffrey Wysdom; from the west side, Ralph de Ely, Augustine de Hadestoke, James Beaupine, John de Kay, William de Cudingtone, Geoffrey de Stratford the falconer. He [i.e. William] was to come with his law eight days after that selection; the woman [i.e. Isabella] was committed to the sheriffs, who were to have her [in court] on that day. On which day William came with his law and waged it before the justices in the following way. First William took the following oath: that he had never beaten Isabella so as to hasten the death of the child to which she gave birth prematurely. Next six [oath-helpers] took the following oath: that to the best of their knowledge the oath he had taken was true. After those six had sworn, William again swore, repeating the oath he had taken before; and afterwards another six took oath. And William took the oath thus six times, and so he did his law. It was therefore judged that William be acquitted forever, and Isabella be committed to gaol.

[Charge of homicide of a woman]

On 16 June 1231 a certain Edward de Bray weaver assaulted and ill-treated Alice, the daughter of Richard de Wiltone, in the fields near Stepney, breaking her arm in two places. Consequently Alice, while still alive, brought a charge against him but died from the beating while prosecuting her case. After her death, her sister pursued the prosecution; she too died while the case was going on. Edward was attached because of the accusation, and now the crown takes the initiative in pursuing the charge against him and asks him by what means he wishes to defend himself against the charge of homicide. He says that he wishes to defend himself according to the law and custom of the city of London, and is handed over to the sheriffs until it shall be decided how he ought to clear himself. Afterwards the mayor and citizens come and say that since the only plaintiff in this case is the king, Edward ought to wage his law and defend himself with seven hands, not thirty-six. Should he fail in his law, he should face the same sentence as if he had failed in his law with 36 hands. But if he performs his law [successfully], he should be acquitted. Furthermore they say that whenever anyone wages law with 36 or seven hands, the mayor and citizens should (without the chamberlain and sheriffs being present), on the basis of their oath and loyalty to the king, choose from the better and more reputable men of the city the compurgators who ought to perform the law. [This being done] in the presence of the one who must clear himself by the law – so that he may reject anyone he can, by just cause, show to be hostile to himself or essoinal. And [they say that] by rights a day ought to be set for him [to wage law] 15 days after the day appointed by decision of the justices for the selection of the compurgators, unless the justices may wish to set a later date. (But the contrary can be found further on). On which day, if he does not come, he is to be considered convicted. During that period, he is to be freed on bail of 12 guarantors, so long as each is of sufficient means to answer to the king for 100s., if on the day following the end of the period they cannot produce him [in court]. Let it also be noted that after anyone has been accused of, and attached for, homicide he cannot exact a recognizance until he has been acquitted of the charge against him. If he is not able to find guarantors in the interim, he is to be committed to prison.

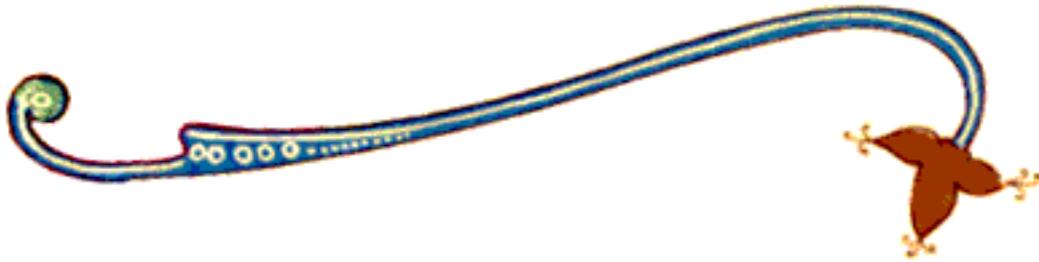

DISCUSSION

Compurgators acted like a jury in some regards. The accused could not personally pick the jury by choosing its members; compurgators were not allowed to include relatives – by blood or marriage – to the party for whom they were asked to vouch. On the other hand, the accused had to be informed of the names of the compurgators chosen and could veto over the choice of anyone he could successfully argue was inimical to him, as well as point out anyone who might escape "jury duty" by having a legitimate excuse for absence, thus jeopardizing his waging of law. We find similar grounds for veto in some other towns, along with other grounds for objection, such as that a compurgator was a proven perjurer, or had been convicted of some other offence involving deceit (e.g. adultery), or was a fugitive from another country because of a crime he had committed there, or was a minor or a madman.

Compurgators were selected, in theory, from law-abiding citizens who would be able to give an honest opinion – or at least a 'best guess' – as to innocence or guilt, based on what they might know or have heard of the case or, at very least, what they might know of the accused's character or reputation. The process surely favoured the accused, however, in that compurgators would have been likely to go against the accused only if they had evidence or strong suspicion of guilt, or at least felt that the accused was generally a bad lot. The mention in the second case of an accused not being able to transact recognizances while the case was in process is curious; it is not clear whether there is any suggestion that recognizances might have been used to bribe, blackmail or intimidate compurgators – we see a similar concern at Leicester a little later, and about the same time we have a complaint of jury-tampering at Oxford. Certainly concern shown in London and elsewhere with avoiding biased compurgators is suggestive: no smoke without fire.

Two other accusations of beatings causing miscarriage were heard in this eyre. In both cases the conclusion of the court was that the deaths of the infants were not caused by the beatings. This appears to have been Bertone's defence. The chamberlain's eye-witness evidence counted for nothing in the decision of guilt or innocence, serving only to convince the court that there was a case to answer, and reflects an imperfection in the judicial system. In the 1276 eyre there were two such cases and again, both defendants were acquitted, even though in one the defendant's legal manoeuvrings themselves create a suspicion of guilt. Since beating a pregnant woman so that an abortion resulted was considered (at least if the foetus was in an advanced condition) homicide and therefore a capital offence, juries may have been reluctant to convict. A more detailed study would be required to throw light on whether the jury system was inherently biased against female plaintiffs (on this see "Accusation of rape").

NOTES

"chamberlain and sheriffs are asked"

They were questioned because the justices considered that those were the officers responsible for holding post mortem inquests. In a separate case heard during this eyre, it was reported to the justices that only the sheriffs and not the chamberlain held inquests. The justices reformed this, requiring that the chamberlain make a record of all reports of deaths and related attachments, and then hold an inquest, with or without the sheriffs, but at the least ordering the sheriffs to make attachments; the sheriffs were forbidden from holding inquests alone, apparently because of past irregularities regarding attachments. In the case brought by Isabella, however, the chamberlain but not the sheriffs had evidently conducted the inquest.

"Great Law"

The Great Law was so called because of the large number of compurgators (36 men) required, commensurate with the seriousness of the crime. Lesser numbers were sufficient for lesser crimes, or (as the second case indicates) where there was no personal plaintiff; in the special circumstances of the second case it was considered sufficient for the defendant to have six compurgators who would support his oath of innocence. The Great Law appears not to have survived far into the 14th century – although the right of a citizen to be tried in this way was claimed at the eyre of 1321, the defendant preferred to opt for trial by jury.

"the Walbrook"

A stream that divided London into eastern and western halves.

"folk moot"

A gathering of the community in St. Paul's churchyard. Formal meetings were held three times a year, but none of these was in April, so evidently ad hoc meetings could also be called.

"barons"

London citizens were referred to as barons.

"36 were chosen"

No explanation was given for why the full complement of 36 was not chosen, or at least not listed, but it appears that any lack had been made up by the time of the oath-taking. That three of the compurgators were also guarantors of William's appearance to undertaken his defence does not necessarily mean they were biased towards William; it may mean nothing more than that they were his neighbours and, as such, more likely to know his character and be able to give a reliable opinion as to the likelihood of whether he committed the crime or not.

"clear himself"

In the original purgare: to undergo compurgation.

"But the contrary can be found further on"

A note of the clerk of the court, perhaps referring to procedural decisions made in the case of Isabella wife of Serlo vs. William Bertone.

"freed on bail"

More literally, committed (to appearing in court) by bail.

TRANSLATION

William Ribald, a thief and informer, accuses William Noche of Norwich of being a receiver of stolen goods, associating with thieves, and having in his own home in the town of Norwich killed a man in his [i.e. Ribald's] presence; with his agreement, advice and help, William Ribald took the corpse out of the city to Thorp wood [to bury it]. That he did this feloniously and with evil intent as his accomplice he offers to prove by his body. William Noche comes and denies [receiving] stolen goods or associating etc., and that he was ever his accomplice in carrying out any homicide or theft or any other felony, or the entirety etc. He offers to defend himself against such [charges] according to the custom of the city of London, which ought to be valid in this city according to the charter of liberties they use. [He states that?] The city of London's custom concerning a man brought to trial for homicide is that they should select 12 jurors from one side of the Walbrook and 12 from the other side, and then the one accused of homicide goes before the justices etc. and swears his oath that the man of whose death he is accused was never by him, or by his procurement, brought closer to death or further from life. If those 36 [jurors] chosen and voluntarily sworn bear witness to the soundness of his oath, he is acquitted of the death. If that method of proof fails, in that one of the 36 jurors is unwilling to join him in his oath, then judgement may be passed on him etc. The same method is applicable in this city. And William Noche came and made his oath, and 18 jurors from one side of Norwich's river and 18 jurors from the other side supported his oath. William completed his own oath through the support of the 36 jurors. Therefore it is decided that he be acquitted of the death of Jocelin. Afterwards, asked how he wished to clear himself of theft, associating [with thieves], and receiving stolen goods, he said that he submitted himself to 12 jurors of the city, for better or worse. The jurors say that he is not guilty of any wrongdoing. Therefore he is acquitted.

DISCUSSION

This case presents an example of how the development of rights and privileges in London provided a model for other towns to emulate. The royal charter of 1194 had granted Norwich citizens "that none of them need undertake combat and that as regards pleas of the crown they may clear themselves according to the custom of the city of London", along with other privileges based on those already obtained by London.

NOTES

"informer"

Criminals who turned "approver", by pointing the finger at other criminals, could hope to win a pardon if their accusation were upheld; if not, informing might at least delay their own execution.

"by his body"

i.e. trial by combat.

"charter of liberties"

In 1250 the most current charter held by the city was that of Henry III (1229), which was largely a confirmation of his predecessors' grants, including that of Richard I (1194).

"London's custom"

Known as the Great Law

"12 jurors"

A scribal error for 18.

TRANSLATION

How the citizens of London shall act toward the king and his council when pleas are held in the Tower of London

[...]

First, when the barons and citizens have been given official notice that presentments are again to be made concerning attachments and misadventures affecting the royal prerogative, the great and more judicious men of the city ought to and are accustomed to meet in a specified and appropriate location to bring a peaceful resolution to the hostilities, grudges, and disagreements that had previously arisen in the city.

If by chance it should happen that anyone causes trouble in the city and bothers the citizenry, that person should be viewed by all citizens as a public enemy and an outsider, and he and his heirs should be denied and deprived of the privileges of citizenship forever. Because it cannot be allowed that because of such a person the king should seize the city and its franchises into his own hand, to the damage and detriment of the entire city.

Arrangements are to be made for the sheriffs and chamberlain, together with their clerks, to meet at a predetermined place and time (which should be between 29 September and 1 November) before the city council, to go over their rolls for the previous year and check that they agree. This should be undertaken every year within that period, in order that a new roll setting down in writing the attachments and misadventures of each year be drawn up by a capable and competent scribe, who is to be required by an oath to carry out this task faithfully and not to reveal the information to others. Thereby the roll will be added to from year to year; and afterwards it is to be put for safekeeping with the city charters.

Once the king has sent his instructions summoning [\[an eyre to enquire\]](#) into Crown attachments, that writ should be enrolled. If by chance it should happen that the date prescribed in the king's writ for summoning [\[the eyre\]](#) is within a period of less than forty days, then men of judgement and eminence are to be sent to persuade the king and his council to assign them another day in writing. For, according to their ancient franchises and customs, they ought not to be summoned regarding such attachments without at least forty days notice.

Once they have received explicit orders (saving the franchises of the city) for presenting and pleading those attachments and misadventures, each of the aldermen should draw up a separate roll for his own ward, which ought to contain the pledges and attachments pertaining to the Crown [\[pleas\]](#). They should advise and warn their neighbours to assemble at Barking church on the day assigned and, when directed by the city council, proceed from there to the Tower of London, so that they can make answer, judiciously and with forethought, to those questions put to them by the king and his justices. They should have the names of those who have died written out, distinctly and clearly, so that they can be properly essoined at the gate of the Tower of London, before the constable [\[of the castle\]](#) and the city chamberlain or their deputies, three days in advance of the date for trying the pleas of the Crown. The same instruction is to be followed regarding those out of the country, so that they can be essoined in the same way.

On the day before that on which the pleas of the Crown are expected to be heard, the custom of the city is as follows. That on that day, first thing in the morning, all the laymen of the city should as usual gather at Barking church and, from there, as a body enter the Tower of London, smartly and presentably dressed. No stall, shop, cellar, or plot of land where goods are sold or made may be open during the sessions of the pleas of the Crown at the Tower.

On the same day, six or more of the more eminent, respectable and judicious barons of the city, [chosen] by the common council of the city, are to be sent from Barking church to enter the Tower to greet and welcome the king, his council and his justices on behalf of the city. They are to request them that, if the king pleases, they may appear safely before them in the Tower, saving to the mayor and the other citizens all their franchises and customs – for the king and all his predecessors who were kings of England, and their justices, have always preserved the citizens' franchises and customs safe and intact for them.

Those aforementioned men shall make it known to the king, his council and his justices, that they should in the king's name forbid that anyone presume to guard the entrances or passageways other than citizens whom the citizenry appoint to that task. Nor should any marshal or crier appear among the citizenry, unless one of their number and answerable to them. For, according to the liberty of the city, it is not their custom or obligation to have any doorkeeper, usher, marshal or crier other than those whom they wish, [chosen] from among themselves. All entrances and passageways should be open to the barons and all citizens, for the duration of holding the pleas of the Crown, so that they can come in and go out freely. So it ought to be and has been in the past.

Next, three judicious and sound men should be selected, of whom one should present to the king, his council and his justices, in [chronological] order, those accidents and misadventures falling within purview of the king that have occurred in the city, from the time when the old pleas were last tried, up to the present. The two other men are to stand next to the presenter, one on his left and the other on his right; so that if by chance he happens to become fatigued by making the presentments, one of the others can take over the task. Or if he should make a mistake in presenting any case, the two standing nearby can without speaking alert him to the fact. No-one else, other than the two bystanders already mentioned, is to presume to disturb or correct the presenter in any way. There is to be no uproar, murmuring, quarrelling, or talking back and forth among the people while the presentments are being made. Everyone is to behave peacefully and avoid contentiousness, if they wish to uphold the honour and liberty of the city, and ensure the presenter can be heard and understood by everyone without difficulty.

Let it be known and kept in mind that the city should respond in the following way to all objections made against the barons and all the citizens. They should make no answer unadvisedly, no matter how well they may have been tutored and informed. Instead, after discussing the matter and obtaining communal advice, they should reply as they have been counselled, saving the franchises of the city. For preparing such responses, 24 or more are to be chosen from the common council, who are to have constant access to the common council of the city, so that [the interests of] the citizens are protected and safeguarded. No outsider may go among them, so that he can hear the consultations of the city, while they are engaging in their group discussions.

After the king's justices have shown and delivered to the mayor and barons of the city the articles [concerning pleas] of the Crown, the mayor and barons are immediately to request an adjournment to allow them to take counsel and prepare, so that they can reply to those articles properly on the day assigned them by the justices, and to give them an opportunity during that period to write out and enrol the articles and their prudent responses.

From the group of 24 men (or more) mentioned above, 4 or more are to be designated by common counsel of the city to be associates of the mayor in responding to the articles and to the principal challenges made. The mayor's clerk, together with the common clerk of the city and the sheriffs' clerks, are to sit in front of them to note down memoranda of all challenges made, to avoid them being forgotten through failure to take notes. One of them is to be the chief notetaker, whose notes shall serve as a guide to the others in writing both the king's challenges and the responses of the community.

The following provisions should be made in the cases of sheriffs and aldermen. The sheriffs should have their sergeants present, and every alderman the beadles of his ward, in smart and presentable clothing and footwear, ready and willing to carry out such orders of the mayor and barons of the city as may be given to each one of them; they are to march along in their smartest tunics and surcoats, caps and cloaks removed, carrying straight white rods in their hands. Of these, four or more (depending on needs) are to be assigned as keepers of the entrances and passageways, two as criers, and the remainder as marshals to carry out orders given them. If any of them happens to be old, feeble, infirm, or of poor eyesight, a substitute should be provided in the form of someone else from the community of that same ward who is capable of what is required. And let it be ensured of such men that they are presentable and tastefully dressed, with a fresh shave and haircut.

Note that, according to the ancient franchises and customs of the city of London, there are three forms of purgation in pleas of the Crown whereby those appealed, accused and put on trial can clear themselves. The first is for cases of homicide or murder; this form of purgation is called the Great Law. The second form of purgation applies to cases of mayhem and is called the Middle Law. The third form of purgation can be used in cases of assault, battery, extortion, wounding, bodily harm, bloodshed, and other similar injuries inflicted during the Christmas season, or during Easter week or Whitsuntide, and is called the Third Law.

For anyone for whom it is appropriate to clear himself by the Great Law, the procedure for that law is as follows. He who is appealed, accused, and put on trial should personally take six oaths; that is, in each oath he shall swear that he is guiltless and innocent of felony and breach of the king's peace and of the entire offence laid against him, so help him God and the holy gospels. Afterwards six men shall swear that, to the best of their knowledge and belief, he has sworn a true and sound oath, so help them God and these holy things. And this process is to be continued until the full number of 36 men have sworn, with the accused swearing as indicated above and after him a group of six men, until the entire number indicated above has been completed.

The selection of those thirty-six men ought to be, and is according to the ancient custom of the city of London, done in the following manner. That, with the accused being absent, eighteen men are to be chosen from the east side of the Walbrook and eighteen men from the west side of the Walbrook; they are not to be relatives by birth or blood or members of his family, nor linked to him by marriage or in any other way whatever, but only trustworthy freemen of the city. The names of these are to be read out to the accused. After hearing them he identify to the mayor and barons of the city any of which cause him concern. If he can show a reasonable cause for objecting to them, the names of such men shall be crossed off the list and others chosen in their place to make up the full number, and their names shall be read out to him. Once he is satisfied with the list of names and has committed to their purgation of the accusation against him, then, when the city decides, he may appear before the king's justices to wage his law on a date and at a place assigned. According to the ancient custom of the city, such a person shall have an adjournment of up to a full 40 days [\[to prepare\]](#) for making his law. The names of the thirty six men are to be delivered to the king's justices.

The procedure for performing the Middle Law is as follows. He who is appealed and brought to trial for mayhem should personally take three oaths. In each oath he shall swear that he is guiltless and innocent of that felony and breach of the king's peace and of the entire offence laid against him, so help him God and these holy things. After him, six men shall swear that, to the best of their knowledge and belief, he has sworn a true and lawful oath, so help them God and these holy things. And this process is to be continued until the full number of eighteen men have sworn, with the accused swearing first as indicated above and after him a group of six men, until the entire number indicated above has been completed.

For the selection of the eighteen men, the same procedure is to be followed for everything as indicated above for the Great Law.

The procedure in performing the Third Law is as follows. He who is accused of assault, battery, extortion, wounding, bodily harm, bloodshed or similar types of injuries, inflicted during the abovementioned festival seasons, should personally take a single oath that he is guiltless and innocent of the offence laid against him and of breach of the king's peace during festival season, so help him God and these holy things. After him, six men shall swear that, to the best of their knowledge and belief, he has sworn a true and lawful oath, so help them God and these holy things. Let it be known that these six men are to be chosen from the neighbourhood where the accused lives. However, they are not to be relatives by birth or blood or members of his family, nor linked to him by marriage or in any other way whatever, but only trustworthy men of that neighbourhood and freemen of the city. Whose names are to be read out to the accused, etc., as above indicated regarding the Great Law.

By consent of the community of the city, the two aldermen nearest the Tower are under orders to go into the Tower three days before the sessions of the Crown, for purposes of inspecting the benches in the great hall to see that they are in good shape. If they happen to be broken, they are to have them properly repaired at the expense of the city. Similarly, they are to have a strong bench made for the middle of the hall, with three seats, to be placed in the middle of the hall facing the great seat of the king. The mayor and the barons of the city may sit upon this when responding to the king and his justices on matters relating to [\[pleas of\]](#) the Crown.

Since it is impossible for the barons and entire citizenry of London to proceed with pleas of the Crown elsewhere than before the king and his justices, the barons and citizenry are obliged to secure their favour and good will – that is, by lavish bestowal of generous gifts on them and their clerks, just as previous barons and citizens of London (who have so manfully and strenuously administered and protected the city of London and its franchises and customs at other times) have been accustomed to do. It is not dishonourable or shameful to follow in the footsteps of our ancestors, who were experts in their time; therefore it is advisable for us to do as they did, to avoid the citizens being disquieted and vexed by [legal] challenges, instead of being left in peaceful possession of their franchises.

If the mayor and barons of the city are asked who are the presenters [of offences] and the finders of those killed, murdered or otherwise having suffered misadventure, it has been decided in common that the answer should be as follows. No matter what the usage of the realm is outside the city, the ancient custom and franchises of the city prescribe that there are in London no presenters or finders of such things. For in a city with such a large population, it is impossible to conceal occurrences of that sort – even before the bailiffs can be informed, news of them spreads throughout the entire city. Consequently, there are no such [presenters or finders] in the city, nor have there been in the past, but only reports from the general populace of the city.

DISCUSSION

This document cannot quite be considered to typify the same matter in other towns, not merely because London was always in a class of its own, but because the eyres were held only in counties and London was (at this period) the only city that was also a county. Professor Cam plausibly argued that this set of instructions was likely drawn up, based on examination of records of previous eyres, by the hypothesised compiler of the Liber Custumarum, Andrew Horn, in late 1320, after the king had decreed that an eyre would be held in London.

An eyre was always a nerve-wracking event for its host community. Since eyres undertook a broad investigation of general governance and public behaviour for the previous several years at least, and since errors were inevitably found and fines levied, the eyre was probably perceived as just another way of extorting money for the king. As was noted in Liber Custumarum, once the Londoners heard the news about an eyre – several weeks notice being required – they not only examined their copies of records of previous eyres, but also took legal counsel, prepared what they would present at the eyre, and where possible settled legal disputes out of court.

In this case, London had particular cause to worry. The eyre had become so cumbersome by the late thirteenth century as to make itself obsolescent. London had hosted no eyre during Edward I's reign. Edward II, however, attempted a limited revival, with an eyre in Kent (1313) and that in London. The decade or so leading up to the London eyre had seen reforming and reactionary administrations alternate in London. Baronial opponents to Edward II had stimulated demands for reform of the city government and the city had, in general, seemed sympathetic to Edward's enemies, led by Henry of Lancaster. The king had been obliged to confirm in 1319 a set of new administrative regulations produced by the reformers.

The eyre of 1321 has been interpreted as his tool for revenge. Justices in eyre were supposed to make allowance for local custom when administering common law. Instead, over an exhausting five-month session during 1321 they systematically challenged London's customs and franchises, demanding the citizens provide documentary proof for each, and rejecting those that they felt went against royal prerogative. One by one the franchises were suspended, pending further examination by the king's council. It has also been suggested that Despenser, a rising power, was flexing his muscles or, at the least, encouraging Edward to subjugate London to their authority.

Londoners offered some resistance through their leaders, among them Andrew Horn, and eventually had their own revenge when in 1326 they followed Lancaster into the camp of Isabella and Mortimer and assisted with Edward's overthrow, even taking the lead in agitating for his deposition; the justices of the 1321 eyre were searched for (in vain) by the angry mobs. In return London was allowed to submit to the 1327 Parliament a long list of petitions, which made frequent reference to the depredations of the eyre. A new charter of liberties, responding to the requests in the petitions, was granted restoring London's liberties and even adding new ones – such as criminal jurisdiction for London's court (not previously held except presumably during the period when London had a justiciar), thanks to the mayor being made an ex officio justice of gaol delivery.

There were no more eyres in London. Although Edward III threatened London with them once or twice, it was with a view to being bribed to drop the idea.

NOTES

"barons"

Barons was a name applied to Londoners almost uniquely (the Cinque Portsmen were also so described), as an alternate to citizens. FitzStephen equated the two terms. Here however barons and citizens seems mutually exclusive categories, and likely refer to the aldermen (and other men of that group of wealthy and propertied residents) and the commons.

"it cannot be allowed that because of such a person"

Ironically, this is just what happened as a result of this eyre: the king confiscated London's franchises upon the eyre giving credence to complaints that a murderer had evaded punishment by, after the fact, bribing the mayor to make him a freeman, so that he be tried according to London custom. Professor Cam suspected this a pretext on the part of the Edward II to justify the seizure. However, kings as a whole were quick to seize city liberties, as a means of asserting their authority and forcing citizens to pay a large fine to repossess their privileges.

"Barking church"

All Hallows, Barking, the closest city church to the Tower.

"by the common council of the city"

It is not easy to say whether phrases such as per commune consilium civitatis in the text should be translated as referring to a common council (i.e. a formal element of city government) or to communal counsel (i.e. a process of taking advice with the community, or its representatives). The evidence for a formal common council as a permanent part of London's constitution at this period is not unambiguous – in fact the document above is one of the principal sources used to argue for the existence of such a council. Professor Cam appears to have been uncertain, using both translations in different contexts without any evident logic. I am no more certain and also use both possible translations, not always in the same way as Professor Cam. One reference coram consilio civium suggests that there was a specific body of men with conciliar status. However, this does not mean that other uses of consilium in the text refer to such a body, rather than a process of consultation. The Londoners probably did not distinguish, or concern themselves about a distinction, between the process and the institution, for the latter was simply a mechanism for the former.

"sound"

The term here translated "sound" is moderati and perhaps implies self-controlled and unexcitable (in the face of provocative questioning by the justices and lawyers).

"principal challenges"

The "principal challenges" (obiecta) made stemmed from the court's investigation of the crimes presented, and concerned matters such as why city officials failed to take certain actions, why witnesses or other parties implicated in a case were not present in court, etc. Some other matters, such as points of law or technicalities of London custom, might be responded to by the city recorder or its lawyers.

"rods"

A symbol of office.

"three forms of purgation"

These forms of purgation were, ironically, already out of favour with the citizenry, who usually preferred the opt for trial by jury.

"mayhem"

A class of offence in which there occurred a serious and permanent injury to someone (i.e. maiming).

"the Walbrook"

A stream that divided London into eastern and western halves.

"two aldermen"

The aldermen who performed this duty in 1321 were in charge of Tower Ward and Langbourn Ward. Tower Ward was immediately east of the Tower; Langbourn, to the north-east of Tower Ward, was in fact not as close as Aldgate or even, it could be argued, Billingsgate.

"strong bench"

It was elsewhere specified that the cost of building the central bench (and perhaps of repairing existing Tower benches) was to be covered by the two aldermen, presumably from ward revenues.

"three seats"

What has been translated here as "three seats" (triplici sedilio) might instead mean a bench three times as big as a standard one.

TRANSLATION

First, the judges asked the mayor, chamberlain, sheriffs and other of the more important men of the town how they ought to begin their pleas. They say [\[in reply\]](#) that first the articles to which they must respond, regarding pleas of the crown, should be handed over. They were then asked to whom the articles ought to be handed over, and whether or not those to whom they should be delivered ought to take an oath to tell the truth about the articles. They say [\[in reply\]](#) that the articles should be delivered to the mayor, without him having to take any oath in that regard, and that he, in counsel with the senior law-abiding, prudent men of the city, will respond to the articles that are pertinent to the city. Similarly, the sheriffs [\[will respond\]](#) to the articles related to their terms of office. They will tell the truth about the articles and anything else required of them, because of the loyalty they owe the king and the [\[oath of\]](#) fealty they have made to him. So that of course if the mayor, who answers for the city, answers well, all members of the community are quit as regards those matters. But if he should answer badly and be convicted or fail in any matter concerning the city community, the whole community for which he answers shall fail. The mayor and all the men of the city say that this was the custom before the war, as well as in the time of King John, King Richard, and King Henry their father. And so the articles were delivered to the mayor in the following form:

Concerning ancient pleas of the crown which were before the king's justices at other times, but were not concluded.

Concerning recent pleas of the crown which arose later, in peacetime.

Concerning those who are in the king's mercy but have not [yet] been amerced.

Concerning debts owed to King John, father of the king, during and before the war: what the debts are and who owes them, whether the debtors have died, and who are their heirs or the holders of their goods.

Concerning those who have maliciously destroyed or burned down houses within the liberty of the city, in breach of the [king's] peace, etc.: who they are, whose houses those were, and whether they [i.e. aggressors and victims] have made peace without the king's licence.

Concerning young men and girls who are or ought to be in the king's wardship: whether they are married [already], or are [still] marriageable; and, if they are married, to whom and by whose agency, and how much their lands are worth.

Concerning the king's sergeanties: what they are, who holds them and through whom, and what kind of sergeanties they are and how much they are worth.

Concerning churches that are or ought to be in the king's gift: which churches they are, who holds them, and through whom.

Concerning the king's escheats, both of tenements of Jews and of Christians: who holds them, through whom, why what service, and how much they are worth.

Concerning purprestures made upon the king within the liberty or elsewhere, wherever they are, on land or on water.

Concerning the measures that have been fixed by regulation and sworn to throughout the kingdom: whether they are upheld according to the provisions, and whether during peacetime the keepers of the measures took payments from anyone so that he might buy or sell with them. This is to be understood to apply to all measures, both of length and of weight. And whether the assize of the width of cloths has been kept according to the provisions for it.

Concerning wine sold contrary to the assize.

Concerning treasure trove.

Concerning sheriffs and other bailiffs who have presided over pleas of the crown, and what pleas.

Concerning Christian usurers who have died, who they were and what moveables they had.

Concerning the moveables seized from merchants under the dominion of the king of France, who has them.

Concerning the moveables of Jews who have been killed, and who has their pledges, charters and [recognizances of] debts.

Concerning counterfeitors and clippers of coins.

Concerning the king's mint and exchange; that is, who may have made coins or exchanges without [licence from] the king or his bailiffs.

Concerning wrongdoers and burglars and those who have harboured them in peacetime.

Concerning fugitives – whether any returned from flight without [the king's] warrant – and outlaws and who has their moveables.

Concerning bribes taken for letting pass grain and other goods, to avoid them being commandeered by bailiffs for provisioning castles, at a lower price than they are worth; the same regarding prises.

Concerning new customs levied in the city, whether on [merchandise coming by] land or water: who levied them and where.

Concerning defaults; that is, those who have been summoned to be before the king's justices and fail to come.

Concerning the delivery of gaols in peacetime without warrant from the king or the justices.

Concerning those imprisoned arbitrarily by bailiffs without reasonable cause, or those set free without warrant.

Concerning thieves who escape [from prison].

Concerning Christian usurers who are living, who they are, what moveables they have, and how much they are worth.

Concerning damages and prises taken from outsiders: by whom this was done, when, where, in whose jurisdiction, and what things.

DISCUSSION

The king's travelling justices came to any given locality infrequently. In the case of London, there had not been an eyre held there since 1226, and before that in 1221. The next session after that of 1244 (which lasted about two months, although some business was deferred until the beginning of 1246) was not until 1251, and there was another large gap until the next one, in 1276. These gaps meant that there was likely to be a large backlog of cases to hear, and litigants, witnesses, guarantors, or city officers had often died in the interim, or accused persons had found opportunity to escape without trace.

London was exempt from the general eyres, which dealt with both crown and civil pleas; only the former were entertained by the sessions held in the Tower, since the city claimed jurisdiction over most civil pleas for its own courts. The mayor and leading citizens – probably largely the aldermen – acted as the presenting jury. Note the principle of representation expressed in the preamble to the articles: the presenters, particularly the mayor, acted on behalf of the community; if crimes came to light that had not been presented, the community itself was accountable.

When an eyre was convened the delivery of the list of articles to the mayor was necessarily a first step (after the reading out of the writ authorizing the justices to hold the eyre), since it guided the presenting jury. Criminal proceedings of homicide, assault and felony received attention first, and formed the bulk of the cases (for some examples from this eyre, see "Cases perceived as precedents or illustrating points of law"). Death by misadventure was a common presentment, while there are several instances of abjurations of the realm by murderers or thieves. There were a number of escheats to deal with, while the list of those who had contravened the assizes of wine or cloth were so numerous as not to be recorded individually (they would have been identified on the list of estreats – i.e. fines to be levied); in the case of the vintners it was simply stated that all were guilty. A number of purprestures were addressed, including erection of buildings on London Bridge and the extension of wharves into the Thames. But the justices were not satisfied and conducted a perambulation necessitating a second session in January 1246 just to deal with well over a hundred infringements that had come to light.

The scope of the list of articles enquired into by the justices in eyre grew over time, as the king defined more and more offences as within the jurisdiction of his courts. The list of 1244 was customized to the particular circumstances of London, omitting some of the articles applied during the shire circuits, and adding some articles believed particularly pertinent to the period since the last eyre: the malicious destruction of houses (reflecting disturbances in the city), and Christian usurers. Overall, however, the list of articles used in this eyre is very similar to, although less extensive than, that presented in Bracton's compilation of about the same period; Bracton himself notes that the articles could vary from eyre to eyre.

Despite the possibility that the list was tailored to London, the mayor nonetheless indicated "nothing to report" with regard to a number of the articles:

- those awaiting amercement (the mayor declared that he needed to see the records of the last eyre before he could say, but the justices were

- refusing access to that court roll)
- destruction of houses
- king's wards (the justices, however, knowing of a case, condemned the mayor and citizens to judgement)
- treasure trove
- sheriffs and bailiffs holding pleas (the justices, however, considered that the assize of weights and measures was a case in hand, and condemned the mayor and citizens etc.)
- moveables of dead Jews
- harbourers of wrongdoers
- counterfeiters and clippers
- mints and exchanges
- bribes related to the administration of weights and measures
- bribes for protecting goods from requisitioning
- new customs
- imprisonments without cause (the initial answer subsequently being amended to admit the case of one sheriff which came to light during the eyre)
- escaped thieves
- Christian usurers, living or dead (although it was intimated that Italians merchants in the city might be practitioners)
- damages and prises taken from outsiders

After working through most of the list, the city authorities then presented a number of new city ordinances – possibly those necessitated by judicial decisions from the previous eyre – for the justices' review, along with changes or elaborations related to tolls collected or the application of standard measures.

There was a single case of a fugitive having returned to the city, but a most damaging one. He had obtained a licence for returning, but the justices ruled that this had been obtained during Henry III's minority, and should have been renewed after the king had come of age. As this had not been done, the city was judged guilty of harbouring a criminal, and had to throw itself on the king's mercy and surrender its liberties, returned when the city agreed to pay the king £1,000. This kind of thing, together with fines laid on numerous city officials, past and present, for various failures in their duty (despite a wall of silence on articles related to abuses of office), must have made the proclamation of an eyre a matter for dread.

NOTES

"the war"

The struggle between John and his barons. The effects of this on administration of law and order are suggested at several points in the document.

"ancient pleas"

These were the types of criminal cases over which the king claimed jurisdiction and which had been brought before the previous eyre but not brought to the point of a judgement, or perhaps had been dealt with by justices of gaol delivery in the interim. Crimes occurring earlier than the previous eyre would not be entertained – perpetrators would not be tried, but that eyre's presenting jury could be fined for failing to present the crimes.

"king's mercy"

Being in the "king's mercy" meant that one had been convicted of a crime and was liable to be amerced. Determining the appropriate amercement was a matter for local men appointed as assessors for the eyre.

"sergeanties"

Grants of land in return for some kind of duty or service (or its financial equivalent), other than that related to military tenure.

"in the king's gift"

A church within the king's gift was one to which the king had the advowson, i.e. the right to appoint or remove the officiating priest (or assign that right to another); this patronage might be a source of revenue for the king, or a way of rewarding supporters.

"escheats"

An escheat was the right of a landlord to take back directly into his own hands property of tenants who had died without heirs or had been convicted of a capital crime, notwithstanding the possible existence of some intermediary landlord. This right was a large part of the reasoning behind the king insisting on licences for grants of property to the Church, since such grants would prevent any future possibility of an escheat. The king was considered the lord of all Jews and their property.

"purprestures"

Encroachments (a form of trespass): typically, the extension of one's own property onto property owned by the king, e.g. building onto one's house a front porch, which trespasses onto the king's highway. Those guilty were either fined or required to remove the encroachment – usually both.

"measures"

A town's executive officers were usually responsible for keeping the standard public measures and, sometimes through subordinates, applying them to check the accuracy of private measures used by tradespeople.

"payments"

It is not absolutely clear what is referred to by the "payments". The Latin (mercedem) means a small reward. In this context it probably means a bribe to ignore the use of inaccurate measures, and is used later in the document in the sense of bribe. But it is possible that the term may also incorporate fees (possibly extortionate) paid for the information needed for accurate private measures to be obtained.

"prises"

Goods taken by the king as a form of customs.

"delivery of gaols"

Gaol deliveries were sessions by king's justices intended to handle backlogs of cases involving prisoners, during the gaps between the eyres.

Pleas of the Crown of the borough of Oxford, before Salomon de Roff, Richard de Boyland, Robert Fulcon, Roger Loveday, and Geoffrey de Pycheford, itinerant justices at Oxford on 14 January 1285.

These were the coroners since the last eyre in this borough: Geoffrey de Hengestesey and Geoffrey le Mercer (who have died), John Filekyngge, John Culverd, Walter Feteplace and Peter de Middleton (who are now in office).

The borough within the walls of Oxford came by 12 jurors, the mayor, bailiffs and entire community of the borough witnessing that no

Englishry is presented in this borough.

[Pleas of the crown, i.e. homicides and other felonies]

Agnes de Drayton came by night to the house of Geoffrey de Hengestesey and stole from the same a bench-cover and a pair of summer shoes, worth 12d. Discovering this, Henry de Hengestesey the house's custodian pursued Agnes and, while she was fleeing, struck her on the shoulder with a sword and secured her through [raising] the hue. She died in prison from that wound, 4 days later. So Henry was arrested and imprisoned. Subsequently, John de Coleshull and Henry's son Henry, who are dead, and coroners Geoffrey de Hengestesey and Geoffrey le Mercer, who are dead, became guarantors for his appearance before the next coming of the justices without king's writ. And Henry is now in prison. Henry now comes and is asked how he wishes to clear himself; he replies that he is a clerk and ought not to respond [to the charge]. Upon which there comes Master Hugh de Lincoln, with letters patent identifying him as representative of the Bishop of Lincoln, and claims him as a clerk. The jurors say under oath that Agnes entered the house by night and stole the benchcover and shoes, as was stated, and that Henry struck her as stated, so that she died. On that basis, he was handed over to the Bishop.

Philip de Hybernia stabbed Peter de Virby with a knife in the back, to his heart, so that he died 4 days later. Philip at once put himself in the church of St. Aldate, Oxford, confessed what he had done, and abjured the realm in front of the coroner. He had no possessions, but resided in the Southwest Ward, therefore it is to be amerced. And because this took place in daylight and the parish of St. Aldate failed to capture him, it is to be amerced.

John Comyn was found dead under the town walls of Oxford, outside the South Gate. It is not known who killed him. Richard de Eynho, the first finder [of the corpse], failed to appear, but is not a suspect and he was attached by Robert Ballivum and John Warrepayn, therefore they are to be amerced. The parish of St. Michael, adjacent to the South Gate of St. Frideswide, failed to come to the inquest, therefore it is to be amerced.

Philip de Waleys clerk of Carmarthen killed William Charles clerk in the North Osney suburb of Oxford and at once fled; he is believed guilty. The first finder has died. The hue was raised, but the suburb of North Osney failed to pursue, therefore it is in mercy.

Subsequently it was testified by the twelve [jurors] that Philip had later returned to town, been captured, and had died in prison.

Robert de Norffolcia was arrested in town for domestic burglaries, robberies, and other thefts, and was imprisoned. He confessed to Geoffrey le Mercer and Thomas le Spicer coroners, now dead, that he had committed many robberies, and he became an informer, accusing a certain Hugh de Cherleton and others. That Hugh was arrested on the accusation by Robert and imprisoned in the town gaol, dying there. The jurors are asked on what legal basis Robert became an informer, and by what right they hold informers in the town after they have become informers. They reply that they keep informers in the king's prison at Oxford and have always so kept them. So that if any informer lays an accusation before the coroners against anyone outside the town liberty, those coroners advise the [county] sheriff that an informer in the town's custody has made an accusation warranting an arrest, and the sheriff goes to make the arrest outside the borough, in Oxfordshire, so that the informer and those he accuses can be held in the town prison until the delivery of the gaol. They say that the citizens of London are accustomed to do this and it is for that reason they claim to have the privilege. The jurors are asked what became of Robert; they say they do not know. They are therefore to be subject to judgement, since they have no answer about the informer nor about his accusation, and they claim to keep an informer in custody until a conviction has been obtained, together with everyone arrested because of his accusations, when they have no power to hold any informer in custody beyond two or three days after he has become an informer, nor to have arrested through an informer's accusation anyone outside the liberty without special warrant from the king, when the informer ought at once to be sent to Newgate or another king's gaol.

Afterwards they paid a fine, as appears in the summary.

A certain Richard, squire to Master Thomas de Luda, was killed on the great bridge of Oxford by Hugh de Hybernia and Master John de Thorney. The first finder has died. Hugh and Master John at once fled and are believed guilty; they are therefore to be outlawed. Nothing is known of their possessions, because they were clerks from Ireland. Because this took place in daylight and the townspeople of Oxford failed to capture them, it is to be amerced. The townspeople did not pursue, even though it took place during the day; therefore they are to be amerced.

Henry son of Henry de Eynesham fell from a boat into the waters of the Thames and was drowned. The first finder has died and was not a suspect. Judgement of misadventure; the value of the boat is 12d., for which the sheriff is to answer.

Robert de Lundon was arrested on suspicion of theft and imprisoned in Oxford castle; he died in prison. Since coroner Geoffrey de Hengestesey failed to hold an inquest on Robert's death, he is subject to judgement.

2s. is due from John, the sheriff, as deodand for a certain boat and a certain cord, which were the cause of the drowning of John son of Robert de Laueneye.

James de Hybernia clerk killed William de Burford outside Smith Gate, and was arrested and imprisoned in the Oxford town prison, where he died. The first finder has died. No-one else is suspected [\[in the homicide\]](#). The parish of St. Peter in the East failed to come to the inquisition; therefore it is to be amerced.

Margery daughter of Richard Helpsman was found dead in the highway of Stockwell Street, Oxford. The first finder has died. It is not known who killed her. John le Sclatter and Roger le Blunt, attached by John de Furno and William de Takles Inn, failed to come, but are not suspects.

Adam son of Henry de Bellomonte was drowned in a certain pit in the courtyard of Richard fitz Nicholas in St. Martin's parish. The first finder comes and is not a suspect, nor is anyone else. Judgement of misadventure. Because coroner Geoffrey de Hengestesey did not attach Richard fitz Nicholas, in whose courtyard this took place, he is subject to judgement.

William de Croumersh died as a result of being crushed by a beam in St. Thomas parish. The first finder comes and is not a suspect, nor is anyone else. Judgement of misadventure. The value of the beam is 16d., for which the sheriff is to answer. John de Pusie was present [at the accident] and does not now appear, but is not a suspect; he was attached by Gilbert Feyregh and William Cithford, therefore they are to be amerced.

John de Radbourn, pursued by parties unknown, put himself in St. Aldate's church and confessed that he had committed many thefts and had stolen a particular item of silver. He abjured the realm before the coroner. His possessions [are worth] 4s., for which the sheriff answers. He was in South Ward, therefore it is to be amerced. The twelve jurors falsified the appraisal of his possessions, therefore they are to be amerced.

Walter de Buke was found dead in the river Cherwell. The first finder comes and is not a suspect. The jurors testify that a certain Matilda de Cudelington was arrested for the death and hung before the justices of gaol [delivery]. Her possessions [are worth] 15s., for which the sheriff is to answer. The parish of Holy Cross in Holywell failed to come to the inquisition; therefore it is to be amerced.

A certain David de Hybernia was found dead in the hall of the Prior of St. Frideswide in Little Jewry. It is confirmed by the twelve that a certain Robert fled and is considered guilty, therefore he is to be outlawed. He had no possessions, nor was he in any ward, because a clerk. The first finder has died and Robert Diffeld, one of the neighbours failed to appear; he is suspected and was attached by Nicholas de Berehull, therefore the latter is to be amerced. The parishes of St. Edward and St. John failed to come to the inquisition, therefore they are to be amerced.

Nicholas Penyfader was found dead at Osney. The first finder has died. The twelve testify that Henry de Arderne killed Nicholas; he now having disappeared and being considered guilty is to be outlawed. He had no possessions nor was he in any ward, because an outsider. The parishes of St. Thomas and St. Ebbe failed to come to the inquisition, therefore they are to be amerced.

A certain Thomas de Godestowe put himself in the church of St. Mary, Oxford, confessed that he had killed a man at Harpsford Bridge, and abjured the realm before the coroner. He had no possessions nor was he in any ward, because an outsider. The parish of St. Mary failed to capture him when the event took place in daylight, therefore it is to be amerced.

Beatrice daughter of Walter Hervey and Amy daughter of Thomas de Gareford were found burned in the cellar of the house of James le Espicer. The first finder came and is not a suspect, nor is anyone else summoned to answer for it.

Simon Prene the son of the brother of Roger Sprenehese accused Richard de Valentinia in the county court of battery and maiming and of breach of the king's peace, done in front of his nephew Roger de Sprenehese. Simon now comes and withdraws his accusation; he is therefore committed to prison and his pledges for prosecution are to be amerced.

[There appears to be some text missing from the transcription at this point, and the transcription itself is faulty in places, perhaps through damage to the original source].

William le Hore, Ralph le Wal, and Richard and Valentine [clerks] came and to what extent they are acquitted of the accusation and to what extent the king's suit they say as above. And, so it can be determined whether they should be handed over to the Bishop, the truth of the matter is to be related by the country. And 12 jurors from this borough together with 12 jurors from the suburb outside the North Gate state under oath that Richard and Valentine had a certain sister who was lodged in the house of Alice Gamage outside the North Gate, being unwell there; Richard and Valentine went there to visit and comfort her, bringing with them one of their fellow clerks, whose name they [i.e. the jurors] do not know, to dine with them there; this was on 29 May 1284. After dinner, at dusk, Richard wished to escort their associate back to his lodgings within the town; that being done, and he intending to go to his own lodgings together with his groom, his associate handed him a sword with which to defend himself if necessary, it being night-time. When he came to the North Gate, he ran into Alexander de Sarr with his sword drawn, who told him that certain men were plotting to kill Richard. For that reason, Richard took the sword that his groom had been carrying; and, when he attempted to return to his sister's house which he had earlier left, there came certain men with swords and other weapons and assaulted Richard. One of them struck Richard on the left arm, seriously wounding him; thus injured, Richard, striking back in his own defence, struck the aforesaid [sic] David on the left shoulder with his sword, giving him a deep wound. Upon receiving the injury, David immediately fled, and went into the house where Richard's sister was lodged. When Richard had escaped from the hands of the others, he returned with difficulty to that house and there found the David whom he had earlier wounded, lying on Richard's bed. Richard was amazed at this and asked him who had wounded him; he replied that he did not know. Richard replied to him "I believe that it was you who wounded me, and I wounded you in my ignorance", and thus they made a reconciliation between them. And the jurors say that what Richard did, he did in self-defence and had no knowledge of whom he thus wounded.

David fitz Griffin lays a complaint against Richard de Tangele, Valentine his brother, and John de la Rede, on the grounds that when, on 29 May 1284, David was behaving peaceably outside the North Gate of Oxford, going towards his lodgings at the hour of vespers, he encountered a certain chaplain carrying the body of the Lord to certain sick persons. As he genuflected to pray before the body of the Lord, Richard and Valentine assaulted him; Richard struck him with a sword on his left shoulder, giving him a wound six inches long, so that David was in despair of his life. Afterwards, Valentine and John with their swords beat him almost to death, to his serious damage and contrary to the king's peace. Whereby he has experienced suffering and damage to the value of £133.6s.8d., and for that reason he has brought this action etc.

Robert de Sunnyngwell was arrested for the death of Richard de Waleys and imprisoned in Oxford castle, in the custody of Thomas de Sancto Vigore, then sheriff. He escaped from Thomas' custody; Thomas is therefore subject to judgement for the escape. Robert immediately put himself into St. George's church, confessed his deed, and abjured the realm before he coroner. He had not chattels, nor was he in any ward.

John de Candene was arrested for the death of the parson of Easton and imprisoned in Oxford castle, in the custody of William de Insula, a former sheriff who is now dead. He escaped from prison and that custody; therefore William's son and heir Roger de Insula is subject to judgement. John immediately put himself in the church of St. Peter in the East, Oxford, confessed to killing the parson, and abjured the realm before the coroner. He had no possessions, nor was he in any ward, because an outsider. Afterwards Roger comes and says that the escape happened in the time of his father William, and seeks judgement if he ought to be responsible for that; and because this happened in the time of his father, he is subject to judgement.

William the servant of Master Hugh de Colebrugge was riding Master Hugh's horse in the borough of Oxford when he fell off, killing himself. No-one is under suspicion for it. Judgement of misadventure. The value of the horse is 40s. The twelve confirm that Hugh died. Master Thomas de Bek, then Chancellor, refused to allow the king's coroner or the bailiffs to lay hands on the deodand; therefore Master Thomas is to be amerced and is to be answerable for the deodand.

A certain William de Dene, an informer imprisoned in Oxford castle, accused John de Coventre of theft. Which John died in prison in the time when Gilbert de Kyrkeby was sheriff. Gilbert subsequently set free the informer William. They do not know on what grounds or by what right. Therefore he is subject to judgement.

Robert the miller, servant of William de Montibus, was torn apart by a horse-powered mill wheel, dying immediately. The first finder has died, and was not a suspect. Judgement of misadventure. The value of the wheel and the horses is 8s.; the parishes of St. Ebbe, St. Budoc, St. Peter le Bailey, and St. Martin made a false appraisal of the deodand and therefore are to be amerced.

A certain Alexander Comyn clerk drowned in the river Cherwell. The first finder comes and is not a suspect, nor is anyone else. Judgement of misadventure. It is confirmed from the coroner's roll that a certain unknown clerk took the corpse of the drowned man and carried it to the church of Holy Cross in Holywell. So that when John Filekyngge the coroner came to the spot to view the body and hold an inquest on it, Walter de Chawsey, the bailiff of Bogo de Clare would not permit the coroner to view the body nor hold an inquest. Walter is now present and is unable to deny it, therefore he is put in custody.

William de Hachetot was found dead in Little Jewry. The first finder has died. It is determined from the coroner's roll that a Meyroc de Bruges, an Oxford Jew, and his wife Beloasset were accused of the homicide and the jurors believed them guilty, with the result that Meyroc and Beloasset were exiled and Meyroc outlawed. And Wayner is to enquire about their possessions, among Christians and Jews.

Thomas son of Walter Snelman killed Nicholas son of William Johan in Binsey and at once took to flight; he is believed guilty and is consequently to be outlawed. He had no possessions, but was in the tithing of Binsey, therefore it is to be amerced. The first finder has died. William Brumstere, Thomas de Benham and Wymond le Lyndraper, who were attached, failed to appear. William was attached by Walter de Kyngeston and Richard le Loder, Thomas by William de Lacy and Henry Gobyum, and Wymond by John de Wittel and John de Weston; they are to be amerced.

Thomas le Poer of Ireland put himself in the church of the Friars Preacher, confessed that he had broken out of Oxford castle gaol, and abjured the realm before the coroner. He had no possessions nor was he in any ward. It is confirmed that Thomas escaped from that prison in the time when Gilbert de Kyrkeby was sheriff, therefore he is subject to judgement for Gilbert's escape.

John the servant of Master Thomas Marescalli and John the servant of Ivo le Merceer got into a fight in the town of Oxford, in which Thomas' servant John struck Ivo's servant John on the head with a cudgel, of which he died 15 days later. Thomas' servant John immediately fled; he is believed guilty and consequently is to be outlawed. His possessions [are worth] 18d.; the sheriff is answerable for them. He was of the household of Master Thomas, who is therefore to be amerced.

A certain John and William, keepers of the king's horses, and William de Boreali killed Eustace de Fynestokes opposite [the church of] St. Mary and immediately fled, but were captured while in flight. William de Boreali was wounded in the process and died as a result, eight days later, in prison. Similarly, William the horsemaster later died in prison. An accusation was later laid against John by an informer at Newgate, and he was conducted there; what became of him, they do not know.

Richard Belereyne, together with others unknown, killed Gilbert de Forsthull in St. Ebbe's parish. He fled and is believed guilty, therefore he is to be outlawed. He had no possessions, but was of the North East Ward, which is therefore to be amerced. John Filekyng coroner failed to answer for any attachment, therefore he is subject to judgement.

William de Melyngton put himself in the church of Holy Cross in the suburbs of Oxford. He had no possessions. The suburb of Holywell failed to capture him, even though it happened in daylight, and is therefore to be amerced.

Nicholas le Forc clerk drowned in the river Thames. Afterwards Andrew le Forc, John Bere, and Geoffrey Fresel came and carried Nicholas to the church of St. Michael at North Gate, and there they had him buried without the coroner viewing [the body]. Therefore they are to be amerced. No-one is suspected. Judgement of misadventure.

The jurors present that William le Mixebury was captured with 13d. in newly clipped coin. He was imprisoned in the gaol of the borough of Oxford, but escaped from the borough's custody. Therefore the town is subject to judgement for that escape. William at once put himself into the church of St. Michael at North Gate, confessed himself a thief and a coin clipper, and abjured the realm before the coroner. His possessions [are worth] 12s.4d., for which the sheriff is answerable.

John de Derby put himself in the church of St. Michael at North Gate, and confessed himself a thief who had committed multiple thefts. After he had stayed there for 8 days, by connivance of Hugh the present parson of the church, he escaped from the church. The borough of Oxford is subject to judgement for that escape. John immediately fled; he is believed guilty, and is therefore to be outlawed. He had no possessions nor was he in any ward. The sheriff is ordered to arrest Hugh; he afterwards testified that Hugh could not be found, therefore he is subject to judgement.

Richard de Clarwich [clerk] killed Adam de Herchenfeild at night in Oxford high street and was afterwards captured, convicted before the justices of gaol delivery, and handed over to the Bishop. His possessions [are worth] 2s.6d., for which the sheriff is answerable. The first finder comes and is not a suspect, and the parish that first etc.

Henry de Jakesle was found dead in the high street of Oxford. It is not known who killed him. The first finder comes and is not a suspect. It is determined from the coroner's roll that a certain Robert Ponterel was at another time arrested for this homicide. The jurors testify that Robert was acquitted by a jury, before William le Poner and his associates who were justices assigned to deliver the gaol at Oxford; this was confirmed from William's roll. The jurors believe William Springold guilty of the homicide; he, having made himself scarce, is to be outlawed. He has no possessions nor is in any ward.

Maurice Aungevyn accused John de la Heth, Richard fitz Ralph, William de Hulme, Hugh fitz Nicholas, Roger Cobbe, John fitz Amicia, Geoffrey Spende, John fitz Juliana, Henry Payn, William fitz Lucia, John Godefrey, Henry le Bonder, and William fitz Godfrey in the county court of robbery, assault, and breach of the king's peace. Maurice failed to appear, therefore he is to be arrested and his pledges for prosecution (viz. Bartholomew de la Wyke and Robert Caleman of Berkshire) are to be amerced. All [the accused] come except John fitz Amicia and John fitz Juliana. Asked how they wish to clear themselves, they state that they are in no way guilty and request that an enquiry be made. And 12 jurors say under oath that they are not guilty of robbery and assault, but have reached a settlement [with Maurice?]. The two Johns who did not come are to be arrested; John fitz Amicia had been attached by Robert Neweman and William de Eylwyne, and John fitz Juliana by Richard Giffard and Richard Roche, who are therefore to be amerced.

Robert le Eyr, king's serjeant, showed to the king's justices that Master Nicholas de Wautham, contrary to his oath of loyalty and to the fealty and allegiance that he owed to the king, seditiously and deceitfully conspired with Guy de Montfort and his brother Emery, and with Llywelyn the former Prince of Wales, enemy of the king. He went to the king's court and remained there in order to insinuate himself as a confidant and intimate of the court and poke around into the king's secrets. What he was able to discover of the counsels and secrets of the king, he frequently passed along in letters to the king's enemies, and thereby nourished treason and sedition; he was an adherent of that faction, a member of their conspiracy, and became their advisor, [acting] against his loyalty and his king. He [i.e. Robert] requested that justice be done for that, as for any rebel and traitor to the king. Master Nicholas, formally summoned on the first, second and third days, did not come to answer to justice in the king's court, but disappeared; he is believed guilty, and therefore is to be outlawed. It was subsequently testified that Master Nicholas had no lay possessions, being parson of Banbury church, which is worth £66.13s.4d. a year. Therefore order is sent to the Bishop of Lincoln to put that church into safe and secure keeping for the time being, so that neither Master Nicholas nor anyone on his behalf can access the revenues therefrom etc.

[Churches in the king's gift]

Concerning churches, they say that the church of St. Peter in the East, together with the chapels of Holy Cross and Wolvercot, is in the king's donation and Bogo de Clare holds it as a gift from the father of the present king; it is worth £40 a year. Similarly, the church of St. Mary in Oxford is in the king's donation and is worth £20 a year; Master Robert de Flecham holds it. The church of St. Budoc is in the king's donation; the Friars Penitential claim that King Henry, father of the present king, gave and granted them the church – they produce charters of King Henry that evidence this.

[Encroachments]

Concerning encroachments, they say that the Friars Preacher of Oxford are blocking a watercourse next to their land outside the South Gate, with the stone piling of a bridge they have built, so that the water overflows and is causing problems for the king's mill. As well it has flooded the king's demesne meadow so that, at mowing and haying time, the king's hay is ruined, causing him serious losses.

Similarly, Robert Cokes, when formerly Prior of St. Frideswide, in order to privatize St. Frideswide's courtyard, pulled down the battlements of the king's wall – on which men were accustomed to stand or pass along for purposes of defending the borough in time of war – where it ran through the middle of St. Frideswide's courtyard. He made the wall perpendicularly flat, so that no-one can go along the wall to defend the borough (should that prove necessary), to the damage of the king and the borough.

Similarly, 16 years ago a certain Henry, Master of St. John's Hospital outside the East Gate, appropriated to his own use an island in the river Cherwell which contains one perch of land. It is worth 6d. a year. This piece of land used to belong to the borough of Oxford; the present master has occupancy of it to the damage of the king etc.

Similarly, Walter de Merton blocked off half an acre's extent of a lane in the borough, along which men were accustomed to pass to reach the borough wall for defending it in time of war. He appropriated that parcel of land for Merton College in Oxford, to the serious damage of the king. Upon this there comes Master Peter de Abyndon, warden of the college, and states that the Abbot of Reading gave Walter de Merton that land in order to build a house in the town of Oxford; it extends southwards from next to [\[the property of\]](#) the church of St. John within the town walls of Oxford; King Henry, father of the present king, confirmed the abbot's gift to Walter. He produced a charter of that king providing evidence that Walter was permitted to enclose the aforesaid plot of land as far as the walls of Oxford, so that he could create a postern gate through the wall, to serve an east-west passage; through which, access in and out could be had when necessary in time of war, for the defence of the town. And those who had tenements within or adjacent to the plot also had a right-of-way to their properties. The jurors, asked if the postern there is as specified in the charter, say that it is; therefore the charge against the master is dismissed.

Twenty years ago, the Abbess of Godstow appropriated to her abbey 40 acres of pasture from the king's demesne, in the suburbs of Oxford, to the damage of the king. They are worth 20s. a year.

The abbot of Rewley has put up an outhouse over the river Thames, 12 feet long and 6 feet wide, which impedes boats bringing food and other necessaries to the borough of Oxford, to the damage of the borough.

The preceptor of Cowley has built a weir upon the river Thames. This has caused the waters of the Thames to flood the king's meadow, and it seriously and frequently makes it difficult for men to cross the Thames to Oxford, to the damage of the region etc. They say that the preceptor increased the height of the weir too much, so that the Thames cannot stay within its customary course when the water level is at its peak, to the great damage of the king and the countryside.

Upon this Master Peter de Abyndon comes etc., as above. Afterwards comes the master of the Hospital of St. John, who asks that he be allowed to rent the land mentioned so that it might be applied to the work of the king; this is granted to him, in return for 6d. a year to the king. As to the encroachment by the late prior, the sheriff was ordered to have repairs made to the wall, at the cost of the prior etc.

As to the preceptor's weir, the sheriff is ordered to alter the weir back to its original condition, tearing down any parts that are causing a nuisance etc.; and the preceptor is to be amerced.

As to the encroachment made by the Abbot of Rewley, the sheriff is ordered to have torn down anything that proves to be a nuisance etc. at the cost of the abbot; and the abbot is to be amerced.

The Abbess appears by her attorney, who states that King Henry, father of the present king, granted the pasture to her; she produces a charter of King Henry which evidences that. Consequently nothing [\[against her\]](#) at present.

[\[Assizes of wine and bread\]](#)

Concerning wines, they say that Nicholas de Kyngeston sold 300 tuns of wine in breach of the assize; Henry Oweyn, 120 tuns; Richard Culverd, 8 tuns; William le Espicer, 315 tuns; John Culverd, 40 tuns; Stephen de Kyngeston, 20 tuns; Henry Gama[ge], 9 tuns; Richard de la Mestre, 6 tuns; Henry le Especer, 3 tuns of wine in breach of the assize. Therefore they are to be amerced.

Concerning bread, they say that Andrew de Durham, Thomas de Sowy, John de Langport, John Aurifaber, Andrew de Pirye, William le Espicer, Ralph le Plomer, and Thomas de Durham have sold bread in breach of the assize. Therefore they are to be amerced. The twelve jurors hid information about those bakers, and are therefore to be amerced

[Escheats]

Concerning escheats, they say that Henry Oweyn holds a tenement that was an escheat to the king, in consequence of the death of the Jew Bonemey, who was hanged; he pays 2s.8d annually for it to the king's Exchequer. Henry now comes and says that he rented the tenement from the Exchequer for 2s.8d; that this is entered in the sheriff's account at the Exchequer is evidenced by extracts from the Exchequer accounts.

Thomas de Sowy holds a tenement worth 30s. a year which was an escheat to the king, in consequence of the death of the Jew Aaron de la Rye. Thomas now comes and says that the present king granted him the tenement to hold of the king and his heirs; he produces the king's charter giving and granting to Thomas de Sowy clerk a messuage and two cottages with appurtenances in Oxford, for Thomas and his heirs to have and hold of the king and his heirs, performing for the same all services due and accustomed.

Master Henry Wade, the queen consort's cook, holds a tenement worth £3.6s.8d a year which was an escheat to the king in consequence of the death of the Jew Olehym son of Basse, who was hanged.

Adam Clerk holds tenement by gift of the king which was the latter's escheat in consequence of the death of the Jew Vynes le Lime, who was hanged; it is worth 13s.4d a year. Adam comes and says that he holds the escheat and lease from the king through [arrangement with] the king's Treasury and Barons of the Exchequer, from which he rents it for 13s.4d a year. The sheriff testifies that he is responsible to answer for the rent as part of the green wax of the Exchequer, producing the record which evidences that.

[Treasure trove]

A certain Henry de Jernemuta was arrested and imprisoned in the town gaol of Oxford. He had hidden £11 of silver by burying it. When he was arrested he confessed to William le Espicer, then mayor, and Peter de Middleton the coroner that he had hidden the £11 behind the grange of Bogo de Clare; the money was discovered there. This led to William le Espicer being asked to answer for that money. He produced a letter from the king in these words: "Edward by the grace of God etc., gives greetings to his justices of the next eyre in the county of Oxford. Because it has been testified before us by our well-beloved servant Matthew de Ethymbar, our butler, that William le Espicer, during the period when he was last mayor of that town, by Matthew's order delivered to Robert de Lamhurst merchant £11 which a certain Henry de Jernemuta, then arrested and held in the town, had acknowledged to William that he had furtively stolen, we have pardoned William of any related legal action brought against him on our behalf by occasion of the aforesaid. Therefore we order you not to trouble or worry William in any way in your eyre because of this matter, but consider him to be acquitted thereof. Witnessed by myself at Bath, 3 January 1285."

[Illegal fishing]

Concerning those who fish etc. The following have fished using kiddles and "starkells", and are therefore to be amerced: Robert le Wal, Richard de Swyneshull, Walter Cha, Gervase the fisherman, William le Rene, Robert Vincent, Lambert the fisherman, William Vincent, John le Spencer, Thomas de Pylers, Roger Rokes, William de la Wyke, Alan the fisherman, his son William, Ralph Rolf, Walter de Beaumunde, Her[vey] le Bot, Adam le Bot, Hugh le Rokes, Thurstan de Merston, Geoffrey Bot, John Molendinarius of Stockgrave, William de Wyca, Richard Short, Nicholas Baron, Richard Doitby of Water Eaton, Richard Ops of the same, John Bankes of the same, Robert Chaunter of the same, Walter Cha of the same, Peter Overheye of Islip, Peter Segrym of the same, Richard Bere of the same, the Abbot of Osney, the Abbot of Rewley, the Preceptor of Cowley, and Henry Peyn of Binsey.

[Fugitives]

Concerning those who have been indicted: Nicholas de Haveringes has fled in relation to the death of Simon le Somonour; John de Maundevill tinker and his wife Agnes have fled in relation to several robberies; Richard de Durham tailor, John de Cestre manciple, and Thomas Sely of Thornham have fled in relation to the death of Master Nicholas de Langtost; Isaac de Canne and his wife Gongo, Jews, in relation to coin-clipping; Seyr de Caxton in relation to the death of William de Norffolk; Philip Hamond in relation to burglaries of houses; and Thomas Godale has fled in relation to the death of Richard de la Wyke. All are believed guilty and are to be outlawed. The possessions of Thomas Godale [are worth] 10s., for which the sheriff is to answer. Walter de Halywell, bailiff of Bogo de Clare, took those possessions without warrant; therefore he is to be amerced. Concerning the possessions of the Jews, an enquiry is to be made by Jews etc. Nicholas and the others had no possessions, nor were they in any ward, because outsiders or vagabonds.

[Defaults in appearing before the justices]

Concerning defaulters, they say that Master Henry Wade the queen's cook, John de Cane, Thomas de Durham, Philip le Waleys, Henry de Lond, Ralph de Muncy, Richard Swet of Brackley, and Elias son of Elias de Hertford did not come on the first day [due to appear]; therefore they are to be amerced.

[Quo warranto]

The jurors present that the Abbess of Godstow erected a watermill in the suburb of Oxford on the king's demesne, by what right they do not know.

The jurors present that the borough of Oxford was part of the ancient Crown demesne. Its lord, King Henry the elder, gave the borough with its suburbs to the burgesses of Oxford at fee farm, for the amount of £63.5d annually. Of which they have paid £40 a year to the king's Exchequer, and £23.5d to the brothers of St. Bartholomew outside the East Gate of Oxford; they say that nothing is in arrears etc.

Concerning their franchises, they say that the burgesses of Oxford claim to have return of writs and their estreats, and they hold pleas of withernam, and have a gallows, pillory and tumbrel, and administer the assizes of bread and ale.

The Prior of St. Frideswide has in Oxford an annual fair lasting 8 days from the feast of St. Frideswide; they do not know by what right. The prior appears by his attorney, who says that he and his predecessors were accustomed to hold such a fair from time immemorial. Notwithstanding which, he says, King John granted him by charter an annual fair in Oxford; he produces the king's charter, in which it says that the king granted the prior and his successors a fair in Oxford, without specifying on which date or for how long a duration. Yet he claims to hold the fair for an entire week – therefore he is to be subject to judgement.

Similarly, they say that the burgesses hold the borough of the king at fee farm, for £63.5d; of which they pay £40 annually into the king's Exchequer and £23.5d annually to the lepers of St. Bartholomew outside Oxford, levied by the hands of the burgesses etc., as per these words: "Because it is known to us, from an examination of the rolls of our Exchequer, that the leper hospital of St. Bartholomew outside Oxford ought by grant of our predecessors to receive and in the past has been accustomed to receive each year from the farm of our town of Oxford £19.15s.5d to support it, and 65s. in cloth by way of alms by our decree, we have granted to the lepers that they may have and receive annually from the farm the said £19.15s.5d for their support and 65s. in cloth, in the same way that they have been accustomed to have and receive it. In testimony to which, we have had drawn up these our letters patent. Witnessed etc., 51st year" [of our reign, i.e. 1267].

The jurors present that ten years ago Richard Everarde and Walter de Chawsey, bailiffs of Bogo de Clare, erected a new gallows in his manor of Holy Cross within the king's liberties of the suburbs of Oxford. By what right, they do not know. And a certain Thomas de Bensinton was caught in possession of a horse, taken to Bogo's court, and by judgement of the court was hanged from those gallows. Alice le Welsh was also hung from those gallows. The sheriff is therefore ordered to have Bogo and his bailiffs appear. Bogo comes and states that he holds his church by gift of King Henry, father of the present king, and that he discovered the church to possess these franchises; and that all his predecessors as parsons of that church had possession of the same from time immemorial. He requests an inquiry into this. The jurors, together with knights chosen for the purpose, say under oath that Bogo and all previous parsons of the church fully enjoyed such franchises. Therefore [\[the court decides that\]](#) they are to have their franchises, saving the rights of the king.

The chancellor of the university of Oxford produces a charter of King Henry, father of the present king, which says the following:

"Henry, by the grace of God King of England, Lord of Ireland and Duke of Aquitaine, to all his bailiffs and loyal subjects into whose hands these letters come, greetings. We have inspected letters patent formerly drawn up at Woodstock in the presence of the proctors of scholars of the university of Oxford and the burgesses of that town regarding franchises granted to the scholars in the following words. On 29 May 1248, in the presence at Woodstock of the proctors of scholars of the university and the burgesses of Oxford, the king grants to the scholars the following franchises: viz. that if the scholars suffer any injury, an inquisition is to be held by the neighbouring villages and by the burgesses. If the burgesses kill any of the Oxford scholars, or in any way assault them, or cause any kind of serious injury to them, the community of the town is to be punished and amerced for it; and the bailiffs (in their own right and not as part of the community) are to be punished and amerced for it, if they have been negligent, or have been duplicitous in executing their duties against those who have caused injury to the scholars. The Jews of Oxford may not take [\[as interest on a loan\]](#) more than 2d. per week per pound from the scholars, and a similar proportion for lesser sums, according to the amount; failing which the Jews are to be punished according to the law of the realm. And that whenever and as often as the mayor and bailiffs of Oxford take their oath of office in their communal place, the community of the town shall inform the chancellor, so that he or other persons chosen for that purpose may be present if they wish. Which oath shall include the following specification regarding the scholars, viz., that the mayor and bailiffs shall preserve the franchises and customs of the university; failing which, their oath is invalid and must be taken again, according to the form specified. If neither the chancellor nor his proctors wish to be present, the oath-taking is to proceed notwithstanding. As ordained by Dom. William de Eboraco, two aldermen are to be chosen and deputed, from those who shall be made for the time coming, to administer justice when the provosts are absent, under the same penalty as applies to the provosts, if they are found to behave negligently or with bad intent. Every burgess of Oxford is to be answerable for his household. So that if any member of his household kills or seriously injures any clerk or his [\[household members\]](#), that burgess is to report the wrongdoer, so that justice can be done to him; failing which let him be punished according to the law of the realm. Whenever an inspection of bread and ale is due to be undertaken by the burgesses, the chancellor and proctors of the university are to be informed the day before, so that they or (if they wish) others deputed by them may be present during the inspection; otherwise the inspection is invalid. If the chancellor and proctors of the university do not wish to be present, in person or by deputy, at the inspection, it is to proceed notwithstanding. In testimony to all of which things Sir Ralph fitz Nicholas, the king's steward, at the instructions of the king, has affixed his seal to this document; from the king by letters ordering the sheriff, and the mayor and bailiffs of Oxford, to uphold and make to be upheld these franchises, without violation; the which the king also had enrolled in the 33rd year of his reign [\[1248\]](#). We, however, approving the aforesaid grant of franchises made by us in the above terms to the scholars, by these our present letters patent grant and reaffirm to the scholars the document, to which we affix our seal. Witnessed by myself at Woodstock, 2 June 1268."

On the second day, the chancellor and scholars of the university produce another charter under the name of King Henry, which says the following:

"Henry, by the grace of God King of England, Lord of Ireland, Duke of Normandy and Aquitaine, and Count of Anjou, to all those into whose hands these letters come, greetings. Know that for the peace and tranquillity, as well as the utility, of the university of scholars of Oxford, we have provided for and granted that four aldermen are to be made in Oxford and eight of the more judicious and law-abiding burgesses of the town are to be associated with the aldermen. All of whom are to swear fealty to us and are to assist and advise the mayor and our bailiffs of Oxford in keeping our peace, administering the assizes in the town, investigating criminals, disturbers of our peace, those who roam at night, harbourers of thieves and wrongdoers, and are to take a corporal oath that they will undertake all such things. In each parish of the town of Oxford two men are to be elected from among the more law-abiding parishioners and are to take oath that every fortnight they will make enquiries diligently as to whether any suspicious persons are staying in the parish; if anyone has received another in his home for three nights, he is to take responsibility for him. Furthermore, no regrater may buy foodstuffs in the town of Oxford, nor outside if it is being brought to town. Nor is anyone to buy or re-sell before noon; and if he does, he is to be amerced and the item purchased is to be confiscated. If a layman causes serious or major injury to a clerk, he is to be arrested immediately; if the injury is great, he is to be imprisoned in Oxford castle and held there until the clerk is compensated – and this by arbitration of the chancellor and university of Oxford, if the clerk is incapacitated. If the injury is light or minor, he may be imprisoned in the town. If a clerk causes serious or major injury to a layman, he is to be imprisoned in the castle until the chancellor of the university lays claim to him; if the injury is light or minor, he may be imprisoned in the town until he can be bailed by the chancellor. Oxford bakers and brewers are not to be punished for their first offence [against the assize], but for the second are to have their bread [or ale] confiscated, and for the third offence are to be punished by the pillory. Each baker is to have a stamp for marking his bread, so that it can be known whose bread it is. Everyone of the town of Oxford who brews for retail purposes is to put out a sign, or face confiscation of the ale. Wines are to be sold in Oxford at the same price to clerks as to laymen, once the container has been broached. Inspections of bread are to be made twice a year; that is, within the fortnight following Michaelmas [29 September], and just before the feast of St. Mary in March [25 March]. The assize of ale is to be made during the same periods, based on the price of grain and malt. Whenever an inspection of bread and ale is to be made, the chancellor of the university may be present, or someone else deputed on his behalf, if when asked they wish to attend; if they are not present nor have been invited, the inspection is to be invalid. In testimony of which we have had these our letters patent drawn up for the university. Witnessed by myself at Woodstock, 18 June 1255. That which was formerly expressed above, referring to the four aldermen and eight more judicious and law-abiding burgesses of the town associated with the aldermen, swearing fealty to us in person and assisting and advising the mayor and bailiffs, in the way that it is expressed, we wish to be observed, except that the oath may be taken before someone whom we have assigned to substitute for us. In testimony of which we have had these our letters patent drawn up. Witnessed by myself at Westminster, 6 February 1262."

In addition, the chancellor and clerks produced another document, which says the following:

"Edward by the grace of God King of England, Lord of Ireland, Duke of Aquitaine and Count of Anjou, to the sheriff and to the mayor and his bailiffs of Oxford, greetings. Wishing the privileges granted by letters patent of our predecessor kings of England to our well-beloved chancellor and scholars of the university of Oxford to be observed without violation in each and every of their articles, insofar as they are applied within reason, we order you to uphold those privileges of the chancellor and scholars without any diminution, and by all means at your disposal to have them upheld in the form aforesaid, without any diminution. In testimony of which, we have had drawn up these our letters patent, to be in force during our pleasure. Witnessed by myself at Westminster, 4 November 1275."

They also produced another charter from the same king, which says the following:

"Edward by the grace of God etc. to our well-beloved in Christ Master Roger de Rodwell, chancellor of the university of Oxford, greetings. There coming before us at York the proctors of the university of the town and certain others representing the mayor and burgesses of that town, to set out fully and make known to ourself and our council the reasons for disagreements and disputes that have arisen between you and the mayor and burgesses, we have decreed that: Robert de Welles and his fellow burgesses of the town should be absolved without delay from the sentence of excommunication placed over them; implementation of punishment imposed on them for their deeds should be deferred until our next parliament; items offered for sale by regraters and forestallers, in breach of the franchises of the university, and confiscated by the common sergeants of the university and/or the town, to whom it has previously fallen to take care of forfeitures of this kind, continue to be brought by both parties to our Hospital of St. John and to the East Gate, and distributed among the poor and the infirm there, so that they not be of benefit to either party. In other matters relevant in any way to the disagreements and disputes between you and them, matters are to remain as status quo. Until, after taking advice, we have reached another decision for a settlement between you, you are to behave in such a manner towards the mayor, burgesses and other officers of the town, in those things affecting maintenance of our peace there, that they shall have no cause for complaint. And we have written the same to them, clearly and explicitly. Witnessed by myself at York, 10 January 1284."

The chancellor and university of Oxford lay a complaint in this regard that the mayor of Oxford, the bailiffs and the burgesses wilfully take for each salmon sold a quarter of it, to the serious damage of the whole university and the region. The accused come and are asked by what right they make that prise. They reply that the mayor and bailiffs have always taken such prises, and present nothing else in support. Seeing that prises of this sort are injurious and damaging to the university and the whole region, they are prohibited from taking in any way that kind of prise henceforth.

The Oxford suburb outside the North Gate comes by twelve [jurors]

They report that these were the coroners since the last eyre: G. de Preston and Nicholas Erneborgh, who have died, Henry fitz Milo, William de Brompton, Robert de Brackele, and Elyas le Quilter, who are now in office.

Hugh de Bolre and William de Lundon were arrested on suspicion of theft outside the North Gate and taken to Headington where they were imprisoned. A crowd of Oxford clerks came there armed and in force and broke Hugh free; it was not possible to find out their names.

William remained in prison, in the custody of Elias de Beckleburg, then bailiff of Bullingdon (now dead), who permitted William to leave. Hugh de Bolre and William have [now] disappeared, and are believed guilty. Therefore they are to be outlawed; their possessions [are worth] £11.6.8d, due Hugh from work for Hugh de Plesetis, for which Hugh is to answer. The sheriffs is ordered to have that money levied from Hugh.

John fitz Botte and Robert de Brackele fought with one another outside the North Gate, with the outcome that John stabbed Robert in the belly with a knife, leaving the knife fixed in Robert's flesh. Robert at once removed the knife and stabbed John in the belly, so that both straightaway died together. The first finder comes and is not a suspect; and the parish that first etc.

John Aleyn of Norton was on a previous occasion indicted here before justices of the eyre for the death of his father; he was arrested and taken to the town of Chipping Norton, to be escorted to the Oxford prison. But when he was passing by the church of St. Mary Magdalene he escaped from his captors' hands; therefore the town of Chipping Norton is subject to judgement. John confessed that he had killed his father, and abjured the realm before the coroner. He had no possessions, nor was he in tithing.

Simon de Wanetynge was condemned by the justices of gaol delivery to be hanged. While being taken to the gallows, clerks of the university of Oxford – their names not known – by force [rescued him and] put him in St. Giles church. He confessed to the coroner of having committed multiple thefts. Nothing is known of his possessions.

William Wodecok killed John de Cogesham in the suburb of Oxford and fled immediately; he is believed guilty. Therefore he is to be outlawed; he had no possessions. Hue was raised but the suburb failed to pursue him, even though this took place in daylight, therefore it is to be amerced. Alan le Taylor the first finder came and has been hanged, as appears in the roll of gaol delivery. His possessions [are worth] 4s.8d, for which the sheriff is to answer.

William son of Jordan de Ginton and his brother John were imprisoned in the castle gaol, in the custody of Nicholas de Oyfrewast. They escaped from his custody, put themselves in St. Mary Magdalene church, and abjured the realm before the coroner. They had no possessions. Because the aforesaid Nicholas, the sheriff, died before being condemned for the escape, sentencing for the escape is pending. Later, the king's Council in parliament decided that, in the circumstances, the sentence for the escape should fall upon Nicholas' executors; therefore they are to be answerable for the escape.

A certain Henry de Makworth together with other wrongdoers unknown, that is with Thomas de Sancto David, David Furlong, William Ousyn, Roger le Fletcher, William de Blithe, and Henry de Staumford, came to the house of Ivo de Hackebourn and burgled it. They carried off goods and possessions found there, and at once fled. They are believed guilty, therefore they are to be outlawed. Possessions of Henry de Staumford [are worth] 16s., for which the sheriff is to answer; Henry and the others had no possessions, because they are clerks.

Thomas de Staunford clerk killed Isabelle de Maydenwell, was immediately arrested, convicted before the justices of gaol delivery, and handed over to the bishop. He had no possessions. The first finder comes and is not a suspect.

Walter de Calueton, John de Nesse, Hugh de Nesse, Richard Corbet, Thomas de Betton, Henry de Hodenet, John de Estlegh, Hugh de Canz, and Walter de Botillier encountering Walter Cissor, an argument arose between them. Walter de Calueton killed Walter Cissor and immediately fled; he is believed guilty and therefore is to be outlawed. He had no possessions. John de Nesse and all the others were arrested and imprisoned in Oxford castle; they were acquitted by jury before the justices of gaol delivery.

Henry Somm of Stokes Island was condemned to be hung. While he was being led to the gallows, there came Robert de Tursway and other clerks unknown; they rescued Henry and took him to St. Giles church, from where he abjured the realm before the coroner. He had no possessions. The jurors consider Robert, who has made himself scarce, guilty; he is therefore to be outlawed. He had no possessions.

Roger de Verdun killed Thomas de Suplet in the house of William le Saucer and at once fled. He is believed guilty, therefore he is to be outlawed. He had no possessions. The first finder comes and is not a suspect. Henry fitz Milo, William de Brampton, Robert de Brackele and Elias le Quilter, the coroners, did not attach those who were present in the house, therefore they are to be amerced. Afterwards, it was testified that Roger did have possessions, that is, 6d worth, for which the sheriff is to answer.

Robert de Pennoby and John de Ardern put themselves in St. Giles church. Robert confessed to having committed multiple thefts and he abjured the realm before the coroner; he had no possessions. John came out of the church and surrendered to the king's peace; he was imprisoned in the Oxford gaol and before the justices of gaol delivery he was handed over by the sheriff to the bishop, as one convicted. His lay possessions [\[are worth\]](#) 2s., for which Thomas de Sancto Quintino formerly the vicar of St Giles is to answer – and because he took those possessions without permission, he is to be amerced.

William de Prene was killed opposite St. Mary Magdalene church by a certain Isaac son of Isaac de Polet, Jew. The first finder comes and is not a suspect. Isaac was captured and put in the king's prison at Leeds [\[castle\]](#) in Kent. Afterwards he comes and is in the sheriff's prison in Oxford.

The jurors present that a certain plot of land lying between the land of Simon le Bere and the land of Paul de Credynton is an escheat to the king, in consequence of the death of the Jew James de Lundon. It is worth 2s. a year. Another vacant plot of land lying between the land of Robert de Barton on either side, and worth 12d. a year, is an escheat to the king in consequence of the death of Richard de Cunford, by judgement of the court called Shortford. Similarly, another vacant plot that is an escheat to the king is in Stockwell Street, in St. Mary Magdalene parish, and is worth 12d. a year.

Concerning encroachments, they say that Gilbert le Marescal erected a farrier's post in the highway in St. Giles parish. Peter the smith similarly has a post next to the cemetery of St. Mary Magdalene in the highway. No rents are being paid on these to the king. They also say that a certain stream used to run through the middle of Richard de Haleston's cellar, but Richard has blocked the channel through which the water took its course, to the nuisance of all the neighbours living around there. Richard has died and Nicholas his son now has control of the channel. The sheriff is ordered to have it unblocked at Nicholas' cost, and whatever is a nuisance etc.. As for the posts etc., the sheriff is ordered to have Gilbert and Peter appear. Subsequently, Gilbert and Peter came and requested permission to rent the posts for 12d. a year, with which [i.e. collection] Henry de Dymmok bailiff is to be charged.

The jurors present that a certain cookshop has been built in the highway, next to St. Mary Magdalene cemetery, which is not a nuisance to anyone. William the cook is the present tenant of the cookshop, rented from the king for 6d. a year, for which the sheriff answers at the king's Exchequer.

The jurors present that Henry fitz Milo took money to remove jurors from juries and assizes; he is therefore to be amerced.

Concerning withdrawals, the jurors say that the chancellor of the university holds a house in Horsemonger Street which used to provide the king with 12½d. in rent, regarding which he was accustomed to make suit at [the court of] the king's hundred outside the North Gate of Oxford [held] every three weeks, until he withdrew the rent and the suit, to the damage of the king in 16d. a year etc. Similarly, John Eu held etc. (refer here to what is in the next section). The sheriff is ordered to have the chancellor appear. Subsequently Master William Pickerel chancellor of Oxford came with the proctors of the university. He says that he found that the house and rent belonged to the university; the jurors testify the same. Therefore the king may have his writ against them, if he wishes. And William de Gyselham is told that he sues etc. that he makes suit against them etc.

Similarly, John de Eu holds a tenement outside the North Gate from which the king is accustomed to receive 23d. a year, until the last six months when the Master of Balliol College withdrew payment of the rent. He comes and cannot deny that the king received the rent until the Master withheld it. Therefore the 23d. annual rent is to be restored to the king, and the Master is to be amerced. The sheriff is ordered to have the chancellor appear. Subsequently Master William Pickerel came etc. as is referred to above.

The jurors present that this hundred is the king's hundred and is worth £30 a year. Of which William Byset receives £10 a year. He being present says that the hundred was at one time within the jurisdiction of one of his ancestors, John Byset, who died seised of it. After his death, all the lands, tenements, rents and possessions were divided proportionately among his heirs. So that the £10 assigned him from this hundred belonged to his mother, who was one of the heirs of John Byset, and whose heir he is. He asks for an enquiry to confirm this; and the twelve jurors testify to the same.

John de Prene, brother of William de Prene, accuses Isaac son of Isaac de Polet of killing his brother William. The court is informed that on 29 May 1284 at vespers William was on the highway outside the North Gate, opposite the cemetery of St. Mary Magdalene, 12 feet from the wall on the east side of the cemetery, behaving peaceably, when Isaac came with felonious and premeditated intent and assaulted him. He struck him with a sword made of Cologne iron and steel, one yard long and 4 inches wide; he stabbed him under his right breast, three inches from the breast, and made a wound 4 inches wide that went as deep as the heart, of which William immediately died, in John's presence. This he did to him wickedly and feloniously, with intent to cause harm, and this John is prepared to prove by his body or in any way the court chooses. John also accuses Rebecca, wife of Isaac, of sending her husband Isaac to commit the felony on the stated day, year and hour, and of abetting in the felony; and this he is prepared to prove against her, as a man against a woman etc. Rebecca came but made no answer to the accusation.

Simon de Prene accuses the same Isaac of the death of his son William. He states that when William was behaving peaceably, at the said time and in the said place, Isaac feloniously and premeditatedly assaulted William, struck him with a sword, gave him a wound below his right breast, of which he died in the presence of Simon, his father. That he did this wickedly and feloniously, with intent to cause harm, he is prepared to prove as Christian against Jew or in any way the court chooses. He also accuses Rebecca of inciting, encouraging, and assisting, as above etc. Isaac and Rebecca came but made no answer, nor said anything about [the accusation], except as above etc. John and Simon request judgement be given on those whom they have accused of homicide, appropriate to the charge and to a felony committed in breach of the king's peace. And they [i.e. the accused] make no answer, nor say anything, except that they do not wish to respond nor to submit themselves to a jury. Since they do not offer any kind of explicit defence, they [i.e. the plaintiffs?] request judgement be given on them as if they were undefended. Because Geoffrey de Pycheford, one of the justices, was not present, they were returned to gaol until 18 February. On which day he [Isaac] comes and, asked if he has anything further he wishes to say, he says that he is not guilty, and asks that an enquiry be made by Christians and Jews of London. John and Symon request judgement be given on him on the grounds he had already left the court as undefended; if he is now to be allowed to have recourse to entering a plea etc. or to submitting himself to a jury. Because Roger Loveday, one of the justices, is alone on the bench, since Richard de Boyland and Geoffrey de Pycheford had previously withdrawn, therefore Isaac is returned to gaol until other arrangements can be made for him.

John de Blekkel, an informer who has been hanged, accused Roger de Barton clerk of keeping company with thieves. So that, through his accusation, he [i.e. Roger] was arrested, [tried] before the justices for gaol delivery etc., and hanged. His possessions [are worth] 103s., which Master Roger de Rodwell former chancellor of the university of Oxford has received.

Concerning those indicted, they say that Adam de Irreis and Simon his son have disappeared in regard to burglary and harbouring thieves, and Walter Peny in regard to robberies and burglary of houses. All are believed guilty, therefore they are to be outlawed; they have no possessions.

Philip Campion was arrested for stealing grain and other thefts. He comes and denies committing theft; for better or worse, he submits himself to a jury. The jurors say under oath that he is not guilty of any crime. Therefore he is acquitted.

These are at present in the office of coroner in the suburbs of Oxford: Nicholas de Gersyndon and William de Ernesby. The borough of Oxford: Nicholas de Kyngeston mayor, sworn; John Culverd, Thomas Sowey, chief bailiffs, sworn. Jurors: Nicholas le Orfevre, Ralph le Plomer, Henry de Gamage, John de Eu, Martin le Samplarer, John de Arderne, Hugh le Parmenter, Philip de Eu. Electors: Henry Oweyn, William de Wotesdon, Andrew de Pirye, John With. The borough outside the North Gate of Oxford: Henry de Dymmok. Jurors: William de Ernesby, Nicholas Rodeplante, John de Dodeford, John Brun, William le Long, Richard de Wolgaricote, William de Stokes, Adam le Wylde, Paul de Credinton, Nicholas de Gersyndon, Hugh de Mersh, Robert de Baron.

[Civil] pleas involving juries and assizes of the town of Oxford

John son of John de Lundon, who brought a writ concerning an annual rent of 18d. against Thomas Billyng, has not prosecuted. Therefore he and his pledges for prosecution (that is, Walter Persone and John Aynho) are to be amerced.

Adam le Mazoun of Oxford and his wife Isabella claim from Henry son of John le Gamage a tenement with appurtenances in the suburbs of Oxford, as the right and inheritance of Isabella. Into which Henry obtained entry only through Henry le Gamage, who thereby unjustly and without any judicial decision dispossessed Helena, the widow of William Scharppe and mother of Isabella, whose heir she is, after the first etc. Henry comes and says that Adam and Isabella can claim no rights in that tenement because, he says, Isabella wife of Adam, when a widow, freely quitclaimed to Henry and his heirs all her rights and claim that she had or could have in that tenement. He produces the quitclaim that evidences this and requests judgement be given etc. Adam and Isabella fully acknowledge that Isabella had, at an earlier time, made that document, but they say that the document ought not hinder them from bringing their action. For, they say, at the time when Isabella made the document she was in Oxford's prison, and made the document under forceful coercion. That this was the case, they ask to be enquired into by a jury. Henry states that Isabella made the quitclaim to him of her own free will, while she was single, by herself, uncoerced, and not in any kind of prison. Therefore it is decided that the case against Henry be dismissed, and Adam and Isabella are to be amerced.

Hugh Karry claims from Thomas Lusewys and his wife Alice a tenement with appurtenances in Oxford, into which Alice obtained entry only through Matilda Cary, Hugh's kinswoman, whose heir he is, who leased it while Matilda was underage etc. Thomas and Alice came and fully acknowledged that Alice obtained entry into the tenement through Matilda Cary, but they say that at the time Matilda leased the tenement to Alice she was of the age of majority according to the usage and customs of Oxford. That this was the case, they submit themselves to a jury; Hugh does likewise, therefore a jury is to be convened. The jurors say under oath that Matilda, at the time she leased the tenement to Alice, was of full age according to Oxford custom, she being 15 years old. Therefore it is decided that the case against Thomas and Alice be dismissed, and Hugh is to be amerced (he was pardoned by the justices).

Richard de la Hide acknowledged that he owes Henry le Mareschall of Guildford £8, which he must repay at Michaelmas this year. He agreed that, unless he does so, the sheriff may recover it from lands and possessions. Afterwards he found pledges – that is, Simon fitz Guydo, William de Wodecote, and Nicholas de Brudicote – who are present and acknowledge themselves to be principally answerable for the debt. They acknowledge that, if Richard does not pay Henry the money within the prescribed period, that the sheriff may recover it from their lands and possessions etc.

Thomas de Orliens and his wife Alice give 6s.8d for licence to reach a settlement with Henry Oweyn concerning an action over real estate; they have an eyre.

Geoffrey le Carpenter claims from Stephen de Perham a tenement with appurtenances in Oxford as his right etc., into which Stephen obtained access only through Master Peter de Abyndon, who leased it to him and thereby unjustly etc. dispossessed Geoffrey after the first etc. Stephen comes and cannot deny the fact that Master Peter dispossessed Geoffrey. Therefore it is decided that Geoffrey may recover possession, and Stephen is to be amerced.

William de Wodestok, who brought a writ of prohibition of attachments against Master Richard de Sancta Frideswyda, official of the Archdeacon of Lincoln, has not prosecuted. Therefore he and his pledges for prosecution (that is, Richard de Cantuaria and Thomas Feteplace) are to be amerced.

Walter Feteplace was attached to answer a plea brought by Richard de Cantuaria and his wife Amy, regarding why he assaulted Amy at Oxford, beated and ill-treat her, took and carried off goods and possessions worth £36.13s.4d that he found there, belonging to Richard and Amy, and inflicted other enormities upon them, to the damage of Richard and Amy and in breach of the peace etc. In regard to which the complaint is laid that when they were staying in the town of Oxford, in a certain house in which they had there goods and possessions worth £36.13s.4d, Walter came to the house on 23 August 1276 and, finding Amy there, assaulted and beat her, and took and carried off the goods of Richard and Amy found in the house; that is: wines worth £16.10s., vinegar worth £2.13s.4d, hay worth £7.6s.8d, wood worth 100s., an iron-banded barrel worth 6s., felt cloth, a coverlet and other goods and utensils worth £4.13s.4d. And he inflicted other enormities upon them. As a result of which, they say, they have suffered losses and damages in the amount of £66.13s.4d., and for that reason they have brought this action etc. Walter comes and denies the force and injury at any time etc. He states that Richard and Amice were renting the house from him for £6 a year, and that one year's rent was in arrears to him. For that reason, Richard and Amy cleared out and removed their goods and possessions from that house, to prevent them being distraigned upon for the arrears. He says that when he learned about this, he came to the house and distraigned on Richard and Amy by one tun of wine, for the arrears, and that he committed no other offence against them, nor inflicted any enormity upon them. He submits his case to a jury; Richard and Amy do likewise. Therefore a jury is to be convened. The jurors chosen by agreement of the parties say under oath that the facts are that Richard and Amy were renting a house in Oxford from Walter for £6 a year, and that Richard and Amy were in arrears for the annual rent. As a result of which, Walter came to the house on the date mentioned, found Amy there, and demanded that she give him immediately the £6 which were owing for the rent of the house, otherwise he would evict Richard and Amy with all the goods and possessions in the house. Because Walter did not receive immediate satisfaction for the £6, he straightaway took Amy by the shoulders – and her children likewise – and threw them out of the house, and he beat Amy and violently mistreated her; and he took and carried off goods and possessions of Richard and Amy to the value of £10. Asked if Richard and Amy owed Walter £6 from [the rent of] the house, they say no, only £1. Therefore it is decided that Richard and Amy may recover the £10 from Walter, together with damages which are assessed by the justices at £10.

Andrew de Harecourt, Richard de Elfynton, and John de Heldelesley each individually acknowledged that he owes to Queen Eleanor, the king's mother, 100s. which he is to repay within a fortnight of Michaelmas this year. He agreed that, unless he does so, the sheriff may recover it from lands and possessions etc.

Claremunda the widow of Henry Whirll claims from Thomas Feteplace one-third of a tenement with appurtenances in North Osney next to Oxford, as dower right in regard to her late husband Henry etc. Thomas comes and says that Claremunda ought not to have any dower right therein, because Henry the late husband of Claremunda never had possession of the tenement as his property in a way that would allow her dower right. That this is the case, he submits himself to a jury; and Claremunda likewise. Therefore a jury is to be convened. On the fourth day afterwards, Claremunda appeared in court to prosecute against Thomas, but he did not come. Therefore the sheriff is ordered to take the third part [of the tenement] into the king's hand and to summon Thomas to be here tomorrow to hear their judgement etc.

Alice widow of Richard de Ebsofend claims from Walter de Witney one-half of a cellar and a solar with appurtenances in Oxford, as is her right etc. through a gift from Walter le Goldsmyth, who gave possession thereof to her and her first husband, William atte Montes, and to which Walter [de Witney] obtained entry only through Richard, Alice's late husband, leasing it to him – which she could not forbid while he was alive. Walter comes and denies her right therein etc., saying that Alice can claim no right in the tenement as a result of Walter le Goldsmyth's gift, because it was her husband who thereby acquired rights therein. Consequently, he says, Alice never had any [rights] in it, except through her husband William who had the rights in that tenement. That this is the case, he submits himself to a jury; and Alice likewise. Therefore a jury is to be convened. The jurors chosen by agreement of the parties say under oath that the tenement was the right and acquisition of William, her late first husband, in the absence of Alice having been given [explicit] joint possession with him therein. Therefore it is decided that the case against Walter be dismissed; Alice is to receive nothing through her writ, but is to be amerced for making a false claim.

Roger son of Stephen Bodyn claims from Mary, widow of Geoffrey le Orfevre, via a writ of right, 4 tenements with appurtenances in the suburbs of Oxford, as his right.

Adam Gray of Banbury gives 6s.8d for licence to reach a settlement with Henry de Dene and his wife Alice, concerning an action over real estate; they have an eyre.

Ralph Bodyn claims from John le Luminour and his wife Alice a tenement with appurtenances in the suburbs of Oxford as his right etc., in which John and Alice obtained entry only through Alan Tele, who leased it to them, thereby unjustly etc. dispossessing Robert Bodyn, Ralph's father, whose heir he is, after etc. John and Alice come and fully acknowledge having obtained entry in the tenement through Alan Tele, but they say that Alan did not dispossess Ralph's father Robert thereof, because Alan had entry into the same by renting it from Robert, not by dispossessing him. That this is the case, they submit themselves to a jury, and Ralph likewise. Therefore a jury is to be convened. Afterwards Ralph requests, and obtains, licence to withdraw his writ.

Adam Londyne was summoned to respond to the plea of Matilda, widow of Philip de Leycestre, that he pay her £9.6s.8d, which he owes her as arrears of rent of 26s.8d annually. In that regard she complains that although Adam is obligated, via a written commitment, to Matilda for an annual rent – paying 6s.8d each at Michaelmas [29 September], the Nativity of St. John Baptist [24 June], and Christmas [25 December], and so on from year to year at the same dates throughout Matilda's lifetime – Adam has withheld the annual rent for the last seven years and continues to withhold it, so that she has suffered losses and damages in the amount of £13.6s.8d; and for that reason she has brought this action etc. Adam comes and they reach a settlement; Matilda give 13s.4d for licence to settle the plea against Adam. It is settled in this way: Adam acknowledges that he owes Matilda the annual rent and will henceforth pay it to her at the agreed dates; on that understanding, Matilda releases him from the arrears and damages.

John de Morshe was summoned to respond to the plea of John de Insula that he pay him £3.15s.6d, which he owes him but unjustly withholds. In that regard he complains that on 10 September 1284 he handed over to a certain Walter de la Morshe his possessions, to the value of the stated debt, and John de Morshe became a pledge for Walter to repay him the debt, through John de la Morshe, at Michaelmas following. But John de Morshe has always withheld repayment and continues to do so, as a result of which he says he has suffered losses and damages in the amount of 100s.; and for that reason he has brought this action. John de Morsh comes and denies force and injury etc. and denies completely that he ever became the pledge of Walter regarding that debt; this he is prepared to defend against him and his suit, by whatever means the court decides.

Therefore it is decided that he shall wage his law in regard to the £8, and may come with his law tomorrow; pledges for doing his law: William de Grandone and Adam de Kingesham. Afterwards, John [de Morshe] performed his law, and the case against him was dismissed. John de Insula is to receive nothing through his writ, but is to be amerced for making a false claim in his plea. Also to be amerced: Henry de Tynesham and Walter Feteplace [pledges for prosecution].

John son of Nicholas Hedrich who, it is said, is of the age of majority claims from Peter de Lokyng a tenement with appurtenances in Oxford as his right etc., which John leased to him while he was underage. Peter comes and denies his right, when etc. and he says that when John leased him the tenement John was of the age of majority according to the custom of the town of Oxford, and not underage. That this is the case, he submits himself to a jury; and John likewise. Therefore let a jury be convened. The jurors say under oath that John was 15 years old when he leased the tenement to Peter, the age of majority according to custom of the town of Oxford, and not underage. Therefore it is decided that the case against Peter be dismissed, and John [is to receive] nothing through his writ, but is to be amerced for making a false claim.

The king sent order to his itinerant justices by his writ in the following words: "Edward by the grace of God etc. to his justices next travelling through the county of Oxfordshire, greetings. Because our well-beloved in Christ the Abbot and Convent of Abingdon claim, by reason of charters of our predecessors formerly kings of England, to have certain franchises for themselves and their men of Culham, which franchises in every judicial eyre previously held in the county, so they claim, have been applied and enjoyed, we order you to allow the abbot and his men to have, apply and enjoy their franchises before you, to the same extent that they were reasonably applied and enjoyed in previous eyres in the county. Witnessed etc."

Roger son of John Owyn of Boxore claims from Henry Gamage and his wife Beatrice a tenement and a mill with appurtenances in Oxford as his right etc., into which Henry and Beatrice obtained entry only through Walter le Monner, to whom Emma de Boxore, Roger's grandmother, whose heir he is, leased it to Walter for the term of his life, with reversion [thereafter] to Roger. Henry and Beatrice come and say that they are not the tenants of the entire tenement sought from them, because John Culverd and his wife Christine are tenants of part of the property, and were tenants on the day when the writ was issued (that is, 3 January of this year). That this is the case, they submit themselves to a jury; and Roger likewise. Therefore a jury is to be convened. The jurors chosen by agreement of the parties say under oath that Henry and Beatrice are not tenants of the entire tenement that Roger is seeking against them, nor were they tenants on the day the writ was issued. Therefore it is decided that the case against Henry and Beatrice be dismissed, and Roger is to receive nothing through his writ, but is to be amerced for making a false claim.

Walter Feteplace was summoned to respond to the plea of Richard de Chalgrave that he be held to a contract made between Hugh de Chalgrave, father of Richard, whose heir he is, and Walter regarding a tenement with appurtenances in Oxford. Regarding which he complains that Walter leased to Hugh the father of Richard, whose heir he is, the tenement with appurtenances on 29 September 1278, to be held by himself and his heirs for the full 10 years following. Hugh was in possession thereof for barely a month when Walter evicted Hugh from the tenement, as a result of which he says he has suffered losses and damages in the amount of 100s.; and for that reason he has brought this action. He produces a document under Walter's name which evidences the lease. Walter comes and fully acknowledges as his the document and what it contains, but says that he never evicted Hugh from the tenement, nor ever acted contrary to the contract. That this is the case, he submits himself to a jury; and Richard likewise. Therefore a jury is to be convened. The jurors chosen by agreement of the parties say under oath that Walter did not evict Hugh from the tenement and that Richard is now the tenant under the contract, and that he [i.e. Walter] never acted against that contract. Therefore it is decided that the case against Walter be dismissed, and Richard is to receive nothing through his writ, but is to be amerced for making a false claim (pardoned by the justices because he is underage).

Elias le Quilter was summoned to respond to the plea of Master Ralph de Hadham that he be held to a contract made between them concerning a tenement with appurtenances in Oxford. Regarding which, he complains that Elias, on 11 August 1284, leased to Master Ralph a messuage with appurtenances in Oxford for Elias' lifetime, paying for it whatever was required by taxations of the town of Oxford. Ralph was in possession of the same for one month under the contract when Elias evicted him and denied making the contract; as a result of which he says he has suffered losses and damages in the amount of £10; and for that reason he has brought this action. Elias comes and fully acknowledges the contract, allowing Ralph to have the house during the lifetime of Master Elias, in return for paying each year whatever was required by taxations of the town of Oxford. Upon this comes forward a certain Philip, son and heir of a certain Oliver who had rights in the house. He states that his father Oliver died in possession of the tenement, as part of his lordship and property; after whose death he himself entered into the tenement, as his right and inheritance, and always remained in possession of it, and still is. Philip requests that no contract be made between Elias and Master Ralph that will disinherit him. Master Ralph states that Elias le Quilter, on the day he leased him the tenement, was himself in possession of that tenement, as a freeholding, and requests that an inquiry be made into this by a jury. The jurors say under oath that Oliver, Philip's father, died in possession of the tenement and, they say, in his last will he left the tenement to Margery the wife of Elias for Margery's lifetime. They say that after Elias and Margery took possession of the tenement through the legacy, Elias made a contract with Master Ralph concerning the tenement. Therefore it is decided that Elias may be held to the contract (as specified above) with Ralph, and the sheriff is ordered to ensure Ralph is given possession.

John son of Nicholas Hedrich claims from Richard le Barbur and his wife Mary a shop with appurtenances in Oxford, into which Richard and Maria obtained entry only through Robert de Flecham, parson of St. Mary's Oxford, to whom Peter de Kyllin[gworth?] leased it, thereby unjustly and without any judicial decision dispossessing John thereafter etc. Richard and Mary come and call on Robert de Flecham to warrant [their right]. He comes upon summons and [says that] he warranted to him [Richard? John?] and rented the shop to John. Therefore it is decided that John may recover possession from Richard and Mary, who may have compensation from the property of Robert, and Robert is to be amerced.

Master Ralph le Taillour of Oxford was summoned to respond to [the plea of] Richard de Cantuaria that he pay him 100s. that he owes him and unjustly withholds. Regarding which, he complains that on 1 August 1272 in Oxford he handed over to him in coin and other goods, and in food and drink, items worth the said amount, by a certain tally which he made him [and] which he produces as evidence of the matter; Master Ralph was due to pay him the money on 1 November following, [but] Master Ralph always withholds the money and refuses to repay, to Richard's damage in the amount of 100s.; and for that reason he has brought this action. Ralph comes and fully acknowledges the debt and that he made the tally. Therefore it is decided that Richard may recover the debt of 100s. from Ralph along with damages which are assessed at 40s., and Ralph is to be amerced etc. Damages, 40s.

Alice widow of William atte Montes claims from Walter de Witney and John atte Montes one-third of a tenement with appurtenances in Oxford, as dower etc. Walter and John come and they say that Alice, after the death of William her late husband, was in possession of that messuage under name of free bench and was thereby in possession for over 40 days. They say that the custom of the town of Oxford is such that when any wife after the death of her husband shall continue in possession of any tenement, under name of free bench, for 40 days or more and afterwards remarries, that she shall forever after be excluded from seeking the said tenement by an action of dower, and [on these grounds] they request a judgement. Alice says that she never had any [possession] of the tenement under name of free bench, except by way of nurturing Robert, the son and heir of her late husband William. That this is the case, she submits herself to a jury; and John and Walter likewise. Therefore a jury is to be convened. (And Simon Balle and John de Hastings pledges did not come, therefore they are to be amerced). The jurors say under oath that the custom of the town is such that when any wife has possession for 40 days of any tenement previously her husband's, under name of free bench, and afterwards remarries, that under no circumstances may she have dower right in that tenement. They say that Alice had possession of the tenement for 40 days after the death of her husband, by claiming her free bench therein. Therefore it is decided that the case against Walter and John be dismissed, and Alice is to be amerced.

Alice widow of Robert Bodyn claims from John le Luminour et his wife Alice one-third of a tenement with appurtenances in the suburbs of Oxford, and from the Prior of St. Frideswide in Oxford one-third of a tenement with appurtenances in that town, as dower etc. John and the Prior come and the Prior, by licence [of the court], concedes her dower right, therefore she may have possession thereof etc. As for John and Alice and the third part claimed from them, they say that she ought not have dower therein because, they say, Alice's late husband Robert, from the day on which she married him never had possession of that tenement as part of his property so that she could have dower therein. That this is the case, they submit themselves to a jury; and Alice likewise. Therefore a jury is to be convened. The jurors say under oath that the tenement belonged to Alan Tele, who sold it to Robert the late husband of Alice and put him in possession of it. Robert had possession of it for 6 years and, pulling down its walls, carried off and sold the building stones and timbers; after the 6 years had ended, Robert returned th tenement to Alan as his right, and Alan afterwards sold it to John and Alice. And because the jury finds that Robert the late husband of Alice was in possession of the tenement as part of his property on the day when he married her, it is decided that Alice may recover her possession thereof; and John le Luminour and his wife Alice are to be amerced.

Adam Londyn was summoned to reply to the plea of Matilda widow of Philip de Leycestre that he give her £22 which he owes her and goods to the value of £16.10s. which he unjustly withholds from her. Regarding which, she says that on 29 September 1274 Adam received £6 from the Friars Preacher of Oxford, in Matilda's name; at the same time Adam was obligated to her in the sum of £14.13s.8d for the hire of a house which Matilda has rented Adam for the term of her life. Similarly, he had from her other possessions which belonged to Matilda as a legacy from her late husband Philip, to the value of £22, and to the present day he detains those and russet and other cloths to the value of £16.10s., which he should have paid her the Michaelmas following. Adam withholds the debt up to the present and refuses to repay her, so that she has suffered losses and damages in the amount of £40; and for that reason she has brought this action. Adam comes. Afterwards they reach a settlement, and Matilda gives 13s.4d for licence to settle on security [given] by Adam. It is settled in this way: Matilda forgives Adam all the aforesaid debts and goods, in return for which Adam acknowledges and concedes to Matilda 13s.4d annually, received from the lands and tenements he now holds in the town of Oxford, [payable] at the 4 terms of the year in equal portions. And he concedes that, as often as this rent shall be in arrears, that the sheriff then in office may recover the rent from his tenements.

John son of John de Lundon claims from Alice daughter of Nicholas de Kyngeston a tenement with appurtenances in Oxford, into which Alice obtained entry only through Nicholas de Coleshull, to whom John leased it for a period which has expired. Alice comes and states that she did not obtain entry into the tenement from Nicholas but, on the contrary, from John. That this is the case, she submits herself to a jury; and John likewise. Therefore a jury is to be convened. The jurors chosen by agreement of the parties say under oath that Alice obtained entry into the tenement from John, not from Nicholas. Therefore it is decided that the case against Alice be dismissed and John is to receive nothing through his writ, but is to be amerced for making a false claim (pardoned by the justices).

The end.

DISCUSSION

The eyres were, in a sense and by this date, as much an enquiry into legal administration as into crimes. Part of the role of coroners was to act as the local officers servicing the eyre, in terms of investigating crimes when they happened, recording what they discovered, and apprehending suspects (where possible) for presentation before the king's justices when they next came to the locality.

The other side of that coin is that eyres were to ensure the king received the revenues due him both from crimes (notably confiscation of the possessions of convicts and outlaws) and from the fines assessed on those who had failed in their duty or who were considered to have wasted the court's time with false accusations. It will be noted that most of the "punishments" meted out by the eyre justices bore no direct relation to the crimes reported (many of which were not just past history but distant history). They instead were fines on communities or individuals who were judged to have neglected to do their legal duty. For example, wards or tithings were amerced in the cases of criminals who had evaded arrest; the amercement was because the ward or tithing had primary responsibility for submitting any errant members to justice.

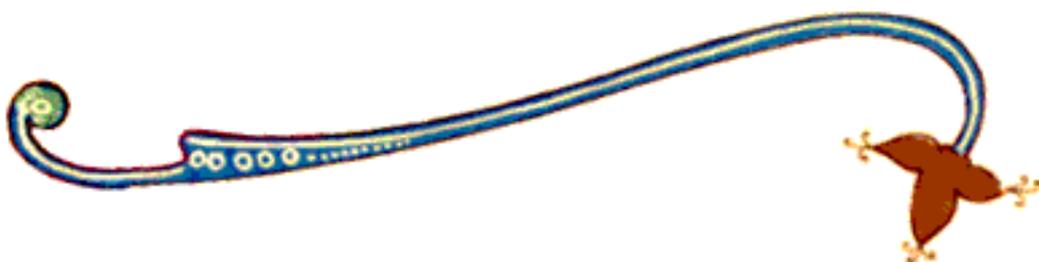

To portray the eyres purely as a mechanism for safeguarding the king's fiscal rights is too cynical an assessment, even though this may have been their chief purpose at their beginning. By the late thirteenth century, and as they declined in the early fourteenth, the eyres did not make so high a profit to warrant any suggestion that the revenues were the principal motive for their use. They came to play a role in the effort to impose a more standardized system of justice across the kingdom. From ad hoc royal commissions intervening in local judicial administration when problems arose, they developed into a more regular and systematized part of the machinery of royal government, a century before the 1285 eyre whose proceedings at Oxford were recorded. This despite the fact that there were not enough travelling justices to visit each locality more than once every few years – the early intent having been every seven years, although the actual interval was often greater. The eyres also had a part in the broader effort of the king to assert the authority of his centralized government, particularly given the struggle for power between king and barons. The eyres dealt primarily with crown pleas – criminal cases – although they could also entertain civil law suits. Over a hundred cases in these categories were brought before the itinerant justices at their Oxford sessions in early 1285 – sessions which evidently lasted a few weeks and would probably have been held in Oxford castle.

Following the civil wars and other regional disruptions during Henry III's reign, which provided opportunities for abuses of local government or usurpations of powers by local lords, Edward I instituted in 1274 a nationwide enquiry. This was followed up by empowering the justices in eyre to adjudicate all complaints received along those lines. Quo Warranto proceedings, which were bundled up with the business of the Oxford eyre, specifically concerned investigations of jurisdictional privileges claimed by some party, and insisted on the party demonstrating the authority by which they claimed to possess those privileges. This was not a new procedure, but one employed more extensively and aggressively by Edward I than by his father. In many cases it was necessary for those challenged to produce a document whereby some king had granted the privilege; although for ancient privileges, the claim to have exercised them from time immemorial was often allowed. Edward's aim was not so much to suppress unwarranted privileges (those discovered were often granted to the claimant in return for an appropriate payment) as to ensure that all privileges were documented and it was made clear that all jurisdictional authority came via by delegation from the king.

Civil cases involving disputes over real estate were typically initiated by the plaintiff having obtained from the king a writ (e.g. of right, of intrusion, of novel disseisin, of dower). Personal actions were more likely to be initiated by the plaintiff appearing before local authorities and laying a complaint.

The years from 1264 to 1278 had been particularly troubled times at Oxford, with hostilities between various parties. The findings of the eyre reflect that.

NOTES

"Englishry"

This was something that originated soon after the Conquest. To help protect the hated Normans from the vengeance of the subjugated Anglo-Saxons, a special fine was imposed for the murder of any Norman if a community could not produce the slayer. The courts automatically assumed a homicide victim was Norman; so, to avoid the fine, a community had to show that the victim was English. As this proof could sometimes be difficult, boroughs sought to obtain charter exemptions from proof of Englishry.

"he is a clerk"

Henry de Hengestese's claim of benefit of clergy would allow his case to be tried before a more lenient ecclesiastical court.

"it is to be amerced"

The Southwest Ward was amerced for Philip's crime because of communal responsibility for discouraging illegal behaviour of its members.

"North Osney"

A suburb to the north-west of the town.

"first finder"

The first finders of corpses were expected to appear to present evidence, not least in order to clear themselves of any suspicion of guilt or complicity.

"failed to pursue"

Pursuit by those in the vicinity of a crime was an obligation once hue-and-cry was raised. Discovery of a what appeared to be an accidental death still required raising the hue, although pursuit was not required.

"delivery of the gaol"

Gaol delivery was a type of court session held periodically by the king's justices or commissioners, necessitated in part because of the infrequency of eyres.

"for that reason"

Oxford's constitution was modelled after that of London, by grant of the king (1155). Interestingly, the townsmen did not think of imitating London in disclaiming an obligation to effect hue-and-cry.

"Newgate"

The principal London gaol.

"great bridge"

The "great bridge", Grandpont, was in fact a long causeway over the Thames on the south side of Oxford, which had probably existed since Anglo-Saxon times although rebuilt after the Norman Conquest; the bridge proper that was part of the Grandpont causeway was South Bridge.

"Smith Gate"

Smith Gate was in the northern stretch of the city wall, but to the east of North Gate, one of the principal entrances.

"Stockwell Street"

Stockwell Street ran through Walton (just northwest of the walled circuit) towards the castle on the west side of town.

"Holywell"

The suburb immediately north-east of the town; as early as 1086 it was a manor distinct from the town itself. Oxford authorities had tried to claim, in 1279, that Holywell was within its jurisdiction, and appears to have been taking the same position in the 1285 eyre. It met little success, but continued the efforts into the next century.

"Little Jewry"

The Jewish quarter, which included Little Jewry, was located around St. Aldate's Street, within a comfortable proximity to the refuge of the castle.

"outlawed"

Outlawry was not an immediate sentence, but preceded by exaction (expressed in the Latin, but in my translation taken for granted as part of outlawry): summoning of the criminal to answer to justice. After a certain number of exactions failed to produce results, outlawry could be pronounced.

"the country"

This means the people, in the form of its representatives, the jury.

"body of the Lord"

Consecrated wafers, for purpose of communion.

"deodand"

The value of items that were considered the causes of deaths was important since those items (or their value) were forfeit to the king as "deodands".

"Bogo de Clare"

Lord of the manor of Holywell, within the liberties of Oxford, which inevitably would have brought him into dispute with the borough authorities over jurisdiction. This lordship included rectorship of some suburban churches.

"Binsey"

A hamlet within the liberties of Oxford, lying on the northwestern boundary of those liberties.

"Thomas Marescalli"

He was considered responsible for his servant John's behaviour, just as a tithing was responsible for its own members.

"clipped coin"

Coin clipping was a capital crime. It involved cutting small pieces off minted coins, in order to melt down the metal and forge new coin.

"deceitfully conspired"

Cases of treason were serious enough that it was not mandatory for there to be a specific accuser; general suspicion was sufficient to warrant a trial to occasion a trial.

"Llywelyn the former Prince of Wales"

Llywelyn ap Gruffydd, Prince of North Wales, had been a longtime opponent of Edward I, resisting the latter's efforts to conquer Wales; he allied himself by marriage with the de Montfort family, themselves old enemies of Edward, but was killed during a rebellion in 1282.

"Concerning churches"

I.e. (the article specified) those whose advowson belonged to the king to bestow on a favourite or supplicant.

"St. John's Hospital"

First heard of in 1180, it appears originally to have been a hostel for travellers. In 1231, it was converted into a place for tending the sick (excluding the incurable, such as lepers), and the king turned over to it part of the Jewish cemetery for a new building, whose construction he probably financed. The king later (1245) granted the hospital exemption from the local hundred courts and frankpledge.

"one perch"

About 30 square yards.

"Merton College"

Merton was the first college founded at Oxford (despite earlier, but unrealized, plans for Balliol and University Colleges), and is still governed by a warden. Walter de Merton was Henry III's chancellor at the time he drafted statutes for the college in 1264, apparently thinking first of a Surrey location, but in the years that followed acquired property to house it at Oxford. He later became Bishop of Rochester.

"for the defence of the town"

A rare use of municipium here as the term for a town; perhaps the context of the town as defensive fortification explain it. The term burgus also seems to be used, on occasion, in that context, as if hearking back to the original concept behind the burh.

"Godstow"

The abbey of Godstow, founded in the 1130s, stood just outside the northwestern limits of the boundary of Oxford's liberty. However, the abbess of Godstow had a manor in Walton, closer to the town. In 1276 it was reported (in the Hundred Rolls) that the abbess had encroached, by enclosure, on 60 acres of the king's demesne and common pasture of the town. In 1281 the king ordered her arrested and produced before parliament apparently to answer the encroachment charge. The complaint before the eyre appears to have been some remnant of that.

"Rewley"

Rewley was a Cistercian abbey founded in 1281 by the Earl of Cornwall. It was located on a part of North Osney that was surrounded by branches of the Thames. The derivation of the name is from the Latin loco Regali.

"Cowley"

In Cowley, to the east of the town, stood a Templars house; preceptor was the name of the governor of a Templars' (or Hospitallers') community.

"escheats"

An escheat was the right of a landlord to take back directly into his own hands property of tenants who had died without heirs or had been convicted of a capital crime, notwithstanding the possible existence of some intermediary landlord. The king was considered the lord of all Jews and their property.

"green wax"

The "green wax" was a particular type of payment, whose record was sealed with green wax. The king had special officers responsible for travelling to localities to pick up those incomes.

"kiddles and starkells"

Kiddles were a kind of moveable weir, employing either a net or a wicker or wooden basket type structure. Starkles were also some kind of trap for fish. Both devices were illegal, and the articles of the eyres specified investigation of the use of those two types of trap.

"manciple"

An officer of a university college whose duties were similar to those of a steward, e. g. ensuring the household was provisioned.

"King Henry the elder"

In fact Oxford obtained its fee farm in 1199; here it was either dubiously claiming greater antiquity for that, back to Henry I (see next note) or Henry II, or it was referring to a confirmation of Henry III.

"St. Bartholomew"

St. Bartholomew's was a hospital on the edge of Cowley, near Cowley Marsh, founded by Henry I to support 12 lepers and a chaplain. Henry I had assigned to each of these 13 persons the sum of 1d. per day for food and 5s. per year for clothing, to be taken from the Oxford farm. It was situated within the manor of Headington, and its advowson belonged to the lord of that manor.

"return of writs and their estreats"

Return of writs was a privilege indicative of a level of self-government. It further excluded from jurisdiction within the town the county sheriff (already displaced by the burgesses having taken responsibility for the borough farm off his hands), who would otherwise have power to execute the commands in royal writs; instead, return of writs gave the town authorities power to deal with the writs and, if necessary, report back to the king thereon, as well as to collect any related revenues (estreats) and account directly for them.

"gallows, pillory and tumbrel"

This was a fairly common grouping of terms, reflecting administration over a range of offences. Having a gallows implied jurisdiction over criminals caught red-handed in a felony, which allowed the town authorities to hang them without waiting for the next local session of royal justices. The tumbrel was a small cart, capable of being tipped on its axle, used for parading offenders, to punish them by shaming them publicly.

"annual fair"

The significance of the fair, as far as these proceedings were concerned, was that during fair time the borough court was suspended and administration of justice was through the prior's court.

"feast of St. Frideswide"

Frideswide lived in the early 8th century, although little historically certain is known of her, and became Oxford's patron saint and – according to legend – the rationale for Oxford's foundation. It does seem plausible that the later legend of the saint reflects historical events in her founding a monastic community of some sort, outside whose gates a community developed (servicing the religious community) that was the kernel of Oxford. The church, where she was buried, was converted to an Augustinian priory in 1122. A fair held on the eve and feast of St. Benedict and the following five days (10-16 July) was transferred to the priory at that time, and the sheriff compensated for loss of revenue from the transferral, but in 1228 the date was changed to the eve and feast of St. Frideswide and the five days following (18-24 October). In 1279 the prior had claimed the right, because of the fair, of receiving tolls taken in the town during the fair, and of holding a court and assizes of bread and ale in that period. The borough authorities challenged these jurisdictional claims in the late 13th and early 14th century.

"duplicitous"

I.e. through bias, have obstructed bringing the culprits to justice, failed to convict them, or have been lenient in punishing them.

"oath of office"

I am making the assumption here that a promise to uphold the university's privileges was part of the broader oath of office taken by newly-elected officers, as opposed to a special oath taken exclusively with regard to that duty. The latter is, however, a possibility, based on other possible translation of the text.

"William de Eboraco"

Bishop of Salisbury in 1248.

"inspection of bread and ale"

Inspecting bread and ale, to ensure correct quality and quantity, was the first step in administering the assizes.

"three nights"

After a three-night stay, the host became responsible for the behaviour of any of his guests, as if the latter were a member of his household.

"arbitration ... incapacitated"

I am uncertain of the correct translation of this passage; referring to the clerk as "proteruus" (brash, impudent), as per the transcription, seems to make no sense in the context, so I am hypothesizing a connection with proterere.

"lays claim to him"

What is referred to here is that cases in which students were defendants were to be tried in the chancellor's court, not that of the borough.

"broached"

I.e. once the cask, barrel, pipe, etc. has been pierced with the intent of selling the wine by retail, as opposed to wholesale (in which case, price would depend on the mercantile negotiation).

"four aldermen and eight more judicious and law-abiding burgesses"

The four aldermen – one per ward – and 8 burgesses comprised a town council of 12 townsmen; we need not assume this charter marked the institution of such a council, although it may have confirmed an institution that had not long existed (formally, at least), and is generally thought to have fixed the number of aldermen at 4.

"prise"

In effect, a toll.

"suburb outside the North Gate"

The suburb outside the North Gate was part of what has been called, variously, Bullingdon Hundred, Headington Hundred, and Northgate Hundred, due to its confused origins; the hundred was associated with Headington manor which had territories on several sides of the town, and Bullingdon had earlier been one of two hundreds attached to the manor, until a redivision of territory which gave birth to Northgate. It did not become administratively part of Oxford, except in a few special areas of jurisdiction, until 1592. This hundred had its own coroners, the lord of the manor his own court and prison.

"Hugh de Plesetis"

Hugh de Plesentis was lord of Headington manor ca. 1279.

"St. Mary Magdalene" "St. Giles"

Parish churches within Northgate Hundred.

"has been hanged"

Why Alan le Taylor was hanged is not clear, unless the jury felt he was an accessory to the crime.

"farrier's post"

Although the Latin trabes marescall is a little vague, I am hypothesising that what is referred to is some kind of structure (possibly no more than an upright post) to which horses were tied while Gilbert shod them. However, the structure might have been some kind of a shoeing stall.

"remove"

The transcription reads admonendis, which would suggest the coroner's crime to be (fore)warning residents, so they might avoid jury duty. However, one of the articles that eyres were occasionally ordered to investigate concerned officers taking bribes to find reasons to remove individuals from juries. I therefore suspect the reading should have been amovendis.

"make suit"

All property-holders owed suit of court to the hundred (or equivalent jurisdiction) where the property was located; this entailed an obligation to bring any pleas related to the property before that court, and to attend the major gatherings held a few times a year.

"The court is informed"

The evidence by which "the court is informed" (doctum est) has more the ring of a report based on the coroner's findings, rather than a statement by the plaintiff.

"prove by his body"

To prove by one's body refers back to a time when accusations were more commonly settled through trial by combat; the defendant could accept combat or put himself "on the country" (i.e. trial by jury). John could not make the same offer of combat in the case of the wife.

"Jurors"

The jury for the borough of Oxford must have included the electors too – those four probably co-opting the other eight. Membership included some of the most prominent citizens (reflecting the importance of the eyre): Nicholas le Orfevre, Ralph le Plomer, John de Eu, Philip de Eu, and Henry Oweyn had all served as town bailiffs during the previous two decades (Oweyn also as mayor), while Henry Gamage would serve in that post in 1286, and Andrew de Pyrie, William de Wotesdon (or Wodeston) and John With a few years later.

"quitclaimed"

To quitclaim was to turn over all legal rights in, or claim to, a property to another. When someone acquired a piece of real estate, it was advisable to extinguish any possible legal rights of, or future court challenges from, close relatives of the former owner, by having legal records made of quitclaims (both in the form of a witnessed document stating the transaction and, if possible, in an enrolment of that document in borough records).

"a cellar and a solar"

I.e. a modest building with a lower level used for storage and/or business and an upper level for living quarters.

"and so on"

The fourth date for the rent instalment due Matilda is missing; it would probably have been the feast of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary (25 March).

"warrant"

"Vouching to warrant" was the right of a defendant in an action involving real estate. It meant calling on the person who had transferred his or her right in a property to the defendant (whether permanently or temporarily, as through a lease) to confirm the legality of that transaction.

"tally"

A tally was a simple record of a financial transaction, typically a notched wooden stick, taking the place of a written record in a lay society that was largely non-literate.

"free bench"

The right of a widow to remain in possession of the house in which she and her late husband lived during the rest of her lifetime. See the Ipswich custumal.

"nurturing"

I.e. guardianship; see the Ipswich custumal.

"Simon Balle and John de Hastings"

They are here described as "rectati" – those who stand (a party) to right; though whether this means pledges for the plaintiff or defendants, I am not sure. Whether their default occurred at the original presentation of arguments or when the jury was convened is also not clear; probably the latter.

TRANSLATION

Katherine the wife of Stephen Justice brings an accusation against Ralph fitz Robert, Andrew le Gaoler, William Virly glover, William Gredi, Walter de Derham, John the servant of Nicholas de Ingham, Nicholas formerly the servant of Nicholas de Lopham, and Nicholas le Gayver. She says that when she was in the peace of God and the king, in the house of her husband Stephen Justice in Fybrigate, in St. Clements parish, in the town of Norwich, on the night of 22 November 1263, there came Ralph, Andrew, William, William, Walter, John, Nicholas, and Nicholas feloniously, with premeditated intent [to make] a felonious assault in infringement of the king's peace. They smashed her oak gates and broke the metal hooks and hinges with poleaxes, wedge-shaped axes, swords, knives, and maces and threw them into the courtyard. Entering feloniously, like felons, they broke down the pine doors into the hall, broke the hinges and iron-work of the doors, broke the chains and bars and the oak shutters of the windows, again just like felons, and after that feloniously entered the chamber of the hall by its southern doorway and robbed that chamber. That is, [they stole] two swords worth 3s.6d, a dagger with an ivory handle worth 12d., an iron breastplate worth 10d., an iron club worth 4d., a cuirass of iron-plated cowhide worth 6s.8d, and a gambeson. Afterwards they left that chamber and feloniously went into the hall, where the corpse of her husband Stephen lay on a bier; they burned it, together with a Rheims blanket worth four shillings that covered the bier and likewise a linen sheet worth 18d. This felony, robbery and burglary Ralph [etc.] and Nicholas carried out on that night of that year, carrying off by robbery, as felons, what was mentioned above. Katherine immediately raised hue and cry from street to street, from parish to parish, and from house to house, until she came into the presence of the bailiffs and coroners, and from that time she pursued the matter against the accused so that it would be tried in the king's court. They also stole a woven linen cloth worth 5s. and a perse hood [lined] with squirrel fur worth 10d. The bailiffs are ordered to arrest the accused. The bailiffs are to answer for it. Pledges for the prosecution: John de Heylesdone and William de Catton.

Memorandum that Henry Turnecurt and Stephen de Balsham were killed in Norwich, in the parish of St. George in front of the gate of Holy Trinity on 1 May 1264. The coroners and bailiffs came to the location and held an inquisition. The inquisition having been concluded and a written record having been made, there later came master Marcus de Brunhale clerk and Ralph Knict with many others threatening to cut the coroners into little pieces unless they handed over the written record. Thereafter they seized Roger the coroner and led him by force ([armed] with swords and axes) back to his own house, until Roger took the document from his chest, then they immediately took him and that document to the church of St. Peter Mancroft where Ralph removed the document from Roger's hands by force, bore it off, and before his companions – all acting crazily – cut it into little pieces. Roger, filled with fear and trepidation was barely able to escape from their clutches. And they say that they could not hold an inquiry into the matter because of the imminent war.

[...]

The parishes of St. Peter Parmentergate, St. Vedast, St. Martin Bailly, and St. Michael Conesford are sworn and say under oath that William le Alblaster from the castle threatened John le Lindraper with burning, and John de Rendlesham and Thomas le Despenser of the castle [did] likewise along with Henry Punel, Simon le Longe, and William Bonehay. And that on the night of 10 June 1264 William le Alblaster set fire to a gate between [the properties of] John le Lindraper and John de Belaya, so that the house of John de Belaya burned down. And that the same William went out from the house of Robert Faber locksmith and returned there after committing the felony. They say that those indicted removed the clappers from the bells of the church of St. Peter Parmentergate and cut the ropes of the bells of the churches of St. Vedast and St. Cuthbert, so that no-one would come to put out the fire. They say that William le Neve, who frequents the house of Matilda la Wymlere in the parish of St. Julian, was present at the event. An order was issued to arrest the wrongdoers.

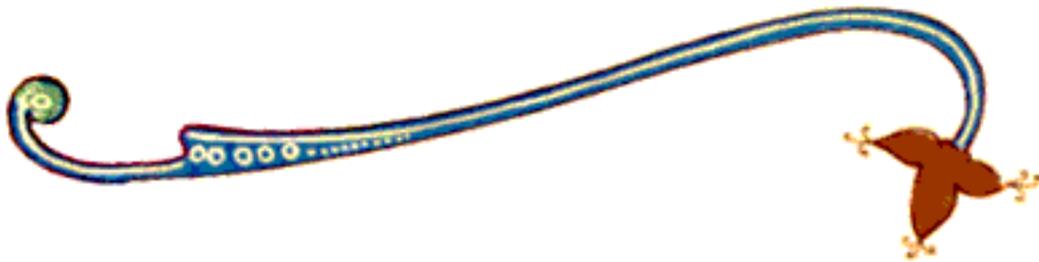

DISCUSSION

These cases were recorded on a roll presumably compiled by the city coroners, from 1263-67, for purposes of presenting crimes at the eyre held in Norfolk in 1268.

The influence of the national disruption – de Montfort's return from exile in 1263 having led to a renewal of armed hostilities with the king's party the following year – may perhaps be perceived in these cases. It complicated and exacerbated local hostilities resulting from competitive jurisdictions within the city controlled by the cathedral-priory and the castle – hostilities that would, a few years later, come to an even more violent climax.

The group who broke into the Justice house did so to plunder it of weapons and armour as well, it appears, as to revenge themselves on an enemy. Even from the complainant's perspective, the incidental theft of other items was only an afterthought. That Stephen Justice was evidently a wealthy burgess is suggested both by the style of his house, which had its own courtyard and multi-room dwelling, and sturdy doors and windows (although not sturdy enough), as well as by the amount of military equipment he owned. The abduction of the coroner was a matter of intimidation to discourage him from attempting to exercise jurisdiction in areas claimed by the priory, while the case involving a fire set (with precautions to prevent the neighbourhood being aroused to fight the blaze) was likewise a matter of intimidation on the part of the castle garrison and residents of the castle fee. In 1266 the target of the latter, John le Lindraper became involved in an argument with Thomas the constable of the castle – probably the same as Thomas le Despenser; Thomas' brother, who happened to be the sheriff of Norfolk, tried to assist his brother by tripping John, but instead fell over and broke his leg, later dying of the injury.

NOTES

"oak gates"

As Hudson points out, first they had to break through the gates into the courtyard of the property, then into the house itself.

"gambeson"

Translated by Hudson as "doublet", a gambeson was a quilted jacket padded so as to offer protection in itself or in conjunction with other armour worn on top.

"perse"

A dark-blue cloth.

"St. George in front of the gate of Holy Trinity"

St. George Tombland, situated outside the cathedral dedicated to Holy Trinity.

"Alblaster"

A crossbowman.

"Despenser"

The steward of the castle.

"Wymplere"

This surname reflects a female occupation: a maker of wimples, a garment to cover the upper torso, from chin to breast.

[1. Initial complaint of rape made before the King's Bench]

London. The sheriffs had been ordered to attach Raymond de Lymoges, so as to have him before the king on this day, that is on 13 April [1320], to answer a charge of rape and breach of the king's peace brought by Joan daughter of Eustace le Seler of London. The sheriffs had responded with the names of pledges for prosecution: Eustace le Seler and John le Boys; and also [confirmation] that they would attach Raymond so as to have him on hand before the king on that date. And now Joan comes, and likewise Raymond. Joan accuses Raymond of rape and breach of the present king's peace. She states that at curfew on the night of 9 March 1320 in Walbrook ward in the parish of St. Mary Woolchurch in London, just outside Eustace's house, by force and against her will, Raymond took Joan by her left hand and led her off to his room in St. Martin Vintry parish. There he threw her to the ground and had sex with her against her will, feloniously as a king's felon, and completely deprived her of her virginity contrary to the peace of the king, his crown and his dignity etc. Having committed this felony, he fled and Joan pursued him, raising hue-and-cry from ward to ward, as far as the nearest 4 wards, and beyond into the king's court, so that Raymond might be arrested on Joan's charge. If Raymond chooses to deny this felony, Joan is ready to prove it against him in whatever way [\[the court decides\]](#).

Raymond comes and says that he is a cleric and that he cannot answer to this without his Ordinaries. To determine in what manner he should be turned over to the Ordinary, an enquiry is to be held into the truth [\[of Raymond's claim\]](#) by a jury. A jury is therefore to come before the king on 2 June etc.

Afterwards, on that date, Raymond comes, led by the marshal. And Joan likewise, and also the jury. Notwithstanding that he had previously said that he was a cleric, Raymond now declares that he is in no way guilty of it [\[i.e. the rape\]](#) and submits himself, win or lose, to this jury. When the jurors return with their verdict, Joan is formally summoned but fails to come to prosecute her charge. Therefore her pledges for prosecution are to be amerced, and she herself to be arrested. However, she is pardoned because underage. Raymond is acquitted of the charge brought by Joan. As for the Crown's case, being asked how he wishes clear himself of the felony, he denies any felony or rape or anything against the king's peace; and he submits his complete innocence of the charges to a jury, win or lose. Therefore a jury is to come before the king on 25 June.

On which day, Raymond comes, led by the marshal. And likewise the jurors, who say under oath that Raymond is not guilty of the rape and felony. Therefore he is acquitted. Furthermore, questioned as to what damages Raymond has incurred because of this matter, they say that his damages are to the value of forty pounds. Asked whether Joan has the means to pay those damages, they say no. Asked also who had aided and abetted in bringing the accusation and in drawing up the charge, they say that Eustace le Seler of London, John le Botoner le Clop', John Lungchaump, Thomas Shereman of Walbrook, and John de Goiz locksmith had abetted the charge. The sheriffs are therefore ordered to distrain them by all their lands etc., and that the what issues from that etc., and that their persons should be brought before the king on 6 October, to answer both to the king and to Raymond.

[2. Review of the case by the eyre]

Joan, daughter of Eustace le Seler came before the coroners of London on 7 February 1321 and accused Raymond de Lymoges of rape and breach of the king's peace, in these words: Joan the daughter of Eustace le Seler accuses Raymond de Lymoges of raping her body, feloniously and against the peace, on 9 March 1320 in Walbrook in the parish of St. Mary Woolchurch in London, two feet from Eustace's house. Raymond came there after the hour of curfew, feloniously as a felon; he seized the body of Joan, 11 years old, and carried her off, taking her into his own house – that is, to the house rented by Ellis Pers in the parish of St. Martin Vintry in London, into his room, which was a solar in the upper storey. There he kept Joan throughout the night and deflowered her, feloniously as a felon, against her will and in breach of the peace; so cruelly and horrendously did he handle her physically that her life was despaired of, and still is, and there remains little hope of her recovery. Therefore Joan begs the help of the king, so that she may have legal retribution and justice for this felony committed in defiance of the king and his crown and against the peace.

She found guarantors that she will prosecute her case, viz. Henry le Sadelere porter and William atte Wode saddlemaker. Consequently the sheriffs were ordered by the coroners to attach Raymond to appear before the justices here [i.e. at the eyre]. And Joan comes, and likewise Raymond, attached by the sheriffs. And Joan accuses Raymond of raping her of her virginity in the location mentioned on 19 March 1320, in contempt of the king's peace, his crown and his dignity. And this she offers to prove in whatever way etc.

Raymond entirely denies the rape and felony, etc. He says that Joan, in the accusation she made before the coroners, asserted that she had been raped on the night of 9 March. But now, in the accusation she lays before the justices, she asserts that she was raped on the 19th, and does not prosecute the accusation that she previously made before the coroners, which was in effect the original. He requests that inconsistency be taken into account, not least because she could not twice be deprived of one and the same virginity, etc. Joan is unable to deny this.

Therefore the charge brought against Raymond by Joan herself is dismissed. Joan is to be imprisoned for false accusation; however, she is pardoned because underage.

As for the Crown's case, Raymond, asked how he wishes to clear himself of rape and felony, states that he had elsewhere been acquitted of that rape and felony, before Henry le Scrop and his fellow justices of the King's Bench, by a local jury to whose verdict he had submitted himself, win or lose. He presents a record of his acquittal, under the seal of that Henry, together with the king's writ addressed to Henry [ordering him] to send that record to the justices here; he also presents the king's writ to the justices here, [ordering them] to admit the document [into evidence] and furthermore to do justice etc. The document having been inspected, it was verified that Raymond had been acquitted of rape and felony at the king's suit. Therefore he is acquitted.

DISCUSSION

Apart from illustrating how a young girl might become a pawn in the affairs of men, this case – which later became part of a compilation of examples used to help law students learn about legal manoeuvring – gives an indication of the drawbacks of medieval legal records.

The legal system required careful adherence to formulae, both in the procedure of a complaint and in the narrative of the accusation and defence. Bracton outlined the procedure to be followed by a virgin who had been raped; the record of the case above reflects that procedure and the emphasis on loss of virginity. Rape of a married woman or widow was considered less serious, but rape of a virgin – at least from the time of the second Statute of Westminster (1285) – was a felony and punishable by mutilation or death.

The information provided for the legal record is shaped at least as much by what the law required as by the real details of events. This included drawing the crime to the immediate attention of neighbours who could witness wounds and torn clothing, then to the attention of the authorities, and – after Raymond has won his first acquittal, before the King's Bench – subsequently to the coroners, who would ensure the trial came before the eyre. Joan must have had to repeat the facts of her charge on several occasions, very carefully to ensure the formulae were respected; in this she would surely have received coaching from family and neighbours, who also may well have taken a leading role in the hue-and-cry following Joan's ordeal, since Joan would surely have fled home first.

We can also see that the formal record of the case is only a summary of the evidence presented during court proceedings. For the legal report which happens to have survived for this eyre provides fuller information. It describes, for instance, the location of the alleged rape in greater detail, while the description of the assault itself is even more detailed:

In the middle of the room ... [Raymond] took the same Joan ... between his two arms and, without her consent and against her will, lay her down on the floor, her belly facing up and her back against the ground, and with his right hand pulled Joan's clothing – she being dressed in a coat of blue say and a dress of a light cloth – up as far as her navel... Using both hands he pushed apart Joan's legs and thighs and, with his right hand took his penis of length etc. and of size etc. and put it into Joan's cunt, breaking through her "watershed" and laying her open, making her bleed, and depriving her of her virginity.

And yet this level of detail is open to question, for we may doubt whether a probably terrified young girl would have been able to focus on the details of what was being done to her. Again, we may be seeing instead an emphasis for legal purposes on the force and injury.

Due in part to the brevity of the legal records, it is difficult for us to reach our own conclusions as to the true guilt or innocence of accused parties. The case against Raymond of Limoges who, as his surname suggests and as evidence from another source indicates, was a merchant of Bordeaux and presumably only in London on a business trip, appears to be strong. His attempt to delay matters – perhaps a panic reaction, prompted by the prospect of being hung – by claiming benefit of clergy cannot endear us to him. His defence strategy rested more on the discrepancies in Joan's case – the inexplicable inconsistency in the dates of the alleged rape, and the question of whether he could be tried twice for the same offence (such being an issue debated by the eyre lawyers) – than on grounds to believe his innocence.

Joan's complaint, whether on 9th or 19th March, was taken seriously enough to warrant Raymond's arrest on 23 March and his imprisonment until 25 June, when he was acquitted. After acquittal, Raymond pursued legal damages of £100 against Joan's father and the others, claiming a conspiracy to frame him had been formed in February 1320. This case dragged on from October 1320 to at least June 1321; its conclusion is not known. Meanwhile, Eustace's daughter's complaint of rape had been renewed before the coroner, despite the 40-day limitation for such a complaint under London custom (also a subject debated by the lawyers), in order to have the case referred to the eyre.

It is possible that Raymond used the delay won from his claim of clergy to influence the jurors to support him – although such influence (e.g. bribery) could not have been easy from within prison unless he had others to help him – or to have Joan or her father intimidated into dropping their prosecution. That Raymond was able to obtain a royal writ obliging the eyre court to admit into evidence the copy of his earlier acquittal suggests he had money and/or influence.

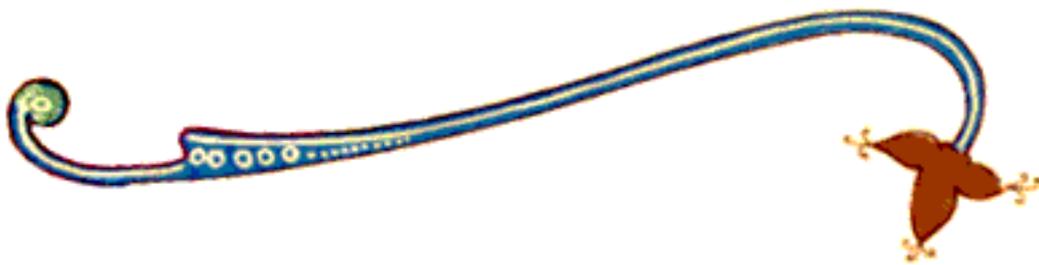

A further factor in Raymond's acquittal was the fact that a legal system dominated by men may have been reluctant to condemn their fellows to mutilation or hanging for a crime they did not consider warranted such severity. Professor Hanawalt (Of Good and Ill Repute: Gender in Social Control in Medieval England, Oxford: University Press, 1998), who has analyzed the Seler vs. Lymoges case from this perspective, points out that rape charges were far less common than homicides, few of the rape charges that were brought obtained a conviction, and convictions leading to capital punishment are virtually non-existent. Unless the accused admitted guilt by fleeing, leading to outlawry, the best a complainant might hope for would be to damage the reputation of her attacker.

On the other hand, without clearer evidence, we cannot dismiss the possibility that Eustace and his friends had fabricated the story of the rape in order to have Raymond imprisoned, perhaps in relation to business dealings; Professor Cam suggests it may have been to prevent Raymond claiming a debt owed him. That Raymond avoided in his defence addressing the substance of the accusation does not help us in determining whether there was any substance.

Raymond's countersuit implies a connection with Eustace prior to the date of the alleged rape, and conceivably Eustace may have been looking to obtain the financial compensation due from a convicted rapist, to counterbalance a debt he owed. Nor is it beyond the realm of possibility that Eustace was pimping his own daughter – something Raymond could not have used as a defence, given the age of the girl. It was not unknown for women to be used as tools to bring charges before the courts; in fact, the royal justices at Wigan in 1323 were assigned, as one of their articles of investigation, to enquire about any cases of persons making use of underage children to accuse others of felony and obtain their incarceration.

We will probably never know if poor Joan suffered a terrible rape, only to see her attacker go free through legal technicalities and, possibly, corruption or bias of a jury; or whether Eustace was heartlessly using his own daughter to bring pressure on a creditor. As Professor Cam (Eyre of London, cxxiv) concluded: "Either way it was a dirty business."

NOTES

"Seler"

A saddlemaker.

"raising hue-and-cry"

After raising hue-and-cry, the law report tells us, Joan sought out the ward beades, who took her to the sheriff; the complaint was next referred to the coroner (who had the authority to refer complaints to a court) before being brought before the king. This – the correct legal procedure from the point of view of the king's court – would have seem a remarkably clear-headed response from a young girl who had just undergone a traumatic experience. However, Joan's hue-and-cry may perhaps have taken place later than we might infer from the text; her rationale for hue-and-cry was likely to establish public witness to the physical signs of the harm done her (i.e. bloodstains, torn clothing).

"says that he is a cleric"

Claiming "benefit of clergy", if the claim could be supported, was a way for the defendant to transfer a case to a church court, which could be expected to impose a less harsh sentence. Many members of society were in lesser orders. In Raymond's case it was only a delaying tactic.

"Ordinaries"

An Ordinary was a cleric having a jurisdiction associated with an ecclesiastical office that involved judicial, legislative or governmental authority.

"the Crown's case"

Since rape was a felony, the defendant had to answer not only Joan's appeal, but an indictment from the Crown.

"say"

A type of woollen cloth similar to serge.

TRANSLATION

That an underage boy not be subject to judgement

On 30 August in the same year [1231] etc. it happened that a certain man by the name of Osbert was found in St. Andrew street with a serious head wound [caused] by a cudgel; he died as a result of the wound the following day. John le Syre of Kingston and his son John [sic ?William] were arrested as suspects in the death and put in prison. Afterwards they were released for 40 days by order of Richard Renger, then a Justice of the Bench, without any other warrant, and the sheriffs were amerced.

John has died; William appears. Richard de Wyndunberi, his wife Wymarca, and Richard's sons Hamo and Thomas – in whose house a cudgel had been found – likewise come; they deny [complicity in] the felony and any infringement of the king's peace, and put themselves on the verdict of the mayor and citizens of London. Which is allowed them, since there are only slight grounds for the suspicion.

Because Hamo and Thomas, attached for the homicide, were then infants and thus underage, they are therefore not subject to judgement but are acquitted of it; but the others are kept in custody.

Afterwards the mayor and citizens stated, under their oath of loyalty by which they were bound to the king, that neither the aforementioned [parties] nor anyone else was guilty of the death. Because, they say, a certain horse belonging to Sir William de Stuteville collapsed in the street and fractured his [i.e. Osbert's] head, so that he died.

Consequently it is decided that everyone be acquitted of the death. Judgement of [death by] misadventure. And because the sheriffs and chamberlain did not mount an adequate investigation, they are to be amerced.

Concerning irresponsible behaviour

In the same year [1235/36], it happened that in Walbrook street a certain youth, Robert the son of Payne, fell off the horse that he was riding when Robert de Donestaple gave the horse a scare; as a result, he died within the month. Robert comes and he is not considered guilty of the death. But because he scared [the horse] through stupidity and thoughtlessness, it is decided that he be put in gaol for his irresponsibility. Judgement of [death by] misadventure. And because the sheriffs and chamberlain did not hold an inquisition on the horse, which was the cause of the youth's death, they are to be amerced.

Abjuration of the realm

In the same year [1239/40] at "la Garre" in Kent: it happened that a certain Roger le Sauser and a certain maid, named Inga, left the house of Isolde de Tateshale in London and went to la Garre, taking with them fire in a pot for the purpose of burning down the house of Joce de la Garre. Which house there they did burn down, and Roger killed Joce with an arrow, and fled to the church of Upchurch. There he admitted his deed and abjured the realm. Asked why and for what reason he did it, he said that Isabella [sic] put him up to it, to protect Inga and burn down the house.

The following day Inga returned to London, to Isolde's house. She was immediately arrested there and imprisoned, and thereafter convicted of the deed and burned.

Concerning someone who remained at large after mortally wounding his wife, and who was not attached.

A certain man, John de Londoneston, struck his wife Agnes with a sword on Easter Sunday [1241], so that she died of the wound the following Friday. Upon her death, John fled and is believed to be guilty. Judgement that he is to be exacted and outlawed according to due form etc. His possessions [are worth] 4s.8d; for which the sheriffs are to answer. Since it was proved that John, for five days after striking her, remained resident in his house among his neighbours and did not take to flight until after her death; and since John Clerk dubber and Thomas de Marisco of Barking, members of John's family who were with him when he committed the deed and afterwards, up to the time he fled, neither raised hue-and-cry upon him nor reported anything of the matter to the chamberlain or the sheriffs (which the justices consider puts them under suspicion), they have been committed to prison, and meanwhile [i.e. pending trial] the matter will be discussed with the king.

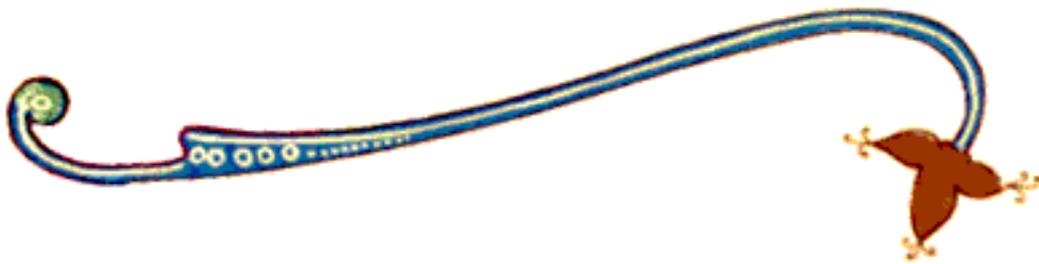

DISCUSSION

The above are synopses of cases dealt with by the eyre of 1244 and considered, by some later London official, of significance in terms of either establishing a precedent or illustrating some point of law or city custom. Over seventy such extracts from the eyre records were made, arranged chronologically under the year in which the offence was committed (ranging between 1228 and the year the eyre was held), with the titles assigned by the compiler to each extract indicating the particular point of law of interest to him. A consequence of the record being a synopsis rather than a full verbatim copy is that some of the facts have evidently been left out.

Gaps are apparent in the first case, where players are introduced abruptly.

The reason for the sheriffs being amerced is not explained (it being irrelevant to the compiler's interests), although it was perhaps for having made an arrest without proper investigation or a formal charge against the suspects. There is also the abrupt switch from 1231 to 1244, although this was a characteristic of the original eyre records too. One of the interesting points of this case is that it suggests that an investigation of a felony might involve searches of properties in the vicinity of the crime.

Another of the synopses deals with a case of trial by combat.

NOTES

"Kingston"

Probably Kingston upon Thames.

"mayor and citizens"

The Londoners claimed the right for presentments of crimes to be made by the mayor and council, without the need to put together juries specially for the eyre, and this passage suggests the same for the rendering of verdicts. They also maintained that their oath of loyalty to the king was sufficient to guarantee the truth of what they said, without any special oath administered by the court.

"inquisition on the horse"

There should have been an official identification of the horse as the instrument of the death, since that would have resulted in the forfeiture of the horse to the king.

"la Garre"

Possibly Harry Green, on the banks of the Medway, just a couple of miles from Upchurch.

"outlawed"

Sentence of outlawry was pronounced in the folkmoot (as an official and very public gathering).

"dubber"

An artisan who beat leather (or cloth) as part of the industrial process.

Pleas [heard on] 11 April 1295

A date is assigned to Thomas de Mamcestria and his wife Codusa, plaintiffs, Ralph de Derisbur, his wife Margery, and Alexander son of Alexander Hurel [defendants], concerning a plea of dower, on 2 May at the request of the parties.

Richard son of Michael le Tevene of Chester was summoned to answer Thomas de Mamcestria and his wife Codusa, concerning a plea that he let them have Codusa's fair dower rights in regard to the freehold that belonged to Richard son of John Ground, her former husband in Chester. In relation to which Thomas and Codusa charge that Richard [le Tevene] withholds from them a one-third share in a tenement with appurtenances in Chester, so that they receive nothing from it, the which Richard [Ground] endowed Codusa with at the church door when he married her. If Richard [le Tevene] wishes to deny this, Thomas and Codusa are prepared to prosecute. Richard comes and denies the force etc. when etc. He requests a view of the property against [the plaintiffs], and this is granted. A date was assigned to the parties, on 2 May, to undertake in the suit what justice requires to be undertaken.

On which day Thomas and Codusa appeared against Richard. And Richard comes and says that Richard Ground had no rights in the tenement in question other than for a term of years; in regard to which he produces a document in the name of John Ground, father of that Richard, which evidences the fact, and requests that this be enquired into. Thomas and Codusa reply that Richard Ground had sufficient right and estate in that tenement for Codusa to be capable of, and due, dower, and request that this be enquired into.

Pleas of the portmoot on 2 May 1295

Thomas de Mamcestria and his wife Codusa appeared by their attorney against Ralph de Derisbur and his wife Margery in a plea of dower. They seek from Ralph and Margery a one-third share in fifteen shillings of annual rent due from a half a shop and a stall, which they withhold from them. Ralph de Derisbur requests a view of the property and this is granted. The parties are assigned 16 May to undertake in the suit what justice requires to be undertaken.

Alexander de Hurel [appears] against Thomas and Codusa in a plea of dower by [his attorney] Aunger de Osberneby, who gives assurance under oath that he will have him to warrant here on 30 May to respond [to the charge].

Richard son of John le Tevene [appears] against the same by [his attorney] Richard son of Thomas de Kelsale, who gives assurance under oath etc.

Pleas of the portmoot on 16 May 1295

Ralph de Derisbur and his wife Margery [appear] against Thomas de Mamcestria and his wife Codusa in a plea of dower by [their attornies] Roger le Murager and William Juvenis, who give assurance under oath that they will have him to warrant here on 30 May.

A day is assigned to Thomas de Mamcestria and his wife Codusa and to Alexander son of Alexander Hurel in the plea of dower, on 30 May, at the request of the parties, without essoin.

Pleas of the portmoot on 30 May 1295

Thomas de Mamcestria and his wife Codusa appeared by their attorney against Ralph de Derisbur and his wife Margery in a plea of dower. Ralph and Margery came and warranted their essoin. As per the custom of the city of Chester, it was not possible to proceed further with the action on that day, but a date was assigned to the parties on 4 July to undertake in the suit what justice requires to be undertaken.

On which day Thomas and Codusa appeared by their attorney. And Ralph came but Margery did not come, and the attorney of Thomas and Codusa requested judgement because Margery had defaulted. The allegation was made on the part of Thomas and Codusa that Ralph was Margery's attorney, received by Alexander Hurel. Ralph says that he was not her attorney. A day was assigned to the parties on 8 August, so that the court could in the interim determine from that Alexander whether Margery had appointed Ralph her attorney in the plea or not.

Alexander son of Alexander Hurel was summoned to answer to Thomas and Codusa in a plea of dower, that he them have the fair dower rights of Codusa. In relation to which Thomas and Codusa charge that Alexander withholds from them a one-third share in eleven shillings of annual rent due from a certain freehold lying between the land of Hugh de Brychull and the land of William de le Flint in Forthegate Street in Chester. And thereby the injustice, since Codusa has fair dower rights in regard to that freehold, which belonged to Richard Ground, her late husband in the city. With which Richard endowed her at the church door when he married her; of which she has nothing, so they say. If Alexander wishes to deny this, Thomas and Codusa are prepared to prosecute. A day is assigned on 11 July, at the request of the parties.

On which day Thomas and Codusa appeared against Alexander by their attornies; he himself was essoined in the plea by Aunger de Osberneby, who gave assurance under oath that he will have him to warrant here on 15 August.

On which day Thomas and Codusa came and appeared against Alexander by their attornies. He challenged the form of the writ, viz. in the place where it is written "in that town" instead of "in that city", and on that basis seeks a judgement. Judgement is deferred to 29 August.

On which day no court session was held, but the parties were adjourned to 5 September.

On which day the parties come and seek a judgement. Judgement is deferred to 26 September.

On which day Alexander comes and seeks a judgement. Henry le Fletcher and Adam de Dunham, attornies of Thomas and Codusa, essoined them. A day was assigned to Alexander on 10 October; which date is to be conveyed to Thomas and Codusa by their essoiners.

On which day Thomas and Codusa appeared against Alexander. He himself did not come, but was essoined by William Juvenis, who gave assurance under oath that he will have him to warrant here on 24 October. And Thomas and Codusa are assigned that day.

On which day the parties came together and, at their request, the plea was adjourned until 31 October.

On which day Alexander comes and appears against Thomas and Codusa. They themselves did not come, but Henry le Fouler, attorney of Thomas and Codusa, had them essoined by Hugh Payn, who gave assurance under oath that he will have him to warrant here on 21 November. And Alexander is assigned that day.

On which day the parties came together and seek a judgement and a record [\[thereof\]](#). Judgement is deferred until 19 December.

On which day Thomas and Codusa come by their attornies and seek a judgement and a record. Alexander likewise comes and seeks judgement. Judgement is deferred to 16 January [1296] because the doomsmen have not yet reached a determination.

On which day Thomas and Codusa come by their attornies and seek a judgement and a record. Alexander did not come but had himself essoined by Aunger, who gave assurance under oath that he will have him to warrant here on 30 January.

On which day Thomas and Codusa come by their attornies and seek a judgement and a record; and Alexander likewise. Judgement is deferred to 13 February.

On which day Thomas and Codusa came and appeared against Alexander by their attornies. Alexander did not come but had himself essoined by Aunger, who gave assurance under oath that he will have him to warrant here on 27 February. Thomas and Codusa are assigned that day.

On which day Thomas and Codusa appeared by their attornies against Alexander and seek judgement. Alexander likewise seeks judgement. Judgement is deferred until 12 March.

On which day the parties came together. And the doomsmen say that a portmoot should not be held on that day, because it was St. Gregory's day, so the parties were adjourned to 2 April.

On which day Alexander comes and appears against Thomas and Codusa. Their names having been sufficiently called out, they did not come nor did they send anyone to esoin them. Alexander seeks judgement based on their default. It is decided that the charge against Alexander be dismissed. Thomas and Codusa are to be amerced for failing to pursue the prosecution.

DISCUSSION

By the close of the thirteenth century two courts were operating in Chester, a town of some importance as the capital of a Palatine jurisdiction. One was the court of the city sheriffs, named the Pentice after the two-storey building in whose upper floor (or penthouse) the court was housed, and focused on petty criminal proceedings. The more ancient was the Portmoot and, presided over by mayor and bailiffs, sometimes with the sheriffs present too, dealt with civil actions including those involving disputes over real estate, and with offences against the community, except for the breaches of the assizes of ale and bread dealt with in the Pentice; as the original court of the community it could also, if it chose, deal with minor crimes more commonly handled by the Pentice.

The case above illustrates the slow procedure often involved in a legal action – in fact, several related actions in which a widow seeks dower rights in various properties she claims to have belonged to her late husband, although only one is followed through over a period of a year. Just reading the terse but repetitive entries communicates a very little of the frustration that parties to a case must have experienced. It was the nature of the portmoot to be cumbersome, since its sessions were held only on Mondays (whereas the Pentice could be convened at need) and pleas involving freeholds were dealt with only on a fortnightly basis. The records given above are fairly typical of the bulk of the entries one finds on borough court rolls of this period.

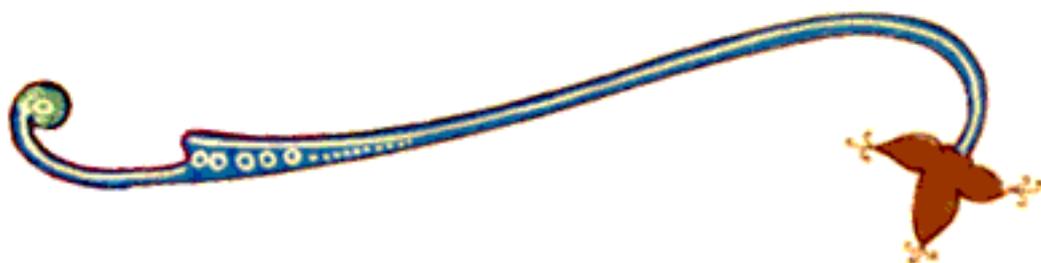

A writ, obtained from the Chancery of the Palatine earldom, was required to initiate a dower action. That had evidently been introduced into court prior to the series of records we see here. Codusa was pursuing the several actions together because she could then fulfill the legal requirement of claiming that she had not been assigned any of her dower rights; having possession of some of the dower properties could have jeopardized her claim to others.

After charges were laid, the accused were given a chance to introduce exceptions that might invalidate the charges, such as that the late husband had not truly owned the property in which dower right was being claimed. They also had the opportunity to request the properties in question be viewed by the jury, and then to produce someone who would warrant their own right in the property. Another defence tactic, tried by Alexander Hurel, was to try to overthrow the charge against him on a legal technicality, in terms of inaccurate wording of the writ of right. If nothing else these tactics had the effect of delaying the proceedings – sending an attorney to vouch a warrantor was treated as an essoin, while the challenge to the writ required time for consideration on the part of the court – the difficulty of the doomsmen in deciding if this technicality should be allowed appears to have been responsible for repeated adjournments. Essoins were the most common reason for an adjournment, and were doubtless used as a mechanism to delay proceedings, although often may reflect a genuine inability of a party to come to court that day; but even the warranting of an essoin at the next session was considered sufficient business for one day. On one occasion the plaintiffs tried to turn the delays to their advantage, by asking for summary judgement when Ralph de Derisbur appeared without his wife, but then brought further delay on themselves by changing tack and claiming Ralph could represent his wife.

The case ended abruptly when Thomas and Codusa defaulted in appearance at one session, and the charge against Alexander Hurel junior was dismissed. After persevering so long, Thomas and Codusa had perhaps despaired of ever getting a judgement; but more likely they settled out of court with him, or had even been intimidated into dropping their prosecution.

Procedure in cases of dower was in fact swifter than procedure in other actions involving real estate, where an even larger number of essoins was permitted, except for cases of novel disseisin.

NOTES

"fair dower rights"

It was fairly standard throughout England that this comprised one-third of the property a man held in his own right when he married, and with which he was therefore capable on endowing his wife.

"married"

The text repeats dotavit, but this must be either a scribal or a transcription error for desponsavit. Bracton indicates that it is the husband who gives his spouse dower rights at the church door on their marriage day (in fact, just prior to the marriage ceremony). Pleading a dower case required the formulaic statements made in this case.

"view of the property"

I.e. that a jury view the property in dispute, to clarify what the property is. Views were normally granted, if the defendant phrased his request properly (asking that the entire property be viewed, not just the third that was subject to the action).

"term of years"

This was one defence that could be made against dower claim: that the property in dispute could not be subject to dower because the late husband did not have clear ownership of it.

"have him to warrant"

To confirm the legitimacy of the essoin made on the party's behalf.

"Alexander Hurel"

As one of the city sheriffs at this time he appears to have been capable of giving official recognition to a party's attorney.

"doomsmen"

The doomsmen, or lawmen, were a body or class of men serving, apparently hereditarily in at least some cases, as judges of a sort in town (or county or other local) courts in some parts of medieval England. A group of 12 iudices obligated to attend Chester's hundred court is mentioned in Domesday, and may be the same institution as the iudicatores of the 13th century Chester portmoot. A similar group of judges is seen at Middlewich (also in Cheshire). This institution has been particularly associated with boroughs of the Danelaw, but may simply be a Scandinavian expression of something more fundamental: a class of "lawworthy" and "discreet" members of the community who were relied on to know local law and be able to advise the court on, if not all at least the trickier, legal issues or technicalities. They did not perform the same function as the jury; although that institution may have reduced the importance of the judges in legal administration, judges are still active on occasion in Chester and Middlewich into the 15th century. Historians have debated whether these doomsmen were somehow predecessors to the jurors who formed incipient town councils (e.g. note the court role of the Fordwich jurors); the evidence is simply not sufficient for us to know with certainty, but it seems unlikely there is a direct link.

"the charge against Alexander be dismissed"

Alexander inde sine die, that is, he didn't need to appear again in his defence.

Session of the king's court of the city of York, held there 4 July 1416 before Thomas Bracebrig and Robert Burton, sheriffs of the city. John Bell of Thirsk brings a complaint against John Cooke, Zealander, in a plea of trespass. Pledge for the prosecution: John Asper spicer; the defendant is attached by pledges Thomas de Aton and John Louth. In which regard the plaintiff, in person, says that on 14 June 1416 in Bootham, in the parish of St. Olave within the liberty of the city of York, the defendant came with armed force – that is, swords and other weapons, etc. – and assaulted the plaintiff there and called him false and treacherous, whereby his good reputation and credibility were greatly diminished and he suffers that loss up to the present; and he took six pounds in coin that he found on the plaintiff, and unjustly carried it off in breach of the king's peace. So that, the plaintiff says, he suffered losses and damages to the value of £20; and for that reason he has brought this action etc. The defendant, by his attorney John Alman, came and denied the force etc., everything which etc., when etc., and the damages of £20 etc., and he says that the defendant is in no way guilty of the charges laid against him by the plaintiff etc., and that this is the case he submits to a jury etc. The plaintiff says that the defendant is guilty exactly as he earlier declared him to be; and that this is the case he likewise submits to a jury etc. Therefore a jury is to be brought into the dispute between them etc. Thereafter the [legal] process continued from day to day, according to the custom of the city, because of default of jurors, until 12 August of that year, when the 12 jurors – selected, inspected and sworn according to custom etc. – state under oath that the defendant is in no way guilty of the charges laid against him by the plaintiff etc. Therefore it is the judgement of the court that the plaintiff take nothing by his plea but is to be amerced for his unfounded accusation. The case against the defendant is dismissed.

Session of the king's court of the city of York, held there 4 July 1416 before Thomas Bracebrig and Robert Burton, sheriffs of the city. John Cooke, Zealander, brings a complaint against John Bell of Thirsk in a plea of trespass. Pledge for the prosecution: Thomas de Aton; the defendant is attached by pledges Andrew Ferur and John Asper spicer. In which regard the plaintiff, by his attorney John Alman, says that here within the liberty of York on 15 June 1416 the defendant unjustly came with armed force – that is, daggers and other weapons – and assaulted the plaintiff and called him false and treacherous, whereby his good reputation and credibility were greatly diminished, and made such serious threats to assault and beat the plaintiff that he was in fear of his life; and that he took, removed and carried off goods and possessions of the plaintiff that he found there: a horse with saddle and bridle, worth 50s.; a sword, a dagger, a wallet, a pair of "lynclathes", and 1 kerchief, together worth 10s.; a leather purse, worth 12d.; together with 12s.6d. in coin. And, unjustly and in breach of the king's peace, he imprisoned the plaintiff and, from the 15th to the 21st, held him imprisoned, so that the plaintiff was in fear of his life and was unable to go about his business or perform his necessities or go anywhere. So that, the plaintiff says, he suffered losses and damages to the value of £20; and for that reason he has brought this action etc. The defendant, by his attorney Robert Orwell, came and denied the force etc., everything which etc., when etc., and the damages of £20 etc., and he says that the defendant is in no way guilty of what he has been accused etc., and that this is the case he submits to a jury etc. The plaintiff says that the defendant is guilty exactly as he earlier declared him to be; and that this is the case he likewise submits to a jury etc. Therefore a jury is to be brought into the dispute between them etc. Thereafter the [legal] process continued from day to day, according to the custom of the city, because of default of jurors, until 11 July of that year, when the 12 jurors – selected, inspected and sworn according to custom etc. – state under oath that the defendant is guilty of the trespass just as was stated against him previously, except in the manner of the armed assault, and they assess damages for the plaintiff in regard to the trespass at £5. Therefore it is the judgement of the court that the plaintiff recover his damages, assessed by the inquest at £5, and the defendant is to be amerced. At which point the plaintiff requests execution against the defendant's pledges for his damages etc.; and the court grants this.

DISCUSSION

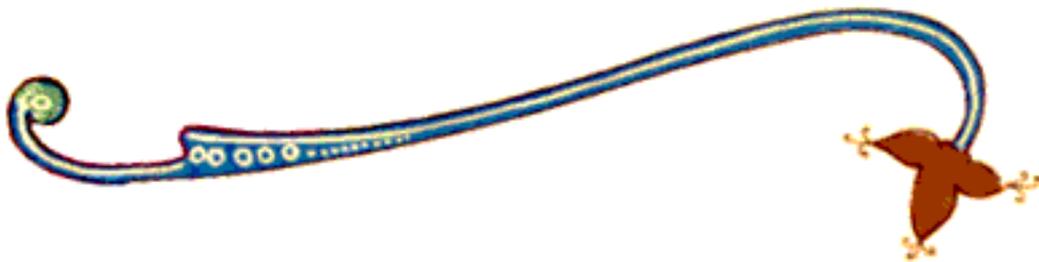

These records of suit and counter-suit brought before the sheriffs' court of York, by two non-residents – one a Yorkshire man, the other from Bruges – found their way into one of the city's books of memoranda because copies of the records were demanded the following year by the Duke of Bedford in relation to a case brought before his court by John Bell. The latter was suing John Lough (probably the John Louth who stood as pledge for John Cooke) and Robert Jarom (a prominent York man whose surname may indicate a possible Flemish background), on some matter related to the failed suit against Cooke; the defendants had made reference to York records of the earlier plea.

From the letters exchanged between the Duke and the city authorities, we learn that on 29 June 1416, several days following the confrontation between Bell and Cooke that resulted in the former holding the latter prisoner, Bell's son William presented to the mayor and aldermen a paper petition (subsequently attached to the sheriffs' court record). This demanded that Cooke be arrested and imprisoned as a felon, pending the next session of justices of gaol delivery, on the charge of having stolen over £6 of the king's tax money from John Bell's house in Thirsk (along with other of John's possessions); Cooke, said the petition, had already been indicted for the crime. Since the crime had not been committed in York, the case could not be heard before the city court.

The city authorities responded to this rather peremptory request with a public proclamation that if Bell or anyone else had any charge to bring against Cooke they should do so the following Saturday in the city court. The sheriffs then arrested Cooke pending that court session, on which day the mayor and sheriffs received information from sources they considered credible that Cooke had not, contrary to the petition, been anywhere indicted on that or any other charge. The petition was not in the name of any authority and it may have been that William Bell, a clerk, had written it himself. The sheriffs therefore set Cooke free. This perhaps explains why Bell felt obliged to concoct the story of Cooke having robbed him at Bootham, a desperate attempt to bring Cooke to justice (assuming that Bell's charge was in fact warranted).

This ploy having failed, it appears that Bell sought revenge, from the court of the Constable of England, against those who had helped Cooke.

Because the York case involved outsiders, the trial proceeded on a daily basis, to ensure expeditious justice. Much of what is presented in the complaint and defence is legal formulae.

NOTES

"Bootham"

A suburb of York.

"assaulted"

The Latin insultus could refer to either a physical or a verbal assault. In both cases, it appears that the confrontations (if one accepts that there were two separate incidents) were more in the nature of intimidation and coercion than direct physical violence.

"inspected"

The parties had the opportunity to review the jurors list, in case they wished to veto the participation of any juror they felt might be prejudiced against them, or whom the court found otherwise unsuitable.

"lynclathes"

Possibly an article of linen clothing or napkins?

TRANSLATION

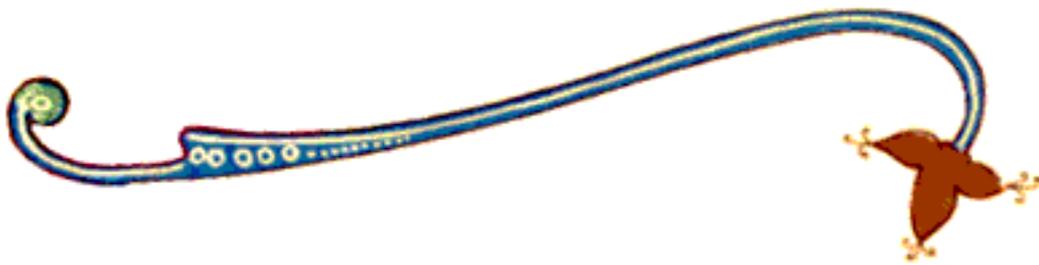

On which day [3 May 1481] Margaret Lassels, lately servant to John Calbek, came in person and, after being questioned concerning the theft of John Calbek's goods, confessed that John Richerdson labourer, recently of Welburn, came to her on several occasions at her master's house and spoke to her of the love they once had for each other, and promised to marry her, and so won her confidence. There being a coffer standing in the parlour, he asked her what it contained and she said there were certain jewels; he answering, said that if she would agree to him having possession of the coffer, he would take it out of there and soon after would obtain a horse and within a short time take her somewhere where no-one knew him or her. Having so suborned her, the said Richerdson came to the city on Sunday, April 1 and on that Sunday night around midnight the said Richerdson received, by her hand, the coffer, and he broke through the wall and took it away, carrying it beyond Layertorpe, where he broke it open and then departed. He returned three days after and spoke with Margaret at a currier's house in Hungate, promising her that on 15 April he would bring a horse to take her away. But he did not come until the evening of 21 April, when he spoke with her at the currier's house, and on 21 April went to the Minster and took his writings, and then departed, telling her he intended to go to Ripon to visit his father and mother. And she has not seen him since then.

DISCUSSION

The examination of Margaret Lassels was conducted by the mayor and city council. It seems that Margaret, deciding she had been deceived by the promises of Richardson – who perhaps been employed in work on the cathedral – had been overcome by guilt or despair of her seducer's return and confessed her part in the crime. Whether she won any sympathy from the city authorities is not recorded. Her turning informant does not appear to have resulted in Richardson's capture, if he is the same as the John Richardson labourer of Thorp-on-Tees (Yorkshire) whose arrest was ordered in York in 1483 at the complaint of a cleric.

NOTES

"Welburn"

About 12 miles north-east of York.

"Layertorpe"

A suburb on the east side of York.

"currier"

A tanner.

Transcription in: Mary Bateson, ed. Records of the Borough of Leicester, (London, 1899), vol.1, 114.

Location: Leicester

Date: 1273

TRANSLATION

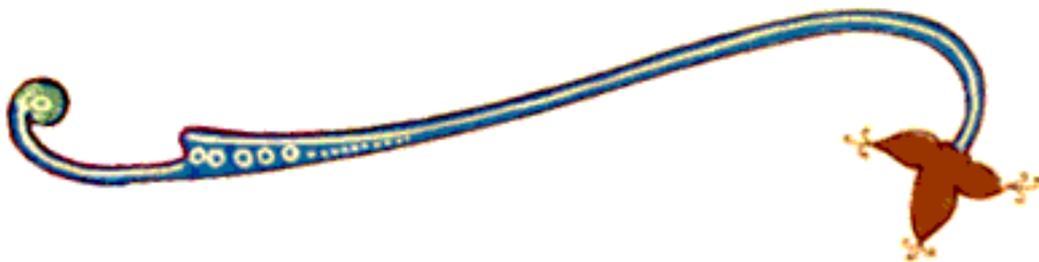

Let it be known that if anyone of the community or liberty of Leicester goes to Chester or Shrewsbury, or any other market town, to undertake trading and he is distrainted relating to a debt of any of his neighbours, as opposed to a debt of his own, he may return home and report the matter to the earl's bailiffs. The bailiffs shall give the debtor one warning, and a second; and, if he is unwilling to arrange for the release of his neighbour's goods distrainted on his account, the bailiffs are allowed to secure his house with locks – no matter who he is – and prevent him from entering until he has delivered his neighbours [from losses incurred] and made satisfaction for his debt. This was granted on 29 November 1273, [conditional] upon judgement by Sir Ralph de Hengham and Walter de Hopeton, justices of King Edward, in the hall of the Earl of Leicester at the castle.

DISCUSSION

This case illustrates the common-sense rationale behind withernam: a visiting merchant could incur debts and, after he left town, it would be difficult to force him to repay. One resort was to seize the goods of another visiting merchant from the same town, as compensation for the debt; this obliged the innocent merchant to seek retribution from his guilty fellow townsmen, after returning home. The intent was presumably partly to put the onus on a community to bring its own members to justice, and partly to discourage deliberate defaulting on debts by ensuring that flight was no escape from liability. Although a community might show some favouritism towards its own members against the accusations of outsiders, it also recognized that the crimes of individual members might adversely reflect on the reputations of all its members.

The desire to have this decision reviewed by the king's justices was a wise one, for the procedure of withernam was out of favour with the king, and was about to be limited by the Statute of Westminster (1275).

NOTES

"arrange for the release"

The way for the debtor to arrange the restoration of the distrained goods to his innocent neighbour would have been to submit to justice himself, or provide pledges for doing so.

TRANSLATION

First, that all those who, being plaintiffs or defendants in a case before the sheriffs of the city of York, do not have the means to hire lawyers or who have only petty pleas to prosecute or defend be allowed to speak on their own behalf, the plaintiffs stating the nature of their complaints and the defendants making a response according to the truth as they perceive it, without being given a hard time because lacking in legal advice.

[Jurors of] all inquests that are to be held before the sheriffs, at the instigation of a party, are to be impanelled and summoned to appear at the next court session following the parties having joined issue, without them taking or being given anything for that [participation]. They are to be distrainted heavily, without any forbearance on the part of the court, until they come. And on all occasions they are to be the best [choices] and those closest [in knowledge of the matters under dispute], through whom the truth can best be ascertained, so that the parties do not face delays or obstructions due to the ineffectiveness of the court.

In future, sessions of the sheriffs' court are to be held as specified by the statute, under the supervision of men knowledgable in the law, in due manner and by due process, without partisans, conspirators, abettors, or false accusers. Those indicted in accordance with the law at the sheriffs' court sessions are to be released on bail upon payment of a reasonable fine, as was anciently the case, and may be delivered by their peers without a ransome during the term of office of those sheriffs, according to the law; with the exceptions of those indicted for homicide. Those who can legally be mainprised should be permitted to be mainprised without fine, according to the law.

Inquests held outside of the [regular] court sessions are to be conducted in the same way as they are during court sessions; that is, by twelve [jurors] from the four parishes nearest the place where the offence or felony was discovered. Anyone who is impanelled and summoned during the court sessions, but fails to come, is to be amerced 4d., and the constable of the parish likewise 4d. for his not coming; of which ameracements half is to be had by the mayor and chamberlains, for the benefit of the community, and the other half by the sheriffs.

The executions of judgements given before the sheriffs are to be carried out as promptly as is humanly possible, within reason, without any [fee] being taken from anyone for the same.

Henceforth [only] persons of good reputation and sound judgement are to be impanelled on assizes before the justices; and those who have been put on one panel are not to be impanelled again, so that every qualified man take his turn in bearing the burden of responsibility and no-one is constantly impanelled. Neither the sheriffs nor their officers are to demand anything for performing their duty in assembling a jury [to decide] between the parties, other than the fees already established as due their officers.

The sheriff's clerk may take the following as legitimate fees of his office, and nothing else. First, for [recording] an entry of the name of the attorney, 1d.; if he enters an attorney for [both] a man and his wife, 1d. If plaintiff or defendant comes [by attorney] before the court to make an essoin, the clerk shall take 1d. for the entry and warrant of the essoin on the first day; for every subsequent essoin the clerk shall have 1d. For every essoin after law is waged, 1d. For every essoin (whether of plaintiff or defendant) after the first day, 1d. For entering any formal plea, 2d. For [making a copy of] each record extracted from the rolls (regardless of whether it is short or long), 6d. For each entry of a king's protection, 2s. For a recognizance made, or to be made, to the sheriffs, the clerk may take 2d. For an entry of sureties of the peace identified to the bailiffs, 2d. from anyone requesting such surety.

The clerk is to enter into his court roll the entire substance of all cases argued before the sheriffs, always according to due process, as is required to ensure proper judgement be made, without taking anything for that.

The clerk is to draw up a list, as a memorandum for the use of the sheriffs, of all original writs and all returns made to the same, including mention of how they are served and answered.

The sheriffs' sergeants shall take the following as legitimate fees of their office, and nothing more. That is, for a summons or an attachment, 1d. For a distress, 2d. For summoning a jury [to decide] between parties, 2d. For distraining on those jurors to oblige them to come [to court], 2d. For executing [a judgement] in a plea of debt or trespass involving a sum of less than 20s., 2d.; for a sum of 20s. and more, 4d. If the sergeant is found to fail in his duty, the plaintiff is to bring it to the attention of the sheriff, who will remedy the situation; if he does not do so, the plaintiff is to complain to the mayor, who will assign him one of his sergeants to undertake due execution. When judgement has been given and the defendant is unwilling to provide the sergeant with a distress sufficient for the sum recoverable, the sergeant is to seal up the entrance into the dwelling of the convicted party to force him to satisfy the other party for the cost of 13d. for making a complaint, as mentioned above. The sheriffs' clerk and sergeants are to perform their duties properly in all regards, consonant with law and right, taking as their fees what is indicated above, without supporting the quarrel of one party or the other and without oppressing the people, upon penalty of being removed from office and other punishments appropriate for the same.

The sheriffs' sergeants are to be replaced each year after Michaelmas; and, in the event that they fail in their duties during their term, they are to be removed from office.

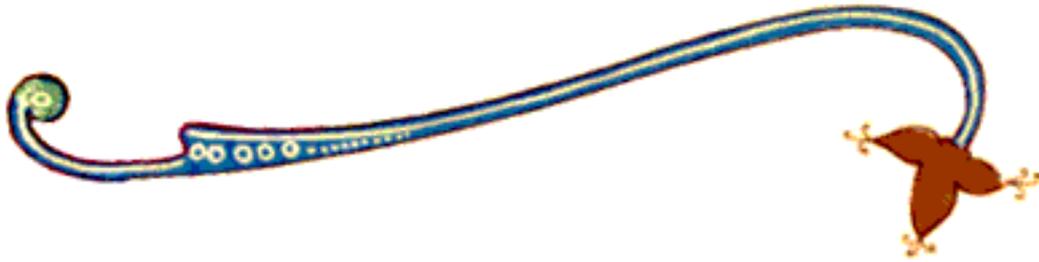

No man who is summoned for debt or trespass should be imprisoned, if he can find sufficient pledges for answering and standing to the common law.

DISCUSSION

These reforms relate to the sheriffs' court in York. The date of the ordinances is not known, but they cannot be earlier than about 1400 since the sheriffs came into being when York was given county status in 1396, but the sheriffs' court had evidently been in existence for some years prior to the ordinances. On the other hand, since these reforms seem to be influenced by regulations applicable to the sheriffs' court of London, we may suspect that the York authorities, in the early years of existence of their sheriffs' court, were looking to London for guidance on how best to operate that court.

By this period the legal profession was sufficiently firmly established, and the law sufficiently complex, that it was normal for lawyers to conduct cases for plaintiffs and defendants. This of course put the poorer townspeople at a disadvantage. These reforms reflect the financial obstacles to obtaining justice.

A "user pays" environment existed whereby bureaucratic officials earned part of their income from fees for performing various duties for citizens. This was however subject to abuse, through the charging of extortionate fees.

NOTES

"men knowledgable in the law"

Likely a reference to the recorder, an office established in York around the time (or shortly before) the grant of county status; the recorder was a professional legal expert retained to give advice to the city on legal and constitutional matters.

"delivered by their peers"

I.e. released upon fellow townsmen standing surety for their appearance at trial, as opposed to a sum of money being put down as bail.

"sureties of the peace"

Guarantors of the peaceable behaviour of one party towards another; the latter, as the one requiring this protection, being liable for payment for an official record being made of the fact and the guarantors' names.

"writs"

Some types of lawsuits could be, or had to be, initiated by a writ (usually from the king), and an official answer had to be given to the writ to confirm that it had been acted upon, or explain why not.

"a distress sufficient"

I.e. some personal possession assessed at the value of the judgement awarded against the defendant, surrendered by way of pledge for the defendant's payment of the damages.

Richard de Totenasse lays a complaint that on the night of Friday, 8 January [1244], when he was in his house in London, behaving peaceably, there came to his house from the house of Hugh Blund the sheriff: Hugh's brother William Goldsmith, Hugh's sergeant Jordan, Hugh's beadle John Shep, Hugh's clerks Ralph and John, John the clerk son of a capmaker, Adam the servant of Thomas de Stanes, Adam's brother Peter, Philip de Enefeud, Simon Vintner of Milk Street, and John de Haneford. They used force to break down the door of his house and to seize and tie up his boy-servant. After which they came to the door of his room, broke it down, dragged him out by the feet onto the staircase leading to the solar, and beat him severely about the body and on the soles of his feet, giving him a wound in the head. After that they used his belt to tie his hands behind his back and [led him] ignominiously through the streets by night to Newgate, Hugh being present and ordering it. There they first stripped him of his possessions and then put him in the deepest part of the prison, [dressed] only in his undershirt, forcing him to sit bare-bottomed upon the broom-swept ground, loading him down with irons and putting him in the stocks. In this fashion they held him in gaol for three days and three nights, in breach of the king's peace. He was not allowed to obtain bail, nor to have any food brought in or any friends visit him, until the king's justices for gaol delivery set him free, on the grounds that he was a clerk of the archdeacon of London. Following his release, he gave the gaoler 4d., and gave Hugh 6d. for three days keep of Richard's horse, which he [i.e. Hugh] had caused to be taken from his house that night. Hugh comes but the others do not. Hugh denies the force and injury and that anything contravened the king's peace. He says that Richard's wife Beatrice is a harbourer of thieves, and he had been given to understand that thieves were lodging there that night. When he sent his deputies to arrest those thieves, they arrived at the house and could not obtain free entry, so they broke down the door; they found in the house a great fire, Richard, his wife and his boy-servant being present in the house. Because Richard refused to act peaceably or to find a guarantor [for good behaviour], but drew his sword and cut off two fingers of one of the deputies, etc.

DISCUSSION

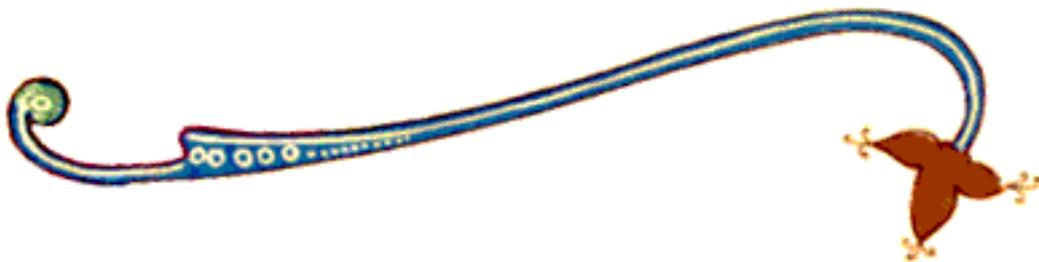

The outcome of this case is not recorded in the roll, so we do not know whether Richard de Totnes did, by resisting authority, provoke his harsh treatment, or whether the manhandling, beating and close confinement was reasonably typical in arrests. The defence against Richard's charge is not so much that he has exaggerated the violence of the arrest, but rather that the action taken was official (hence it is Hugh, as sheriff, who answers) and not unjust. Complaints about imprisonment are not uncommon in eyre records, it being part of the eyre's purpose to check into abuses of authority, but this case seems to have been an extreme. In its broad strokes, however, it paints a useful picture of police procedure.

It appears that Hugh put together a posse comprising his own shrievalty staff together with a few other citizens. That to effect the arrest he required such a large group and put it in charge of his brother (we may hypothesize from William being named first in the list), rather than his sergeant, may suggest that Hugh was anticipating problems. Hugh judiciously stayed out of harm's way until Richard and his household were subdued. Whether Hugh's defence that thieves were believed to be in the house was accurate or not cannot be judged, since the domestic confusion and Richard's resistance to arrest seem to have deflected the original purpose of the raid.

It may be noted that John Shep was apparently promoted to sheriff's sergeant later in the year, but was forced to flee the city, and was outlawed, after having arrested a man on suspicion of homicide, then flinging him so violently into the Newgate dungeon that he broke his neck.

Note also that prisoners often relied on family and friends, or even passers-by, to supply them with foods and other comforts while in prison. Richard's payment to the gaoler was likely for food and perhaps other comforts.

NOTES

"solar"

An upper chamber of a house, usually the parlour and/or bedroom of the tenant. The staircase may have been inside or outside the house; possibly the landing at the top of the staircase is where the beating took place.

"beat him"

The beating described was probably by kicking.

"Newgate"

As one of the sturdy gates on the western side of the fortifications around London, Newgate was a logical location for a city gaol of modest capacity.

"broom-swept"

Why Richard included in his deposition the point that the prison floor had been swept clean is uncertain, unless it was to emphasize the coldness of the floor, cleared of sawdust or other scrapings that might perhaps have offered some small protection.

"he was a clerk"

Richard claimed "benefit of clergy" to escape prison: that he was in holy orders and any charges against him should be tried in an ecclesiastical court.

"etc."

I.e. he was arrested.

From now on the Counters are not to be put to farm by any sheriff, or anyone else on their behalf, to porters of the Counters or to any other officer of the sheriff. The sheriffs must bear the cost of the rent, candles, and other costs such as the porters of the Counters have born in times past, due to their having the farm.

Prisoners who stay in the Counters for one night need not pay any fees to the porters or sheriffs pertaining to their stay in the Counter, except for a penny the first night for a bed. If it is their preference to be held in the Counter rather than be sent to Newgate or Ludgate – whether for debt, trespass, or any other cause (with the exception of felony or treason) – then the sheriffs are allowed to leave such prisoners in the Counter, for their comfort, [in return] for a payment to the sheriffs of 4d., 6d., 8d., or 12d. per person, per week (and no more), to be used to cover the rent of the building. This [amount] is to be assessed by the clerks of the Counter, taking into consideration [the reason for] their arrest and also their status.

If a prisoner makes such an arrangement with the sheriff or his clerks to be held in the Counter, as is mentioned above, the prisoner may be permitted to have his own bed [brought] there, if he owns one. If he does not, then it is permissible for the porter to provide him with a bed, taking a penny a night for it, as is done in all lodging houses.

Neither the porter nor any other officer of the Counter may sell prisoners bread, ale, coal, firewood, nor any other foodstuffs whatever, except by [honest] measure and at a reasonable price, upon penalty of imprisonment and imposition of a fine at the discretion of the mayor and aldermen.

Newgate and Ludgate

Because there has been much complaint in the past about many wrongs and extortions committed by the gaolers at Newgate and Ludgate, and their officers and servants, causing serious impoverishment to the king's poor subjects, it is ordained and agreed to by the mayor, aldermen and community of the city that henceforth no prisoner committed to Newgate or Ludgate (for whatever cause) should pay any money for lighting within those gaols, nor for any bed therein. But all prisoners committed to the same shall pay to their gaolers, upon release, 4d. (and no more) as the fee, in all cases except for treason or felony. Providing always that no prisoner, sent to the gaolers by order of the mayor, aldermen or sheriffs, to be punished and disciplined, has to pay anything to those gaolers, nor to their officers or servants, for lighting, bed, or fee. If any of those gaolers, officers or servants, takes [money] from any prisoner contrary to this ordinance, and is convicted of so doing, he is to be deprived of his office without [hope of] restitution; and furthermore is to pay ten times the amount that he extorted: half to the Chamber for the use of the community, and the other half to him by whose complaint he has been convicted.

But it is permissible for the gaolers to take reasonable surety from prisoners in their custody, in the sum of 100 shillings or more, for removing their irons – as has been the practice in other of the king's gaols previously.

DISCUSSION

There were different types of prison in the city, with different levels of discomfort and security, and some specialization in the types of criminals they hosted. Newgate, the largest of the city prisons, was an adaptation of a city gate and adjoining buildings. As an already strongly-built structure, it received the more serious offenders, including informers and those they accused, the dregs of society; it was a correspondingly harsh environment. Some parts of Newgate were evidently quite unpleasant, but there was doubtless no inclination to make comfortable those destined for hanging – indeed many did not survive the prison conditions long enough to meet that fate.

The Fleet prison was originally intended for offenders from London and Middlesex, but was later also used for outsiders sentenced by royal courts. It was designed as a prison, and surrounded by a moat. It became home to a large number of debtors, since the Exchequer and the Court of Common Pleas (both entertaining cases of debt) made use of it. Ludgate, founded in 1380, was on the other hand for freemen of London; it too came to be designated as a prison for debtors or the better class of citizens and, after a brief abolition, was re-established as such during the mayoralty of Richard Whittington in 1419. The two Counters were minor gaols at changing locations (in the fifteenth century in Cheapside and the Poultry), under supervision of the sheriffs and therefore used for any type of offender who came into the sheriffs' court – although this was primarily debtors or other minor offenders who could expect to be fined and released back into society. In earlier days the sheriffs had had to use their own houses to hold such offenders. The Tun on Cornhill was a temporary lock-up for those breaking curfew or offending against morals – typically, in both cases, whores, pimps, and johns; nearby was the city pillory.

It was fairly common for officials to look upon their posts as opportunities for private profit, by charging all sorts of fees for services. Those who could afford to pay these bribes could expect a more comfortable stay in gaol.

NOTES

"status"

That is, their economic means; fines and fees were often graduated according to the wealth or poverty of the offender.

"100 shillings"

This was not a fee, but an amount put up to guarantee that the offender, once freed of chains, would not escape.

TRANSLATION

Be it remembered, that John de Hakford came before the Mayor, John Not, and the Aldermen of London, in the Guildhall of the said city, on the Monday next after the Feast of St. Peter's Chains [1 August] in the 38th year, to shew to the said Mayor and Aldermen that one Richard Hay, fuller, came to him in the week last past upon Cornhulle, and asked him if he was one of those who were at Haveryng atte Boure, when the people of the City were there with our Lord the King. And he answered – "Yes," and then the said Richard asked if he was a tailor, and knew of the design that was entertained. And to this John answered that he was a tailor, but as to any design, he knew nothing about it; whereupon, the same Richard said to him that there were ten thousand men in the said city, all of one alliance and of one agreement, that, at a certain time, such as should seem to them the best, they would all be ready and prepared with their arms, – those who have arms, and those who have none of their own, with such arms as they may get, – to slay all the best people, and the great folks and officers of the said city : and that as he had not been warned before, he now gave him warning to be ready and prepared, whensoever the cry should be raised. On which charge, the said Richard was committed to the Prison of Neugate, there to remain until, etc.

[... In November Richard denied the charge and an inquisition jury was summoned ...]

Who said upon their oath, that the said Richard was in no way guilty of any of the things to them submitted thereupon. And because that the King himself commanded with his own lips that, if the said information should be found to be false, the same John Hakford should be punished, as an example to other such liars, the said John was remanded by the Mayor and Aldermen to the Prison of Neugate, there to remain until they should be better advised as to their judgment.

Then afterwards, on Saturday the morrow of St. Nicholas [6 December], in the 38th year etc., the Mayor and Aldermen, with the assent and good advice of the Commonalty, gave orders as to the punishment that the said John de Hakford should have for the falsehood aforesaid, – in form as follows. The said John shall remain in prison for one whole year and a day, that is to say, from Monday the Feast of St. Martin [11 November], in the 38th year aforesaid, the day on which he was convicted of the falsehood, until the same day in the year next to come. And the said John within such year shall four times have the punishment of the pillory, that is to say, one day in each quarter of the year, beginning, for the first day of the pillory, on the Saturday aforesaid, and in this manner. – The said John shall come out of Newgate without hood or girdle, barefoot and unshod, with a whetstone hung by a chain from his neck, and lying on his breast, it being marked with the words, – "A false liar"; and there shall be a pair of trumpets trumpeting before him on his way to the pillory; and there the cause of his punishment shall be solemnly proclaimed. And the said John shall remain on the pillory for three hours of the day, and from thence shall be taken back to Neugate in the same manner, there to remain until his punishment shall be completed, in manner aforesaid.

DISCUSSION

The pillory was a common punishment for offences against the community, particularly those involving some kind of deceit or fraud; the aim was to expose and humiliate the deceiver publicly. The usual penalty was one or more sessions of an hour each in the pillory, although a session might last as long as three hours for particularly reprehensible offences. The humiliation was not just a matter of exposure to public ridicule or insult, but also through some symbolic act to indicate the nature of the crime, as well as its public proclamation. For example, in 1365 a seller of putrid pigeon-meat had the pigeons burnt beneath the pillory in which he was secured, while in 1376 a cheat had his chequerboard burned beneath the pillory. More common was to hang around the offender's neck, or from the pillory itself, an item associated with the offence. Or, in a case in 1364, a seller of bad wine was forced to drink a draught of the same wine he had tried to foist on the public, and then the remainder was poured over his head. Some mitigation of the punishment was possible in special cases; in 1380, John Bernard was punished for selling sacks of charcoal of short measure, but, due to his advanced age, he was left in the pillory only for as long as it took to burn his sacks under him. Occasionally the humiliation itself was considered sufficiently strong punishment; in 1382 a man who had pretended to be a physician was punished just by being led through the city, accompanied by trumpets and pipes, seated on a horse without a saddle, with a parchment (bearing a false spell) and a whetstone hung from his neck, and a urinal hung before him and another behind him – after such exposure he was unlikely to be given any further business by the citizens.

A case of sentencing a forger to the pillory can be found in Why Thomas Corbett stood in the Pillory.

Slander and malicious rumour-mongering were looked on with considerable displeasure by city authorities, particularly in cases such as this when the spectre of social strife was raised. The fact that Hakford was also a beadle of Cornhill ward may have compounded the gravity of the charge. Compare with the sentence of a single three-hour session in the pillory imposed the same year on baker John atte Wode for trying to increase the price at which he could sell his own grain, by buying up grain from other sellers. Or with that in 1371 on Nicholas Mollere for spreading rumours (suggesting a loss of Londoner's franchises) aimed at stirring up social unrest; he was to stand in the pillory for one hour with a whetstone hung from his neck. Again, in 1382, John de Stratton was convicted of forging a letter for purposes of fraud and, for this deception, was condemned to be escorted by pipers and trumpeters from Newgate, through Cheapside, to Cornhill, to the pillory, where he would spend an hour, and suffer the same punishment the following day, after which he was to remain in prison until he had repaid the sum he had obtained through his fraud; there is no mention of the whetstone in this sentence.

Perhaps the notion of a popular uprising was not entirely a fiction conjured up by Hakford in an attempt to discredit Hay. Hakford evidently had friends with some influence, for in April 1365 the king ordered him released, upon finding guarantors, and putting up a bond of £100, for future good behaviour. One of his guarantors was John Northampton, possibly the draper of that name who later rose to a position of influence – ultimately mayor – and in the 1370s and '80s led a popular and somewhat radical reform movement that aimed to curtail the power of the aldermannic class.

TRANSLATION

The jurors present that on 12 February 1285, during the time of Roger de Wileby, Adam le Clerk, James Nade, and William de Burwode, bailiffs of the king, Walter Eghe was arrested upon an indictment at the city's leet court for stealing cloth from the house of Richard de la Hoe and for other thefts. Subsequently, on the 14th, he was brought before the bailiffs and the whole community of the entire city in the Tolbooth and, without any suit being brought [\[against him\]](#) by anyone, pressured [\[to say\]](#) by what method he wished to clear himself of the charge of theft; for better or worse he submitted himself to a jury. The bailiffs, together with the community, had an inquisition made [\[to ascertain\]](#) whether or not he were guilty; the inquisition determined that Walter was guilty, as a result of which he was sentenced to be hung, and they hung him. After he was taken down from the gallows and carried to the church of St. George for burial, he was found still to be alive.

The jurors were asked by whom Walter was taken down from those gallows. They say that it was by William the son of Thomas Stanhard; he came and acknowledged it to be true. Therefore he is committed to gaol. The possessions of Walter [are worth] £2.13s.4d., for which the sheriff is to answer.

It was testified that Walter stayed in the church for fifteen days – kept under guard there by the parishes of St. Peter Hungate, St. Mary the Less, SS. Simon and Jude, and St. George in front of the gate of Holy Trinity – after which period he escaped from the custody of the parishes. Therefore the four parishes are subject to judgement for the escape. After his escape, Walter put himself into the church of Holy Trinity, Norwich, and remained there until the king pardoned him the charge of breaking his peace; he now comes and presents in evidence the king's charter [of pardon] which states "Edward, by the grace of God, etc." [...]

The bailiffs together with the community were asked by what authority they sentenced Walter to hang and hung him, without a suit from anyone or without having caught him in the act. They say that at Easter after the events took place the king came into these parts and was given to understand how Walter was hung. As a result of which he sent John de Lovetot to the city to enquire into the matter; and he, because of their deed, took the liberties of the city into the king's hand, and they remained in the king's hand until his next parliament. At which parliament he afterwards restored to them their city by his charter.

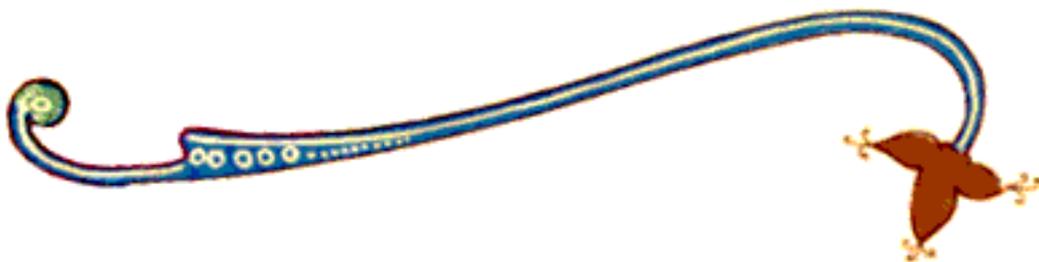

DISCUSSION

This mis-step by the Norwich authorities took place during a period when Edward I was attempting to assert greater control over the administration of justice. In 1278 he had added Quo Warranto proceedings to the scope of responsibilities of the justices in eyre; the challenge against the city was, in essence, of that type.

At this time, the law required that a felony trial had to be initiated either by a legal action being brought by one individual against another, or by a royal writ. The leet court might identify the occurrence of felonies, but without investigation turning up a plaintiff, a suspected felon ought not to be tried; the exceptions being for felons caught red-handed or confessing their crimes. The language of the record may indicate that Walter initially refused to respond to the charge, on those grounds, but the court forced him to do so. Why Richard de la Hoe did not bring a charge is something we cannot know for certain. One suspects that Walter may have been a notorious thief, leading the city authorities to act against him in the absence of an accuser, and there is some suggestion that the bailiffs may have based their actions on a breach of the king's peace (although this should have been held for trial by royal justices). The king's pardon to Walter may not have addressed the issue of his guilt or innocence directly, but may have been occasioned by the seeming divine intervention that allowed Walter to survive the hanging.

The king's action against the city authorities was a typical response of suspending the city privileges of self-government. The court record justifies this, as opposed to punishment of the bailiffs, by emphasising the community's role in supporting the proceedings against Eghe. The citizens purchased their own pardon and obtained a restitution dated 27 May 1285; the cost to them was an additional 40s. payment added to the annual fee farm. The restitution stated that the seizure of the liberties had been due to the city authorities sitting in judgement on crimes committed outside of their area of jurisdiction. It may therefore be that what we see in the case of Walter Eghe is another manifestation of the long-standing disputes between the city and independent areas of jurisdiction within the city bounds; it may be noted that the document of restitution made reference (without any apparent necessity) to an earlier seizure of liberties, in 1272, as consequence of the same disputes.

NOTES

"Tolbooth"

Tolbooth was the name of the building housing the city government at this time; it can hardly have been large enough to hold the entire community, a term used rather to express that the court session was public or – in this context – perhaps to ensure the city as a whole, not just its officers, was held accountable for the maladministration of justice.

"fifteen days"

I.e. he took advantage of the situation to claim sanctuary.

"parishes"

These parishes represent the one in which the sanctuary was claimed (St. George Tombland) – which suggests that the gallows were on Tombland – and the three closest parishes.

"subject to judgement"

The parishes were subsequently fined 100s.

"church of Holy Trinity"

The cathedral, just across Tombland from St. George's.

"pardon"

A section of text omitted by Hudson, but supplied in an earlier translation by Harrod (Norfolk Archaeology, vol.7, 1879), indicates that the pardon (as opposed to the restitution) was obtained on 24 March.

TRANSLATION

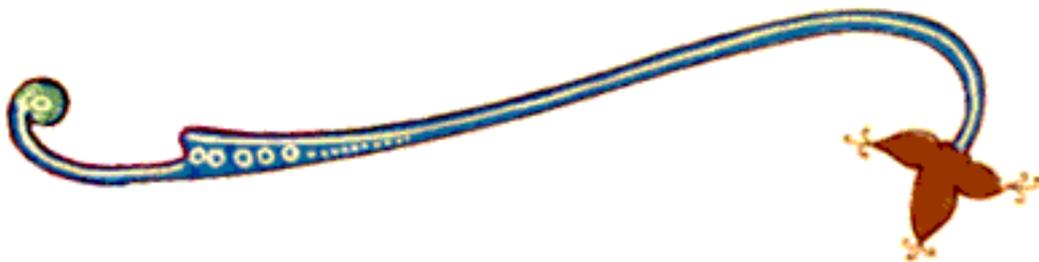

Memorandum that on the last day of February (that is, the 27th) 1391, there were gathered in the mayor's chamber on the Ouse Bridge in York, Robert Savage, then mayor, John de Hoveden and John de Doncastre, then bailiffs, John de Ripon, Robert del Gare, Robert Warde, John de Bolton, William de Rumlay, Hugh Straunge, and many other reputable men, into whose presence came in person Ralph del See, son of Richard del See of York. Following – indeed being led by – him came a certain Robert de Ellerbek mercer, barefooted and head uncovered, into the chamber before the mayor, bailiffs and other reputable men. He sinking down to the ground on bended knee before Ralph del See, humbly and tearfully implored Ralph in these words: "I beg you, Ralph, for the love of our Lord Jesus Christ, who redeemed humanity on the cross with his precious blood, to pardon and forgive me for the death of your father Richard del See." Upon which words, the mayor, bailiffs and other reputable men added their voices to that of Robert de Ellerbek, asking Ralph to pardon him for the death of Richard, his father, for the love of God. Ralph, his anger against Robert dispelled, responded: "In reverence of God, at the request of these respectable men, and for the good of Richard's soul, I forgive and release you forever for the death of my father Richard del See."

DISCUSSION

Nothing is known of the circumstances surrounding this case, nor is it clear whether Ralph's forgiveness released Robert from the risk of prosecution, although it may at least have paved the way to purchasing a royal pardon. As a mercer, Robert may well have been of the same society as the influential men who ran the city government, and perhaps was related to the Thomas de Ellerbek who was one of the attornies retained by the city; since he did not enter the franchise at York until 1395, he was probably in the early part of his career. Richard del See was perhaps of the same class, possessing multiple properties in York which Ralph had already (in January) sold to a London merchant; Ralph being referred to as "esquire" during those dealings.

TRANSLATION

In the time of Gregory [de Rokesle], mayor of London, in the eighth year of the reign of King Edward, [this ordinance was made] because often there have been some men who took the role of countors who did not have know-how about that craft and did not bother to learn it. Through the ignorance of which men, as the reputable men of the city fully recognized, defendants and plaintiffs have lost their pleas and their suits in the husting or the sheriff's hall, and some have been disinherited through the amateurish conduct [of these countors]. Anyone might put himself forward as a countor, at will, sometimes without knowing how to speak the correct language [of the courts], to the great disrepute of those courts which indulged this, and [also as?] pleaders, attornies and essoiners, and sometimes assessors in the sheriff's court – each [thus becoming] the judge of others, privately or openly; with the result that they have undermined justice [being done].

[Consequently] the mayor and his aldermen and other reputable men of the city, at the request of the sergeants and countors who are knowledgable in their craft and who felt greatly aggrieved by this [situation], have established that henceforth [the courts] shall not give an ear to those who do not have a reasonable knowledge of their craft, nor understand how to manage satisfactorily the [legal] business and suits of reputable men. And that such persons shall henceforth be admitted [to practice in the courts only] by the mayor and the aforesaid reputable men, except that each reputable man may nonetheless have such counsel as he wishes, whether citizen or outsider, to look after his business. However, this ordinance and decision is to hold good regarding our sergeants, attornies, and essoiners who are full-time residents and are in regular attendance on our courts. It is also their [i. e. the mayor's and aldermen's] wish that everyone restrict himself to his own role; that is, that a countor not act as attorney or essoiner, nor an essoiner [be a] countor or attorney.

The duties of a countor are thus: acting as a pleader and presenting cases, and making arguments at the bar, without any knavery, without casting blame or using foul language, and without slandering any man, throughout the duration of the court session. Neither sergeants nor attornies should advance [towards the judge] further than the bar or beyond the seat assigned to them. Nor is anyone to act as assessor, or sit close to the bailiff, for delivering pleas or judgements, unless the chief bailiff presiding in the court calls him forward – in which case he is to take an oath not to favour either party [to the suit].

Neither countor nor any other person is to object to or dispute the [court] records or the judgements. If it appears to them that there has been an error, the law and custom of the city allows them to make a complaint or representation to the mayor, who will rectify the error (if there is one). No countor is to take a case in order to be partner in the plea, nor to accept a fee from both parties to a suit; rather, he is to carry out his craft in a proper and ethical fashion. No countor, nor anyone else, is to dispute the judgements of the husting, nor attempt procurement [of outside support or authority?] to overturn the decisions and sentences of the community. The countors are to swear an oath that they shall not do this.

Whoever comes near the judge without being invited, or objects to the records and the judgements, or slanders another, if [done] in the sheriff's court, is to be suspended for 8 days so that he cannot present cases for anyone, or to be amerced 6s.8d by the sheriff. If [done] in the husting, he is to be suspended for 3 or more sessions, depending on [the gravity of] the offence. Anyone who is convicted of taking [a fee] from both parties is to be suspended for 3 years; where, after taking it, he abandons his client and allies himself with the other party, or takes it and defaults [in representing] his client, he is to reimburse double [the amount] and may not argue against that client in the plea. Anyone convicted of seeking to procure [support] to overturn the sentences and judgements of the community is to be perpetually disbarred, and forever considered a perjurer. A countor convicted of taking a case for a share in the [compensation] demanded is to be perpetually disbarred. The same penalty applies to attornies, if they are convicted of contravening this ordinance. If attornies, due to default or negligence, lose the cases of those they represent, the king's statute requires that they be imprisoned. No one who is an attorney shall act as essoiner, nor any essoiner is to be an attorney, under the penalty already mentioned.

DISCUSSION

It will be noted that this document refers to the practice of law as a craft (mestier) rather than a profession, placing it on a par with other trades and crafts in contrast to the predominant twentieth century view of lawyers as members of a profession, with a superior social standing to those who using manual skills. Even this recognition of the craft of attornies – probably not intended to imply any organized gild – was a step in the direction of professionalization, however. Yet, while this document indicates awareness that the practice of law required special training, this does not in itself imply professionalism in the fullest sense that we use the term today. In essence, the document's concerns could be reduced to the concern – seen repeatedly in borough ordinances regulating craft guilds – that unskilled practitioners would bring disrepute to the craft as a whole, and offered unfair competition to the skilled, established practitioners.

London's courts, because of their number and the early development of a fairly elaborate bureaucracy, attracted specialized lawyers from a relatively early date, but (as the document suggests) without blocking the activity of men whom we might describe today as "para-legals". Doubtless influenced by the nearby royal courts, London increasingly passed ordinances defining the practice of law in its courts, and specifying who was qualified to practice it.

The overall image from the reform document translated here is that the courts had become something of a circus, with unqualified men hanging around the courthouses to sell their services to parties in lawsuits, then acting outside of established court procedures, trying to exert undue influence over judges by having private words with them in court, and raising objections to recorded evidence or to judgements that went against their clients. Some were also capitalizing on the tendency to use litigation as a pressure tactic in business dealings or even as a means of speculation – introducing a volume of pleas in the anticipation that the income from victories or out-of-court settlements would exceed the costs of losses – by partnering with such plaintiffs (perhaps even inciting men to introduce such frivolous suits). Another abuse revealed by the document seems to have been a countor acting for both sides in the same plea, or accepting a bribe from the opposing party to sabotage his client's case, or even taking one party's case (and fee) and, having familiarized himself with the arguments for that party, switching sides to give the other party an advantage and himself a second fee; these of course being serious perversions of justice, and punished accordingly.

This could not have done much to enhance the reputation of lawyers, who were already the subject of distrust. In certain cases, notably that governed by the law merchant, lawyers were not normally allowed to take part, it being felt that the facts should speak for themselves and not be subject to the convoluted arguments of lawyers. And there were several largely unsuccessful attempts to prohibit the election of lawyers as parliamentary representatives.

A countor was a certain category of those whom are today called barristers or lawyers, i.e. they pleaded court cases on behalf of clients pursuing or defending a legal suit. The name, which was the one most commonly used in the thirteenth century for representatives of litigants, originates from the fact that they counted (argued) counts, i.e. accounts – although whether in the sense of a narration of the events (as the Latin equivalent, narrator suggests), or the sense of a demand that one person account to another for some alleged injury (there being some indication of a link of the term to the Latin computarium), is not clear.

Several categories of men engaging in legal practice, at some level, are seen in the document: sergeants, attornies, countors, pleaders, essoiners, and assessors. Whether or to what extent these categories may have overlapped is uncertain, although the document itself envisages distinctions. Certainly at a later date sergeants represented the highest level (the pool from which professional justices were chosen), years of service as an attorney prepared one to be a sergeant, and countors appear to have been a level lower than attornies; pleaders were perhaps men of even lesser experience (Riley suspected they were at the apprenticeship level). Esoiners provided a specialized service (see notes below). Assessors were apparently individuals present in the court whom the presiding officer might invite to advise him on an appropriate sentence – hence perhaps the notion that sentences were passed by the community. It would still be a few years before London had its first known public prosecutor, the Common Sergeant, and its first expert legal advisor, the Recorder.

NOTES

"reputable men"

A term often used to refer to a city council, and perhaps so intended in some uses here; but in others appears to apply more broadly to law-abiding citizens in general. This is an illustration of how we must beware of seeking too much, or consistent, precision in medieval use of terms.

"husting"

The husting was the principal city court in London, with jurisdiction in both civil and criminal matters, and the oldest court to receive official endorsement from a royal charter. The earliest reference to it is in the second half of the 10th century, and its purpose was probably to deal with day-to-day administration of local customs and other business touching community interests (something the outdoor popular assembly, the folkmoot, was not well-designed to do, meeting only a few times a year). It was the aldermen, the oldest body of purely local authorities, who served as what we would today consider a jury, along with other "reputable" or law-worthy men of the city; although at a later date the mayor and before that probably one of the sheriffs (or perhaps the mysterious "justiciar", or judge, referred to in Henry I's charter) presided. The jurisdiction of the husting was gradually eaten away as new institutions, such as the mayor's court, emerged.

"sheriff's hall"

This hall (hostiel – whence today's hôtel de ville) doubtless refers to the location where the sheriffs dispensed justice; they had jurisdiction over certain city gaols, also known as the Counters, for the punishment of minor offences.

"essoiners"

Persons who presented to the court the excuses of parties to pleas for being unable to attend a particular session and, if necessary, provided supporting proof for the legitimacy, or arguments for the acceptance, of the essoin. While likely originally a task performed as a favour by friends or family members, it became quasi-professionalized: some townsmen appear to have pursued essoining as an income-earning sideline, or as part of a wider clerical/notarial/legal occupation.

"chief bailiff"

Seems to be used here as a generic term for whatever officer is presiding in the court.

"to the mayor"

The mayor's court became the court of appeal from other city courts, since responsibility ultimately lay with the mayor to see that justice was done. It was through this that the mayor's court came to draw power away from the husting and sheriff's court. If a party felt that justice had not been obtained from the mayor, appeal could be made to a higher authority (such as, for example, to a lord who might intervene informally, or to one of the king's courts), but this would normally be considered an act of gross disloyalty to the community.

[Complaint to the Shropshire Eyre of 1292]

Avice Kylot of Shrewsbury complains to the king's justices about Adam de la Roue of Shrewsbury. Adam made a contract with Avice to manage her [legal] business faithfully and purchase writs from the king for her against Robert de Grymmesby, his wife Alice, Thomas the son of Alice, and Alice Hagereng, regarding a half-share in a shop in Shrewsbury, and [against] others regarding a tenement and a one-third share in a tenement and its appurtenances in Shrewsbury, and he has received 5s. of her money for honestly and faithfully pursuing [these legal actions] in the county court in Shrewsbury and also before you. Instead, through a sham prosecution and collusion with her opponents, he has caused her writs to be abated, and he has faithlessly switched from counselling Avice to counselling her opponents, to Avice's damage in the amount of £20; for which she begs redress, in God's name.

[Endorsed:] She failed to prosecute. Adam de la Roue cannot be found and has nothing by which he can be attached.

[Complaint to the Staffordshire Eyre of 1293]

Your Honour, this is a complaint and a grievance brought before you by Lovekin Semon of Stafford against John Organ of Newcastle-under-Lyme. Lovekin covered the costs of John going to London for three and a half years, to the amount of over 100s., on condition that he give assistance to Lovekin if he needed to go to court. It happened that Lovekin sued one Henry Meyler of Shrewsbury regarding a tenement with appurtenances in the town of Shrewsbury. In relation to that tenement, John Organ purchased a writ in Lovekin's name, and brought the writ before the court, and pursued the legal action at Lovekin's cost, and was his attorney for a good three and a half years. When the action was so far advanced that the tenement was on the verge of being lost or won, Lovekin's pleader John Organ went to Henry Meyler, the tenant of the property, and took £6.13s.4d from him to thwart Lovekin's claim. He forged for Henry Meyler 4 pairs of charters under the names of ancestors of Lovekin, which ancestors had been dead for sixty years or more before that time. For the last ten years he [i.e. Lovekin] has been unable to recover that property, but throughout that time has been beggared; nor did he ever receive back a penny, or even a halfpenny, of that 100s., except for his [i.e. John's?] horse in lieu of 20s. although it was not worth more than 6s.8d. Nor did he ever receive anything of the £6.13s.4d. To his damage in the amount of £20 and more. And Lovekin begs Your Honour for redress, in God's name and for the good of the king's soul.

[Endorsed:] He failed to prosecute.

DISCUSSION

Duplicity on the part of lawyers – taking money from both parties in a case, in order to betray the interests of one to the benefit of the other – was sufficiently common that it was occasionally among the list of articles that justices in eyre were specifically authorized to enquire about. Forgery of property deeds was also a common charge levied at lawyers.

We should not assume, of course, that all or a majority of lawyers were like to behave in this fashion. Avice Kylot and Lovekin Semon made bad choices in who to trust. Avice's lawyer sabotaged his own case in order to have judgement go against his client, and for the writ she had bought to come to initiate the action come to nothing. The fact that Adam de la Roue had no possessions that could be found in Shrewsbury that could be used as a lever to force him to answer to justice itself suggests that he was a shady character, and may be the explanation of why Avice, seemingly a widow of limited resources, was unable to pursue her action against him.

Lovekin had been prepared to loan the money necessary to support John Organ in London while he studied law there; the reference to John as a "pleader" uses a term applied to those permitted to argue cases in the king's courts and Lovekin's purpose behind his subsidization of a legal education was not simply to acquire an attorney, but a barrister with experience in the highest courts in the land. Whether the three and a half years in which John served faithfully as Lovekin's attorney were the same as the period of training in London is difficult to say. But John was evidently no youth when he decided on a legal career, for another bill presented to the justices in eyre was from John himself, complaining that one Master Richard de Thyknes had failed to completely fulfill an assignment given him by John's father Adam fitz Juliana on January 1, 1271 (at Newcastle-under-Lyme), to deliver to John, then in Orleans, some money and a gold ring. Even if we suppose that John had then been an apprentice or factor for his father, pursuing some commercial business abroad, his interest in the law could not have come until he had entered his twenties.

Then, as today, there was wealth to be made from a legal practice. The entrepreneurial outlook of medieval townsmen made the pursuit of law one of many avenues to making money, whether honestly or not.

NOTES

"caused her writs to be abated"

To abate a writ was to judge it to be ineffective or void.

The prospects of old age

There was no systematized or institutionalized retirement in medieval lay society. Yet there was recognition that, for those who lived long enough and had or could find the means to provide themselves with the basic resources (food, clothing, shelter) for survival, retirement was a possibility. Old age, when coupled with infirmity or disability (e.g. blindness), was seen as a valid excuse for ridding oneself of responsibilities. There are numerous cases of townsmen withdrawing from positions in local or royal service on such grounds, even though some may have been excuses behind which lie other reasons. On the other hand there was no social expectation that men would retire at a certain age; London seems an exception in ruling, in the fifteenth century, that no-one over 70 need undertake jury service if he did not wish. But 70 was very old; the harsher living conditions of the Middle Ages brought many to the condition of physical decline, that we associate with old age, in their 50s. Probably only about 15% of the adult population lived to a modern retirement age.

Retirement was necessarily a personal decision and it was largely up to individuals to take the initiative in providing for their retirement years. It is assumed that many retirees would have been supported by their families, through informal (i.e. unrecorded) arrangements, or supported themselves from wealth accumulated during their working lives. We sometimes find provisions in wills for the support of widows, while dower rights were partly intended for that purpose, although also to ensure the maintenance of underage children. Those townsmen who could not call on familial support and lacked the means to support themselves, except through earning a living, worked until they dropped. At the other end of the socio-economic scale, some of those wealthy townsmen who had invested in country estates (as quite a few did) may have retired there in their final years.

For townspeople there were no company pensions, for there were few "companies" – most of those involved in commerce or industry being self-employed, at least in the later stages of their careers. The Church was the closest to a perpetual corporation that looked after its own. In the case of government, we do find cases of bureaucrats upon retirement being rewarded for long or faithful service with annual allowances (e.g. a Coventry minstrel), and fewer of negotiating a pension in advance of accepting an appointment, this was neither regulated nor systematized. Such cases are rarer in local government, where the majority of participants were elected for brief periods rather than being career administrators, and more common at the national level, perhaps helping explain why positions in royal government were sought after.

The family was necessarily the first line of support for those in their years of decline.

The medieval poor house

A few of the aged who became too ill or infirm to work received support from a charitable institution, such as hospital or gild (in the case of members in decline). Socio-religious guilds were much more active here than craft guilds, since charity was one of the purposes of their foundation. The majority made provisions for support of members who were in decline, occasionally even non-members. Hospitals had a variety of purposes and some were specialized, but their most prominent role was to look after the poor, old, and sick who lacked the means to take care of themselves. Since the elderly were particularly prone to both infirmity and poverty, it seems likely that many hospital residents were older members of society, although only a handful of hospitals explicitly focused their efforts on the aged, such as one founded at Nottingham in 1392 intended for impoverished, aging widows. The aged who lacked family support were particularly susceptible to falling into poverty.

The late thirteenth century saw a second wave of hospital foundation; this was a time when town governments were expanding their spheres of activity and when increasing socio-economic differentiation within urban communities may have stimulated a sense of responsibility among the urban elite to provide for those less fortunate, and their own souls at the same time. Many of these and later hospitals were founded by leading townsmen, individually or in groups (sometimes socio-religious guilds), and typically imposed a semi-religious rule upon the inmates while also supporting one or more secular clergy who, sometimes together with the inmates, had the duty of praying for the souls of the hospital benefactors. The Hospital of St. Mary at Yarmouth is one example; it provided a refuge for impoverished adults of at least 30 years of age who had no family to support them, and it may well be that aged persons represented a large proportion of the inmates.

A trend in the fifteenth century was to endow the almshouse type of hospital, to accommodate the poor or aged. The London foundation of Richard Whittington is one of the best-known examples. As did the urban hospitals founded in earlier periods, these attracted donations from citizens, often in the form of small bequests. A few of these foundations specified a minimum age of inmates, indicating their focus on the elderly.

Despite the Church teaching the importance of charity for the good of the giver's soul, and despite some provision by the wealthy during life and particularly at death for charitable donations, including to hospitals, only a small percentage of the aged poor could have benefitted from that resource. Residents were not necessarily penniless, for some were accepted only on payment of a sizeable entry fee or an annual amount for bed-and-board. In some cases preferential treatment was given to freemen or householders in the locality, to the detriment of the unenfranchised poor. So, to some extent, hospital foundation represents the urban upper class providing for its own. There was no real effort to address poverty on the broader scale, as a social undesirable, for poverty was part of Christian tradition, and was largely accepted as within the natural order of things; only as the economy worsened towards the close of the Middle Ages was there a growing resentment of those paupers (such as beggars and vagrants) on the peripheries of society.

At hospitals such as St. Leonard's, York, of which only ruins remain (top left), and St. Giles, Norwich, (below) which remains largely intact and impressive, elderly inmates could be assured the necessities of life in their final years; hospitals and other religious houses also assisted poor non-residents with daily gifts of food and drink (top right). The missions of St. Giles' and St. Leonard's continue today with modern institutions.

Retirement homes

For those of means, however, there were several other options open for arranging for support in the latter part of one's life.

It was not a common occurrence for medieval merchants or craftsmen to put aside their occupation and become monks or friars in mid-life, although their sons or daughters might be attracted by the religious life, and large families often had at least one member who had chosen to pursue a career in the church. However, the standard of living in religious houses generally being in some respects higher than that of secular society, some of the wealthier townspeople negotiated arrangements whereby they would spend their declining years in relative peace and comfort in a "retirement home" environment of a friary or some other religious institution, including hospitals – the result of which was that paying guests consumed resources originally intended for the poor. Such maintenance contracts, specifying the terms of the accommodations, meal provision and other aspects of the retirement – the medieval equivalent of a modern pension – are known as a corrodies. The patrons of monasteries, particularly the king, arranged for corrodies to reward their old servants, again consuming the resources of such institutions; this came to be perceived as an abuse. Many who did not retire to friaries chose to be buried there – an indication of the high regard in which these institutions were usually held.

Maintenance agreements could be made with younger members of the family, neighbours, or friends, or respectable members of the community, or religious houses (e.g. hospitals). In many cases, the business-like character of these agreements likely disguises an element of trust or goodwill, or sometimes a landlord-tenant bond, which lay behind the relationship of the parties to the agreement; on the other hand, the formality of the agreements may reflect concern on the part of the elderly that they risked being treated poorly if reduced to dependency on others. In some cases, however, the retiree and the maintainer had no evident relationship, and the arrangement seems purely a matter of business. This may have been a necessity for the elderly who had no children or other close relatives on whom they might rely. It is believed that in the decades after the Black Death had taken its toll in the mid-fourteenth century, this situation may have become more common, because of high mortality among the young and the division of families as a reduced workforce encouraged migration to where better career opportunities lay.

These agreements were essentially contracts in which the retirees turned over their real estate, or in the case of widows their dower rights, and perhaps (sometimes explicitly) most of the moveables therein, to the maintainer conditional upon the latter providing accommodation, food, clothing and other necessities on a regular basis for the remainder of the life of the retirees or, less commonly, for a specified period. For example, a contract at Coventry in 1332 involved Henry le Spicer and his wife Mary agreeing to give Henry's father, Richard:

- a suitable place for his bed in Henry's own house, along with suitable bed-clothes;
- food and drink served at Henry's own table, of sufficient quantity for Richard's needs and of the same quality as that consumed by Henry and his wife;
- a robe of decent quality cloth every 30 November, with suitable fur for an overcoat;
- a winter coat with cap and fur lining every other Michaelmas;
- a summer tunic every alternate 3 May;
- 6 pairs of shoes and hose each year;
- 50s. cash each year, out of a rent from a Smithford Street property.

It is likely these Richard had granted his properties to Henry in return for this maintenance.

Such agreements can be considered a sort of pension, and the pensioners might often stay on in the homes they had turned over to the maintainer, or go to live in the maintainer's home, or be supplied with a new residence. The more property retirees had to bargain with, the better the conditions they might hope to negotiate. In the case of widows or other propertied women who found themselves in financial difficulty in the later years of life, the arrangement might take the form of management of the property until the woman's finances were on a sounder footing. For the party taking on maintenance obligations, the advantage was access to a source of revenue; this was useful to younger generations of the family, to religious institutions that relied on donations, and to the entrepreneur.

For once, we tend to have better information about maintenance agreements in rural rather than urban communities, since villagers' property was held of manorial lords and any transfers had to be reported in the manorial court. Otherwise much of our knowledge of urban agreements comes from the records of religious institutions, or from court cases involving contractual disputes.

Maintenance agreements did not always work out as planned, sometimes because the maintainer reneged on the agreement, or sometimes because the retiree became dissatisfied with the constricted terms interfering with lifestyle. In poorer households an aged parent might expect no more than a bed in the corner and a share in family meals. Wealthier townspeople, however, had in mind private quarters, access to cooking and storage facilities, an adequate diet, regular allowances of new clothing, provisions for a servant, and freedom to entertain or be entertained elsewhere. For those who could afford it, retirement – if coupled with fair health – might be quite comfortable. However, it seems likely that retirement was most commonly prompted by failing health.

A York gildhall incorporated hospital facilities.

TRANSLATION

[1. Gild of (St. James) Garlickhithe, London]

If any of the fraternity is the victim of misfortune, so that he has nothing and, through old age or infirmity, is unable to support himself, if he has been a member of the fraternity for [at least] seven years and fulfilled all his obligations towards the gild, [then] every week thereafter he shall receive 14d. from the communal box, for life (unless he recover from his misfortune).

[2. Gild of St. Katherine, Aldersgate, London]

Also, if any of the fraternity should fall into poverty, or be overcome by old age, so that he cannot support himself – or through any other bad luck, due to fire or water, thieves, illness, or any other occurrence (so long as it is not his own fault, due to his own bad character), then he shall receive 14d. a week.

[3. Gild of St. Mary, Beverley]

The alderman and stewards of the gild shall visit those bretheren and sisteren who are poor, ailing, or weak, and who have not enough of their own to live upon; and they shall give to these as they think right out of the gild stock, as has been agreed; namely, to each one so being poor, ailing, or weak, eightpence, sixpence, or at least fourpence, every week, to help their needs. And if any of those poor bretheren dies, or any other of the gild who is not well off, he shall be buried at the cost of the gild, and have all becoming services.

[4. Gild of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Kingston-upon-Hull]

If it happen that any of the gild becomes infirm, bowed, blind, dumb, deaf, maimed, or sick, whether with some lasting or only temporary sickness, and whether in old age or in youth, or be so borne down by any other mishap that he has not the means of living then, for kindness' sake, and for the souls' sake of the founders, it is ordained that each shall have, out of the goods of the gild, at the hands of the wardens, sevenpence every week; and every one so being infirm, bowed, blind, dumb, deaf, maimed, or sick, shall have that sevenpence every week as long as he lives.

[5. Gild of the Blessed Mary, Chesterfield]

If any brother, through age, or loss of limb, or leprosy, comes to so great want that he cannot support himself, the bretheren who are able shall, in turn, supply him with needful food, or shall find for him a house of religion where he may stay during life.

[6. Merchant gild, Coventry]

And if any man or woman of the fraternity becomes so enfeebled through illness or old age that he cannot work or engage in commerce, he shall be supported, at the cost of the gild, in a manner fitting to his status.

[7. Holy Trinity gild, Coventry]

If any brother or sister of the gild becomes so feeble, through old age or through any worldly mishap, that he has not, and cannot earn, the means of living, he shall have such help, at the cost of the gild, that he shall not need to beg his bread.

[8. Holy Trinity gild, Cambridge]

If any brother, or brother's wife, comes to want through mishap, without any self-guilt, he shall have, at the cost of the Gild, sevenpence every week of his life while the need lasts, and a gown and hood every year; and he shall be freed from all Gild payments.

[9. Gild of St. Clement, Cambridge (1431)]

Also, it is ordained by agreement of everyone that if any brother or sister of this association, reaching old age or falling into great poverty, lacks the wherewithal to maintain or support himself, he shall receive 4d. weekly from the goods of the gild, as long as those goods are worth 40s. or more. Should it happen that there are more than one such poor men, then it is ordained by agreement of everyone that the 4d. weekly is to be divided among them all.

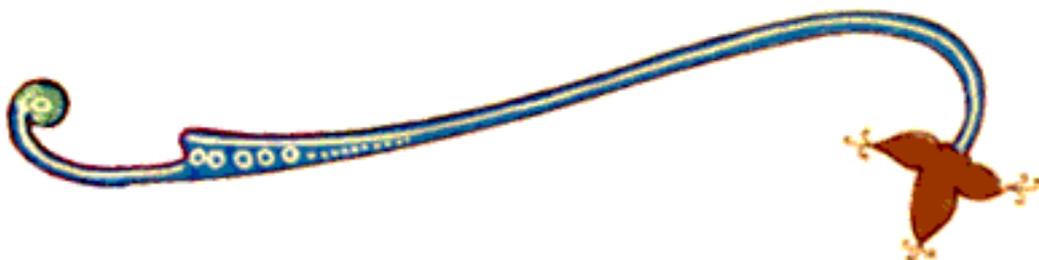

DISCUSSION

A large number of the socio-religious gilds made charitable provision for persons – usually members – who became ill or impoverished. Only a small number specifically identify old age as a cause of these misfortunes, but the elderly were one of the groups in society most likely to succumb to illness and/or poverty. Part of the purpose of such gilds was charitable works, and this was the justification for the king granting them licences in mortmain to acquire property. However, their aim of their alms programme was probably also to create a closer bond among the membership, and between members and the gild, by promoting the idea that members could rely on support if they fell upon hard times, as well as to ensure that no member was reduced to the indignities of begging, which would have reflected badly on the gild.

The provision made for supporting elderly members unable to support themselves financially varied according to the means of the gild and, in some cases, according to the social status of the recipient; longstanding members or former gild officers might have been the beneficiaries of the higher amounts. As the extracts showed, aid given might be a case of supplying food, or money, and sometimes clothing, or at the least of helping the unfortunate individual find shelter in a hospital. Pecuniary aid was modest, but then a gild with limited resources might find itself supporting at any given time an unknown number of recipients; estimations of the cost of living suggest that the amounts given would have provided for bare subsistence only, and in some cases less.

The wealthy mercantile gild of Holy Trinity at Lynn has left us a broken series of account rolls between 1373 and 1484 that show its annual payments in alms to impoverished gildsmen, widows, elderly members, and local anchorites or hermits. At its peak of activity in 1442 there were 52 such recipients. Most received the annual equivalent to only a few pennies a week. Among the highest paid were Nicholas Dunton and Robert Narburgh, who would have been around 60 years old when they are first found receiving alms from the gild (1438); why they were given a relatively high amount – about a shilling a week – is unclear, although Dunton had played some role as custodian of one of the town quays and perhaps both men were long-standing employees of the gild. At the same period, a lesser amount was being paid to Alice the widow of Robert Burgeys, a prominent townsman who had in 1424 obtained a discharge from the local office of constable on the grounds of old age; he died a few months later. St. George's gild at Norwich likewise supported multiple alms recipients, mostly men (whereas Holy Trinity gild at Lynn supported as many women as men), at the amount of 8d. a week, raised via obligatory contributions from members of a farthing a week. Recipients included Thomas Digard who had since 1420 played the role of the dragon during the annual gild procession; by 1445 he was unable to support himself and was given financial aid by the gild for the final few years of his life. At the other end of the social scale, judging by its name, was the Poor Men's Gild, which was able to provide only 3d. a week to members in trouble; its very existence suggests that most socio-religious gilds were for the support of the urban middle and upper classes.

NOTES

"communal box"

I.e. the gild's treasury.

"fire or water"

Referring most probably to the loss of worldly possessions through a house fire, and the loss of mercantile possessions through a ship sinking.

"own fault"

E.g. through gambling, debauchery, litigiousness.

"house of religion"

A common way of referring to a hospital.

"fitting to his status"

Toulmin Smith chose "as befits his need" as the translation of solonc ce que soun estat demaunde, but I believe the "needs" were more social than physical.

"freed from all Gild payments"

A few gilds required recipients to use a portion of their alms to pay the annual gild membership fee.

TRANSLATION

Memorandum that in full hallmoot of Cirencester, held on 24 October 1310, an agreement was made between Adam, the lord abbot of Cirencester, and the convent of the abbey on one side and John son and heir of the late Thomas de Baudynton on the other. Which is, that in front of the hallmoot John, on behalf of himself and his heirs in perpetuity, turned over to the abbot all the tenements, lands, and rents in the town of Cirencester, its fields, and the fields of Chesterton that he acquired by inheritance from his late father Thomas de Baudynton; for the abbot and convent to have and to hold forever. For their part, the abbot and convent in compensation for this surrender have granted to John, for as long as he shall live, the following. That is, a place with a bed and other conveniences in a certain chamber built into the abbey's great gateway. Each day a white conventual loaf and a brown conventual loaf, with broth and two dishes of whatever happens [\[to be cooked\]](#) that day for the free servants [\[of the abbey\]](#); and each Saturday 4 gallons of conventual ale and four gallons of the ale called chaplain's ale, received from the abbey brewhouse. For clothing and shoes and other things he needs to purchase, 20s. received from our treasury each year on 29 September, for as long as he lives.

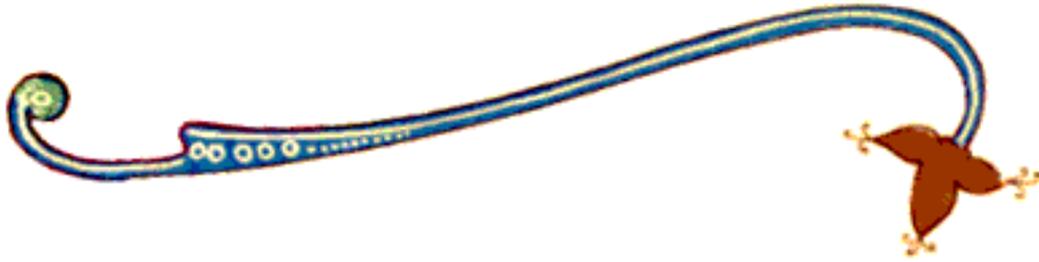

Furthermore they have granted his boy-servant each day a loaf called white bread, with broth and garnishes such as for grooms of free servants. If it should happen that John is unwilling or unable to warranty those tenements, rents, and lands to the abbot and convent, all those above items granted to him shall altogether be withdrawn. In witness of which matter the parties have each in turn appended their seals to the indenture.

DISCUSSION

Cirencester was a Roman settlement. At the time the abbey was founded (1133) Cirencester seems to have had borough status – the foundation charter mentions burgesses there, and such mentions appear repeatedly in the Pipe Rolls during the latter half of the twelfth century, although these types of evidence are not by themselves unambiguous demonstrations that Cirencester should be considered on a par with places that were clearly urban. The Cotswold town was making a living from the wool trade. However, the abbey and town were at odds for jurisdiction and Richard I gave the abbot lordship over the town. Henceforth the townsmen were forced into a struggle to defend the independence on which their prosperity partly relied. Matters reached a climax in the king's court in 1342, when the townsmen accused the abbot of, most notably, trying to suppress the rights and institutions (the town court) that made Cirencester a borough. The abbot's counterargument was that Cirencester was only a vill, a manor belonging to the abbey, not a borough. The abbey's influence – not least pecuniary – won out; in 1343 the king granted a charter confirming the its authority, and dismissed the townsmen's complaints.

Notwithstanding the tensions between abbey and townspeople, the abbey could be a generous patron, particularly to its loyal servants. There is some implication in the document that Baudynton may have been such. At least he was treated to retirement rights comparable to a lay, non-villein servant of the abbey. Turning over one's patrimony to another party was a serious matter, implying that John de Baudynton had no surviving heirs, who would normally have inherited the patrimonial real estate; his household seems to have comprised only a male servant. Most if not all of the property seems to have been accumulated by John's grandfather William, in the third quarter of the thirteenth century.

"conventual"

The transcript has cornerium, but I can make no sense of this adjectivally and am going to assume (given the context) it may have been an incorrect transcription or inaccurate expansion of an abbreviation. TRANSLATION

Gilbert Lovelle, master of the De Vaux school, Salisbury, and the scholars themselves give greetings to all etc. Know that we, by unanimous agreement, voluntarily and out of our goodwill, have granted and by this present charter confirm to Roger Moton and his wife Christine sustenance in our house for the term of their lives, while they reside in our house, in sickness and in health, on the same terms as any scholar of the house receives there.

Roger may sit at the second table [in the refectory] beside Roger Fouk, on his right, while Roger is alive. After the death of Roger Fouk, he may take over for the rest of his life the place at the table where Roger [Fouk] was accustomed to sit. Christine may have a place at whatever table she would most like. A chamber is to be built, half at Roger's expense, on the east side of the hay-barn next to the water, with a privy and a fireplace. When it suits him, Roger shall build at his own expense a stable for a horse. From this day forth, Roger and Christine may have access in and out, inside the close as well as outside, as freely as any scholar of our house. After Roger's death, Christine may have each year, for as long as she lives, 13s.4d on 25 March.

We, the master and scholars of the house, grant for ourselves etc. that after Roger and Christine die an anniversary mass will be celebrated for them by the scholars, each year in perpetuity, and that on the day of the anniversary of [the deaths of] Roger and Christine every scholar who attends [the mass] shall receive 2d.

Given at Salisbury on 14 April 1317, these being witnesses: Geoffrey de Weremunster, then bailiff of Salisbury, Reginald Tuddeworth, then mayor of Salisbury, William Berewik, then coroner of Salisbury, John Baudry and Walter Saucer, then reeves of Salisbury, Robert Cnowelle, Henry de Melkesham, William de Keynes, William de Calewey, William de Morden clerk, and others.

DISCUSSION

The "House of the Valley of Scholars of Blessed Nicholas", as it was originally called, has been considered by some as the first university college in England, founded two years before Merton, the earliest Oxford college. Like the early Oxford colleges, that at Salisbury was until late in the Middle Ages, called a "house" rather than a "college". After a violent argument between the entourage papal legate and Oxford students in 1238, there was an emigration of students and teachers from Oxford, mainly to Northampton and Salisbury. New Salisbury as we call it now – in reference to its eclipsing an older borough now called Old Sarum (although the former was actually a development of a manorial settlement probably as old as the latter) – had by then acquired a reputation as a centre of learning, and by the 1270s several faculties had been established there. After lectures resumed at Oxford, some of the migrants returned, but others may have remained at Salisbury, and their numbers may have swelled again when there was a renewed exodus from Oxford during the town-gown troubles of the 1260s and '70s.

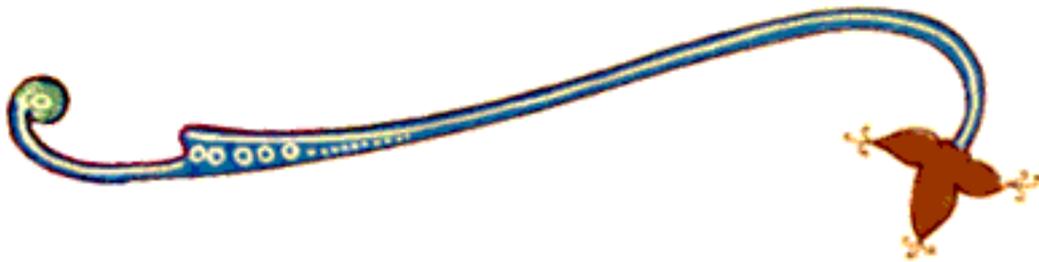

It was perhaps with a view to accommodating such scholars that in 1262 Giles de Bridport, Bishop of Salisbury, founded a hospital dedicated to Jesus, the Blessed Virgin Mary, and St. Nicholas. He may have been inspired by the University of Paris, with which his brother was associated and where he himself may have studied. The name he chose for his foundation echoes the order of Augustinians called "de Valle Scholarium", which had built a college in Paris in the 1230s. The site of the Salisbury foundation was a meadow just south of the cathedral precinct, on the northern bank of the River Avon, and across the road from St. Nicholas's Hospital, a slightly older episcopal foundation, with which there was some association, although not a close one – the two institutions were separately administered. Yet several early colleges at Paris had emerged as offshoots of hospitals originally for the sick and aged, which expanded to offering board and financial support to students.

The aim of the foundation was to maintain a warden, or master, two chaplains, and twenty poor but respectable scholars, who would be taught theology and the liberal arts. The Bishop made the Dean and Chapter of Salisbury the college's patrons, and required that all masters be chosen from the cathedral chapter. A secondary goal was to establish a chantry college, whereby the chaplains and students would pray for the souls of the founder and benefactors. The master was assisted in his duties by a steward, or proctor, an officer elected from the scholars for a year or two at a time; during the fourteenth century he played an increasing part in college administration.

The main role of the de Vaux college then was to support and teach students. The Motons were clearly a different category of resident, being provided with private accommodations and various amenities and privileges. This corrody is unusual in its degree of detail about the terms. It was rare for the college to make this type of arrangement; more common were arrangements for spiritual benefits, such as endowments in return for obits, or that by which Salisbury citizen Gervase Apothecarius and his wife Emma agreed to up the rent they paid the college for a tenement in Minster Street, in return for two candles being kept burning perpetually for their souls. The Moton arrangement was not, however, the earliest corrody granted by the college. In 1304 John de Wotton had endowed it with a piece of land in return for a corrody giving him the same support, for the rest of his life, as a fellow of the college.

A subsequent entry in the cartulary, drawn up ca.1447, is a copy of a record of a grant made in the borough court, a little later in the same year, by Roger and Christine to Gilbert Lovel, representing payment for the corrody granted by the college. This payment was in the form of an endowment to the college of the Moton's property in Minster Street and Winchester Street, including one tenement (possibly a shop) near the west gate of the college, along with 43s. in rents from other properties. Lovel, in his role as a canon of the cathedral chapter, became the feoffee of these properties, on behalf of the college, until a licence for alienation in mortmain could be obtained (1325), allowing him to transfer the property to himself, as warden, and the scholars. The income from these properties would provide the funding for the college to support the living expenses of the Motons; after their deaths, the college would be able to reallocate the income to its own uses, other than the money required for the celebration of the anniversary masses.

NOTES

"Roger Fouk"

One of the more prominent scholars, who had served as acting master in 1296.

"a privy and a fireplace"

It may seem odd to specify that the chamber in which the Motons would live would be equipped with privy and fireplace/chimney – features taken for granted in the western world in the latter half of the 20th century – but they were not standard features in the early 14th century. Fireplaces, for example, were only beginning to be introduced in domestic architecture, largely due to the necessary protective structure surrounding the flue being either expensive (stone) or an innovation (brick).

"1317"

As the date of the document, based on regnal year, does not specify whether Edward II or Edward III is intended, there is some uncertainty as to whether the date is 1317 or 1337. The former appears more likely, given the identity of the master of the college, yet some of the names of witnesses suggest the later date (without clearly ruling out the earlier).

TRANSLATION

This indenture, made on 26 February 1379 between the Prior and Convent of the Augustinian Friars of Lynn, on the one side, and Geoffrey de Gadgrave, their servant, on the other side, witnesses that Geoffrey shall reside with the present prior and convent and their successors for the term of his life, and he will serve them well and faithfully, to the best of his ability, in duties related to the bakery and mill, applying his skill and his efforts to perform whatever is required by those duties, but with all necessary materials being provided at the cost of the convent.

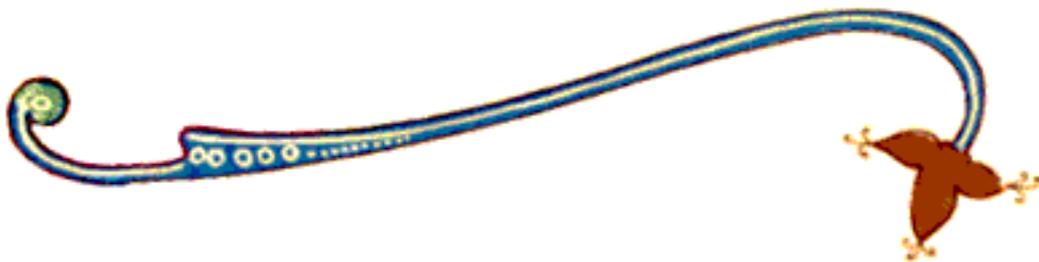

Geoffrey is to receive annually from the prior and convent as wages for his labour, for as long as he shall be able to perform satisfactorily his specified duties, 30s. in cash paid promptly in equal portions at the usual four terms of the year. If it should happen that Geoffrey is afflicted by infirmity or old age, so that he is incapable of continuing work in those duties, he shall not receive the annual wages, but shall still receive board from the convent table as previously, being served the same food allowance as the friars. Furthermore, if ever Geoffrey is so seriously incapacitated with infirmity or old age that he is unable to bring himself to the convent table, then every week he is to receive in his chamber, which the convent is bound to provide for him, 8 conventual loaves and 7 pots of ale, and whatever allowance [of other foodstuffs?] is at that time issued to every friar of the convent. On condition, however, that those victuals are had by Geoffrey for his personal use; he shall not be permitted to sell any of them. Both the prior and convent on the one side, and Geoffrey on the other, agree faithfully to carry out faithfully this agreement. In testimony of which, Geoffrey's seal is appended to that part of the indenture to be in the possession of the prior and convent. Dated on the day and year aforesaid, in our chapter house in Lynn.

DISCUSSION

It seems to have been not uncommon for religious houses to make retirement provisions as part of employment agreements with its lay servants.

NOTES

TRANSLATION

This indenture, made at Lynn on 7 January 1359 between Thomas Reynald skinner of Lynn and Alice widow of William de Glosbrigge formerly a burgess of Lynn, witnesses that even though Thomas and William de Pountfreit skinner, burgess of Lynn, recently through a certain document made a life grant to Alice of an annual rent of 104s., due from a tenement owned by them in Briggate street, Lynn – as is detailed in that same document – Alice, however, wishes and (by this indenture) grants for herself and her assigns that the previous document, which is and shall remain in the custody of the mayor and alderman of Lynn in the town's common chest, shall not be put into effect or enforced while the conditions set out in this indenture are being fulfilled, but after the death of Alice shall be surrendered to Thomas or his executors or assigns.

[Those conditions being that] Thomas and [after his death] his executors provide Alice, for the rest of her life, at the appropriate times with food and drink in sufficient quantity and of the same quality that Thomas provides for himself and his wife. And that Thomas or his executors give Alice each year at Easter a fur-lined hooded coat, a new single-coloured tunic of woollen cloth, a new robe of blanket cloth, two new linen smocks, a new pair of gloves suitable to Alice, and three pairs of shoes. And that he or they ensure Alice always is supplied with a complete bed suitable to her status with four linen sheets, and with candles and heating materials as often and in as much quantity as she needs. Also that Thomas or his executors provide Alice for life with a chamber suitable to her status, with free passage in and out for herself and others whom she may wish to bring there, together with the service of one of Thomas' maids whenever Alice has need, be it day or night. And he or they shall pay to Alice, at whatever time she demands it, £2.13s.4d.

Thomas wishes and grants for himself, his heirs, executors and assigns, that if it should happen that he or his executors default in fulfilling any of these arrangements with Alice then the aforesaid document concerning the annual rent shall have force, be put into effect in all regards, and may be delivered to Alice. In witness to which agreement the parties have affixed their seals to the indenture.

DISCUSSION

William de Glosbrigge was not in the first rank of citizens, but apparently of some status, judging from the retirement expectations of his wife. In a deed of May 1335, he too is identified as a skinner. I conjecture that Reynald and Pountfreit may have been his executors, friends/feoffees, or even sons-in-law, and that the arrangement negotiated by Alice was to exchange a rent inherited from her husband (as dower right) for the lodging, food, clothing and other necessities specified in the indenture. This would save her the bother of having to collect the rent – with all the risk of taking legal proceedings in the case of rent in arrears – while Reynald's incentive was to supply Alice with her annual needs for under the 104s., in order to make a profit. The document acknowledging the rent as due Alice served as a bond to guarantee fulfillment of the terms of the maintenance arrangements. It appears that Alice was to lodge with Reynald for the rest of her life.

NOTES

"William de Glosbrigge"

The earliest reference I have found to him was in 1333, when he was among a list of townsmen participating in an array of arms (he presented for view a bow and two dozen arrows).

"alderman"

The head of the merchant gild, which played an important enough role at Lynn that the alderman was considered second-in-command to the mayor.

TRANSLATION

[1. Petition to the Shropshire Eyre of 1292, with court record of defendant's response]

To the king's justices,
Thomas le Peleter of Shrewbury lays a complaint against Robert de Rossehall sergeant of the town of Shrewsbury, regarding an agreement made between Thomas and Robert on 3 October 1288 whereby Robert would provide Thomas with sustenance and all necessaries – such as food, drink, footwear, clothing, linen, and wool [len cloth] – in return for a house in Shrewsbury that Thomas gave him. Robert fulfilled his side of the contract only during the first two years and has done nothing since, but has broken the contract with him and refuses to provide him with sustenance, as a result of which Thomas has become a beggar, to his great damage in the amount of a hundred shillings, for which he prays for redress, in God's name.

Robert comes and fully acknowledges that he is bound to provide Thomas with the necessaries stated. He is ready to provide him with those necessaries and says firmly that it was in fact never his fault that he [i.e. Thomas] could not have the necessaries. Thomas admits this.

Therefore Thomas is told that he should reside with Robert if he wants to receive the necessities.

[2. Complaint to the Shropshire Eyre of 1292]

Dear sir, I appeal to the mercy of you who represent the king in doing justice to both rich and poor. I, John Feyrewyn lay a complaint before God and before you, Your Honour, that Richard le Carpenter, clerk of the bailiff of Shrewsbury, withholds from me £4 that I paid him under a written agreement to the effect that Richard was obligated to provide me, John, with sustenance in return for the money received from me. But he has not acted towards me as specified in the contract; as soon as he had the money, he ignored my needs, restricted my movements, and fed me scraps of bread as though I were a pauper begging bread in God's name, so that I almost starved to death. Because of this, dear sir, I appeal in God's name for your mercy in ensuring my money is returned to me before you leave this town. Otherwise I shall never get my money back – for you should know that the rich people stick together to ensure that the poor people can get no justice in this town. As soon as I have my money, my lord, I shall go to the Holy Land, where I shall pray for the king of England and, particularly, for you Sir John de Berrewyke. You should know that I have not a penny nor a halfpenny for [hiring] a lawyer. And so, dear sir, have pity on me so that I may get my money back.

[Endorsed:] He admitted [the charge] and they have permission to settle [their disagreement].

DISCUSSION

It is notable that both these cases involve borough officials as the providers of maintenance. Whether this is coincidence, or whether such men were expected to be conscientious in meeting their obligations, cannot be said.

NOTES

"sustenance"

In this context, it may be interpreted as board and lodging.

"reside"

The Latin is adhereat, meaning to stick to, be a supporter of, or (by extension) be a member of the household of.

"restricted my movements"

This would seem to be the gist of me fit sere par le trunc.

Media vita in morte sumus

Death and the fate of the soul were matters that must have weighed more heavily on the thoughts of medieval townspeople than those of today. In a society with a propensity for violence, in which executions were usually public events and corpses were openly displayed or body parts of criminals hung on city walls, where the rate of infant mortality was very high, poverty at a level now associated with Third World countries, sanitation and medical care crude and often ineffective, and which was visited periodically by famine and pestilence, death was almost a part of everyday life and perhaps many people were hardened against it – even though the loss of a loved one could occasion extreme grief to the point of insanity.

Homicides and death by misadventure we hear about primarily through coroners' records. These give us a good sense of the spectrum of mortal dangers existing in medieval society. Both these and other court records point to deaths of criminals, whether in the foul conditions of gaols or through capital punishment, applied more liberally than today. For deaths from natural causes we rely more on archaeological investigation of medieval burials; a number of excavations of cemeteries have taken place in the late twentieth century, but not so much in urban contexts, as burials there have been much disturbed by changes in the Late Middle Ages and afterwards, such as redigging for new burials, extensions to churches, or encroachments on the churchyard by new building (e.g. almshouses, housing for priests).

Death was to be feared not merely for its own sake, but because it was believed to propel the soul on to a possibly worse fate. Concern about divine judgement provided a daily influence over moral behaviour. The messages that death and judgement were the fate of all and that sinners faced consignment to the torments of Hell were driven home by the Church: through sermons, in architectural and funerary sculpture or inscriptions, and in the wall-paintings and stained glass windows that decorated many medieval churches, giving them a rather more dramatic and less sombre appearance than they tend to have today. These messages were further reinforced by the design of personal devotional items, as well as by secular drama (e.g. the Dance of Death), literature (e.g. Chaucer's Pardoner's Tale), and art – Bosch and Bruegel providing some of the better-known examples of artists depicting the nightmarish imagery that reflect, if in an extreme fashion, popular dread of the Apocalypse and Hell. Death came to be personified and depicted as a skeleton summoning or leading people to the next world.

The need to constantly warn of the afterlife punishments of sinners shows that fear of Hell was effective only to an extent. For it was also believed that a life of sin could be redeemed on the death-bed by true repentance and by recompense through charitable and pious works. The medieval philosophy of balance in all things frowned on economic inequalities, which were perceived as a form of injustice, and at one extreme the accumulation of riches was seen as inherently wicked. Such inequality was a fact of life, but it was felt that some redistribution of wealth at death could help redress the balance. Bequests to the mendicant orders, to the poor or downtrodden, and to the community (whether parochial or urban) were therefore a common feature of the testaments of wealthier townspeople, even though they accounted for only a small portion of the total wealth bequeathed. In return, the recipients – especially the "blessed poor" – were expected to intercede through prayer for the soul of the testator.

Sudden death was particularly to be feared since it left no time for repentance or charity, unless a last will and testament had been drawn up in advance. Setting off on an overseas journey provided the catalyst for some merchants to draw up such a document; however, it was more common for people to have wills drafted within a year or less of their death and, given the lack of medical relief for illness or physical decline, it may have been easier for medieval townspeople to sense when their time was approaching.

The traumatic effect of the Black Death – which, given the state of medical science, could only be understood by the masses as a divine punishment – stimulated depictions of death and judgement in art and encouraged greater ceremonial in funerals, during a period when ceremony was taking a larger place in society as a whole. Repeated, if lesser, visitations of plague after the initial disastrous bout emphasised the imminence of death and the need to be prepared. The act of dying itself came to be perceived by some as an "art" requiring a measure of ritual and even spectacle: with the gathering of family, friends and even neighbours around the death-bed, the expression of last will if none had been written down, farewells exchanged, the priest's visit to hear the death-bed contrition and administer the last rites. By the close of the Middle Ages tracts were being written to instruct people in this art. The importance of such ritual was another reason for dreading a sudden death that would rob one of the opportunity of a death-bed ceremony.

The association made between sin, punishment and death was intended to inspire (through horror) men and women to live a moral life in conformity with laws of Church and state. The strong belief in the inevitability of judgement and the efficacy of prayers to persuade God to mercy, is suggested by surviving evidence - although we cannot be sure whether the attitude was pervasive across the different social strata.

Last will and testament

The ability to dispose, at death, of one's property and possessions as one wished was a privilege, a freedom from the power of one's lord to dictate the disposal; it became one of the principal distinguishing features of burgage tenure. In theory a testator did not own his property outright but held it – in essence as a loan – from his lord. Unless freedom of devise was to be offered by a lord among other privileges intended to attract tenants into towns founded or fostered by them, it was advisable to persuade the lord to allow a testament by bequeathing some portion or some valuable item to the lord. This incentive to respect the instructions set out in a will or testament continued later in the Middle Ages through bequests to urban authorities and to executors.

In the past the testament was, strictly speaking, the device by which personal property (moveables) was bequeathed and the will the instrument for devising real property – principally real estate acquired during the testator's lifetime, for the property he had inherited was expected to be devised to his own heirs. However, testamentum was the term usually applied to both types of document, although we occasionally hear of an ultima voluntas, and sometimes these terms appear to be used synonymously. A testator sometimes drew up separate documents as testament and last will, and often only one of these documents has survived; but in most cases realty and personalty were bequeathed within the same document. (The term "devise" likewise came to apply strictly speaking to realty and "bequest" to personalty, but again the distinction is little used.)

Since the real estate devised by townspeople was primarily situated within the town of residence, it was advisable to register wills in borough court records, and we know of a number of cases where local government required registration and probate before it, at least as regards those clauses concerning lands within the borough. Having a will proved before and enrolled by the borough authorities publicized the intent of the testator and established an evidentiary foundation, even a warrant, for the "livery of seisin" (the formal transfer of ownership of a property). Possibly the occasionally lengthy delays between probate in ecclesiastical and borough courts may have been due to a lack of need for the latter, until a situation arose involving a transaction or challenge affecting some of the property bequeathed.

Wills can give some sense of what real estate an individual owned. Some was probably ignored by wills because it passed automatically to the immediate heirs – although it may be that some testators specified the division anyway – while the widow also had claim upon a portion specified by local custom or common law, although the testament would often deal with this, because of the need to specify what would happen to it after the widow's death. Husbands similarly had a lifetime claim on property brought by wives to the marriage. It may be that testators with direct male heirs are slightly under-represented in the record, because they felt less pressure to make wills and were more prone to dying intestate.

Most borough courts had jurisdiction in transactions regarding burgage tenements and this included disputes arising from devise of such property, perhaps most notably those relating to claims of the spouse; they were prepared to make ordinances regulating such matters. It was natural that they would encourage the entering of relevant documents into the official record, as a source of future knowledge in the event of disputes arising; or demand this course of action, failing which they reserved the right to override the terms of the will. The enrollment may, at first, have been secondary to the public reading of the documents and the authorization of executors to proceed with administration. While we do find examples of burgesses drawing up separate wills and testaments, commonly a document dealt with both real and personal property, and the terms were often used indistinctively in medieval documents; today lawyers use them interchangeably.

The Church encouraged the use of the testament for a final act of contrition, to ensure salvation of the soul, through charitable and pious bequests. Anyone dying unexpectedly would miss confession and the last rites and their souls would rely that much more on gifts for pious works. The Church therefore frowned upon wilful intestacy. Nuncupative wills, often dictated by a testator in extremis, were also looked upon with suspicion, since subject to misinterpretation or fraud, unless well witnessed. But even written wills could be the subject of fraud and forgery. It was also possible for a written will, often drawn up well in advance of death, to be augmented by a written codicil or by oral directions to executors shortly before death; Richard Whittington's is a case in point where his executors were at pains to justify some of their disposal of the testator's wealth on the grounds of death-bed instructions. One of the reasons why probate was necessary, besides ensuring that the written document was genuinely that embodying the testator's wishes, was to confirm with the executors that they were prepared to carry out those wishes. Where the executors were faced with an onerous task, or there was some concern of dispute between them or a risk of negligence or embezzlement, the testator had the option of appointing a supervisor to ensure action was taken and decisions were reached.

With its view of testaments, the Church not surprisingly contested the jurisdiction of borough authorities in matters of probate, and probate of testaments (in the strict definition) was really within the ecclesiastical sphere. This had not been the case in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, where the Church had shown interest in testaments only as regards pious legacies; but in the thirteenth century it extended its jurisdiction over testaments, notably challenges to their validity, and the performance of executors. Where a testator held property in two or more jurisdictions, it was generally necessary to obtain probate from an ecclesiastical court. In cases where wills and testaments were enrolled in borough records, sometimes the clerk extracted only those sections dealing with borough property; but it was often less intellectual effort just to transcribe the whole document. We even find them enrolling documents dealing only with moveables; similarly, ecclesiastical courts are sometimes found proving wills dealing only with real estate within a single secular jurisdiction. In most towns there was collaboration with ecclesiastical authorities in the area of probate; and probate in ecclesiastical court typically preceded probate in borough court. In the Cinque Ports, however, borough probate acquired an unusual degree of independence; at Fordwich, for example, the validity of even a nuncupative testament was unquestioned if the mayor and jurats were the witnesses, and even in cases of intestacy officials of the Church were specifically prohibited from intervening.

Wills and testaments provide us with the best single source of information about the extent of landholding (unless there was an inquisition post mortem, which was rare in the case of townsmen), and the household items and personal possessions of townspeople; they are also an important source of information about family relationships. However, it is largely the wealthier urban residents, particularly landowners, who are represented in this kind of record. The majority of wills, or the extracts copied into official records, are relatively short; typically, the estate simply went to the heir with a life interest in a share for the widow, and there was not the need in most cases for lengthy provisions. The wills presented in this, or other, sections of Florilegium Urbanum are not to be considered "typical"; they have been chosen because they present a more detailed or more intimate look at a testator's arrangements, possessions, and attitudes – insofar as we can take these as normal, given that the testator's mind was on death.

Historians continue to debate to what extent we can trust wills as evidence of the religious attitudes of the testators. To what extent did convention play a part in dictating the arrangements testators made for their funeral ceremonies and related pious and charitable investments post-mortem? To what extent do they reflect testators' behaviour during life? These questions are not easy to answer. However, despite the formulaic elements in wills, there is sufficient variety of approach and expression – especially in those that are highly detailed – that we may imagine seeing the personality of the testator emerging.

An emaciated and dying Richard Whittington conveys to his executors his last wishes.

Funerals

In principle, people could choose for themselves where they were buried, although before the twelfth century lay burials within churches were prohibited (and excavations suggest this restriction was respected). Although wills often specified the location, there was no legal requirement for this – all that was needed was the testimony of a credible witness to the deceased's wishes in this regard; wills were sometimes used to specify funerary arrangements in more detail, but this seems the exception rather than the rule. In cases where no preference for place of burial or funeral arrangements was expressed before death, kin and executors doubtless had a say, and in certain cases they could even override impractical requests by the deceased. In practice, choice of place of burial was often dictated by factors such as residence, place of death, location of family members' graves (particularly those of spouses), or whether the deceased had provided for the establishment of a chantry or other yearly commemorative services at a particular altar in a church.

It was most common for townspeople to be buried in the cemetery or even within the church of their parish, and the parish priests encouraged this, since it was a source of income for them: not formally, but the practice of gifts, in money or goods, to the church – a kind of mortuary payment – in recompense for the officiating of priests became general. Many of the more important urban churches seem to have originated with often large graveyards attached or surrounding; some of these grounds may have been absorbed into marketplaces, if such arose beside the church, or were taken up by buildings such as almshouses. Lesser churches may often have come into being without the provision of any graveyard, particularly if they originally had the status only of a chapel. Alternate choices to the parish cemetery could be made and friaries or even cathedrals were popular with wealthier townspeople, although even then financial compensation was often made to the parish church. Despite that, there was rivalry and sometimes animosity between the parties responsible for potential burial places; in particular, parish clergy resisted burial rights being accorded to detached chapels lacking parochial status. Jewish cemeteries were generally located just outside the town walls and were not associated with any synagogue.

Medieval townspeople were mostly buried in the cemetery attached to their parish church, or occasionally inside the church itself. A handful of greater wealth and status might aspire to a more prestigious burial place in abbey or cathedral.

Coffins were the preserve of the wealthier members of society. Rank-and-file townspeople were buried without coffins; women sometimes in a shroud and men in a hair shirt. Even poor people were entitled to burial in their parish church. The parish priest could only turn down some select categories of deceased, such as the unbaptized, suicides, heretics, excommunicates, and notorious and unrepentant sinners. Even this may have been more honoured in the breach than in the observance, since the idea of burials outside consecrated ground was repugnant to the Church; there are indications that some churches had separate churchyards for such undesirables, perhaps with burials carried out unsanctioned or in private. Because of demands on space within a church and even in the churchyard, older burials were periodically disturbed and the bones transferred to charnel houses established on church property. Nonetheless, in recent decades cemeteries – particularly those abandoned, forgotten and therefore undisturbed (such as at friary sites) – have proven fruitful for archaeologists, giving a sense of population characteristics such as life expectancy, gender mix, health problems and diet. Even so, relatively few have been systematically excavated as yet.

Death, where not sudden, might be considered the prelude to funerary ceremonies, in the sense that a range of preparations was desirable. This might include the dictation of a will, although the timing of will-drafting seems more influenced by the onset of old age or declining health more than by imminent death. Possibly even existing wills were reviewed and confirmed on the death-bed, for they represented a kind of rite of passage, with the testator indicating the intent to divest himself or herself of material possessions. A priest would be summoned to hear confession and, by asking a series of prescribed questions, ensure the dying person was repentant and free of animosity towards anyone; this was another form of divestment: this time, of worldly concerns. Extreme unction and the sacrament would be administered when death was considered close. Throughout this period the death-bed might be surrounded by family members, friends, executors, servants, doctors, and clerics – dying could be quite a public matter.

Under normal circumstances, funerals usually commenced one to three days after death. A longer interlude might be requested by a testator, although there were concerns over having decaying bodies lying around. In the interim the corpse would lie in the place of death, and be put in its shroud. Funerals were to an extent a communal affair; the community after all had lost one of its members. The community was alerted to a death and a funeral by the tolling of the church bell and by public announcements made by bedemen (or bellmen), often minor civic officials, who also exhorted townspeople to pray for the soul of the deceased; specific testamentary provision was sometimes made for the associated costs. Those who belonged to socio-religious guilds could anticipate their fellow members to attend their funeral in numbers, and these guilds often had as one of their core functions the arrangement of funerals of members.

Funerals were elaborate ceremonials that some men planned in detail and were prepared to spend lavishly on, as they approached death, although others took a more frugal approach. (click on the images for enlarged versions and more information)

The first stage (if one discounts the preparation of the dying person by confession and prayers around the death-bed) was to convey the body to the church altar, where funeral rites would be celebrated. This procession could entail some ceremony – again particularly if a guild was involved – with the carrying of lights, ringing of a handbell, and chanting of psalms. Burial was preceded by a sequence of religious rites covering parts of two days: Placbo, Dirige, and Requiem Mass. The Placbo was simply a slight variant of the Vespers (Evensong) service, while the Dirige a variant of Matins; a vigil might connect the two events. Candles were lit around the coffin and kept alight throughout the services, if not overnight. Later in the morning the Mass, followed by a Commendation, completed the services, and led into the burial proper. By the fifteenth century these services were often being sung (performed "by note"), rather than said, and sometimes testators specifically requested this. The actual burial was of lesser importance in the funerary sequence.

Those who were wealthier could afford showier funerals, although this was not always the personal inclination, and some explicitly discouraged it. The deceased could enlarge the body of mourners by making testamentary provision for additional priests and for paupers to attend the services, in return for payment and sometimes they were provided with mourner's gowns as well. Post-burial meals and/or charitable doles were also a commonplace of funerals, and very occasionally – in the case of the wealthiest and proudest townsmen – lavish; the intent was to maximize the reach of the charity through small handouts, so that many individuals would offer a prayer for the deceased.

Many of those who could afford it liked to leave some memorial to themselves. This was not simply a case of ego or pride; remembrance was the key to continued prayers for the soul of the deceased. These memorials could take a variety of forms.

The funeral did not conclude things, for there remained things that could be done to assist the deceased in deliverance from Purgatory to Heaven, as well as to show that the deceased was not forgotten. The funeral's sequence of services was mirrored at commemorative ceremonies typically held, for those who could afford them, a week and/or a month after the funeral and each year on the anniversary of the funeral. During the initial month after death or burial, considered to be a crucial period for the soul, daily services might occasionally be funded, with a view to an intense period of intercession.

Longer-term arrangements were also made for services and charity, to remind priests and community on at least an annual basis of the needs of the deceased's soul. Aside from commissioning anniversaries, which repeated the funeral rites and sometimes the alms-giving, long-term arrangements involved founding institutions such as chantries or almshouses.

Testamentary provision for anniversary obits (a term derived from the Latin for "departure" or "passing on") might be thought of as akin to an insurance policy, but to protect the soul rather than the body. Even those whose religiosity during life was lower than the standard expected could not afford to ignore the risks of Purgatory, fear of which intensified as the Late Middle Ages progressed. On the contrary, they could afford to indulge the possibilities for lightening the burden on their souls. Every prayer, every mass said for the dead was considered to lighten the suffering of the soul in Purgatory.

While testators' provisions for lavish funeral ceremonies and periodic commemorations were selfish, they nonetheless provided an important source of relief for the poorer members of the urban community, in the form of gifts of money, food or drink. Others might also benefit similarly: the clergy, friars, and borough officials who were asked to attend were also rewarded with a meal and/or payment – often the payment could be generous; this perhaps became a minor but not insignificant source of supplementary income. Chantry provided long-term employment for some priests, just as some of the wealthier founders had employed priests to serve in their private chapels; in the larger cities there may have been a sizable group of priests employed by townsmen living and dead. Thus, while death deprived towns of citizens who contributed to economic, social and administrative well-being, the other side of the coin was a redistribution of wealth, including an injection of funds into the physical and social fabric.

The best assurance of remembrance and prayers was to found a chantry, although this could be an expensive proposition; perpetual chantries required a long-term source of funding, usually in the form of assigned revenues from rental properties. Medieval parish churches often had several altars (besides the high altar) dedicated to particular saints; there the chantry services were held. The chapel shown above is, however, Jesus Chapel in Norwich cathedral; the altar is Norman.

TRANSLATION

[1 September 1278]

[The jurors] say that the before-named Godfrey [de Belstede], on 24 August, was coming from Cheshunt towards London, mounted on a hackney, hired of a certain man of that village, as they believe, but as to whose name and person they are ignorant, and having one Richard le Lacir in his company, they met certain carters coming from London, with three carts, but as to the names and persons of whom they are altogether ignorant. Whereupon, one of the carters aforesaid began most shamefully to abuse the said Godfrey, for riding the said hackney so fast, and a dispute arising between Godfrey and the said Richard, on the one side, and the said carters on the other, one of the carters seizing with his hands a certain iron fork, struck Godfrey upon the crown of his head with such force, as to inflict a wound two inches in length, and penetrating almost to the brain. The other carters also badly beat him all over the body with sticks, and maltreated both him and the said Richard le Lacir; so much so, that the latter hardly escaped with his life. Godfrey before-named survived from 24 August to 1 September, languishing from the wound and beating aforesaid; and on that day, at about the third hour, he died.

[Sunday, 17 December 1300]

The jurors say that when, on the preceding Wednesday, the said Richard [le Brewere] was going up a step of a solar in the house of William Cros, carrying a bag of malt, being overcome with drink, he by accident stumbled from the said step and fell, rupturing his bowels and diaphragm, and so lived until the following Friday, when he died about the hour of curfew.

[Sunday, 30 July 1301]

The jurors say that when, on the preceding Saturday, the said Roger [le Brewere] about the ninth hour left the kitchen of the said Adam de Ely [fishmonger] complaining of a disorder called Tisik, he asked Agnes, his wife, whom he found in the Hall, to summon a chaplain to come to him immediately; that the said Agnes ran to a church [but] before his arrival, the said Roger fell dead in the Hall of the said disorder.

[28 May 1301]

The jurors say that when on 6 May, the said Peter [de Huntyngdon] and a certain Andrew Prille came to the house of Walter Vigerous and there continued drinking until after the hour of Vespers, they by mutual consent agreed to wrestle; that, afterwards, the said Andrew left the said Peter, saying that he would no more wrestle as his clothes were torn, and that thereupon the said Peter took off his own vest and handed it to Andrew for him to wrestle in it; that they then wrestled with all their strength and gripped each other in such a way that Peter's right leg was broken, and so he lingered until 1 June, when he died as night was coming on, from the fracture and bad attention.

[18 June 1301]

The jurors say that when, on 11 June, the said Robert [le Brasour] had come into Wood Street after the hour of Vespers, and had met a certain Robert de Amias, they quarrelled together, both being inebriated, and the said Robert de Amias beat the said Robert le Brasour with an oak stick; that the latter then went towards the church of St. Bartholomew the Little, and there lay down on a trunk and passed the night; that at sunrise on the morrow he went to the house of Henry Poteman, his master, who reprimanded him for leaving his house without permission, paid him his wages, and ordered him to leave the house; that he thereupon went to the house of John Butcher and there lingered until 8 June, when he died after the hour of Prime; they say, however, that he was not nearer death nor farther from life by reason of the beating, but that he died from the illness he contracted by passing the night in the street, and not from any felony.

[Friday, 21 July 1301]

The jurors say that when, on the preceding Tuesday, the said Richard [son of John le Mazon], who was 8 years of age, was walking, immediately after dinner, across London Bridge to school, he hung by his hands in play from a certain beam on the side of the bridge, so that, his hands giving way, he fell into the water and was drowned.

[1 September 1301]

The jurors say that on 4 May 1301 there came a certain Hugh Picard riding a white horse belonging to Master William de London, a clerk, in Philips Lane, after the hour of Vespers, when the said Petronilla [daughter of William de Wyntonia, aged three years] was playing in the street, and the horse being strong, quickly carried the said Hugh against his will over the said Petronilla so that it struck her on her right side with its right fore-foot; that the said Petronilla lingered until the following day, when she died, at the hour of Vespers, from the blow aforesaid.

[9 September 1301]

The jurors say that when, on 29 August, the said Richard le Brewere entered his brewhouse to take boiling water out of a leaden vessel with a certain ladle and put it into a certain vat, both his feet having given way he fell backwards and the water poured over his neck and body and scalded him; that he lingered until 7 September, when he died at midnight.

[Monday, 30 November 1321]

The jurors say that the aforesaid Isabella [wife of Robert de Pampesworth] for the two last years and more had suffered from a disease called "frensy", and that on the preceding Sunday, at the hour of Prime, she was alone in her chamber whilst Cristiana de Iseldone, servant to John de Pampesworth, son of the said Isabella, went to the kitchen to get her some food, and she hanged herself by a cord from a small beam in the said solar, when nobody was present, whilst suffering from the aforesaid disease; that the said Cristiana when she entered the room and saw her hanging raised the cry, so that a certain William Scot ran thither and cut the cord with his knife, and the said Isabella fell to the ground alive, and so lingered for the space of a quarter of an hour of the same day and then died from weakness of the same disease and the hanging aforesaid.

[7 January 1322]

The jurors say that when on 3 January 1322 a certain John de Eddeworth, brother of the late Osbert le Pledour, was riding in company with certain men unknown who were taking Walter de Selby, an enemy and rebel to the lord the King, towards the Tower of London, he met the aforesaid John de Tygre, to whom he said that by reason of the death of the aforesaid Osbert his brother, whom the said John de Tygre had killed, he would have something to say to him when opportunity occurred; that the two men moved to anger separated, and thence forward each lay in wait to kill the other. At length on 4 January, before midnight, the said John de Eddeworth, with two other men, his companions, whose names are unknown [met] the said John de Tygre at the head of Sopers Lane, in the Ward of Cheap, and immediately the said John and John with their swords drawn, and the two persons unknown, one with his knife, called "Irish knife", and the other with a wooden staff called "balkstaff", fought together, so that the said John de Eddeworth and his two companions drove the said John de Tygre from place to place, and at the head of Wood Street, opposite the tenement of John de Shordych in the Ward of Cripplegate, the said John de Tygre fell over a heap of dung, and forthwith the said John de Eddeworth and his companions mortally wounded him as he lay, viz.: the said John de Eddeworth with his sword inflicted five mortal wounds, three being on the back of the head, and one on the left side, each of them two inches long and penetrating the skull, and one under his left ear, and inch and a half deep and two inches long, whilst one of the unknown men with his staff mortally beat him on his sides, back, arms and neck; that when certain watchmen for keeping the peace in the said Ward heard of this, they immediately ran thither and found the said John de Tygre thus wounded and beaten, and certain of his friends carried him to the said solar [in the tenement of John's wife Alice, in the parish of St. Clement Candlewick Street] where he lay dead and there he had his ecclesiastical rights, and lingered until 6 January when he died after the ninth hour from the said wounds and blow.

[Wednesday, 28 April 1322]

The jurors say that when on the preceding Tuesday a little before midnight, the said Robert [de Kent cordwainer] and Matilda his wife, and William and John their sons lay asleep in the said solar [held by the said Robert of Adam Braz], a lighted candle fixed on the wall by the said Matilda fell by accident on the bed of the said Robert and Matilda, and set the whole house on fire; that the said Robert and William were immediately caught in the flames and were burnt, and the said Matilda and John with difficulty escaped with their lives.

[?29 April 1322]

William, son of John de Brich', who had been attached for burglary of the house, and carrying off the goods, of Geoffrey le Rook of Little Burstead [Essex] died of starvation in the prison of Newgate on 29 April 1322, and of no felony.

[Friday, 21 May 1322]

The jurors say that when on the preceding Thursday, before the hour of Vespers, the said Johanna [daughter of Bernard de Irlaunde, a child one month old] was lying in her cradle alone, the shop door being open there entered a certain sow which mortally bit the right side of the head of the said Johanna. At length there came Margaret, wife of the said Bernard and mother of the said Johanna, and raised the cry and snatched up the said Johanna and kept her alive until midnight of the said Friday when she died of the said bite and of no other felony.

[Saturday, 26 June 1322]

The jurors say that [when] on the preceding Friday the said Robert [son of Ralph de Leyre de la Hay of co. Essex] went to the wharf called the Fishwharf and entered the river to bathe, no one being present, he was by accident drowned and so remained in the water until the following Saturday, when, about noon, a certain John Curteys, a boat-man, found him drowned and raised the cry, so that the country came; that at the request of friends of the said Robert, his corpse was taken out of the water and placed in the said shop [rented by Oliver Brounyng in [Queenhithe ward\]](#) for better inspection, and for fuller enquiry as to his death to be made. They suspect no one of the death but only the mischance aforesaid. The corpse viewed on which no wound or bruise appeared.

[\[7 July 1322\]](#)

The jurors say that when at daybreak of that day a great multitude of poor people were assembled at the gate of the Friars Preacher seeking alms, Robert Fynel, Simon, Robert and William his sons and 22 other male persons, names unknown, Matilda, daughter of Robert le Carpenter, Beatrix Cole, Johanna le Peyntures, Alice la Norice and 22 other women, names unknown, whilst entering the gate were fatally crushed owing to the numbers, and immediately died thereof and of no other felony.

[\[Wednesday, 27 March 1325\]](#)

The jurors say that when on the preceding Sunday at the hour of Compline the said Walter de Benygtone [\[tailor\]](#), with seventeen companions, unknown, had come to the brewhouse of Gilbert de Mordone, stockfishmonger, in the Ward of Bridge with stones in their hoods, swords, knives and other weapons and were sitting and drinking four gallons of beer, lying in wait to seize and carry off Emma, daughter of the late Robert Pourte then under the charge of the said Gilbert; that perceiving this, Mabel, the wife of Gilbert de Mordone, and Geoffrey, the brewer of the said Gilbert, prayed the said Walter and his associates to depart thence, but they replied that they would stay there, as the house was public; whereupon the said Mabel seeing their folly returned to her chamber taking the said Emma with her; that the said Walter and his associates being on that account moved with anger assaulted the said Geoffrey and Robert de Mordone and other inmates of the house and struck the said Robert on the head with stones, so that he raised the cry and fled into the High Street, and the said Walter with a knife in one hand and a misericord in the other followed him to kill him. Thereupon, Benedict de Warde and other neighbours came up to pacify them, when the said Walter assaulted the said Benedict with the aforesaid weapons, and refused to surrender to the King's peace, and the said Benedict seizing a balstaff from a stranger, therewith struck the said Walter on the top of his head so that he fell to the ground at the entrance of the lane of Gilbert de Mordone in the parish [\[of St. Michael\]](#) aforesaid, and was thence carried by Walter de Arderne and Christina his wife into the land of St. Michael aforesaid, where they laid him on the pavement near the fountain where he lay the whole of the following night, and on the morrow he was carried half dead by them into the house of Geoffrey de Warde, where he immediately died.

[15 November 1325]

The jurors ... say that a certain John de Wynestone, Thomas de Walpol, Martin de Aumbresbury, William de Grenstede, Thomas le Waryner, John le Joignour, William Shonk, Simon Lightfot, Richard de Aumbresbury, James de Shordiche, John Galle and John Baudechon, goldsmiths, on Sunday, 10 November, shortly after the hour of curfew, were walking in the High Street of Cheap, lying in wait for the men of the mystery of Saddlers in order to beat them, on account of a quarrel that had arisen between men of the mystery of Goldsmiths and that of Saddlers; that meeting the aforesaid John atte Vyse [saddler] opposite the stone cross in Cheap the said John de Wynestone, Thomas de Walpol and Martin de Aumbresbury assaulted him, the said John de Wynestone striking him with a sword on the left side of the head, inflicting a mortal wound seven inches long and three inches deep, and the said Thomas Walpol striking him with an axe and nearly severing his leg, whilst the aforesaid Martin belaboured him with a staff when lying on the pavement ... the said John atte Vyse thus beaten and wounded lay there groaning until carried by his friends to the house [he held in the parish of St. Vedast], where he had his ecclesiastical rights and where he lingered until the followign Thursday, when he died about cock-crow of his wounds.

[Wednesday, 15 January 1326]

The jurors ... say on oath that when on the preceding Tuesday, about midnight the said John Toly rose naked from his bed and stood at a window of the solar 30 ft. high to relieve himself towards the High Street, he accidentally fell headlong to the pavement crushing his neck and other members, and thereupon died about cock-crow.

[3 August 1326]

The jurors ... say that on 30 June 1326, Agnes Houdydoudy met the aforesaid Lucy [wife of Richard de Barstaple], who was enceinte, in the High Street near the Tower, and a quarrel arising, the said Agnes knocked the said Lucy and struck her on the belly with fist and knees, and fled leaving her half dead in the street. The said Agnes was immediately caught and taken to Newgate, whilst the said Lucy was carried by friends to the rented house aforesaid where she had her ecclesiastical rights and within three weeks gave birth to an abortive child, and died on 1 August of the blows, at the third hour.

[2 February 1337]

The jurors ... say that the above Emma [a pauper and mendicant], who had long suffered from falling sickness came about the ninth hour to the bank of Tower ditch carrying a large earthen vessel full of water, and owing to her sickness fell head foremost into the ditch, nobody being near, and immediately died.

[Friday, 21 February 1337]

The jurors ... say that on the preceding Thursday, about the hour of Vespers, two carters (unknown) taking two empty carts out of the City were urging their horses apace, when the wheels of one of the carts collapsed opposite the rent of the Hospital [of St. Mary, Bishopsgate], so that the following cart fell on the said Agnes [de Cicestre] who immediately died; that the carter thereupon left his cart and three horses and took flight in fear, although he was not suspected of malicious intent.

[Monday, 20 December 1339]

The jurors ... say that on the preceding Sunday after the hour of curfew, a quarrel arose between Robert de Portesmouthe and Alice his wife in a solar in the rent of Richard le Rous, when the said Robert struck his wife with a staff called a "wombedstaff" on the neck as she stood by the stair in the said solar, so that with the blow she fell down the stair and broke her neck; that the said Robert took flight the next day, but whither, etc., the jurors know not. And because the information was given to the Coroner, that Robert son of the aforesaid Robert de Portesmouthe had been arrested on suspicion of causing the death of the said Alice his step-mother and had been taken to Newgate, precept was issued to the Sheriffs to summon other jurors of the ward of Queenhithe for the following Tuesday in order that further enquiry might be made. Accordingly on that day there came [13 named jurors] who said on oath that on the aforesaid day the said Robert, the son, struck the said Alice with his hand, whilst the father struck her with a "wombedstaff" on the neck from which blow the said Alice died, and that the death of the said Alice was not hastened by the blow from the hand of the said son.

[Saturday, 14 January 1340]

The jurors ... say that on the preceding Thursday about sunrise when the above John [Briny] tried to put a halter on a grey horse in the stable of Roger de Forsham the horse kicked him in the face so that he died on the following Saturday.

[Saturday, 4 February 1340]

The jurors ... say that on the preceding Friday, after the hour of curfew, the aforesaid Alice [wife of Henry de Warewyk skinner], who for the last half-year had been non compos mentis, opened the door of the house of the said Henry and Alice in the parish of St. Benedict Fink, in the ward of Broad Street, and ran by herself in a wild state to the port of Dowgate and threw herself into the Thames and was drowned.

[Monday, 28 August 1340]

The jurors ... say that on the aforesaid Monday the said John Bone was going down the well [on the property he rented in the parish of St. Andrew East Cheap] by means of a long pole to recover a bucket which was there, when he fell and, there being but little water in the well, he immediately died. Precept to the Sheriff to cause the well to be stopt up.

[29 September 1367]

The jurors ... say that on 21 September, at dusk, the aforesaid John Farnaham [of North Ockendon, clerk] entered a boat belonging to John Sevar of Portsoken in the parish of Aveley, Essex, which boat lay in the Thames near Botulph's Wharf in the parish of St. Botulph in the ward of Billingsgate, desiring to voyage in her to the vill of North Ockendon; that whilst he and his fellow travellers lay asleep waiting for the tide, a great storm of wind and rain arose and overturned the boat near the bridge in the ward and parish aforesaid; so that the said John fell into the water and was drowned; that his corpse was carried hither and thither until 29 September when it was found cast in the water in the fleet at Lymhostes.

DISCUSSION

When a death from other than natural causes occurred, the finder of the dead or dying person had to raise the alarm, the neighbours had to be alerted, and the matter had to be reported promptly to the city authorities. The coroner with jurisdiction in the area where the death occurred would quickly summon a group of men living in the neighbourhood – in the case of London, where the sheriffs worked with the coroner, from the ward in question as well as from adjacent wards – to serve as jury for an inquest. Their investigation, held at the site where the death occurred and calling on the neighbours to give evidence, was to determine how the death – usually described as "other than a rightful death" – occurred and who, if anyone, or what was responsible, so that the courts could take the appropriate action. This kind of investigation seems to have applied as much to the poorest members of society as to others; it did not usually apply if an individual succumbed to a recognized illness.

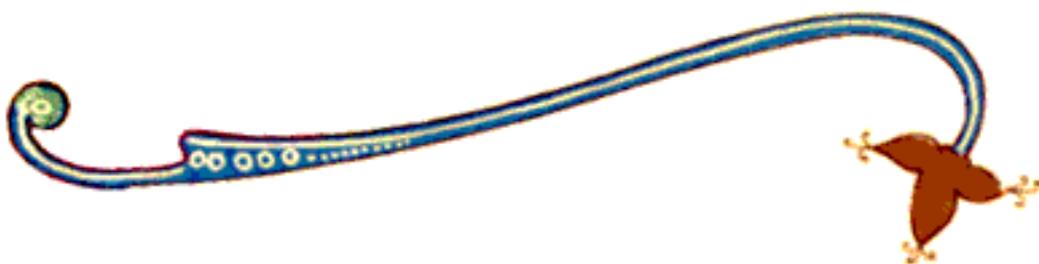

Many of the deaths investigated were homicides resulting from quarrels or brawls, often the result of drunkenness, hot-headedness, or hot temper. One case illustrates that "road rage" is not a modern phenomenon. But not a few involved malice aforethought, as in cases of vendetta or revenge, or at least a proclivity to be looking for trouble – those involved were going around armed with daggers, staffs, or axes. Occasionally the perpetrator or victim had simply been trying to prevent a crime from being committed, against him or her self or against another. A couple of deaths resulted from the simmering hostilities between some of the craft guilds, which occasionally erupted into violence; another instance (besides that given above) was the outcome of a brawl in 1340 between skimmers and fishmongers. Law students were also the instigators of a couple of brawls, although this was a pale reflection of the troubles caused by students at Oxford. Deaths as the result of domestic quarrels are also found, but are not numerous; one of the most horrific cases was that of a house burning down, the occupants having escaped, but the husband, who blamed his wife for the fire, pushed her back into the burning house.

A large number, on the other hand, fall into the death by misadventure category. Falls from ladders or from upper story windows occur several times, and several deaths were as a result of falls down wells – the unlucky individual might drown, break his neck, or suffocate in a dry well. Drowning in the Thames or in the city ditches was a fairly common cause of death, although for a variety of reasons, such as falling in by accident, losing one's footing while bathing, committing suicide, or in one case being prevented (it appears) by the weight of stolen loot secreted on the thief's person from avoiding the consequences of a rising tide during an effort to escape capture. Children make an appearance in the coroner's rolls in the context mainly of domestic accidents, or accidental deaths that occurred while wandering or at play in the streets; the case of Johanna de Irlaunde reveals one of the reasons why towns repeatedly passed by-laws against allowing pigs to wander the streets. The supposed high rate of infant mortality is not reflected in coroner's rolls, however, suggesting that most infant deaths were seen as 'natural', and even the unnatural deaths provoked no comment on parental culpability in terms of failing to supervise the children.

Several deaths of prisoners in city gaols were recorded with little comment. The cause of death was not usually given, but when described as a "rightful death" may sometimes refer to execution and sometimes to what was perceived as a natural death. In a few cases it is explicitly recorded that prisoners starved to death. Prisoners received nothing to eat unless fed by family or friends, or as the result of charitable gifts, and therefore it was easy for many to starve. Or perhaps that way out seemed preferable to some of those destined for hanging.

Occasionally other deaths were also described as "rightful", meaning that the jury could not identify – either from evidence of events surrounding the death, or from examination of the corpse – any reason to believe foul play had occurred. Therefore it was concluded that a natural death had occurred. Such was the case, for example, with a baby that died a day after its birth, with a child of 12 for whom no clear cause of death could be identified, but also with adults considered to have died prematurely or without forewarning of any ill health.

NOTES

"hackney"

A riding horse.

"bad attention"

The leg of the corpse was described as gangrenous.

"seeking alms"

Sharpe identifies the event that occasioned this tragedy as being a dole of alms by the executor of Henry Fingrie.

"misericord"

A narrow-bladed dagger intended to deliver the death blow to an incapacitated opponent.

"stone cross in Cheap"

This was the original location of London's Eleanor Cross, later removed to Charing.

"ecclesiastical rights"

I.e. the right to have the last rites administered.

"29 September"

Or 6 October; there is a discrepancy in the original or the transcript which would have the body found a week after the inquest, clearly not correct.

"North Ockendon"

Close to Aveley.

"coroner"

Technically, the duties of coroner were exercised by the King's Chamberlain who, in the earliest coroner's records from London, acted with the city sheriffs in holding an inquest. As the Chamberlain was, in practice, occupied with other duties, a deputy was often appointed in London.

[1. Lynn: coroner's roll 1291-1300]

Inquest held on the death of William del Wre and Walter Kyng of Saltfleetby, on 18 June 1294 at Lynn, by Simon de Waynflet, Ralph Swyft, John ad Aquam, Richard Cocum, his brother Ralph, Geoffrey Drewe, Alan de Swerdeston, William de Cranewiz, John de Acra, John de Barewe, John son of Simon de Beverle, and Alexander le Gardener of Ditton, jurors, who say under oath that the mayor and bailiffs of Lynn had received special orders from the king to arrest all ships and boats arriving at Lynn, together with the men and goods being in the same, in order that they not transport any goods overseas. On 12 June a certain John Stalle of Yarmouth approached a ship called the Stoute and he said to the master of that ship and his fellows that thieves and plunderers were about to come with a writ to deprive them of their ship and its cargo and to kill them.

On the following day, William and Walter, together with the sergeants of the Tolbooth of Lynn and other men, by an order sent them by the mayor and bailiffs, came in a boat to arrest the ship. When they saw the men in the boat coming, those who were in the ship thought them to be the plunderers and thieves and, when William and Walter wished to board the ship from the boat, they took it [...] by one of the ship's ropes and at once the tidal current drew away the boat from the ship; and when it was hanging by the ship's rope, unnerved by the armed men in the ship, they [i.e. William and Walter] fell into the sea between the boat and the ship and had the misfortune to drown.

Inquest held before the coroners of Lynn on 22 May 1296 into the death of Roger fitz Claricia miller [...] the jurors say that around the middle of the day on 19 May, Roger arose from his midday nap and went down to the water next to the lesser water-wheel of the mill in Lynn called "Swargermelne", to wash his hands, when he tripped over himself and fell onto the beam called "briggetre". Of which [injury] he languished from that hour until vespers on the following Monday.

[2. Lynn: coroner's roll 1302-04]

Inquest held [...] 29 January 1303 [...] concerning the death of John de Beverlee [...] The jurors say under oath that on the night of 28 January John was coming from the house of Peter le Schereman in Brigate and he crossed over a bridge called "Godlombesbrigge". Having had his fill of drink, he had the misfortune to fall off the bridge and was drowned in the water.

[...]

Inquest held on 25 July 1302 concerning the dath of Margaret, daughter of Richard de Thornhegg [...] The jurors say that on the previous night, before midnight, Alice de Tyrington, servant of Beatrice le Hukestere put up a candle on a partition wall in Beatrice's house; but that, Alice being drunk, while she was taking care of other matters the candle fell down into the straw and set on fire the house and Margaret. Alice and Beatrice, fleeing for their lives and barely escaping with them, forgot about Margaret (who was then 12 years old) and left her behind in the burning house. They say that no-one is guilty of the death. Afterwards, Richard de Thornhegg found her and raised the hue.

[...]

Inquest held on 17 December 1302 concerning the death of Giles de Flandres [...] The jurors say that on the night of 15 December before curfew Giles was sitting in a Ely boat from which he was selling ale in the port of Lynn when he said to his companion that his haketon was better and gave surer protection than any made in England. He said that he would prove it and, drawing his own knife he stabbed himself in the chest with the knife, giving himself a wound half an inch deep, from which he immediately died.

[York]

Memorandum that on 13 February 1382 it came about in the city of York that a certain John de Braytoft of Scroby, a servant of Robert de Comberworth, was riding on a horse of his master out of York Castle towards the watercourse between the chapel and the watermill beside the castle, in order to water the horse there. By a terrible accident, John was drowned in the water there between the mill and the chapel. In consequence of which, Simon de Clapham, Simon de Waghen, and Henry de Bolton bailiffs and William de Newby coroner and many other reputable men of the city came to claim the liberty and to take possession thereof.

After which, the body of the drowned man being found, it was viewed according to custom and an inquest held by William de Newby, city coroner, by the oath of Thomas de Lokyngton, William Lorymer, Walter Fox, Roger Wright, John Strynger, Robert de Wistowe, John de Elveley, William del Ker, Robert Pawe, William Fletcher, John Pouchemaker, and John Stiel, jurors. Who state under oath that the said John rode on the horse into the water at the aforementioned location; the value of the horse [was assessed at] 10s. In a deep part of the river the horse stumbled, colliding with stones hidden beneath the surface; to John's misfortune the force of the collision threw him from the horse into the water, where he was at once submerged, and separated from the horse. The horse has gone outside the boundary of the city, but into whose hands it has fallen they have no idea whatsoever, and say so under oath.

DISCUSSION

When a death occurred, the initial task was to determine where it had happened, in order to ascertain within which jurisdiction the investigation fell. In this case, the city authorities promptly claimed the affair as within their jurisdiction (the proximity to the castle fee could have cast doubt on the matter). The purpose of the inquest, which appears to have been held promptly, was to determine who, or what, was responsible for a sudden death. Part of the reason was that the instrument causing death might be forfeited to the Crown (or in some cases, given as compensation to family of the deceased); hence the concern with assessing the value of the horse and with stating under oath that the horse had escaped and could not be found.

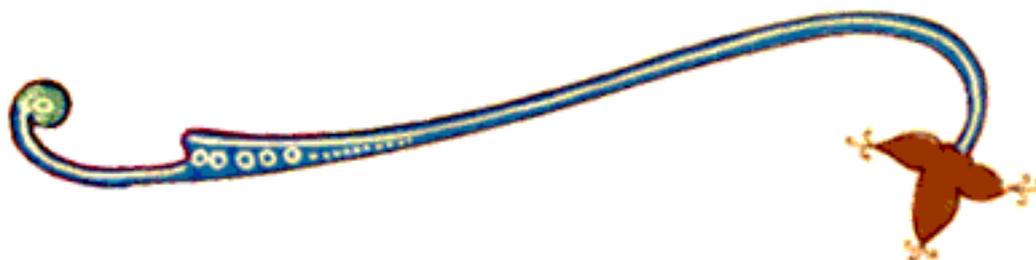

Drowning was a not infrequent cause of death in the Middle Ages. It is not clear whether the ability to swim was very common, although swimming could be a recreation for those with the ability. An off-balance fall into water, getting out of one's depth while bathing, or a drunken tumble into water were the most common scenarios. Watercourses were used for industry, as sources of domestic supply, for cleaning oneself or watering one's animals, and for travel, and a place like Lynn, as an important commercial port, experienced a relatively large number of drownings. By contrast, deaths as a result of house-fires were not as common as one might expect, given the vulnerability of medieval structures to fire.

Records of coroners' inquests, despite their somewhat formulaic and in most cases succinct style, paint us a picture of the various hazards in medieval society. In particular the too frequent resort to violence. The Lynn coroners' records from which the above cases were taken also tell of deaths resulting from slight provocations, such as telling some argumentative Norwegian sailors to keep the noise down, or a dispute arising from a ball game on the river-bank, or an argument in a brothel. Drink was sometimes involved – as one suspects it may have been in the above case of Giles de Flandres, explicable only as the folly of an inebriated man.

Unless inquest juries were prone to concocting stories or intentionally protecting the guilty, possibilities we cannot – or cannot always – rule out, they seem to have been a fairly effective tool for gathering information within a short time-frame. On rare occasions when multiple inquests were held on a death, we sometimes get conflicting information from the different juries, but more often they are corroborative or complementary. It seems that few secrets could be kept in a community where people were more inclined to mix – in the streets, in the marketplace, in church, and in guildhalls – than to shut themselves away in their homes. In the relatively small communities of medieval English towns, with houses often close together or contiguous, one tended to know what one's neighbours were up to.

On the other hand, it has been suggested [Carrie Smith, "Medieval Coroners' Rolls: Legal Fiction or Historical Fact?", pp.93-115 in Courts, Counties and the Capital, ed. D. Dunn, New York: St. Martin's Press, 1996] that sympathetic neighbours might on occasion be unwilling to condemn some of their own (e.g. for a killing in self-defence), and that some crimes may have gone completely unreported for similar or other reasons, some of which apply more to rural than urban situations. Also that a few of the deaths categorized by juries as misadventure might, because of inadequate knowledge of the circumstances – perhaps particularly for deaths that happened in the middle of the night or in the privacy of the home – actually have been homicides. Without additional sources of evidence, we can never know for certain.

TRANSLATION

Hamo Blund, one of the wealthier men of this town, being on his deathbed, was very reluctant to make any kind of testament. Finally he did make a [nuncupative] testament dealing with the sum of three marks, in the hearing only of his brother, his wife, and a chaplain. So that, after the man's death, when the abbot was investigating the matter, he called those three before him and sternly chastised them because the brother (who was the heir) and the wife had not permitted anyone else access to the sick man, desiring to take possession of everything. The abbot issued a public statement: "I was his bishop and had the care of his soul. So that the ignorance of his priest and confessor does not turn into harm from me [failing to act], since I was absent and could not advise the sick man while he was still alive, it is important that I take action even though it is late in the day. I order that all debts owed him and all his moveable possessions, which are said to be worth two hundred marks, are to be put down in writing. One share is to be given to the heir, another to the wife, and a third to his poor relations and other poor people. As for the horse that drew the bier of the dead man and was offered to St. Edmund, I order it to be released and returned, for our church should not be polluted by the gift of someone who died intestate and who is reputed to have regularly loaned his money usuriously. By the face of God, if such a thing happens again in my time to anyone, he won't be buried in a cemetery!" At these words, the others slunk away shamefacedly.

DISCUSSION

The abbot had a number of reasons to feel outraged by the circumstances surrounding Hamo's testament. Nuncupative wills or testaments tended to be looked upon with suspicion since a dying man could be influenced by those at his bedside, or his expressed wishes disregarded and others ascribed to him. That was suspected here – or perhaps the abbot suspected collusion between a procrastinating testator and his nearest and dearest with a view to maximizing their inheritance while minimizing the share expected to be dedicated to charitable and pious uses. The complaint that Hamo's bequests amounted only to a fraction of his believed worth may possibly refer to the amount he assigned (or was claimed to have assigned) to the poor and the church, since the remainder would automatically go to his heir, with the widow being allowed a life share. The abbot blamed the chaplain for failing to ensure that Hamo was better advised in regard to his charitable obligations.

It was probably less on the grounds of the nature of the testament than those of its inadequate coverage of the testator's possessions that prompted Abbot Samson to treat Hamo's as an intestate death and to assume administration of the dead man's estate. In cases of intestacy the lord had claim to the estate, although perhaps more as trustee than owner. The abbot certainly took that view, reallocating the estate evenly among the heir, the widow, and poor relations and other poor folk – this last was the charitable share and reflects that charity begins at home. He even opted to forego the traditional but obligatory gift – frequently a horse or other animal – to the church (a payment for funeral services), although that was because of the suspicion that Hamo's wealth had been acquired through immoral means and the belief that someone who died wilfully intestate had in effect committed spiritual suicide.

The immoral means are specified in the accusation that Hamo's money was tainted because he had engaged in money-lending, a practice frowned on by the Church as unChristian. The Third Lateran Council (1179) ordered that any usurer who failed to repent – which appears to apply to Hamo – should not be given Christian burial. This may help explain the abbot's closing remark; churches or clergyman failing to obey the injunction themselves faced excommunication. Abbot Samson deported the Jewish community from Bury St. Edmunds to other towns, on the excuse that everything within the town should belong to the abbey (whereas the Jews belonged to the king), although whether this took place before or after Hamo's death cannot be said. In fact, the expulsion was more likely part of Samson's efforts to reform abbey finances, by getting rid of some of its creditors; an effort undermined by the king's justices, who ordered Jews should be allowed into town if suing for their debts in the abbot's court.

"marks"

A mark was worth 13s.4d. In most cases where the term appears in documents presented in Florilegium Urbanum I have converted to old style pounds, shillings and pence.

"investigating"

This could be translated to say that an inquest was being held, although there was hardly a need for one since the death itself was not suspicious.

"his bishop"

The abbots strongly resisted any encroachments on their authority or jurisdiction by bishops and archbishops, turning to Rome in support of their independence.

"drew"

Literally "was led before", but it seems likely that the horse would have been used to pull the litter bearing the coffin.

"usuriously"

Today we think of usury as the loan of money in order to make an extortionate profit from the interest. For most of the Middle Ages, however, the Church saw the taking of any amount of interest on a loan as usurious. It was considered a mortal sin leading to damnation, unless the sinner repented; it is not clear from the account whether Hamo made a death-bed repentance to the chaplain/confessor, but the abbot was clearly unsatisfied with the way in which Hamo made his end. By the end of the Middle Ages the Church had come to terms with money-lending, and no longer condemned it.

"expulsion"

Professor Butler suggested the expulsion might have been to protect the Jewish community from further attacks after 57 were massacred – one of numerous such attacks throughout England – in 1190; their transfer to other towns is then explained as putting them within access to castles that could offer protection. However, Jocelin does not even mention this massacre (which he would surely have done had it shocked him), and the expulsion seems more an expression of Christian distaste for Jews than a desire for their well-being. This distaste was perhaps particularly felt by the convent. In fact, the first matter Jocelin addresses in his chronicle is the sad state of abbey finances due partly to indebtedness to Jews.

1. Concerning testaments

Let it be known that the entire city of London is held of the lord king in free burgage, without any mesne lord. And, according to the usage of the city and its suburbs, all the lands and tenements, rents and services within that city and suburbs, whether as direct possession or as reversion, are devisable by man or woman to whomever they wish and in whatever fashion they wish. They can also devise that new rents be taken from their tenements, as seems best to them, by their testaments and their last will. Those who are freemen of that city can devise their tenements in mortmain, as appears from the charter the king gave them. Also, those who hold tenements jointly with others can devise whatever belongs to them, without making any division. But underage children cannot devise, nor can a married woman devise her tenements, whether with permission of her husband nor in any other way, while she is still married. A husband cannot devise his tenements to his wife in any [\[more permanent\]](#) form than for the woman's lifetime, nor can the wife make any greater claim without risking losing everything. A husband cannot devise tenements [\[he holds\]](#) by right of his wife, nor tenements that the husband and his wife have jointly purchased; but if the husband and wife hold tenements jointly for themselves and the husband's heirs, the husband may at least devise their reversion.

All testaments by which any tenements are devised can be enrolled in the husting court of record, at the request of anyone who may receive benefit from those testaments. Testaments that should be enrolled are brought or sent before the mayor and aldermen in full husting; there the testament is read out aloud by the sergeant, and then proved by two well-known and reputable men, who are individually examined under oath concerning the circumstances surrounding the testament, the state of mind of the testator, and about his seal. If the evidences are found satisfactory, commensurate with law, and in agreement with each other, then the testament will be enrolled in the husting record, and a fee will be paid for the enrollment. No nuncupative testament, nor any other testament, can be entered into record unless the testator's seal is appended to the testament. On the other hand, testaments that are found satisfactory and legal are considered in force, regardless of whether enrolled or part of the record. Testaments within the city must, by city custom, be judged in force and executable (with regard to the wishes of the testators) based on the extent to which the terminology of such testaments is defective or not, according to the common law.

2. Verdict of the aldermen concerning the testament of Osbert de Suffolchia

On 15 May 1303 by the unanimous assent and consent of John le Blount, mayor of London, Elias Russel, Adam de Rokesle, Richard de Gloucestria, William de Betonia, Thomas Romayn, John de Wengrave, John de Vinetria, Richer de Refham, Ralph de Honylane, Nicolas Picot, John de Armenters, John de Dunstaple, Nicholas de Farndone, Henry de Gloucestria, Walter de Finchingfeld, and Hugh Pourte, aldermen, it was agreed, and each one queried individually as to his opinion stated, that the blood heirs of Osbert de Suffolchia are excluded from any hereditary claim to a tenement that belonged to Osbert in Cordwainer Street, in the parishes of St. Mary-le-Bow and St. Mary Aldermary, [devised] by Osbert's testament, proved and enrolled in the London husting on 8 May 1284. Except for Walter de Finchingfeld and Henry de Gloucestria, who were not entirely in agreement; but they said that everything of the testament that was enrolled was the testator's will, and proper and valid, etc.

Afterwards, on 19 February 1305 it was agreed and by unanimous consent decided, by John le Blount mayor of London, John de Wengrave, William de Leyre, Walter de Finchingfeld, Richer de Refham, John de Dunstaple, Hugh Pourte, Adam de Fulham, Adam de Rokesle, John de Vinetria, Salomon le Cotiller, aldermen, and Roger de Paris, sheriff, that Ralph Godchep, John de Wrytele, Stephen de Uptone, and William le Barber spicer, parishioners of St. Mary-le-Bow, sworn on the Holy Evangelis, are to sell those houses for as much money as they can, under the supervision, and with the approval and consent of John, the mayor. And that with the money received from the same, divine services are to be held for the souls of Osbert and his wife Anne and those of all the faithful deceased, as specified by the terms of the testament; the remainder of the money, beyond [the costs of] that chantry, are to be well and truly applied towards [the upkeep of] the fabric of London Bridge.

3. Concerning the probate of testaments. [1344]

It is agreed and enacted that all testaments of burgesses of the town [of Bristol] in which lands, tenements or rents are bequeathed, are to be proved in full hundred court before the mayor and two reputable men sitting with him. This [is to be done] by two witnesses examined before them in the following way, viz.: concerning the date; whether they heard with their own ears that this was the last will of the testator; whether the testator was of sound mind; and whether he set his seal [on the testament]. Such testaments that are proved in the above manner are henceforth to be copied in full onto paper, and the paper is to be [kept] in the treasury where the common seal is placed, under the mayor's seal. So that those whom the testament concerns may subsequently have recovery on the basis of such a record, should they need or wish to have it through judicial process, and they may call it to warranty should the original testament be lost or in any way carried off maliciously, to prevent them from having recovery of their property. If a testament is proved in the manner described, it is to be entered into the paper record. Such testaments are henceforth to be endorsed with the date and place of probate, by the hand of the common clerk who may take 40d. for making the endorsement; and they are to be sealed with the mayoral seal, etc. All other testaments, not proved in the correct manner described above, are to be considered void and forever worthless and invalid. If witnesses default, this default is to be written on the document by the clerk, so that they not be accepted [by the court] at any future time through false witnesses.

4. Concerning the enrolment of citizens' testaments

The same day [10 February 1371] it was enacted and established that from this day forward all testaments of citizens of York in which lands and tenements within the franchise are devised are to be presented by their executors to the mayor and chamberlains then in office in the city, and entered and enrolled by their common clerk in the community register, to remain there in perpetuity to provide greater assurance and reliable evidence to all those who possess those lands or shall possess them in times to come.

5. [Probate procedure at Lynn]

This testament was proved before us, Hugh de Betele mayor of Lynn, John de Swerdestone, Henry de Betele, Robert Braunch, and Peter de Walton, specially elected and deputed for the examination of testaments by the entire community in Lynn's gild hall, on the basis of the customs of the borough of Lynn used in times past, by Richard Wyff and Henry de Swafham clerk. Who were, on 12 February 1343, administered an oath and examined concerning the making and proving of this testament as regards the aforesaid tenement, and who were concordant [in the statements given]. Solemn proclamation having first been made before the entire community of the town of Lynn for three days previously, as is customary, that if anyone believed that execution of the testament ought not to take place with regard to that tenement, they should speak out against the bequest of the tenement by the testament; and at those times and place no-one opposed or said anything against [the testament]. Consequently, we, Hugh de Betele the mayor, have judged it appropriate [to proceed with] the probate and execution of the testament as regards the tenement devised therein, and on the above date appended our seal of the office of mayoralty to the testament, in the presence of [those of] the community then in the gild hall.

6. [Testimonial concerning a nuncupative will, York, 11 October 1484]

To all true Christian people to whom etc., Thomas Wrangwish mayor etc. confirm etc. that our trusty and well-beloved fellow citizen Robert Leche, recently parish clerk of the same city, and William Inglesaynt sherman of the same came in person to the city's council chamber before us, the mayor and aldermen, on the same day this was drawn up. Then and there they publicly took an oath on the Holy Evangelist that each and both of them were present at the time that one Thomas Worcetre lister, formerly of this city, lay on his death-bed in his own residence in North Street inside the city, being sound in mind. At that time was also present dom. John Chalonere, parish priest of St. John Evangelist at one end of Ouse Bridge in the city. [This was] in 1452, the precise date not being recalled. The which dom. John there and then asked and enquired of Thomas Worcetre to whom he intended to pass on and bequeath the messuage with appurtenances in which he then resided. To which Thomas answered, saying for all to hear that "I will and bequeath the same, my messuage with appurtenances, to my wife Ellen, to hold after my death for the term of her natural life. And after her death, I will and bequeath that messuage with appurtenances to my daughter Katherine and to her legitimate heirs; if she dies without legitimate heirs then I will and bequeath the messuage with appurtenances to the church of St. John forever, to pray for my soul and the souls of all Christians." In testimony and witness, etc., the 11th day of October.

Also, Alison Tayt came into the council chamber on Ouse Bridge before Thomas Wrangwish, mayor of the city of York, and the aldermen of that city on 11 October, and then and there offered to take oath upon a book that she had been a servant of Thomas Worcetre and was present in person when dom. John Chalonere asked and enquired to whom he would pass on and bequeath the messuage with appurtenances in which he resided and in which he then lay upon his death-bed. To which he responded, saying for all to hear, as written down in the above testimonial more precisely, that he gave and bequeathed that messuage with appurtenances to his wife Ellen for her lifetime and after her death it was to remain to his daughter Katherine, she and her legitimate heirs to have and hold; and if it chanced that Katherine died without legitimate heirs, then he willed and bequeathed the messuage to the church of St. John at the end of Ouse Bridge forever, to pray for his soul and those of all Christians.

DISCUSSION

The presence in many borough archives of copies of wills, whether individual documents or entries within records of wider scope, suggests that it was probably common for borough authorities to have an interest in such documents. For those documents called into play some of the fundamental liberties of burgesses, notably the right to hold and dispose of real estate relatively freely, when unencumbered by predispositions of patrimony, and the dower rights of women. It was to the benefit of those borough authorities whose courts had been granted jurisdiction over disputes concerning burgage tenure to keep on hand copies of documents evidencing ownership of those properties.

It was also advantageous for townspeople both to have their property transfers enacted in a public setting such as a court and/or to have transactional documents read out in public and copies then deposited in borough archives. If a legal dispute arose in the borough court over an inheritance, the will copy could be retrieved as evidence from records reasonably close at hand, as opposed to the time and cost involved in obtaining an authorized copy from ecclesiastical sources. Yet although probate and enrolment generated a crude kind of land registry, we should not forget that the primary reason for probate was to authenticate the document and allow its execution to proceed; it was not the purpose of probate to pass judgement on whether the property devised rightfully belonged to the testator.

While borough authorities acknowledged the primacy of the Church in the area of will probate, at least as regarded personalty and devise to pious uses, they naturally became involved in this arena. Copies of deeds are found among some of the earliest surviving borough court records, and wills or notices of wills were quick to join them. Because so much has not survived, it is difficult and dangerous to generalize, and what does survive portrays a range of practices. In some towns deeds and wills were transcribed into court records among other notations of legal cases. London's husting rolls provide the best example of this – deeds having been enrolled from 1252; many hundreds of citizens' wills have survived for us in that record. At Colchester entering the wills into the court rolls with all sorts of other records remained the practice throughout the late Middle Ages, making it necessary by the late fourteenth century for successive town clerks to compile a finding tool for what might be found in each annual roll, and on what folio. At Winchester too we hear of wills being recorded together with deeds on a "certain roll" archived in the community chest. At Ipswich, by contrast, a separate record series was spun off from the main court rolls and dedicated to recording matters related to property transfers, and wills were transferred there (from the main court roll) from 1307, although the recording of property transactions is evidenced just a few years after it began in London.

In some towns we find wills copied into volumes of memoranda; Lynn's Red Register, York's Memorandum Book B, Bristol's Great Red Book, and Southampton's Black Book are examples. In these cases it is not clear whether the volumes were serving as official registers of wills, or whether the inclusions are selective and for purposes that are more bureaucratic. In some of these cases wills may have been recorded only where the corporation was itself implicated – such as when bequests were made to the community, or borough government was asked to involve itself in supervising fulfillment of bequests. Some wills were recorded many years after the testator's death, and there does not seem to have been a specific cut-off date; presumably so long as credible witnesses to the making of the will were alive, probate was possible.

The initial focus of borough government interest in wills was insofar as they dealt with burgage tenements. It was unnecessary to transcribe the entire document, and often we find an edited down version, or just selected extracts, or even only an abstract or a notice of the document. In other cases, the entire document appears to have been transcribed. This may have owed something to the inclinations of different clerks, but it also appears that full transcription increasingly became the trend, and was not intended to represent any competition with ecclesiastical courts. A copy of one citizen's will entered into a Winchester volume of memoranda closed with two notices of probate:

This testament has been proved before us, the Deacon of Winchester, and pronounced legitimate by us, and we have committed the administration of all the goods dealt with by the testament to the above-named executors in due legal form. In testimony of which our seal of office has been appended to this document. Given at Winchester on 17 January in the above year [1349].

This testament was proved with regard to the lay fee in the session of the Winchester city court held on 16 March 1362, and it was enrolled etc. In the time of Nicholas de Hanyton, mayor.

[W.H.B. Bird, ed. The Black Book of Winchester, Winchester, 1925, 117.]

As borough courts becoming increasingly drawn into acting as a secondary venue for probate, copying of wills in entirety may have seemed the advisable course. The proving of a testament in a borough court applied to the entire document, not just those clauses related to urban realty. The role of borough courts as a secondary venue – it being expected that probate before Church officials would take place first – is evidenced in local by-laws and customs. Chapters 18-24 of the Norwich custumal concern themselves with this subject; chapter 18 required probate of any will bequeathing real estate within the borough, and enrolment of those parts of the document dealing with the properties. The initial section of Ipswich's custumal dealt with various matters relating to pleas of land, including several chapters related to wills. In particular, chapter 16 prescribed a form of probate similar to that described above at London and Bristol. Even a small town such as Maldon seems to have required a form of probate before its court. Lynn's husting court also had probate powers, but was in the hands of episcopal administration, although the bishop conceded the mayor the right to compile a copy of all business involving tenements in the borough, including wills; the Red Register may have been the outcome of this, or perhaps it was simply part of the ongoing effort of the mayoral administration to usurp episcopal jurisdiction.

The first document translated above is one element of what appears to be a copy, obtained by Bristol authorities at unknown date, of a series of provisions relating to London's constitution. Some of that series are taken from London's Liber Albus or Liber Custumarum, but the clauses dealing with testaments are not found in either of those works. According to town clerk Richard Ricart, who compiled these documents into a reference book – although whether from sources in London or already held in the Bristol archives is unknown – the source was a volume used by Henry Darcy (mayor 1337-39).

London was looked to by many boroughs as a source of advice and inspiration in dealing with constitutional and legal matters. In 1325, for example, the Oxford authorities had asked their London counterparts how the latter would deal with a situation in which someone challenged a bequest of property by claiming part of the property as his by right, while another part was subject to a novel disseisin process, and a third part of the bequest was unchallenged. The reply from London, echoing a provision quoted below, was that a will was proved through the examination of two sworn witnesses and if a challenge against the will was forthcoming, probate could be granted but the challenge would be registered along with the will. The challenger then had the right to bring at some future time a legal action to prove his/her claim, if possible. A dispute over a testament, dealt with in the London eyre of 1276, shows that the city authorities in husting were prepared to annul a will if its bequests unjustifiably circumvented the rights of the heirs. Likewise they were prepared to deny probate if the testator's seal or the evidence of the provers were suspect.

Liber Albus is not silent on the subject of probate of testaments, but it addresses the peripheries more than the core. The legal value of enrolled copies of wills is illustrated:

In cases where reversions or rents are devised by a testament enrolled in the husting record, those reversions or rents are passed on [i.e. in effect] from the time of the testator's death. So that those to whom such rents have been devised may distrain for the rent and make avowry. And those with reversion may sue a writ of waste at will without attornment by the tenants, and can, if necessary, base their case on the enrolments should they not have the testaments themselves in hand.

The same custom is applicable to deeds, indentures and other documents enrolled in the husting record. Such enrolments have always been the practice, so long as the testaments are openly read out and proved in full husting, as is mentioned above.

[H.T. Riley, ed. Liber Albus, vol.1 (1859), 180.]

The final phrase of the last sentence, referring back to some earlier passage, may point to the original source of the Bristol transcription, for the copy made in the Liber Albus omitted any earlier section dealing with testaments.

One of the major concerns was with ensuring that the testament was an accurate representation of the testator's final wishes, and not a document to which he/she did not consent or, worse, a forgery. Thus the requirement, dating back to at least an ordinance of 1302, that:

henceforth no testament is to be granted probated unless the testator's seal is attached or appended. Similarly, not unless both witnesses can expressly testify it is the testator's seal and are well familiar with that seal.

[Liber Albus, vol.1, 403.]

While another clause dealt with the question of disputes surrounding testaments brought for probate:

That, regarding the probate of testaments, if anyone makes any challenge to a testament when it is undergoing probate, the testament is to be granted probate (at least, so long as the witnesses can testify to the last will of the testator) except in regard to that part of the testament challenged by the challenger.

[Liber Albus, vol.1, 407.]

As the second document translated above indicates, the will of the testator was paramount in cases of property he or she had a right to devise, notwithstanding any challenges by heirs. Osbert's testament had made provision for a chantry in St. Mary-le-Bow, although for the benefit of himself and his first wife Joan; his second wife Anne (or Agnes) was then still alive, and was bequeathed Osbert's properties in the two parishes for life, or until she remarried. After that, the properties were to be sold to finance chantries in St. Mary-le-Bow and two other churches. The aldermen of almost a generation later interpreted his wishes slightly differently, while upholding Osbert's broad intent, to the exclusion of heirs who, one assumes, had tried to lay claim to the property following Anne's death.

The third document was part of a set of customs and ordinances compiled by Bristol's recorder (legal expert) in 1344, while the fourth was similarly one of a group of reforms legislated at York in 1371. The fifth is simply a statement describing probate procedure made following the transcription into Lynn's Red Register in 1343 of that part of William de Walton's will concerning a particular tenement. Three days was the norm for giving others a chance to state claims to property devised, although this period could be extended in exceptional cases, such as the probate in 1345 of the testament of Nicholas Page of Norwich, who had acquired Lynn property through marriage; two witnesses – also Norwich men – were produced by the executors, and were separately interrogated as to Nicholas' state of mind when his testament was drawn up, and to the appending of his seal to the document. In fact, Nicholas stated in his document that because his seal was not widely known, he had also arranged for the seal of the deacon of Norwich to be appended as well. Another description of the probate procedure, concerning the will of Thomas de Rigges in 1330, closes with the note that:

Since no-one came to object to the testament that had been thus legitimately proclaimed and satisfactorily proven by trustworthy men, the judgement is for it to be enrolled and seisin delivered to the executors in due legal form.

[Ingleby, op.cit., 1, 56.]

Finally, the investigation into the nuncupative will of Thomas Worcetre, although not a probate proceeding, illustrates the type of examination that borough authorities may have instituted in some cases, whether as part of probate or not. At the same time it shows the kind of problem that could arise when a will was not enrolled in the borough records. The investigation was part of the city council's attempt to mediate a dispute over ownership of Worcetre's former residence, between Worcetre's daughter, Katherine Basingburne, and sherman Henry Faucet (in the person of his widow and executrix). In September 1484 the king, whom Katherine had petitioned for justice, ordered the mayor to settle the dispute. The investigation was still going on in March 1485, when it seemed to have made little progress.

NOTES

"reversion"

A situation in which property is given or devised for a limited term (e.g. life), or under specific conditions, and following the end of the term or termination of the conditions, the property reverts to the heirs of the grantor or testator; a reversion was a commodity that could be sold or otherwise alienated. By contrast a remainder is an interest in property, to become active following the end of the term or termination of conditions, that is assigned to someone other than an heir; because of that it needed to be specified in a legal document, whereas a reversion did not need to be specified, as it was automatic in law (however, in practice testators often specified the reversion).

"proved"

I.e. the authenticity vouched for.

"state of mind"

I am here assuming that de lestate le testatoure refers to the testator's state of mind when the testament was drawn up, rather than social standing or property. Similarly, the court's questions about the testator's seal were doubtless to confirm that the witnesses were familiar with the seal and could verify that the seal on the testament was genuine.

"subsequently have recovery"

I.e. before the law, should their rights, determined by the testament, be challenged or usurped.

"call it to warranty"

Call on it as evidence of their rights.

"may take 40d."

I.e. this was the fee to be paid the town clerk by those bringing the testament for probate.

"If witnesses default"

It is not clear whether this refers to a lack of witnesses to support probate, or a failure of witnesses to answer the court's questions satisfactorily.

"before the entire community"

I.e. in a public setting. An account of the probate of the will of Thomas de Rigges states that the proclamation was made by the common sergent in the gildhall on three days when the assembly was in session.

"one end of Ouse Bridge"

At the corner of Micklegate and North Street.

"17 January"

This was just three days after the will was drawn up, and we may guess that probate took place hastily in the context of the Black Death, which began in the west of England. The haste and the survivors' preoccupation with the plague may explain why probate in the city court did not follow close on. However, in places like London and Ipswich the Black Death created a peak in activity in borough probate.

"lay fee"

I.e. the real estate bequeathed to lay persons (as opposed to pious uses).

"make avowry"

If the party on whom the distraint was made sued for restitution, the defendant could acknowledge the distraint but prevent summary judgement against him by declaring (avowing) that he had the right to do so.

"writ of waste"

A complaint that the tenant is neglecting or damaging a property so that its value will be significantly diminished once the complainant comes into possession.

TRANSLATION

Let it be remembered that on 10 July 1471, Davy Herell gentleman and his wife Elizabeth delivered a written complaint, as per the custom of the city, to John Stokton, then mayor, and the aldermen of the city of London, in the Inner Chamber of the city Guildhall, against John Lambard mercer of London and John Basyngthwayte grocer of London. [Of which] the terms of the complaint, the answer thereto, the response [of the complainants] along with all other things pertaining to the same are written below.

To their most honourable lord and masters, the mayor and aldermen of the city of London, Davy Herell gentleman and his wife Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Alexander Marchall, son and heir of Robert Marchall citizen and grocer of London, declare to your good selves that the said Robert in his testament willed that his wife Elizabeth should have, for her lifetime, 4 messuages located in the parish of St. Antholin and 2 gardens lying in the parish of St. Giles Cripplegate, London. And that, after her death, the lands should remain to his son Alexander and to his direct heirs. Robert Marchall subsequently died. After his death his wife Elizabeth occupied those lands and tenements during her life and subsequently died. After her death, the said Alexander occupied the same lands without disturbance during his lifetime, and then died. After his death John Lambard mercer of London and John Basyngthwayte grocer of London laid claim to all the lands and tenements for their own use, contrary to Robert's will, in which it is stated that Robert Marchall wished John Lambard and John Basyngthwayte, as his feoffees, to carry out his wishes as expressed in his testament. [They] will not allow us, your supplicants, to collect any revenues from those lands and tenements. Instead they receive the revenues therefrom for their own benefit, contrary to the will of Robert Marchall. Therefore, may it please your lordships to give sympathetic consideration to these matters, to order John Lambard and John Basyngthwayte to appear before you to be questioned about them, and to give such direction and judgement thereon as is required by justice and good conscience. Doing so for the love of God and in the name of charity.

This is the answer of John Lambard and John Basyngthwayte to the written complaint of Davy Herell and his wife Elizabeth. The said John and John say that Robert Marchall, in his testament, willed that his wife Elizabeth have the 4 messuages and 2 gardens specified in the complaint, for her lifetime, and after her death the messuages and gardens were to remain to the said Alexander and his direct legitimate heirs, conditional upon certain specifications laid out in the testament. The wording of which is as follows:

"and in particular as regards the bearing and behaviour of my son Alexander. That is to say, if he behaves well and virtuously he is to have it, as is written above; but if his behaviour is not good or virtuous, but he gives himself over to unruliness and vice, the feoffees are to give his share to my other children, dividing it according to their

as appears in the testament, which they are ready to put forward in evidence. Robert had as his offspring the said Alexander, now dead, Amy the wife of John Lambard, and Elizabeth the wife of William Langefeld, still living.

The two Johns say that the behaviour of Alexander after the death of his father was neither good nor virtuous, but given over to unruliness and vice. Furthermore, they say that at an earlier date, during the lifetime of Alexander, on the basis of the testament they sued a writ of sub pena in the king's Chancery, at great cost and expense to themselves, against one Thomas Wenslowe. Who had schemed with a willing Alexander, after the death of Robert Marchall, to arrange for one William Olyver – who pretended to be a feoffee-to-use of Robert Marchall – to turn over to Thomas Wenslowe the ownership of certain lands and tenements which Robert, by his testament, had assigned to Alexander under the condition indicated above. [The purpose of their suit was] to compel him to turn over ownership of those lands and tenements to the two Johns. Once the allegations and evidence of both parties had been heard, after great deliberation the Court of Chancery pronounced judgement compelling Thomas to turn over ownership of the lands and tenements to the two Johns.

Whereas Davy and Elizabeth say that after the death of his mother Alexander occupied the lands throughout his lifetime, the two Johns say that he never occupied them, other than illegally. And then he never took possession until recently, during the time of troubles – that is, a little before last Michaelmas – and occupied them until the following Easter; during which time they dared not try to regain possession, out of fear. John Lambard says that Alexander used threats to scare him off and publicly accused him of being a traitor to Henry VI, lately called king of England, so that throughout that period he hardly dared go out in public.

These statements they are ready to prove in whatever way seems appropriate to your lordships. Moreover, whatever direction and decision that your lordships give as regards the testament they are ready to respect and carry out.

This is the response of Davy Herell and his wife Elizabeth to the answer given by John Lambard and John Basyngthwayte. Davy and Elizabeth protest that the statements made in the answer is not a tenable answer to the complaint laid by them. Notwithstanding, so that the truth of the matter be known, in response Davy and Elizabeth say that Robert Marchall caused the condition, specified in the answer, to be incorporated in his testament with the intent of encouraging his son Alexander to shun and avoid vice and unruliness, but not so that he would be utterly disinherited, nor to remove his source of livelihood. Davy and his wife Elizabeth also say that, after the death of his father Robert, Alexander was of good and virtuous character and did not give himself over to unruliness and vice in the way that John Lambard and John Basyngthwayte allege in their answer. What is more, Davy and his wife Elizabeth say, after the death of Robert Marchall his wife Elizabeth occupied all the lands in question and died around 24 August 1470. Within the space of 3 days following her death Alexander took possession of all those lands and tenements, and retained possession without disturbance throughout his life, dying in possession of them about the last day of April last past. While he was alive neither John Lambard nor John Basyngthwayte made any accusation of vice or unruly behaviour on Alexander's part, nor that Alexander used threats to scare him off or called him a traitor. Nor that Alexander occupied the lands and tenements illegally, in the way that John Lambard has alleged in his answer.

John Lambard and John Basyngthwayte have also alleged in their answer that, as a result of a sub pena brought by them in the king's Chancery, they compelled one Thomas Wenslowe to turn over to them ownership of the lands and tenements. To which Davy and his wife Elizabeth respond that those lands were lands in the country [side], and not part of these lands [i.e. claimed by the plaintiff?]; and that their complaint was made in Chancery, via that sub pena, to compel Thomas Wenslowe to turn over to them ownership of the lands and tenements in the country with the intent that they carry out the last will of Robert Marchall, not for their own use and benefit, as evidenced in the records of the Court of Chancery.

All of which statements Davy and his wife Elizabeth are ready to prove in whatever way seems appropriate to your lordships, beseeching you to give whatever direction and judgement in this matter as you think right and in good conscience.

[Response of Lambard and Basyngthwayte:] Let it be remembered that Alexander Marchall, after the death of his father, displayed such unruliness and vices, among others, as are described below – which John Lambard and John Basyngthwayte are sorry to have to relate, but they are forced to it.

First, at the month's mind for his father, Alexander stole and carried off a gilded silver salt cellar, worth ?6 or more. Since the death of his father, the character of Alexander's life can be seen in that he has lived adulterously with various women – with one of which women he was arrested and brought before the Counter in Passion Week, as evidenced in its records. Also, since his father's death, Alexander has robbed various men of their goods; that is, among others, the vicarage of Ashwell of a boar and Robert Trigge of Ashwell in Hertfordshire of 4 loads of timber, for which he was indicted, as evidenced in the king's records. Also he committed various other felonies in Yorkshire, which can be proved if necessary. Also, after his father's death, Alexander stole and carried off from this father's place in the country the inventory of his father's goods, against the will of his executors. Also, John Lambard and John Basyngthwayte delivered to Alexander, immediately and forthwith following his father's death, everything his father had bequeathed him; notwithstanding which, Alexander, because of his malicious character, had Danyel and Trevilian threaten and harass the two Johns, to the point where they were prepared to give Alexander £300 to have him leave them in peace. Also, Alexander forged a document in the form of a testament in his father's name, of which there was a great deal that was never part of his father's will, as can be clearly proved. Also, John Lambard and John Basyngthwayte sued Thomas Wenslowe in Chancery by writ sub pena for certain lands and tenements which had belonged to the testator, but of which Thomas Wenslowe had obtained possession unscrupulously, through a conspiracy with Alexander after the death of his father, contrary to the last will of his father, at great cost and expense to themselves. John Lambard has since undertaken extensive repairs to those lands and tenements.

If these examples are not considered sufficient, the two Johns can prove various other misbehaviours and unruly actions of Alexander after his father's death, which they are very loath to reveal.

This is the response of Davy Herell and his wife Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Alexander Marchall, to the slanderous accusations alleged by John Lambard and John Basyngthwayte regarding the character of Alexander Marchall.

As to the first accusation, Davy and Elizabeth say that Alexander never stole nor carried off in any larcenous fashion a salt cellar, as alleged in the accusation; if he had any salt cellar it was as part of the goods bequeathed him by his father Robert Marchall. As to the second accusation, Davy and Elizabeth say that Alexander did not live adulterously, as alleged in that accusation etc. As to the third accusation, Davy and Elizabeth say that Alexander was never a thief nor did he rob anyone; regarding the boar of the vicarage of Ashwell and the 4 loads of timber of Robert Trigge, Alexander claimed a quit-rent from the vicarage, for the arrears of which Alexander took the boar and 4 loads of timber by way of a distress, and not by way of theft as is slanderously and maliciously alleged by John Lambard and John Basyngthwayte. Nor was Alexander ever indicted for felony for taking the boar and 4 loads of timber, as alleged in the accusation etc. As to the fourth accusation, Davy and Elizabeth say that Alexander never stole the inventory of his father's goods; nor did he ever take it in any other fashion, except with the intent to ensure that neither John Lambard nor John Basyngthwayte deceive him concerning his share of the goods of his father etc. As to the fifth accusation, Davy and Elizabeth say that Alexander never had Danyel and Trevilian harass John Lambard and John Basyngthwayte; if they were harassed by Danyell and Trevilian, it was for a reason stemming from some matter of the two Johns, and not that relating to Alexander etc. As to the sixth accusation, Davy and Elizabeth say that Alexander never forged any testament of his father in the manner alleged by the two Johns etc. As to the seventh accusation, Davy and Elizabeth say that Thomas Wenslowe never had possession in the lands as a result of a conspiracy involving Alexander, as alleged in the accusation. In proof of which, John Lambard and John Basyngthwayte alleged in their suit of sub pena in Chancery that the possession Thomas Wenslowe had of those lands was against Alexander's will, as is evidenced by Chancery records. As for the costs they expended on that suit, they have recouped it and much more from the revenues and profits from the lands and tenements in question.

Thereafter, on 13 September 1471, John Lambard, in order to prove the bad and misguided behaviour of Alexander Marchall, after the death of his father, brought before the mayor and aldermen John Horne gentleman, Roger Richard butler, and Simon Blower beadle of Candlewick Street ward of the city.

With regard to the first accusation, claiming that at the month's mind of Robert Marchall Alexander stole a salt cellar from a cupboard in Roger Richard's keeping, then and there before the mayor and aldermen Roger was administered an oath upon a book to tell the truth in response to whatever enquiries were put to him on this matter. Then it was asked of Roger whether he had certain knowledge that Alexander had stolen the salt cellar or not. To which he responded that he did not know it for certain, but it was his conscientious opinion that Alexander, and no-one else, had stolen the salt-cellar.

And John Horne said and affirmed, in that time and place, that after the death of his father Alexander Marchall was indicted for felony, for stealing a boar from the vicarage of Ashwell and also for stealing timber from Robert Trygge. He showed to the mayor and aldermen a copy, unsealed, of that indictment. John Horne was asked if he would swear upon a book that what he said was true. John Horne answered that what he said was true, but that he would not affirm it under oath.

Simon Blower was, then and there before the mayor and aldermen, administered an oath upon a book. He stated and affirmed that he, with others of Candlewick Street ward, in Passion Week last past, at about 11 o'clock at night found a woman in Alexander's chamber, sitting by his bedside, with no-one else present. Whereupon Simon took Alexander and the woman to the Counter of the Poultry, London, and there advised them of the orders of the ward alderman.

After due consideration, the mayor and aldermen asked John Lambard (John Basyngthwayte then being absent) and David Herell whether they would accept the decision of the mayor and aldermen, or the majority thereof, on this matter. And would each put up a bond to do so to the city chamberlain, by a recognizance of £400. They agreed to put up bonds in that regard, and so were each bound to Robert Colwyche, chamberlain of the city, in £400, by two separate recognizances, with conditions, the tenor of which is given below. [The two recognizances are entered into the record, but have not been transcribed by the editor].

Thereafter, on 18 September 1471, John Stokton mayor, Humphrey Starkey recorder, Richard Lee, Mathew Philipp, John Yonge, William Tailour, George Irlond, Robert Basset, William Hampton, John Tate, William Edward, Bartholomew James, John Bromer, Thomas Stalbrok, Richard Gardyner, William Haryot, Robert Drope, John Crosby and John Warde aldermen of the city, took upon themselves the responsibility for arbitration of the matter:

Forasmuch as the witnesses put forward by John Lambard did not satisfactorily prove Alexander to have been misguided, unruly, and profligate following the death of his father. And also Robert Trygge came before the mayor and aldermen on 20 August last and stated and affirmed that Alexander Marchall claimed – as his father had done before him – to have a quit-rent from the property where the boar and timber were taken; and that Alexander removed the boar and timber by way of distress, and not for any other reason. And because John Basyngthwayte, who knew most of Robert Marchall's intent when he was drawing up his testament, stated under oath before the mayor and aldermen on 24 July and affirmed that, to the best of his understanding, the intent of Robert Marchall in what he expressed in his testament was never to prevent Alexander from having the 4 messuages and 2 gardens, but rather that Alexander should avoid unruliness and vice and be of a good and virtuous character. And because Alexander, for the period of nine months before his death was in possession of the messuages and gardens, during which time John Lambard allowed Alexander to occupy those messuages and gardens without disturbance or interruption.

It was therefore adjudged, deemed and awarded by the mayor and aldermen that John Lambard should not prevent but allow David Herell and his wife Elizabeth to collect and receive the revenues and profits from the messuages and gardens, to [the use] of that David and his wife Elizabeth and the legitimate direct heirs of Elizabeth. Since John Basyngthwayte has been out of the city and not always ready to respond to the issues of the complaint, when he next returns to town John Basyngthwayte is to be ordered to appear before the mayor and aldermen, to be questioned on the above matters etc.

DISCUSSION

Whether the mayor's court reached the right verdict is of course more than we can say with confidence. It does look as though John Lambard was either being over-zealous in fulfilling his duties as executor, or, more likely, was using that authority to further his vested interest, as Robert Marchall's son-in-law, in the disputed property and had persuaded his fellow executor, John Basyngthwayte, to go along with him. Of Marchall's two other executors, Robert Heworth had died at some time in the 1460s, and William Freeman was probably also dead by the time of the dispute. Whether Basyngthwayte's own testimony, which helped bring judgement against him and Lambard, and his absences from town reflect discomfort with the proceedings, we will never know. At the same time, it seems plausible that Robert Marchall may have had valid concerns about his son, who was likely a teenager at the time of his father's death (which would explain why he was not among Robert's executors, but his daughter was an adult by 1470); some of the accusations against Alexander's character his daughter and son-in-law could not convincingly refute.

Nonetheless, we have the impression that Lambard's case was somewhat exaggerated and distorted in its claims, and he may have hoped his status in the city – he having served as sheriff in 1461 and as alderman 1460-70 – would carry some weight with the court. His failure to obtain a share of Alexander's inheritance probably did him little harm; he likely already had a share of the Marchall property through his wife's inheritance, for he was buried (1487) on his estate at Hinxworth, Hertfordshire, a neighbouring village to Ashwell.

Numerous cases of such disputes are known, and others are discussed elsewhere. One has the impression that they were common, but this is of course a bias caused by the type of records that survive to us from medieval England, largely judicial and administrative. Compared to the number of wills that were proved without evident subsequent dispute, legal battles resulting from the execution of testaments were the exception rather than the rule.

NOTES

"Robert Marchall"

Sheriff in 1439; dead by 1447.

"writ of sub pena"

In Chancery procedure, a writ to compel an accused party to attend a judicial proceeding at a specific place and time and respond to the accusation of a plaintiff, under threat of punishment (i.e. as contempt of court) for non-compliance.

"time of troubles"

Reference to that period of the War of the Roses (September 1470 to April 1471) when Edward IV was temporarily supplanted by the restoration of his predecessor, Henry VI.

"month's mind"

A commemorative ceremony held a month after a funeral.

"lived adulterously with various women"

This would appear to imply consorting with prostitutes.

"Passion Week"

The week before Easter.

"unsealed"

TRANSLATION

In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, Amen. I, John Burghard, burgess of Bishop's Lynn, have set out my testament in the following manner. First, I commend my soul to Almighty God and the Blessed Virgin Mary, and my body to be buried in the church of St. Margaret, Lynn, before the altar of St. John the Baptist there. I bequeath one hundred shillings to the high altar of that church, for my forgotten tithes. Towards the fabric of that church, 20s. I leave £13.6s.8d towards the expenses of my funeral. For distribution to poor people on the day of my burial, £50. Towards the fabric of the chapel of St. James, Lynn, 20s. Towards the fabric of the chapel of St. Nicholas, Lynn, 10s. Towards the fabric of Stoke church, 10s. Towards the fabric of Wretton church, 40d. Towards the fabric of West Dereham church, 40d. Towards the fabric of Southery church, 40d. Towards the fabric of Hilgay church, 40d.

I bequeath to Richard, the husband of my sister Matilda, my best gown. To Matilda herself, £4. I bequeath 10s. to Geoffrey Drewe senior. To his wife Alice, 10s. To Geoffrey Drewe junior, 10s. I bequeath 10s. to John the son of Thomas Burghard. I bequeath one hundred shillings to be distributed among my poor relations and widows of Stoke, at the discretion of my executors; and 40s. to be distributed in the same way among my poor relations and widows of Burton. I bequeath 100s. to be distributed by my executors among the sickly poor of Bishop's Lynn. I bequeath 20s. towards repairs to the Setchey causeway. I bequeath 6s.8d to Thomas de Derham, my one-time associate. To his brother John, 20s. I bequeath 20s. towards the repair of Stoke bridge and causeway. I bequeath 10s. to [maintaining] the light of Stoke church. I bequeath 10s. to the light before the altar of St. John Baptist in St. Margaret's church, Lynn. I bequeath 10s. to William Colle of Lynn. Towards the fabric of Wereham church, 40d. To the chaplain of the parish church of St. Margaret, Lynn, 40d.

I bequeath £66.13s.4d. for anniversaries for my soul, the souls of my father and mother, those to whom I am beholden, and all the faithful deceased to be celebrated in St. Margaret's church, Lynn, in its charnel chapel, and in other places in Lynn dedicated to God, during the two years following my death, at the arrangements of my executors. I wish my executors to have freedom in selecting the chaplains for those anniversaries in the places mentioned.

I bequeath 70s. for the distribution of shoes to poor people of the town of Lynn, at the discretion of my executors. I bequeath 40s. towards the repair of bridges in the town of Bishop's Lynn, at the discretion of my executors. I bequeath 10s. to Margaret, the wife of Thomas Burghard. To Margaret's daughter Sarah, 10s. To the sacrist of St. Margaret's church, 40d. Towards the repair of causeways between Lynn and Wootton, 100s., at the discretion of my executors. To Marion, the wife of Henry de Derham, 10s. I bequeath to my poor relations all my funeral clothing (that is, linens and woollens), to be divided among them at the decision of my executors, as they think best. I wish that 15 wax torches, each of the weight of 6 lb. of wax, burn around my body and that 16 paupers, newly clothed, each hold in hand a torch around my body while mass is celebrated for my soul. And that after my burial whatever remains of the torches be distributed in equal portions among St. Margaret's church, the chapels of St. James and St. Nicholas the charnel, and the Friars (Preacher, Minor, Carmelite, and Augustinian) in Lynn, as well as the parish church of Stoke, to burn there at the elevation of the Host.

I bequeath to my daughter Alice, a nun at Ickleton, twenty shillings a year for life, to be received at Easter from [a rent from] a certain shop in Brigate lying between the tenement of Ralph le Wake on the north side and the tenement once of John Gigge on the south side, no matter into whose hands it comes. I bequeath to my wife Alice for her lifetime that entire tenement, with its buildings and appurtenances, that I recently acquired from Alan de Ripun; it is located in the town of Bishop's Lynn between the tenement of William de Blakene on the east side and the tenement of Alice, widow of William de Dockynge on the west side. It is my wish that after the death of my wife Alice this tenement, with its buildings and appurtenances, revert to my son Geoffrey and his direct, legitimate heirs.

I bequeath to my son Geoffrey and his direct, legitimate heirs that entire tenement, with its buildings and appurtenances, located in the town of Bishop's Lynn, that I recently acquired from Sir John Sefoul; it lies in Brigate between the tenement of Ralph le Wake on the north side and the tenement once of John Gigge on the south side. Also that entire tenement, with its buildings and appurtenances, located in the town of Bishop's Lynn in Wingate, between the tenement of John Bamme on the west side and the tenement of Adam de Walsoken on the east side. Also five shops, with their adjacent courtyard, in the town of Bishop's Lynn in Pillory Lane, which lie between the tenement once of Robert de Walsingham on the east side and the tenement of Roger de Buttelee on the west side. Also a tenement, with two shops and its buildings and appurtenances, in the town of Bishop's Lynn, lying in Brigate next to the tenement of Adam de Walsoken on its north side. Also a tenement, with its buildings and appurtenances, in the town of Bishop's Lynn in Brigate, that I acquired in the past from Joan Noon, lying between the tenement of Bartholomew le Coteler on the north side and the tenement once of Richard de Warewik on the south side. Also a tenement, with its buildings and appurtenances, that I acquired from Thomas Broun, located in the town of Bishop's Lynn on the corner opposite St. Margaret's church, Lynn, between the tenement of John de Tilneie butcher on the east side and the tenement of Lady Aveline de Tilneie on the north side. On condition that Geoffrey gives each year for his lifetime five shillings towards the maintenance of the light of St. John the Baptist in St. Margaret's church, Lynn. And also that entire tenement, with its buildings and appurtenances, that I acquired from the executors of the testament of dom. Walter le Seksteyn chaplain, recently deceased, located in the town of Bishop's Lynn on the south side of the priory, between the tenement of Thomas Bamme on the east side and the tenement of dom John de Folsham chaplain on the west side. Also that entire tenement with three shops and its buildings and appurtenances, that I acquired from John de Ely, located in the town of Bishop's Lynn next to the tenement of Peter de Folsham. Also four shillings annual rent due each year from the tenement of Stephen Foot located in the town of Bishop's Lynn; which rent [I acquired] recently from Alice de Wyrham. Also thirty two shillings annual rent due each year from a tenement, with its buildings [and appurtenances], located in the town of Bishop's Lynn in Briggegate, which dom. John de Tid chaplain holds and which lies between the tenement of Robert de Bichamwelle on the south side and the tenement of Roger Prat on the north side. Also two shillings annual rent due each year from the tenement of Ralph de Brunham, located in Bishop's Lynn to the rear of Lynn Priory. Should it happen that my son Geoffrey die without direct, legitimate heirs, then I wish all the above tenements and rents to be equally divided, by my executors, among my surviving sons and daughter.

I bequeath to my son Nicholas and his direct, legitimate heirs a shop in Bishop's Lynn with solar built above it that was once Adam Baude's, lying in the Gresmarket between the tenement of Adam Walsoken on the west side and the tenement recently of Mariota on the east side. Also a tenement, with its buildings and appurtenances, located in the town of Bishop's Lynn in the Gresmarket, between the tenement of John de Couteshale on the west side and the tenement once of Martin de Thorpe on the east side. Also a tenement, with its buildings and appurtenances, located next to the Guildhall of Bishop's Lynn, between the tenement of William Elys on the east side and the tenement of Hugh de Riggis on the west side. Also a tenement, with six shops and its buildings and appurtenances, located in the town of Bishop's Lynn in Damgate, between the tenement of John de Fordham senior on the east side and the public lane called Heukewaldeslane on the west side. Also forty shillings annual rent due each year from the tenement of John de Coumbes, located in the town of Lynn between the public lane called Austynes Lane on the south side and the tenement that was Walter le Barker's on the north side. Also twenty shillings annual rent due each year from the tenement of Robert de Tilneie lying in the Gresmarket between the tenement once of John de Cranehous on the east side and the tenement of Simon de Snoringe on the west side. Also sixteen shillings annual rent due each year from the tenement of John Luminour, located in Bishop's Lynn in Damgate, between the tenement of William de Denevere on the east side and the tenement of Alice de Welle on the west side. Also six shillings and eightpence annual rent due each year from the tenement of Henry de Bauseye, located in the town of Bishop's Lynn in the street called Ratton Row. Also fourteen shillings annual rent due each year from the tenement of John de Trunche, lying in Damgate; which rent I recently acquired from John Bamme. Also thirteen shillings and fourpence annual rent due each year from the tenement of Eloise Burghard, located in Bishop's Lynn in Damgate, between the tenement of Eloise on the east side and the tenement of Simon de Lexham on the west side. Also four shillings annual rent due each year from the tenement of Katherine de Deneby, located in Bishop's Lynn in Damgate, between the tenement of Richard de Dockinge on the east side and the tenement of John de Derewent on the west side. Should it happen that my son Nicholas die without direct, legitimate heirs, then I wish that all the above tenements and rents bequeathed him be equally divided, by my executors, among my surviving sons and daughter Margaret.

I bequeath to my son Peter and his direct, legitimate heirs that entire tenement, with its buildings and appurtenances, located in the town of Bishop's Lynn between the tenement of Alan Sandy on the east side and the tenement of William de Blakene on the west side, and extending in length from the said tenement of William de Blakene to the north as far as the public waterway called Purfleet to the south. Also a tenement, with its buildings and appurtenances and with a quay belonging to the same, located in the town of Bishop's Lynn between the tenement of Peter de Waltone on the east side and the tenement and the tenement once of John de Frengue on the west side, and extending in length from the said tenement of Peter de Waltone to the north as far as the public waterway called Purfleet to the south; which tenement I recently acquired from Thomas de Lenna. On condition that my son Peter preserve and maintain a certain public privy built on the quay, adjacent to the tenement; the faithful performance of the same I place as a charge and obligation on the tenement, no matter into whose hands it may come. Also two shops with their buildings and appurtenances, located in Bishop's Lynn in Briggate between the tenement of Peter de Waltone on the north side and the tenement of John de Fordham senior on the south side; which shops I recently acquired from the executors of John Lamberd. Also a shop with its buildings and appurtenances located in the town of Bishop's Lynn in Briggate, between the tenement of Ralph Wake on the north side and the tenement once of Thomas de Hereforde on the south side; which shop I recently acquired from Thomas de Hereforde. Also that entire tenement, with its buildings and appurtenances, located in the town of Bishop's Lynn in the street called Jews Lane, between the tenement of Robert de Tilneye on the east side and the tenement of John de Coutishale on the west side. Also a tenement with four shops, with its buildings and appurtenances, located in the town of Bishop's Lynn in Stonegate, between the tenement of William de Waltone on the east side and the public road on the west side. Also thirty-six shillings annual rent due each year from three shops, with their appurtenances, lying in Briggate between the tenement of John de Massingham on the north side and the tenement of Ralph le Hattere on the south side. Should it happen that my son Peter die without direct, legitimate heirs, then I wish that all the above tenements and rents bequeathed him be equally divided, by my executors, among my surviving sons and daughter Margaret.

I bequeath to my daughter Margaret and her direct, legitimate heirs, that entire tenement, with its buildings and appurtenances and with a quay belonging to it, located in the town of Bishop's Lynn between the tenement of William Colle on the east side and the tenement of Nicholas de Pulham on the west side; its south end abutting on the public waterway called Purfleet. Also a tenement, with its buildings and appurtenances, located in the town of Bishop's Lynn in Webesteresgate, between the tenement of William le Webestere on the north side and the tenement once of John Teyntoure chaplain on the south side. Also a tenement, with its buildings and appurtenances, that I recently acquired from Thomas de Hereforde, located in the town of Bishop's Lynn between the tenement once of Peter de Thorendene on the east side and the tenement of Alan Spirling on the west side. Also eight shops, with their buildings and appurtenances, located in Bishop's Lynn in Ratton Row; which shops I recently acquired from Robert Boleghere. Also a garden situated in Ratton Row; which garden I recently acquired from Geoffrey Hors. Also twelve shillings annual rent due each year from that entire tenement, with its buildings and appurtenances, located in the town of Bishop's Lynn between the tenement of Nicholas de Pulham on the east side and the tenement of Alan Souch on the west side. Also four shillings annual rent due each year from the three shops of Alan Sandy, located in Bishop's Lynn between the tenement of John Mundesson on the east side and the tenement once of John Teyntour chaplain on the west side. Also thirty shillings annual rent due each year from the tenement of Peter Wake, which I acquired from Ralph Wake, located in Bishop's Lynn between the tenement of John Wake on the east side and the tenement of John de Dockinge on the west side. Also eight shillings annual rent received each year from a shop, with its buildings and appurtenances, which Thomas de Fransham holds in Briggate, located in the town of Bishop's Lynn between the shop once of John Gigge on the north side and the tenement once of John de Cranehous on the south side. Also two shillings annual rent due each year; that is, from the tenement of William Colle located in the town of Bishop's Lynn between the tenement of John de Tilneie, son of Sir Thomas de Tilneye, on the south side and the tenement of Stephen le Fourbour on the north side. Also twenty shillings annual rent due each year from that entire tenement, with its buildings and appurtenances, located in the town of Bishop's Lynn in Briggate, between the tenement of Thomas Costyn on the south side and the tenement of William Elys on the north side. Also twenty shillings annual rent due each year from the messuage and tenement, with its buildings and appurtenances, in which Thomas de Riburgh currently lives; it is located in Bishop's Lynn between my tenement on the north side and the tenement of Nicholas Norwich on the south side. Should it happen that my daughter Margaret die without direct, legitimate heirs, then I wish that all the above tenements and rents bequeathed her be equally divided, by my executors, among my surviving sons.

Should it happen that the aforesaid Geoffrey, Nicholas, and Peter, my sons, and Margaret, my daughter, die without direct legitimate heirs, then I wish that all the tenements and rents, with their appurtenances, bequeathed above in this testament be sold by my executors and the executors of Geoffrey, Nicholas, Peter and Margaret. And the money received from the same be distributed in the town of Bishop's Lynn for [the benefit of] my soul, the soul of my wife Alice, the souls of Geoffrey, Nicholas, Peter and Margaret, and the souls of those to whom we are beholden and of all the faithful deceased, at the discretion of those executors.

I bequeath to my son Geoffrey 1 gilded silver cup and £10 in cash. I bequeath to my son Nicholas 1 gilded silver cup and £10 in cash. I bequeath to my son Peter 1 gilded silver cup and £10 in cash. I bequeath to my daughter Margaret 1 gilded silver cup and £40 in cash. It is my wish that custody of my son Peter and my daughter Margaret, while they are minors, along with all the goods, moveable and immoveable, bequeathed them and each of them, as already indicated in my testament, be committed to my wife Alice, until Peter and Margaret come of legal age or Margaret is married.

I bequeath 10s. to the fabric of Ickleton nunnery. I bequeath 20s. to Alice, daughter of William Burghard junior. I bequeath 20s. to my niece Emma. I bequeath 20s. to her son John. I bequeath 20s. to William the son of my sister Matilda. To his son Roger, 20s. I bequeath 40s. to John, son of William Burghard junior. To Matilda, the wife of Peter Wake, 20s. I bequeath 20s. to Edmund, son of William Burghard senior. I bequeath 10s. to Simon de Lexham clerk, for his work on drawing up my testament. I bequeath to my wife Alice my entire bedroom, with each and every cloth, vessel and utensil it contains, of whatever kind, with the exception of the 4 silver cups bequeathed above in this testament to Geoffrey, Nicholas, Peter and Margaret. After Alice's death, I wish that those vessels and utensils remain to my son Geoffrey. I wish that the bed in which I die, wherever God arranges that this should happen, be handed over to my sister Matilda.

The residue of all my goods, wherever found, after my debts are paid and this testament is fulfilled, I bequeath to be spent in the town of Bishop's Lynn on the celebration of masses, bread, cloth, shoes, and other pious uses, at the discretion of my executors, as seems to them most productive and useful for the good of my soul. I make, designate and appoint as my executors of this my testament, or last will, my wife Alice as chief [executrix], my son and heir Geoffrey, Simon de Byteryng, Simon de Snoringe, and Robert de Dockyng, burgesses of Bishop's Lynn; may they faithfully distribute my possessions for my soul, in the sight of God. I bequeath to that Simon, Simon, and Robert, for their labour on the execution of my [testament], £6 to be divided equally among them. I bequeath 5s. to John the clerk, writer of this testament. Drawn up at Bishop's Lynn on 5 April 1339.

Codicil

Memorandum that the late John Burghard, after having made and concluded his testament, altered his will as written down in that testament. Whereas he had bequeathed in that testament £66.13s.4d. for anniversaries for the souls of himself, his father and mother, and all the faithful deceased to be celebrated in St. Margaret's church, Lynn, in its charnel chapel, and in other places in Lynn dedicated to God, during the two years following his death, at the arrangements of his executors, as is more fully set out in that testament. He [subsequently] wished that the £66.13s.4d. be put towards five suitable chaplains, to be chosen by the decision of his executors, celebrating in the charnel for the seven years following his death, with the remaining cost of those anniversaries provided by his executors from his goods. Another addition to that testament was his bequest of 2s.6d to each monk in Norwich priory at the time of his death. Also, to the Prior of Norwich, 6s.8d. To the cellarer there, 40d. To each canon of the houses of West Dereham and Shouldham, 4s. To each lay brother of those houses, 2s. To the Abbot of West Dereham, 5s. To the Prior of Shouldham, 6s.8d. To each nun of the same, 18d. To each lay sister of the same, 12d. He bequeathed 4s. to each of the four alms-collecting orders – the [Friars] Preacher, Minor, Carmelite, and Augustinian – that shall announce his death throughout England. To the three alms-collecting monasteries of Dereham, Shouldham and the cathedral church of Norwich, 5s. He bequeathed 40d. to the Prioress of Ickleton. To each nun there, 2s. He bequeathed 3s. to each canon in the religious houses of West Acre and Pentney. To each brother of the houses of Fritcham, Massingham, Petirston and Beeston, 3s. I bequeath [sic] 26s.8d to the Friars Preacher of Lynn. to the Friars Minor of Lynn, 26s.8d. To the Carmelite Friary of Lynn, 26s.8d. To the Augustinian Friary of Lynn, 26s.8d. He bequeathed to his daughter Margaret £20 over and above what he bequeathed her in his testament. To Godfrey de Dampgate, 13s.4d. To Walter le Coteler, 10s. To Ralph de Egemere, 10s. To Reginald le Sopere, 6s.8d. To Marion, wife of Henry de Derham, 6s.8d. To Alice, daughter of the late William Burghard junior, £6.13s.4d. He arranged that Alice, wife of the deceased, might have from their common goods £200, his entire bedroom, and half of the grain, malt and other victuals in the house in which he lived at the time of his death, to support her and her household, along with everything bequeathed her in the testament, by way of her entire widow's portion (due her under the name of dower) of their common moveables.

I, the aforesaid Alice, declare myself to be content with the portion assigned me by the deceased, as indicated above; and before the venerable lord's official with jurisdiction at Lynn, have in consequence voluntarily given a corporal oath that I will not harrass or trouble the deceased's executors for that portion. As for the document setting forth the portion, as indicated above, of Alice, wife of the deceased, it is appended to the testament. In testimony to which, we the official of the jurisdiction of Lynn, at the request of the executors of the testament, have set our seal of office to the codicil.

DISCUSSION

John Burghard's lengthy will was proved before the bishop's official on 20 August 1339; the anniversary of his death was later celebrated every 15 August, which may represent the date of his death, or the closest saint's day to it. In the months following the document's drafting, when John likely sensed his end approaching, he had evidently given further thought to the needs of his soul – addressed by additional gifts to religious houses, whose grateful residents he doubtless expected would offer prayers for him, and additional investment in annual ceremonies commemorating his death – as well as to the issue of whether dower rights might interfere with his testamentary provisions. The will was not proved, in regard to the real property bequeathed, in the borough court until August 1344, before mayor Adam de Walsoken, who like Burghard was probably a first-generation immigrant to Lynn who built a fortune there. The two men were colleagues in local government, and probably competitors in the wool trade. Those called on to prove the will were mercer John de Derham, the brother of Burghard's former business associate, and the testament's writer, John the clerk.

The will (which I have divided into paragraphs, to make for easier reading and highlight the organization) is an orderly document, carefully worded, which perhaps owes as much to the guidance of Simon de Lexham as to Burghard's own organizational abilities. Its main thrusts are to provide for the testator's soul and for his children. It is a litany of the extensive real estate built up by Burghard, presumably from the wealth he accumulated through his mercantile activities; he entered the franchise at Lynn (1305) as an immigrant, and there is no indication that any of his Lynn property came to him by inheritance.

A biographical sketch of Burghard has been given elsewhere, so here I will present only a few additional points or elaborations. Ironically, his property is far better documented than the activities that made them possible, of which we have only a few glimpses. His preparedness to purchase the franchise at Lynn is one small indication that he was not a penniless fortune-seeker upon arrival. He may already have had some modest landed interests in the region south of Lynn, providing him with wool and/or agricultural produce that he could retail or wholesale. Certainly by the close of his life he had wool-producing lands in Gayton, Boughton, North Runcton, Wormegay, and Terrington – all but the last in the region east and south of Lynn to which Burghard's will makes frequent reference and points to his family origins.

By 1312/13 his affairs were prospering sufficiently that he decided it was time to become a member of the merchant gild. Not long after he was called on to serve his community as a member of a committee on parliamentary affairs, another indication that his star was rising. Within ten years he would be counted as one of the leading wool merchants of the town. His fortune, like those of other contemporary successful merchants, was based partly on supplying the king, itself driven partly by the needs of the army. His acquisitions of rents and tenements, especially in the core of the town along its principal street Briggate and beside the Purfleet, a mercantile location, that are better evidenced than his commercial ventures per se. Those acquisitions not only reflect him capitalizing on the growing commerce of the town, but also represent an important part of his business activities in their own right, providing a significant portion of his annual income. Despite two or perhaps three mayoralties, his service to his community appears only what duty required, and he gives no other indications of an interest in administration as a career route.

The family fortunes waned as quickly as they had waxed. His eldest son died at some point between 1347 and 1352, and most likely was a victim of the Black Death; perhaps the same fate befell his youngest son, Peter, who is not heard of outside the testament. The middle son, Nicholas, had entered the church at some time between his father's death and 1345. In time, all John's property seems to have come to his daughter Margaret. She was certainly of age by 1347, when she was involved in a property dispute with Peter de Walton, who perhaps had encroached upon one of Burghard's properties to which he was neighbour. She married Thomas de Kenynghale who as early as the mid-1350s is seen involved in mercantile ventures to northern Europe, the Low Countries, and Gascony, but who did not take out the franchise at Lynn until 1363. In the early 1370s he served as one of Lynn's jurats.

Margaret died in the latter part of that decade, but in her testament returned to the town the sources of wealth that her father had obtained from it. An entry in the borough records states that:

On 8 October 1378, in the second year of the reign of King Richard II, John de Brunham then being mayor, the entire community was called together and met in the guildhall. The mayor and community unanimously agreed and granted, for themselves and for their successors in perpetuity, that henceforth every year on the festival of the Assumption of the Glorious Virgin [15 August], they would arrange to be held in the choir of St. Margaret's church the anniversary of John Burghard, former burgess of Lynn, of his wife Alice, and of their daughter Margaret as well as all their other children. At which anniversary the mayor then in office should be present, if he is not prevented by a reasonable cause; if indeed he is unable to be present, he should assign some other reputable man in his place. In return for the holding of which anniversary in that way, Thomas de Kenynghale husband of the aforesaid Margaret, Geoffrey Tolbothe, Thomas Drewe junior, and Walter de Walsoken, executors of Margaret's testament, have granted and by their deed confirmed to John de Brunham and others named alongside him in the deed, to the use of the community, certain messuages and rents located at various places in Lynn. The community however is to pay out from the same each year, to Thomas de Kenynghale for his lifetime, £12.13s.4d in annual rents at the four principal terms of the year usual in Lynn (or within at most a week of the same) in equal portions, without any further delay; and also to the executors £10 a year, at the same times and in the same portions, for six years beginning at Michaelmas next, [to support] the celebration of two anniversaries for the souls mentioned above during that six-year period, in the charnel in the churchyard. And so that this grant be firm and stable and observed for all time, the mayor and community have promised and of their own free will have put up an obligation for the same for themselves and their successors in perpetuity. (Seek the aforementioned donation deed of the executors of Margaret Burghard [...] and the messuages and rents in which John de Brunham and the other feoffees [...] among the muniments – deeds and other memoranda – of the community). [Red Register, pp.141-42]

Sure enough, the grant of Burghard's estate to the borough, injecting an important new source of revenues into the borough treasury and propelling the borough into property management responsibilities, is still found among borough archives today (KL C50/Be575). The borough continued to uphold its reciprocal obligations to commemorate Burghard's death and, more important, help his souls with prayers for some time, as indicated by an ordinance reinforcing the obligation in 1424, along with other mentions in fifteenth century borough records. From this perspective, John Burghard would doubtless have considered his real estate acquisitions and his testamentary provisions a sound investment in his spiritual future.

NOTES

"tithes"

A one-tenth share of income (profits from commerce, labour, or agriculture) expected to be paid to the Church by laymen to support its religious activities. This payment was promoted by the Church as a divine law, and gradually enforced by secular law, in contrast to an "offering" which was theoretically voluntary.

"Stoke"

Possibly Stoke-on-Trent, but see below for the possibility of Stoke Ferry.

"Wretton" "West Dereham" "Southery" "Hilgay" "Wereham"

These villages all lay in much the same vicinity, roughly 12 to 15 miles south of Lynn. Another village part of this conglomeration was Stoke Ferry, making that a very probable place of the family's origins.

"Burton"

If Burton-on-Trent this would support the hypothesis that Stoke = Stoke-on-Trent. There is a Boughton and a Barton Bendish in the vicinity of West Dereham/Wretton/Stoke Ferry (although Boughton is in a separate but contemporary document rendered as Bukton).

"Setchey causeway"

The road, raised to pass through marshy land, approaching Lynn from the south.

"associate"

The implication here seems to be business partner; most partnerships were per venture, but socius is suggestive of something more long-term. However, given the small size of the bequest, Thomas de Derham's rare appearance in the records, and the fact that his assessment in the 1332 subsidy was below average (and his brother John's only average), possibly Thomas was only a factor of Burghard.

"Wootton"

Just north of Lynn.

"funeral clothing"

This may refer to the shroud, or perhaps include cloth draped over coffin or hearse when the corpse was taken to church; dressing the dead in finery was not unknown, but usually applied only to the rich or high-ranking.

"Ickleton"

The original refers to "Hikelington" and "Ikelyngton". While Hickleton in South Yorkshire is not out of the question, a more likely candidate is the Ickleton that lies a few miles south of Cambridge. A Benedictine nunnery was founded there in the late 12th century.

"acquired from Thomas Broun"

Burghard began by acquiring from Broun, in 1326, a rent of 10s. issuing from the property, which was part of a neighbourhood where butchers congregated (later to become a shambles). The following year he acquired the property itself, but leased it back to Broun in 1328, for life; in 1347 Broun's widow quitclaimed any rights in it to Geoffrey Burghard.

"Stonegate"

The street heading north, as far as St. Margaret's, from the bridge connecting Bishop's Lynn and South Lynn.

"Simon de Lexham"

Presumably a legal advisor, since the scribe of the document is separately rewarded later.

"bedroom"

The modern sense is too restrictive a translation of "camera" (chamber), since its purpose was not solely as a bedroom but as private living quarters in a broader sense. The bequest of this "room" in a house otherwise bequeathed to the testator's eldest son was to ensure that the widow continue to enjoy for life the private quarters and its furnishings to which she was accustomed.

"bread, cloth, shoes"

Charitable handouts to poor people attending the masses is likely what is meant.

"Simon de Byteryng"

A merchant and ship-owner who traded mainly in victuals. Probably somewhat younger than Burghard. There is no other evidence of any association with Burghard, although we do not know to whom he served an apprenticeship (the same is true of the other executors). He was later named an executor of Adam de Walsoken.

"Simon de Snoring"

A merchant, although his commercial activities have left little mark on the records. His career was only beginning to take off as Burghard's wound down. Again, no evidence of any other association with Burghard.

"Robert de Dockyng"

A mercer, a contemporary of Byteryng and Snoring (who was one of his executors), but less so of Burghard. The choice of younger men as executors would clearly have been prudent, given the time sometimes required to fulfill a testament and supervise ongoing provisions.

"Shouldham"

A village about half-way between Lynn and Stoke Ferry.

"West Acre and Pentney"

These are situated close to each other, a few miles east-south-east of Lynn.

"Flitcham, Massingham, Petirston and Beeston"

Flitcham, Massingham and Beeston all lie on a diagonal (north-west to south-east) line to the east of Lynn; based on that connection, "Petirston" may refer to Weasenham St. Peter, which lies just off that line.

"common goods"

I.e. the goods they shared as husband and wife.

"lord's official"

I.e. the bishop of Norwich's official delegated authority over spiritual matters, such as probate of wills, at Lynn.

"that portion"

I.e. any dower claim beyond the share allocated by her husband.

TRANSLATION

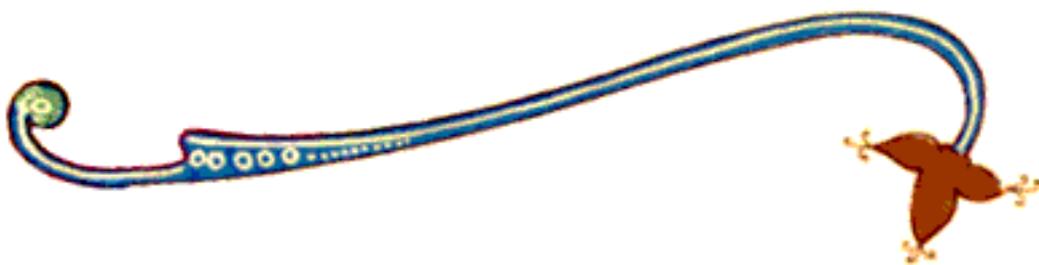

On 21 March 1477 it was ordained and agreed by the mayor and all the comburgesses of the whole borough that whenever and as often as any comburgess of the borough should happen to pass away or decease, then the mayor and all the comburgesses [should go] with the corpse from the house where the death occurred as far as the church where the burial is to take place and there make an offering; and that they act in the same manner at the trental. If it is a comburgess such as who has, in times past, been tasked with the burden of the mayoralty, then all the comburgesses shall act in the same manner both for the initial and for the secondary funeral services, under penalty of sixpence [fine] for whoever defaults or does the contrary, as often as that may happen.

DISCUSSION

The growing consciousness of urban government as a perpetual institution, increasingly recognized so before the law and through grants of incorporation, encouraged townsmen to ensure the maintenance of their anniversary services by assigning some of the responsibility to local government. This might be by way of assigning revenues allocated for chantry support to the management of that government, or by giving local officials a vested interest by paying them for attendance at and supervision of the anniversary. Local government was thereby drawn into the regulation of certain aspects of funerals and commemorative services; ordinances from Lynn and Henley provide examples of this.

In the case above, the Reading authorities were looking after their own, for we may reasonably suspect that "comburgesses" here is not being used in its literal sense of "fellow townsmen" but in its technical sense referring to those acting as a town council (possibly equivalent to members of the Guild of Reading). This was a question of mutual support of the sort that socio-religious guilds had long provided for their members. It was also a question of a public display of political solidarity, perhaps – although not necessarily – in the context of a political battle with the abbey and its supporters.

NOTES

"trental"

Also known as "month's mind", this was a service held thirty days after the funeral.

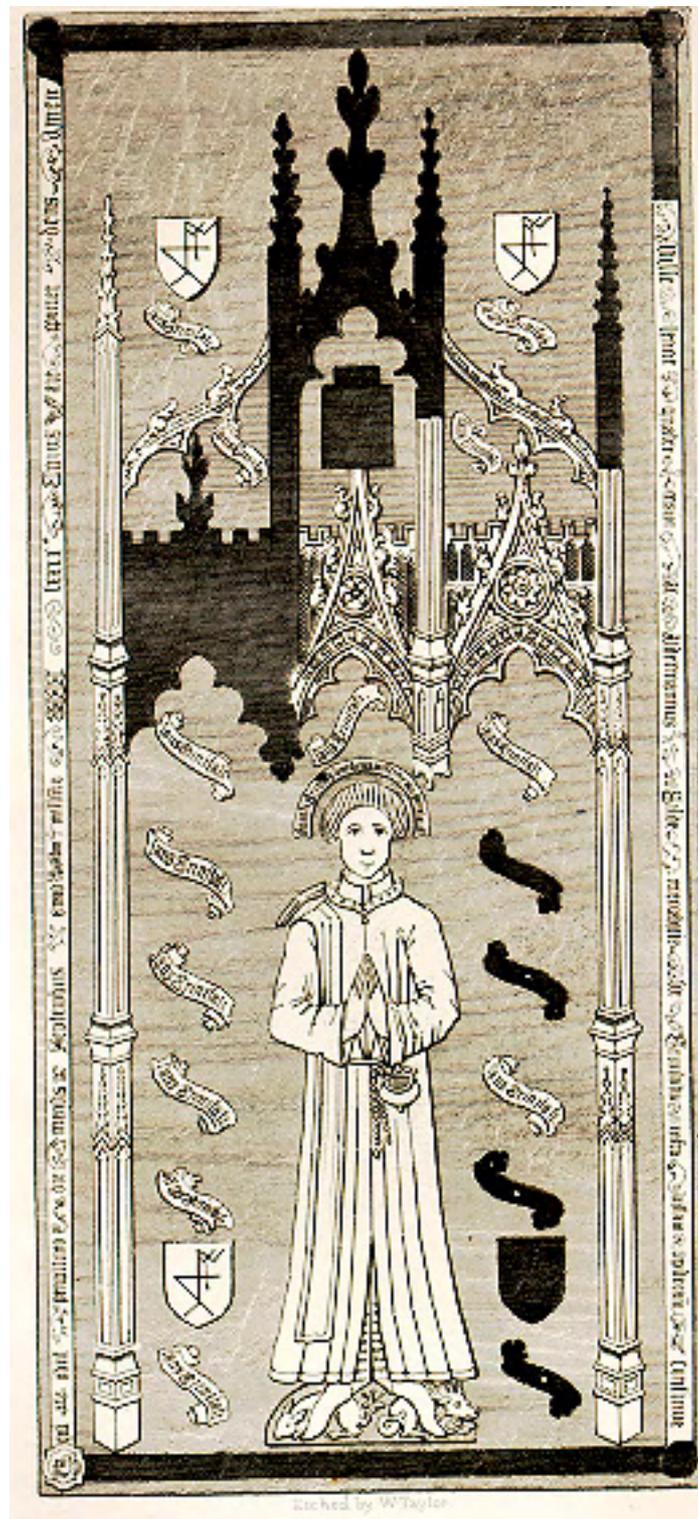

"secondary funeral services"

I.e. commemorative services held at intervals after the funeral.

26. King's Lynn, St. Margaret's, north aisle of choir (Trinity Chapel), monumental brass of Walter Coney, 1476, four times mayor of Lynn. Motto Laus Trinitati (Praise to the Trinity) on scrolls and Coney's merchant's mark on shield (the commoner's substitute for heraldic charge). Coney was a prominent member of the Trinity Guild. Largely destroyed, known from rubbing. After William Taylor, The Antiquities of King's Lynn (London, 1844).

Medieval and Renaissance Political Thinkers and their Works

Primary Thinkers:

Gratian, 12th century; Decretum Gratiani 1140.

Gratian taught Church Law at the University of Bologna around the middle of the 12th century. He compiled Church laws ('canons') from all available sources and called the collection Concordia Discordantium Canonum (the harmonizing of discordant canons). The collection became known as the Decretum Gratiani. The Decretum addresses the problem of an errant pope at D.40 c.6.

Later additions were made by St. Raymond of Pennafort and promulgated by Pope Gregory IX in 1234 as the Liber Extravagantium (so called because it was outside the Decretum). Other collections were issued by Boniface VIII in 1298 and John XXII in 1317. In 1500, canonist John Chapuis edited the previous collections and added to them subsequent papal decretals. These works together are what came to be called the Corpus Iuris Canonici, or Body of Canon Law.

Huguccio (Hugh of Pisa), ?-1210; Summa Decretorum (Commentary on Gratian) (1188-90)

He studied at Bologna, possibly under Gandolphus, and taught canon law, perhaps in the monastery of SS. Nabore e Felice. In 1190 he became Bishop of Ferrara. Teacher of Lothario de' Conti, afterwards Innocent III. His Summa observes that a Pope was not answerable to the Church, "unless found to be in heresy." This is an early example of conciliarism, the right of a council to rein in a deviant Pope.

Also wrote "Liber derivationum", on etymologies.

Bernard of Clairvaux, 1090-1153; Letter to Pope Eugenius III

Born of aristocratic family and well educated, he entered a strict monastery at Citeaux, with noble friends. In 1114 he was sent to found new house at Clairvaux. He wanted to extend monastic ideal to the entire church, including Popes and Kings. Accused Abelard of Heresy; rebuked emperor Lothair over his support of Anti-pope Antecletus, and spoke in favor of a second Crusade.

The Letter to Pope Eugenius III was written either 1146 to describe the Second Crusade, or c. 1150 to urge another expedition. Bernard advocates the "Two Swords" to justify the Pope's temporal as well as spiritual power. Bernard cited Luke 22.36-8, where, after his meal, Jesus urges the apostles to buy swords. In the Garden of Gethsemane Peter drew his sword, but Jesus told him to sheath it, thus the apostles had swords but could not shed blood with them.

John of Salisbury: c. 1120-1180. Metalogicon; Policraticus (both completed 1159)

Studied at Paris in the 1130's-40's with Peter Abelard, William of Thierry, William of Conches. 1148, in service to Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury. 1154 Chancellor to King Henry II. In 1161, with the death of Theobald and appointment of Becket, John went into service to Becket, and followed Becket in exile. In 1176

John became Bishop of Chartres.

Metalogicon is a discussion of pedagogy and the state of learning. Man can attain the product of political association only in context with a refinement of intellectual and rational skills. John here is consistent with Cicero.

Policraticus: Of the Frivolity of Courtiers and the Footprints of Philosophers: the first complete work of medieval political philosophy? Stresses the need for the king's moral instruction and wise advisors. Uses a metaphor of body politic to human body: soul (priests), head (king), and body (counsels to peasants). King can be replaced and, if necessary, killed, if he transgresses his proper limits.

Ranulf of Glanville: c.1125-1190; A Treatise on the Laws and Customs of the Kingdom of England Commonly called Glanville (authorship disputed) (c. 1189)

Roman law was easily adopted by the Church, given their common historical roots, their hierarchical organizations and their stress on an imposed power. But feudal customs were less adaptable to Roman Law. This treatise, written in the court of Henry II, tries to reconcile Roman Law with feudal customs. Common law derived from customs is law, according to this treatise, but this is maintained through legislation and kingship that is Roman in conception.

Brunetto Latini, c. 1220-1294; The Book of Treasure

A Florentine, Latini was exiled to France 1260-66. Livre du Tresor steps through theoretical philosophy, ethics, and rhetoric and politics. A contractarian understanding of the obligations between rulers and ruled, and practical means to implement and enforce this. His politics rightly includes all the arts needed in the human community, yet he limits himself to matters concerning the king and his office. This is an early understanding that social matters should be differentiated from matters of government.

Thomas Aquinas, 1225-1274; On Kingship; Summa Theologiae; Commentary on Aristotle's Politics

Educated at the Abbey of Monte Cassino, then at the University of Naples, he continued his education at the Universities of Paris and Cologne. His works cannot be summarized here except to indicate that he is the foremost thinker to attempt to reconcile Aristotle with Church doctrine.

Giles (Aegidius) of Rome (Egidius Colonna), 1247-1316; On Civil Government (de Regimine principum)

Augustinian; studied in Paris under Aquinas, given a chair at Paris, tutored Philip the Fair, son of Philip III of France. On Civil Government was written at request of the King; it aims to deal with everything a King needs to rule well: education, courtly life, political theories. This shows a strong Aristotelian influence, as Aristotle's Politics first appeared in translation in the 1260's. For instance, the tyrant rules for his own good, and the king for the good of the community. He reflects a generally pro-monarchy, pro-papal stance, although he speaks of a "natural state" in which there was no property, only claims.

Ptolemy of Lucca, ?-1327; De Regimine Principum.

This was attached to manuscripts of Thomas Aquinas, his teacher. Ptolemy was Bishop of Torcello in 1318. He writes that Republicanism is best where the spirit of the people is strong and freedom is valued.

John of Paris, c. 1250-1306; On the Regal and Papal Power (1302-03)

One of the most prominent scholars in Paris at end of 13th century; wrote a defense of Aquinas against Franciscan critics in 1285. He wrote many other works, dealing with philosophy and theology. Why did he write on politics? After 1296, Philip IV the fair was in controversy with Boniface VIII over a king's right to tax church property. Like most French clerics, the Dominican John of Paris urged Philip to bring Boniface to trial.

On the Regal and Papal Power makes what may be an early statement of property rights. John argues that church officials may be concerned with material property, thus arguing against radical ascetics; on the other hand, the Pope is not an earthly ruler. Ultimately John claims that use and ownership cannot be divided, and that a peasant's use of his land means his ownership of it. This is true even if Kingly and Papal officials have jurisdiction over it. In terms of Papal authority over the Church, John maintains a distinction between the man and the office. This means that the pope is both the highest authority and answerable to the body of the Church.

Joannus Monarchus, ?-1313; Glossa Aurea Supra Sexto Decretium Libro

A prominent canonist; advisor to Philip the Fair, and made a Cardinal by Celestine V. He supported a definite position for the cardinals in relation to the Pope by using standard corporation theory: “The Pope relates to the college of Cardinals as any bishop in respect of his college [of canons].” Consequently, the Papal authority is limited in the sense that a wise Pope will consult with the Cardinals in order to make his pronouncements legally binding.

Guilielmus Durantis (William Durant), ?-1330; Tractatus de Modo Generalis Concilii Celebrandi

A French Bishop, he saw Papal authority as limited not by the cardinals but rather by the local churches. The Pope was a Bishop with a relationship to his cathedral chapter, and was constrained by Canonical legislation (unless approved by a Church council). He invoked as his theme the well-known quod omnes tangit ab omnibus approbetur—“what touches all must be approved by all.” His arguments were based solely on texts from the Decretum.

Marsilius of Padua, 1275-1342; The Defender of the Peace (1324)

His early training was in medicine at Padua under Peter d’Abano. He brought training in observational biology and dialectics to University of Paris, where he was rector in 1313. The Defender of the Peace (1324) was published anonymously; in 1326 authorship became known and Marsilius fled to Paris and the protection of the Bavarian Emperor Ludwig. Ludwig was in controversy with papacy over the Pope’s unwillingness to recognize his position as Emperor. Marsilius may have been involved in the King’s 1327 march over the Alps into Italy and his coronation by the Roman people. Marsilius became the Emperor’s “Spiritual Vicar” of Rome. Ludwig forced out of Rome in 1329; Marsilius remained at his court.

Structurally, there are 3 parts to the treatise. The first deals with kingly power; the second with powers of papacy and priesthood; the third is a summary. This is a strong differentiation between political and ecclesiastical powers. Papal attempts to regulate temporal affairs are seen as disruptive; the discourse is in favor of a conciliar rather than authoritarian form of church governance.

William of Pagula, c.1290-1332; The Mirror of King Edward III

William was a parish priest who also earned a doctorate in Canon Law (1320).

The Mirror of King Edward III is two texts, the first of 1311 and the second probably of 1312 is a revision. William argues against purveyance, the means by which the King taxed the peasantry outside of normal channels, either by outright confiscation or buying at fixed non-negotiable rates. The affects of this on the peasants were terrible, and William defends them by claiming that the most humble of the King’s subjects deserves his protections.

Other works include Also The Eye of the Priesthood, a canon law and theological guide for parish priests; and The Summary of Summaries, a more academic treatment of these issues.

William of Ockham, c. 1285-1349; Whether a Ruler can Accept the Property of the Churches for his Own Needs, Namely in case of War, even against the Wishes of the Pope (1338)

Born in Ockham, Surrey, early education probably Oxford; Subdeacon of St. Mary’s, Southwark (1306). 1310-1324 Oxford, called “Venerable Inceptor.” Indicted at Avignon in 1324 under influence of Chancellor of Oxford John Lutterell; 1324-28 under house arrest in Avignon. With other Franciscans (persecuted for “spiritualism”) he escaped to court of Ludwig of Bavaria. William spent rest of life defending the Franciscan ideal of apostolic poverty and the Imperial aims of Ludwig.

Whether a Ruler can Accept . . . is his first political work. In 1337 Edward III and Ludwig allied, albeit briefly. William defended Edward’s right to tax the peasantry and denied the Pope’s right to interfere. Therefore William attacked the Pope’s claim to a “plenitude of power,” dominion over the offices and property of the laity.

His further political works are based on Whether a Ruler can Accept . . . these include Dialogue (1339-41); Short treatise on Tyrannical Government (1341); the Eight Questions on the Power of the Pope (c. 1341), and On Imperial and Pontifical Power (1346-47).

John Wyclif, 1330-1383; On Civil Lordship (1374-5); On the Duty of the King (1378-9), treatises within his Summary of Theology

From Yorkshire, Oxford educated, supported by absentee clerical offices (a common practice). John's theological writings were controversial, but he was never condemned, maybe due to connections to Royal family, esp. John of Gaunt son of Edward III. Wyclif withdrew from Oxford in 1381 right before a purge of his followers.

Wyclif claims that civil lordship, over material goods, belongs properly to those who avoid sin. He distinguishes natural lordship, meaning factual possession of goods, from evangelical lordship, which provides a right to those goods through grace. He advocates minimal law, claiming that divine law in scripture is sufficient for government, and defends monarchy. He wants to place priests under royal direction without subordinating the Church to secular power.

Pierre d'Ailly, 1350?-1420?; On the Sentences of Peter Lombard.

French Conciliarist who represented French interests at the Councils of Pisa (1409) and Constance (1414-18). Developed his views at the time of the Great Schism, while a student in Paris in 1379. Chancellor of University of Paris 1389-95; Bishop, and then Cardinal in 1411 (under John XXII). Urged a via cessionis position to end the Schism (both Popes would resign, and the Cardinals would choose again. This contrasted with via concilis, in which a Council would select a Pope from the two existing Popes). He maintained that the authority of Bishops and Priests came from Christ, not the Pope, and that the Pope's authority was thereby limited and subject to Council review. He used corporation theory to argue from administration over relations between Pope and Council. Although there is a notion of "consent" in his thought, this must not be taken too far; consent meant passive acceptance not active approval. The people had no more right to withhold their consent than the ruler could default on his authority.

His Sentences served to advance Nominalism at the University of Paris.

Jean Gerson, 1363-1429.

Student of d'Ailly at Paris. A dominant conciliarist at Council of Constance (1414-18). He expressed his view in theological rather than legal / political terms. He rejected Ockham's view that the Church could exist in a single person; Gerson saw its priests and its hierarchy as essential to it (only the Holy Spirit could change that hierarchy). He wrote numerous tracts on the role of the Councils.

Franciscus Zabarella, 1360-1429; Tractatus de Schismate (1403-08).

He made the most scholarly and sustained efforts to solve the Schism as a conciliarist. He studied jurisprudence at Bologna (1378-83) chiefly under the famous Giovanni di Lignano, and at Florence, where he was graduated in 1385. He taught canon law at Florence (1385-90) and at Padua (1390-1410). Councilor of Venetian legate at the Council of Pisa in 1409; Bishop of Florence in 1410. He opted for a legal solution to the Schism, drawing on John of Paris and corporation theory.

"The statement that a Pope has a plenitude of power should not be understood to mean that he alone possesses it, but that he has it in virtue of being head of a corporation (universitas) such that this power resides fundamentally in the corporation, and in the pope as its first minister through whom the power is expressed" (Commentaria 109va).

Christine de Pizan, c. 1365-1430; The Book of the Body Politic

Born in Venice; daughter of doctor and astrologer. Father trained at University of Bologna, and appointed to court of Charles V of France. Wrote poetry, warfare, politics, chivalry, and works for women.

The Book of the Body Politic uses a metaphor from John of Salisbury's Policraticus. This is an organizing principle, but possibly also a warning to the prince that the people will revolt if he does not rule well. The organization follows the three estates in France: the Prince, the Nobles, and the Commons (including the clergy, merchants and students).

Bartolus of Sassoferrato, 1314-1357; Treatise on City Government

Bartolus is a legal realist of the Italian Renaissance; he argues that the original government of Rome developed from the people, and that actual conditions must set the terms for law. The law must reflect those conditions. In fact there are now multiple polities in Italy, and they are not under a single rule. There is no single hierarchy of rule in the world. From this de facto position he develops de iure justifications for the independence of the Italian city-states. Custom and popular assent are necessary to considering the legitimacy of a regime.

Baldus de Ubaldus, 1326?-1400

Baldus taught and practiced law in Perugia, Pisa, Florence, Padua and Pavia. A student of Bartolus, he was a legal practitioner and not primarily a theorist. His legal opinions may have totaled some 7 million words, making him the most prolific jurist of his time. A legal realist, he stressed the need to apply law to real situations.

The real independence of the Italian city-states is not over-ridden by the theoretical claims of law. The de iure jurisdictions of Pope and Emperor must be distinguished from de facto conditions in various states. To resolve this, Baldus (like many legal scholars) distinguished absolute powers from ordinary powers (potestas absoluta et potestas ordinaria); the Emperor allows local conditions to continue by using only his ordinary powers. If the Emperor were here his approval would be needed; but, he is not here.

The Emperor holds power from via selection by the people. (1) the people are sovereign under God; (2) the people transfer power to the emperor; (3) Christ confirms this through “render unto Caesar; (4) the Pope crowns the Emperor to complete the process. (This sophisticated idea of a corporate juristic populus could be expanded into a theory of popular sovereignty.)

Coluccio Salutati, 1331-1406

Elder Statesman of the 15th century Florentine Humanists. Trained in Rhetoric at Bologna, under Pietro de Muglio. Praised Petrarch’s rediscovery of classical thinkers, and praised republican government. He equated liberty and independence with participatory self-government without foreign intervention. Citizens needed to participate in government and in military defense. He saw Florence as founded by the republican Sulla, not the tyrant Caesar.

His later A Treatise on Tyrants (c. 1400) supported a single ruler, and praised Caesar.

Leonardo Bruni (Aretino), 1369-1444; History of Florence

Follower of Salutati. Trained in rhetoric in Florence in the 1390’s. Secretary to the Papal Curia in 1406; returned to Florence as Chancellor in 1416. Praised the life of action, not contemplation; saw republican government as allowing men to rise to honor. (A return to the life of contemplation occurs after the collapse of Florence’s republican republic in the 1480’s; as Marsilio Ficino and Pico della Mirandola.)

He made the treasures of the Hellenic world accessible by translating into Latin Greek authors such as Aristotle, Plato, Plutarch, Demosthenes, and Aeschines.

Pier Paolo Vergerio

Follower of Salutati. Wrote a letter to the Chancellor of Venice in 1394 praising the city’s mixed constitution.

Poggio Braccidini, 1380-1459

Follower of Salutati.

Nicholas of Cusa (Cusanus), 1401-; de Concordatia Catholica (On the Harmony of the Church) (1433).

Prominent at the Council of Basle, 1432. Trained in Canon law at Padua. Argued philosophically from Neoplatonic premises in favor of a hierarchy in reality (of which the Church was a major part) and in rationality in natural law. Consent is therefore a sign and expression of reason in human affairs. He laid out legal guidelines for convening a Council and for the authority of the Pope. He saw the Church as a hierarchy with the General Council at its head and the Pope as an administrator.

Aeneas Silvius Piccolomini, 1405-68; De Ortu et Autoritate Imperii Romani (1446), (Pope Pius II in 1458)

Spoke of humans coming together out of a pre-political stage; from rational decision after living like beasts (De Orto 1.391).

Francisco Patrizi, 1413-1492; De Institutione Reipublicae (On the Institutions of the Republic) 1460's.

Part of the republican revival in Florence after the Peace of Lodi (1454) formalized the triumph of the princes over the republic.

Alamanno Rinucci Dialogus de Libertate (Dialogue on Liberty) 1470's.

Part of the republican revival in Florence after the Peace of Lodi (1454) formalized the triumph of the princes over the republic.

Donato Acciavoli Wrote Commentaries to Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics and Politics

Part of the republican revival in Florence after the Peace of Lodi (1454) formalized the triumph of the princes over the republic.

Girolamo Savonarola, 1452-1498; Treatise on the Regime and Government of the City of Florence

Savonarola was a Dominican preacher who reformed the Dominican order and proposed turning Florence into a Christian Commonwealth. He condemned Pope Alexander VI, was excommunicated and tried for heresy, and was hung and burned.

Savonarola followed the ideas of Ptolemy, Bartolus and Baldus. After the 1494 French Invasion, coup and flight of the Medici from Florence he opposed the party of the Medici, who gathered power and advocated their return. Theoretically he taught that Monarchy is not proper for Florence; citizen councils with properly delegated powers are best. His theory is based on popular sovereignty. He is both a figure associated with protecting the Florentine Republic in the face of the growing power of princes, and a religious reformer.

Tomasso de Vio (Cardinal Cajetan), 1468-1534; Commentary on the Summa Theologia of Thomas Aquinas and On the Authority of Pope and Council.

An Italian Dominican, educated at taught at Rome. A major figure in the revival of Thomism in the late 15th and early 16th centuries. Under natural law, the people choose their rulers; the people are part of the causal process that begins with God. Domingo de Soto (1495-1560), his pupil, followed him in claiming that the people have a right to choose their leaders. The people, therefore, can depose a tyrant.

Alonso de Castrillo, Treatise on the Republic (1521).

A Spanish political writer, his Treatise examined how modern political societies come into being. He is Augustinian in that he sees society as arising from man's originally sinful condition, but is Aristotelian in that he sees a reference to natural law as necessary for society. "Society" is natural, but "political society" was a reasonable rather than a natural condition for mankind. Man must obey the monarch in order to avoid greater evils.

Juan Luis Vives, 1492-1540; De Concordia et Discordia in Humano Genere (On Harmony and Disharmony in Human Generation) (1529).

Great Spanish Humanist, following Erasmus. Agrees with Castrillo in that political societies were responses to sin. Original societies were natural, but not polities.

Francisco de Vitoria, 1483-1546;

From Burgos, Spain; a Dominican, studied at Paris; back to Spain in 1523. For Vitorio, natural law was the reason humans formed political societies; this differed from humanists, who focused on convention (agreement) and not nature. At root, all humanists stressed reason as the basis of political societies.

Lorenzo Valla, 1405-1507; Elegantia litinae linguae libri sex (The Elegance of the Latin Language in Six Books).

He stressed active reinterpretations of Classical texts and Christian scriptures using methods that rejected the scholastic "commentary" approach. He taught at Pavia (which he was forced to leave), Genoa, Milan, Rome and Naples.

His Treatise of Lorenzo Valla on the Donation of Constantine showed the donation to be a forgery. (This was claimed to be a Donation, by the Emperor Constantine, of the Vatican to the Pope. This was the historical basis for the Pope's claim to political rule of the Papal States. The so-called "Donation of Pepin," Charlemagne's father, re-established the claim and the emperor's role in defending the Pope.)

Ulrich von Hutten, 1488-1523

Printed Valla's Donation in an edition that influenced Luther.

Andrea Alciato, 1492-1550; De verborum significatione (On the Signification of Words) united philology with ancient law.

A practicing jurists who followed Valla. He was Professor at Avignon from 1518, and at Bourges from 1527; from 1534 to 1550 he taught at Pavia, Bologna, Ferrara and Pavia. He brought new methods of textual analysis into the northern areas. Rather than developing scholastic commentaries, this method stressed active engagement with the text, and clear understanding of historical setting and context.

Guillaume Bude/, 1467-1540; Annotationes in Pandecta 1508

A polemic on scholastic interpretations, used Valla's and Alciato's textual methods in the north.

Mario Salamonio, 1450?-1532; Patrii Romani de Principatu Libri Septem 1544

After the 1512-1514 crisis and the first return of the Medici, Salamonio considered that the wealth of the Florentines and their military weakness invited attack, a position repeated by Machiavelli and Guicciardini. Effective political institutions should be based on the whole body of citizens: "The imperium of the Roman people with no princeps or true overlord in Rome, but only a minister of the people."

Niccolo Machiavelli, 1469-1527; The Prince; Discourses on Livy; The Art of War; Florentine History

A seminal figure who cannot be summarized here. A major innovation is his explicit contrast between Christian virtues (e.g., humility, Agnegation, contempt for the mundane) versus Roman virtues (magnanimity, strength, boldness). The Prince needs the latter.

The Prince completed 1513; dedicated in 1515 to Lorenzo the Magnificent. Offers the ruler advice and non-Christian virtues.

Discourses on Livy: 1519. Concerned with regaining republican ideals

Francesco Guicciardini, 1483-1540; History of Italy

Loyal to the Medici, to whom he was cemented by marriage. Lawyer, diplomat, general. His Storia d'Italia covers the period from the death of Lorenzo de'Medici in 1492 to that of Pope Clement VII in 1534, including the sack of Rome in 1527, which he was unable to prevent.

Donato Giannotti Libro della repubblica de Viniziani (Book on the Republic of Venice) 1540.

After the turn to princely rule in Florence, Venice continued to hold onto republican government. Giannotti admired Venice.

He returned to Florence from Venice in 1527, during the second expulsion of the Medicis. Organized civilian militias to oppose the Medici return 1529-1530.

Gasparo Contarini, 1483-1542; The Commonwealth and Government of Venice 1543.

Praised the republican government of Venice after the final fall of the republic in Florence.

Desiderius Erasmus, 1466-1536; The Complaint of Peace

Dutch humanist. His position in relation to the Church is beyond description here. His Complaint rejected coercion to defend political society, including "Just War" theories going back to Augustine. This rejection of military power is an important difference between Italian and Northern Renaissance thinkers.

Thomas More, 1478-1535; Utopia

Belongs to the “Northern Renaissance,” if this is defined as being north of the Alps including the Iberian Peninsula. Life-long friend of Erasmus. 1503 Member of Parliament; 1529 Lord Chancellor. Beheaded for his opposition to Henry VIII’s marriage to Anne Boleyn, and for refusal to recognize Henry as head of the Anglican Church.

John Major, 1467-1500.

A Scot, educated at University of Paris; taught at Glasgow, Paris and St. Andrews. Renown scholastic theologian at Paris. Historian of Great Britain; teacher of Scottish Humanism. He thought it impossible that an errant Pope was not subject to judgment and even deposition by his subjects. Like a king, the Pope is rex singulis major; universo minor (king is superior to any individual in his kingdom, but is inferior to the citizenry as a whole).

Jacques Almain, c.1480-1515; Tractatus de Auctoritate Ecclesiae et Conciliorum Generalium (1512).

Student and colleague of Major at Paris, and at Navarre. A conciliarist, his Treatise was a response to the Dominican Cajetan’s support of Julius II’s repudiation of the Council of Pisa in 1511. (The French Louis XII and the Emperor Maximilian has called the Council to bring pressure against Julius due to the Pope’s claims on northern Italy.) Like Major, he upheld a theory of ecclesiastical polity. Like Major, he thought the Church a monarchy, but of a kind where the monarch is not superior to the citizenry as a whole, only to any one individual in it.

Martin Luther, 1483-1546.

Cannot be summarized here; one political point to be made. Luther is Pauline in that he maintained that the people have a duty to obey the prince. The people, he maintained early, have no right to revolt; his Secular Authority: to What Extent it Should be Obeyed(1523) sets out his basic doctrine of two parallel (not hierarchical) spheres of authority, each of which must be obeyed as that sphere demands. Disobedience is sinful. If a tyrant demands that subjects act in non-Christian ways, they must disobey, and then humbly accept the consequences. Active revolt is always wrong, since tyranny is always a providential response to sin. Against the Robbing and Murdering Horde of Peasants (1524) was a response to such the Peasant’s Revolt in Germany. He opposed radical protestants who wanted such revolts, probably on theological grounds. In 1523 his Secular Authority maintained that a prince could not oppose an attack by the Emperor, although he could oppose another prince.

His answer of 1530 to his princely protector, who feared an anti-Lutheran attack by the Emperor, was not a serious reversal of his position. He rejected any opposition to the Emperor if based on his Imperial oath of office, or natural law, or pending appeal to a church council. But, 7 months later, the Augsburg Diet rejected the Augsburg Confession of Melanchthon and demanded that Lutherans return to unity with Rome. Philip of Hesse, esp. his Chancellor Gregory Brueck, drew a position that maintained that each prince received his authority from God and had a duty to protect his subjects. In October 1530 Luther followed this by signing the Torgau Declaration, from a meeting of Protestant Theologians at Torgau Castle Oct. 25-28. They renounced any scriptural or theological opposition to that which seemed to have legal justification. By 1536 the Natural Law doctrine of Melanchthon was accepted by Luther, and in 1539 he accepted armed resistance based on the Emperor’s position as an agent of the Pope. (See A P Monahan 208 f. for this interpretation.)

Philip Melanchthon, 1497-1560. The Augsburg Confession (1530)

Collaborator with Luther. Taught in Wittenberg for 42 years. The Confession (Confessio Augustana) tried to show that Protestants had the right to remain in the Catholic Church.

John Calvin, 1509-1564. Institution of the Christian religion.

Cannot be summarized here. His theocracy in Geneva was a full-sale implementation of Protestant political ideas. By combining the idea that people should be loyal to legitimate rulers, and then basing legitimacy on his interpretation of the scriptures, he becomes fully as theocratic as any Catholic theocrat.

His doctrine of conscience is how a person grasps the general tenets of natural law.

George Buchanan, 1506-82; De Iuri Regni apud Scotos (On the Powers of the Crown of Scotland) (1579).

A Scottish student of Major in Paris. Adopted Scottish Reformed religion in 1560. Returned to Scotland in 1560. De Iuri is reasonably systematic, and justified the deposition of Mary Queen of Scots. Also wrote a History of Scotland.

He stated that the Pauline injunction to obey the ruler did not apply to tyrants; this may have disagreed with early Lutheran teachings (but agreed with Luther post-1530). Rulers are chosen by popular election, and rule for the common good.

John Ponet, 1514-1556; Short Treatise of Politic Power (1556).

His Treatise may be the first complete doctrine of resistance by a Protestant on other than purely religious grounds.

Juan de Marina, 1534-; De Rege et Regis Institutione (1599).

Spanish neo-Scholastic; Jesuit; taught in Paris and Rome. Infamous for a doctrine of tyrannicide, which followed from the assassination of Henry III by a radical French Dominican, Jacques Clement, in 1589. His works burned in Paris in 1610 by order of the Parlement. On tyrannicide see also De Tyrannia by Bartolus of Sassoferrato, and the Tractatus de Tyranno of Coluccio Salutati.

He also distinguished between contracts by which people bring a government into being, and those by which people agree to follow a particular leader.

Francesco Suarez, 1548-1617; On Laws (1612); Defense of the Catholic Faith (1612).

Spanish neo-Scholastic; Jesuit; Counter-reformation figure. Generally Thomistic in approach to law. Placed important emphasis on custom as unwritten law. Also, by basing property on the original reasoned contract to form a political society and the consent of the people he stressed the role of free will. The people's obligation to obey followed the legitimacy of the office, and tyranny absolved the people of that responsibility.

Prooemium

[37744] I^a-II^ae q. 98 pr.

Consequenter considerandum est de lege veteri. Et primo, de ipsa lege; secundo, de praeceptis eius. Circa primum quaeruntur sex. Primo, utrum lex vetus sit bona. Secundo, utrum sit a Deo. Tertio, utrum sit ab eo mediantibus Angelis. Quarto, utrum data sit omnibus. Quinto, utrum omnes obliget. Sexto, utrum congruo tempore fuerit data.

Articulus 1

[37745] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 1 arg. 1

Ad primum sic proceditur. Videtur quod lex vetus non fuerit bona. Dicitur enim Ezech. XX dedi eis praecepta non bona, et iudicia in quibus non vivent. Sed lex non dicitur bona nisi propter bonitatem praeceptorum quae continet. Ergo lex vetus non fuit bona.

[37746] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 1 arg. 2

Praeterea, ad bonitatem legis pertinet ut communi saluti proficiat sicut Isidorus dicit. Sed lex vetus non fuit salutifera, sed magis mortifera et nociva. Dicit enim apostolus, Rom. VII, sine lege peccatum mortuum erat. Ego autem vivebam sine lege aliquando, sed cum venisset mandatum, peccatum revixit, ego autem mortuus sum; et Rom. V, lex subintravit ut abundaret delictum. Ergo lex vetus non fuit bona.

[37747] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 1 arg. 3

Praeterea, ad bonitatem legis pertinet quod sit possibilis ad observandum et secundum naturam, et secundum humanam consuetudinem. Sed hoc non habuit lex vetus, dicit enim Petrus, Act. XV, quid tentatis imponere iugum super cervicem discipulorum, quod neque nos, neque patres nostri, portare potuimus? Ergo videtur quod lex vetus non fuerit bona.

[37748] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 1 s. c.

Sed contra est quod apostolus dicit, Rom. VII, itaque lex quidem sancta est, et mandatum sanctum et iustum et bonum.

[37749] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 1 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod absque omni dubio lex vetus bona fuit. Sicut enim doctrina ostenditur esse vera ex hoc quod consonat rationi rectae, ita etiam lex aliqua ostenditur esse bona ex eo quod consonat rationi. Lex autem vetus rationi consonabat. Quia concupiscentiam reprimebat, quae rationi adversatur; ut patet in illo mandato, non concupisces rem proximi tui, quod ponitur Exod. XX. Ipsa etiam omnia peccata prohibebat, quae sunt contra rationem. Unde manifestum est quod bona erat. Et haec est ratio apostoli, Rom. VII, condelector, inquit, legi Dei secundum interiorem hominem; et iterum, consentio legi, quoniam bona est. Sed notandum est quod bonum diversos gradus habet, ut Dionysius dicit, IV cap. de Div. Nom., est enim aliquod bonum perfectum, et aliquod bonum imperfectum. Perfecta quidem bonitas est, in his quae ad finem ordinantur, quando aliquid est tale quod per se sufficiens est inducere ad finem, imperfectum autem bonum est quod operatur aliquid ad hoc quod perveniatur ad finem, non tamen sufficit ad hoc quod ad finem perducat. Sicut medicina perfecte bona est quae hominem sanat, imperfecta autem est quae hominem adiuvat, sed tamen sanare non potest. Est autem sciendum quod est alius finis legis humanae, et alius legis divinae. Legis enim humanae finis est temporalis tranquillitas civitatis, ad quem finem pervenit lex cohibendo exteriores actus, quantum ad illa mala quae possunt perturbare pacificum statum civitatis. Finis autem legis divinae est perducere hominem ad finem felicitatis aeternae; qui quidem finis impeditur per quodcumque peccatum, et non solum per actus exteriores, sed etiam per interiores. Et ideo illud quod sufficit ad perfectionem legis humanae, ut scilicet peccata prohibeat et poenam apponat, non sufficit ad perfectionem legis divinae, sed oportet quod hominem totaliter faciat idoneum ad participationem felicitatis aeternae. Quod quidem fieri non potest nisi per gratiam spiritus sancti, per quam diffunditur caritas in cordibus nostris, quae legem adimplet, gratia enim Dei vita aeterna, ut dicitur Rom. VI. Hanc autem gratiam lex vetus conferre non potuit, reservabatur enim hoc Christo, quia, ut dicitur Ioan. I, lex per Moysen data est; gratia et veritas per Iesum Christum facta est. Et inde est quod lex vetus bona quidem est, sed imperfecta; secundum illud Heb. VII, nihil ad perfectum adduxit lex.

[37750] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 1 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod dominus loquitur ibi de praeceptis caeremonialibus; quae quidem dicuntur non bona, quia gratiam non conferebant, per quam homines a peccato mundarentur, cum tamen per huiusmodi se peccatores ostenderent. Unde signanter dicitur, et iudicia in quibus non vivent, idest per quae vitam gratiae obtinere non possunt; et postea subditur, et pollui eos in muneribus suis, idest pollutos ostendi, cum offerrent omne quod aperit vulvam, propter delicta sua.

[37751] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 1 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod lex dicitur occidisse, non quidem effective, sed occasionaliter, ex sua imperfectione, inquantum scilicet gratiam non conferebat, per quam homines implere possent quod mandabat, vel vitare quod vetabat. Et sic occasio ista non erat data, sed sumpta ab hominibus. Unde et apostolus ibidem dicit, occasione accepta peccatum per mandatum seduxit me, et per illud occidit. Et ex hac etiam ratione dicitur quod lex subintravit ut abundaret delictum, ut ly ut teneatur consecutive, non causaliter, inquantum scilicet homines, accipientes occasionem a lege, abundantius peccaverunt; tum quia gravius fuit peccatum post legis prohibitionem; tum etiam quia concupiscentia crevit, magis enim concupiscimus quod nobis prohibetur.

[37752] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 1 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod iugum legis servari non poterat sine gratia adiuvante, quam lex non dabat, dicitur enim Rom. IX, non est volentis neque currentis, scilicet velle et currere in praeceptis Dei, sed miserentis Dei. Unde et in Psalmo CXVIII dicitur, viam mandatorum tuorum cucurri, cum dilatasti cor meum, scilicet per donum gratiae et caritatis.

Articulus 2

[37753] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 2 arg. 1

Ad secundum sic proceditur. Videtur quod lex vetus non fuerit a Deo. Dicitur enim Deut. XXXII, Dei perfecta sunt opera. Sed lex fuit imperfecta, ut supra dictum est. Ergo lex vetus non fuit a Deo.

[37754] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 2 arg. 2

Praeterea, Eccle. III dicitur, didici quod omnia opera quae fecit Deus, perseverent in aeternum. Sed lex vetus non perseverat in aeternum, dicit enim apostolus, ad Heb. VII, reprobatio fit quidem praecedentis mandati, propter infirmitatem eius et inutilitatem. Ergo lex vetus non fuit a Deo.

[37755] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 2 arg. 3

Praeterea, ad sapientem legislatorem pertinet non solum mala auferre, sed etiam occasiones malorum. Sed vetus lex fuit occasio peccati, ut supra dictum est. Ergo ad Deum, cui nullus est similis in legislatoribus, ut dicitur Iob XXXVI, non pertinebat legem talem dare.

[37756] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 2 arg. 4

Praeterea, I ad Tim. II, dicitur quod Deus vult omnes homines salvos fieri. Sed lex vetus non sufficiebat ad salutem hominum, ut supra dictum est. Ergo ad Deum non pertinebat talem legem dare. Lex ergo vetus non est a Deo.

Sed contra est quod dominus dicit, Matth. XV, loquens Iudaeis, quibus erat lex vetus data, irritum fecistis mandatum Dei propter traditiones vestras. Et paulo ante praemittitur, honora patrem tuum et matrem tuam, quod manifeste in lege veteri continetur. Ergo lex vetus est a Deo.

Respondeo dicendum quod lex vetus a bono Deo data est, qui est pater domini nostri Iesu Christi. Lex enim vetus homines ordinabat ad Christum dupliciter. Uno quidem modo, testimonium Christo perhibendo, unde ipse dicit, Lucae ult., oportet impleri omnia quae scripta sunt in lege et Psalmis et prophetis de me; et Ioan. V, si crederetis Moysi, crederetis forsitan et mihi, de me enim ille scripsit. Alio modo, per modum cuiusdam dispositionis, dum, retrahens homines a cultu idololatriae, concludebat eos sub cultu unius Dei, a quo salvandum erat humanum genus per Christum, unde apostolus dicit, ad Gal. III, priusquam veniret fides, sub lege custodiebamur conclusi in eam fidem quae revelanda erat. Manifestum est autem quod eiusdem est disponere ad finem et ad finem perducere, et dico eiusdem per se vel per suos subiectos. Non enim Diabolus legem tulisset per quam homines adducerentur ad Christum, per quem erat eiiciendus; secundum illud Matth. XII, si Satanas Satanam eiicit, divisum est regnum eius. Et ideo ab eodem Deo a quo facta est salus hominum per gratiam Christi, lex vetus data est.

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod nihil prohibet aliquid non esse perfectum simpliciter, quod tamen est perfectum secundum tempus, sicut dicitur aliquis puer perfectus non simpliciter, sed secundum temporis conditionem. Ita etiam praecepta quae pueris dantur, sunt quidem perfecta secundum conditionem eorum quibus dantur, etsi non sint perfecta simpliciter. Et talia fuerunt praecepta legis. Unde apostolus dicit, ad Gal. III, lex paedagogus noster fuit in Christo.

Ad secundum dicendum quod opera Dei perseverant in aeternum, quae sic Deus fecit ut in aeternum perseverent, et haec sunt ea quae sunt perfecta. Lex autem vetus reprobatur tempore perfectionis gratiae, non tanquam mala, sed tanquam infirma et inutilis pro isto tempore, quia, ut subditur, nihil ad perfectum adduxit lex. Unde ad Gal. III, dicit apostolus, ubi venit fides, iam non sumus sub paedagogo.

[37761] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 2 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod, sicut supra dictum est, Deus aliquando permittit aliquos cadere in peccatum, ut exinde humiliantur. Ita etiam voluit talem legem dare quam suis viribus homines implere non possent, ut sic dum homines de se praesumentes peccatores se invenirent, humiliati recurrerent ad auxilium gratiae.

[37762] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 2 ad 4

Ad quartum dicendum quod, quamvis lex vetus non sufficeret ad salvandum hominem, tamen aderat aliud auxilium a Deo hominibus simul cum lege, per quod salvari poterant, scilicet fides mediatoris, per quam iustificati sunt antiqui patres, sicut etiam nos iustificamur. Et sic Deus non deficiebat hominibus quin daret eis salutis auxilia.

Articulus 3

[37763] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 3 arg. 1

Ad tertium sic proceditur. Videtur quod lex vetus non fuerit data per Angelos, sed immediate a Deo. Angelus enim nuntius dicitur, et sic nomen Angeli ministerium importat, non dominium; secundum illud Psalmi CII, benedicite domino, omnes Angeli eius, ministri eius. Sed vetus lex a domino tradita esse perhibetur, dicitur enim Exod. XX, locutusque est dominus sermones hos, et postea subditur, ego enim sum dominus Deus tuus. Et idem modus loquendi frequenter repetitur in Exodo, et in libris consequentibus legis. Ergo lex est immediate data a Deo.

[37764] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 3 arg. 2

Praeterea, sicut dicitur Ioan. I, lex per Moysen data est. Sed Moyses immediate accepit a Deo, dicitur enim Exod. XXXIII, loquebatur dominus ad Moysen facie ad faciem, sicut loqui solet homo ad amicum suum. Ergo lex vetus immediate data est a Deo.

[37765] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 3 arg. 3

Praeterea, ad solum principem pertinet legem ferre, ut supra dictum est.

Sed solus Deus est princeps salutis animarum, Angeli vero sunt administratorii spiritus, ut dicitur ad Heb. I. Ergo lex vetus per Angelos dari non debuit, cum ordinaretur ad animarum salutem.

[37766] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 3 s. c.

Sed contra est quod dicit apostolus, ad Gal. III, lex data est per Angelos in manu mediatoris. Et Act. VII, dicit Stephanus, accepistis legem in dispositione Angelorum.

[37767] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 3 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod lex data est a Deo per Angelos. Et praeter generalem rationem, quam Dionysius assignat, in IV cap. Cael. Hier., quod divina debent deferri ad homines mediantibus Angelis, specialis ratio est quare legem veterem per Angelos dari oportuit. Dictum est enim quod lex vetus imperfecta erat, sed disponebat ad salutem perfectam generis humani, quae futura erat per Christum. Sic autem videtur in omnibus potestatibus et artibus ordinatis, quod ille qui est superior, principalem et perfectum actum operatur per seipsum; ea vero quae disponunt ad perfectionem ultimam, operatur per suos ministros; sicut navifactor compaginat navem per seipsum, sed praeparat materiam per artifices subministrantes. Et ideo conveniens fuit ut lex perfecta novi testamenti daretur immediate per ipsum Deum hominem factum; lex autem vetus per ministros Dei, scilicet per Angelos, daretur hominibus. Et per hunc modum apostolus, in principio ad Heb., probat eminentiam novae legis ad veterem, quia in novo testamento locutus est nobis Deus in filio suo, in veteri autem testamento est sermo factus per Angelos.

[37768] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 3 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod, sicut Gregorius dicit, in principio Moral., Angelus qui Moysi apparuisse describitur, modo Angelus, modo dominus memoratur. Angelus videlicet, propter hoc quod exterius loquendo serviebat; dominus autem dicitur, quia interius praesidens loquendi efficaciam ministrabat. Et inde est etiam quod quasi ex persona domini Angelus loquebatur.

[37769] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 3 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod, sicut Augustinus dicit, XII super Gen. ad Litt., in Exodo dicitur, locutus est dominus Moysi facie ad faciem; et paulo post subditur, ostende mihi gloriam tuam. Sentiebat ergo quid videbat; et quod non videbat, desiderabat. Non ergo videbat ipsam Dei essentiam, et ita non immediate ab eo instruebatur. Quod ergo dicitur quod loquebatur ei facie ad faciem, secundum opinionem populi loquitur Scriptura, qui putabat Moysen ore ad os loqui cum Deo, cum per subiectam creaturam, idest per Angelum et nubem, ei loqueretur et appareret. Vel per visionem faciei intelligitur quaedam eminens contemplatio et familiaris, infra essentiae divinae visionem.

[37770] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 3 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod solius principis est sua auctoritate legem instituere, sed quandoque legem institutam per alios promulgat. Et ita Deus sua auctoritate instituit legem, sed per Angelos promulgavit.

Articulus 4

[37771] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 4 arg. 1

Ad quartum sic proceditur. Videtur quod lex vetus non debuerit dari soli populo Iudaeorum. Lex enim vetus disponebat ad salutem quae futura erat per Christum, ut dictum est. Sed salus illa non erat futura solum in Iudaeis, sed in omnibus gentibus; secundum illud Isaiae XLIX, parum est ut sis mihi servus ad suscitandas tribus Iacob et faeces Israel convertendas, dedi te in lucem gentium, ut sis salus mea usque ad extremum terrae. Ergo lex vetus dari debuit omnibus gentibus, et non uni populo tantum.

[37772] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 4 arg. 2

Praeterea, sicut dicitur Act. X, non est personarum acceptor Deus, sed in omni gente qui timet Deum et facit iustitiam, acceptus est illi. Non ergo magis uni populo quam aliis viam salutis debuit aperire.

[37773] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 4 arg. 3

Praeterea, lex data est per Angelos, sicut iam dictum est. Sed ministeria Angelorum Deus non solum Iudaeis, sed omnibus gentibus semper exhibuit, dicitur enim Eccli. XVII, in unamquamque gentem praeposuit rectorem. Omnibus etiam gentibus temporalia bona largitur, quae minus sunt curae Deo quam spiritualia bona. Ergo etiam legem omnibus populis dare debuit.

[37774] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 4 s. c.

Sed contra est quod dicitur Rom. III, quid ergo amplius est Iudaeo? Multum quidem per omnem modum. Primum quidem, quia credita sunt illis eloquia Dei. Et in Psalmo CXLVII dicitur, non fecit taliter omni nationi, et iudicia sua non manifestavit eis.

[37775] I^a-II^ae q. 98 a. 4 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod posset una ratio assignari quare potius populo Iudaeorum data sit lex quam aliis populis, quia, aliis ad idololatriam declinantibus, solus populus Iudaeorum in cultu unius Dei remansit; et ideo alii populi indigni erant legem recipere, ne sanctum canibus daretur. Sed ista ratio conveniens non videtur, quia populus ille etiam post legem latam, ad idololatriam declinavit, quod gravius fuit, ut patet Exod. XXXII; et Amos V, numquid hostias et sacrificium obtulistis mihi in deserto quadraginta annis, domus Israel? Et portastis tabernaculum Moloch vestro, et imaginem idolorum vestrorum, sidus Dei vestri, quae fecistis vobis. Expresse etiam dicitur Deut. IX, scito quod non propter iustitias tuas dominus Deus tuus dedit tibi terram hanc in possessionem, cum durissimae cervici sis populus. Sed ratio ibi praemittitur, ut compleret verbum suum dominus, quod sub iuramento pollicitus est patribus tuis, Abraham, Isaac et Iacob. Quae autem promissio eis sit facta, ostendit apostolus, ad Galat. III, dicens, Abrahae dictae sunt promissiones, et semini eius. Non dicit, seminibus, quasi in multis, sed quasi in uno, et semini tuo, qui est Christus. Deus igitur et legem et alia beneficia specialia illi populo exhibuit propter promissionem eorum patribus factam ut ex eis Christus nasceretur. Decebat enim ut ille populus ex quo Christus nasciturus erat, quadam speciali sanctificatione polleret; secundum illud quod dicitur Levit. XIX, sancti eritis, quia ego sanctus sum. Nec etiam fuit propter meritum ipsius Abrahae ut talis promissio ei fieret, ut scilicet Christus ex eius semine nasceretur, sed ex gratuita electione et vocatione. Unde dicitur Isaiae XLI, quis suscitavit ab oriente iustum, vocavit eum ut sequeretur se? Sic ergo patet quod ex sola gratuita electione patres promissionem acceperunt, et populus ex eis progenitus legem accepit; secundum illud Deut. IV, audistis verba illius de medio ignis, quia dilexit patres, et elegit semen eorum post illos. Si autem rursus quaeratur quare hunc populum elegit ut ex eo Christus nasceretur, et non alium, conveniet responsio Augustini, quam dicit super Ioan., quare hunc trahat et illum non trahat, noli velle diiudicare, si non vis errare.

[37776] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 4 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod, quamvis salus futura per Christum, esset omnibus gentibus praeparata; tamen oportebat ex uno populo Christum nasci, qui propter hoc prae aliis praerogativas habuit; secundum illud Rom. IX, quorum, scilicet Iudaeorum, est adoptio filiorum Dei, et testamentum et legislatio; quorum patres; ex quibus Christus est secundum carnem.

[37777] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 4 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod acceptio personarum locum habet in his quae ex debito dantur, in his vero quae ex gratuita voluntate conferuntur, acceptio personarum locum non habet. Non enim est personarum acceptor qui ex liberalitate de suo dat uni et non alteri, sed si esset dispensator bonorum communium, et non distribueret aequaliter secundum merita personarum, esset personarum acceptor. Salutaria autem beneficia Deus humano generi confert ex sua gratia. Unde non est personarum acceptor si quibusdam prae aliis conferat. Unde Augustinus dicit, in libro de Praedest. Sanct., omnes quos Deus docet, misericordia docet, quos autem non docet, iudicio non docet. Hoc enim venit ex damnatione humani generis pro peccato primi parentis.

[37778] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 4 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod beneficia gratiae subtrahuntur homini propter culpam, sed beneficia naturalia non subtrahuntur. Inter quae sunt ministeria Angelorum, quae ipse naturarum ordo requirit, ut scilicet per media gubernentur infima; et etiam corporalia subsidia, quae non solum hominibus, sed etiam iumentis Deus administrat, secundum illud Psalmi XXXV, homines et iumenta salvabis, domine.

Articulus 5

[37779] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 5 arg. 1

Ad quintum sic proceditur. Videtur quod omnes homines obligarentur ad observandam veterem legem. Quicumque enim subditur regi, oportet quod subdatur legi ipsius. Sed vetus lex est data a Deo, qui est rex omnis terrae, ut in Psalmo XLVI dicitur. Ergo omnes habitantes terram tenebantur ad observantiam legis.

[37780] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 5 arg. 2

Praeterea, Iudaei salvari non poterant nisi legem veterem observarent, dicitur enim Deut. XXVII, maledictus qui non permanet in sermonibus legis huius, nec eos opere perficit. Si igitur alii homines sine observantia legis veteris potuissent salvari, peior fuisset conditio Iudaeorum quam aliorum hominum.

[37781] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 5 arg. 3

Praeterea, gentiles ad ritum Iudaicum et ad observantias legis admittebantur, dicitur enim Exod. XII, si quis peregrinorum in vestram voluerit transire coloniam, et facere phase domini, circumcidetur prius omne masculinum eius, et tunc rite celebrabit, eritque simul sicut indigena terrae. Frustra autem ad observantias legales fuissent extranei admissi ex ordinatione divina, si absque legalibus observantiis salvari potuissent. Ergo nullus salvari poterat nisi legem observaret.

[37782] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 5 s. c.

Sed contra est quod Dionysius dicit, IX cap. Cael. Hier., quod multi gentilium per Angelos sunt reducti in Deum. Sed constat quod gentiles legem non observabant. Ergo absque observantia legis poterant aliqui salvari.

[37783] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 5 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod lex vetus manifestabat praecepta legis naturae, et superaddebat quaedam propria praecepta. Quantum igitur ad illa quae lex vetus continebat de lege naturae, omnes tenebantur ad observantiam veteris legis, non quia erant de veteri lege, sed quia erant de lege naturae. Sed quantum ad illa quae lex vetus superaddebat, non tenebantur aliqui ad observantiam veteris legis nisi solus populus Iudaeorum. Cuius ratio est quia lex vetus, sicut dictum est, data est populo Iudaeorum ut quandam praerogativam sanctitatis obtineret, propter reverentiam Christi, qui ex illo populo nasciturus erat. Quaecumque autem statuuntur ad specialem aliquorum sanctificationem, non obligant nisi illos, sicut ad quaedam obligantur clerici, qui mancipantur divino ministerio, ad quae laici non obligantur; similiter et religiosi ad quaedam perfectionis opera obligantur ex sua professione, ad quae saeculares non obligantur. Et similiter ad quaedam specialia obligabatur populus ille, ad quae alii populi non obligabantur. Unde dicitur Deut. XVIII, perfectus eris, et absque macula, cum domino Deo tuo. Et propter hoc etiam quadam professione utebantur; ut patet Deut. XXVI, profiteor hodie coram domino Deo tuo et cetera.

[37784] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 5 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod quicumque subduntur regi, obligantur ad legem eius observandam quam omnibus communiter proponit. Sed si instituat aliqua observanda a suis familiaribus ministris, ad haec ceteri non obligantur.

[37785] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 5 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod homo quanto Deo magis coniungitur, tanto efficitur melioris conditionis. Et ideo quanto populus Iudaeorum erat adstrictus magis ad divinum cultum, dignior aliis populis erat. Unde dicitur Deut. IV, quae est alia gens sic inclyta, ut habeat caeremonias, iustaque iudicia, et universam legem? Et similiter etiam quantum ad hoc sunt melioris conditionis clerici quam laici, et religiosi quam saeculares.

[37786] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 5 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod gentiles perfectius et securius salutem consequabantur sub observantiis legis quam sub sola lege naturali, et ideo ad eas admittebantur. Sicut etiam nunc laici transeunt ad clericatum, et saeculares ad religionem, quamvis absque hoc possint salvari.

Articulus 6

[37787] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 6 arg. 1

Ad sextum sic proceditur. Videtur quod lex vetus non convenienter fuerit data tempore Moysi. Lex enim vetus disponebat ad salutem quae erat futura per Christum, sicut dictum est. Sed statim homo post peccatum indiguit huiusmodi salutis remedio. Ergo statim post peccatum lex vetus debuit dari.

[37788] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 6 arg. 2

Praeterea, lex vetus data est propter sanctificationem eorum ex quibus Christus nasciturus erat. Sed Abrahae incoepit fieri promissio de semine, quod est Christus, ut habetur Gen. XII. Ergo statim tempore Abrahae debuit lex dari.

Praeterea, sicut Christus non est natus ex aliis descendantibus ex Noe nisi ex Abraham, cui facta est promissio; ita etiam non est natus ex aliis filiis Abrahae nisi ex David, cui est promissio renovata, secundum illud II Reg. XXIII, dixit vir cui constitutum est de Christo Dei Iacob. Ergo lex vetus debuit dari post David, sicut data est post Abraham.

Sed contra est quod apostolus dicit, ad Gal. III, quod lex propter transgressionem posita est, donec veniret semen cui promiserat, ordinata per Angelos in manu mediatoris, idest ordinabiliter data, ut Glossa dicit. Ergo congruum fuit ut lex vetus illo temporis ordine traderetur.

Respondeo dicendum quod convenientissime lex vetus data fuit tempore Moysi. Cuius ratio potest accipi ex duobus, secundum quod quaelibet lex duobus generibus hominum imponitur. Imponitur enim quibusdam duris et superbis, qui per legem compescuntur et domantur, imponitur etiam bonis, qui, per legem instructi, adiuvantur ad implendum quod intendunt. Conveniens igitur fuit tali tempore legem veterem dari, ad superbiam hominum convincendam. De duobus enim homo superbiebat, scilicet de scientia, et de potentia. De scientia quidem, quasi ratio naturalis ei posset sufficere ad salutem. Et ideo ut de hoc eius superbia convinceretur permissus est homo regimini suae rationis absque adminiculo legis scriptae, et experimento homo discere potuit quod patiebatur rationis defectum, per hoc quod homines usque ad idololatriam et turpissima vitia circa tempora Abrahae sunt prolapsi. Et ideo post haec tempora fuit necessarium legem scriptam dari in remedium humanae ignorantiae, quia per legem est cognitio peccati, ut dicitur Rom. III. Sed postquam homo est instructus per legem, convicta est eius superbia de infirmitate, dum implere non poterat quod cognoscebat. Et ideo, sicut apostolus concludit, ad Rom. VIII, quod impossibile erat legi, in qua infirmabatur per carnem, misit Deus filium suum, ut iustificatio legis impleretur in nobis. Ex parte vero bonorum, lex data est in auxilium. Quod quidem tunc maxime populo necessarium fuit, quando lex naturalis obscurari incipiebat propter exuberantiam peccatorum. Oportebat autem huiusmodi auxilium quodam ordine dari, ut per imperfecta ad perfectionem manuducerentur. Et ideo inter legem naturae et legem gratiae, oportuit legem veterem dari.

[37792] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 6 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod statim post peccatum primi hominis non competebat legem veterem dari, tum quia nondum homo recognoscebat se ea indigere, de sua ratione confisus. Tum quia adhuc dictamen legis naturae nondum erat obtenebratum per consuetudinem peccandi.

[37793] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 6 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod lex non debet dari nisi populo, est enim praeceptum commune, ut dictum est. Et ideo tempore Abrahae data sunt quaedam familiaria praecepta, et quasi domestica, Dei ad homines. Sed postmodum, multiplicatis eius posteris intantum quod populus esset, et liberatis eis a servitute, lex convenienter potuit dari, nam servi non sunt pars populi vel civitatis, cui legem dari competit, ut philosophus dicit, in III Polit.

[37794] I^a-IIae q. 98 a. 6 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod, quia legem oportebat alicui populo dari, non solum illi ex quibus Christus natus est, legem acceperunt; sed totus populus consignatus signaculo circumcisionis, quae fuit signum promissionis Abrahae factae et ab eo creditae, ut dicit apostolus, Rom. IV. Et ideo etiam ante David oportuit legem dari tali populo iam collecto.

Quaestio 99

Prooemium

[37795] I^a-IIae q. 99 pr.

Deinde considerandum est de praeceptis veteris legis. Et primo, de distinctione ipsorum; secundo, de singulis generibus distinctis. Circa primum quaeruntur sex. Primo, utrum legis veteris sint plura praecepta, vel unum tantum. Secundo, utrum lex vetus contineat aliqua praecepta moralia. Tertio, utrum praeter moralia contineat caeremonialia. Quarto, utrum contineat, praeter haec, iudicialia. Quinto, utrum praeter ista tria contineat aliqua alia. Sexto, de modo quo lex inducebat ad observantiam praedictorum.

Articulus 1

[37796] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 1 arg. 1

Ad primum sic proceditur. Videtur quod in lege veteri non contineatur nisi unum praeceptum. Lex enim est nihil aliud quam praeceptum, ut supra habitum est. Sed lex vetus est una. Ergo non continet nisi unum praeceptum.

[37797] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 1 arg. 2

Praeterea, apostolus dicit, Rom. XIII, si quod est aliud mandatum, in hoc verbo instauratur, diliges proximum tuum sicut teipsum. Sed istud mandatum est unum. Ergo lex vetus non continet nisi unum mandatum.

[37798] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 1 arg. 3

Praeterea, Matth. VII, dicitur, omnia quaecumque vultis ut faciant vobis homines, et vos facite illis, haec est enim lex et prophetarum. Sed tota lex vetus continetur in lege et prophetis. Ergo tota lex vetus non habet nisi unum praeceptum.

[37799] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 1 s. c.

Sed contra est quod apostolus dicit, ad Ephes. II, legem mandatorum decretis evacuans. Et loquitur de lege veteri, ut patet per Glossam ibidem. Ergo lex vetus continet in se multa mandata.

[37800] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 1 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod praeceptum legis, cum sit obligatorium, est de aliquo quod fieri debet. Quod autem aliquid debeat fieri, hoc provenit ex necessitate alicuius finis. Unde manifestum est quod de ratione praecepti est quod importet ordinem ad finem, inquantum scilicet illud praecipitur quod est necessarium vel expediens ad finem. Contingit autem ad unum finem multa esse necessaria vel expedientia. Et secundum hoc possunt de diversis rebus dari praecepta inquantum ordinantur ad unum finem. Unde dicendum est quod omnia praecepta legis veteris sunt unum secundum ordinem ad unum finem, sunt tamen multa secundum diversitatem eorum quae ordinantur ad finem illum.

[37801] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 1 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod lex vetus dicitur esse una secundum ordinem ad finem unum, et tamen continet diversa praecepta, secundum distinctionem eorum quae ordinat ad finem. Sicut etiam ars aedificativa est una secundum unitatem finis, quia tendit ad aedificationem domus, tamen continet diversa praecepta, secundum diversos actus ad hoc ordinatos.

[37802] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 1 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod, sicut apostolus dicit, I ad Tim. I, finis praecepti caritas est, ad hoc enim omnis lex tendit, ut amicitiam constituat vel hominum ad invicem, vel hominis ad Deum. Et ideo tota lex impletur in hoc uno mandato, diliges proximum tuum sicut teipsum, sicut in quodam fine mandatorum omnium, in dilectione enim proximi includitur etiam Dei dilectio, quando proximus diligitur propter Deum. Unde apostolus hoc unum praeceptum posuit pro duobus quae sunt de dilectione Dei et proximi, de quibus dicit dominus, Matth. XXII, in his duobus mandatis pendet omnis lex et prophetae.

[37803] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 1 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod, sicut dicitur in IX Ethic., amicabilia quae sunt ad alterum, venerunt ex amicabilibus quae sunt homini ad seipsum, dum scilicet homo ita se habet ad alterum sicut ad se. Et ideo in hoc quod dicitur, omnia quaecumque vultis ut faciant vobis homines, et vos facite illis, explicatur quaedam regula dilectionis proximi, quae etiam implicite continetur in hoc quod dicitur, diliges proximum tuum sicut teipsum. Unde est quaedam explicatio istius mandati.

Articulus 2

[37804] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 2 arg. 1

Ad secundum sic proceditur. Videtur quod lex vetus non contineat praecepta moralia. Lex enim vetus distinguitur a lege naturae, ut supra habitum est. Sed praecepta moralia pertinent ad legem naturae. Ergo non pertinent ad legem veterem.

[37805] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 2 arg. 2

Praeterea, ibi subvenire debuit homini lex divina, ubi deficit ratio humana, sicut patet in his quae ad fidem pertinent, quae sunt supra rationem. Sed ad praecepta moralia ratio hominis sufficere videtur. Ergo praecepta moralia non sunt de lege veteri, quae est lex divina.

Praeterea, lex vetus dicitur littera occidens, ut patet II ad Cor. III. Sed praecepta moralia non occidunt, sed vivificant; secundum illud Psalmi CXVIII, in aeternum non obliviscar iustificationes tuas, quia in ipsis vivificasti me. Ergo praecepta moralia non pertinent ad veterem legem.

Sed contra est quod dicitur Eccli. XVII, addidit illis disciplinam, et legem vitae haereditavit eos. Disciplina autem pertinet ad mores, dicit enim Glossa ad Heb. XII, super illud, omnis disciplina etc., disciplina est eruditio morum per difficilia. Ergo lex a Deo data, praecepta moralia continebat.

Respondeo dicendum quod lex vetus continebat praecepta quaedam moralia, ut patet Exod. XX, non occides, non furtum facies. Et hoc rationabiliter. Nam sicut intentio principalis legis humanae est ut faciat amicitiam hominum ad invicem; ita intentio legis divinae est ut constituat principaliter amicitiam hominis ad Deum. Cum autem similitudo sit ratio amoris, secundum illud Eccli. XIII, omne animal diligit simile sibi; impossibile est esse amicitiam hominis ad Deum, qui est optimus, nisi homines boni efficiantur, unde dicitur Levit. XIX, sancti eritis, quoniam ego sanctus sum. Bonitas autem hominis est virtus, quae facit bonum habentem. Et ideo oportuit praecepta legis veteris etiam de actibus virtutum dari. Et haec sunt moralia legis praecepta.

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod lex vetus distinguitur a lege naturae non tanquam ab ea omnino aliena, sed tanquam aliquid ei superaddens. Sicut enim gratia praesupponit naturam, ita oportet quod lex divina praesupponat legem naturalem.

Ad secundum dicendum quod legi divinae conveniens erat ut non solum provideret homini in his ad quae ratio non potest, sed etiam in his circa quae contingit rationem hominis impediri. Ratio autem hominis circa praecepta moralia, quantum ad ipsa communissima praecepta legis naturae, non poterat errare in universali, sed tamen, propter consuetudinem peccandi, obscurabatur in particularibus agendis. Circa alia vero praecepta moralia, quae sunt quasi conclusiones deductae ex communibus principiis legis naturae, multorum ratio oberrabat, ita ut quaedam quae secundum se sunt mala, ratio multorum licita iudicaret. Unde oportuit contra utrumque defectum homini subveniri per auctoritatem legis divinae. Sicut etiam inter credenda nobis proponuntur non solum ea ad quae ratio attingere non potest, ut Deum esse trinum; sed etiam ea ad quae ratio recta pertingere potest, ut Deum esse unum; ad excludendum rationis humanae errorem, qui accidebat in multis.

[37811] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 2 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod, sicut Augustinus probat in libro de spiritu et littera, etiam littera legis quantum ad praecepta moralia, occidere dicitur occasionaliter, inquantum scilicet praecipit quod bonum est, non praebens auxilium gratiae ad implendum.

Articulus 3

[37812] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 3 arg. 1

Ad tertium sic proceditur. Videtur quod lex vetus non contineat praecepta caeremonialia, praeter moralia. Omnis enim lex quae hominibus datur, est directiva humanorum actuum. Actus autem humani morales dicuntur, ut supra dictum est. Ergo videtur quod in lege veteri hominibus data, non debeant contineri nisi praecepta moralia.

[37813] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 3 arg. 2

Praeterea, praecepta quae dicuntur caeremonialia, videntur ad divinum cultum pertinere. Sed divinus cultus est actus virtutis, scilicet religionis, quae, ut Tullius dicit in sua Rhetoric., divinae naturae cultum caeremoniamque affert. Cum igitur praecepta moralia sint de actibus virtutum, ut dictum est, videtur quod praecepta caeremonialia non sint distinguenda a moralibus.

[37814] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 3 arg. 3

Praeterea, praecepta caeremonialia esse videntur quae figurative aliquid significant. Sed sicut Augustinus dicit, in II de Doctr. Christ., verba inter homines obtinuerunt principatum significandi. Ergo nulla necessitas fuit ut in lege continerentur praecepta caeremonialia de aliquibus actibus figurativis.

Sed contra est quod dicitur Deut. IV, decem verba scripsit in duabus tabulis lapideis, mihiq̄ mandavit in illo tempore ut docerem vos caeremonias et iudicia quae facere deberetis. Sed decem praecepta legis sunt moralia. Ergo praeter praecepta moralia sunt etiam alia praecepta caeremonialia.

Respondeo dicendum quod, sicut dictum est, lex divina principaliter instituitur ad ordinandum homines ad Deum; lex autem humana principaliter ad ordinandum homines ad invicem. Et ideo leges humanae non curaverunt aliquid instituere de cultu divino nisi in ordine ad bonum commune hominum, et propter hoc etiam multa confinxerunt circa res divinas, secundum quod videbatur eis expediens ad informandos mores hominum; sicut patet in ritu gentilium. Sed lex divina e converso homines ad invicem ordinavit secundum quod conveniebat ordini qui est in Deum, quem principaliter intendebat. Ordinatur autem homo in Deum non solum per interiores actus mentis, qui sunt credere, sperare et amare; sed etiam per quaedam exteriora opera, quibus homo divinam servitatem profitetur. Et ista opera dicuntur ad cultum Dei pertinere. Qui quidem cultus caeremonia vocatur, quasi munia, idest dona, Caereris, quae dicebatur dea frugum, ut quidam dicunt, eo quod primo ex frugibus oblationes Deo offerebantur. Sive, ut maximus Valerius refert, nomen caeremoniae introductum est ad significandum cultum divinum apud Latinos, a quodam oppido iuxta Romam, quod Caere vocabatur, eo quod, Roma capta a gallis, illuc sacra Romanorum ablata sunt, et reverentissime habita. Sic igitur illa praecepta quae in lege pertinent ad cultum Dei, specialiter caeremonialia dicuntur.

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod humani actus se extendunt etiam ad cultum divinum. Et ideo etiam de his continet praecepta lex vetus hominibus data.

Ad secundum dicendum quod, sicut supra dictum est, praecepta legis naturae communia sunt, et indigent determinatione. Determinantur autem et per legem humanam, et per legem divinam. Et sicut ipsae determinationes quae fiunt per legem humanam, non dicuntur esse de lege naturae, sed de iure positivo; ita ipsae determinationes praeceptorum legis naturae quae fiunt per legem divinam, distinguuntur a praeceptis moralibus, quae pertinent ad legem naturae. Colere ergo Deum, cum sit actus virtutis, pertinet ad praeceptum morale, sed determinatio huius praecepti, ut scilicet colatur talibus hostiis et talibus muneribus, hoc pertinet ad praecepta caeremonialia. Et ideo praecepta caeremonialia distinguuntur a praeceptis moralibus.

[37819] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 3 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod, sicut Dionysius dicit, I cap. Cael. Hier., divina hominibus manifestari non possunt nisi sub aliquibus similitudinibus sensibilibus. Ipsae autem similitudines magis movent animum quando non solum verbo exprimuntur, sed etiam sensui offeruntur. Et ideo divina traduntur in Scripturis non solum per similitudines verbo expressas, sicut patet in metaphoricis locutionibus; sed etiam per similitudines rerum quae visui proponuntur, quod pertinet ad praecepta caeremonialia.

Articulus 4

[37820] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 4 arg. 1

Ad quartum sic proceditur. Videtur quod praeter praecepta moralia et caeremonialia, non sint aliqua praecepta iudicialia in veteri lege. Dicit enim Augustinus, contra Faustum, quod in lege veteri sunt praecepta vitae agenda, et praecepta vitae significanda. Sed praecepta vitae agenda sunt moralia; praecepta autem vitae significanda sunt caeremonialia. Ergo praeter haec duo genera praeceptorum, non sunt ponenda in lege alia praecepta iudicialia.

[37821] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 4 arg. 2

Praeterea, super illud Psalmi CXVIII, a iudiciis tuis non declinavi, dicit Glossa, idest ab his quae constituisti regulam vivendi. Sed regula vivendi pertinet ad praecepta moralia. Ergo praecepta iudicialia non sunt distinguenda a moralibus.

[37822] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 4 arg. 3

Praeterea, iudicium videtur esse actus iustitiae; secundum illud Psalmi XCIII, quoadusque iustitia convertatur in iudicium. Sed actus iustitiae, sicut et actus ceterarum virtutum, pertinet ad praecepta moralia. Ergo praecepta moralia includunt in se iudicialia, et sic non debent ab eis distinguui.

[37823] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 4 s. c.

Sed contra est quod dicitur Deut. VI, haec sunt praecepta et caeremoniae atque iudicia. Praecepta autem antonomastice dicuntur moralia. Ergo praeter praecepta moralia et caeremonialia, sunt etiam iudicialia.

[37824] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 4 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod, sicut dictum est, ad legem divinam pertinet ut ordinet homines ad invicem et ad Deum. Utrumque autem horum in communi quidem pertinet ad dictamen legis naturae, ad quod referuntur moralia praecepta, sed oportet quod determinetur utrumque per legem divinam vel humanam, quia principia naturaliter nota sunt communia tam in speculativis quam in activis. Sicut igitur determinatio communis praecepti de cultu divino fit per praecepta caeremonialia, sic et determinatio communis praecepti de iustitia observanda inter homines, determinatur per praecepta iudicialia. Et secundum hoc, oportet tria praecepta legis veteris ponere; scilicet moralia, quae sunt de dictamine legis naturae; caeremonialia, quae sunt determinationes cultus divini; et iudicialia, quae sunt determinationes iustitiae inter homines observandae. Unde cum apostolus, Rom. VII, dixisset quod lex est sancta, subiungit quod mandatum est iustum et sanctum et bonum, iustum quidem, quantum ad iudicialia; sanctum, quantum ad caeremonialia (nam sanctum dicitur quod est Deo dicatum); bonum, idest honestum, quantum ad moralia.

[37825] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 4 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod tam praecepta moralia, quam etiam iudicialia, pertinent ad directionem vitae humanae. Et ideo utraque continentur sub uno membro illorum quae ponit Augustinus, scilicet sub praeceptis vitae agenda.

[37826] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 4 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod iudicium significat executionem iustitiae, quae quidem est secundum applicationem rationis ad aliqua particularia determinate. Unde praecepta iudicialia communicant in aliquo cum moralibus, inquantum scilicet a ratione derivantur; et in aliquo cum caeremonialibus, in quantum scilicet sunt quaedam determinationes communium praeceptorum. Et ideo quandoque sub iudiciis comprehenduntur praecepta iudicialia et moralia, sicut Deut. V, audi, Israel, caeremonias atque iudicia; quandoque vero iudicialia et caeremonialia, sicut Levit. XVIII, facietis iudicia mea, et praecepta mea servabitis, ubi praecepta ad moralia referuntur, iudicia vero ad iudicialia et caeremonialia.

[37827] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 4 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod actus iustitiae in generali pertinet ad praecepta moralia, sed determinatio eius in speciali pertinet ad praecepta iudicialia.

Articulus 5

[37828] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 5 arg. 1

Ad quintum sic proceditur. Videtur quod aliqua alia praecepta contineantur in lege veteri praeter moralia, iudicialia et caeremonialia. Iudicialia enim praecepta pertinent ad actum iustitiae, quae est hominis ad hominem; caeremonialia vero pertinent ad actum religionis, qua Deus colitur. Sed praeter has sunt multae aliae virtutes, scilicet temperantia, fortitudo, liberalitas, et aliae plures, ut supra dictum est. Ergo praeter praedicta oportet plura alia in lege veteri contineri.

[37829] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 5 arg. 2

Praeterea, Deut. XI dicitur, ama dominum Deum tuum, et observa eius praecepta et caeremonias et iudicia atque mandata. Sed praecepta pertinent ad moralia, ut dictum est. Ergo praeter moralia, iudicialia et caeremonialia, adhuc alia continentur in lege, quae dicuntur mandata.

[37830] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 5 arg. 3

Praeterea, Deut. VI dicitur, custodi praecepta domini Dei tui, ac testimonia et caeremonias quas tibi praecepi. Ergo praeter omnia praedicta adhuc in lege testimonia continentur.

[37831] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 5 arg. 4

Praeterea, in Psalmo CXVIII dicitur, in aeternum non obliviscar iustificationes tuas, Glossa, idest legem. Ergo praecepta legis veteris non solum sunt moralia, caeremonialia et iudicialia, sed etiam iustificationes.

Sed contra est quod dicitur Deut. VI, haec sunt praecepta et caeremoniae atque iudicia quae mandavit dominus Deus vobis. Et haec ponuntur in principio legis. Ergo omnia praecepta legis sub his comprehenduntur.

Respondeo dicendum quod in lege ponuntur aliqua tanquam praecepta; aliqua vero tanquam ad praeceptorum adimpletionem ordinata. Praecepta quidem sunt de his quae sunt agenda. Ad quorum impletionem ex duobus homo inducitur, scilicet ex auctoritate praecipientis; et ex utilitate impletionis, quae quidem est consecutio alicuius boni utilis, delectabilis vel honesti, aut fuga alicuius mali contrarii. Oportuit igitur in veteri lege proponi quaedam quae auctoritatem Dei praecipientis indicarent, sicut illud Deut. VI, audi, Israel, dominus Deus tuus Deus unus est; et illud Gen. I, in principio creavit Deus caelum et terram. Et huiusmodi dicuntur testimonia. Oportuit etiam quod in lege proponerentur quaedam praemia observantium legem, et poenae transgredientium, ut patet Deut. XXVIII, si audieris vocem domini Dei tui, faciet te excelsiorem cunctis gentibus, et cetera. Et huiusmodi dicuntur iustificationes, secundum quod Deus aliquos iuste punit vel praemiat. Ipsa autem agenda sub praecepto non cadunt nisi in quantum habent aliquam debiti rationem. Est autem duplex debitum, unum quidem secundum regulam rationis, aliud autem secundum regulam legis determinantis; sicut philosophus, in V Ethic., distinguit duplex iustum, scilicet morale et legale. Debitum autem morale est duplex, dictat enim ratio aliquid faciendum vel tanquam necessarium, sine quo non potest esse ordo virtutis; vel tanquam utile ad hoc quod ordo virtutis melius conservetur. Et secundum hoc, quaedam moralium praecise praecipiuntur vel prohibentur in lege, sicut, non occides, non furtum facies. Et haec proprie dicuntur praecepta. Quaedam vero praecipiuntur vel prohibentur, non quasi praecise debita, sed propter melius. Et ista possunt dici mandata, quia quandam inductionem habent et persuasionem. Sicut illud Exod. XXII, si pignus acceperis vestimentum a proximo tuo, ante solis occasum reddas ei; et aliqua similia. Unde Hieronymus dicit quod in praeceptis est iustitia, in mandatis vero caritas. Debitum autem ex determinatione legis, in rebus quidem humanis pertinet ad iudicialia; in rebus autem divinis, ad caeremonialia. Quamvis etiam ea quae pertinent ad poenam vel praemia, dici possint testimonia, inquantum sunt protestationes quaedam divinae iustitiae. Omnia vero praecepta legis possunt dici iustificationes, inquantum sunt quaedam executiones legalis iustitiae. Possunt etiam aliter mandata a praeceptis distingui, ut praecepta dicantur quae Deus per seipsum iussit; mandata autem, quae per alios mandavit, ut ipsum nomen sonare videtur. Ex quibus omnibus apparet quod omnia legis praecepta continentur sub moralibus, caeremonialibus et iudicialibus, alia vero non habent rationem praeceptorum, sed ordinantur ad praeceptorum observationem, ut dictum est.

[37834] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 5 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod sola iustitia, inter alias virtutes, importat rationem debiti. Et ideo moralia intantum sunt lege determinabilia, inquantum pertinent ad iustitiam, cuius etiam quaedam pars est religio, ut Tullius dicit. Unde iustum legale non potest esse aliquod praeter caeremonialia et iudicialia praecepta.

[37835] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 5 ad 2

Ad alia patet responsio per ea quae dicta sunt.

Articulus 6

[37836] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 6 arg. 1

Ad sextum sic proceditur. Videtur quod lex vetus non debuerit inducere ad observantiam praeceptorum per temporales promissiones et comminationes. Intentio enim legis divinae est ut homines Deo subdat per timorem et amorem, unde dicitur Deut. X, et nunc, Israel, quid dominus Deus tuus petit a te, nisi ut timeas dominum Deum tuum, et ambules in viis eius, et diligas eum? Sed cupiditas rerum temporalium abducit a Deo, dicit enim Augustinus, in libro octoginta trium quaest., quod venenum caritatis est cupiditas. Ergo promissiones et comminationes temporales videntur contrariari intentioni legislatoris, quod facit legem reprobabilem, ut patet per philosophum, in II Polit.

[37837] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 6 arg. 2

Praeterea, lex divina est excellentior quam lex humana. Videmus autem in scientiis quod quanto aliqua est altior, tanto per altiora media procedit. Ergo cum lex humana procedat ad inducendum homines per temporales comminationes et promissiones, lex divina non debuit ex his procedere, sed per aliqua maiora.

[37838] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 6 arg. 3

Praeterea, illud non potest esse praemium iustitiae vel poena culpae, quod aequaliter evenit et bonis et malis. Sed sicut dicitur Eccle. IX, universa, temporalia, aequae eveniunt iusto et impio, bono et malo, mundo et immundo, immolanti victimas et sacrificia contemnenti. Ergo temporalia bona vel mala non convenienter ponuntur ut poenae vel praemia mandatorum legis divinae.

[37839] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 6 s. c.

Sed contra est quod dicitur Isaiae I, si volueritis, et audieritis me, bona terrae comedetis. Quod si nolueritis, et me ad iracundiam provocaveritis, gladius devorabit vos.

[37840] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 6 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod, sicut in scientiis speculativis inducuntur homines ad assentiendum conclusionibus per media syllogistica, ita etiam in quibuslibet legibus homines inducuntur ad observantias praeceptorum per poenas et praemia. Videmus autem in scientiis speculativis quod media proponuntur auditori secundum eius conditionem, unde oportet ordinate in scientiis procedere, ut ex notioribus disciplina incipiat. Ita etiam oportet eum qui vult inducere hominem ad observantiam praeceptorum, ut ex illis eum movere incipiat quae sunt in eius affectu, sicut pueri provocantur ad aliquid faciendum aliquibus puerilibus munusculis. Dictum est autem supra quod lex vetus disponebat ad Christum sicut imperfectum ad perfectum, unde dabatur populo adhuc imperfecto in comparatione ad perfectionem quae erat futura per Christum, et ideo populus ille comparatur puero sub paedagogo existenti, ut patet Galat. III. Perfectio autem hominis est ut, contemptis temporalibus, spiritualibus inhaereat, ut patet per illud quod apostolus dicit, Philipp. III, quae quidem retro sunt obliviscens, ad ea quae priora sunt me extendo. Quicumque ergo perfecti sumus, hoc sentiamus. Imperfectorum autem est quod temporalia bona desiderent, in ordine tamen ad Deum. Perversorum autem est quod in temporalibus bonis finem constituent. Unde legi veteri conveniebat ut per temporalia, quae erant in affectu hominum imperfectorum, manuduceret homines ad Deum.

[37841] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 6 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod cupiditas, qua homo constituit finem in temporalibus bonis, est caritatis venenum. Sed consecutio temporalium bonorum quae homo desiderat in ordine ad Deum, est quaedam via inducens imperfectos ad Dei amorem; secundum illud Psalmi XLVIII, confitebitur tibi cum benefeceris illi.

[37842] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 6 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod lex humana inducit homines ex temporalibus praemiis vel poenis per homines inducendis, lex vero divina ex praemiis vel poenis exhibendis per Deum. Et in hoc procedit per media altiora.

[37843] I^a-IIae q. 99 a. 6 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod, sicut patet historias veteris testamenti revolventi, communis status populi semper sub lege in prosperitate fuit, quandiu legem observabant; et statim declinantes a praeceptis legis, in multas adversitates incidebant. Sed aliquae personae particulares etiam iustitiam legis observantes, in aliquas adversitates incidebant, vel quia iam erant spirituales effecti, ut per hoc magis ab affectu temporalium abstraherentur, et eorum virtus probata redderetur; aut quia, opera legis exterius implentes, cor totum habebant in temporalibus defixum et a Deo elongatum, secundum quod dicitur Isaiae XXIX, populus hic labiis me honorat, cor autem eorum longe est a me.

Quaestio 100

Prooemium

[37844] I^a-IIae q. 100 pr.

Deinde considerandum est de singulis generibus praeceptorum veteris legis. Et primo, de praeceptis moralibus; secundo, de caeremonialibus; tertio, de iudicialibus. Circa primum quaeruntur duodecim. Primo, utrum omnia praecepta moralia veteris legis sint de lege naturae. Secundo, utrum praecepta moralia veteris legis sint de actibus omnium virtutum. Tertio, utrum omnia praecepta moralia veteris legis reducantur ad decem praecepta Decalogi. Quarto, de distinctione praeceptorum Decalogi.

Quinto, de numero eorum. Sexto, de ordine. Septimo, de modo tradendi ipsa. Octavo, utrum sint dispensabilia. Nono, utrum modus observandi virtutem cadat sub praecepto. Decimo, utrum modus caritatis cadat sub praecepto. Undecimo, de distinctione aliorum praeceptorum moralium. Duodecimo, utrum praecepta moralia veteris legis iustificent.

Articulus 1

[37845] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 1 arg. 1

Ad primum sic proceditur. Videtur quod non omnia praecepta moralia pertineant ad legem naturae. Dicitur enim Eccli. XVII, addidit illis disciplinam, et legem vitae haereditavit illos. Sed disciplina dividitur contra legem naturae, eo quod lex naturalis non addiscitur, sed ex naturali instinctu habetur. Ergo non omnia praecepta moralia sunt de lege naturae.

[37846] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 1 arg. 2

Praeterea, lex divina perfectior est quam lex humana. Sed lex humana superaddit aliqua ad bonos mores pertinentia his quae sunt de lege naturae, quod patet ex hoc quod lex naturae est eadem apud omnes, huiusmodi autem morum instituta sunt diversa apud diversos. Ergo multo fortius divina lex aliqua ad bonos mores pertinentia debuit addere supra legem naturae.

[37847] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 1 arg. 3

Praeterea, sicut ratio naturalis inducit ad aliquos bonos mores, ita et fides, unde etiam dicitur ad Galat. V, quod fides per dilectionem operatur. Sed fides non continetur sub lege naturae, quia ea quae sunt fidei, sunt supra rationem naturalem. Ergo non omnia praecepta moralia legis divinae pertinent ad legem naturae.

[37848] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 1 s. c.

Sed contra est quod dicit apostolus, Rom. II, quod gentes, quae legem non habent, naturaliter ea quae legis sunt, faciunt, quod oportet intelligi de his quae pertinent ad bonos mores. Ergo omnia moralia praecepta legis sunt de lege naturae.

[37849] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 1 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod praecepta moralia, a caeremonialibus et iudicialibus distincta, sunt de illis quae secundum se ad bonos mores pertinent. Cum autem humani mores dicantur in ordine ad rationem, quae est proprium principium humanorum actuum, illi mores dicuntur boni qui rationi congruunt, mali autem qui a ratione discordant. Sicut autem omne iudicium rationis speculativae procedit a naturali cognitione primorum principiorum, ita etiam omne iudicium rationis practicae procedit ex quibusdam principiis naturaliter cognitis, ut supra dictum est. Ex quibus diversimode procedi potest ad iudicandum de diversis. Quaedam enim sunt in humanis actibus adeo explicita quod statim, cum modica consideratione, possunt approbari vel reprobari per illa communia et prima principia. Quaedam vero sunt ad quorum iudicium requiritur multa consideratio diversarum circumstantiarum, quas considerare diligenter non est cuiuslibet, sed sapientum, sicut considerare particulares conclusiones scientiarum non pertinet ad omnes, sed ad solos philosophos. Quaedam vero sunt ad quae diiudicanda indiget homo adiuvari per instructionem divinam, sicut est circa credenda. Sic igitur patet quod, cum moralia praecepta sint de his quae pertinent ad bonos mores; haec autem sunt quae rationi congruunt; omne autem rationis humanae iudicium aliquo modo a naturali ratione derivatur, necesse est quod omnia praecepta moralia pertineant ad legem naturae, sed diversimode. Quaedam enim sunt quae statim per se ratio naturalis cuiuslibet hominis diiudicat esse facienda vel non facienda, sicut honora patrem tuum et matrem tuam, et, non occides, non furtum facies. Et huiusmodi sunt absolute de lege naturae. Quaedam vero sunt quae subtiliori consideratione rationis a sapientibus iudicantur esse observanda. Et ista sic sunt de lege naturae, ut tamen indigeant disciplina, qua minores a sapientioribus instruuntur, sicut illud, coram cano capite consurge, et honora personam senis, et alia huiusmodi. Quaedam vero sunt ad quae iudicanda ratio humana indiget instructione divina, per quam erudimur de divinis, sicut est illud, non facies tibi sculptile neque omnem similitudinem; non assumes nomen Dei tui in vanum.

[37850] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 1 ad arg.

Et per hoc patet responsio ad obiecta.

Articulus 2

[37851] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 2 arg. 1

Ad secundum sic proceditur. Videtur quod praecepta moralia legis non sint de omnibus actibus virtutum. Observatio enim praeceptorum veteris legis iustificatio nominatur, secundum illud Psalmi CXVIII, iustificationes tuas custodiam. Sed iustificatio est executio iustitiae. Ergo praecepta moralia non sunt nisi de actibus iustitiae.

[37852] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 2 arg. 2

Praeterea, id quod cadit sub praecepto, habet rationem debiti. Sed ratio debiti non pertinet ad alias virtutes nisi ad solam iustitiam, cuius proprius actus est reddere unicuique debitum. Ergo praecepta legis moralia non sunt de actibus aliarum virtutum, sed solum de actibus iustitiae.

[37853] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 2 arg. 3

Praeterea, omnis lex ponitur propter bonum commune, ut dicit Isidorus. Sed inter virtutes sola iustitia respicit bonum commune, ut philosophus dicit, in V Ethic. Ergo praecepta moralia sunt solum de actibus iustitiae.

[37854] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 2 s. c.

Sed contra est quod Ambrosius dicit, quod peccatum est transgressio legis divinae, et caelestium inobedientia mandatorum. Sed peccata contrariantur omnibus actibus virtutum. Ergo lex divina habet ordinare de actibus omnium virtutum.

[37855] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 2 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod, cum praecepta legis ordinentur ad bonum commune, sicut supra habitum est, necesse est quod praecepta legis diversificentur secundum diversos modos communitatum, unde et philosophus, in sua politica, docet quod alias leges oportet statuere in civitate quae regitur rege, et alias in ea quae regitur per populum, vel per aliquos potentes de civitate. Est autem alius modus communitatis ad quam ordinatur lex humana, et ad quam ordinatur lex divina. Lex enim humana ordinatur ad communitatem civilem, quae est hominum ad invicem. Homines autem ordinantur ad invicem per exteriores actus, quibus homines sibi invicem communicant. Huiusmodi autem communicatio pertinet ad rationem iustitiae, quae est proprie directiva communitatis humanae. Et ideo lex humana non proponit praecepta nisi de actibus iustitiae; et si praecipiat actus aliarum virtutum, hoc non est nisi in quantum assumunt rationem iustitiae; ut patet per philosophum, in

V Ethic. Sed communitas ad quam ordinat lex divina, est hominum ad Deum, vel in praesenti vel in futura vita. Et ideo lex divina praecepta proponit de omnibus illis per quae homines bene ordinantur ad communicationem cum Deo. Homo autem Deo coniungitur ratione, sive mente, in qua est Dei imago. Et ideo lex divina praecepta proponit de omnibus illis per quae ratio hominis est bene ordinata. Hoc autem contingit per actus omnium virtutum, nam virtutes intellectuales ordinant bene actus rationis in seipsis; virtutes autem morales ordinant bene actus rationis circa interiores passiones et exteriores operationes. Et ideo manifestum est quod lex divina convenienter proponit praecepta de actibus omnium virtutum, ita tamen quod quaedam, sine quibus ordo virtutis, qui est ordo rationis, observari non potest, cadunt sub obligatione praecepti; quaedam vero, quae pertinent ad bene esse virtutis perfectae, cadunt sub admonitione consilii.

[37856] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 2 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod adimpletio mandatorum legis etiam quae sunt de actibus aliarum virtutum, habet rationem iustificationis, inquantum iustum est ut homo obediat Deo. Vel etiam inquantum iustum est quod omnia quae sunt hominis, rationi subdantur.

[37857] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 2 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod iustitia proprie dicta attendit debitum unius hominis ad alium, sed in omnibus aliis virtutibus attenditur debitum inferiorum virium ad rationem. Et secundum rationem huius debiti, philosophus assignat, in V Ethic., quandam iustitiam metaphoricam.

[37858] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 2 ad 3

Ad tertium patet responsio per ea quae dicta sunt de diversitate communitatis.

Articulus 3

[37859] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 3 arg. 1

Ad tertium sic proceditur. Videtur quod non omnia praecepta moralia veteris legis reducantur ad decem praecepta Decalogi. Prima enim et principalia legis praecepta sunt, diliges dominum Deum tuum, et, diliges proximum tuum, ut habetur Matth. XXII. Sed ista duo non continentur in praeceptis Decalogi. Ergo non omnia praecepta moralia continentur in praeceptis Decalogi.

[37860] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 3 arg. 2

Praeterea, praecepta moralia non reducuntur ad praecepta caeremonialia, sed potius e converso. Sed inter praecepta Decalogi est unum caeremoniale, scilicet, memento ut diem sabbati sanctifices. Ergo praecepta moralia non reducuntur ad omnia praecepta Decalogi.

[37861] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 3 arg. 3

Praeterea, praecepta moralia sunt de omnibus actibus virtutum. Sed inter praecepta Decalogi ponuntur sola praecepta pertinentia ad actus iustitiae; ut patet discurrenti per singula. Ergo praecepta Decalogi non continent omnia praecepta moralia.

[37862] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 3 s. c.

Sed contra est quod, Matth. V, super illud, beati estis cum maledixerint etc., dicit Glossa quod Moyses, decem praecepta proponens, postea per partes explicat. Ergo omnia praecepta legis sunt quaedam partes praeceptorum Decalogi.

[37863] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 3 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod praecepta Decalogi ab aliis praeceptis legis differunt in hoc, quod praecepta Decalogi per seipsum Deus dicitur populo proposuisse; alia vero praecepta proposuit populo per Moysen. Illa ergo praecepta ad Decalogum pertinent, quorum notitiam homo habet per seipsum a Deo. Huiusmodi vero sunt illa quae statim ex principiis communibus primis cognosci possunt modica consideratione, et iterum illa quae statim ex fide divinitus infusa innotescunt. Inter praecepta ergo Decalogi non computantur duo genera praeceptorum, illa scilicet quae sunt prima et communia, quorum non oportet aliam editionem esse nisi quod sunt scripta in ratione naturali quasi per se nota, sicut quod nulli debet homo malefacere, et alia huiusmodi; et iterum illa quae per diligentem inquisitionem sapientum inveniuntur rationi convenire, haec enim proveniunt a Deo ad populum mediante disciplina sapientum. Utraque tamen horum praeceptorum continentur in praeceptis Decalogi, sed diversimode. Nam illa quae sunt prima et communia, continentur in eis sicut principia in conclusionibus proximis, illa vero quae per sapientes cognoscuntur, continentur in eis, e converso, sicut conclusiones in principiis.

[37864] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 3 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod illa duo praecepta sunt prima et communia praecepta legis naturae, quae sunt per se nota rationi humanae, vel per naturam vel per fidem. Et ideo omnia praecepta Decalogi ad illa duo referuntur sicut conclusiones ad principia communia.

[37865] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 3 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod praeceptum de observatione sabbati est secundum aliquid morale, inquantum scilicet per hoc praecipitur quod homo aliquo tempore vacet rebus divinis; secundum illud Psalmi XLV, vacate, et videte quoniam ego sum Deus. Et secundum hoc, inter praecepta Decalogi computatur. Non autem quantum ad taxationem temporis, quia secundum hoc est caeremoniale.

[37866] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 3 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod ratio debiti in aliis virtutibus est magis latens quam in iustitia. Et ideo praecepta de actibus aliarum virtutum non sunt ita nota populo sicut praecepta de actibus iustitiae. Et propter hoc actus iustitiae specialiter cadunt sub praeceptis Decalogi, quae sunt prima legis elementa.

Articulus 4

[37867] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 4 arg. 1

Ad quartum sic proceditur. Videtur quod inconvenienter praecepta Decalogi distinguantur. Latria enim est alia virtus a fide. Sed praecepta dantur de actibus virtutum. Sed hoc quod dicitur in principio Decalogi, non habebis deos alienos coram me, pertinet ad fidem, quod autem subditur, non facies sculptile etc., pertinet ad latriam. Ergo sunt duo praecepta, et non unum, sicut Augustinus dicit.

[37868] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 4 arg. 2

Praeterea, praecepta affirmativa in lege distinguuntur a negativis, sicut, honora patrem et matrem, et, non occides. Sed hoc quod dicitur, ego sum dominus Deus tuus, est affirmativum, quod autem subditur, non habebis deos alienos coram me, est negativum. Ergo sunt duo praecepta, et non continentur sub uno, ut Augustinus ponit.

Praeterea, apostolus, ad Rom. VII, dicit, concupiscentiam nesciebam, nisi lex diceret, non concupisces. Et sic videtur quod hoc praeceptum, non concupisces, sit unum praeceptum. Non ergo debet distinguui in duo.

Sed contra est auctoritas Augustini, in Glossa super Exod., ubi ponit tria praecepta pertinentia ad Deum, et septem ad proximum.

Respondeo dicendum quod praecepta Decalogi diversimode a diversis distinguuntur. Hesychius enim, Levit. XXVI, super illud, decem mulieres in uno clibano coquunt panes, dicit praeceptum de observatione sabbati non esse de decem praeceptis, quia non est observandum, secundum litteram, secundum omne tempus. Distinguit tamen quatuor praecepta pertinentia ad Deum, ut primum sit, ego sum dominus Deus tuus; secundum sit, non habebis deos alienos coram me (et sic etiam distinguit haec duo Hieronymus, Osee X, super illud, propter duas iniquitates tuas); tertium vero praeceptum esse dicit, non facies tibi sculptile; quartum vero, non assumes nomen Dei tui in vanum. Pertinentia vero ad proximum dicit esse sex, ut primum sit, honora patrem tuum et matrem tuam; secundum, non occides; tertium, non moechaberis; quartum, non furtum facies; quintum, non falsum testimonium dices; sextum, non concupisces. Sed primo hoc videtur inconueniens, quod praeceptum de observatione sabbati praeceptis Decalogi interponatur, si nullo modo ad Decalogum pertineat. Secundo quia, cum scriptum sit Matth. VI, nemo potest duobus dominis servire, eiusdem rationis esse videtur, et sub eodem praecepto cadere, ego sum dominus Deus tuus, et, non habebis deos alienos. Unde Origenes, distinguens etiam quatuor praecepta ordinantia ad Deum, ponit ista duo pro uno praecepto; secundum vero ponit, non facies sculptile; tertium, non assumes nomen Dei tui in vanum; quartum, memento ut diem sabbati sanctifices. Alia vero sex ponit sicut Hesychius. Sed quia facere sculptile vel similitudinem non est prohibitum nisi secundum hoc, ut non colantur pro diis (nam et in tabernaculo Deus praecepit fieri imaginem Seraphim, ut habetur Exod. XXV); convenientius Augustinus ponit sub uno praecepto, non habebis deos alienos, et, non facies sculptile. Similiter etiam concupiscentia uxoris alienae ad commixtionem, pertinet ad concupiscentiam carnis; concupiscentiae autem aliarum rerum, quae desiderantur ad possidendum, pertinent ad concupiscentiam oculorum; unde etiam Augustinus ponit duo praecepta de non concupiscendo rem alienam, et uxorem alienam. Et sic ponit tria praecepta in ordine ad Deum, et septem in ordine ad proximum. Et hoc melius est.

[37872] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 4 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod latria non est nisi quaedam protestatio fidei, unde non sunt alia praecepta danda de latria, et alia de fide. Potius tamen sunt danda de latria quam de fide, quia praeceptum fidei praesupponitur ad praecepta Decalogi, sicut praeceptum dilectionis. Sicut enim prima praecepta communia legis naturae sunt per se nota habenti rationem naturalem, et promulgatione non indigent; ita etiam et hoc quod est credere in Deum, est primum et per se notum ei qui habet fidem, accedentem enim ad Deum oportet credere quia est, ut dicitur ad Heb. XI. Et ideo non indiget alia promulgatione nisi infusione fidei.

[37873] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 4 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod praecepta affirmativa distinguuntur a negativis, quando unum non comprehenditur in alio, sicut in honoratione parentum non includitur quod nullus homo occidatur, nec e converso. Sed quando affirmativum comprehenditur in negativo vel e converso, non dantur super hoc diversa praecepta, sicut non datur aliud praeceptum de hoc quod est, non furtum facies, et de hoc quod est conservare rem alienam, vel restituere eam. Et eadem ratione non sunt diversa praecepta de credendo in Deum, et de hoc quod non credatur in alienos deos.

[37874] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 4 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod omnis concupiscentia convenit in una communi ratione, et ideo apostolus singulariter de mandato concupiscendi loquitur. Quia tamen in speciali diversae sunt rationes concupiscendi, ideo Augustinus distinguit diversa praecepta de non concupiscendo, differunt enim specie concupiscentiae secundum diversitatem actionum vel concupiscibilium, ut philosophus dicit, in X Ethic.

[37875] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 5 arg. 1

Ad quintum sic proceditur. Videtur quod inconvenienter praecepta Decalogi enumerentur. Peccatum enim, ut Ambrosius dicit, est transgressio legis divinae, et caelestium inobedientia mandatorum. Sed peccata distinguuntur per hoc quod homo peccat vel in Deum, vel in proximum, vel in seipsum. Cum igitur in praeceptis Decalogi non ponantur aliqua praecepta ordinantia hominem ad seipsum, sed solum ordinantia ipsum ad Deum et proximum; videtur quod insufficiens sit enumeratio praeceptorum Decalogi.

[37876] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 5 arg. 2

Praeterea, sicut ad cultum Dei pertinebat observatio sabbati, ita etiam observatio aliarum solemnitatum, et immolatio sacrificiorum. Sed inter praecepta Decalogi est unum pertinens ad observantiam sabbati. Ergo etiam debent esse aliqua pertinentia ad alias solemnitates, et ad ritum sacrificiorum.

[37877] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 5 arg. 3

Praeterea, sicut contra Deum peccare contingit periurando, ita etiam blasphemando, vel alias contra doctrinam divinam mentiendo. Sed ponitur unum praeceptum prohibens periurium, cum dicitur, non assumes nomen Dei tui in vanum. Ergo peccatum blasphemiae, et falsae doctrinae, debent aliquo praecepto Decalogi prohiberi.

[37878] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 5 arg. 4

Praeterea, sicut homo naturalem dilectionem habet ad parentes, ita etiam ad filios. Mandatum etiam caritatis ad omnes proximos extenditur. Sed praecepta Decalogi ordinantur ad caritatem; secundum illud I Tim. I, finis praecepti caritas est. Ergo sicut ponitur quoddam praeceptum pertinens ad parentes, ita etiam debuerunt poni aliqua praecepta pertinentia ad filios et ad alios proximos.

[37879] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 5 arg. 5

Praeterea, in quolibet genere peccati contingit peccare corde et opere. Sed in quibusdam generibus peccatorum, scilicet in furto et adulterio, seorsum prohibetur peccatum operis, cum dicitur, non moechaberis, non furtum facies; et seorsum peccatum cordis, cum dicitur, non concupisces rem proximi tui, et, non concupisces uxorem proximi tui. Ergo etiam idem debuit poni in peccato homicidii et falsi testimonii.

[37880] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 5 arg. 6

Praeterea, sicut contingit peccatum provenire ex inordinatione concupiscibilis, ita etiam ex inordinatione irascibilis. Sed quibusdam praeceptis prohibetur inordinata concupiscentia, cum dicitur, non concupisces. Ergo etiam aliqua praecepta in Decalogo debuerunt poni per quae prohiberetur inordinatio irascibilis. Non ergo videtur quod convenienter decem praecepta Decalogi enumerentur.

[37881] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 5 s. c.

Sed contra est quod dicitur Deut. IV, ostendit vobis pactum suum, quod praecepit ut faceretis; et decem verba quae scripsit in duabus tabulis lapideis.

[37882] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 5 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod, sicut supra dictum est, sicut praecepta legis humanae ordinant hominem ad communitatem humanam, ita praecepta legis divinae ordinant hominem ad quandam communitatem seu rempublicam hominum sub Deo. Ad hoc autem quod aliquis in aliqua communitate bene commoretur, duo requiruntur, quorum primum est ut bene se habeat ad eum qui praeesst communitati; aliud autem est ut homo bene se habeat ad alios communitatis consocios et comparticipes. Oportet igitur quod in lege divina primo ferantur quaedam praecepta ordinantia hominem ad Deum; et deinde alia praecepta ordinantia hominem ad alios proximos simul conviventes sub Deo. Principi autem communitatis tria debet homo, primo quidem, fidelitatem; secundo, reverentiam; tertio, famulatum. Fidelitas quidem ad dominum in hoc consistit, ut honorem principatus ad alium non deferat. Et quantum ad hoc accipitur primum praeceptum, cum dicitur, non habebis deos alienos. Reverentia autem ad dominum requiritur ut nihil iniuriosum in eum committatur. Et quantum ad hoc accipitur secundum praeceptum, quod est, non assumes nomen domini Dei tui in vanum. Famulatus autem debetur domino in recompensationem beneficiorum quae ab ipso percipiunt subditi. Et ad hoc pertinet tertium praeceptum, de sanctificatione sabbati in memoriam creationis rerum. Ad proximos autem aliquis bene se habet et specialiter, et generaliter. Specialiter quidem, quantum ad illos quorum est debitor, ut eis debitum reddat. Et quantum ad hoc accipitur praeceptum de honoratione parentum. Generaliter autem, quantum ad omnes, ut nulli nocumentum inferatur, neque opere neque ore neque corde. Opere quidem infertur nocumentum proximo, quandoque quidem in personam propriam, quantum ad consistentiam scilicet personae. Et hoc prohibetur per hoc quod dicitur, non occides. Quandoque autem in personam coniunctam quantum ad propagationem prolis. Et hoc prohibetur cum dicitur, non moechaberis. Quandoque autem in rem possessam, quae ordinatur ad utrumque. Et quantum ad hoc dicitur, non furtum facies. Nocumentum autem oris prohibetur cum dicitur, non loqueris contra proximum tuum falsum testimonium. Nocumentum autem cordis prohibetur cum dicitur, non concupisces. Et secundum hanc etiam differentiam possent distingui tria praecepta ordinantia in Deum. Quorum primum pertinet ad opus, unde ibi dicitur, non facies sculptile. Secundum ad os, unde dicitur, non assumes nomen Dei tui in vanum. Tertium pertinet ad cor, quia in sanctificatione sabbati, secundum quod est morale praeceptum, praecipitur quies cordis in Deum. Vel, secundum Augustinum, per primum praeceptum reveremur unitatem primi principii; per secundum, veritatem divinam; per tertium, eius bonitatem, qua sanctificamur, et in qua quiescimus sicut in fine.

[37883] I^a-II^ae q. 100 a. 5 ad 1

Ad primum ergo potest responderi dupliciter. Primo quidem, quia praecepta Decalogi referuntur ad praecepta dilectionis. Fuit autem dandum praeceptum homini de dilectione Dei et proximi, quia quantum ad hoc lex naturalis obscurata erat propter peccatum, non autem quantum ad dilectionem sui ipsius, quia quantum ad hoc lex naturalis vigeat. Vel quia etiam dilectio sui ipsius includitur in dilectione Dei et proximi, in hoc enim homo vere se diligit, quod se ordinat in Deum. Et ideo etiam in praeceptis Decalogi ponuntur solum praecepta pertinentia ad proximum et ad Deum. Aliter potest dici quod praecepta Decalogi sunt illa quae immediate populus recepit a Deo, unde dicitur Deut. X, scripsit in tabulis, iuxta id quod prius scripserat, verba decem, quae locutus est ad vos dominus. Unde oportet praecepta Decalogi talia esse quae statim in mente populi cadere possunt. Praeceptum autem habet rationem debiti. Quod autem homo ex necessitate debeat aliquid Deo vel proximo, hoc de facili cadit in conceptione hominis, et praecipue fidelis. Sed quod aliquid ex necessitate sit debitum homini de his quae pertinent ad seipsum et non ad alium, hoc non ita in promptu apparet, videtur enim primo aspectu quod quilibet sit liber in his quae ad ipsum pertinent. Et ideo praecepta quibus prohibentur inordinationes hominis ad seipsum, perveniunt ad populum mediante instructione sapientum. Unde non pertinent ad Decalogum.

[37884] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 5 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod omnes solemnitates legis veteris sunt institutae in commemorationem alicuius divini beneficii vel praeteriti commemorati, vel futuri praefigurati. Et similiter propter hoc omnia sacrificia offerebantur. Inter omnia autem beneficia Dei commemoranda, primum et praecipuum erat beneficium creationis, quod commemoratur in sanctificatione sabbati, unde Exod. XX pro ratione huius praecepti ponitur, sex enim diebus fecit Deus caelum et terram et cetera. Inter omnia autem futura beneficia, quae erant praefiguranda, praecipuum et finale erat quies mentis in Deo, vel in praesenti per gratiam, vel in futuro per gloriam, quae etiam figurabatur per observantiam sabbati; unde dicitur Isaiae LVIII, si averteris a sabbato pedem tuum, facere voluntatem tuam in die sancto meo, et vocaveris sabbatum delicatum, et sanctum domini gloriosum. Haec enim beneficia primo et principaliter sunt in mente hominum, maxime fidelium. Aliae vero solemnitates celebrantur propter aliqua particularia beneficia temporaliter transeuntia, sicut celebratio phase propter beneficium praeteritae liberationis ex Aegypto, et propter futuram passionem Christi, quae temporaliter transivit, inducens nos in quietem sabbati spiritualis. Et ideo, praetermissis omnibus aliis solemnitatibus et sacrificiis, de solo sabbato fiebat mentio inter praecepta Decalogi.

[37885] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 5 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod, sicut apostolus dicit, ad Heb. VI, homines per maiorem sui iurant, et omnis controversiae eorum finis ad confirmationem est iuramentum. Et ideo, quia iuramentum est omnibus commune, propter hoc prohibitio inordinationis circa iuramentum, specialiter praecepto Decalogi prohibetur. Peccatum vero falsae doctrinae non pertinet nisi ad paucos, unde non oportebat ut de hoc fieret mentio inter praecepta Decalogi. Quamvis etiam, quantum ad aliquem intellectum, in hoc quod dicitur, non assumes nomen Dei tui in vanum, prohibeatur falsitas doctrinae, una enim Glossa exponit, non dices Christum esse creaturam.

[37886] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 5 ad 4

Ad quartum dicendum quod statim ratio naturalis homini dictat quod nulli iniuriam faciat, et ideo praecepta prohibentia nocumentum, extendunt se ad omnes. Sed ratio naturalis non statim dictat quod aliquid sit pro alio faciendum, nisi cui homo aliquid debet. Debitum autem filii ad patrem adeo est manifestum quod nulla tergiversatione potest negari, eo quod pater est principium generationis et esse, et insuper educationis et doctrinae. Et ideo non ponitur sub praecepto Decalogi ut aliquod beneficium vel obsequium alicui impendatur nisi parentibus. Parentes autem non videntur esse debitores filiis propter aliqua beneficia suscepta, sed potius e converso. Filius etiam est aliquid patris; et patres amant filios ut aliquid ipsorum, sicut dicit philosophus, in VIII Ethic. Unde eisdem rationibus non ponuntur aliqua praecepta Decalogi pertinentia ad amorem filiorum, sicut neque etiam aliqua ordinantia hominem ad seipsum.

[37887] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 5 ad 5

Ad quintum dicendum quod delectatio adulterii, et utilitas divitiarum, sunt propter seipsa appetibilia, inquantum habent rationem boni delectabilis vel utilis. Et propter hoc oportuit in eis prohiberi non solum opus, sed etiam concupiscentiam. Sed homicidium et falsitas sunt secundum seipsa horribilia, quia proximus et veritas naturaliter amantur, et non desiderantur nisi propter aliud. Et ideo non oportuit circa peccatum homicidii et falsi testimonii prohibere peccatum cordis, sed solum operis.

[37888] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 5 ad 6

Ad sextum dicendum quod, sicut supra dictum est, omnes passiones irascibilis derivantur a passionibus concupiscibilis. Et ideo in praeceptis Decalogi, quae sunt quasi prima elementa legis, non erat mentio facienda de passionibus irascibilis, sed solum de passionibus concupiscibilis.

Articulus 6

Ad sextum sic proceditur. Videtur quod inconvenienter ordinentur decem praecepta Decalogi. Dilectio enim proximi videtur esse praevia ad dilectionem Dei, quia proximus est nobis magis notus quam Deus; secundum illud I Ioan. IV, qui fratrem suum, quem videt, non diligit, Deum, quem non videt, quomodo potest diligere? Sed tria prima praecepta pertinent ad dilectionem Dei, septem vero alia ad dilectionem proximi. Ergo inconvenienter praecepta Decalogi ordinantur.

Praeterea, per praecepta affirmativa imperantur actus virtutum, per praecepta vero negativa prohibentur actus vitiorum. Sed secundum Boetium, in commento praedicamentorum, prius sunt extirpanda vitia quam inserantur virtutes. Ergo inter praecepta pertinentia ad proximum, primo ponenda fuerunt praecepta negativa quam affirmativa.

Praeterea, praecepta legis dantur de actibus hominum. Sed prior est actus cordis quam oris vel exterioris operis. Ergo inconvenienti ordine praecepta de non concupiscendo, quae pertinent ad cor, ultimo ponuntur.

Sed contra est quod apostolus dicit, Rom. XIII, quae a Deo sunt, ordinata sunt. Sed praecepta Decalogi sunt immediate data a Deo, ut dictum est. Ergo convenientem ordinem habent.

Respondeo dicendum quod, sicut dictum est, praecepta Decalogi dantur de his quae statim in promptu mens hominis suscipit. Manifestum est autem quod tanto aliquid magis a ratione suscipitur, quanto contrarium est gravius et magis rationi repugnans. Manifestum est autem quod, cum rationis ordo a fine incipiat, maxime est contra rationem ut homo inordinate se habeat circa finem. Finis autem humanae vitae et societatis est Deus. Et ideo primo oportuit per praecepta Decalogi hominem ordinare ad Deum, cum eius contrarium sit gravissimum. Sicut etiam in exercitu, qui ordinatur ad ducem sicut ad finem, primum est quod miles subdatur duci, et huius contrarium est gravissimum; secundum vero est ut aliis coordinetur. Inter ipsa autem per quae ordinamur in Deum, primum occurrit quod homo fideliter ei subdatur, nullam participationem cum inimicis habens. Secundum autem est quod ei reverentiam exhibeat. Tertium autem est quod etiam famulatum impendat. Maiusque peccatum est in exercitu si miles, infideliter agens, cum hoste pactum habeat, quam si aliquam irreverentiam faciat duci, et hoc est etiam gravius quam si in aliquo obsequio ducis deficiens inveniatur. In praeceptis autem ordinantibus ad proximum, manifestum est quod magis repugnat rationi, et gravius peccatum est, si homo non servet ordinem debitum ad personas quibus magis est debitor. Et ideo inter praecepta ordinantia ad proximum, primo ponitur praeceptum pertinens ad parentes. Inter alia vero praecepta etiam apparet ordo secundum ordinem gravitatis peccatorum. Gravius est enim, et magis rationi repugnans, peccare opere quam ore, et ore quam corde. Et inter peccata operis, gravius est homicidium, per quod tollitur vita hominis iam existentis, quam adulterium, per quod impeditur certitudo prolis nasciturae; et adulterium gravius quam furtum, quod pertinet ad bona exteriora.

[37894] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 6 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod, quamvis secundum viam sensus proximus sit magis notus quam Deus, tamen dilectio Dei est ratio dilectionis proximi, ut infra patebit. Et ideo praecepta ordinantia ad Deum, fuerunt praeordinanda.

[37895] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 6 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod, sicut Deus est universale principium essendi omnibus, ita etiam pater est principium quoddam essendi filio. Et ideo convenienter post praecepta pertinentia ad Deum, ponitur praeceptum pertinens ad parentes. Ratio autem procedit quando affirmativa et negativa pertinent ad idem genus operis. Quamvis etiam et in hoc non habeat omnimodam efficaciam. Etsi enim in executione operis, prius extirpanda sint vitia quam inserendae virtutes, secundum illud Psalmi XXXIII, declina a malo, et fac bonum, et Isaiae I, quiescite agere perverse, discite benefacere; tamen in cognitione prior est virtus quam peccatum, quia per rectum cognoscitur obliquum, ut dicitur in I de anima. Per legem autem cognitio peccati, ut Rom. III dicitur. Et secundum hoc, praeceptum affirmativum debuisset primo poni. Sed non est ista ratio ordinis, sed quae supra posita est. Quia in praeceptis pertinentibus ad Deum, quae sunt primae tabulae, ultimo ponitur praeceptum affirmativum, quia eius transgressio minorem reatum inducit.

[37896] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 6 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod peccatum cordis etsi sit prius in executione, tamen eius prohibitio posterius cadit in ratione.

Articulus 7

[37897] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 7 arg. 1

Ad septimum sic proceditur. Videtur quod praecepta Decalogi inconvenienter tradantur. Praecepta enim affirmativa ordinant ad actus virtutum, praecepta autem negativa abstrahunt ab actibus vitiorum. Sed circa quamlibet materiam opponuntur sibi virtutes et vitia. Ergo in qualibet materia de qua ordinat praeceptum Decalogi, debuit poni praeceptum affirmativum et negativum. Inconvenienter igitur ponuntur quaedam affirmativa et quaedam negativa.

[37898] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 7 arg. 2

Praeterea, Isidorus dicit quod omnis lex ratione constat. Sed omnia praecepta Decalogi pertinent ad legem divinam. Ergo in omnibus debuit ratio assignari, et non solum in primo et tertio praecepto.

[37899] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 7 arg. 3

Praeterea, per observantiam praeceptorum meretur aliquis praemia a Deo. Sed divinae promissiones sunt de praemiis praeceptorum. Ergo promissio debuit poni in omnibus praeceptis, et non solum in primo et quarto.

[37900] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 7 arg. 4

Praeterea, lex vetus dicitur lex timoris, in quantum per comminationes poenarum inducebat ad observationes praeceptorum. Sed omnia praecepta Decalogi pertinent ad legem veterem. Ergo in omnibus debuit poni comminatio poenae, et non solum in primo et secundo.

[37901] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 7 arg. 5

Praeterea, omnia praecepta Dei sunt in memoria retinenda, dicitur enim Prov. III, describe ea in tabulis cordis tui. Inconvenienter ergo in solo tertio praecepto fit mentio de memoria. Et ita videntur praecepta Decalogi inconvenienter tradita esse.

[37902] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 7 s. c.

Sed contra est quod dicitur Sap. XI, quod Deus omnia fecit in numero, pondere et mensura. Multo magis ergo in praeceptis suae legis congruum modum tradendi servavit.

[37903] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 7 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod in praeceptis divinae legis maxima sapientia continetur, unde dicitur Deut. IV, haec est vestra sapientia et intellectus coram populis. Sapientis autem est omnia debito modo et ordine disponere. Et ideo manifestum esse debet quod praecepta legis convenienti modo sunt tradita.

[37904] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 7 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod semper ad affirmationem sequitur negatio oppositi, non autem semper ad negationem unius oppositi sequitur affirmatio alterius. Sequitur enim, si est album, non est nigrum, non tamen sequitur, si non est nigrum, ergo est album, quia ad plura sese extendit negatio quam affirmatio. Et inde est etiam quod non esse faciendum iniuriam, quod pertinet ad praecepta negativa, ad plures personas se extendit, secundum primum dictamen rationis, quam esse debitum ut alicui obsequium vel beneficium impendatur. Inest autem primo dictamen rationis quod homo debitor est beneficii vel obsequii exhibendi illis a quibus beneficia accepit, si nondum recompensavit. Duo autem sunt quorum beneficiis sufficienter nullus recompensare potest, scilicet Deus et pater, ut dicitur in VIII Ethic. Et ideo sola duo praecepta affirmativa ponuntur, unum de honoratione parentum; aliud de celebratione sabbati in commemorationem divini beneficii.

[37905] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 7 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod illa praecepta quae sunt pure moralia, habent manifestam rationem, unde non oportuit quod in eis aliqua ratio adderetur. Sed quibusdam praeceptis additur caeremoniale, vel determinativum praecepti moralis communis, sicut in primo praecepto, non facies sculptile; et in tertio praecepto determinatur dies sabbati. Et ideo utrobique oportuit rationem assignari.

[37906] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 7 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod homines ut plurimum actus suos ad aliquam utilitatem ordinant. Et ideo in illis praeceptis necesse fuit promissionem praemii apponere, ex quibus videbatur nulla utilitas sequi, vel aliqua utilitas impediri. Quia vero parentes sunt iam in recedendo, ab eis non expectatur utilitas. Et ideo praecepto de honore parentum additur promissio. Similiter etiam praecepto de prohibitione idololatriae, quia per hoc videbatur impediri apparens utilitas quam homines credunt se posse consequi per pactum cum Daemonibus initum.

[37907] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 7 ad 4

Ad quartum dicendum quod poenae praecipue necessariae sunt contra illos qui sunt proni ad malum, ut dicitur in X Ethic. Et ideo illis solis praeceptis legis additur comminatio poenarum, in quibus erat pronitas ad malum. Erant autem homines proni ad idololatriam, propter generalem consuetudinem gentium. Et similiter sunt etiam homines proni ad periurium, propter frequentiam iuramenti. Et ideo primis duobus praeceptis adiungitur comminatio.

[37908] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 7 ad 5

Ad quintum dicendum quod praeceptum de sabbato ponitur ut commemorativum beneficii praeteriti. Et ideo specialiter in eo fit mentio de memoria. Vel quia praeceptum de sabbato habet determinationem adiunctam quae non est de lege naturae; et ideo hoc praeceptum speciali admonitione indiguit.

Articulus 8

[37909] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 8 arg. 1

Ad octavum sic proceditur. Videtur quod praecepta Decalogi sint dispensabilia. Praecepta enim Decalogi sunt de iure naturali. Sed iustum naturale in aliquibus deficit, et mutabile est, sicut et natura humana, ut philosophus dicit, in V Ethic. Defectus autem legis in aliquibus particularibus casibus est ratio dispensandi, ut supra dictum est. Ergo in praeceptis Decalogi potest fieri dispensatio.

[37910] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 8 arg. 2

Praeterea, sicut se habet homo ad legem humanam, ita se habet Deus ad legem datam divinitus. Sed homo potest dispensare in praeceptis legis quae homo statuit. Ergo, cum praecepta Decalogi sint instituta a Deo, videtur quod Deus in eis possit dispensare. Sed praelati vice Dei funguntur in terris, dicit enim apostolus, II ad Cor. II, nam et ego, si quid donavi, propter vos donavi in persona Christi. Ergo etiam praelati possunt in praeceptis Decalogi dispensare.

[37911] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 8 arg. 3

Praeterea, inter praecepta Decalogi continetur prohibitio homicidii. Sed in isto praecepto videtur dispensari per homines, puta cum, secundum praeceptum legis humanae, homines licite occiduntur, puta malefactores vel hostes. Ergo praecepta Decalogi sunt dispensabilia.

[37912] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 8 arg. 4

Praeterea, observatio sabbati continetur inter praecepta Decalogi. Sed in hoc praecepto fuit dispensatum, dicitur enim I Machab. II, et cogitaverunt in die illa dicentes, omnis homo quicumque venerit ad nos in bello die sabbatorum, pugnemus adversus eum. Ergo praecepta Decalogi sunt dispensabilia.

[37913] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 8 s. c.

Sed contra est quod dicitur Isaiae XXIV, quidam reprehenduntur de hoc quod mutaverunt ius, dissipaverunt foedus sempiternum, quod maxime videtur intelligendum de praeceptis Decalogi. Ergo praecepta Decalogi mutari per dispensationem non possunt.

[37914] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 8 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod, sicut supra dictum est, tunc in praeceptis debet fieri dispensatio, quando occurrit aliquis particularis casus in quo, si verbum legis observetur, contrariatur intentioni legislatoris. Intentio autem legislatoris cuiuslibet ordinatur primo quidem et principaliter ad bonum commune; secundo autem, ad ordinem iustitiae et virtutis, secundum quem bonum commune conservatur, et ad ipsum pervenitur. Si qua ergo praecepta dentur quae contineant ipsam conservationem boni communis, vel ipsum ordinem iustitiae et virtutis; huiusmodi praecepta continent intentionem legislatoris, et ideo indispensabilia sunt. Puta si poneretur hoc praeceptum in aliqua communitate, quod nullus destrueret rempublicam, neque proderet civitatem hostibus, sive quod nullus faceret aliquid iniuste vel male; huiusmodi praecepta essent indispensabilia. Sed si aliqua alia praecepta traderentur ordinata ad ista praecepta, quibus determinantur aliqui speciales modi, in talibus praeceptis dispensatio posset fieri; inquantum per omissionem huiusmodi praeceptorum in aliquibus casibus, non fieret praeiudicium primis praeceptis, quae continent intentionem legislatoris. Puta si, ad conservationem reipublicae, statueretur in aliqua civitate quod de singulis vicis aliqui vigilarent ad custodiam civitatis obsessae; posset cum aliquibus dispensari propter aliquam maiorem utilitatem. Praecepta autem Decalogi continent ipsam intentionem legislatoris, scilicet Dei. Nam praecepta primae tabulae, quae ordinant ad Deum, continent ipsum ordinem ad bonum commune et finale, quod Deus est; praecepta autem secundae tabulae continent ipsum ordinem iustitiae inter homines observandae, ut scilicet nulli fiat indebitum, et cuilibet reddatur debitum; secundum hanc enim rationem sunt intelligenda praecepta Decalogi. Et ideo praecepta Decalogi sunt omnino indispensabilia.

[37915] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 8 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod philosophus non loquitur de iusto naturali quod continet ipsum ordinem iustitiae, hoc enim nunquam deficit, iustitiam esse servandam. Sed loquitur quantum ad determinatos modos observationis iustitiae, qui in aliquibus fallunt.

[37916] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 8 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod, sicut apostolus dicit, II ad Tim. II, Deus fidelis permanet, negare seipsum non potest. Negaret autem seipsum, si ipsum ordinem suae iustitiae auferret, cum ipse sit ipsa iustitia. Et ideo in hoc Deus dispensare non potest, ut homini liceat non ordinate se habere ad Deum, vel non subdi ordini iustitiae eius, etiam in his secundum quae homines ad invicem ordinantur.

[37917] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 8 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod occisio hominis prohibetur in Decalogo secundum quod habet rationem indebiti, sic enim praeceptum continet ipsam rationem iustitiae. Lex autem humana hoc concedere non potest, quod licite homo indebite occidatur. Sed malefactores occidi, vel hostes reipublicae, hoc non est indebitum. Unde hoc non contrariatur praecepto Decalogi, nec talis occisio est homicidium, quod praecepto Decalogi prohibetur, ut Augustinus dicit, in I de Lib. Arb. Et similiter si alicui auferatur quod suum erat, si debitum est quod ipsum amittat, hoc non est furtum vel rapina, quae praecepto Decalogi prohibentur. Et ideo quando filii Israel praecepto Dei tulerunt Aegyptiorum spolia, non fuit furtum, quia hoc eis debebatur ex sententia Dei. Similiter etiam

Abraham, cum consensit occidere filium, non consensit in homicidium, quia debitum erat eum occidi per mandatum Dei, qui est dominus vitae et mortis. Ipse enim est qui poenam mortis infligit omnibus hominibus, iustis et iniustis, pro peccato primi parentis, cuius sententiae si homo sit executor auctoritate divina, non erit homicida, sicut nec Deus. Et similiter etiam Osee, accedens ad uxorem fornicariam, vel ad mulierem adulteram, non est moechatus nec fornicatus, quia accessit ad eam quae sua erat secundum mandatum divinum, qui est auctor institutionis matrimonii. Sic igitur praecepta ipsa Decalogi, quantum ad rationem iustitiae quam continent, immutabilia sunt. Sed quantum ad aliquam determinationem per applicationem ad singulares actus, ut scilicet hoc vel illud sit homicidium, furtum vel adulterium, aut non, hoc quidem est mutabile, quandoque sola auctoritate divina, in his scilicet quae a solo Deo sunt instituta, sicut in matrimonio, et in aliis huiusmodi; quandoque etiam auctoritate humana, sicut in his quae sunt commissa hominum iurisdictioni. Quantum enim ad hoc, homines gerunt vicem Dei, non autem quantum ad omnia.

[37918] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 8 ad 4

Ad quartum dicendum quod illa excogitatio magis fuit interpretatio praecepti quam dispensatio. Non enim intelligitur violare sabbatum qui facit opus quod est necessarium ad salutem humanam; sicut dominus probat, Matth. XII.

Articulus 9

[37919] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 9 arg. 1

Ad nonum sic proceditur. Videtur quod modus virtutis cadat sub praecepto legis. Est enim modus virtutis ut aliquis iuste operetur iusta, et fortiter fortia, et similiter de aliis virtutibus. Sed Deut. XVI praecipitur, iuste quod iustum est exequeris. Ergo modus virtutis cadit sub praecepto.

[37920] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 9 arg. 2

Praeterea, illud maxime cadit sub praecepto quod est de intentione legislatoris. Sed intentio legislatoris ad hoc principaliter fertur ut homines faciat virtuosos, sicut dicitur in II Ethic. Virtuosi autem est virtuose agere. Ergo modus virtutis cadit sub praecepto.

Praeterea, modus virtutis proprie esse videtur ut aliquis voluntarie et delectabiliter operetur. Sed hoc cadit sub praecepto legis divinae, dicitur enim in Psalmo XCIX, servite domino in laetitia; et II ad Cor. IX, non ex tristitia aut ex necessitate, hilarem enim datorem diligit Deus; ubi Glossa dicit, quidquid boni facis, cum hilaritate fac, et tunc bene facis, si autem cum tristitia facis, fit de te, non tu facis. Ergo modus virtutis cadit sub praecepto legis.

Sed contra, nullus potest operari eo modo quo operatur virtuosus, nisi habeat habitum virtutis; ut patet per philosophum, in II et V Ethic. Quicumque autem transgreditur praeceptum legis, meretur poenam. Sequeretur ergo quod ille qui non habet habitum virtutis, quidquid faceret, mereretur poenam. Hoc autem est contra intentionem legis, quae intendit hominem, assuefaciendo ad bona opera, inducere ad virtutem. Non ergo modus virtutis cadit sub praecepto.

Respondeo dicendum quod, sicut supra dictum est, praeceptum legis habet vim coactivam. Illud ergo directe cadit sub praecepto legis, ad quod lex cogit. Coactio autem legis est per metum poenae, ut dicitur X Ethic., nam illud proprie cadit sub praecepto legis, pro quo poena legis infligitur. Ad instituendam autem poenam aliter se habet lex divina, et lex humana. Non enim poena legis infligitur nisi pro illis de quibus legislator habet iudicare, quia ex iudicio lex punit. Homo autem, qui est legis lator humanae, non habet iudicare nisi de exterioribus actibus, quia homines vident ea quae parent, ut dicitur I Reg. XVI. Sed solius Dei, qui est lator legis divinae est iudicare de interioribus motibus voluntatum; secundum illud Psalmi VII, scrutans corda et renes Deus. Secundum hoc igitur dicendum est quod modus virtutis quantum ad aliquid respicitur a lege humana et divina; quantum ad aliquid autem, a lege divina sed non a lege humana; quantum ad aliquid vero, nec a lege humana nec a lege divina. Modus autem virtutis in tribus consistit, secundum philosophum, in II Ethic. Quorum primum est, si aliquis operetur sciens. Hoc autem diiudicatur et a lege divina et a lege humana. Quod enim aliquis facit ignorans, per accidens facit. Unde secundum ignorantiam aliqua diiudicantur ad poenam vel ad veniam, tam secundum legem humanam quam secundum legem divinam. Secundum autem est ut aliquis operetur volens, vel eligens et propter hoc eligens; in quo importatur duplex motus interior, scilicet voluntatis et intentionis, de quibus supra dictum est. Et ista duo non diiudicat lex humana, sed solum lex divina. Lex enim humana non punit eum qui vult occidere et non occidit, punit autem eum lex divina, secundum illud Matth. V, qui irascitur fratri suo, reus erit iudicio. Tertium autem est ut firme et immobiliter habeat et operetur. Et ista firmitas proprie pertinet ad habitum, ut scilicet aliquis ex habitu radicato operetur. Et quantum ad hoc, modus virtutis non cadit sub praecepto neque legis divinae neque legis humanae, neque enim ab homine neque a Deo punitur tanquam praecepti transgressor, qui debitum honorem impendit parentibus, quamvis non habeat habitum pietatis.

[37924] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 9 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod modus faciendi actum iustitiae qui cadit sub praecepto, est ut fiat aliquid secundum ordinem iuris, non autem quod fiat ex habitu iustitiae.

[37925] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 9 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod intentio legislatoris est de duobus. De uno quidem, ad quod intendit per praecepta legis inducere, et hoc est virtus. Aliud autem est de quo intendit praeceptum ferre, et hoc est id quod ducit vel disponit ad virtutem, scilicet actus virtutis. Non enim idem est finis praecepti et id de quo praeceptum datur, sicut neque in aliis rebus idem est finis et quod est ad finem.

[37926] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 9 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod operari sine tristitia opus virtutis, cadit sub praecepto legis divinae, quia quicumque cum tristitia operatur, non volens operatur. Sed delectabiliter operari, sive cum laetitia vel hilaritate, quodammodo cadit sub praecepto, scilicet secundum quod sequitur delectatio ex dilectione Dei et proximi, quae cadit sub praecepto, cum amor sit causa delectationis, et quodammodo non, secundum quod delectatio consequitur habitum; delectatio enim operis est signum habitus generati, ut dicitur in II Ethic. Potest enim aliquis actus esse delectabilis vel propter finem, vel propter convenientiam habitus.

Articulus 10

[37927] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 10 arg. 1

Ad decimum sic proceditur. Videtur quod modus caritatis cadat sub praecepto divinae legis. Dicitur enim Matth. XIX, si vis ad vitam ingredi, serva mandata, ex quo videtur quod observatio mandatorum sufficiat ad introducendum in vitam. Sed opera bona non sufficiunt ad introducendum in vitam, nisi ex caritate fiant, dicitur enim I ad Cor. XIII, si distribuero in cibos pauperum omnes facultates meas, et si tradidero corpus meum ita ut ardeam, caritatem autem non habuero, nihil mihi prodest. Ergo modus caritatis est in praecepto.

[37928] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 10 arg. 2

Praeterea, ad modum caritatis proprie pertinet ut omnia fiant propter Deum. Sed istud cadit sub praecepto, dicit enim apostolus, I ad Cor. X, omnia in gloriam Dei facite. Ergo modus caritatis cadit sub praecepto.

[37929] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 10 arg. 3

Praeterea, si modus caritatis non cadit sub praecepto, ergo aliquis potest implere praecepta legis non habens caritatem. Sed quod potest fieri sine caritate, potest fieri sine gratia, quae semper adiuncta est caritati. Ergo aliquis potest implere praecepta legis sine gratia. Hoc autem est Pelagiani erroris; ut patet per Augustinum, in libro de haeresibus. Ergo modus caritatis est in praecepto.

[37930] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 10 s. c.

Sed contra est quia quicumque non servat praeceptum, peccat mortaliter. Si igitur modus caritatis cadat sub praecepto, sequitur quod quicumque operatur aliquid et non ex caritate, peccet mortaliter. Sed quicumque non habet caritatem, operatur non ex caritate. Ergo sequitur quod quicumque non habet caritatem, peccet mortaliter in omni opere quod facit, quantumcumque sit de genere bonorum. Quod est inconveniens.

[37931] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 10 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod circa hoc fuerunt contrariae opiniones. Quidam enim dixerunt absolute modum caritatis esse sub praecepto. Nec est impossibile observare hoc praeceptum caritatem non habenti, quia potest se disponere ad hoc quod caritas ei infundatur a Deo. Nec quandocumque aliquis non habens caritatem facit aliquid de genere bonorum, peccat mortaliter, quia hoc est praeceptum affirmativum, ut ex caritate operetur, et non obligat ad semper, sed pro tempore illo quo aliquis habet caritatem. Alii vero dixerunt quod omnino modus caritatis non cadit sub praecepto. Utrique autem quantum ad aliquid, verum dixerunt. Actus enim caritatis dupliciter considerari potest. Uno modo, secundum quod est quidam actus per se. Et hoc modo cadit sub praecepto legis quod de hoc specialiter datur, scilicet, diliges dominum Deum tuum, et, diliges proximum tuum. Et quantum ad hoc, primi verum dixerunt. Non enim est impossibile hoc praeceptum observare, quod est de actu caritatis, quia homo potest se disponere ad caritatem habendam, et quando habuerit eam, potest ea uti. Alio modo potest considerari actus caritatis secundum quod est modus actuum aliarum virtutum, hoc est secundum quod actus aliarum virtutum ordinantur ad caritatem, quae est finis praecepti, ut dicitur I ad Tim. I, dictum est enim supra quod intentio finis est quidam modus formalis actus ordinati in finem. Et hoc modo verum est quod secundi dixerunt, quod modus caritatis non cadit sub praecepto, hoc est dictum, quod in hoc praecepto, honora patrem, non includitur quod honoretur pater ex caritate, sed solum quod honoretur pater. Unde qui honorat patrem, licet non habens caritatem, non efficitur transgressor huius praecepti, etsi sit transgressor praecepti quod est de actu caritatis, propter quam transgressionem meretur poenam.

[37932] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 10 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod dominus non dixit, si vis ad vitam ingredi, serva unum mandatum, sed, serva omnia mandata. Inter quae etiam continetur mandatum de dilectione Dei et proximi.

[37933] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 10 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod sub mandato caritatis continetur ut diligatur Deus ex toto corde, ad quod pertinet ut omnia referantur in Deum. Et ideo praeceptum caritatis implere homo non potest, nisi etiam omnia referantur in Deum. Sic ergo qui honorat parentes, tenetur ex caritate honorare, non ex vi huius praecepti quod est, honora parentes, sed ex vi huius praecepti, diliges dominum Deum tuum ex toto corde tuo. Et cum ista sint duo praecepta affirmativa non obligantia ad semper, possunt pro diversis temporibus obligare. Et ita potest contingere quod aliquis implens praeceptum de honoratione parentum, non tunc transgrediatur praeceptum de omissione modi caritatis.

[37934] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 10 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod observare omnia praecepta legis homo non potest, nisi impleat praeceptum caritatis, quod non fit sine gratia. Et ideo impossibile est quod Pelagius dixit, hominem implere legem sine gratia.

Articulus 11

[37935] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 11 arg. 1

Ad undecimum sic proceditur. Videtur quod inconvenienter distinguantur alia moralia praecepta legis praeter Decalogum. Quia ut dominus dicit, Matth. XXII, in duobus praeceptis caritatis pendet omnis lex et prophetae. Sed haec duo praecepta explicantur per decem praecepta Decalogi. Ergo non oportet alia praecepta moralia esse.

[37936] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 11 arg. 2

Praeterea, praecepta moralia a iudicialibus et caeremonialibus distinguuntur, ut dictum est. Sed determinationes communium praeceptorum moralium pertinent ad iudicialia et caeremonialia praecepta, communia autem praecepta moralia sub Decalogo continentur, vel etiam Decalogo praesupponuntur, ut dictum est. Ergo inconvenienter traduntur alia praecepta moralia praeter Decalogum.

[37937] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 11 arg. 3

Praeterea, praecepta moralia sunt de actibus omnium virtutum, ut supra dictum est. Sicut igitur in lege ponuntur praecepta moralia praeter Decalogum pertinentia ad iustitiam, liberalitatem et misericordiam, et castitatem; ita etiam deberent poni aliqua praecepta pertinentia ad alias virtutes, puta ad fortitudinem, sobrietatem, et alia huiusmodi. Quod tamen non invenitur. Non ergo convenienter distinguuntur in lege alia praecepta moralia quae sunt praeter Decalogum.

[37938] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 11 s. c.

Sed contra est quod in Psalmo XVIII dicitur, lex domini immaculata, convertens animas. Sed per alia etiam moralia quae Decalogo superadduntur, homo conservatur absque macula peccati, et anima eius ad Deum convertitur. Ergo ad legem pertinebat etiam alia praecepta moralia tradere.

Respondeo dicendum quod, sicut ex dictis patet, praecepta iudicialia et caeremonialia ex sola institutione vim habent, quia antequam instituerentur, non videbatur differre utrum sic vel aliter fieret. Sed praecepta moralia ex ipso dictamine naturalis rationis efficaciam habent, etiam si nunquam in lege statuuntur. Horum autem triplex est gradus. Nam quaedam sunt certissima, et adeo manifesta quod editione non indigent; sicut mandata de dilectione Dei et proximi, et alia huiusmodi, ut supra dictum est, quae sunt quasi fines praeceptorum, unde in eis nullus potest errare secundum iudicium rationis. Quaedam vero sunt magis determinata, quorum rationem statim quilibet, etiam popularis, potest de facili videre; et tamen quia in paucioribus circa huiusmodi contingit iudicium humanum perverti, huiusmodi editione indigent, et haec sunt praecepta Decalogi. Quaedam vero sunt quorum ratio non est adeo cuilibet manifesta, sed solum sapientibus, et ista sunt praecepta moralia superaddita Decalogo, tradita a Deo populo per Moysen et Aaron. Sed quia ea quae sunt manifesta, sunt principia cognoscendi eorum quae non sunt manifesta; alia praecepta moralia superaddita Decalogo reducuntur ad praecepta Decalogi, per modum cuiusdam additionis ad ipsa. Nam in primo praecepto Decalogi prohibetur cultus alienorum deorum, cui superadduntur alia praecepta prohibitiva eorum quae ordinantur in cultum idolorum; sicut habetur Deut. XVIII, non inveniatur in te qui lustret filium suum aut filiam, ducens per ignem, nec sit maleficus atque incantator, nec Pythones consulat neque divinos, et quaerat a mortuis veritatem. Secundum autem praeceptum prohibet periurium. Superadditur autem ei prohibitio blasphemiae, Levit. XXIV; et prohibitio falsae doctrinae, Deut. XIII. Tertio vero praecepto superadduntur omnia caeremonialia. Quarto autem praecepto, de honore parentum, superadditur praeceptum de honoratione senum, secundum illud Levit. XIX, coram cano capite consurge, et honora personam senis; et universaliter omnia praecepta inducentia ad reverentiam exhibendam maioribus, vel ad beneficia exhibenda vel aequalibus vel minoribus. Quinto autem praecepto, quod est de prohibitione homicidii, additur prohibitio odii et cuiuslibet violationis contra proximum, sicut illud Levit. XIX, non stabis contra sanguinem proximi tui; et etiam prohibitio odii fratris, secundum illud, ne oderis fratrem tuum in corde tuo. Praecepto autem sexto, quod est de prohibitione adulterii, superadditur praeceptum de prohibitione meretricii, secundum illud Deut. XXIII, non erit meretrix de filiabus Israel, neque fornicator de filiis Israel; et iterum prohibitio vitii contra naturam, secundum illud Levit. XVIII, cum masculo non commisceberis, cum omni pecore non coibis. Septimo autem praecepto, de prohibitione furti adiungitur praeceptum de prohibitione usurae, secundum illud Deut. XXIII, non foenerabis fratri tuo ad usuram; et prohibitio fraudis, secundum illud Deut. XXV, non habebis in sacco diversa pondera; et universaliter omnia quae ad prohibitionem calumniae et rapinae pertinent. Octavo vero praecepto, quod est de prohibitione falsi testimonii, additur prohibitio falsi iudicii, secundum illud Exod. XXIII, nec in iudicio plurimorum acquiesces sententiae, ut a veritate devies; et prohibitio mendacii, sicut ibi subditur, mendacium fugies; et prohibitio detractionis, secundum illud Levit. XIX, non eris criminator et susurro in populis. Aliis autem duobus praeceptis nulla alia adiunguntur, quia per ea universaliter omnis mala concupiscentia prohibetur.

[37940] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 11 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod ad dilectionem Dei et proximi ordinantur quidem praecepta Decalogi secundum manifestam rationem debiti, alia vero secundum rationem magis occultam.

[37941] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 11 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod praecepta caeremonialia et iudicialia sunt determinativa praeceptorum Decalogi ex vi institutionis, non autem ex vi naturalis instinctus, sicut praecepta moralia superaddita.

[37942] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 11 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod praecepta legis ordinantur ad bonum commune, ut supra dictum est. Et quia virtutes ordinantes ad alium directe pertinent ad bonum commune; et similiter virtus castitatis, inquantum actus generationis deservit bono communi speciei; ideo de istis virtutibus directe dantur praecepta et Decalogi et superaddita. De actu autem fortitudinis datur praeceptum proponendum per duces exhortantes in bello, quod pro bono communi suscipitur, ut patet Deut. XX, ubi mandatur sacerdoti, nolite metuere, nolite cedere. Similiter etiam actus gulae prohibendus committitur monitioni paternae, quia contrariatur bono domestico, unde dicitur Deut. XXI, ex persona parentum, monita nostra audire contemnit, comessationibus vacat et luxuriae atque conviviis.

Articulus 12

[37943] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 12 arg. 1

Ad duodecimum sic proceditur. Videtur quod praecepta moralia veteris legis iustificarent. Dicit enim apostolus, Rom. II, non enim auditores legis iusti sunt apud Deum, sed factores legis iustificabuntur. Sed factores legis dicuntur qui implent praecepta legis. Ergo praecepta legis adimpleta iustificabant.

[37944] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 12 arg. 2

Praeterea, Levit. XVIII dicitur, custodite leges meas atque iudicia, quae faciens homo vivet in eis. Sed vita spiritualis hominis est per iustitiam. Ergo praecepta legis adimpleta iustificabant.

[37945] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 12 arg. 3

Praeterea, lex divina efficacior est quam lex humana. Sed lex humana iustificat, est enim quaedam iustitia in hoc quod praecepta legis adimplentur. Ergo praecepta legis iustificabant.

[37946] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 12 s. c.

Sed contra est quod apostolus dicit, II ad Cor. III, littera occidit. Quod secundum Augustinum, in libro de spiritu et littera, intelligitur etiam de praeceptis moralibus. Ergo praecepta moralia non iustificabant.

[37947] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 12 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod, sicut sanum proprie et primo dicitur quod habet sanitatem, per posterius autem quod significat sanitatem, vel quod conservat sanitatem; ita iustificatio primo et proprie dicitur ipsa factio iustitiae; secundo vero, et quasi improprie, potest dici iustificatio significatio iustitiae, vel dispositio ad iustitiam. Quibus duobus modis manifestum est quod praecepta legis iustificabant, in quantum scilicet disponebant homines ad gratiam Christi iustificantem, quam etiam significabant; quia sicut dicit Augustinus, contra Faustum, etiam vita illius populi prophetica erat, et Christi figurativa. Sed si loquamur de iustificatione proprie dicta, sic considerandum est quod iustitia potest accipi prout est in habitu, vel prout est in actu, et secundum hoc, iustificatio dupliciter dicitur. Uno quidem modo, secundum quod homo fit iustus adipiscens habitum iustitiae. Alio vero modo, secundum quod opera iustitiae operatur, ut secundum hoc iustificatio nihil aliud sit quam iustitiae executio. Iustitia autem, sicut et aliae virtutes potest accipi et acquisita et infusa, ut ex supradictis patet. Acquisita quidem causatur ex operibus, sed infusa causatur ab ipso Deo per eius gratiam. Et haec est vera iustitia, de qua nunc loquimur, secundum quam aliquis dicitur iustus apud Deum; secundum illud Rom. IV, si Abraham ex operibus legis iustificatus est, habet gloriam, sed non apud Deum. Haec igitur iustitia causari non poterat per praecepta moralia, quae sunt de actibus humanis. Et secundum hoc, praecepta moralia iustificare non poterant iustitiam causando. Si vero accipiatur iustificatio pro executione iustitiae, sic omnia praecepta legis iustificabant, aliter tamen et aliter. Nam praecepta caeremonialia continebant quidem iustitiam secundum se in generali, prout scilicet exhibebantur in cultum Dei, in speciali vero non continebant secundum se iustitiam, nisi ex sola determinatione legis divinae. Et ideo de huiusmodi praeceptis dicitur quod non iustificabant nisi ex devotione et obedientia facientium. Praecepta vero moralia et iudicialia continebant id quod erat secundum se iustum vel in generali, vel etiam in speciali. Sed moralia praecepta continebant id quod est secundum se iustum secundum iustitiam generalem quae est omnis virtus, ut dicitur in V Ethic. Praecepta vero iudicialia pertinebant ad iustitiam specialem, quae consistit circa contractus humanae vitae, qui sunt inter homines ad invicem.

[37948] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 12 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod apostolus accipit ibi iustificationem pro executione iustitiae.

[37949] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 12 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod homo faciens praecepta legis dicitur vivere in eis, quia non incurrebat poenam mortis, quam lex transgressoribus infligebat. In quo sensu inducit hoc apostolus, Gal. III.

[37950] I^a-IIae q. 100 a. 12 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod praecepta legis humanae iustificat iustitia acquisita, de qua non quaeritur ad praesens, sed solum de iustitia quae est apud Deum.

Quaestio 101

Prooemium

[37951] I^a-IIae q. 101 pr.

Consequenter considerandum est de praeceptis caeremonialibus. Et primo, de ipsis secundum se; secundo, de causa eorum; tertio, de duratione ipsorum. Circa primum quaeruntur quatuor. Primo, quae sit ratio praeceptorum caeremonialium. Secundo, utrum sint figuralia. Tertio, utrum debuerint esse multa. Quarto, de distinctione ipsorum.

Articulus 1

[37952] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 1 arg. 1

Ad primum sic proceditur. Videtur quod ratio praeceptorum caeremonialium non in hoc consistat quod pertinent ad cultum Dei. In lege enim veteri dantur Iudaeis quaedam praecepta de abstinentia ciborum, ut patet Levit. XI; et etiam de abstinendo ab aliquibus vestimentis, sicut illud Levit. XIX, vestem quae ex duobus texta est, non indueris; et iterum quod praecipitur Num. XV, ut faciant sibi fimbrias per angulos palliorum. Sed huiusmodi non sunt praecepta moralia, quia non manent in nova lege. Nec etiam iudicialia, quia non pertinent ad iudicium faciendum inter homines. Ergo sunt caeremonialia. Sed in nullo pertinere videntur ad cultum Dei. Ergo non est ratio caeremonialium praeceptorum quod pertineant ad cultum Dei.

[37953] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 1 arg. 2

Praeterea, dicunt quidam quod praecepta caeremonialia dicuntur illa quae pertinent ad solemnitates, quasi dicerentur a cereis, qui in solemnitatibus accenduntur. Sed multa alia sunt pertinentia ad cultum Dei praeter solemnitates. Ergo non videtur quod praecepta caeremonialia ea ratione dicantur, quia pertinent ad cultum Dei.

[37954] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 1 arg. 3

Praeterea, secundum quosdam praecepta caeremonialia dicuntur quasi normae, idest regulae, salutis, nam chaire in Graeco idem est quod salve. Sed omnia praecepta legis sunt regulae salutis, et non solum illa quae pertinent ad Dei cultum. Ergo non solum illa praecepta dicuntur caeremonialia quae pertinent ad cultum Dei.

[37955] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 1 arg. 4

Praeterea, Rabbi Moyses dicit quod praecepta caeremonialia dicuntur quorum ratio non est manifesta. Sed multa pertinentia ad cultum Dei habent rationem manifestam, sicut observatio sabbati, et celebratio phase et Scenopegiae, et multorum aliorum, quorum ratio assignatur in lege. Ergo caeremonialia non sunt quae pertinent ad cultum Dei.

[37956] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 1 s. c.

Sed contra est quod dicitur Exod. XVIII, esto populo in his quae ad Deum pertinent, ostendasque populo caeremonias et ritum colendi.

[37957] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 1 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod, sicut supra dictum est, caeremonialia praecepta determinant praecepta moralia in ordine ad Deum, sicut iudicialia determinant praecepta moralia in ordine ad proximum. Homo autem ordinatur ad Deum per debitum cultum. Et ideo caeremonialia proprie dicuntur quae ad cultum Dei pertinent. Ratio autem huius nominis posita est supra, ubi praecepta caeremonialia ab aliis sunt distincta.

[37958] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 1 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod ad cultum Dei pertinent non solum sacrificia et alia huiusmodi, quae immediate ad Deum ordinari videntur, sed etiam debita praeparatio colentium Deum ad cultum ipsius, sicut etiam in aliis quaecumque sunt praeparatoria ad finem, cadunt sub scientia quae est de fine. Huiusmodi autem praecepta quae dantur in lege de vestibus et cibis colentium Deum, et aliis huiusmodi, pertinent ad quandam praeparationem ipsorum ministrantium, ut sint idonei ad cultum Dei, sicut etiam specialibus observantiis aliqui utuntur qui sunt in ministerio regis. Unde etiam sub praeceptis caeremonialibus continentur.

[37959] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 1 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod illa expositio nominis non videtur esse multum conveniens, praesertim cum non multum inveniatur in lege quod in solemnitatibus cerei accenderentur, sed in ipso etiam candelabro lucernae cum oleo olivarum praeparabantur, ut patet Lev. XXIV. Nihilominus tamen potest dici quod in solemnitatibus omnia illa quae pertinebant ad cultum Dei, diligentius observabantur, et secundum hoc, in observatione solemnitatum omnia caeremonialia includuntur.

[37960] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 1 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod nec illa expositio nominis videtur esse multum conveniens, nomen enim caeremoniae non est Graecum, sed Latinum. Potest tamen dici quod, cum salus hominis sit a Deo, praecipue illa praecepta videntur esse salutis regulae, quae hominem ordinant ad Deum. Et sic caeremonialia dicuntur quae ad cultum Dei pertinent.

[37961] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 1 ad 4

Ad quartum dicendum quod illa ratio caeremonialium est quodammodo probabilis, non quod ex eo dicuntur caeremonialia quia eorum ratio non est manifesta; sed hoc est quoddam consequens. Quia enim praecepta ad cultum Dei pertinentia oportet esse figuralia, ut infra dicetur, inde est quod eorum ratio non est adeo manifesta.

Articulus 2

[37962] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 2 arg. 1

Ad secundum sic proceditur. Videtur quod praecepta caeremonialia non sint figuralia. Pertinet enim ad officium cuiuslibet doctoris ut sic pronunciet ut de facili intelligi possit, sicut Augustinus dicit, in IV de Doctr. Christ. Et hoc maxime videtur esse necessarium in legis latione, quia praecepta legis populo proponuntur. Unde lex debet esse manifesta, ut Isidorus dicit. Si igitur praecepta caeremonialia data sunt in alicuius rei figuram, videtur inconvenienter tradidisse huiusmodi praecepta Moyses, non exponens quid figurarent.

[37963] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 2 arg. 2

Praeterea, ea quae in cultum Dei aguntur, maxime debent honestatem habere. Sed facere aliqua facta ad alia repraesentanda, videtur esse theatricum, sive poeticum, in theatris enim repraesentabantur olim per aliqua quae ibi gerebantur, quaedam aliorum facta. Ergo videtur quod huiusmodi non debeant fieri ad cultum Dei. Sed caeremonialia ordinantur ad cultum Dei, ut dictum est. Ergo caeremonialia non debent esse figuralia.

[37964] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 2 arg. 3

Praeterea, Augustinus dicit, in Enchirid., quod Deus maxime colitur fide, spe et caritate. Sed praecepta quae dantur de fide, spe et caritate, non sunt figuralia. Ergo praecepta caeremonialia non debent esse figuralia.

[37965] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 2 arg. 4

Praeterea, dominus dicit, Ioan. IV, spiritus est Deus, et eos qui adorant eum, in spiritu et veritate adorare oportet. Sed figura non est ipsa veritas, immo contra se invicem dividuntur. Ergo caeremonialia, quae pertinent ad cultum Dei, non debent esse figuralia.

[37966] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 2 s. c.

Sed contra est quod apostolus dicit, ad Colos. II, nemo vos iudicet in cibo aut in potu, aut in parte diei festi aut Neomeniae aut sabbatorum, quae sunt umbra futurorum.

[37967] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 2 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod, sicut iam dictum est, praecepta caeremonialia dicuntur quae ordinantur ad cultum Dei. Est autem duplex cultus Dei, interior, et exterior. Cum enim homo sit compositus ex anima et corpore, utrumque debet applicari ad colendum Deum, ut scilicet anima colat interiori cultu, et corpus exteriori, unde dicitur in Psalmo LXXXIII, cor meum et caro mea exultaverunt in Deum vivum. Et sicut corpus ordinatur in Deum per animam, ita cultus exterior ordinatur ad interiorem cultum. Consistit autem interior cultus in hoc quod anima coniungatur Deo per intellectum et affectum. Et ideo secundum quod diversimode intellectus et affectus colentis Deum Deo recte coniungitur, secundum hoc diversimode exteriores actus hominis ad cultum Dei applicantur. In statu enim futurae beatitudinis, intellectus humanus ipsam divinam veritatem in seipsa intuebitur. Et ideo exterior cultus non consistet in aliqua figura, sed solum in laude Dei, quae procedit ex interiori cognitione et affectione; secundum illud Isaiae li, gaudium et laetitia invenietur in ea, gratiarum actio et vox laudis. In statu autem praesentis vitae, non possumus divinam veritatem in seipsa intueri, sed oportet quod radius divinae veritatis nobis illucescat sub aliquibus sensibilibus figuris, sicut Dionysius dicit, I cap. Cael. Hier., diversimode tamen, secundum diversum statum cognitionis humanae. In veteri enim lege neque ipsa divina veritas in seipsa manifesta erat, neque etiam adhuc propalata erat via ad hoc perveniendi, sicut apostolus dicit, ad Heb. IX. Et ideo oportebat exteriorem cultum veteris legis non solum esse figurativum futurae veritatis manifestandae in patria; sed etiam esse figurativum Christi, qui est via ducens ad illam patriae veritatem. Sed in statu novae legis, haec via iam est revelata. Unde hanc praefigurari non oportet sicut futuram, sed commemorari oportet per modum praeteriti vel praesentis, sed solum oportet praefigurari futuram veritatem gloriae nondum revelatam. Et hoc est quod apostolus dicit, ad Heb. X, umbram habet lex futurorum bonorum, non ipsam imaginem rerum, umbra enim minus est quam imago; tanquam imago pertineat ad novam legem, umbra vero ad veterem.

[37968] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 2 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod divina non sunt revelanda hominibus nisi secundum eorum capacitatem, alioquin daretur eis praecipitii materia, dum contemnerent quae capere non possent. Et ideo utilius fuit ut sub quodam figurarum velamine divina mysteria rudi populo traderentur, ut sic saltem ea implicite cognoscerent, dum illis figuris deservirent ad honorem Dei.

[37969] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 2 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod, sicut poetica non capiuntur a ratione humana propter defectum veritatis qui est in eis, ita etiam ratio humana perfecte capere non potest divina propter excedentem ipsorum veritatem. Et ideo utrobique opus est repraesentatione per sensibiles figuras.

[37970] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 2 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod Augustinus ibi loquitur de cultu interiore; ad quem tamen ordinari oportet exteriorem cultum, ut dictum est.

[37971] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 2 ad 4

Et similiter dicendum est ad quartum, quia per Christum homines plenius ad spiritualem Dei cultum sunt introducti.

Articulus 3

[37972] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 3 arg. 1

Ad tertium sic proceditur. Videtur quod non debuerint esse multa caeremonialia praecepta. Ea enim quae sunt ad finem, debent esse fini proportionata. Sed caeremonialia praecepta, sicut dictum est, ordinantur ad cultum Dei et in figuram Christi. Est autem unus Deus, a quo omnia; et unus dominus Iesus Christus, per quem omnia, ut dicitur I ad Cor. VIII. Ergo caeremonialia non debuerunt multiplicari.

[37973] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 3 arg. 2

Praeterea, multitudo caeremonialium praeceptorum transgressionis erat occasio; secundum illud quod dicit Petrus, Act. XV, quid tentatis Deum, imponere iugum super cervicem discipulorum, quod neque nos, neque patres nostri, portare potuimus? Sed transgressio divinorum praeceptorum contrariatur humanae salutis. Cum igitur lex omnis debeat salutis congruere hominum, ut Isidorus dicit, videtur quod non debuerint multa praecepta caeremonialia dari.

[37974] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 3 arg. 3

Praeterea, praecepta caeremonialia pertinebant ad cultum Dei exteriorum et corporalem, ut dictum est. Sed huiusmodi cultum corporalem lex debebat diminuere, quia ordinabat ad Christum, qui docuit homines Deum colere in spiritu et veritate, ut habetur Ioan. IV. Non ergo debuerunt multa praecepta caeremonialia dari.

[37975] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 3 s. c.

Sed contra est quod dicitur Osee VIII, scribam eis multiplices leges intus; et Iob XI, ut ostenderet tibi secreta sapientiae, quod multiplex sit lex eius.

[37976] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 3 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod, sicut supra dictum est, omnis lex alicui populo datur. In populo autem duo genera hominum continentur, quidam proni ad malum, qui sunt per praecepta legis coercendi, ut supra dictum est; quidam habentes inclinationem ad bonum, vel ex natura vel ex consuetudine, vel magis ex gratia; et tales sunt per legis praeceptum instruendi et in melius promovendi. Quantum igitur ad utrumque genus hominum, expediebat praecepta caeremonialia in veteri lege multiplicari. Erant enim in illo populo aliqui ad idololatriam proni, et ideo necesse erat ut ab idololatriae cultu per praecepta caeremonialia revocarentur ad cultum Dei. Et quia multipliciter homines idololatriae deserviebant, oportebat e contrario multa institui ad singula reprimenda, et iterum multa talibus imponi, ut, quasi oneratis ex his quae ad cultum Dei impenderent, non vacaret idololatriae deservire. Ex parte vero eorum qui erant prompti ad bonum, etiam necessaria fuit multiplicatio caeremonialium praeceptorum. Tum quia per hoc diversimode mens eorum referebatur in Deum, et magis assidue. Tum etiam quia mysterium Christi, quod per huiusmodi caeremonialia figurabatur, multiplices utilitates attulit mundo, et multa circa ipsum consideranda erant, quae oportuit per diversa caeremonialia figurari.

[37977] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 3 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod, quando id quod ordinatur ad finem, est sufficiens ad ducendum in finem, tunc sufficit unum ad unum finem, sicut una medicina, si sit efficax, sufficit quandoque ad sanitatem inducendam, et tunc non oportet multiplicari medicinam. Sed propter debilitatem et imperfectionem eius quod est ad finem, oportet eam multiplicari, sicut multa remedia adhibentur infirmo, quando unum non sufficit ad sanandum. Caeremoniae autem veteris legis invalidae et imperfectae erant et ad repraesentandum Christi mysterium, quod est superexcellens; et ad subiugandum mentes hominum Deo. Unde apostolus dicit, ad Heb. VII, reprobatio fit praecedentis mandati, propter infirmitatem et inutilitatem, nihil enim ad perfectum adduxit lex. Et ideo oportuit huiusmodi caeremonias multiplicari.

[37978] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 3 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod sapientis legislatoris est minores transgressiones permittere, ut maiores caveantur. Et ideo, ut caveretur transgressio idololatriae, et superbiae quae in Iudaeorum cordibus nasceretur si omnia praecepta legis implerent, non propter hoc praetermisit Deus multa caeremonialia praecepta tradere, quia de facili sumebant ex hoc transgrediendi occasionem.

[37979] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 3 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod vetus lex in multis diminuit corporalem cultum. Propter quod statuit quod non in omni loco sacrificia offerrentur, neque a quibuslibet. Et multa huiusmodi statuit ad diminutionem exterioris cultus; sicut etiam Rabbi Moyses Aegyptius dicit. Oportebat tamen non ita attenuare corporalem cultum Dei, ut homines ad cultum Daemonum declinarent.

Articulus 4

[37980] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 4 arg. 1

Ad quartum sic proceditur. Videtur quod caeremoniae veteris legis inconvenienter dividantur in sacrificia, sacra, sacramenta et observantias. Caeremoniae enim veteris legis figurabant Christum. Sed hoc solum fiebat per sacrificia, per quae figurabatur sacrificium quo Christus se obtulit oblationem et hostiam Deo, ut dicitur ad Ephes. V. Ergo sola sacrificia erant caeremonialia.

[37981] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 4 arg. 2

Praeterea, vetus lex ordinabatur ad novam. Sed in nova lege ipsum sacrificium est sacramentum altaris. Ergo in veteri lege non debuerunt distinguere sacramenta contra sacrificia.

[37982] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 4 arg. 3

Praeterea, sacrum dicitur quod est Deo dicatum, secundum quem modum tabernaculum et vasa eius sacrificari dicebantur. Sed omnia caeremonialia erant ordinata ad cultum Dei, ut dictum est. Ergo caeremonialia omnia sacra erant. Non ergo una pars caeremonialium debet sacra nominari.

[37983] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 4 arg. 4

Praeterea, observantiae ab observando dicuntur. Sed omnia praecepta legis observari debebant, dicitur enim Deut. VIII, observa et cave ne quando obliviscaris domini Dei tui, et negligas mandata eius atque iudicia et caeremonias. Non ergo observantiae debent poni una pars caeremonialium.

[37984] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 4 arg. 5

Praeterea, solemnitates inter caeremonialia computantur, cum sint in umbram futuri, ut patet ad Colos. II. Similiter etiam oblationes et munera; ut patet per apostolum, ad Heb. IX. Quae tamen sub nullo horum contineri videntur. Ergo inconveniens est praedicta distinctio caeremonialium.

[37985] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 4 s. c.

Sed contra est quod in veteri lege singula praedicta caeremoniae vocantur. Sacrificia enim dicuntur caeremoniae Num. XV, offerat vitulum et sacrificia eius ac libamenta, ut caeremoniae eius postulant. De sacramento etiam ordinis dicitur Levit. VII, haec est unctio Aaron et filiorum eius in caeremoniis. De sacris etiam dicitur Exod. XXXVIII, haec sunt instrumenta tabernaculi testimonii in caeremoniis Levitarum. De observantiis etiam dicitur III Reg. IX, si aversi fueritis, non sequentes me, nec observantes caeremonias quas proposui vobis.

[37986] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 4 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod, sicut supra dictum est, caeremonialia praecepta ordinantur ad cultum Dei. In quo quidem cultu considerari possunt et ipse cultus, et colentes, et instrumenta colendi. Ipse autem cultus specialiter consistit in sacrificiis, quae in Dei reverentiam offeruntur. Instrumenta autem colendi pertinent ad sacra, sicut est tabernaculum, et vasa, et alia huiusmodi. Ex parte autem colentium duo possunt considerari. Scilicet et eorum institutio ad cultum divinum, quod fit per quandam consecrationem vel populi, vel ministrorum, et ad hoc pertinent sacramenta. Et iterum eorum singularis conversatio, per quam distinguuntur ab his qui Deum non colunt, et ad hoc pertinent observantiae, puta in cibis et vestimentis et aliis huiusmodi.

[37987] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 4 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod sacrificia oportebat offerri et in aliquibus locis, et per aliquos homines, et totum hoc ad cultum Dei pertinet. Unde sicut per sacrificia significatur Christus immolatus, ita etiam per sacramenta et sacra illorum figurabantur sacramenta et sacra novae legis; et per eorum observantias figurabatur conversatio populi novae legis. Quae omnia ad Christum pertinent.

[37988] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 4 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod sacrificium novae legis, idest Eucharistia, continet ipsum Christum, qui est sanctificationis auctor, sanctificavit enim per suum sanguinem populum, ut dicitur ad Heb. ult. Et ideo hoc sacrificium etiam est sacramentum. Sed sacrificia veteris legis non continebant Christum, sed ipsum figurabant, et ideo non dicuntur sacramenta. Sed ad hoc designandum seorsum erant quaedam sacramenta in veteri lege, quae erant figurae futurae consecrationis. Quamvis etiam quibusdam consecrationibus quaedam sacrificia adiungerentur.

[37989] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 4 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod etiam sacrificia et sacramenta erant sacra.

Sed quaedam erant quae erant sacra, utpote ad cultum Dei dicata, nec tamen erant sacrificia nec sacramenta, et ideo retinebant sibi commune nomen sacrorum.

[37990] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 4 ad 4

Ad quartum dicendum quod ea quae pertinebant ad conversationem populi colentis Deum, retinebant sibi commune nomen observantiarum, inquantum a praemissis deficiebant. Non enim dicebantur sacra, quia non habebant immediatum respectum ad cultum Dei, sicut tabernaculum et vasa eius. Sed per quandam consequentiam erant caeremonialia, inquantum pertinebant ad quandam idoneitatem populi colentis Deum.

[37991] I^a-IIae q. 101 a. 4 ad 5

Ad quintum dicendum quod, sicut sacrificia offerebantur in determinato loco ita etiam offerebantur in determinatis temporibus, unde etiam solemnitates inter sacra computari videntur. Oblationes autem et munera computantur cum sacrificiis, quia Deo offerebantur, unde apostolus dicit, ad Heb. V, omnis pontifex ex hominibus assumptus, pro hominibus constituitur in his quae sunt ad Deum, ut offerat dona et sacrificia.

Quaestio 102

Prooemium

[37992] I^a-IIae q. 102 pr.

Deinde considerandum est de causis caeremonialium praeceptorum. Et circa hoc quaeruntur sex. Primo, utrum praecepta caeremonialia habeant causam. Secundo, utrum habeant causam litteralem, vel solum figuralem. Tertio, de causis sacrificiorum. Quarto, de causis sacramentorum. Quinto, de causis sacrorum. Sexto, de causis observantiarum.

Articulus 1

[37993] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 1 arg. 1

Ad primum sic proceditur. Videtur quod caeremonialia praecepta non habeant causam. Quia super illud Ephes. II, legem mandatorum decretis evacuans, dicit Glossa, idest, evacuans legem veterem quantum ad carnales observantias, decretis, idest praeceptis evangelicis, quae ex ratione sunt. Sed si observantiae veteris legis ex ratione erant, frustra evacuarentur per rationabilia decreta novae legis. Non ergo caeremoniales observantiae veteris legis habebant aliquam rationem.

[37994] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 1 arg. 2

Praeterea, vetus lex successit legi naturae. Sed in lege naturae fuit aliquod praeceptum quod nullam rationem habebat nisi ut hominis obedientia probaretur; sicut Augustinus dicit, VIII super Gen. ad Litt., de prohibitione ligni vitae. Ergo etiam in veteri lege aliqua praecepta danda erant in quibus hominis obedientia probaretur, quae de se nullam rationem haberent.

[37995] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 1 arg. 3

Praeterea, opera hominis dicuntur moralia secundum quod sunt a ratione. Si igitur caeremonialium praeceptorum sit aliqua ratio, non different a moralibus praeceptis. Videtur ergo quod caeremonialia praecepta non habeant aliquam causam, ratio enim praecepti ex aliqua causa sumitur.

[37996] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 1 s. c.

Sed contra est quod dicitur in Psalmo XVIII, praeceptum domini lucidum, illuminans oculos. Sed caeremonialia sunt praecepta Dei. Ergo sunt lucida. Quod non esset nisi haberent rationabilem causam. Ergo praecepta caeremonialia habent rationabilem causam.

[37997] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 1 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod, cum sapientis sit ordinare, secundum philosophum, in I Metaphys., ea quae ex divina sapientia procedunt, oportet esse ordinata, ut apostolus dicit, ad Rom. XIII. Ad hoc autem quod aliqua sint ordinata, duo requiruntur. Primo quidem, quod aliqua ordinentur ad debitum finem, qui est principium totius ordinis in rebus agendis, ea enim quae casu eveniunt praeter intentionem finis, vel quae non serio fiunt sed ludo, dicimus esse inordinata. Secundo oportet quod id quod est ad finem, sit proportionatum fini. Et ex hoc sequitur quod ratio eorum quae sunt ad finem, sumitur ex fine, sicut ratio dispositionis serrae sumitur ex sectione, quae est finis eius, ut dicitur in II Physic. Manifestum est autem quod praecepta caeremonialia, sicut et omnia alia praecepta legis, sunt ex divina sapientia instituta, unde dicitur Deut. IV, haec est sapientia vestra et intellectus coram populis. Unde necesse est dicere quod praecepta caeremonialia sint ordinata ad aliquem finem, ex quo eorum rationabiles causae assignari possunt.

[37998] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 1 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod observantiae veteris legis possunt dici sine ratione quantum ad hoc, quod ipsa facta in sui natura rationem non habebant, puta quod vestis non conficeretur ex lana et lino. Poterant tamen habere rationem ex ordine ad aliud, in quantum scilicet vel aliquid per hoc figurabatur, vel aliquid excludebatur. Sed decreta novae legis, quae praecipue consistunt in fide et dilectione Dei, ex ipsa natura actus rationabilia sunt.

[37999] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 1 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod prohibitio ligni scientiae boni et mali non fuit propter hoc quod illud lignum esset naturaliter malum, sed tamen ipsa prohibitio habuit aliquam rationem ex ordine ad aliud, in quantum scilicet per hoc aliquid figurabatur. Et sic etiam caeremonialia praecepta veteris legis habent rationem in ordine ad aliud.

[38000] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 1 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod praecepta moralia secundum suam naturam habent rationabiles causas, sicut, non occides, non furtum facies. Sed praecepta caeremonialia habent rationabiles causas ex ordine ad aliud, ut dictum est.

Articulus 2

[38001] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 2 arg. 1

Ad secundum sic proceditur. Videtur quod praecepta caeremonialia non habeant causam litteralem, sed figuralem tantum. Inter praecepta enim caeremonialia praecipua erant circumcisio, et immolatio agni paschalis. Sed utrumque istorum non habebat nisi causam figuralem, quia utrumque istorum datum est in signum. Dicitur enim Gen. XVII, circumcidetis carnem praeputii vestri, ut sit in signum foederis inter me et vos. Et de celebratione phase dicitur Exod. XIII, erit quasi signum in manu tua, et quasi monumentum ante oculos tuos. Ergo multo magis alia caeremonialia non habent nisi causam figuralem.

[38002] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 2 arg. 2

Praeterea, effectus proportionatur suae causae. Sed omnia caeremonialia sunt figuralia, ut supra dictum est. Ergo non habent nisi causam figuralem.

[38003] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 2 arg. 3

Praeterea, illud quod de se est indifferens utrum sic vel non sic fiat, non videtur habere aliquam litteralem causam. Sed quaedam sunt in praeceptis caeremonialibus quae non videntur differre utrum sic vel sic fiant, sicut est de numero animalium offerendorum, et aliis huiusmodi particularibus circumstantiis. Ergo praecepta veteris legis non habent rationem litteralem.

[38004] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 2 s. c.

Sed contra, sicut praecepta caeremonialia figurabant Christum, ita etiam historiae veteris testamenti, dicitur enim I ad Cor. X, quod omnia in figuram contingebant illis. Sed in historiis veteris testamenti, praeter intellectum mysticum seu figuralem, est etiam intellectus litteralis. Ergo etiam praecepta caeremonialia, praeter causas figurales, habebant etiam causas litterales.

[38005] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 2 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod, sicut supra dictum est, ratio eorum quae sunt ad finem, oportet quod a fine sumatur. Finis autem praeceptorum caeremonialium est duplex, ordinabatur enim ad cultum Dei pro tempore illo, et ad figurandum Christum; sicut etiam verba prophetarum sic respiciebant praesens tempus, quod etiam in figuram futuri dicebantur, ut Hieronymus dicit, super Osee. Sic igitur rationes praeceptorum caeremonialium veteris legis dupliciter accipi possunt. Uno modo, ex ratione cultus divini qui erat pro tempore illo observandus. Et rationes istae sunt litterales, sive pertineant ad vitandum idololatriae cultum; sive ad memoranda aliqua Dei beneficia; sive ad insinuandam excellentiam divinam; vel etiam ad designandam dispositionem mentis quae tunc requirebatur in colentibus Deum. Alio modo possunt eorum rationes assignari secundum quod ordinantur ad figurandum Christum. Et sic habent rationes figurales et mysticas, sive accipiantur ex ipso Christo et Ecclesia, quod pertinet ad allegoriam; sive ad mores populi Christiani, quod pertinet ad moralitatem; sive ad statum futurae gloriae, prout in eam introducimur per Christum, quod pertinet ad anagogiam.

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod, sicut intellectus metaphoricæ locutionis in Scripturis est litteralis, quia verba ad hoc proferuntur ut hoc significant; ita etiam significationes caeremoniarum legis quæ sunt commemorativæ beneficiorum Dei propter quæ instituta sunt, vel aliorum huiusmodi quæ ad illum statum pertinebant, non transcendunt ordinem litteralium causarum. Unde quod assignetur causa celebrationis phase quia est signum liberationis ex Aegypto, et quod circumcisio est signum pacti quod Deus habuit cum Abraham, pertinet ad causam litteralem.

Ad secundum dicendum quod ratio illa procederet, si caeremonialia praecepta essent data solum ad figurandum futurum, non autem ad praesentialiter Deum colendum.

Ad tertium dicendum quod, sicut in legibus humanis dictum est quod in universali habent rationem, non autem quantum ad particulares conditiones, sed haec sunt ex arbitrio instituentium; ita etiam multae particulares determinationes in caeremoniis veteris legis non habent aliquam causam litteralem, sed solam figuralem; in communi vero habent etiam causam litteralem.

Articulus 3

Ad tertium sic proceditur. Videtur quod non possit conveniens ratio assignari caeremoniarum quæ ad sacrificia pertinent. Ea enim quæ in sacrificium offerebantur, sunt illa quæ sunt necessaria ad sustentandam humanam vitam, sicut animalia quaedam, et panes quidam. Sed tali sustentamento Deus non indiget; secundum illud Psalmi XLIX, numquid manducabo carnes taurorum, aut sanguinem hircorum potabo? Ergo inconvenienter huiusmodi sacrificia Deo offerebantur.

Praeterea, in sacrificium divinum non offerebantur nisi de tribus generibus animalium quadrupedum, scilicet de genere bovum, ovium et caprarum; et de avibus, communiter quidem turtur et columba; specialiter autem in emundatione leprosi fiebat sacrificium de passeribus. Multa autem alia animalia sunt eis nobiliora. Cum igitur omne quod est optimum Deo sit exhibendum, videtur quod non solum de istis rebus fuerint Deo sacrificia offerenda.

[38011] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 arg. 3

Praeterea, sicut homo a Deo habet dominium volatilium et bestiarum, ita etiam piscium. Inconvenienter igitur pisces a divino sacrificio excludebantur.

[38012] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 arg. 4

Praeterea, indifferenter offerri mandantur turtures et columbae. Sicut igitur mandantur offerri pulli columbarum, ita etiam pulli turturum.

[38013] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 arg. 5

Praeterea, Deus est auctor vitae non solum hominum, sed etiam animalium; ut patet per id quod dicitur Gen. I. Mors autem opponitur vitae. Non ergo debuerunt Deo offerri animalia occisa, sed magis animalia viventia. Praecipue quia etiam apostolus monet, Rom. XII, ut exhibeamus nostra corpora hostiam viventem, sanctam, Deo placentem.

[38014] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 arg. 6

Praeterea, si animalia Deo in sacrificium non offerebantur nisi occisa, nulla videtur esse differentia qualiter occidantur. Inconvenienter igitur determinatur modus immolationis, praecipue in avibus, ut patet Levit. I.

[38015] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 arg. 7

Praeterea, omnis defectus animalis via est ad corruptionem et mortem. Si igitur animalia occisa Deo offerebantur, inconueniens fuit prohibere oblationem animalis imperfecti, puta claudi aut caeci, aut aliter maculosi.

[38016] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 arg. 8

Praeterea, illi qui offerunt hostias Deo, debent de his participare; secundum illud apostoli, I Cor. X, nonne qui edunt hostias, participes sunt altaris? Inconvenienter igitur quaedam partes hostiarum offerentibus subtrahebantur, scilicet sanguis et adeps, et pectusculum et armus dexter.

[38017] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 arg. 9

Praeterea, sicut holocausta offerebantur in honorem Dei, ita etiam hostiae pacificae et hostiae pro peccato. Sed nullum animal feminini sexus offerebatur Deo in holocaustum, fiebant tamen holocausta tam de quadrupedibus quam de avibus. Ergo inconvenienter in hostiis pacificis et pro peccato offerebantur animalia feminini sexus; et tamen in hostiis pacificis non offerebantur aves.

[38018] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 arg. 10

Praeterea, omnes hostiae pacificae unius generis esse videntur. Non ergo debuit poni ista differentia, quod quorundam pacificorum carnes non possent vesci in crastino, quorundam autem possent, ut mandatur Levit. VII.

[38019] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 arg. 11

Praeterea, omnia peccata in hoc conveniunt quod a Deo avertunt. Ergo pro omnibus peccatis, in Dei reconciliationem, unum genus sacrificii debuit offerri.

[38020] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 arg. 12

Praeterea, omnia animalia quae offerebantur in sacrificium, uno modo offerebantur, scilicet occisa. Non videtur ergo conveniens quod de terrae nascentibus diversimode fiebat oblatio, nunc enim offerebantur spicae, nunc simila, nunc panis, quandoque quidem coctus in clibano, quandoque in sartagine, quandoque in craticula.

[38021] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 arg. 13

Praeterea, omnia quae in usum nostrum veniunt, a Deo recognoscere debemus. Inconvenienter ergo praeter animalia, solum haec Deo offerebantur, panis, vinum, oleum, thus et sal.

[38022] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 arg. 14

Praeterea, sacrificia corporalia exprimunt interius sacrificium cordis, quo homo spiritum suum offert Deo. Sed in interiori sacrificio plus est de dulcedine, quam repraesentat mel, quam de mordacitate, quam repraesentat sal, dicitur enim Eccli. XXIV, spiritus meus super mel dulcis. Ergo inconvenienter prohibebatur in sacrificio apponi mel et fermentum, quod etiam facit panem sapidum; et praecipiebatur ibi apponi sal, quod est mordicativum, et thus, quod habet saporem amarum. Videtur ergo quod ea quae pertinent ad caeremonias sacrificiorum, non habeant rationabilem causam.

Sed contra est quod dicitur Levit. I, oblata omnia adolebit sacerdos super altare in holocaustum et odorem suavissimum domino. Sed sicut dicitur Sap. VII, neminem diligit Deus nisi qui cum sapientia inhabitat, ex quo potest accipi quod quidquid est Deo acceptum, est cum sapientia. Ergo illae caeremoniae sacrificiorum cum sapientia erant, velut habentes rationabiles causas.

Respondeo dicendum quod, sicut supra dictum est, caeremoniae veteris legis duplicem causam habebant, unam scilicet litteralem, secundum quod ordinabantur ad cultum Dei; aliam vero figuralem, sive mysticam, secundum quod ordinabantur ad figurandum Christum. Et ex utraque parte potest convenienter assignari causa caeremoniarum quae ad sacrificia pertinebant. Secundum enim quod sacrificia ordinabantur ad cultum Dei, causa sacrificiorum dupliciter accipipotest. Uno modo, secundum quod per sacrificia repraesentabatur ordinatio mentis in Deum, ad quam excitabatur sacrificium offerens. Ad rectam autem ordinationem mentis in Deum pertinet quod omnia quae homo habet, recognoscat a Deo tanquam a primo principio, et ordinet in Deum tanquam in ultimum finem. Et hoc repraesentabatur in oblationibus et sacrificiis, secundum quod homo ex rebus suis, quasi in recognitionem quod haberet ea a Deo, in honorem Dei ea offerebat; secundum quod dixit David, I Paral. XXIX, tua sunt omnia; et quae de manu tua accepimus, dedimus tibi. Et ideo in oblatione sacrificiorum protestabatur homo quod Deus esset primum principium creationis rerum et ultimus finis, ad quem essent omnia referenda. Et quia pertinet ad rectam ordinationem mentis in Deum ut mens humana non recognoscat alium primum auctorem rerum nisi solum Deum, neque in aliquo alio finem suum constituat; propter hoc prohibebatur in lege offerre sacrificium alicui alteri nisi Deo, secundum illud Exod. XXII, qui immolat diis, occidetur, praeter domino soli. Et ideo de causa caeremoniarum circa sacrificia potest assignari ratio alio modo, ex hoc quod per huiusmodi homines retrahebantur a sacrificiis idolorum. Unde etiam praecepta de sacrificiis non fuerunt data populo Iudaeorum nisi postquam declinavit ad idololatriam, adorando vitulum conflatilem, quasi huiusmodi sacrificia sint instituta ut populus ad sacrificandum promptus, huiusmodi sacrificia magis Deo quam idolis offerret. Unde dicitur Ierem. VII, non sum locutus cum patribus vestris, et non praecepi eis, in die qua eduxi eos de terra Aegypti, de verbo holocaustatum et victimarum. Inter omnia autem dona quae Deus humano generi iam per peccatum lapso dedit, praecipuum est quod dedit filium suum, unde dicitur Ioan. III, sic Deus dilexit mundum ut filium suum unigenitum daret, ut omnis qui credit in ipsum non pereat, sed habeat vitam aeternam. Et ideo potissimum sacrificium est quo ipse Christus seipsum obtulit Deo in odorem suavitatis, ut dicitur ad Ephes. V. Et propter hoc omnia alia sacrificia offerebantur in veteri lege ut hoc unum singulare et praecipuum sacrificium figuraretur, tanquam perfectum per imperfecta. Unde apostolus dicit, ad Heb. X, quod sacerdos veteris legis easdem saepe offerebat hostias, quae nunquam possunt auferre peccata, Christus autem pro peccatis obtulit unam in sempiternum. Et quia ex figurato sumitur ratio figurae, ideo rationes sacrificiorum figurantium veteris legis sunt sumendae ex vero sacrificio Christi.

[38025] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod Deus non volebat huiusmodi sacrificia sibi offerri propter ipsas res quae offerebantur, quasi eis indigeret, unde dicitur Isaiae I, holocausta arietum, et adipem pinguium, et sanguinem vitulorum et hircorum et agnorum, nolui. Sed volebat ea sibi offerri, ut supra dictum est, tum ad excludendam idololatriam; tum ad significandum debitum ordinem mentis humanae in Deum; tum etiam ad figurandum mysterium redemptionis humanae factae per Christum.

[38026] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod quantum ad omnia praedicta, conveniens ratio fuit quare ista animalia offerebantur Deo in sacrificium, et non alia. Primo quidem, ad excludendum idololatriam. Quia omnia alia animalia offerebant idololatrae diis suis, vel eis ad maleficia utebantur, ista autem animalia apud Aegyptios, cum quibus conversati erant, abominabilia erant ad occidendum, unde ea non offerebant in sacrificium diis suis; unde dicitur Exod. VIII, abominationes Aegyptiorum immolabimus domino Deo nostro. Oves enim colebant; hircos venerabantur, quia in eorum figura Daemones apparebant; bobus autem utebantur ad agriculturam, quam inter res sacras habebant. Secundo, hoc conveniens erat ad praedictam ordinationem mentis in Deum. Et hoc dupliciter.

Primo quidem, quia huiusmodi animalia maxime sunt per quae sustentatur humana vita, et cum hoc mundissima sunt, et mundissimum habent nutrimentum. Alia vero animalia vel sunt silvestria, et non sunt communiter hominum usui deputata, vel, si sunt domestica, immundum habent nutrimentum, ut porcus et gallina; solum autem id quod est purum, Deo est attribuendum. Huiusmodi autem aves specialiter offerebantur, quia habentur in copia in terra promissionis. Secundo, quia per immolationem huiusmodi animalium puritas mentis designatur. Quia, ut dicitur in Glossa Levit. I, vitulum offerimus, cum carnis superbiam vincimus; agnum, cum irracionales motus corrigimus; haedum, cum lasciviam superamus; turturem, dum castitatem servamus; panes azymos, cum in azymis sinceritatis epulamur. In columba vero manifestum est quod significatur caritas et simplicitas mentis. Tertio vero, conveniens fuit haec animalia offerri in figuram Christi. Quia, ut in eadem Glossa dicitur, Christus in vitulo offertur, propter virtutem crucis; in agno, propter innocentiam; in ariete, propter principatum; in hirco, propter similitudinem carnis peccati. In turture et columba duarum naturarum coniunctio monstrabatur, vel in turture castitas, in columba caritas significatur. In similagine aspersione credentium per aquam Baptismi figurabatur.

[38027] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod pisces, quia in aquis vivunt, magis sunt alieni ab homine quam alia animalia, quae vivunt in aere, sicut et homo. Et iterum pisces, ex aqua extracti, statim moriuntur, unde non poterant in templo offerri, sicut alia animalia.

[38028] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 ad 4

Ad quartum dicendum quod in turturibus meliores sunt maiores quam pulli; in columbis autem e converso. Et ideo, ut Rabbi Moyses dicit, mandantur offerri turtures et pulli columbarum, quia omne quod est optimum, Deo est attribuendum.

[38029] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 ad 5

Ad quintum dicendum quod animalia in sacrificium oblata occidebantur, quia veniunt in usum hominis occisa, secundum quod a Deo dantur homini ad esum. Et ideo etiam igni cremabantur, quia per ignem decocta fiunt apta humano usui. Similiter etiam per occisionem animalium significatur destructio peccatorum. Et quod homines erant digni occisione pro peccatis suis, ac si illa animalia loco eorum occiderentur, ad significandum expiationem peccatorum. Per occisionem etiam huiusmodi animalium significabatur occisio Christi.

[38030] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 ad 6

Ad sextum dicendum quod specialis modus occidendi animalia immolata determinabatur in lege ad excludendum alios modos, quibus idololatrae animalia idolis immolabant. Vel etiam, ut Rabbi Moyses dicit, lex elegit genus occisionis quo animalia minus affligebantur occisa. Per quod excludebatur etiam immisericordia offerentium, et deterioratio animalium occisorum.

[38031] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 ad 7

Ad septimum dicendum quod, quia animalia maculosa solent haberi contemptui etiam apud homines, ideo prohibitum est ne Deo in sacrificium offerrentur, propter quod etiam prohibitum erat ne mercedem prostibuli, aut pretium canis, in domum Dei offerrent. Et eadem etiam ratione non offerebant animalia ante septimum diem, quia talia animalia erant quasi abortiva, nondum plene consistentia, propter teneritudinem.

[38032] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 ad 8

Ad octavum dicendum quod triplex erat sacrificiorum genus. Quoddam erat quod totum comburebatur, et hoc dicebatur holocaustum, quasi totum incensum. Huiusmodi enim sacrificium offerebatur Deo specialiter ad reverentiam maiestatis ipsius, et amorem bonitatis eius, et conveniebat perfectionis statui in impletione consiliorum. Et ideo totum comburebatur, ut sicut totum animal, resolutum in vaporem, sursum ascendebat, ita etiam significaretur totum hominem, et omnia quae ipsius sunt, Dei dominio esse subiecta, et ei esse offerenda. Aliud autem erat sacrificium pro peccato, quod offerebatur Deo ex necessitate remissionis peccati, et conveniebat statui poenitentium in satisfactione peccatorum. Quod dividebatur in duas partes, nam una pars eius comburebatur, alia vero cedebat in usum sacerdotum; ad significandum quod expiatio peccatorum fit a Deo per ministerium sacerdotum. Nisi quando offerebatur sacrificium pro peccato totius populi, vel specialiter pro peccato sacerdotis, tunc enim totum comburebatur. Non enim debebant in usum sacerdotum venire ea quae pro peccato eorum offerebantur, ut nihil peccati in eis remaneret. Et quia hoc non esset satisfactio pro peccato, si enim cederet in usum eorum pro quorum peccatis offerebatur, idem esse videretur ac si non offerrent. Tertium vero sacrificium vocabatur hostia pacifica, quae offerebatur Deo vel pro gratiarum actione, vel pro salute et prosperitate offerentium, ex debito beneficii vel accepti vel accipiendi, et convenit statui proficientium in impletione mandatorum. Et ista dividebantur in tres partes, nam una pars incendebatur ad honorem Dei, alia pars cedebat in usum sacerdotum, tertia vero pars in usum offerentium; ad significandum quod salus hominis procedit a Deo, dirigentibus ministris Dei, et cooperantibus ipsis hominibus qui salvantur. Hoc autem generaliter observabatur, quod sanguis et adeps non veniebant neque in usum sacerdotum, neque in usum offerentium, sed sanguis effundebatur ad crepidinem altaris, in honorem Dei; adeps vero adurebatur in igne. Cuius ratio una quidem fuit ad excludendam idololatriam. Idololatrae enim bibebant de sanguine victimarum, et comedebant adipem; secundum illud Deut. XXXII, de quorum victimis comedebant adipem, et bibebant vinum libaminum. Secunda ratio est ad informationem humanae vitae. Prohibebatur enim eis usus sanguinis, ad hoc quod horrerent humani sanguinis effusionem, unde dicitur Gen. IX, carnem cum sanguine non comedetis, sanguinem enim animarum vestrarum requiram. Esus vero adipum prohibebatur eis ad vitandam lasciviam, unde dicitur Ezech. XXXIV, quod crassum erat, occidebatis. Tertia ratio est propter reverentiam divinam. Quia sanguis est maxime necessarius ad vitam, ratione cuius dicitur anima esse in sanguine, adeps autem abundantiam nutrimenti demonstrat. Et ideo ut ostenderetur quod a Deo nobis est et vita et omnis bonorum sufficientia, ad honorem Dei effundebatur sanguis, et adurebatur adeps. Quarta ratio est quia per hoc figurabatur effusio sanguinis Christi, et pinguedo caritatis eius, per quam se obtulit Deo pro nobis. De hostiis autem pacificis in usum sacerdotis cedebat pectusculum et armus dexter, ad excludendum quandam divinationis speciem quae vocatur spatulamantia, quia scilicet in spatulis animalium immolatorum divinabant, et similiter in osse pectoris. Et ideo ista offerentibus subtrahebantur. Per hoc etiam significabatur quod sacerdoti erat necessaria sapientia cordis ad instruendum populum, quod significabatur per pectus, quod est tegumentum cordis; et etiam fortitudo ad sustentandum defectus, quae significatur per armum dextrum.

Ad nonum dicendum quod, quia holocaustum erat perfectissimum inter sacrificia, ideo non offerebatur in holocaustum nisi masculus, nam femina est animal imperfectum. Oblatio autem turturum et columbarum erat propter paupertatem offerentium, qui maiora animalia offerre non poterant. Et quia hostiae pacificae gratis offerebantur, et nullus eas offerre cogebatur nisi spontaneus; ideo huiusmodi aves non offerebantur inter hostias pacificas, sed inter holocausta et hostias pro peccato, quas quandoque oportebat offerre. Aves etiam huiusmodi, propter altitudinem volatus, congruunt perfectioni holocaustorum, et etiam hostiis pro peccato, quia habent gemitum pro cantu.

Ad decimum dicendum quod inter omnia sacrificia holocaustum erat praecipuum, quia totum comburebatur in honorem Dei, et nihil ex eo comedebatur. Secundum vero locum in sanctitate tenebat hostia pro peccato, quae comedebatur solum in atrio a sacerdotibus, et in ipsa die sacrificii. Tertium vero gradum tenebant hostiae pacificae pro gratiarum actione, quae comedebantur ipso die, sed ubique in Ierusalem. Quartum vero locum tenebant hostiae pacificae ex voto, quarum carnes poterant etiam in crastino comedi. Et est ratio huius ordinis quia maxime obligatur homo Deo propter eius maiestatem, secundo, propter offensam commissam; tertio, propter beneficia iam suscepta; quarto, propter beneficia sperata.

Ad undecimum dicendum quod peccata aggravantur ex statu peccantis, ut supra dictum est. Et ideo alia hostia mandatur offerri pro peccato sacerdotis et principis, vel alterius privatae personae. Est autem attendendum, ut Rabbi Moyses dicit, quod quanto gravius erat peccatum, tanto vilior species animalis offerebatur pro eo. Unde capra, quod est vilissimum animal, offerebatur pro idololatria, quod est gravissimum peccatum; pro ignorantia vero sacerdotis offerebatur vitulus; pro negligentia autem principis, hircus.

Ad duodecimum dicendum quod lex in sacrificiis providere voluit paupertati offerentium, ut qui non posset habere animal quadrupes, saltem offerret avem; quam qui habere non posset, saltem offerret panem; et si hunc habere non posset, saltem offerret farinam vel spicas. Causa vero figuralis est quia panis significat Christum, qui est panis vivus, ut dicitur Ioan. VI. Qui quidem erat sicut in spica, pro statu legis naturae, in fide patrum; erat autem sicut simila in doctrina legis prophetarum; erat autem sicut panis formatus post humanitatem assumptam; coctus igne, idest formatus spiritu sancto in clibano uteri virginalis; qui etiam fuit coctus in sartagine, per labores quos in mundo sustinebat; in cruce vero quasi in craticula adustus.

[38037] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 ad 13

Ad decimumtertium dicendum quod ea quae in usum hominis veniunt de terrae nascentibus, vel sunt in cibum, et de eis offerebatur panis. Vel sunt in potum, et de his offerebatur vinum. Vel sunt in condimentum, et de his offerebatur oleum et sal. Vel sunt in medicamentum, et de his offerebatur thus, quod est aromaticum et consolidativum. Per panem autem figuratur caro Christi; per vinum autem sanguis eius, per quem redempti sumus; oleum figurat gratiam Christi; sal scientiam; thus orationem.

[38038] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 3 ad 14

Ad decimumquartum dicendum quod mel non offerebatur in sacrificiis Dei, tum quia consueverat offerri in sacrificiis idolorum. Tum etiam ad excludendam omnem carnalem dulcedinem et voluptatem ab his qui Deo sacrificare intendunt. Fermentum vero non offerebatur, ad excludendam corruptionem. Et forte etiam in sacrificiis idolorum solitum erat offerri. Sal autem offerebatur, quia impedit corruptionem putredinis, sacrificia autem Dei debent esse incorrupta. Et etiam quia in sale significatur discretio sapientiae; vel etiam mortificatio carnis. Thus autem offerebatur ad designandam devotionem mentis, quae est necessaria offerentibus; et etiam ad designandum odorem bonae famae, nam thus et pingue est, et odoriferum. Et quia sacrificium zelotypiae non procedebat ex devotione, sed magis ex suspicione, ideo in eo non offerebatur thus.

Articulus 4

[38039] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 4 arg. 1

Ad quartum sic proceditur. Videtur quod caeremoniarum veteris legis quae ad sacra pertinent sufficiens ratio assignari non possit. Dicit enim Paulus, Act. XVII, Deus, qui fecit mundum et omnia quae in eo sunt, hic, caeli et terrae cum sit dominus, non in manufactis templis habitat. Inconvenienter igitur ad cultum Dei tabernaculum, vel templum, in lege veteri est institutum.

[38040] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 4 arg. 2

Praeterea, status veteris legis non fuit immutatus nisi per Christum. Sed tabernaculum designabat statum veteris legis. Non ergo debuit mutari per aedificationem alicuius templi.

[38041] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 4 arg. 3

Praeterea, divina lex praecipue etiam debet homines inducere ad divinum cultum. Sed ad augmentum divini cultus pertinet quod fiant multa altaria et multa templa, sicut patet in nova lege. Ergo videtur quod etiam in veteri lege non debuit esse solum unum templum aut unum tabernaculum sed multa.

[38042] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 4 arg. 4

Praeterea, tabernaculum, seu templum, ad cultum Dei ordinabatur. Sed in Deo praecipue oportet venerari unitatem et simplicitatem. Non videtur igitur fuisse conveniens ut tabernaculum, seu templum, per quaedam vela distingueretur.

[38043] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 4 arg. 5

Praeterea, virtus primi moventis, qui est Deus, primo apparet in parte orientis, a qua parte incipit primus motus. Sed tabernaculum fuit institutum ad Dei adorationem. Ergo debebat esse dispositum magis versus orientem quam versus occidentem.

[38044] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 4 arg. 6

Praeterea, Exod. XX, dominus praecepit ut non facerent sculptile, neque aliquam similitudinem. Inconvenienter igitur in tabernaculo, vel in templo, fuerunt sculptae imagines Cherubim. Similiter etiam et arca, et propitiatorium, et candelabrum, et mensa, et duplex altare, sine rationabili causa ibi fuisse videntur.

[38045] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 4 arg. 7

Praeterea, dominus praecepit, Exod. XX, altare de terra facietis mihi. Et iterum, non ascendes ad altare meum per gradus. Inconvenienter igitur mandatur postmodum altare fieri de lignis auro vel aere contextis; et tantae altitudinis ut ad illud nisi per gradus ascendi non posset. Dicitur enim Exod. XXVII, facies et altare de lignis setim, quod habebit quinque cubitos in longitudine, et totidem in latitudine, et tres cubitos in altitudine; et operies illud aere. Et Exod. XXX dicitur, facies altare ad adolendum thymiamata, de lignis setim, vestiesque illud auro purissimo.

[38046] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 4 arg. 8

Praeterea, in operibus Dei nihil debet esse superfluum, quia nec in operibus naturae aliquid superfluum invenitur. Sed uni tabernaculo, vel domui, sufficit unum operimentum. Inconvenienter igitur tabernaculo fuerunt apposita multa tegumenta, scilicet cortinae, saga cilicina, pelles arietum rubricatae, et pelles hyacintinae.

[38047] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 4 arg. 9

Praeterea, consecratio exterior interiorem sanctitatem significat, cuius subiectum est anima. Inconvenienter igitur tabernaculum et eius vasa consecrabantur, cum essent quaedam corpora inanimata.

[38048] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 4 arg. 10

Praeterea, in Psalmo XXXIII dicitur, benedicam dominum in omni tempore, semper laus eius in ore meo. Sed solemnitates instituuntur ad laudandum Deum. Non ergo fuit conveniens ut aliqui certi dies statuerentur ad solemnitates peragendas. Sic igitur videtur quod caeremoniae sacrorum convenientes causas non haberent.

[38049] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 4 s. c.

Sed contra est quod apostolus dicit, ad Heb. VIII, quod illi qui offerunt secundum legem munera, exemplari et umbrae deserviunt caelestium, sicut responsum est Moysi, cum consummaret tabernaculum, vide, inquit, omnia facito secundum exemplar quod tibi in monte monstratum est. Sed valde rationabile est quod imaginem caelestium repraesentat. Ergo caeremoniae sacrorum rationabilem causam habebant.

[38050] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 4 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod totus exterior cultus Dei ad hoc praecipue ordinatur ut homines Deum in reverentia habeant. Habet autem hoc humanus affectus, ut ea quae communia sunt, et non distincta ab aliis, minus revereat; ea vero quae habent aliquam excellentiae discretionem ab aliis, magis admiretur et revereat. Et inde etiam hominum consuetudo inolevit ut reges et principes, quos oportet in reverentia haberi a subditis, et pretiosioribus vestibus ornentur, et etiam ampliores et pulchriores habitationes possideant. Et propter hoc oportuit ut aliqua specialia tempora, et speciale habitaculum, et specialia vasa, et speciales ministri ad cultum Dei ordinarentur, ut per hoc animi hominum ad maiorem Dei reverentiam adducerentur. Similiter etiam status veteris legis, sicut dictum est, institutus erat ad figurandum mysterium Christi. Oportet autem esse aliquid determinatum id per quod aliud figurari debet, ut scilicet eius aliquam similitudinem repraesentet. Et ideo etiam oportuit aliqua specialia observari in his quae pertinent ad cultum Dei.

[38051] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 4 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod cultus Dei duo respicit, scilicet Deum, qui colitur; et homines colentes. Ipse igitur Deus, qui colitur, nullo corporali loco clauditur, unde propter ipsum non oportuit tabernaculum fieri, aut templum. Sed homines ipsum colentes corporales sunt, et propter eos oportuit speciale tabernaculum, vel templum, institui ad cultum Dei, propter duo. Primo quidem, ut ad huiusmodi locum convenientes cum hac cogitatione quod deputaretur ad colendum Deum, cum maiori reverentia accederent. Secundo, ut per dispositionem talis templi, vel tabernaculi, significarentur aliqua pertinentia ad excellentiam divinitatis vel humanitatis Christi. Et hoc est quod Salomon dicit, III Reg. VIII, si caelum et caeli caelorum te capere non possunt, quanto magis domus haec, quam aedificavi tibi? Et postea subdit, sint oculi tui aperti super domum hanc, de qua dixisti, erit nomen meum ibi; ut exaudias deprecationem servi tui et populi tui Israel. Ex quo patet quod domus sanctuarii non est instituta ad hoc quod Deum capiat, quasi localiter inhabitantem; sed ad hoc quod nomen Dei habitet ibi, idest ut notitia Dei ibi manifestetur per aliqua quae ibi fiebant vel dicebantur; et quod, propter reverentiam loci, orationes fierent ibi magis exaudibiles ex devotione orantium.

[38052] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 4 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod status veteris legis non fuit immutatus ante Christum quantum ad impletionem legis, quae facta est solum per Christum, est tamen immutatus quantum ad conditionem populi qui erat sub lege. Nam primo populus fuit in deserto, non habens certam mansionem; postmodum autem habuerunt varia bella cum finitimis gentibus; ultimo autem, tempore David et Salomonis, populus ille habuit quietissimum statum. Et tunc primo aedificatum fuit templum, in loco quem designaverat Abraham, ex divina demonstratione, ad immolandum. Dicitur enim Gen. XXII, quod dominus mandavit Abrahae ut offerret filium suum in holocaustum super unum montium quem monstravero tibi. Et postea dicit quod appellavit nomen illius loci, dominus videt, quasi secundum Dei praevisionem esset locus ille electus ad cultum divinum. Propter quod dicitur Deut. XII, ad locum quem elegerit dominus Deus vester, venietis, et offeretis holocausta et victimas vestras. Locus autem ille designari non debuit per aedificationem templi ante tempus praedictum, propter tres rationes, quas Rabbi Moyses assignat. Prima est ne gentes appropriarent sibi locum illum. Secunda est ne gentes ipsum destruerent. Tertia vero ratio est ne quaelibet tribus vellet habere locum illum in sorte sua, et propter hoc orirentur lites et iurgia. Et ideo non fuit aedificatum templum donec haberent regem, per quem posset huiusmodi iurgium compesci. Antea vero ad cultum Dei erat ordinatum tabernaculum portatile per diversa loca, quasi nondum existente determinato loco divini cultus. Et haec est ratio litteralis diversitatis tabernaculi et templi. Ratio autem figuralis esse potest quia per haec duo significatur duplex status. Per tabernaculum enim, quod est mutabile, significatur status praesentis vitae mutabilis. Per templum vero, quod erat fixum et stans, significatur status futurae vitae, quae omnino invariabilis est. Et propter hoc in aedificatione templi dicitur quod non est auditus sonitus mallei vel securis, ad significandum quod omnis perturbationis tumultus longe erit a statu futuro. Vel per tabernaculum significatur status veteris legis, per templum autem a Salomone constructum, status novae legis. Unde ad constructionem tabernaculi soli Iudaei sunt operati, ad aedificationem vero templi cooperati sunt etiam gentiles, scilicet Tyrii et Sidonii.

[38053] I^a-II^ae q. 102 a. 4 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod ratio unitatis templi, vel tabernaculi, potest esse et litteralis, et figuralis. Litteralis quidem est ratio ad exclusionem idololatriae. Quia gentiles diversis diis diversa templa constituebant, et ideo, ut firmaretur in animis hominum fides unitatis divinae, voluit Deus ut in uno loco tantum sibi sacrificium offerretur. Et iterum ut per hoc ostenderet quod corporalis cultus non propter se erat ei acceptus. Et ideo compescebantur ne passim et ubique sacrificia offerrent. Sed cultus novae legis, in cuius sacrificio spiritualis gratia continetur, est secundum se Deo acceptus. Et ideo multiplicatio altarium et templorum acceptatur in nova lege. Quantum vero ad ea quae pertinebant ad spiritualem cultum Dei, qui consistit in doctrina legis et prophetarum, erant etiam in veteri lege diversa loca deputata in quibus conveniebant ad laudem Dei, quae dicebantur synagogae, sicut et nunc dicuntur Ecclesiae, in quibus populus Christianus ad laudem Dei congregatur. Et sic Ecclesia nostra succedit in locum et templi et synagogae, quia ipsum sacrificium Ecclesiae spirituale est; unde non distinguitur apud nos locus sacrificii a loco doctrinae. Ratio autem figuralis esse potest quia per hoc significatur unitas Ecclesiae, vel militantis vel triumphantis.

[38054] I^a-II^ae q. 102 a. 4 ad 4

Ad quartum dicendum quod, sicut in unitate templi, vel tabernaculi, repraesentabatur unitas Dei, vel unitas Ecclesiae; ita etiam in distinctione tabernaculi, vel templi, repraesentabatur distinctio eorum quae Deo sunt subiecta, ex quibus in Dei venerationem consurgimus. Distinguebatur autem tabernaculum in duas partes, in unam quae vocabatur sancta sanctorum, quae erat Occidentalis; et aliam quae vocabatur sancta, quae erat ad orientem. Et iterum ante tabernaculum erat atrium. Haec igitur distinctio duplicem habet rationem. Unam quidem, secundum quod tabernaculum ordinatur ad cultum Dei. Sic enim diversae partes mundi in distinctione tabernaculi figurantur. Nam pars illa quae sancta sanctorum dicitur, figurabat saeculum altius, quod est spiritualium substantiarum, pars vero illa quae dicitur sancta, exprimebat mundum corporalem. Et ideo sancta a sanctis sanctorum distinguebantur quodam velo, quod quatuor coloribus erat distinctum, per quos quatuor elementa designantur, scilicet bysso, per quod designatur terra, quia byssus, idest linum, de terra nascitur; purpura, per quam significatur aqua, fiebat enim purpureus color ex quibusdam conchis quae inveniuntur in mari; hyacintho, per quem significatur aer, quia habet aereum colorem; et cocco bis tincto, per quem designatur ignis. Et hoc ideo quia materia quatuor elementorum est impedimentum per quod velantur nobis incorporales substantiae. Et ideo in interius tabernaculum, idest in sancta sanctorum, solus summus sacerdos, et semel in anno, introibat, ut designaretur quod haec est finalis perfectio hominis, ut ad illud saeculum introducat. In tabernaculum vero exterius, idest in sancta, introibant sacerdotes quotidie, non autem populus, qui solum ad atrium accedebat, quia ipsa corpora populus percipere potest; ad interiores autem eorum rationes soli sapientes per considerationem attingere possunt. Secundum vero rationem figuralem, per exterius tabernaculum, quod dicitur sancta, significatur status veteris legis, ut apostolus dicit, ad Heb. IX, quia ad illud tabernaculum semper introibant sacerdotes sacrificiorum officia consummantes. Per interius vero tabernaculum, quod dicitur sancta sanctorum, significatur vel caelestis gloria, vel etiam status spiritualis novae legis, qui est quaedam inchoatio futurae gloriae. In quem statum nos Christus introduxit, quod figurabatur per hoc quod summus sacerdos, semel in anno, solus in sancta sanctorum intrabat. Velum autem figurabat spiritualium occultationem sacrificiorum in veteribus sacrificiis. Quod velum quatuor coloribus erat ornatum, bysso quidem, ad designandam carnis puritatem; purpura autem, ad figurandum passiones quas sancti sustinuerunt pro Deo; cocco bis tincto, ad significandum caritatem geminam Dei et proximi; hyacintho autem significabatur caelestis meditatio. Ad statum autem veteris legis aliter se habebat populus, et aliter sacerdotes. Nam populus ipsa corporalia sacrificia considerabat, quae in atrio offerebantur. Sacerdotes vero rationem sacrificiorum considerabant, habentes fidem magis explicitam de mysteriis Christi. Et ideo intrabant in exterius tabernaculum. Quod etiam quodam velo distinguebatur ab atrio, quia quaedam erant velata populo circa mysterium Christi, quae sacerdotibus erant nota. Non tamen erant eis plene revelata, sicut postea in novo testamento, ut habetur Ephes. III.

[38055] I^a-II^ae q. 102 a. 4 ad 5

Ad quintum dicendum quod adoratio ad occidentem fuit introducta in lege ad excludendam idololatriam, nam omnes gentiles, in reverentiam solis, adorabant ad orientem; unde dicitur Ezech. VIII, quod quidam habebant dorsa contra templum domini et facies ad orientem, et adorabant ad ortum solis. Unde ad hoc excludendum, tabernaculum habebat sancta sanctorum ad occidentem, ut versus occidentem adorarent. Ratio etiam figuralis esse potest quia totus status prioris tabernaculi ordinabatur ad figurandum mortem Christi, quae significatur per occasum; secundum illud Psalmi LXVII, qui ascendit super occasum, dominus nomen illi.

[38056] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 4 ad 6

Ad sextum dicendum quod eorum quae in tabernaculo continebantur, ratio reddi potest et litteralis et figuralis. Litteralis quidem, per relationem ad cultum divinum. Et quia dictum est quod per tabernaculum interius, quod dicebatur sancta sanctorum, significabatur saeculum altius spiritualium substantiarum, ideo in illo tabernaculo tria continebantur. Scilicet arca testamenti, in qua erat urna aurea habens manna, et virga Aaron quae fronderat, et tabulae in quibus erant scripta decem praecepta legis. Haec autem arca sita erat inter duos Cherubim, qui se mutuis vultibus respiciebant. Et super arcam erat quaedam tabula, quae dicebatur propitiatorium, super alas Cherubim, quasi ab ipsis Cherubim portaretur, ac si imaginaretur quod illa tabula esset sedes Dei. Unde et propitiatorium dicebatur, quasi exinde populo propitiaretur, ad preces summi sacerdotis. Et ideo quasi portabatur a Cherubim, quasi Deo obsequentibus, arca vero testamenti erat quasi scabellum sedentis supra propitiatorium. Per haec autem tria designantur tria quae sunt in illo altiori saeculo. Scilicet Deus, qui super omnia est, et incomprehensibilis omni creaturae. Et propter hoc nulla similitudo eius ponebatur, ad repraesentandam eius invisibilitatem. Sed ponebatur quaedam figura sedis eius, quia scilicet creatura comprehensibilis est, quae est subiecta Deo, sicut sedes sedenti. Sunt etiam in illo altiori saeculo spirituales substantiae, quae Angeli dicuntur. Et hi significantur per duos Cherubim; mutuo se respicientes, ad designandam concordiam eorum ad invicem, secundum illud Iob XXV, qui facit concordiam in sublimibus. Et propter hoc etiam non fuit unus tantum Cherubim, ut designaretur multitudo caelestium spirituum, et excluderetur cultus eorum ab his quibus praeceptum erat ut solum unum Deum colerent. Sunt etiam in illo intelligibili saeculo rationes omnium eorum quae in hoc saeculo perficiuntur quodammodo clausae, sicut rationes effectuum clauduntur in suis causis, et rationes artificiatorum in artifice. Et hoc significabatur per arcam, in qua repraesentabantur, per tria ibi contenta, tria quae sunt potissima in rebus humanis, scilicet sapientia, quae repraesentabatur per tabulas testamenti; potestas regiminis, quae repraesentabatur per virgam Aaron; vita, quae repraesentabatur per manna, quod fuit sustentamentum vitae. Vel per haec tria significabantur tria Dei attributa, scilicet sapientia, in tabulis; potentia, in virga; bonitas, in manna, tum propter dulcedinem, tum quia ex Dei misericordia est populo datum, et ideo in memoriam divinae misericordiae conservabatur. Et haec tria etiam figurata sunt in visione Isaiae. Vidit enim dominum sedentem super solium excelsum et elevatum; et Seraphim assistentes; et domum impleri a gloria Dei. Unde et Seraphim dicebant, plena est omnis terra gloria eius. Et sic similitudines Seraphim non ponebantur ad cultum, quod prohibebatur primo legis praecepto, sed in signum ministerii, ut dictum est. In exteriori vero tabernaculo, quod significat praesens saeculum, continebantur etiam tria, scilicet altare thymiamatis, quod erat directe contra arcam; mensa propositionis, super quam duodecim panes apponebantur, erat posita ex parte aquilonari; candelabrum vero ex parte Australi. Quae tria videntur respondere tribus quae erant in arca clausa, sed magis manifeste eadem repraesentabant, oportet enim rationes rerum ad manifestiorem demonstrationem perducere quam sint in mente divina et Angelorum, ad hoc quod homines sapientes eas cognoscere possint qui significantur per sacerdotes ingredientes tabernaculum. In candelabro igitur designabatur, sicut in signo sensibili, sapientia quae intelligibilibus verbis exprimebatur in tabulis. Per altare vero thymiamatis significabatur officium sacerdotum, quorum erat populum ad Deum reducere, et hoc etiam significabatur per virgam. Nam in illo altari incedebatur thymiana boni odoris, per quod significabatur sanctitas populi acceptabilis Deo, dicitur enim Apoc. VIII, quod per fumum aromatum significantur iustificationes sanctorum. Convenienter autem sacerdotalis dignitas in arca significabatur per virgam, in exteriori vero tabernaculo per altare thymiamatis, quia sacerdos mediator est inter Deum et populum, regens populum per potestatem divinam, quam virga significat; et fructum sui regiminis, scilicet sanctitatem populi, Deo offert, quasi in altari thymiamatis. Per mensam autem significatur nutrimentum vitae, sicut et per manna. Sed hoc est communius et grossius nutrimentum, illud autem suavius et subtilius. Convenienter autem candelabrum ponebatur ex parte Australi, mensa autem ex parte aquilonari, quia Australis pars est dextera pars mundi, aquilonaris autem sinistra, ut dicitur in II de caelo et mundo; sapientia autem pertinet ad dextram, sicut et cetera spiritualia bona; temporale autem nutrimentum ad sinistram, secundum illud Prov. III, in sinistra illius divitiae et gloria. Potestas autem sacerdotalis media est inter temporalia et spiritualem sapientiam, quia per eam et spiritualis sapientia et temporalia dispensantur. Potest autem et horum alia ratio assignari magis litteralis. In arca enim continebantur tabulae legis, ad tollendam legis oblivionem, unde dicitur Exod. XXIV, dabo tibi duas tabulas lapideas et legem ac mandata quae scripsi, ut doceas filios Israel. Virga vero Aaron ponebatur ibi ad comprimendam dissensionem populi de sacerdotio Aaron, unde dicitur Num. XVII, refer virgam Aaron in tabernaculum testimonii, ut servetur in signum rebellium filiorum Israel. Manna autem conservabatur in arca, ad commemorandum beneficium quod dominus praestitit filiis Israel in deserto, unde dicitur Exod. XVI, imple gomor ex eo, et custodiatur in futuras retro generationes, ut noverint panes de quibus alui vos in solitudine. Candelabrum vero erat institutum ad honorificentiam tabernaculi, pertinet enim ad magnificentiam domus quod sit bene luminosa. Habebat autem candelabrum septem calamos, ut Iosephus dicit, ad significandum septem planetas, quibus totus mundus illuminatur. Et ideo ponebatur candelabrum ex parte Australi, quia ex illa parte est nobis planetarum cursus. Altare vero thymiamatis erat institutum ut iugiter in tabernaculo esset fumus boni odoris, tum propter venerationem tabernaculi; tum etiam in remedium fetoris quem oportebat accidere ex effusione sanguinis et occisione animalium. Ea enim quae sunt fetida, despiciuntur quasi vilia, quae vero sunt boni odoris, homines magis appetant. Mensa autem apponebatur ad significandum quod sacerdotes templo servientes, in templo victum habere debebant, unde duodecim panes superpositos mensae, in memoriam duodecim tribuum, solis sacerdotibus edere licitum erat, ut habetur Matth. XII. Mensa autem non ponebatur directe in medio ante propitiatorium, ad excludendum ritum idololatriae, nam gentiles in sacris lunae proponebant mensam coram idolo lunae; unde dicitur Ierem. VII, mulieres conspergunt adipem ut faciant placentas reginae caeli. In atrio vero extra tabernaculum continebatur altare holocaustorum, in quo offerebantur Deo sacrificia de his quae erant a populo possessa. Et ideo in atrio poterat esse populus, qui huiusmodi Deo offerebat per manus sacerdotum. Sed ad altare interiorius, in quo ipsa devotio et sanctitas populi Deo offerebatur, non poterant accedere nisi sacerdotes, quorum erat Deo offerre populum. Est autem hoc altare extra tabernaculum in atrio constitutum, ad removendum cultum idololatriae, nam gentiles infra templa altaria constituebant ad immolandum idolis. Figuralis vero ratio omnium horum assignari potest ex relatione tabernaculi ad Christum, qui figurabatur. Est autem considerandum quod ad designandum imperfectionem legalium figurarum, diversae figurae fuerunt institutae in templo ad significandum Christum. Ipse enim significatur per propitiatorium, quia ipse est propitiatio pro peccatis nostris, ut dicitur I Ioan. II. Et convenienter hoc propitiatorium a Cherubim portatur, quia de eo scriptum est, adorent eum omnes Angeli Dei, ut habetur Heb. I. Ipse etiam significatur per arcam, quia sicut arca erat constructa de lignis setim, ita corpus Christi de membris purissimis constabat. Erat autem deaurata, quia Christus fuit plenus sapientia et caritate, quae per aurum significantur. Intra arcam autem erat urna aurea, idest sancta anima; habens manna, idest omnem plenitudinem divinitatis. Erat etiam in arca virga, idest potestas sacerdotalis, quia ipse est factus sacerdos in aeternum. Erant etiam ibi tabulae testamenti, ad designandum quod ipse Christus est legis dator. Ipse etiam Christus significatur per candelabrum, quia ipse dicit, ego sum lux mundi, per septem lucernas, septem dona spiritus sancti. Ipse est spiritualis cibus, secundum illud Ioan. VI, ego sum panis vivus, duodecim autem panes significant duodecim apostolos, vel doctrinam eorum. Sive per candelabrum et mensam potest significari doctrina et fides Ecclesiae, quae etiam illuminat et spiritualiter reficit. Ipse etiam Christus significatur per duplex altare holocaustorum et thymiamatis. Quia per ipsum oportet nos Deo offerre omnia virtutum opera, sive illa quibus carnem affligimus, quae offeruntur quasi in altari holocaustorum; sive illa quae, maiore mentis perfectione, per spiritualia perfectorum desideria, Deo offeruntur in Christo, quasi in altari thymiamatis, secundum illud ad Heb. ult., per ipsum ergo offeramus hostiam laudis semper Deo.

[38057] I³-IIae q. 102 a. 4 ad 7

Ad septimum dicendum quod dominus praecepit altare construi ad sacrificia et munera offerenda, in honorem Dei et sustentationem ministrorum qui tabernaculo deserviebant. De constructione autem altaris datur a domino duplex praeceptum. Unum quidem in principio legis, Exod. XX, ubi dominus mandavit quod facerent altare de terra, vel saltem de lapidibus non sectis; et iterum quod non facerent altare excelsum, ad quod oporteret per gradus ascendere. Et hoc, ad detestandum idololatriae cultum, gentiles enim idolis construebant altaria ornata et sublimia, in quibus credebant aliquid sanctitatis et numinis esse. Propter quod etiam dominus mandavit, Deut. XVI, non plantabis lucum, et omnem arborem, iuxta altare domini Dei tui, idololatrae enim consueverunt sub arboribus sacrificare, propter amoenitatem et umbrositatem. Quorum etiam praeceptorum ratio figuralis fuit. Quia in Christo, qui est nostrum altare, debemus confiteri veram carnis naturam, quantum ad humanitatem, quod est altare de terra facere, et quantum ad divinitatem, debemus in eo confiteri patris aequalitatem, quod est non ascendere per gradus ad altare. Nec etiam iuxta Christum debemus admittere doctrinam gentilium, ad lasciviam provocantem. Sed factio tabernaculo ad honorem Dei, non erant timendae huiusmodi occasiones idololatriae. Et ideo dominus mandavit quod fieret altare holocaustorum de aere, quod esset omni populo conspicuum; et altare thymiamatis de auro, quod soli sacerdotes videbant. Nec erat tanta pretiositas aeris ut per hoc populus ad aliquam idololatriam provocaretur. Sed quia Exod. XX ponitur pro ratione huius praecepti, non ascendes per gradus ad altare meum, id quod subditur, ne reveletur turpitudine tua; considerandum est quod hoc etiam fuit institutum ad excludendam idololatriam, nam in sacris Priapi sua pudenda gentiles populo denudabant. Postmodum autem indictus est sacerdotibus feminalium usus ad tegimen pudendorum. Et ideo sine periculo institui potuit tanta altaris altitudo ut per aliquos gradus ligneos, non stantes sed portatiles, in hora sacrificii, sacerdotes ad altare ascenderent sacrificia offerentes.

[38058] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 4 ad 8

Ad octavum dicendum quod corpus tabernaculi constabat ex quibusdam tabulis in longitudinem erectis, quae quidem interius tegebantur quibusdam cortinis ex quatuor coloribus variatis, scilicet de bysso retorta, et hyacintho, ac purpura, coccoque bis tincto. Sed huiusmodi cortinae tegebant solum latera tabernaculi, in tecto autem tabernaculi erat operimentum unum de pellibus hyacinthinis; et super hoc aliud de pellibus arietum rubricatis; et desuper tertium de quibusdam sagis cilicinis, quae non tantum operiebant tectum tabernaculi, sed etiam descendebant usque terram, et tegebant tabulas tabernaculi exterius. Horum autem operimentorum ratio litteralis in communi erat ornatus et protectio tabernaculi, ut in reverentia haberetur. In speciali vero, secundum quosdam, per cortinas designabatur caelum sydereum, quod est diversis stellis variatum; per saga, aquae quae sunt supra firmamentum; per pelles rubricatas, caelum Empyreum, in quo sunt Angeli; per pelles hyacinthinas, caelum sanctae Trinitatis. Figuralis autem ratio horum est quia per tabulas ex quibus construebatur tabernaculum, significantur Christi fideles, ex quibus construitur Ecclesia. Tegebantur autem interius tabulae cortinis quadricoloribus, quia fideles interius ornantur quatuor virtutibus; nam in bysso retorta, ut Glossa dicit, significatur caro castitate renitens; in hyacintho, mens superna cupiens; in purpura, caro passionibus subiacens; in cocco bis tincto, mens inter passiones Dei et proximi dilectione praeifulgens. Per operimenta vero tecti designantur praelati et doctores, in quibus debet renitere caelestis conversatio, quod significatur per pelles hyacinthinas; promptitudo ad martyrium, quod significant pelles rubricatae; austeritas vitae et tolerantia adversorum, quae significantur per saga cilicina, quae erant exposita ventis et pluviis, ut Glossa dicit.

[38059] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 4 ad 9

Ad nonum dicendum quod sanctificatio tabernaculi et vasorum eius habebat causam litteralem ut in maiori reverentia haberetur, quasi per huiusmodi consecrationem divino cultui deputatum. Figuralis autem ratio est quia per huiusmodi sanctificationem significatur spiritualis sanctificatio viventis tabernaculi, scilicet fidelium, ex quibus constituitur Ecclesia Christi.

[38060] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 4 ad 10

Ad decimum dicendum quod in veteri lege erant septem solemnitates temporales, et una continua, ut potest colligi Num. XXVIII et XXIX. Erat enim quasi continuum festum, quia quotidie mane et vespere immolabatur agnus. Et per illud continuum festum iugis sacrificii repraesentabatur perpetuitas divinae beatitudinis. Festorum autem temporalium primum erat quod iterabatur qualibet septimana. Et haec erat solemnitas sabbati, quod celebrabatur in memoriam creationis rerum, ut supra dictum est. Alia autem solemnitas iterabatur quolibet mense, scilicet festum Neomeniae, quod celebrabatur ad commemorandum opus divinae gubernationis. Nam haec inferiora praecipue variantur secundum motum lunae, et ideo celebrabatur hoc festum in novitate lunae. Non autem in eius plenitudine, ad evitandum idololatrarum cultum, qui in tali tempore lunae sacrificabant. Haec autem duo beneficia sunt communia toti humano generi, et ideo frequentius iterabantur. Alia vero quinque festa celebrabantur semel in anno, et recolebantur in eis beneficia specialiter illi populo exhibita. Celebrabatur enim festum phase primo mense, ad commemorandum beneficium liberationis ex Aegypto. Celebrabatur autem festum Pentecostes post quinquaginta dies, ad recolendum beneficium legis datae. Alia vero tria festa celebrabantur in mense septimo, qui quasi totus apud eos erat solemnis, sicut et septimus dies. In prima enim die mensis septimi erat festum tubarum, in memoriam liberationis Isaac, quando Abraham invenit arietem haerentem cornibus, quem repraesentabant per cornua quibus buccinabant. Erat autem festum tubarum quasi quaedam invitatio ut praepararent se ad sequens festum, quod celebrabatur decimo die. Et hoc erat festum expiationis, in memoriam illius beneficii quo Deus propitiatus est peccato populi de adoratione vituli, ad preces Moysi. Post hoc autem celebrabatur festum Scenopegiae, idest tabernaculorum, septem diebus, ad commemorandum beneficium divinae protectionis et deductionis per desertum, ubi in tabernaculis habitaverunt. Unde in hoc festo debebant habere fructum arboris pulcherrimae, idest citrum, et lignum densarum frondium, idest myrtum, quae sunt odorifera; et spatulas palmarum, et salices de torrente, quae diu retinent suum virorem; et haec inveniuntur in terra promissionis; ad significandum quod per aridam terram deserti eos duxerat Deus ad terram deliciosam. Octavo autem die celebrabatur aliud festum, scilicet coetus atque collectae, in quo colligebantur a populo ea quae erant necessaria ad expensas cultus divini. Et significabatur adunatio populi et pax praestita in terra promissionis. Figuralis autem ratio horum festorum est quia per iuge sacrificium agni figuratur perpetuitas Christi, qui est agnus Dei; secundum illud Heb. ult., Jesus Christus heri et hodie, ipse et in saecula. Per sabbatum autem significatur spiritualis requies nobis data per Christum, ut habetur ad Heb. IV. Per Neomeniam autem, quae est incoeptio novae lunae, significatur illuminatio primitivae Ecclesiae per Christum, eo praedicante et miracula faciente. Per festum autem Pentecostes significatur descensus spiritus sancti in apostolos. Per festum autem tubarum significatur praedicatio apostolorum. Per festum autem expiationis significatur emundatio a peccatis populi Christiani. Per festum autem tabernaculorum, peregrinatio eorum in hoc mundo, in quo ambulant in virtutibus proficiendo. Per festum autem coetus atque collectae significatur congregatio fidelium in regno caelorum, et ideo istud festum dicebatur sanctissimum esse. Et haec tria festa erant continua ad invicem, quia oportet expiatis a vitiis proficere in virtute, quousque perveniant ad Dei visionem, ut dicitur in Psalmo LXXXIII.

Articulus 5

[38061] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 5 arg. 1

Ad quintum sic proceditur. Videtur quod sacramentorum veteris legis conveniens causa esse non possit. Ea enim quae ad cultum divinum fiunt, non debent esse similia his quae idololatrae observabant, dicitur enim Deut. XII, non facies similiter domino Deo tuo, omnes enim abominationes quas aversatur dominus, fecerunt diis suis. Sed cultores idolorum in eorum cultu se incidebant usque ad effusionem sanguinis, dicitur enim III Reg. XVIII, quod incidebant se, iuxta ritum suum, cultris et lanceolis, donec perfunderentur sanguine. Propter quod dominus mandavit, Deut. XIV, non vos incidetis, nec facietis calvitium super mortuo. Inconvenienter igitur circumcisio erat instituta in lege.

[38062] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 5 arg. 2

Praeterea, ea quae in cultum divinum fiunt, debent honestatem et gravitatem habere; secundum illud Psalmi XXXIV, in populo gravi laudabo te. Sed ad levitatem quandam pertinere videtur ut homines festinanter comedant. Inconvenienter igitur praeceptum est, Exod. XII, ut comederent festinanter agnum paschalem. Et alia etiam circa eius comestionem sunt instituta, quae videntur omnino irrationabilia esse.

[38063] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 5 arg. 3

Praeterea, sacramenta veteris legis figurae fuerunt sacramentorum novae legis. Sed per agnum paschalem significatur sacramentum Eucharistiae; secundum illud I ad Cor. V, Pascha nostrum immolatus est Christus. Ergo etiam debuerunt esse aliqua sacramenta in lege quae praefigurarent alia sacramenta novae legis, sicut confirmationem et extremam unctionem et matrimonium, et alia sacramenta.

[38064] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 5 arg. 4

Praeterea, purificatio non potest convenienter fieri nisi ab aliquibus immunditiis. Sed quantum ad Deum, nullum corporale reputatur immundum, quia omne corpus creatura Dei est; et omnis creatura Dei bona, et nihil reiiciendum quod cum gratiarum actione percipitur, ut dicitur I ad Tim. IV. Inconvenienter igitur purificabantur propter contactum hominis mortui, vel alicuius huiusmodi corporalis infectionis.

[38065] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 5 arg. 5

Praeterea, Eccli. XXXIV dicitur, ab immundo quid mundabitur? Sed cinis vitulae rufae quae comburebatur, immundus erat, quia immundum reddebat, dicitur enim Num. XIX, quod sacerdos qui immolabat eam, commaculatus erat usque ad vesperum; similiter et ille qui eam comburebat; et etiam ille qui eius cineres colligebat. Ergo inconvenienter praeceptum ibi fuit ut per huiusmodi cinerem aspersum immundi purificarentur.

[38066] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 5 arg. 6

Praeterea, peccata non sunt aliquid corporale, quod possit deferri de loco ad locum, neque etiam per aliquid immundum potest homo a peccato mundari. Inconvenienter igitur ad expiationem peccatorum populi, sacerdos super unum hircorum confitebatur peccata filiorum Israel, ut portaret ea in desertum, per alium autem, quo utebantur ad purificationes, simul cum vitulo comburentes extra castra, immundi reddebantur, ita quod oportebat eos lavare vestimenta et carnem aqua.

[38067] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 5 arg. 7

Praeterea, illud quod iam est mundatum, non oportet iterum mundari. Inconvenienter igitur, mundata lepra hominis, vel etiam domus, alia purificatio adhibebatur; ut habetur Levit. XIV.

[38068] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 5 arg. 8

Praeterea, spiritualis immunditia non potest per corporalem aquam, vel pilorum rasuram, emundari. Irrationabile igitur videtur quod dominus praecepit Exod. XXX, ut fieret labium aeneum cum basi sua ad lavandum manus et pedes sacerdotum qui ingressuri erant tabernaculum; et quod praecipitur Num. VIII, quod Levitae abstergerentur aqua lustrationis, et raderent omnes pilos carnis suae.

[38069] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 5 arg. 9

Praeterea, quod maius est, non potest sanctificari per illud quod minus

est. Inconvenienter igitur per quandam unctionem corporalem, et corporalia sacrificia, et oblationes corporales, fiebat in lege consecratio maiorum et minorum sacerdotum, ut habetur Levit. VIII; et Levitarum, ut habetur Num. VIII.

[38070] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 5 arg. 10

Praeterea, sicut dicitur I Reg. XVI, homines vident ea quae parent, Deus autem intuetur cor. Sed ea quae exterius parent in homine, est corporalis dispositio, et etiam indumenta. Inconvenienter igitur sacerdotibus maioribus et minoribus quaedam specialia vestimenta deputabantur, de quibus habetur Exod. XXVIII. Et sine ratione videtur quod prohiberetur aliquis a sacerdotio propter corporales defectus, secundum quod dicitur Levit. XXI, homo de semine tuo per familias qui habuerit maculam, non offeret panes Deo suo, si caecus fuerit, vel claudus, et cetera. Sic igitur videtur quod sacramenta veteris legis irrationabilia fuerint.

[38071] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 5 s. c.

Sed contra est quod dicitur Levit. XX, ego sum dominus, qui sanctifico vos. Sed a Deo nihil sine ratione fit, dicitur enim in Psalmo CIII, omnia in sapientia fecisti. Ergo in sacramentis veteris legis, quae ordinabantur ad hominum sanctificationem, nihil erat sine rationabili causa.

[38072] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 5 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod, sicut supra dictum est, sacramenta proprie dicuntur illa quae adhibebantur Dei cultoribus ad quandam consecrationem, per quam scilicet deputabantur quodammodo ad cultum Dei. Cultus autem Dei generali quidem modo pertinebat ad totum populum; sed speciali modo pertinebat ad sacerdotes et Levitas, qui erant ministri cultus divini. Et ideo in istis sacramentis veteris legis quaedam pertinebant communiter ad totum populum; quaedam autem specialiter ad ministros. Et circa utrosque tria erant necessaria. Quorum primum est institutio in statu colendi Deum. Et haec quidem institutio communiter quantum ad omnes, fiebat per circumcisionem, sine qua nullus admittebatur ad aliquid legalium, quantum vero ad sacerdotes, per sacerdotum consecrationem. Secundo requirebatur usus eorum quae pertinent ad divinum cultum. Et sic quantum ad populum, erat esus paschalis convivii, ad quem nullus incircumciscus admittebatur, ut patet Exod. XII, et quantum ad sacerdotes, oblatio victimarum, et esus panum propositionis et aliorum quae erant sacerdotum usibus deputata. Tertio requirebatur remotio eorum per quae aliqui impediabantur a cultu divino, scilicet immunditiarum. Et sic quantum ad populum, erant institutae quaedam purificationes a quibusdam exterioribus immunditiis, et etiam expiationes a peccatis, quantum vero ad sacerdotes et Levitas, erat instituta ablutio manuum et pedum, et rasio pilorum. Et haec omnia habebant rationabiles causas et litterales, secundum quod ordinabantur ad cultum Dei pro tempore illo; et figurales, secundum quod ordinabantur ad figurandum Christum; ut patebit per singula.

[38073] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 5 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod litteralis ratio circumcisionis principalis quidem fuit ad protestationem fidei unius Dei. Et quia Abraham fuit primus qui se ab infidelibus separavit, exiens de domo sua et de cognatione sua, ideo ipse primus circumcisionem accepit. Et hanc causam assignat apostolus, ad Rom. IV, signum accepit circumcisionis, signaculum iustitiae fidei quae est in praepotio, quia scilicet in hoc legitur Abrahae fides reputata ad iustitiam, quod contra spem in spem credidit, scilicet contra spem naturae in spem gratiae, ut fieret pater multarum gentium, cum ipse esset senex, et uxor sua esset anus et sterilis. Et ut haec protestatio, et imitatio fidei Abrahae, firmaretur in cordibus Iudaeorum, acceperunt signum in carne sua, cuius oblivisci non possent, unde dicitur Gen. XVII, erit pactum meum in carne vestra in foedus aeternum. Ideo autem fiebat octava die, quia antea puer est valde tenellus, et posset ex hoc graviter laedi, et reputatur adhuc quasi quiddam non solidatum, unde etiam nec animalia offerebantur ante octavum diem. Ideo vero non magis tardabatur, ne propter dolorem aliqui signum circumcisionis refugerent, et ne parentes etiam, quorum amor increscit ad filios post frequentem conversationem et eorum augmentum, eos circumcisioni subtraherent. Secunda ratio esse potuit ad debilitationem concupiscentiae in membro illo. Tertia ratio, in sugillationem sacrorum Veneris et Priapi, in quibus illa pars corporis honorabatur. Dominus autem non prohibuit nisi incisionem quae in cultum idolorum fiebat, cui non erat similis praedicta circumcisio. Figuralis vero ratio circumcisionis erat quia figurabatur ablutio corruptionis fienda per Christum, quae perfecte complebitur in octava aetate, quae est aetas resurgentium. Et quia omnis corruptio culpae et poenae provenit in nos per carnalem originem ex peccato primi parentis, ideo talis circumcisio fiebat in membro generationis. Unde apostolus dicit, ad Colos. II, circumcisi estis in Christo circumcissione non manu facta in expoliatione corporis carnis, sed in circumcissione domini nostri Iesu Christi.

[38074] I^a-II^ae q. 102 a. 5 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod litteralis ratio paschalis convivii fuit in commemorationem beneficii quo Deus eduxit eos de Aegypto. Unde per huiusmodi convivii celebrationem profitebantur se ad illum populum pertinere quem Deus sibi assumpserat ex Aegypto. Quando enim sunt ex Aegypto liberati, praeceptum est eis ut sanguine agni linirent superliminaria domorum, quasi protestantes se recedere a ritibus Aegyptiorum, qui arietem colebant. Unde et liberati sunt per sanguinis agni aspersionem vel linitionem in postibus domorum, a periculo exterminii quod imminebat Aegyptiis. In illo autem exitu eorum de Aegypto duo fuerunt, scilicet festinantia ad egrediendum, impellebant enim eos Aegyptii ut exirent velociter, ut habetur Exod. XII; imminebatque periculum ei qui non festinaret exire cum multitudine, ne remanens occideretur ab Aegyptiis. Festinantia autem designabatur dupliciter. Uno quidem modo per ea quae comedebant. Praeceptum enim erat eis quod comederent panes azymos, in huius signum, quod non poterant fermentari, cogentibus exire Aegyptiis; et quod comederent assum igni, sic enim velocius praeparabatur; et quod os non comminuerent ex eo, quia in festinantia non vacat ossa frangere. Alio modo, quantum ad modum comedendi. Dicitur enim, renes vestros accingetis, calceamenta habebitis in pedibus, tenentes baculos in manibus, et comedetis festinanter, quod manifeste designat homines existentes in promptu itineris. Ad idem etiam pertinet quod eis praecipitur, in una domo comedetis, neque feretis de carnibus eius foras, quia scilicet, propter festinantiam, non vacabat invicem mittere exennia. Amaritudo autem quam passi fuerant in Aegypto, significabatur per lactucas agrestes. Figuralis autem ratio patet. Quia per immolationem agni paschalis significabatur immolatio Christi; secundum illud I ad Cor. V, Pascha nostrum immolatus est Christus. Sanguis vero agni liberans ab exterminatore, linitis superliminaribus domorum, significat fidem passionis Christi in corde et ore fidelium, per quam liberamur a peccato et a morte; secundum illud I Petr. I, redempti estis pretioso sanguine agni immaculati. Comedebantur autem carnes illae, ad significandum esum corporis Christi in sacramento. Erant autem assae igni, ad significandum passionem, vel caritatem Christi. Comedebantur autem cum azymis panibus, ad significandam puram conversationem fidelium sumentium corpus Christi, secundum illud I ad Cor. V, epulemur in azymis sinceritatis et veritatis. Lactucae autem agrestes addebantur, in signum poenitentiae peccatorum, quae necessaria est sumentibus corpus Christi. Renes autem accingendi sunt cingulo castitatis. Calceamenta autem pedum sunt exempla mortuorum patrum. Baculi autem habendi in manibus, significant pastoralementiam custodiam. Praecipitur autem quod in una domo agnus paschalis comedatur, idest in Ecclesia Catholicorum, non in conventiculis haereticorum.

[38075] I^a-II^ae q. 102 a. 5 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod quaedam sacramenta novae legis habuerunt in veteri lege sacramenta figuralia sibi correspondentia. Nam circumcisioni respondet Baptismus, qui est fidei sacramentum, unde dicitur ad Col. II, circumcisi estis in circumcissione domini nostri Iesu Christi, consepulti ei in Baptismo. Convivio vero agni paschalis respondet in nova lege sacramentum Eucharistiae. Omnibus autem purificationibus veteris legis respondet in nova lege sacramentum poenitentiae. Consecrationi autem pontificum et sacerdotum respondet sacramentum ordinis. Sacramento autem confirmationis, quod est sacramentum plenitudinis gratiae, non potest respondere in veteri lege aliquod sacramentum, quia nondum advenerat tempus plenitudinis, eo quod neminem ad perfectum adduxit lex. Similiter autem et sacramento extremae unctionis, quod est quaedam immediata praeparatio ad introitum gloriae, cuius aditus nondum patebat in veteri lege, pretio nondum soluto. Matrimonium autem fuit quidem in veteri lege prout erat in officium naturae; non autem prout est sacramentum coniunctionis Christi et Ecclesiae, quae nondum erat facta. Unde et in veteri lege dabatur libellus repudii, quod est contra sacramenti rationem.

[38076] I^a-II^ae q. 102 a. 5 ad 4

Ad quartum dicendum quod, sicut dictum est, purificationes veteris legis ordinabantur ad removendum impedimenta cultus divini. Qui quidem est duplex, scilicet spiritualis, qui consistit in devotione mentis ad Deum; et corporalis, qui consistit in sacrificiis et oblationibus et aliis huiusmodi. A cultu autem spirituali impediuntur homines per peccata, quibus homines pollui dicebantur, sicut per idololatriam et homicidium, per adulteria et incestus. Et ab istis pollutionibus purificabantur homines per aliqua sacrificia vel communiter oblata pro tota multitudine, vel etiam pro peccatis singulorum. Non quod sacrificia illa carnalia haberent ex seipsis virtutem expiandi peccatum, sed quia significabant expiationem peccatorum futuram per Christum, cuius participes erant etiam antiqui, protestantes fidem redemptoris in figuris sacrificiorum. A cultu vero exteriori impediabantur homines per quasdam immunditias corporales, quae quidem primo considerabantur in hominibus; consequenter etiam in aliis animalibus, et in vestimentis et domibus et vasis. In hominibus quidem immunditia reputabatur partim quidem ex ipsis hominibus; partim autem ex contactu rerum immundarum. Ex ipsis autem hominibus immundum reputabatur omne illud quod corruptionem aliquam iam habebat, vel erat corruptioni expositum. Et ideo, quia mors est corruptio quaedam, cadaver hominis reputabatur immundum. Similiter etiam, quia lepra ex corruptione humorum contingit, qui etiam exterius erumpunt et alios inficiunt, leprosi etiam reputabantur immundi. Similiter etiam mulieres patientes sanguinis fluxum, sive per infirmitatem, sive etiam per naturam vel temporibus menstruis vel etiam tempore conceptionis. Et eadem ratione viri reputabantur immundi fluxum seminis patientes, vel per infirmitatem, vel per pollutionem nocturnam, vel etiam per coitum. Nam omnis humiditas praedictis modis ab homine egrediens, quandam immundam infectionem habet. Inerat etiam hominibus immunditia quaedam ex contactu quarumcumque rerum immundarum. Istarum autem immunditiarum ratio erat et litteralis, et figuralis. Litteralis quidem, propter reverentiam eorum quae ad divinum cultum pertinent. Tum quia homines pretiosas res contingere non solent cum fuerint immundi. Tum etiam ut ex raro accessu ad sacra, ea magis venerarentur. Cum enim omnes huiusmodi immunditias raro aliquis cavere possit, contingebat quod raro poterant homines accedere ad attingendum ea quae pertinebant ad divinum cultum, et sic quando accedebant, cum maiori reverentia et humilitate mentis accedebant. Erat autem in quibusdam horum ratio litteralis ut homines non reformidarent accedere ad divinum cultum, quasi refugientes consortium leprosum et similium infirmorum, quorum morbus abominabilis erat et contagiosus. In quibusdam etiam ratio erat ad vitandum idololatriae cultum, quia gentiles in ritu suorum sacrificiorum utebantur quandoque humano sanguine et semine. Omnes autem huiusmodi immunditiae corporales purificabantur vel per solam aspersionem aquae, vel quae maiores erant, per aliquod sacrificium ad expiandum peccatum, ex quo tales infirmitates contingebant. Ratio autem figuralis harum immunditiarum fuit quia per huiusmodi exteriores immunditias figurabantur diversa peccata. Nam immunditia cadaveris cuiuscumque significat immunditiam peccati, quod est mors animae. Immunditia autem leprae significat immunditiam haereticae doctrinae, tum quia haeretica doctrina contagiosa est, sicut et lepra; tum etiam quia nulla falsa doctrina est quae vera falsis non admisceat, sicut etiam in superficie corporis leprosi apparet quaedam distinctio quarundam macularum ab alia carne integra. Per immunditiam vero mulieris sanguinifluae, designatur immunditia idololatriae, propter immolatum cruorem. Per immunditiam vero viri seminiflui, designatur immunditia vanae locutionis, eo quod semen est verbum Dei. Per immunditiam vero coitus, et mulieris parientis, designatur immunditia peccati originalis. Per immunditiam vero mulieris menstruatae, designatur immunditia mentis per voluptates emollitae. Universaliter vero per immunditiam contactus rei immundae designatur immunditia consensus in peccatum alterius; secundum illud II ad Cor. VI, exite de medio eorum et separamini, et immundum ne tetigeritis. Huiusmodi autem immunditia contactus derivabatur etiam ad res inanimatas, quidquid enim quocumque modo tangebatur immundus, immundum erat. In quo lex attenuavit superstitionem gentilium, qui non solum per contactum immundi dicebant immunditiam contrahi, sed etiam per colloquutionem aut per aspectum, ut Rabbi Moyses dicit de muliere menstruata. Per hoc autem mystice significabatur id quod dicitur Sap. XIV, similiter odio sunt Deo impius et impietas eius. Erat autem et immunditia quaedam ipsarum rerum inanimatarum secundum se, sicut erat immunditia leprae in domo et in vestimentis. Sicut enim morbus leprae accidit in hominibus ex humore corrupto putrefaciente carnem et corrumpente, ita etiam propter aliquam corruptionem et excessum humiditatis vel siccitatis, fit quandoque aliqua corrosio in lapidibus domus, vel etiam in vestimento. Et ideo hanc corruptionem vocabat lex lepram, ex qua domus vel vestis immunda iudicaretur. Tum quia omnis corruptio ad immunditiam pertinebat, ut dictum est. Tum etiam quia contra huiusmodi corruptionem gentiles deos Penates colebant, et ideo lex praecepit huiusmodi domus, in quibus fuerit talis corruptio perseverans, destrui, et vestes comburi, ad tollendam idololatriae occasionem. Erat etiam et quaedam immunditia vasorum, de qua dicitur Num. XIX, vas quod non habuerit cooperculum et ligaturam desuper, immundum erit. Cuius immunditiae causa est quia in talia vasa de facili poterat aliquid immundum cadere, unde poterant immundari. Erat etiam hoc praeceptum ad declinandam idololatriam, credebant enim idololatrae quod, si mures aut lacertae, vel aliquid huiusmodi, quae immolabant idolis, cito caderent in vasa vel in aquas, quod essent diis gratiosa. Adhuc etiam aliquae mulierculae vasa dimittunt discooperta in obsequium nocturnorum numinum, quae ianas vocant. Harum autem immunditiarum ratio est figuralis quia per lepram domus significatur immunditia congregationis haereticorum. Per lepram vero in veste linea significatur perversitas morum ex amaritudine mentis. Per lepram vero vestis laneae significatur perversitas adulatorum. Per lepram in stamine significantur vitia animae, per lepram vero in subtegmine significantur peccata carnalia, sicut enim stamen est in subtegmine, ita anima in corpore. Per vas autem quod non habet operculum nec ligaturam, significatur homo qui non habet aliquod velamen taciturnitatis, et qui non constringitur aliqua censura disciplinae.

[38077] I^a-II^ae q. 102 a. 5 ad 5

Ad quintum dicendum quod, sicut dictum est, duplex erat immunditia in lege. Una quidem per aliquam corruptionem mentis vel corporis, et haec immunditia maior erat. Alia vero erat immunditia ex solo contactu rei immundae, et haec minor erat, et faciliori ritu expiabatur. Nam immunditia prima expiabatur sacrificio pro peccato, quia omnis corruptio ex peccato procedit et peccatum significat, sed secunda immunditia expiabatur per solam aspersionem aquae cuiusdam, de qua quidem aqua expiationis habetur Num. XIX. Mandatur enim ibi a domino quod accipiant vaccam rufam, in memoriam peccati quod commiserunt in adoratione vituli. Et dicitur vacca magis quam vitulus, quia sic dominus synagogam vocare consuevit; secundum illud Osee IV, sicut vacca lasciviens declinavit Israel. Et hoc forte ideo quia vaccas in morem Aegyptii, coluerunt; secundum illud Osee X, vaccas Bethaven coluerunt.

Et in detestationem peccati idololatriae, immolabatur extra castra. Et ubicumque sacrificium fiebat pro expiatione multitudinis peccatorum, cremabatur extra castra totum. Et ut significaretur per hoc sacrificium emundari populus ab universitate peccatorum, intingebat sacerdos digitum in sanguine eius, et aspergebat contra fores sanctuarii septem vicibus, quia septenarius universitatem significat. Et ipsa etiam aspersione sanguinis pertinebat ad detestationem idololatriae, in qua sanguis immolatus non effundebatur, sed congregabatur, et circa ipsum homines comedebant in honorem idolorum. Comburebatur autem in igne. Vel quia Deus Moysi in igne apparuit, et in igne data est lex. Vel quia per hoc significabatur quod idololatria totaliter erat extirpanda, et omne quod ad idololatriam pertinebat, sicut vacca cremabatur, tam pelle et carnibus, quam sanguine et fimo, flammae traditis. Adiungebatur etiam in combustionem lignum cedrinum, hyssopus, coccusque bis tinctus, ad significandum quod, sicut ligna cedrina non de facili putrescunt, et coccus bis tinctus non amittit colorem, et hyssopus retinet odorem etiam postquam fuerit desiccatus; ita etiam hoc sacrificium erat in conservationem ipsius populi, et honestatis et devotionis ipsius. Unde dicitur de cineribus vaccae, ut sint multitudini filiorum Israel in custodiam. Vel, secundum Iosephum, quatuor elementa significata sunt, igni enim apponebatur cedrus, significans terram, propter sui terrestritatem; hyssopus, significans aerem, propter odorem; coccus, significans aquam, eadem ratione qua et purpura, propter tincturas, quae ex aquis sumuntur, ut per hoc exprimeretur quod illud sacrificium offerebatur creatori quatuor elementorum. Et quia huiusmodi sacrificium offerebatur pro peccato idololatriae, in eius detestationem et comburens, et cineres colligens, et ille qui aspergit aquas in quibus cinis ponebatur, immundi reputabantur, ut per hoc ostenderetur quod quidquid quocumque modo ad idololatriam pertinet, quasi immundum est abiiciendum. Ab hac autem immunditia purificabantur per solam ablutionem vestimentorum, nec indigebant aqua aspergi propter huiusmodi immunditiam, quia sic esset processus in infinitum. Ille enim qui aspergebat aquam, immundus fiebat, et sic si ipse seipsum aspergeret, immundus remaneret; si autem alius eum aspergeret, ille immundus esset; et similiter ille qui illum aspergeret, et sic in infinitum. Figuralis autem ratio huius sacrificii est quia per vaccam rufam significatur Christus secundum infirmitatem assumptam, quam femininus sexus designat. Sanguinem passionis eius designat vaccae color. Erat autem vacca rufa aetatis integrae, quia omnis operatio Christi est perfecta. In qua nulla erat macula, nec portavit iugum, quia non portavit iugum peccati. Praecipitur autem adduci ad Moysen, quia imputabant ei transgressionem Mosaicae legis in violatione sabbati. Praecipitur etiam tradi Eleazaro sacerdoti, quia Christus occidendus in manus sacerdotum traditus est. Immolatur autem extra castra, quia extra portam Christus passus est. Intingit autem sacerdos digitum in sanguine eius, quia per discretionem, quam digitus significat, mysterium passionis Christi est considerandum et imitandum. Aspergitur autem contra tabernaculum, per quod synagoga designatur, vel ad condemnationem Iudaeorum non credentium; vel ad purificationem credentium. Et hoc septem vicibus, vel propter septem dona spiritus sancti; vel propter septem dies, in quibus omne tempus intelligitur. Sunt autem omnia quae ad Christi incarnationem pertinent, igne cremanda, idest spiritualiter intelligenda, nam per pellem et carnem exterior Christi operatio significatur; per sanguinem, subtilis et interna virtus exteriora vivificans; per fimum, lassitudo, sitis, et omnia huiusmodi ad infirmitatem pertinentia. Adduntur autem tria, cedrus, quod significat altitudinem spei, vel contemplationis; hyssopus, quod significat humilitatem, vel fidem; coccus bis tinctus, quod significat geminam caritatem; per haec enim debemus Christo passo adhaerere. Iste autem cinis combustionis colligitur a viro mundo, quia reliquiae passionis pervenerunt ad gentiles, qui non fuerunt culpabiles in Christi morte. Apponuntur autem cineres in aqua ad expiandum, quia ex passione Christi Baptismus sortitur virtutem emundandi peccata. Sacerdos autem qui immolabat et comburebat vaccam, et ille qui comburebat, et qui colligebat cineres, immundus erat, et etiam qui aspergebat aquam, vel quia Iudaei facti sunt immundi ex occisione Christi, per quam nostra peccata expiantur; et hoc usque ad vesperum, idest usque ad finem mundi, quando reliquiae Israel convertentur. Vel quia illi qui tractant sancta intendentes ad emundationem aliorum, ipsi etiam aliquas immunditias contrahunt, ut Gregorius dicit, in pastoralis; et hoc usque ad vesperum, idest usque ad finem praesentis vitae.

[38078] I^a-II^ae q. 102 a. 5 ad 6

Ad sextum dicendum quod, sicut dictum est, immunditia quae ex

corruptione proveniebat vel mentis vel corporis, expiatur per sacrificia pro peccato. Offerebantur autem specialia sacrificia pro peccatis singulorum, sed quia aliqui negligentes erant circa expiationem huiusmodi peccatorum et immunditiarum; vel etiam propter ignorantiam ab expiatione huiusmodi desistebant; institutum fuit ut semel in anno, decima die septimi mensis, fieret sacrificium expiationis pro toto populo. Et quia, sicut apostolus dicit, ad Heb. VII, lex constituit homines sacerdotes infirmitatem habentes, oportebat quod sacerdos prius offerret pro seipso vitulum pro peccato, in commemorationem peccati quod Aaron fecerat in conflatione vituli aurei; et arietem in holocaustum, per quod significabatur quod sacerdotis praelatio, quam aries designat, qui est dux gregis, erat ordinanda ad honorem Dei. Deinde autem offerebat pro populo duos hircos. Quorum unus immolabatur, ad expiandum peccatum multitudinis. Hircus enim animal fetidum est, et de pilis eius fiunt vestimenta pungentia, ut per hoc significaretur fetor et immunditia et aculei peccatorum. Huius autem hirci immolati sanguis inferebatur, simul etiam cum sanguine vituli, in sancta sanctorum, et aspergebatur ex eo totum sanctuarium, ad significandum quod tabernaculum emundabatur ab immunditiis filiorum Israel. Corpus vero hirci et vituli quae immolata sunt pro peccato, oportebat comburi, ad ostendendum consumptionem peccatorum. Non autem in altari, quia ibi non comburebantur totaliter nisi holocausta. Unde mandatum erat ut comburerentur extra castra, in detestationem peccati, hoc enim fiebat quandocumque immolabatur sacrificium pro aliquo gravi peccato, vel pro multitudine peccatorum. Alter vero hircus mittebatur in desertum, non quidem ut offerretur Daemonibus, quos colebant gentiles in desertis, quia eis nihil licebat immolari; sed ad designandum effectum illius sacrificii immolati. Et ideo sacerdos imponebat manum super caput eius, confitens peccata filiorum Israel, ac si ille hircus deportaret ea in desertum, ubi a bestiis comederetur, quasi portans poenam pro peccatis populi. Dicebatur autem portare peccata populi, vel quia in eius emissionem significabatur remissio peccatorum populi, vel quia colligabatur super caput eius aliqua schedula ubi erant scripta peccata. Ratio autem figuralis horum erat quia Christus significatur et per vitulum, propter virtutem; et per arietem, quia ipse est dux fidelium; et per hircum, propter similitudinem carnis peccati. Et ipse Christus est immolatus pro peccatis et sacerdotum et populi, quia per eius passionem et maiores et minores a peccato mundantur. Sanguis autem vituli et hirci infertur in sancta per pontificem, quia per sanguinem passionis Christi patet nobis introitus in regnum caelorum. Comburantur autem eorum corpora extra castra, quia extra portam Christus passus est, ut apostolus dicit, ad Heb. ult. Per hircum autem qui emittebatur, potest significari vel ipsa divinitas Christi, quae in solitudinem abiit, homine Christo patiente, non quidem locum mutans, sed virtutem cohibens, vel significatur concupiscentia mala, quam debemus a nobis abiicere, virtuosos autem motus domino immolare. De immunditia vero eorum qui huiusmodi sacrificia comburebant, eadem ratio est quae in sacrificio vitulae rufae dicta est.

[38079] I^a-II^ae q. 102 a. 5 ad 7

Ad septimum dicendum quod per ritum legis leprosus non emundabatur a macula leprae, sed emundatus ostendebatur. Et hoc significatur Lev. XIV, cum dicitur de sacerdote, cum invenerit lepram esse emundatam, praecipiet ei qui purificatur. Iam ergo lepra mundata erat, sed purificari dicebatur, in quantum iudicio sacerdotis restituebatur consortio hominum et cultui divino. Contingebat tamen quandoque ut divino miraculo per ritum legis corporalis mundaretur lepra, quando sacerdos decipiebatur in iudicio. Huiusmodi autem purificatio leprosi dupliciter fiebat, nam primo, iudicabatur esse mundus; secundo autem, restituebatur tanquam mundus consortio hominum et cultui divino, scilicet post septem dies. In prima autem purificatione offerebat pro se leprosus mundandus duos passeris vivos, et lignum cedrinum, et vermiculum, et hyssopum; hoc modo ut filo coccineo ligarentur passer et hyssopus simul cum ligno cedrino, ita scilicet quod lignum cedrinum esset quasi manubrium aspersorii. Hyssopus vero et passer erant id quod de aspersorio tingebatur in sanguine alterius passeris immolati in aquis vivis. Haec autem quatuor offerebat contra quatuor defectus leprae, nam contra putredinem, offerebatur cedrus, quae est arbor imputribilis; contra fetorem, hyssopus, quae est herba odorifera; contra insensibilitatem, passer vivus; contra turpitudinem coloris, vermiculus, qui habet vivum colorem. Passer vero vivus avolare dimittebatur in agrum, quia leprosus restituebatur pristinae libertati. In octavo vero die admittebatur ad cultum divinum, et restituebatur consortio hominum. Primo tamen rasis pilis totius corporis et vestimentis, eo quod lepra pilos corrodit, et vestimenta inquinat et fetida reddit. Et postmodum sacrificium offerebatur pro delicto eius, quia lepra plerumque inducitur pro peccato. De sanguine autem sacrificii tangebatur extremum auriculae eius qui erat mundandus, et pollices manus dextrae et pedis, quia in istis partibus primum lepra dignoscitur et sentitur. Adhibebantur etiam huic ritui tres liquores, scilicet sanguis, contra sanguinis corruptionem; oleum, ad designandam sanationem morbi; aqua viva, ad emundandum spurcitiem. Figuralis autem ratio erat quia per duos passeris significantur divinitas et humanitas Christi. Quorum unus, scilicet humanitas, immolatur in vase fictili super aquas viventes, quia per passionem Christi aquae Baptismi consecrantur. Alius autem, scilicet impassibilis divinitas, vivus remanebat, quia divinitas mori non potest. Unde et avolabat, quia passione astringi non poterat. Hic autem passer vivus, simul cum ligno cedrino et cocco, vel vermiculo, et hyssopo, idest fide, spe et caritate, ut supra dictum est, mittitur in aquam ad aspergendum, quia in fide Dei et hominis baptizamur. Lavat autem homo, per aquam Baptismi vel lacrymarum, vestimenta sua, idest opera, et omnes pilos, idest cogitationes. Tingitur autem extremum auriculae dextrae eius qui mundatur, de sanguine et de oleo, ut eius auditum muniat contra corrumpentia verba, pollices autem manus dextrae et pedis tinguntur, ut sit eius actio sancta. Alia vero quae ad hanc purificationem pertinent, vel etiam aliarum immunditiarum, non habent aliquid speciale praeter alia sacrificia pro peccatis vel pro delictis.

[38080] I^a-II^ae q. 102 a. 5 ad 8

Ad octavum et nonum dicendum quod, sicut populus instituebatur ad cultum Dei per circumcisionem, ita ministri per aliquam specialem purificationem vel consecrationem, unde et separari ab aliis praecipuntur, quasi specialiter ad ministerium cultus divini prae aliis deputati. Et totum quod circa eos fiebat in eorum consecratione vel institutione ad hoc pertinebat ut ostenderetur eos habere quandam praerogativam puritatis et virtutis et dignitatis. Et ideo in institutione ministrorum tria fiebant, primo enim, purificabantur; secundo, ornabantur et consecrabantur; tertio, applicabantur ad usum ministerii. Purificabantur quidem communiter omnes per ablutionem aquae, et per quaedam sacrificia; specialiter autem Levitae radebant omnes pilos carnis suae; ut habetur Lev. VIII. Consecratio vero circa pontifices et sacerdotes hoc ordine fiebat. Primo enim, postquam abluti erant, induebantur quibusdam vestimentis specialibus pertinentibus ad designandum dignitatem ipsorum. Specialiter autem pontifex oleo unctionis in capite ungebatur, ut designaretur quod ab ipso diffundebatur potestas consecrandi ad alios, sicut oleum a capite derivatur ad inferiora; ut habetur in Psalmo CXXXII, sicut unguentum in capite, quod descendit in barbam, barbam Aaron. Levitae vero non habebant aliam consecrationem, nisi quod offerebantur domino a filiis Israel per manus pontificis, qui orabat pro eis. Minorum vero sacerdotum solae manus consecrabantur, quae erant applicandae ad sacrificia. Et de sanguine animalis immolati tingebatur extremum auriculae dextrae ipsorum, et pollices pedis ac manus dextrae, ut scilicet essent obedientes legi Dei in oblatione sacrificiorum, quod significatur in intinctione auris dextrae; et quod essent solliciti et prompti in executione sacrificiorum, quod significatur in intinctione pedis et manus dextrae. Aspergebantur etiam ipsi, et vestimenta eorum, sanguine animalis immolati, in memoriam sanguinis agni per quem fuerunt liberati in Aegypto. Offerebantur autem in eorum consecratione huiusmodi sacrificia, vitulus pro peccato, in memoriam remissionis peccati Aaron circa conflationem vituli; aries in holocaustum, in memoriam oblationis Abrahae, cuius obedientiam pontifex imitari debebat; aries etiam consecrationis, qui erat quasi hostia pacifica, in memoriam liberationis de Aegypto per sanguinem agni; canistrum panum, in memoriam mannae praestiti populo. Pertinebat autem ad applicationem ministerii quod imponebantur super manus eorum adeps arietis, et torta panis unius, et armus dexter, ut ostenderetur quod accipiebant potestatem huiusmodi offerendi domino. Levitae vero applicabantur ad ministerium per hoc quod intromittebantur in tabernaculum foederis, quasi ad ministrandum circa vasa sanctuarii. Figuralis vero horum ratio erat quia illi qui sunt consecrandi ad spirituale ministerium Christi, debent primo purificari per aquam Baptismi et lacrymarum in fide passionis Christi, quod est expiativum et purgativum sacrificium. Et debent radere omnes pilos carnis, idest omnes pravas cogitationes. Debent etiam ornari virtutibus; et consecrari oleo spiritus sancti; et aspersione sanguinis Christi. Et sic debent esse intenti ad exequenda spiritualia ministeria.

[38081] I^a-II^ae q. 102 a. 5 ad 10

Ad decimum dicendum quod, sicut iam dictum est, intentio legis erat

inducere ad reverentiam divini cultus. Et hoc dupliciter, uno modo, excludendo a cultu divino omne id quod poterat esse contemptibile; alio modo, apponendo ad cultum divinum omne illud quod videbatur ad honorificentiam pertinere. Et si hoc quidem observabatur in tabernaculo et vasis eius, et animalibus immolandis, multo magis hoc observandum erat in ipsis ministris. Et ideo ad removendum contemptum ministrorum, praeceptum fuit ut non haberent maculam vel defectum corporalem, quia huiusmodi homines solent apud alios in contemptu haberi. Propter quod etiam institutum fuit ut non sparsim ex quolibet genere ad Dei ministerium applicarentur, sed ex certa prosapia secundum generis successionem, ut ex hoc clariores et nobiliores haberentur. Ad hoc autem quod in reverentia haberentur, adhibebatur eis specialis ornatus vestium, et specialis consecratio. Et haec est in communi causa ornatus vestium. In speciali autem sciendum est quod pontifex habebat octo ornamenta. Primo enim, habebat vestem lineam. Secundo, habebat tunicam hyacinthinam; in cuius extremitate versus pedes, ponebantur per circuitum tintinabula quaedam, et mala Punica facta ex hyacintho et purpura coccoque bis tincto. Tertio, habebat superhumerali, quod tegebat humeros et anteriorem partem usque ad cingulum; quod erat ex auro et hyacintho et purpura, coccoque bis tincto, et bysso retorta. Et super humeros habebat duos onychinos, in quibus erant sculpta nomina filiorum Israel. Quartum erat rationale, ex eadem materia factum; quod erat quadratum, et ponebatur in pectore, et coniungebatur superhumerali. Et in hoc rationali erant duodecim lapides pretiosi distincti per quatuor ordines, in quibus etiam sculpta erant nomina filiorum Israel, quasi ad designandum quod ferret onus totius populi, per hoc quod habebat nomina eorum in humeris; et quod iugiter debebat de eorum salute cogitare, per hoc quod portabat eos in pectore, quasi in corde habens. In quo etiam rationali mandavit dominus poni doctrinam et veritatem, quia quaedam pertinentia ad veritatem iustitiae et doctrinae, scribebantur in illo rationali. Iudaei tamen fabulantur quod in rationali erat lapis qui secundum diversos colores mutabatur, secundum diversa quae debebant accidere filiis Israel, et hoc vocant veritatem et doctrinam. Quintum erat balteus, idest cingulus quidam, factus ex praedictis quatuor coloribus. Sextum erat tiara, idest mitra quaedam, de bysso. Septimum autem erat lamina aurea, pendens in fronte eius, in qua erat nomen domini. Octavum autem erant femoralia linea, ut operirent carnem turpitudinis suae, quando accederent ad sanctuarium vel ad altare. Ex istis autem octo ornamentis minores sacerdotes habebant quatuor, scilicet tunicam lineam, femoralia, balteum et tiaram. Horum autem ornamentorum quidam rationem litteralem assignant, dicentes quod in istis ornamentis designatur dispositio orbis terrarum, quasi pontifex protestaretur se esse ministrum creatoris mundi, unde etiam Sap. XVIII dicitur quod in veste Aaron erat descriptus orbis terrarum. Nam femoralia linea figurabant terram, ex qua linum nascitur. Baltei circumvolutio significabat Oceanum, qui circumcingit terram. Tunica hyacinthina suo colore significabat aerem, per cuius tintinabula significabantur tonitrua; per mala granata, coruscationes. Superhumerales vero significabat sua varietate caelum sidereum, duo onychini, duo hemisphaeria, vel solem et lunam. Duodecim gemmae in pectore, duodecim signa in zodiaco, quae dicebantur posita in rationali, quia in caelestibus sunt rationes terrenorum, secundum illud Iob XXXVIII, numquid nosti ordinem caeli, et ponis rationem eius in terra? Cidaris autem, vel tiara, significabat caelum Empyreum. Lamina aurea, Deum omnibus praesidentem. Figuralis vero ratio manifesta est. Nam maculae vel defectus corporales a quibus debebant sacerdotes esse immunes, significant diversa vitia et peccata quibus debent carere. Prohibetur enim esse caecus, idest, ne sit ignorans. Ne sit claudus, idest instabilis, et ad diversa se inclinans. Ne sit parvo, vel grandi, vel torto naso, idest ne per defectum discretionis, vel in plus vel in minus excedat, aut etiam aliqua prava exercent; per nasum enim discretio designatur, quia est discretivus odoris. Ne sit fracto pede vel manus, idest ne amittat virtutem bene operandi, vel procedendi in virtutem. Repudiatur etiam si habeat gibbum vel ante vel retro, per quem significatur superfluous amor terrenorum. Si est lippus, idest per carnalem affectum eius ingenium obscuratur, contingit enim lippitudo ex fluxu humoris. Repudiatur etiam si habeat albuginem in oculo, idest praesumptionem candoris iustitiae in sua cogitatione. Repudiatur etiam si habuerit iugem scabiem, idest petulantiam carnis. Et si habuerit impetiginem, quae sine dolore corpus occupat, et membrorum decorem foedat, per quam avaritia designatur. Et etiam si sit herniosus vel ponderosus, qui scilicet gestat pondus turpitudinis in corde, licet non exercent in opere. Per ornamenta vero designantur virtutes ministrorum Dei. Sunt autem quatuor quae sunt necessariae omnibus ministris, scilicet castitas, quae significatur per femoralia; puritas vero vitae, quae significatur per lineam tunicam; moderatio discretionis quae significatur per cingulum; rectitudo intentionis, quae significatur per tiaram protegentem caput. Sed prae his pontifices debent quatuor habere. Primo quidem, iugem Dei memoriam in contemplatione, et hoc significat lamina aurea habens nomen Dei, in fronte. Secundo, quod supportent infirmitates populi, quod significat superhumeralia. Tertio, quod habeant populum in corde et in visceribus per sollicitudinem caritatis, quod significatur per rationale. Quarto, quod habeant conversationem caelestem per opera perfectionis, quod significatur per tunicam hyacinthinam. Unde et tunicae hyacinthinae adiunguntur in extremitate tintinabula aurea, per quae significatur doctrina divinorum, quae debet coniungi caelesti conversationi pontificis. Adiunguntur autem mala Punica, per quae significatur unitas fidei et concordia in bonis moribus, quia sic coniuncta debet esse eius doctrina, ut per eam fidei et pacis unitas non rumpatur.

Articulus 6

[38082] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 arg. 1

Ad sextum sic proceditur. Videtur quod observantiarum caeremonialium nulla fuerit rationabilis causa. Quia ut apostolus dicit, I ad Tim. IV, omnis creatura Dei est bona, et nihil reiiciendum quod cum gratiarum actione percipitur. Inconvenienter igitur prohibiti sunt ab esu quorundam ciborum tanquam immundorum, ut patet Lev. XI.

[38083] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 arg. 2

Praeterea, sicut animalia dantur in cibum hominis, ita et herbae, unde dicitur Gen. IX, quasi olera virentia dedi vobis omnem carnem. Sed in herbis lex non distinxit aliquas immundas, cum tamen aliquae illarum sint maxime nocivae, ut puta venenosae. Ergo videtur quod nec de animalibus aliqua debuerint prohiberi tanquam immunda.

[38084] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 arg. 3

Praeterea, si materia est immunda ex qua aliquid generatur, pari ratione videtur quod id quod generatur ex ea, sit immundum. Sed ex sanguine generatur caro. Cum igitur non omnes carnes prohiberentur tanquam immundae, pari ratione nec sanguis debuit prohiberi quasi immundus; aut adeps, qui ex sanguine generatur.

[38085] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 arg. 4

Praeterea, dominus dicit, Matth. X, eos non esse timendos qui occidunt corpus, quia post mortem non habent quid faciant, quod non esset verum, si in nocumentum homini cederet quid ex eo fieret. Multo igitur minus pertinet ad animal iam occisum qualiter eius carnes decoquantur. Irrationabile igitur videtur esse quod dicitur Exod. XXIII, non coques haedum in lacte matris suae.

[38086] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 arg. 5

Praeterea, ea quae sunt primitiva in hominibus et animalibus, tanquam perfectiora, praecipiuntur domino offerri. Inconvenienter igitur praecipitur Lev. XIX, quando ingressi fueritis terram, et plantaveritis in ea ligna pomifera, auferetis praepudia eorum, idest prima germina, et immunda erunt vobis, nec edetis ex eis.

[38087] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 arg. 6

Praeterea, vestimentum extra corpus hominis est. Non igitur debuerunt quaedam specialia vestimenta Iudaeis interdici, puta quod dicitur Lev. XIX, vestem quae ex duobus texta est, non indueris; et Deut. XXII, non induetur mulier veste virili, et vir non induetur veste feminea; et infra, non indueris vestimento quod ex lana linoque contextum est.

[38088] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 arg. 7

Praeterea, memoria mandatorum Dei non pertinet ad corpus, sed ad cor. Inconvenienter igitur praecipitur Deut. VI, quod ligarent praecepta Dei quasi signum in manu sua, et quod scriberentur in limine ostiorum; et quod per angulos palliorum facerent fimbrias, in quibus ponerent vittas hyacinthinas, in memoriam mandatorum Dei, ut habetur Num. XV.

[38089] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 arg. 8

Praeterea, apostolus dicit, I ad Cor. IX, quod non est cura Deo de bobus, et per consequens neque de aliis animalibus irrationalibus. Inconvenienter igitur praecipitur Deut. XXII, si ambulaveris per viam, et inveneris nidum avis, non tenebis matrem cum filiis; et Deut. XXV, non alligabis os bovis triturantis; et Lev. XIX, iumenta tua non facies coire cum alterius generis animantibus.

[38090] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 arg. 9

Praeterea, inter plantas non fiebat discretio mundorum ab immundis.

Ergo multo minus circa culturam plantarum debuit aliqua discretio adhiberi. Ergo inconvenienter praecipitur Lev. XIX, agrum non seres diverso semine; et Deut. XXII, non seres vineam tuam altero semine; et, non arabis in bove simul et asino.

[38091] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 arg. 10

Praeterea, ea quae sunt inanimata, maxime videmus hominum potestati esse subiecta. Inconvenienter igitur arcetur homo ab argento et auro ex quibus fabricata sunt idola, et ab aliis quae in idolorum domibus inveniuntur, praecepto legis quod habetur Deut. VII. Ridiculum etiam videtur esse praeceptum quod habetur Deut. XXIII, ut egestionem humo operirent, fodientes in terra.

[38092] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 arg. 11

Praeterea, pietas maxime in sacerdotibus requiritur. Sed ad pietatem pertinere videtur quod aliquis funeribus amicorum intersit, unde etiam de hac Tobias laudatur, ut habetur Tob. I. Similiter etiam quandoque ad pietatem pertinet quod aliquis in uxorem accipiat meretricem, quia per hoc eam a peccato et infamia liberat. Ergo videtur quod haec inconvenienter prohibeantur sacerdotibus, Lev. XXI.

[38093] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 s. c.

Sed contra est quod dicitur Deut. XVIII, tu autem a domino Deo tuo aliter institutus es, ex quo potest accipi quod huiusmodi observantiae sunt institutae a Deo ad quandam specialem illius populi praerogativam. Non ergo sunt irrationabiles, aut sine causa.

[38094] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod populus Iudaeorum, ut supra dictum est, specialiter erat deputatus ad cultum divinum; et inter eos, specialiter sacerdotes. Et sicut aliae res quae applicantur ad cultum divinum, aliquam specialitatem debent habere, quod pertinet ad honorificentiam divini cultus; ita etiam et in conversatione illius populi, et praecipue sacerdotum, debuerunt esse aliqua specialia congruentia ad cultum divinum, vel spirituales vel corporales. Cultus autem legis figurabat mysterium Christi, unde omnia eorum gesta figurabant ea quae ad Christum pertinent; secundum illud I Cor. X, omnia in figuram contingebant illis. Et ideo rationes harum observantiarum dupliciter assignari possunt, uno modo, secundum congruentiam ad divinum cultum; alio modo, secundum quod figurant aliquid circa Christianorum vitam.

[38095] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod, sicut supra dictum est, duplex pollutio, vel immunditia, observabatur in lege, una quidem culpa, per quam polluebatur anima; alia autem corruptionis cuiusdam, per quam quodammodo inquinatur corpus. Loquendo igitur de prima immunditia, nulla genera ciborum immunda sunt, vel hominem inquinare possunt, secundum suam naturam, unde dicitur Matth. XV, non quod intrat in os, coinquinat hominem; sed quae procedunt de ore, haec coinquant hominem; et exponitur hoc de peccatis. Possunt tamen aliqui cibi per accidens inquinare animam, in quantum scilicet contra obedientiam vel votum, vel nimia concupiscentia comeduntur; vel in quantum praebent fomentum luxuriae, propter quod aliqui a vino et carnibus abstinent. Secundum autem corporalem immunditiam, quae est corruptionis cuiusdam, aliquae animalium carnes immunditiam habent, vel quia ex rebus immundis nutriuntur, sicut porcus; aut immunde conversantur, sicut quaedam animalia sub terra habitantia, sicut talpae et mures et alia huiusmodi, unde etiam quendam fetorem contrahunt; vel quia eorum carnes, propter superfluum umiditatem vel siccitatem, corruptos humores in corporibus humanis generant. Et ideo prohibitae sunt eis carnes animalium habentium soleas, id est unguam unam non fissam, propter eorum terrestritatem. Et similiter sunt eis prohibitae carnes animalium habentium multas fissuras in pedibus, quia sunt nimis cholericae et adusta, sicut carnes leonis et huiusmodi. Et eadem ratione prohibitae sunt eis aves quaedam rapaces, quae sunt nimiae siccitatis; et quaedam aves aquaticae, propter excessum humiditatis. Similiter etiam quidam pisces non habentes pinnulas et squamas, ut anguillae et huiusmodi, propter excessum humiditatis. Sunt autem eis concessa ad esum animalia ruminantia et findentia unguam, quia habent humores bene digestos, et sunt medie complexionata, quia nec sunt nimis humida, quod significant unguae; neque sunt nimis terrestria, cum non habeant unguam continuam, sed fissam. In piscibus etiam concessi sunt eis pisces sicciore, quod significatur per hoc quod habent squamas et pinnulas, per hoc enim efficitur temperata complexio humida piscium. In avibus etiam sunt eis concessae magis temperatae, sicut gallinae, perdices, et aliae huiusmodi. Alia ratio fuit in detestationem idololatriae. Nam gentiles, et praecipue Aegyptii, inter quos erant nutriti, huiusmodi animalia prohibita idolis immolabant, vel eis ad maleficia utebantur. Animalia vero quae Iudaeis sunt concessa ad esum non comedebant, sed ea tanquam deos colebant; vel propter aliam causam ab eis abstinebant, ut supra dictum est. Tertia ratio est ad tollendam nimiam diligentiam circa cibaria. Et ideo conceduntur illa animalia quae de facili et in promptu haberi possunt. Generaliter tamen prohibitus est eis esus sanguinis et adipis cuiuslibet animalis. Sanguinis quidem tum ad vitandam crudelitatem, ut detestarentur humanum sanguinem effundere, sicut supra dictum est. Tum etiam ad vitandum idololatriae ritum, quia eorum consuetudo erat ut circa sanguinem congregatum adunarentur ad comedendum in honorem idolorum, quibus reputabant sanguinem acceptissimum esse. Et ideo dominus mandavit quod sanguis effunderetur, et quod pulvere operiretur. Et propter hoc etiam prohibitum est eis comedere animalia suffocata vel strangulata, quia sanguis eorum non separaretur a carne. Vel quia in tali morte animalia multum affliguntur; et dominus voluit eos a crudelitate prohibere etiam circa animalia bruta, ut per hoc magis recederent a crudelitate hominis, habentes exercitium pietatis etiam circa bestias. Adipis etiam esus prohibitus est eis, tum quia idololatrae comedebant illum in honorem deorum suorum. Tum etiam quia cremabatur in honorem Dei. Tum etiam quia sanguis et adeps non generant bonum nutrimentum, quod pro causa inducit Rabbi Moyses. Causa autem prohibitionis esus nervorum exprimitur Gen. XXXII, ubi dicitur quod non comedunt filii Israel nervum, eo quod tetigerit nervum femoris Iacob, et obstupuerit. Figuralis autem ratio horum est quia per omnia huiusmodi animalia prohibita designantur aliqua peccata, in quorum figuram illa animalia prohibentur. Unde dicit Augustinus, in libro contra Faustum, si de porco et agno requiratur, utrumque natura mundum est, quia omnis creatura Dei bona est, quadam vero significatione, agnus mundus, porcus immundus est. Tanquam, si stultum et sapientem diceres, utrumque hoc verbum natura vocis et litterarum et syllabarum ex quibus constat, mundum est, significatione autem unum est mundum, et aliud immundum. Animal enim quod ruminat et ungulam findit, mundum est significatione. Quia fissio ungulae significat distinctionem duorum testamentorum; vel patris et filii; vel duarum naturarum in Christo; vel discretionem boni et mali.

Ruminatio autem significat meditationem Scripturarum, et sanum intellectum earum. Cuicumque autem horum alterum deest, spiritualiter immundus est. Similiter etiam in piscibus illi qui habent squamas et pinnulas, significatione mundi sunt. Quia per pinnulas significatur vita sublimis, vel contemplatio; per squamas autem significatur aspera vita; quorum utrumque necessarium est ad munditiam spiritualem. In avibus autem specialia quaedam genera prohibentur. In aquila enim, quae alte volat, prohibetur superbia. In gryphe autem, qui equis et hominibus infestus est, crudelitas potentum prohibetur. In haliaeeto autem, qui pascitur minutis avibus, significantur illi qui sunt pauperibus molesti. In milvo autem, qui maxime insidiis utitur, designantur fraudulentum. In vulture autem, qui sequitur exercitum expectans comedere cadavera mortuorum, significantur illi qui mortes et seditiones hominum affectant ut inde lucrentur. Per animalia corvini generis significantur illi qui sunt voluptatibus denigrati, vel qui sunt expertes bonae affectionis, quia corvus, semel emissus ab arca, non est reversus. Per struthionem, qui, cum sit avis, volare non potest, sed semper est circa terram, significantur Deo militantes et se negotiis saecularibus implicantes. Nycticorax, quae in nocte acuti est visus, in die autem non videt, significat eos qui in temporalibus sunt astuti, in spiritualibus hebetes. Larus autem, qui et volat in aere et natat in aqua, significat eos qui et circumcisionem et Baptismum venerantur, vel significat eos qui per contemplationem volare volunt, et tamen vivunt in aquis voluptatum. Accipiter vero, qui deservit hominibus ad praedam, significat eos qui ministrant potentibus ad depraedandum pauperes. Per bubonem, qui in nocte pastum quaerit, de die autem latet, significantur luxuriosi, qui occultari quaerunt in nocturnis operibus quae agunt. Mergulus autem, cuius natura est ut sub undis diutius immoretur, significat gulosos, qui aquis deliciarum se immergunt. Ibis vero avis est in Africa habens longum rostrum, quae serpentibus pascitur, et forte est idem quod ciconia, et significat invidos, qui de malis aliorum, quasi de serpentibus, reficiuntur. Cygnus autem est coloris candidi, et longo collo quod habet, ex profunditate terrae vel aquae cibum trahit, et potest significare homines qui per exteriorem iustitiae candorem lucra terrena quaerunt. Onocrotalus autem avis est in partibus orientis, longo rostro, quae in faucibus habet quosdam folliculos, in quibus primo cibum reponit, et post horam in ventrem mittit, et significat avaros, qui immoderata sollicitudine vitae necessaria congregant. Porphyrio autem, praeter modum aliarum avium, habet unum pedem latum ad natandum, alium fissum ad ambulandum, quia et in aqua natat ut anates, et in terra ambulat ut perdices, solo morsu bibit, omnem cibum aqua tingens, et significat eos qui nihil ad alterius arbitrium facere volunt, sed solum quod fuerit tinctum aqua propriae voluntatis. Per Herodionem qui vulgariter falco dicitur, significantur illi quorum pedes sunt veloces ad effundendum sanguinem. Charadrius autem, quae est avis garrula, significat loquaces. Upupa autem, quae nidificat in stercorebus et fetenti pascitur fimo, et gemitum in cantu simulat, significat tristitiam saeculi, quae in hominibus immundis mortem operatur. Per vespertilionem autem, quae circa terram volitat, significantur illi qui, saeculari scientia praediti, sola terrena sapiunt. Circa volatilia autem et quadrupedia, illa sola conceduntur eis quae posteriora crura habent longiora, ut salire possint. Alia vero, quae terrae magis adhaerent, prohibentur, quia illi qui abutuntur doctrina quatuor Evangelistarum, ut per eam in altum non subleventur, immundi reputantur. In sanguine vero et adipe et nervo, intelligitur prohiberi crudelitas, et voluptas, et fortitudo ad peccandum.

[38096] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod esus plantarum et aliorum terrae nascentium adfuit apud homines etiam ante diluvium, sed esus carnum videtur esse post diluvium introductus; dicitur enim Gen. IX, quasi olera virentia dedi vobis omnem carnem. Et hoc ideo, quia esus terrae nascentium magis pertinet ad quandam simplicitatem vitae; esus autem carnum ad quasdam delicias et curiositatem vivendi. Sponte enim terra herbam germinat, vel cum modico studio huiusmodi terrae nascentia in magna copia procurantur, oportet autem cum magno studio animalia vel nutrire, vel etiam capere. Et ideo volens dominus populum suum reducere ad simpliciore victum, multa in genere animalium eis prohibuit, non autem in genere terrae nascentium. Vel etiam quia animalia immolabantur idolis, non autem terrae nascentia.

[38097] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 ad 3

Ad tertium patet responsio ex dictis.

[38098] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 ad 4

Ad quartum dicendum quod, etsi haedus occisus non sentiat qualiter carnes eius coquantur, tamen in animo decoquentis ad quandam crudelitatem pertinere videtur si lac matris, quod datum est ei pro nutrimento, adhibeatur ad consumptionem carniū ipsius. Vel potest dici quod gentiles in solemnitatibus idolorum taliter carnes haedi coquebant, ad immolandum vel ad comedendum. Et ideo Exod. XXIII, postquam praedictum fuerat de solemnitatibus celebrandis in lege, subditur, non coques haedum in lacte matris suae. Figuralis autem ratio huius prohibitionis est quia praefigurabatur quod Christus, qui est haedus propter similitudinem carnis peccati, non erat a Iudaeis coquendus, idest occidendus, in lacte matris, idest tempore infantiae. Vel significatur quod haedus idest peccator, non est coquendus in lacte matris, idest non est blanditiis deliniendus.

[38099] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 ad 5

Ad quintum dicendum quod gentiles fructus primitivos, quos fortunatos aestimabant, diis suis offerebant, vel etiam comburebant eos ad quaedam magica facienda. Et ideo praeceptum est eis ut fructus trium primorum annorum immundos reputarent. In tribus enim annis fere omnes arbores terrae illius fructum producunt, quae scilicet vel seminando, vel inserendo, vel plantando coluntur. Raro autem contingit quod ossa fructuum arboris, vel semina latentia, seminentur, haec enim tardius facerent fructum, sed lex respexit ad id quod frequentius fit. Poma autem quarti anni, tanquam primitiae mundorum fructuum, Deo offerebantur, a quinto autem anno, et deinceps, comedebantur. Figuralis autem ratio est quia per hoc praefiguratur quod post tres status legis, quorum unus est ab Abraham usque ad David, secundus usque ad transmigrationem Babylonis, tertius usque ad Christum, erat Christus Deo offerendus, qui est fructus legis. Vel quia primordia nostrorum operum debent esse nobis suspecta, propter imperfectionem.

[38100] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 ad 6

Ad sextum dicendum quod sicut dicitur Eccli. XIX, amictus corporis enuntiat de homine. Et ideo voluit dominus ut populus eius distingueretur ab aliis populis non solum signo circumcisionis, quod erat in carne, sed etiam certa habitus distinctione. Et ideo prohibitum fuit eis ne induerentur vestimento ex lana et lino contexto, et ne mulier indueretur veste virili, aut e converso, propter duo. Primo quidem, ad vitandum idololatriae cultum. Huiusmodi enim variis vestibus ex diversis confectis gentiles in cultu suorum deorum utebantur. Et etiam in cultu Martis mulieres utebantur armis virorum; in cultu autem Veneris e converso viri utebantur vestibus mulierum. Alia ratio est ad declinandam luxuriam. Nam per commixtiones varias in vestimentis omnis inordinata commixtio coitus excluditur. Quod autem mulier induatur veste virili, aut e converso, incentivum est concupiscentiae, et occasionem libidini praestat. Figuralis autem ratio est quia in vestimento contexto ex lana et lino interdicitur coniunctio simplicitatis innocentiae, quae figuratur per lanam, et subtilitatis malitiae, quae figuratur per linum. Prohibetur etiam quod mulier non usurpet sibi doctrinam, vel alia virorum officia; vel vir declinet ad mollities mulierum.

[38101] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 ad 7

Ad septimum dicendum quod, sicut Hieronymus dicit, super Matth., dominus iussit ut in quatuor angulis palliorum hyacinthinas fimbrias facerent, ad populum Israel dignoscendum ab aliis populis. Unde per hoc se esse Iudaeos profitebantur, et ideo per aspectum huius signi inducebantur in memoriam suae legis. Quod autem dicitur, ligabis ea in manu tua, et erunt semper ante oculos tuos, Pharisei male interpretabantur, scribentes in membranis Decalogum Moysi, et ligabant in fronte, quasi coronam, ut ante oculos moverentur, cum tamen intentio domini mandantis fuerit ut ligarentur in manu, idest in operatione; et essent ante oculos, idest in meditatione. In hyacinthinis etiam vittis, quae palliis inserebantur, significatur caelestis intentio, quae omnibus operibus nostris debet adiungi. Potest tamen dici quod, quia populus ille carnalis erat et durae cervicis, oportuit etiam per huiusmodi sensibilia eos ad legis observantiam excitari.

[38102] I^a-IIae q. 102 a. 6 ad 8

Ad octavum dicendum quod affectus hominis est duplex, unus quidem secundum rationem; alius vero secundum passionem. Secundum igitur affectum rationis, non refert quid homo circa bruta animalia agat, quia omnia sunt subiecta eius potestati a Deo, secundum illud Psalmi VIII, omnia subiecisti sub pedibus eius. Et secundum hoc apostolus dicit quod non est cura Deo de bobus, quia Deus non requirit ab homine quid circa boves agat, vel circa alia animalia. Quantum vero ad affectum passionis, movetur affectus hominis etiam circa alia animalia, quia enim passio misericordiae consurgit ex afflictionibus aliorum, contingit autem etiam bruta animalia poenas sentire, potest in homine consurgere misericordiae affectus etiam circa afflictiones animalium. Proximum autem est ut qui exercetur in affectu misericordiae circa animalia, magis ex hoc disponatur ad affectum misericordiae circa homines, unde dicitur Prov. XII, novit iustus animas iumentorum suorum; viscera autem impiorum crudelia. Et ideo ut dominus populum Iudaicum, ad crudelitatem pronum, ad misericordiam revocaret, voluit eos exerceri ad misericordiam etiam circa bruta animalia, prohibens quaedam circa animalia fieri quae ad crudelitatem quandam pertinere videntur. Et ideo prohibuit ne coqueretur haedus in lacte matris; et quod non alligaretur os bovi trituranti; et quod non occideretur mater cum filiis. Quamvis etiam dici possit quod haec prohibita sunt eis in detestationem idololatriae. Nam Aegyptii nefarium reputabant ut boves triturantes de frugibus comederent. Aliqui etiam malefici utebantur matre avis incubante et pullis eius simul captis, ad fecunditatem et fortunam circa nutritionem filiorum. Et etiam quia in auguriis reputabatur hoc esse fortunatum, quod inveniretur mater incubans filiis. Circa commixtionem vero animalium diversae speciei, ratio litteralis potuit esse triplex. Una quidem, ad detestationem idololatriae Aegyptiorum, qui diversis commixtionibus utebantur in servitium planetarum, qui secundum diversas coniunctiones habent diversos effectus, et super diversas species rerum. Alia ratio est ad excludendum concubitus contra naturam. Tertia ratio est ad tollendam universaliter occasionem concupiscentiae. Animalia enim diversarum specierum non commiscentur de facili ad invicem, nisi hoc per homines procuretur; et in aspectu coitus animalium excitatur homini concupiscentiae motus. Unde etiam in traditionibus Iudaeorum praeceptum invenitur, ut Rabbi Moyses dicit, ut homines avertant oculos ab animalibus coeuntibus. Figuralis autem horum ratio est quia bovi trituranti, idest praedicatori deferenti segetes doctrinae, non sunt necessaria victus subtrahenda; ut apostolus dicit, I ad Cor. IX. Matrem etiam non simul debemus tenere cum filiis, quia in quibusdam retinendi sunt spirituales sensus, quasi filii, et dimittenda est litteralis observantia, quasi mater; sicut in omnibus caeremoniis legis. Prohibetur etiam quod iumenta, idest populares homines, non faciamus coire, idest coniunctionem habere, cum alterius generis animantibus, idest cum gentilibus vel Iudaeis.

Ad nonum dicendum quod omnes illae commixtiones in agricultura sunt prohibitae, ad litteram, in detestationem idololatriae. Quia Aegyptii, in venerationem stellarum, diversas commixtiones faciebant et in seminibus et in animalibus et in vestibus, repraesentantes diversas coniunctiones stellarum. Vel omnes huiusmodi commixtiones variae prohibentur ad detestationem coitus contra naturam. Habent tamen figuralem rationem. Quia quod dicitur, non seres vineam tuam altero semine, est spiritualiter intelligendum, quod in Ecclesia, quae est spiritualis vinea, non est seminanda aliena doctrina. Et similiter ager, idest Ecclesia, non est seminandus diverso semine, idest Catholica doctrina et haeretica. Non est etiam simul arandum in bove et asino, quia fatuus sapienti in praedicatione non est sociandus, quia unus impedit alium.

Ad undecimum dicendum quod malefici et sacerdotes idolorum utebantur in suis ritibus ossibus vel carnibus hominum mortuorum. Et ideo, ad extirpandum idololatriae cultum, praecepit dominus ut sacerdotes minores, qui per tempora certa ministrabant in sanctuario, non inquinarentur in mortibus nisi valde propinquorum, scilicet patris et matris et huiusmodi coniunctarum personarum. Pontifex autem semper debebat esse paratus ad ministerium sanctuarii, et ideo totaliter prohibitus erat ei accessus ad mortuos, quantumcumque propinquos. Praeceptum etiam est eis ne ducerent uxorem meretricem ac repudiatam, sed virginem. Tum propter reverentiam sacerdotum, quorum dignitas quodammodo ex tali coniugio diminui videretur. Tum etiam propter filios, quibus esset ad ignominiam turpitudine matris, quod maxime tunc erat vitandum, quando sacerdotii dignitas secundum successionem generis conferebatur. Praeceptum etiam erat eis ut non raderent caput nec barbam, nec in carnibus suis facerent incisuram, ad removendum idololatriae ritum. Nam sacerdotes gentilium radebant caput et barbam, unde dicitur Baruch VI, sacerdotes sedent habentes tunicas scissas, et capita et barbam rasam. Et etiam in cultu idolorum incidebant se cultris et lanceolis, ut dicitur III regum XVIII. Unde contraria praecepta sunt sacerdotibus veteris legis. Spiritualis autem ratio horum est quia sacerdotes omnino debent esse immunes ab operibus mortuis, quae sunt opera peccati. Et etiam non debent radere caput, idest deponere sapientiam; neque deponere barbam, idest sapientiae perfectionem; neque etiam scindere vestimenta aut incidere carnes, ut scilicet vitium schismatis non incurrant.

Quaestio 103

Prooemium

[38105] I^a-IIae q. 103 pr.

Deinde considerandum est de duratione caeremonialium praeceptorum. Et circa hoc quaeruntur quatuor. Primo, utrum praecepta caeremonialia fuerint ante legem. Secundo, utrum in lege aliquam virtutem habuerint iustificandi. Tertio, utrum cessaverint Christo veniente. Quarto, utrum sit peccatum mortale observare ea post Christum.

Articulus 1

[38106] I^a-IIae q. 103 a. 1 arg. 1

Ad primum sic proceditur. Videtur quod caeremoniae legis fuerint ante legem. Sacrificia enim et holocausta pertinent ad caeremonias veteris legis, ut supra dictum est. Sed sacrificia et holocausta fuerunt ante legem. Dicitur enim Gen. IV, quod Cain obtulit de fructibus terrae munera domino; Abel autem obtulit de primogenitis gregis sui, et de adipibus eorum. Noe etiam obtulit holocausta domino, ut dicitur Gen. VIII; et Abraham similiter, ut dicitur Gen. XXII. Ergo caeremoniae veteris legis fuerunt ante legem.

[38107] I^a-IIae q. 103 a. 1 arg. 2

Praeterea, ad caeremonias sacrorum pertinet constructio altaris, et eius inunctio. Sed ista fuerunt ante legem. Legitur enim Gen. XIII, quod Abraham aedificavit altare domino; et de Iacob dicitur Gen. XXVIII, quod tulit lapidem et erexit in titulum fundens oleum desuper. Ergo caeremoniae legales fuerunt ante legem.

[38108] I^a-IIae q. 103 a. 1 arg. 3

Praeterea, inter sacramenta legalia primum videtur fuisse circumcisio. Sed circumcisio fuit ante legem, ut patet Gen. XVII. Similiter etiam sacerdotium fuit ante legem, dicitur enim Gen. XIV, quod Melchisedech erat sacerdos Dei summi. Ergo caeremoniae sacramentorum fuerunt ante legem.

Praeterea, discretio mundorum animalium ab immundis pertinet ad caeremonias observantiarum, ut supra dictum est. Sed talis discretio fuit ante legem, dicitur enim Gen. VII, ex omnibus mundis animalibus tolle septena et septena; de animantibus vero immundis, duo et duo. Ergo caeremoniae legales fuerunt ante legem.

Sed contra est quod dicitur Deut. VI, haec sunt praecepta et caeremoniae quae mandavit dominus Deus vester ut docerem vos. Non autem indignissent super his doceri, si prius praedictae caeremoniae fuissent. Ergo caeremoniae legis non fuerunt ante legem.

Respondeo dicendum quod, sicut ex dictis patet, caeremoniae legis ad duo ordinabantur, scilicet ad cultum Dei, et ad figurandum Christum. Quicumque autem colit Deum, oportet quod per aliqua determinata eum colat, quae ad exteriorem cultum pertinent. Determinatio autem divini cultus ad caeremonias pertinet; sicut etiam determinatio eorum per quae ordinamur ad proximum, pertinet ad praecepta iudicialia; ut supra dictum est. Et ideo sicut inter homines communiter erant aliqua iudicialia, non tamen ex auctoritate legis divinae instituta, sed ratione hominum ordinata; ita etiam erant quaedam caeremoniae, non quidem ex auctoritate alicuius legis determinatae, sed solum secundum voluntatem et devotionem hominum Deum colentium. Sed quia etiam ante legem fuerunt quidam viri praecipui prophetico spiritu pollentes, credendum est quod ex instinctu divino, quasi ex quadam privata lege, inducerentur ad aliquem certum modum colendi Deum, qui et conveniens esset interiori cultui, et etiam congrueret ad significandum Christi mysteria, quae figurabantur etiam per alia eorum gesta, secundum illud I ad Cor. X, omnia in figuram contingebant illis. Fuerunt igitur ante legem quaedam caeremoniae, non tamen caeremoniae legis, quia non erant per aliquam legislationem institutae.

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod huiusmodi oblationes et sacrificia et holocausta offerebant antiqui ante legem ex quadam devotione propriae voluntatis, secundum quod eis videbatur conveniens ut in rebus quas a Deo acceperant, quas in reverentiam divinam offerrent, protestarentur se colere Deum, qui est omnium principium et finis.

[38113] I^a-IIae q. 103 a. 1 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod etiam sacra quaedam instituerunt, quia videbatur eis conveniens ut in reverentiam divinam essent aliqua loca ab aliis discreta, divino cultui mancipata.

[38114] I^a-IIae q. 103 a. 1 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod sacramentum circumcisionis praecepto divino fuit statutum ante legem. Unde non potest dici sacramentum legis quasi in lege institutum, sed solum quasi in lege observatum. Et hoc est quod dominus dicit, Ioan. VII, circumcisio non ex Moyse est, sed ex patribus eius. Sacerdotium etiam erat ante legem apud colentes Deum, secundum humanam determinationem, quia hanc dignitatem primogenitis attribuebant.

[38115] I^a-IIae q. 103 a. 1 ad 4

Ad quartum dicendum quod distinctio mundorum animalium et immundorum non fuit ante legem quantum ad esum, cum dictum sit Gen. IX, omne quod movetur et vivit, erit vobis in cibum, sed solum quantum ad sacrificiorum oblationem, quia de quibusdam determinatis animalibus sacrificia offerebant. Si tamen quantum ad esum erat aliqua discretio animalium, hoc non erat quia esus illorum reputaretur illicitus, cum nulla lege esset prohibitus, sed propter abominationem vel consuetudinem, sicut et nunc videmus quod aliqua cibaria sunt in aliquibus terris abominabilia, quae in aliis comeduntur.

Articulus 2

[38116] I^a-IIae q. 103 a. 2 arg. 1

Ad secundum sic proceditur. Videtur quod caeremoniae veteris legis habuerint virtutem iustificandi tempore legis. Expiatio enim a peccato, et consecratio hominis, ad iustificationem pertinent, sed Exod. XXIX, dicitur quod per aspersionem sanguinis et inunctionem olei consecrabantur sacerdotes et vestes eorum; et Levit. XVI, dicitur quod sacerdos per aspersionem sanguinis vituli expiabat sanctuarium ab immunditiis filiorum Israel, et a praevaricationibus eorum atque peccatis. Ergo caeremoniae veteris legis habebant virtutem iustificandi.

[38117] I^a-IIae q. 103 a. 2 arg. 2

Praeterea, id per quod homo placet Deo, ad iustitiam pertinet; secundum illud Psalmi X, iustus dominus, et iustitias dilexit, sed per caeremonias aliqui Deo placebant, secundum illud Levit. X, quomodo potui placere domino in caeremoniis mente lugubri? Ergo caeremoniae veteris legis habebant virtutem iustificandi.

[38118] I^a-IIae q. 103 a. 2 arg. 3

Praeterea, ea quae sunt divini cultus magis pertinent ad animam quam ad corpus; secundum illud Psalmi XVIII, lex domini immaculata, convertens animas. Sed per caeremonias veteris legis mundabatur leprosus, ut dicitur Levit. XIV. Ergo multo magis caeremoniae veteris legis poterant mundare animam, iustificando.

[38119] I^a-IIae q. 103 a. 2 s. c.

Sed contra est quod apostolus dicit, Galat. II, si data esset lex quae posset iustificare, Christus gratis mortuus esset, idest sine causa. Sed hoc est inconveniens. Ergo caeremoniae veteris legis non iustificabant.

[38120] I^a-IIae q. 103 a. 2 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod, sicut supra dictum est, in veteri lege duplex immunditia observabatur. Una quidem spiritualis, quae est immunditia culpa. Alia vero corporalis, quae tollebat idoneitatem ad cultum divinum, sicut leprosus dicebatur immundus, vel ille qui tangebatur aliquod morticinum, et sic immunditia nihil aliud erat quam irregularitas quaedam. Ab hac igitur immunditia caeremoniae veteris legis habebant virtutem emundandi, quia huiusmodi caeremoniae erant quaedam remedia adhibita ex ordinatione legis ad tollendas praedictas immunditias ex statuto legis inductas. Et ideo apostolus dicit, ad Heb. IX, quod sanguis hircorum et taurorum, et cinis vitulae aspersus, inquinatos sanctificat ad emundationem carnis. Et sicut ista immunditia quae per huiusmodi caeremonias emundabatur, erat magis carnis quam mentis; ita etiam ipsae caeremoniae iustitiae carnis dicuntur ab ipso apostolo, parum supra, iustitiis, inquit, carnis usque ad tempus correctionis impositis. Ab immunditia vero mentis, quae est immunditia culpa, non habebant virtutem expiandi. Et hoc ideo quia expiatio a peccatis nunquam fieri potuit nisi per Christum, qui tollit peccata mundi, ut dicitur Ioan. I, et quia mysterium incarnationis et passionis Christi nondum erat realiter peractum, illae veteris legis caeremoniae non poterant in se continere realiter virtutem profluentem a Christo incarnato et passo, sicut continent sacramenta novae legis. Et ideo non poterant a peccato mundare, sicut apostolus dicit, ad Heb. X, quod impossibile est sanguine taurorum aut hircorum auferri peccata. Et hoc est quod, Gal. IV, apostolus vocat ea egena et infirma elementa, infirma quidem, quia non possunt a peccato mundare; sed haec infirmitas provenit ex eo quod sunt egena, idest eo quod non continent in se gratiam. Poterat autem mens fidelium, tempore legis, per fidem coniungi Christo incarnato et passo, et ita ex fide Christi iustificabantur. Cuius fidei quaedam protestatio erat huiusmodi caeremoniarum observatio, inquantum erant figura Christi. Et ideo pro peccatis offerebantur sacrificia quaedam in veteri lege, non quia ipsa sacrificia a peccato emundarent, sed quia erant quaedam protestationes fidei, quae a peccato mundabat. Et hoc etiam ipsa lex innuit ex modo loquendi, dicitur enim Levit. IV et V, quod in oblatione hostiarum pro peccato orabit pro eo sacerdos, et dimittetur ei; quasi peccatum dimittatur non ex vi sacrificiorum, sed ex fide et devotione offerentium. Sciendum est tamen quod hoc ipsum quod veteris legis caeremoniae a corporalibus immunditiis expiabant, erat in figura expiationis a peccatis quae fit per Christum. Sic igitur patet quod caeremoniae in statu veteris legis non habebant virtutem iustificandi.

[38121] I^a-IIae q. 103 a. 2 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod illa sanctificatio sacerdotum et filiorum eius, et vestium ipsorum, vel quorumcumque aliorum, per aspersionem sanguinis, nihil aliud erat quam deputatio ad divinum cultum, et remotio impedimentorum ad emundationem carnis, ut apostolus dicit; in praefigurationem illius sanctificationis qua Iesus per suum sanguinem sanctificavit populum. Expiatio etiam ad remotionem huiusmodi corporalium immunditiarum referenda est, non ad remotionem culpae. Unde etiam sanctuarium expiari dicitur, quod culpae subiectum esse non poterat.

[38122] I^a-IIae q. 103 a. 2 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod sacerdotes placebant Deo in caeremoniis propter obedientiam et devotionem et fidem rei praefiguratae, non autem propter ipsas res secundum se consideratas.

Ad tertium dicendum quod caeremoniae illae quae erant institutae in emundatione leprosi, non ordinabantur ad tollendam immunditiam infirmitatis leprae. Quod patet ex hoc quod non adhibebantur huiusmodi caeremoniae nisi iam emundato, unde dicitur Levit. XIV, quod sacerdos, egressus de castris, cum invenerit lepram esse mundatam, praecipiet ei qui purificatur ut offerat, etc.; ex quo patet quod sacerdos constituebatur iudex leprae emundatae, non autem emundandae. Adhibebantur autem huiusmodi caeremoniae ad tollendam immunditiam irregularitatis. Dicunt tamen quod quandoque, si contingeret sacerdotem errare in iudicando, miraculose leprosus mundabatur a Deo virtute divina, non autem virtute sacrificiorum. Sicut etiam miraculose mulieris adulterae computrescebat femur, bibitis aquis in quibus sacerdos maledicta congesserat, ut habetur Num. V.

Articulus 3

Ad tertium sic proceditur. Videtur quod caeremoniae veteris legis non cessaverint in Christi adventu. Dicitur enim Baruch IV, hic est liber mandatorum Dei, et lex quae est in aeternum. Sed ad legem pertinebant legis caeremoniae. Ergo legis caeremoniae in aeternum duraturae erant.

Praeterea, oblatio leprosi mundati ad legis caeremonias pertinebat. Sed etiam in Evangelio praecipitur leproso emundato ut huiusmodi oblationes offerat. Ergo caeremoniae veteris legis non cessaverunt Christo veniente.

Praeterea, manente causa, manet effectus. Sed caeremoniae veteris legis habebant quasdam rationabiles causas, inquantum ordinabantur ad divinum cultum; etiam praeter hoc quod ordinabantur in figuram Christi. Ergo caeremoniae veteris legis cessare non debuerunt.

Praeterea, circumcisio erat instituta in signum fidei Abrahae; observatio autem sabbati ad recolendum beneficium creationis; et aliae solemnitates legis ad recolendum alia beneficia Dei; ut supra dictum est. Sed fides Abrahae est semper imitanda etiam a nobis; et beneficium creationis, et alia Dei beneficia, semper sunt recolenda. Ergo ad minus circumcisio et solemnitates legis cessare non debuerunt.

[38128] I^a-IIae q. 103 a. 3 s. c.

Sed contra est quod apostolus dicit, ad Coloss. II, nemo vos iudicet in cibo aut in potu, aut in parte diei festi aut Neomeniae aut sabbatorum, quae sunt umbra futurorum. Et ad Heb. VIII dicitur quod, dicendo novum testamentum, veteravit prius, quod autem antiquatur et senescit, prope interitum est.

[38129] I^a-IIae q. 103 a. 3 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod omnia praecepta caeremonialia veteris legis ad cultum Dei sunt ordinata, ut supra dictum est. Exterior autem cultus proportionari debet interiori cultui, qui consistit in fide, spe et caritate. Unde secundum diversitatem interioris cultus, debuit diversificari cultus exterior. Potest autem triplex status distingui interioris cultus. Unus quidem secundum quem habetur fides et spes et de bonis caelestibus, et de his per quae in caelestia introducimur, de utrisque quidem sicut de quibusdam futuris. Et talis fuit status fidei et spei in veteri lege. Alius autem est status interioris cultus in quo habetur fides et spes de caelestibus bonis sicut de quibusdam futuris, sed de his per quae introducimur in caelestia, sicut de praesentibus vel praeteritis. Et iste est status novae legis. Tertius autem status est in quo utraque habentur ut praesentia, et nihil creditur ut absens, neque speratur ut futurum. Et iste est status beatorum. In illo ergo statu beatorum nihil erit figurale ad divinum cultum pertinens, sed solum gratiarum actio et vox laudis. Et ideo dicitur Apoc. XXI, de civitate beatorum, templum non vidi in ea, dominus enim Deus omnipotens templum illius est, et agnus. Pari igitur ratione, caeremoniae primi status, per quas figurabatur et secundus et tertius, veniente secundo statu, cessare debuerunt; et aliae caeremoniae induci, quae convenirent statui cultus divini pro tempore illo, in quo bona caelestia sunt futura, beneficia autem Dei per quae ad caelestia introducimur, sunt praesentia.

[38130] I^a-IIae q. 103 a. 3 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod lex vetus dicitur esse in aeternum, secundum moralia quidem, simpliciter et absolute, secundum caeremonialia vero, quantum ad veritatem per ea figuratam.

Ad secundum dicendum quod mysterium redemptionis humani generis completum fuit in passione Christi, unde tunc dominus dixit, consummatum est, ut habetur Ioan. XIX. Et ideo tunc totaliter debuerunt cessare legalia, quasi iam veritate eorum consummata. In cuius signum, in passione Christi velum templi legitur esse scissum, Matth. XXVII. Et ideo ante passionem Christi, Christo praedicante et miracula faciente, currebant simul lex et Evangelium, quia iam mysterium Christi erat inchoatum, sed nondum consummatum. Et propter hoc mandavit dominus, ante passionem suam, leproso, ut legales caeremonias observaret.

Ad tertium dicendum quod rationes litterales caeremoniarum supra assignatae referuntur ad divinum cultum, qui quidem cultus erat in fide venturi. Et ideo, iam veniente eo qui venturus erat, et cultus ille cessat, et omnes rationes ad hunc cultum ordinatae.

Ad quartum dicendum quod fides Abrahae fuit commendata in hoc quod credidit divinae promissioni de futuro semine, in quo benedicerentur omnes gentes. Et ideo quandiu hoc erat futurum, oportebat protestari fidem Abrahae in circumcissione. Sed postquam iam hoc est perfectum, oportet idem alio signo declarari, scilicet Baptismo, qui in hoc circumcissione succedit; secundum illud apostoli, ad Coloss. II, circumcisi estis circumcissione non manu facta in expoliatione corporis carnis, sed in circumcissione domini nostri Iesu Christi, consepulti ei in Baptismo. Sabbatum autem, quod significabat primam creationem, mutatur in diem dominicum, in quo commemoratur nova creatura inchoata in resurrectione Christi. Et similiter aliis solemnitatibus veteris legis novae solemnitates succedunt, quia beneficia illi populo exhibita, significant beneficia nobis concessa per Christum. Unde festo phase succedit festum passionis Christi et resurrectionis. Festo Pentecostes, in quo fuit data lex vetus, succedit festum Pentecostes in quo fuit data lex spiritus vitae. Festo Neomeniae succedit festum beatae virginis, in qua primo apparuit illuminatio solis, idest Christi, per copiam gratiae. Festo tubarum succedunt festa apostolorum. Festo expiationis succedunt festa martyrum et confessorum. Festo tabernaculorum succedit festum consecrationis Ecclesiae. Festo coetus atque collectae succedit festum Angelorum; vel etiam festum omnium sanctorum.

Articulus 4

[38134] I^a-IIae q. 103 a. 4 arg. 1

Ad quartum sic proceditur. Videtur quod post passionem Christi legalia possint sine peccato mortali observari. Non est enim credendum quod apostoli, post acceptum spiritum sanctum, mortaliter peccaverint, eius enim plenitudine sunt induti virtute ex alto, ut dicitur Lucae ult. Sed apostoli post adventum spiritus sancti legalia observaverunt, dicitur enim Act. XVI, quod Paulus circumcidit Timotheum; et Act. XXI, dicitur quod Paulus, secundum consilium Iacobi, assumptis viris, purificatus cum eis intravit in templum, annuntians expletionem dierum purificationis, donec offerretur pro unoquoque eorum oblatio. Ergo sine peccato mortali possunt post Christi passionem legalia observari.

[38135] I^a-IIae q. 103 a. 4 arg. 2

Praeterea, vitare consortia gentilium ad caeremonias legis pertinebat. Sed hoc observavit primus pastor Ecclesiae, dicitur enim ad Gal. II, quod, cum venissent quidam Antiochiam, subtrahebat et segregabat se Petrus a gentilibus. Ergo absque peccato post passionem Christi legis caeremoniae observari possunt.

[38136] I^a-IIae q. 103 a. 4 arg. 3

Praeterea, praecepta apostolorum non induxerunt homines ad peccatum. Sed ex decreto apostolorum statutum fuit quod gentiles quaedam de caeremoniis legis observarent, dicitur enim Act. XV, visum est spiritui sancto et nobis nihil ultra imponere oneris vobis quam haec necessaria, ut abstineatis vos ab immolatis simulacrorum, et sanguine, et suffocato, et fornicatione. Ergo absque peccato caeremoniae legales possunt post Christi passionem observari.

[38137] I^a-IIae q. 103 a. 4 s. c.

Sed contra est quod apostolus dicit, ad Gal. V, si circumcidimini, Christus nihil vobis proderit. Sed nihil excludit fructum Christi nisi peccatum mortale. Ergo circumcidi, et alias caeremonias observare, post passionem Christi est peccatum mortale.

Respondeo dicendum quod omnes caeremoniae sunt quaedam protestationes fidei, in qua consistit interior Dei cultus. Sic autem fidem interiorem potest homo protestari factis, sicut et verbis, et in utraque protestatione, si aliquid homo falsum protestatur, peccat mortaliter. Quamvis autem sit eadem fides quam habemus de Christo, et quam antiqui patres habuerunt; tamen quia ipsi praecesserunt Christum, nos autem sequimur, eadem fides diversis verbis significatur a nobis et ab eis. Nam ab eis dicebatur, ecce virgo concipiet et pariet filium, quae sunt verba futuri temporis, nos autem idem repraesentamus per verba praeteriti temporis, dicentes quod concepit et peperit. Et similiter caeremoniae veteris legis significabant Christum ut nasciturum et passurum, nostra autem sacramenta significant ipsum ut natum et passum. Sicut igitur peccaret mortaliter qui nunc, suam fidem protestando, diceret Christum nasciturum, quod antiqui pie et veraciter dicebant; ita etiam peccaret mortaliter, si quis nunc caeremonias observaret, quas antiqui pie et fideliter observabant. Et hoc est quod Augustinus dicit, contra Faustum, iam non promittitur nasciturus, passurus, resurrecturus, quod illa sacramenta quodammodo personabant, sed annuntiat quod natus sit, passus sit, surrexerit; quod haec sacramenta quae a Christianis aguntur, iam personant.

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod circa hoc diversimode sensisse videntur Hieronymus et Augustinus. Hieronymus enim distinxit duo tempora. Unum tempus ante passionem Christi, in quo legalia nec erant mortua, quasi non habentia vim obligatoriam, aut expiativam pro suo modo; nec etiam mortifera, quia non peccabant ea observantes. Statim autem post passionem Christi incoeperunt esse non solum mortua, idest non habentia virtutem et obligationem; sed etiam mortifera, ita scilicet quod peccabant mortaliter quicumque ea observabant. Unde dicebat quod apostoli nunquam legalia observaverunt post passionem secundum veritatem; sed solum quadam pia simulatione, ne scilicet scandalizarent Iudaeos et eorum conversionem impedirent. Quae quidem simulatio sic intelligenda est, non quidem ita quod illos actus secundum rei veritatem non facerent, sed quia non faciebant tanquam legis caeremonias observantes; sicut si quis pelliculam virilis membri abscinderet propter sanitatem, non causa legalis circumcisionis observandae. Sed quia indecens videtur quod apostoli ea occultarent propter scandalum quae pertinent ad veritatem vitae et doctrinae, et quod simulatione uterentur in his quae pertinent ad salutem fidelium; ideo convenientius Augustinus distinxit tria tempora. Unum quidem ante Christi passionem, in quo legalia non erant neque mortifera neque mortua. Aliud autem post tempus Evangelii divulgati, in quo legalia sunt et mortua et mortifera. Tertium autem est tempus medium, scilicet a passione Christi usque ad divulgationem Evangelii, in quo legalia fuerunt quidem mortua, quia neque vim aliquam habebant, neque aliquis ea observare tenebatur; non tamen fuerunt mortifera, quia illi qui conversi erant ad Christum ex Iudaeis, poterant illa legalia licite observare, dummodo non sic ponerent spem in eis quod ea reputarent sibi necessaria ad salutem, quasi sine legalibus fides Christi iustificare non posset. His autem qui convertebantur ex gentilitate ad Christum, non inerat causa ut ea observarent. Et ideo Paulus circumcidit Timotheum, qui ex matre Iudaea genitus erat; Titum autem, qui ex gentilibus natus erat, circumcidere noluit. Ideo autem noluit spiritus sanctus ut statim inhiberetur his qui ex Iudaeis convertebantur observatio legalium, sicut inhibebatur his qui ex gentilibus convertebantur gentilitatis ritus, ut quaedam differentia inter hos ritus ostenderetur. Nam gentilitatis ritus repudiabatur tanquam omnino illicitus, et a Deo semper prohibitus, ritus autem legis cessabat tanquam impletus per Christi passionem, utpote a Deo in figuram Christi institutus.

[38140] I^a-II^ae q. 103 a. 4 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod, secundum Hieronymum, Petrus simulatorie se a gentilibus subtrahebat, ut vitaret Iudaeorum scandalum, quorum erat apostolus. Unde in hoc nullo modo peccavit, sed Paulus eum similiter simulatorie reprehendit, ut vitaret scandalum gentilium, quorum erat apostolus. Sed Augustinus hoc improbat, quia Paulus in canonica Scriptura, scilicet Gal. II, in qua nefas est credere aliquid esse falsum, dicit quod Petrus reprehensibilis erat. Unde verum est quod Petrus peccavit, et Paulus vere eum, non simulatorie, reprehendit. Non autem peccavit Petrus in hoc quod ad tempus legalia observabat, quia hoc sibi licebat, tanquam ex Iudaeis converso. Sed peccabat in hoc quod circa legalium observantiam nimiam diligentiam adhibebat ne scandalizaret Iudaeos, ita quod ex hoc sequebatur gentilium scandalum.

Ad tertium dicendum quod quidam dixerunt quod illa prohibitio apostolorum non est intelligenda ad litteram, sed secundum spiritualem intellectum, ut scilicet in prohibitione sanguinis, intelligatur prohibitio homicidii; in prohibitione suffocati, intelligatur prohibitio violentiae et rapinae; in prohibitione immolatorum, intelligatur prohibitio idololatriae; fornicatio autem prohibetur tanquam per se malum. Et hanc opinionem accipiunt ex quibusdam Glossis, quae huiusmodi praecepta mystice exponunt. Sed quia homicidium et rapina etiam apud gentiles reputabantur illicita, non oportuisset super hoc speciale mandatum dari his qui erant ex gentilitate conversi ad Christum. Unde alii dicunt quod ad litteram illa comestibilia fuerunt prohibita, non propter observantiam legalium, sed propter gulam comprimendam. Unde dicit Hieronymus, super illud Ezech. XLIV, omne morticinum etc., condemnat sacerdotes qui in turdis et ceteris huiusmodi, haec, cupiditate gulae, non custodiunt. Sed quia sunt quaedam cibaria magis delicata et gulam provocantia, non videtur ratio quare fuerunt haec magis quam alia prohibita. Et ideo dicendum, secundum tertiam opinionem, quod ad litteram ista sunt prohibita, non ad observandum caeremonias legis, sed ad hoc quod posset coalescere unio gentilium et Iudaeorum insimul habitantium. Iudaeis enim, propter antiquam consuetudinem, sanguis et suffocatum erant abominabilia, comestio autem immolatorum simulacris, poterat in Iudaeis aggenerare circa gentiles suspicionem reditus ad idololatriam. Et ideo ista fuerunt prohibita pro tempore illo, in quo de novo oportebat convenire in unum gentiles et Iudaeos. Procedente autem tempore, cessante causa, cessat effectus; manifestata evangelicae doctrinae veritate, in qua dominus docet quod nihil quod per os intrat, coinquinat hominem, ut dicitur Matth. XV; et quod nihil est reiiciendum quod cum gratiarum actione percipitur, ut I ad Tim. IV dicitur. Fornicatio autem prohibetur specialiter, quia gentiles eam non reputabant esse peccatum.

Quaestio 104

Prooemium

Consequenter considerandum est de praeceptis iudicialibus. Et primo, considerandum est de ipsis in communi; secundo, de rationibus eorum.

Circa primum quaeruntur quatuor. Primo, quae sint iudicialia praecepta. Secundo, utrum sint figuralia. Tertio, de duratione eorum. Quarto, de distinctione eorum.

Articulus 1

[38143] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 1 arg. 1

Ad primum sic proceditur. Videtur quod ratio praeceptorum iudicialium non consistat in hoc quod sunt ordinantia ad proximum. Iudicialia enim praecepta a iudicio dicuntur. Sed multa sunt alia quibus homo ad proximum ordinatur, quae non pertinent ad ordinem iudiciorum. Non ergo praecepta iudicialia dicuntur quibus homo ordinatur ad proximum.

[38144] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 1 arg. 2

Praeterea, praecepta iudicialia a moralibus distinguuntur, ut supra dictum est. Sed multa praecepta moralia sunt quibus homo ordinatur ad proximum, sicut patet in septem praeceptis secundae tabulae. Non ergo praecepta iudicialia dicuntur ex hoc quod ad proximum ordinant.

[38145] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 1 arg. 3

Praeterea, sicut se habent praecepta caeremonialia ad Deum, ita se habent iudicialia praecepta ad proximum, ut supra dictum est. Sed inter praecepta caeremonialia sunt quaedam quae pertinent ad seipsum, sicut observantiae ciborum et vestimentorum, de quibus supra dictum est. Ergo praecepta iudicialia non ex hoc dicuntur quod ordinent hominem ad proximum.

[38146] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 1 s. c.

Sed contra est quod dicitur Ezech. XVIII, inter cetera bona opera viri iusti, si iudicium verum fecerit inter virum et virum. Sed iudicialia praecepta a iudicio dicuntur. Ergo praecepta iudicialia videntur dici illa quae pertinent ad ordinationem hominum ad invicem.

[38147] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 1 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod, sicut ex supradictis patet, praeceptorum cuiuscumque legis quaedam habent vim obligandi ex ipso dictamine rationis, quia naturalis ratio dictat hoc esse debitum fieri vel vitari. Et huiusmodi praecepta dicuntur moralia, eo quod a ratione dicuntur mores humani. Alia vero praecepta sunt quae non habent vim obligandi ex ipso dictamine rationis, quia scilicet in se considerata non habent absolute rationem debiti vel indebiti; sed habent vim obligandi ex aliqua institutione divina vel humana. Et huiusmodi sunt determinationes quaedam moralium praeceptorum. Si igitur determinentur moralia praecepta per institutionem divinam in his per quae ordinatur homo ad Deum, talia dicentur praecepta caeremonialia. Si autem in his quae pertinent ad ordinationem hominum ad invicem, talia dicentur praecepta iudicialia. In duobus ergo consistit ratio iudicialium praeceptorum, scilicet ut pertineant ad ordinationem hominum ad invicem; et ut non habeant vim obligandi ex sola ratione, sed ex institutione.

[38148] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 1 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod iudicia exercentur officio aliquorum principum, qui habent potestatem iudicandi. Ad principem autem pertinet non solum ordinare de his quae veniunt in litigium, sed etiam de voluntariis contractibus qui inter homines fiunt, et de omnibus pertinentibus ad populi communitatem et regimen. Unde praecepta iudicialia non solum sunt illa quae pertinent ad lites iudiciorum; sed etiam quaecumque pertinent ad ordinationem hominum ad invicem, quae subest ordinationi principis tanquam supremi iudicis.

[38149] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 1 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod ratio illa procedit de illis praeceptis ordinantibus ad proximum, quae habent vim obligandi ex solo dictamine rationis.

[38150] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 1 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod etiam in his quae ordinant ad Deum, quaedam sunt moralia, quae ipsa ratio fide informata dictat, sicut Deum esse amandum et colendum. Quaedam vero sunt caeremonialia, quae non habent vim obligationis nisi ex institutione divina. Ad Deum autem pertinent non solum sacrificia oblata Deo, sed etiam quaecumque pertinent ad idoneitatem offerentium et Deum colentium. Homines enim ordinantur in Deum sicut in finem, et ideo ad cultum Dei pertinet, et per consequens ad caeremonialia praecepta, quod homo habeat quandam idoneitatem respectu cultus divini. Sed homo non ordinatur ad proximum sicut in finem, ut oporteat eum disponi in seipso in ordine ad proximum, haec enim est comparatio servorum ad dominos, qui id quod sunt, dominorum sunt, secundum philosophum, in I Polit. Et ideo non sunt aliqua praecepta iudicialia ordinantia hominem in seipso, sed omnia talia sunt moralia, quia ratio, quae est principium moralium, se habet in homine respectu eorum quae ad ipsum pertinent, sicut princeps vel iudex in civitate. Sciendum tamen quod, quia ordo hominis ad proximum magis subiacet rationi quam ordo hominis ad Deum, plura praecepta moralia inveniuntur per quae ordinatur homo ad proximum, quam per quae ordinatur ad Deum. Et propter hoc etiam oportuit plura esse caeremonialia in lege quam iudicialia.

Articulus 2

[38151] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 2 arg. 1

Ad secundum sic proceditur. Videtur quod praecepta iudicialia non figurent aliquid. Hoc enim videtur esse proprium caeremonialium praeceptorum, quod sint in figuram alicuius rei instituta. Si igitur etiam praecepta iudicialia aliquid figurent, non erit differentia inter iudicialia et caeremonialia praecepta.

[38152] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 2 arg. 2

Praeterea, sicuti illi populo Iudaeorum data sunt quaedam iudicialia praecepta, ita etiam aliis populis gentilium. Sed iudicialia praecepta aliorum populorum non figurant aliquid, sed ordinant quid fieri debeat. Ergo videtur quod neque praecepta iudicialia veteris legis aliquid figurarent.

[38153] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 2 arg. 3

Praeterea, ea quae ad cultum divinum pertinent, figuris quibusdam tradi oportuit, quia ea quae Dei sunt, supra nostram rationem sunt, ut supra dictum est. Sed ea quae sunt proximorum, non excedunt nostram rationem. Ergo per iudicialia, quae ad proximum nos ordinant, non oportuit aliquid figurari.

[38154] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 2 s. c.

Sed contra est quod Exod. XXI iudicialia praecepta allegorice et moraliter exponuntur.

[38155] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 2 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod dupliciter contingit aliquod praeceptum esse figurale. Uno modo, primo et per se, quia scilicet principaliter est institutum ad aliquid figurandum. Et hoc modo praecepta caeremonialia sunt figuralia, ad hoc enim sunt instituta, ut aliquid figurent pertinens ad cultum Dei et ad mysterium Christi. Quaedam vero praecepta sunt figuralia non primo et per se, sed ex consequenti. Et hoc modo praecepta iudicialia veteris legis sunt figuralia. Non enim sunt instituta ad aliquid figurandum; sed ad ordinandum statum illius populi secundum iustitiam et aequitatem. Sed ex consequenti aliquid figurabant, inquantum scilicet totus status illius populi, qui per huiusmodi praecepta disponebatur, figuralis erat; secundum illud I ad Cor. X, omnia in figuram contingebant illis.

[38156] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 2 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod praecepta caeremonialia alio modo sunt figuralia quam iudicialia, ut dictum est.

[38157] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 2 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod populus Iudaeorum ad hoc electus erat a Deo, quod ex eo Christus nasceretur. Et ideo oportuit totum illius populi statum esse propheticum et figuralem, ut Augustinus dicit, contra Faustum. Et propter hoc etiam iudicialia illi populo tradita, magis sunt figuralia quam iudicialia aliis populis tradita. Sicut etiam bella et gesta illius populi exponuntur mystice; non autem bella vel gesta Assyriorum vel Romanorum, quamvis longe clariora secundum homines.

[38158] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 2 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod ordo ad proximum in populo illo, secundum se consideratus, pervius erat rationi. Sed secundum quod referebatur ad cultum Dei, superabat rationem. Et ex hac parte erat figuralis.

Articulus 3

[38159] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 3 arg. 1

Ad tertium sic proceditur. Videtur quod praecepta iudicialia veteris legis perpetuam obligationem habeant. Praecepta enim iudicialia pertinent ad virtutem iustitiae, nam iudicium dicitur iustitiae executio. Iustitia autem est perpetua et immortalis, ut dicitur Sap. I. Ergo obligatio praeceptorum iudicialium est perpetua.

Praeterea, institutio divina est stabilior quam institutio humana. Sed praecepta iudicialia humanarum legum habent perpetuam obligationem. Ergo multo magis praecepta iudicialia legis divinae.

Praeterea, apostolus dicit, ad Heb. VII, quod reprobatio fit praecedentis mandati propter infirmitatem ipsius et inutilitatem. Quod quidem verum est de mandato caeremoniali quod non poterat facere perfectum iuxta conscientiam servientem solummodo in cibis et in potibus et variis Baptismatibus et iustitiis carnis, ut apostolus dicit, ad Heb. IX. Sed praecepta iudicialia utilia erant et efficacia ad id ad quod ordinabantur, scilicet ad iustitiam et aequitatem inter homines constituendam. Ergo praecepta iudicialia veteris legis non reprobantur, sed adhuc efficaciam habent.

Sed contra est quod apostolus dicit, ad Heb. VII, quod translato sacerdotio, necesse est ut legis translatio fiat. Sed sacerdotium est translatum ab Aaron ad Christum. Ergo etiam et tota lex est translata. Non ergo iudicialia praecepta adhuc obligationem habent.

Respondeo dicendum quod iudicialia praecepta non habuerunt perpetuam obligationem, sed sunt evacuata per adventum Christi, aliter tamen quam caeremonialia. Nam caeremonialia adeo sunt evacuata ut non solum sint mortua, sed etiam mortifera observantibus post Christum, maxime post Evangelium divulgatum. Praecepta autem iudicialia sunt quidem mortua, quia non habent vim obligandi, non tamen sunt mortifera. Quia si quis princeps ordinaret in regno suo illa iudicialia observari, non peccaret, nisi forte hoc modo observarentur, vel observari mandarentur, tanquam habentia vim obligandi ex veteris legis institutione. Talis enim intentio observandi esset mortifera. Et huius differentiae ratio potest accipi ex praemissis. Dictum est enim quod praecepta caeremonialia sunt figuralia primo et per se, tanquam instituta principaliter ad figurandum Christi mysteria ut futura. Et ideo ipsa observatio eorum praeiudicat fidei veritati, secundum quam confitemur illa mysteria iam esse completa. Praecepta autem iudicialia non sunt instituta ad figurandum, sed ad disponendum statum illius populi, qui ordinabatur ad Christum. Et ideo, mutato statu illius populi, Christo iam veniente, iudicialia praecepta obligationem amiserunt, lex enim fuit paedagogus ducens ad Christum, ut dicitur ad Gal. III. Quia tamen huiusmodi iudicialia praecepta non ordinantur ad figurandum, sed ad aliquid fiendum, ipsa eorum observatio absolute non praeiudicat fidei veritati. Sed intentio observandi tanquam ex obligatione legis, praeiudicat veritati fidei, quia per hoc haberetur quod status prioris populi adhuc duraret, et quod Christus nondum venisset.

[38164] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 3 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod iustitia quidem perpetuo est observanda. Sed determinatio eorum quae sunt iusta secundum institutionem humanam vel divinam, oportet quod varietur secundum diversum hominum statum.

[38165] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 3 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod praecepta iudicialia ab hominibus instituta habent perpetuam obligationem, manente illo statu regiminis. Sed si civitas vel gens ad aliud regimen deveniat, oportet leges mutari. Non enim eadem leges conveniunt in democratia, quae est potestas populi, et in oligarchia, quae est potestas divitum; ut patet per philosophum, in sua politica. Et ideo etiam, mutato statu illius populi, oportuit praecepta iudicialia mutari.

[38166] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 3 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod illa praecepta iudicialia disponebant populum ad iustitiam et aequitatem secundum quod conveniebat illi statui. Sed post Christum, statum illius populi oportuit mutari, ut iam in Christo non esset discretio gentilis et Iudaei, sicut antea erat. Et propter hoc oportuit etiam praecepta iudicialia mutari.

Articulus 4

[38167] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 4 arg. 1

Ad quartum sic proceditur. Videtur quod praecepta iudicialia non possint habere aliquam certam divisionem. Praecepta enim iudicialia ordinant homines ad invicem. Sed ea quae inter homines ordinari oportet, in usum eorum venientia, non cadunt sub certa distinctione, cum sint infinita. Ergo praecepta iudicialia non possunt habere certam distinctionem.

[38168] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 4 arg. 2

Praeterea, praecepta iudicialia sunt determinationes moralium. Sed moralia praecepta non videntur habere aliquam distinctionem, nisi secundum quod reducuntur ad praecepta Decalogi. Ergo praecepta iudicialia non habent aliquam certam distinctionem.

[38169] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 4 arg. 3

Praeterea, praecepta caeremonialia quia certam distinctionem habent, eorum distinctio in lege innuitur, dum quaedam vocantur sacrificia, quaedam observantiae. Sed nulla distinctio innuitur in lege praeceptorum iudicialium. Ergo videtur quod non habeant certam distinctionem.

[38170] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 4 s. c.

Sed contra, ubi est ordo, oportet quod sit distinctio. Sed ratio ordinis maxime pertinet ad praecepta iudicialia, per quae populus ille ordinabatur. Ergo maxime debent habere distinctionem certam.

[38171] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 4 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod, cum lex sit quasi quaedam ars humanae vitae instituendae vel ordinandae, sicut in unaquaque arte est certa distinctio regularum artis, ita oportet in qualibet lege esse certam distinctionem praeceptorum, aliter enim ipsa confusio utilitatem legis auferret. Et ideo dicendum est quod praecepta iudicialia veteris legis, per quae homines ad invicem ordinabantur, distinctionem habent secundum distinctionem ordinationis humanae. Quadruplex autem ordo in aliquo populo inveniri potest, unus quidem, principum populi ad subditos; alius autem, subditorum ad invicem; tertius autem, eorum qui sunt de populo ad extraneos; quartus autem, ad domesticos, sicut patris ad filium, uxoris ad virum, et domini ad servum. Et secundum istos quatuor ordines distingui possunt praecepta iudicialia veteris legis. Dantur enim quaedam praecepta de institutione principum et officio eorum, et de reverentia eis exhibenda, et haec est una pars iudicialium praeceptorum. Dantur etiam quaedam praecepta pertinentia ad concives ad invicem, puta circa emptiones et venditiones, et iudicia et poenas. Et haec est secunda pars iudicialium praeceptorum. Dantur etiam quaedam praecepta pertinentia ad extraneos, puta de bellis contra hostes, et de susceptione peregrinorum et advenarum. Et haec est tertia pars iudicialium praeceptorum. Dantur etiam in lege quaedam praecepta pertinentia ad domesticam conversationem, sicut de servis, et uxoribus, et filiis. Et haec est quarta pars iudicialium praeceptorum.

[38172] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 4 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod ea quae pertinent ad ordinationem hominum ad invicem, sunt quidem numero infinita; sed tamen reduci possunt ad aliqua certa, secundum differentiam ordinationis humanae, ut dictum est.

[38173] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 4 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod praecepta Decalogi sunt prima in genere moralium, ut supra dictum est, et ideo convenienter alia praecepta moralia secundum ea distinguuntur. Sed praecepta iudicialia et caeremonialia habent aliam rationem obligationis non quidem ex ratione naturali sed ex sola institutione. Et ideo distinctionis eorum est alia ratio.

[38174] I^a-IIae q. 104 a. 4 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod ex ipsis rebus quae per praecepta iudicialia ordinantur in lege, innuit lex distinctionem iudicialium praeceptorum.

Quaestio 105

Prooemium

[38175] I^a-IIae q. 105 pr.

Deinde considerandum est de ratione iudicialium praeceptorum. Et circa hoc quaeruntur quatuor. Primo, de ratione praeceptorum iudicialium quae pertinent ad principes. Secundo, de his quae pertinent ad convictum hominum ad invicem. Tertio, de his quae pertinent ad extraneos. Quarto, de his quae pertinent ad domesticam conversationem.

Articulus 1

[38176] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 1 arg. 1

Ad primum sic proceditur. Videtur quod inconvenienter lex vetus de principibus ordinaverit. Quia, ut philosophus dicit, in III Polit., ordinatio populi praecipue dependet ex maximo principatu. Sed in lege non invenitur qualiter debeat institui supremus princeps. Invenitur autem de inferioribus principibus, primo quidem, Exod. XVIII, provide de omni plebe viros sapientes, etc.; et Num. XI, congrega mihi septuaginta viros de senioribus Israel; et Deut. I, date ex vobis viros sapientes et gnaros, et cetera. Ergo insufficienter lex vetus principes populi ordinavit.

[38177] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 1 arg. 2

Praeterea, optimi est optima adducere, ut Plato dicit. Sed optima ordinatio civitatis vel populi cuiuscumque est ut gubernetur per regem, quia huiusmodi regimen maxime repraesentat divinum regimen, quo unus Deus mundum gubernat. A principio igitur lex debuit regem populo instituere; et non permittere hoc eorum arbitrio, sicut permittitur Deut. XVII, cum dixeris, constituam super me regem, eum constitues, et cetera.

[38178] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 1 arg. 3

Praeterea, sicut dicitur Matth. XII, omne regnum in se divisum desolabitur, quod etiam experimento patuit in populo Iudaeorum, in quo divisio regni fuit destructionis causa. Sed lex praecipue debet intendere ea quae pertinent ad communem salutem populi. Ergo debuit in lege prohiberi divisio regni in duos reges. Nec etiam debuit hoc auctoritate divina introduci; sicut legitur introductum auctoritate domini per Ahiam Silonitem prophetam, III Reg. XI.

[38179] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 1 arg. 4

Praeterea, sicut sacerdotes instituuntur ad utilitatem populi in his quae ad Deum pertinent, ut patet Heb. V; ita etiam principes instituuntur ad utilitatem populi in rebus humanis. Sed sacerdotibus et Levitis qui sunt in lege, deputantur aliqua ex quibus vivere debeant, sicut decimae et primitiae, et multa alia huiusmodi. Ergo similiter principibus populi debuerunt aliqua ordinari unde sustentarentur, et praecipue cum inhibita sit eis munerum acceptio, ut patet Exod. XXIII, non accipietis munera, quae excaecant etiam prudentes, et subvertunt verba iustorum.

[38180] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 1 arg. 5

Praeterea, sicut regnum est optimum regimen, ita tyrannis est pessima corruptio regiminis. Sed dominus regi instituendo instituit ius tyrannicum, dicitur enim I Reg. VIII, hoc erit ius regis qui imperaturus est vobis, filios vestros tollet, et cetera. Ergo inconvenienter fuit provisum per legem circa principum ordinationem.

Sed contra est quod populus Israel de pulchritudine ordinationis commendatur, Num. XXIV, quam pulchra tabernacula tua, Iacob; et tentoria tua, Israel. Sed pulchritudo ordinationis populi dependet ex principibus bene institutis. Ergo per legem populus fuit circa principes bene institutus.

Respondeo dicendum quod circa bonam ordinationem principum in aliqua civitate vel gente, duo sunt attendenda. Quorum unum est ut omnes aliquam partem habeant in principatu, per hoc enim conservatur pax populi, et omnes talem ordinationem amant et custodiunt, ut dicitur in II Polit. Aliud est quod attenditur secundum speciem regiminis, vel ordinationis principatum. Cuius cum sint diversae species, ut philosophus tradit, in III Polit., praecipuae tamen sunt regnum, in quo unus principatur secundum virtutem; et aristocratia, idest potestas optimorum, in qua aliqui pauci principantur secundum virtutem. Unde optima ordinatio principum est in aliqua civitate vel regno, in qua unus praeficitur secundum virtutem qui omnibus praesit; et sub ipso sunt aliqui principantes secundum virtutem; et tamen talis principatus ad omnes pertinet, tum quia ex omnibus eligi possunt, tum quia etiam ab omnibus eliguntur. Talis enim est optima politia, bene commixta ex regno, inquantum unus praeest; et aristocratia, inquantum multi principantur secundum virtutem; et ex democratia, idest potestate populi, inquantum ex popularibus possunt eligi principes, et ad populum pertinet electio principum. Et hoc fuit institutum secundum legem divinam. Nam Moyses et eius successores gubernabant populum quasi singulariter omnibus principantes, quod est quaedam species regni. Eligebantur autem septuaginta duo seniores secundum virtutem, dicitur enim Deut. I, tuli de vestris tribubus viros sapientes et nobiles, et constitui eos principes, et hoc erat aristocraticum. Sed democraticum erat quod isti de omni populo eligebantur; dicitur enim Exod. XVIII, provide de omni plebe viros sapientes, etc., et etiam quod populus eos eligebat; unde dicitur Deut. I, date ex vobis viros sapientes, et cetera. Unde patet quod optima fuit ordinatio principum quam lex instituit.

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod populus ille sub speciali cura Dei regebatur, unde dicitur Deut. VII, te elegit dominus Deus tuus ut sis ei populus peculiaris. Et ideo institutionem summi principis dominus sibi reservavit. Et hoc est quod Moyses petivit, Num. XXVII, provideat dominus Deus spirituum omnis carnis, hominem qui sit super multitudinem hanc. Et sic ex Dei ordinatione institutus est Iosue in principatu post Moysen, et de singulis iudicibus qui post Iosue fuerunt, legitur quod Deus suscitavit populo salvatorem, et quod spiritus domini fuit in eis, ut patet Iudic. III. Et ideo etiam electionem regis non commisit dominus populo, sed sibi reservavit; ut patet Deut. XVII, eum constitues regem, quem dominus Deus tuus elegerit.

[38184] I^a-II^ae q. 105 a. 1 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod regnum est optimum regimen populi, si non corrumpatur. Sed propter magnam potestatem quae regi conceditur, de facili regnum degenerat in tyrannidem, nisi sit perfecta virtus eius cui talis potestas conceditur, quia non est nisi virtuosi bene ferre bonas fortunas, ut philosophus dicit, in IV Ethic. Perfecta autem virtus in paucis invenitur, et praecipue Iudaei crudeles erant et ad avaritiam prони, per quae vitia maxime homines in tyrannidem decidunt. Et ideo dominus a principio eis regem non instituit cum plena potestate, sed iudicem et gubernatorem in eorum custodiam. Sed postea regem ad petitionem populi, quasi indignatus, concessit, ut patet per hoc quod dixit ad Samuelem, I Reg. VIII, non te abiecerunt, sed me, ne regnem super eos. Instituit tamen a principio circa regem instituendum, primo quidem, modum eligendi. In quo duo determinavit, ut scilicet in eius electione expectarent iudicium domini; et ut non facerent regem alterius gentis, quia tales reges solent parum affici ad gentem cui praeficiuntur, et per consequens non curare de eis. Secundo, ordinavit circa reges institutos qualiter deberent se habere quantum ad seipsos, ut scilicet non multiplicarent currus et equos, neque uxores, neque etiam immensas divitias; quia ex cupiditate horum principes ad tyrannidem declinant, et iustitiam derelinquunt. Instituit etiam qualiter se deberent habere ad Deum, ut scilicet semper legerent et cogitarent de lege Dei, et semper essent in Dei timore et obedientia. Instituit etiam qualiter se haberent ad subditos suos, ut scilicet non superbe eos contemnerent, aut opprimerent, neque etiam a iustitia declinarent.

Ad tertium dicendum quod divisio regni, et multitudo regum, magis est populo illi data in poenam pro multis dissensionibus eorum, quas maxime contra regnum David iustum moverant, quam ad eorum profectum. Unde dicitur Osee XIII, dabo tibi regem in furore meo; et Osee VIII, ipsi regnaverunt, et non ex me, principes extiterunt, et non cognovi.

Ad quartum dicendum quod sacerdotes per successionem originis sacris deputabantur. Et hoc ideo ut in maiori reverentia haberentur, si non quilibet ex populo posset sacerdos fieri, quorum honor cedebat in reverentiam divini cultus. Et ideo oportuit ut eis specialia quaedam deputarentur, tam in decimis quam in primitiis, quam etiam in oblationibus et sacrificiis, ex quibus viverent. Sed principes, sicut dictum est, assumebantur ex toto populo, et ideo habebant certas possessiones proprias, ex quibus vivere poterant. Et praecipue cum dominus prohiberet etiam in rege ne superabundaret divitiis aut magnifico apparatu, tum quia non erat facile quin ex his in superbiam et tyrannidem erigeretur; tum etiam quia, si principes non erant multum divites, et erat laboriosus principatus et sollicitudine plenus, non multum affectabatur a popularibus, et sic tollebatur seditionis materia.

Ad quintum dicendum quod illud ius non dabatur regi ex institutione divina; sed magis praenuntiatur usurpatio regum, qui sibi ius iniquum constituunt in tyrannidem degenerantes, et subditos depraedantes. Et hoc patet per hoc quod in fine subdit, vosque eritis ei servi, quod proprie pertinet ad tyrannidem, quia tyranni suis subditis principantur ut servis. Unde hoc dicebat Samuel ad deterrendum eos ne regem peterent, sequitur enim, noluit autem audire populus vocem Samuelis. Potest tamen contingere quod etiam bonus rex, absque tyrannide, filios tollat, et constituat tribunos et centuriones, et multa accipiat a subditis, propter commune bonum procurandum.

Ad secundum sic proceditur. Videtur quod inconvenienter fuerint tradita praecepta iudicialia quantum ad popularium convictum. Non enim possunt homines pacifice vivere ad invicem, si unus accipiat ea quae sunt alterius. Sed hoc videtur esse inductum in lege, dicitur enim Deut. XXIII, ingressus vineam proximi tui, comede uvas quantum tibi placuerit. Ergo lex vetus non convenienter providebat hominum paci.

[38189] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 arg. 2

Praeterea, ex hoc maxime multae civitates et regna destruuntur, quod possessiones ad mulieres perveniunt, ut philosophus dicit, in II Polit. Sed hoc fuit inductum in veteri lege, dicitur enim Num. XXVII, homo cum mortuus fuerit absque filio, ad filiam eius transibit hereditas. Ergo non convenienter providit lex saluti populi.

[38190] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 arg. 3

Praeterea, societas hominum maxime per hoc conservatur, quod homines emendo et vendendo sibi invicem res suas commutant quibus indigent, ut dicitur in I Polit. Sed lex vetus abstulit virtutem venditionis, mandavit enim quod possessio vendita reverteretur ad venditorem in quinquagesimo anno iubilaei, ut patet Levit. XXV. Inconvenienter igitur lex populum illum circa hoc instituit.

[38191] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 arg. 4

Praeterea, necessitatibus hominum maxime expedit ut homines sint prompti ad mutuuum concedendum. Quae quidem promptitudo tollitur per hoc quod creditores accepta non reddunt, unde dicitur Eccli. XXIX, multi non causa nequitiae non faenerati sunt, sed fraudari gratis timuerunt. Hoc autem induxit lex. Primo quidem, quia mandavit Deut. XV, cui debetur aliquid ab amico vel proximo ac fratre suo, repetere non poterit, quia annus remissionis est domini; et Exod. XXII dicitur quod si praesente domino animal mutuatum mortuum fuerit, reddere non tenetur. Secundo, quia aufertur ei securitas quae habetur per pignus, dicitur enim Deut. XXIV, cum repetes a proximo tuo rem aliquam quam debet tibi, non ingredieris domum eius ut pignus auferas; et iterum, non pernoctabit apud te pignus, sed statim reddes ei. Ergo insufficienter fuit ordinatum in lege de mutuis.

[38192] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 arg. 5

Praeterea, ex defraudatione depositi maximum periculum imminet, et ideo est maxima cautela adhibenda, unde etiam dicitur II Mach. III, quod sacerdotes invocabant de caelo eum qui de depositis legem posuit, ut his qui deposuerant ea, salva custodiret. Sed in praeceptis veteris legis parva cautela circa deposita adhibetur, dicitur enim Exod. XXII quod in amissione depositi statuitur iuramento eius apud quem fuit depositum. Ergo non fuit circa hoc legis ordinatio conveniens.

[38193] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 arg. 6

Praeterea, sicut aliquis mercenarius locat operas suas, ita etiam aliqui locant domum, vel quaecumque alia huiusmodi. Sed non est necessarium ut statim pretium locatae domus conductor exhibeat. Ergo etiam nimis durum fuit quod praecipitur Levit. XIX, non morabitur opus mercenarii tui apud te usque mane.

[38194] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 arg. 7

Praeterea, cum frequenter immineat iudiciorum necessitas, facilis debet esse accessus ad iudicem. Inconvenienter igitur statuitur lex, Deut. XVII, ut irent ad unum locum expetiturum iudicium de suis dubiis.

[38195] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 arg. 8

Praeterea, possibile est non solum duos, sed etiam tres vel plures concordare ad mentiendum. Inconvenienter igitur dicitur Deut. XIX, in ore duorum vel trium testium stabit omne verbum.

[38196] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 arg. 9

Praeterea, poena debet taxari secundum quantitatem culpae, unde dicitur etiam Deut. XXV, pro mensura peccati erit et plagarum modus. Sed quibusdam aequalibus culpis lex statuit inaequales poenas, dicitur enim Exod. XXII, quod restituet fur quinque boves pro uno bove, et quatuor oves pro una ove. Quaedam etiam non multum gravia peccata gravi poena puniuntur, sicut Num. XV, lapidatus est qui collegerat ligna in sabbato. Filius etiam protervus propter parva delicta, quia scilicet comessionibus vacabat et conviviis, mandatur lapidari, Deut. XXI. Igitur inconvenienter in lege sunt institutae poenae.

[38197] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 arg. 10

Praeterea, sicut Augustinus dicit, XXI de Civ. Dei, octo genera poenarum in legibus esse scribit Tullius, damnum, vincula, verbera, talionem, ignominiam, exilium, mortem, servitutem. Ex quibus aliqua sunt in lege statuta. Damnum quidem, sicut cum fur condemnabatur ad quintuplum vel quadruplum. Vincula vero, sicut Num. XV, mandatur de quodam quod in carcerem includatur. Verbera vero, sicut Deut. XXV, si eum qui peccavit dignum viderint plagis, prosternent, et coram se facient verberari. Ignominiam etiam inferebat illi qui nolebat accipere uxorem fratris sui defuncti, quae tollebat calceamentum illius, et spuebat in faciem illius. Mortem etiam inferebat, ut patet Levit. XX, qui maledixerit patri suo aut matri, morte moriatur. Poenam etiam talionis lex induxit, dicens Exod. XXI, oculum pro oculo, dentem pro dente. Inconueniens igitur videtur quod alias duas poenas, scilicet exilium et servitutem, lex vetus non infligit.

[38198] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 arg. 11

Praeterea, poena non debetur nisi culpae. Sed bruta animalia non possunt habere culpam. Ergo inconvenienter eis infligitur poena, Exod. XXI, bos lapidibus obruetur qui occiderit virum aut mulierem. Et Levit. XX dicitur, mulier quae succubuerit cuilibet iumento, simul interficiatur cum eo. Sic igitur videtur quod inconvenienter ea quae pertinent ad convictum hominum ad invicem, fuerint in lege veteri ordinata.

[38199] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 arg. 12

Praeterea, dominus mandavit Exod. XXI, quod homicidium morte hominis puniretur. Sed mors bruti animalis multo minus reputatur quam occisio hominis. Ergo non potest sufficienter recompensari poena homicidii per occisionem bruti animalis. Inconuenienter igitur mandatur Deut. XXI quod quando inventum fuerit cadaver occisi hominis, et ignorabitur caedis reus, seniores propinquioris civitatis tollant vitulam de armento quae non traxit iugum nec terram scidit vomere, et ducent eam ad vallem asperam atque saxosam quae numquam arata est nec sementa recepit, et caedent in ea cervices vitulae.

[38200] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 s. c.

Sed contra est quod pro speciali beneficio commemoratur in Psalmo CXLVII, non fecit taliter omni nationi, et iudicia sua non manifestavit eis.

[38201] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod, sicut Augustinus in II de Civ. Dei introducit a Tullio dictum, populus est coetus multitudinis iuris consensu et utilitatis communione sociatus. Unde ad rationem populi pertinet ut communicatio hominum ad invicem iustis praeceptis legis ordinetur. Est autem duplex communicatio hominum ad invicem, una quidem quae fit auctoritate principum; alia autem fit propria voluntate privatarum personarum. Et quia voluntate uniuscuiusque disponi potest quod eius subditur potestati, ideo auctoritate principum, quibus subiecti sunt homines, oportet quod iudicia inter homines exerçantur, et poenae malefactoribus inferantur. Potestati vero privatarum personarum subduntur res possessae, et ideo propria voluntate in his possunt sibi invicem communicare, puta emendo, vendendo, donando, et aliis huiusmodi modis. Circa utramque autem communicationem lex sufficienter ordinavit. Statuit enim iudices, ut patet Deut. XVI, iudices et magistros constitues in omnibus portis eius, ut iudicent populum iusto iudicio. Instituit etiam iustum iudicii ordinem, ut dicitur Deut. I, quod iustum est iudicate, sive civis ille sit sive peregrinus, nulla erit personarum distantia. Sustulit etiam occasionem iniusti iudicii, acceptionem munerum iudicibus prohibendo; ut patet Exod. XXIII, et Deut. XVI. Instituit etiam numerum testium duorum vel trium; ut patet Deut. XVII, et XIX. Instituit etiam certas poenas pro diversis delictis, ut post dicitur. Sed circa res possessas optimum est, sicut dicit philosophus, in II Polit., quod possessiones sint distinctae, et usus sit partim communis, partim autem per voluntatem possessorum communicetur. Et haec tria fuerunt in lege statuta. Primo enim, ipsae possessiones divisae erant in singulos, dicitur enim Num. XXXIII, ego dedi vobis terram in possessionem, quam sorte dividetis vobis. Et quia per possessionum irregularitatem plures civitates destruuntur, ut philosophus dicit, in II Polit.; ideo circa possessiones regulandas triplex remedium lex adhibuit. Unum quidem, ut secundum numerum hominum aequaliter dividerentur, unde dicitur Num. XXXIII, pluribus dabitis latiore, et paucioribus angustiore. Aliud remedium est ut possessiones non in perpetuum alienentur, sed certo tempore ad suos possessores revertantur, ut non confundantur sortes possessionum. Tertium remedium est ad huiusmodi confusionem tollendam, ut proximi succedant morientibus, primo quidem gradu, filius; secundo autem, filia; tertio, fratres; quarto, patru; quinto, quicumque propinqui. Et ad distinctionem sortium conservandam, ulterius lex statuit ut mulieres quae sunt haeredes, nuberent suae tribus hominibus, ut habetur Num. XXXVI. Secundo vero, instituit lex ut quantum ad aliqua usus rerum esset communis. Et primo, quantum ad curam, praeceptum est enim Deut. XXII, non videbis bovem et ovem fratris tui errantem, et *praeteribis, sed reduces fratri tuo; et similiter de aliis. Secundo, quantum ad fructum. Concedebatur enim communiter quantum ad omnes, ut ingressus in vineam amici posset licite comedere, dum tamen extra non auferret. Quantum ad pauperes vero specialiter, ut eis relinquerentur manipuli obliti, et fructus et racemi remanentes, ut habetur Lev. XIX, et Deut. XXIV. Et etiam communicabantur ea quae nascebantur in septimo anno; ut habetur Exod. XXIII, et Lev. XXV. Tertio vero, statuit lex communicationem factam per eos qui sunt domini rerum. Unam pure gratuitam, unde dicitur Deut. XIV, anno tertio separabis aliam decimam, venientque Levites et peregrinus et pupillus et vidua, et comedent et saturabuntur. Aliam vero cum recompensatione utilitatis, sicut per venditionem et emptionem, et locationem et conductionem, et per mutuum, et iterum per depositum, de quibus omnibus inveniuntur ordinationes certae in lege. Unde patet quod lex vetus sufficienter ordinavit convictum illius populi.*

[38202] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod, sicut apostolus dicit, Rom. XIII, qui diligit proximum, legem implevit, quia scilicet omnia praecepta legis, praecipue ordinata ad proximum, ad hunc finem ordinari videntur, ut homines se invicem diligant. Ex dilectione autem procedit quod homines sibi invicem bona sua communicent, quia ut dicitur I Ioan. III, qui viderit fratrem suum necessitatem patientem, et cluserit viscera sua ab eo, quomodo caritas Dei manet in illo? Et ideo intendebat lex homines assuefacere ut facile sibi invicem sua communicarent, sicut et apostolus, I ad Tim. VI, divitibus mandat facile tribuere et communicare. Non autem facile communicativus est qui non sustinet quod proximus aliquid modicum de suo accipiat, absque magno sui detrimento. Et ideo lex ordinavit ut liceret intrantem in vineam proximi, racemos ibi comedere, non autem extra deferre, ne ex hoc daretur occasio gravis damni inferendi, ex quo pax perturbaretur. Quae inter disciplinatos non perturbatur ex modicorum acceptione, sed magis amicitia confirmatur, et assuefiunt homines ad facile communicandum.

[38203] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod lex non statuit quod mulieres succederent in bonis paternis, nisi in defectu filiorum masculorum. Tunc autem necessarium erat ut successio mulieribus concederetur in consolationem patris, cui grave fuisset si eius hereditas omnino ad extraneos transiret. Adhibuit tamen circa hoc lex cautelam debitam, praecipiens ut mulieres succedentes in haereditate paterna, nuberent suae tribus hominibus, ad hoc quod sortes tribuum non confunderentur, ut habetur Num. ult.

[38204] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod, sicut philosophus dicit, in II Polit., regulatio possessionum multum confert ad conservationem civitatis vel gentis. Unde, sicut ipse dicit, apud quasdam gentilium civitates statutum fuit ut nullus possessionem vendere posset, nisi pro manifesto detrimento. Si enim passim possessiones vendantur, potest contingere quod omnes possessiones ad paucos deveniant, et ita necesse erit civitatem vel regionem habitatoribus evacuari. Et ideo lex vetus, ad huiusmodi periculum amovendum, sic ordinavit quod et necessitatibus hominum subveniretur, concedens possessionum venditionem usque ad certum tempus; et tamen periculum removet, praecipiens ut certo tempore possessio vendita ad vendentem rediret. Et hoc instituit ut sortes non confunderentur, sed semper remaneret eadem distinctio determinata in tribubus. Quia vero domus urbanae non erant sorte distinctae, ideo concessit quod in perpetuum vendi possent, sicut et mobilia bona. Non enim erat statutus numerus domorum civitatis, sicut erat certa mensura possessionis, ad quam non addebatur, poterat autem aliquid addi ad numerum domorum civitatis. Domus vero quae non erant in urbe, sed in villa muros non habente, in perpetuum vendi non poterant, quia huiusmodi domus non construuntur nisi ad cultum et ad custodiam possessionum; et ideo lex congrue statuit idem ius circa utrumque.

[38205] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 ad 4

Ad quartum dicendum quod, sicut dictum est, intentio legis erat assuefacere homines suis praeceptis ad hoc quod sibi invicem de facili in necessitatibus subvenirent, quia hoc maxime est amicitiae fomentum. Et hanc quidem facilitatem subveniendi non solum statuit in his quae gratis et absolute donantur, sed etiam in his quae mutuo conceduntur, quia huiusmodi subventio frequentior est, et pluribus necessaria. Huiusmodi autem subventionis facilitatem multipliciter instituit. Primo quidem, ut faciles se praeberent ad mutuuum exhibendum, nec ab hoc retraherentur anno remissionis appropinquante, ut habetur Deut. XV. Secundo, ne eum cui mutuuum concederent, gravarent vel usuris, vel etiam aliqua pignora omnino vitae necessaria accipiendo, et si accepta fuerint, quod statim restituerentur. Dicitur enim Deut. XXIII, non faeneraberis fratri tuo ad usuram; et XXIV, non accipies loco pignoris inferiorem et superiorem molam, quia animam suam apposuit tibi; et Exod. XXII dicitur, si pignus a proximo tuo acceperis vestimentum, ante solis occasum reddes ei. Tertio, ut non importune exigerent. Unde dicitur Exod. XXII, si pecuniam mutuam dederis populo meo pauperi qui habitat tecum, non urgebis eum quasi exactor. Et propter hoc etiam mandatur Deut. XXIV, cum repetes a proximo tuo rem aliquam quam debet tibi, non ingredieris in domum eius ut pignus auferas; sed stabis foris, et ille tibi proferet quod habuerit, tum quia domus est tutissimum uniuscuiusque receptaculum, unde molestum homini est ut in domo sua invadatur; tum etiam quia non concedit creditori ut accipiat pignus quod voluerit, sed magis debitori ut det quo minus indiguerit. Quarto, instituit quod in septimo anno debita penitus remitterentur. Probabile enim erat ut illi qui commode reddere possent, ante septimum annum redderent, et gratis mutuantem non defraudarent. Si autem omnino impotentes essent, eadem ratione eis erat debitum remittendum ex dilectione, qua etiam erat eis de novo dandum propter indigentiam. Circa animalia vero mutuata haec lex statuit, ut propter negligentiam eius cui mutuata sunt, si in ipsius absentia moriantur vel debilitentur, reddere ea compellatur. Si vero eo praesente et diligenter custodiente, mortua fuerint vel debilitata, non cogebatur restituere, et maxime si erant mercede conducta, quia ita etiam potuissent mori et debilitari apud mutuantem; et ita, si conservationem animalis consequeretur, iam aliquod lucrum reportaret ex mutuo, et non esset gratuitum mutuum. Et maxime hoc observandum erat quando animalia erant mercede conducta, quia tunc habebat certum pretium pro usu animalium; unde nihil accrescere debebat per restitutionem animalium, nisi propter negligentiam custodientis. Si autem non essent mercede conducta, potuisset habere aliquam aequitatem ut saltem tantum restitueret quantum usus animalis mortui vel debilitati conduci potuisset.

[38206] I^a-II^{ae} q. 105 a. 2 ad 5

Ad quintum dicendum quod haec differentia est inter mutuum et depositum, quia mutuum traditur in utilitatem eius cui traditur; sed depositum traditur in utilitatem deponentis. Et ideo magis arctabatur aliquis in aliquibus casibus ad restituendum mutuum, quam ad restituendum depositum. Depositum enim perdi poterat dupliciter. Uno modo, ex causa inevitabili, vel naturali, puta si esset mortuum vel debilitatum animal depositum; vel extrinseca, puta si esset captum ab hostibus, vel si esset comestum a bestia; in quo tamen casu tenebatur deferre ad dominum animalis id quod de animali occiso supererat. In aliis autem praedictis casibus nihil reddere tenebatur, sed solum, ad expurgandam suspicionem fraudis, tenebatur iuramentum praestare. Alio modo poterat perdi ex causa evitabili, puta per furtum. Et tunc, propter negligentiam custodis, reddere tenebatur. Sed, sicut dictum est, ille qui mutuo accipiebat animal, tenebatur reddere, etiam si debilitatum aut mortuum fuisset in eius absentia. De minori enim negligentia tenebatur quam depositarius, qui non tenebatur nisi de furto.

[38207] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 ad 6

Ad sextum dicendum quod mercenarii qui locant operas suas, pauperes sunt, de laboribus suis victum quaerentes quotidianum, et ideo lex provide ordinavit ut statim eis merces solveretur, ne victus eis deficeret. Sed illi qui locant alias res, divites esse consueverunt, nec ita indigent locationis pretio ad suum victum quotidianum. Et ideo non est eadem ratio in utroque.

[38208] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 ad 7

Ad septimum dicendum quod iudices ad hoc inter homines constituuntur, quod determinent quod ambiguum inter homines circa iustitiam esse potest. Dupliciter autem aliquid potest esse ambiguum. Uno modo, apud simplices. Et ad hoc dubium tollendum, mandatur Deut. XVI, ut iudices et magistri constituerentur per singulas tribus, ut iudicarent populum iusto iudicio. Alio modo contingit aliquid esse dubium etiam apud peritos. Et ideo ad hoc dubium tollendum, constituit lex ut omnes recurrerent ad locum principalem a Deo electum, in quo et summus sacerdos esset, qui determinaret dubia circa caeremonias divini cultus; et summus iudex populi, qui determinaret quae pertinent ad iudicia hominum, sicut etiam nunc per appellationem, vel per consultationem, causae ab inferioribus iudicibus ad superiores deferuntur. Unde dicitur Deut. XVII, si difficile et ambiguum apud te iudicium perspexeris, et iudicium intra portas tuas videris verba variari; ascende ad locum quem elegerit dominus, veniesque ad sacerdotes levitici generis, et ad iudicem qui fuerit illo tempore. Huiusmodi autem ambigua iudicia non frequenter emergebant. Unde ex hoc populus non gravabatur.

[38209] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 ad 8

Ad octavum dicendum quod in negotiis humanis non potest haberi probatio demonstrativa et infallibilis, sed sufficit aliqua coniecturalis probabilitas, secundum quam rhetor persuadet. Et ideo, licet sit possibile duos aut tres testes in mendacium convenire, non tamen est facile nec probabile quod conveniant; et ideo accipitur eorum testimonium tanquam verum; et praecipue si in suo testimonio non vacillent, vel alias suspecti non fuerint. Et ad hoc etiam quod non de facili a veritate testes declinent, instituit lex ut testes diligentissime examinarentur, et graviter punirentur qui invenirentur mendaces, ut habetur Deut. XIX. Fuit tamen aliqua ratio huiusmodi numeri determinandi, ad significandam infallibilem veritatem personarum divinarum, quae quandoque numerantur duae, quia spiritus sanctus est nexus duorum, quandoque exprimuntur tres; ut Augustinus dicit, super illud Ioan. VIII, in lege vestra scriptum est quia duorum hominum testimonium verum est.

[38210] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 ad 9

Ad nonum dicendum quod non solum propter gravitatem culpae, sed etiam propter alias causas gravis poena infligitur. Primo quidem, propter quantitatem peccati, quia maiori peccato, ceteris paribus, gravior poena debetur. Secundo, propter peccati consuetudinem, quia a peccatis consuetis non faciliter homines abstrahuntur nisi per graves poenas. Tertio, propter multam concupiscentiam vel delectationem in peccato, ab his enim non de facili homines abstrahuntur nisi per graves poenas. Quarto, propter facilitatem committendi peccatum, et latendi in ipso, huiusmodi enim peccata, quando manifestantur, sunt magis punienda, ad terrorem aliorum. Circa ipsam etiam quantitatem peccati quadruplex gradus est attendendus, etiam circa unum et idem factum. Quorum primus est quando involuntarius peccatum committit. Tunc enim, si omnino est involuntarius, totaliter excusatur a poena, dicitur enim Deut. XXII, quod puella quae opprimitur in agro, non est rea mortis, quia clamavit, et nullus affuit qui liberaret eam. Si vero aliquo modo fuerit voluntarius, sed tamen ex infirmitate peccat, puta cum quis peccat ex passione, minuitur peccatum, et poena, secundum veritatem iudicii, diminui debet; nisi forte, propter communem utilitatem, poena aggravetur, ad abstrahendum homines ab huiusmodi peccatis, sicut dictum est. Secundus gradus est quando quis per ignorantiam peccavit. Et tunc aliquo modo reus reputabatur, propter negligentiam addiscendi; sed tamen non puniebatur per iudices, sed expiabat peccatum suum per sacrificia. Unde dicitur Levit. IV, anima quae peccaverit per ignorantiam, et cetera. Sed hoc intelligendum est de ignorantia facti, non autem de ignorantia praecepti divini, quod omnes scire tenebantur. Tertius gradus est quando aliquis ex superbia peccabat, idest ex certa electione vel ex certa malitia. Et tunc puniebatur secundum quantitatem delicti. Quartus autem gradus est quando peccabat per proterviam et pertinaciam. Et tunc, quasi rebellis et destructor ordinationis legis, omnino occidendus erat. Secundum hoc, dicendum est quod in poena furti considerabatur secundum legem id quod frequenter accidere poterat. Et ideo pro furto aliarum rerum, quae de facili custodiri possunt a furibus, non reddebat fur nisi duplum. Oves autem non de facili possunt custodiri a furto, quia pascuntur in agris, et ideo frequentius contingebat quod oves furto subtraherentur. Unde lex maiorem poenam apposuit, ut scilicet quatuor oves pro una ove redderentur. Adhuc autem boves difficilius custodiuntur, quia habentur in agris, et non ita pascuntur gregatim sicut oves. Et ideo adhuc hic maiorem poenam apposuit, ut scilicet quinque boves pro uno bove redderentur. Et hoc dico, nisi forte idem animal inventum fuerit vivens apud eum, quia tunc solum duplum restituebat, sicut et in ceteris furtis; poterat enim haberi praesumptio quod cogitaret restituere, ex quo vivum servasset. Vel potest dici, secundum Glossam, quod bos habet quinque utilitates, quia immolatur, arat, pascit carnibus, lactat, et corium etiam diversis usibus ministrat, et ideo pro uno bove quinque boves reddebantur. Ovis autem habet quatuor utilitates, quia immolatur, pascit, lac dat, et lanam ministrat. Filius autem contumax, non quia comedebat et bibebat, occidebatur, sed propter contumaciam et rebellionem, quae semper morte puniebatur, ut dictum est. Ille vero qui colligebat ligna in sabbato, lapidatus fuit tanquam legis violator, quae sabbatum observari praecipiebat in commemorationem fidei novitatis mundi, sicut supra dictum est. Unde occisus fuit tanquam infidelis.

[38211] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 ad 10

Ad decimum dicendum quod lex vetus poenam mortis inflixit in gravioribus criminibus, scilicet in his quae contra Deum peccantur, et in homicidio, et in furto hominum, et in irreverentia ad parentes, et in adulterio, et in incestibus. In furto autem aliarum rerum adhibuit poenam damni. In percussuris autem et mutilationibus induxit poenam talionis; et similiter in peccato falsi testimonii. In aliis autem minoribus culpis induxit poenam flagellationis vel ignominiae. Poenam autem servitutis induxit in duobus casibus. In uno quidem, quando, septimo anno remissionis, ille qui erat servus, nolebat beneficio legis uti ut liber exiret. Unde pro poena ei infligebatur ut in perpetuum servus remaneret. Secundo, infligebatur furi, quando non habebat quod posset restituere, sicut habetur Exod. XXII. Poenam autem exilii universaliter lex non statuit. Quia in solo populo illo Deus colebatur, omnibus aliis populis per idololatriam corruptis, unde si quis a populo illo universaliter exclusus esset, daretur ei occasio idololatriae. Et ideo I Reg. XXVI dicitur quod David dixit ad Saul, maledicti sunt qui eiecerunt me hodie, ut non habitem in hereditate domini, dicentes, vade, servi diis alienis. Erat tamen aliquod particulare exilium. Dicitur enim Deut. XIX quod qui percusserit proximum suum nesciens, et qui nullum contra ipsum habuisse odium comprobatur, ad unam urbium refugii confugiebat, et ibi manebat usque ad mortem summi sacerdotis. Tunc enim licebat ei redire ad domum suam, quia in universali damno populi consueverunt particulares irae sedari, et ita proximi defuncti non sic proni erant ad eius occisionem.

[38212] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 ad 11

Ad undecimum dicendum quod animalia bruta mandabantur occidi, non propter aliquam ipsorum culpam; sed in poenam dominorum, qui talia animalia non custodierant ab huiusmodi peccatis. Et ideo magis puniebatur dominus si bos cornupeta fuerat ab heri et nudius tertius, in quo casu poterat occurri periculo; quam si subito cornupeta efficeretur. Vel occidebantur animalia in detestationem peccati; et ne ex eorum aspectu aliquis horror hominibus incuteretur.

[38213] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 2 ad 12

Ad duodecimum dicendum quod ratio litteralis illius mandati fuit, ut Rabbi Moyses dicit, quia frequenter interfector est de civitate propinquiore. Unde occisio vitulae fiebat ad explorandum homicidium occultum. Quod quidem fiebat per tria. Quorum unum est quod seniores civitatis iurabant nihil se praetermisisse in custodia viarum. Aliud est quia ille cuius erat vitula damnificabatur in occisione animalis, et si prius manifestaretur homicidium, animal non occideretur. Tertium est quia locus in quo occidebatur vitula, remanebat incultus. Et ideo, ad evitandum utrumque damnum, homines civitatis de facili manifestarent homicidam, si scirent, et raro poterat esse quin aliqua verba vel iudicia super hoc facta essent. Vel hoc fiebat ad terrorem, in detestationem homicidii. Per occisionem enim vitulae, quae est animal utile et fortitudine plenum, praecipue antequam laboret sub iugo, significabatur quod quicumque homicidium fecisset, quamvis esset utilis et fortis, occidendus erat; et morte crudeli, quod cervicis concisio significabat; et quod tanquam vilis et abiectus a consortio hominum excludendus erat, quod significabatur per hoc quod vitula occisa in loco aspero et inculto relinquebatur, in putredinem convertenda. Mystice autem per vitulam de armento significatur caro Christi; quae non traxit iugum, quia non fecit peccatum; nec terram scidit vomere, idest seditionis maculam non admisit. Per hoc autem quod in valle inculta occidebatur, significabatur despecta mors Christi; per quam purgantur omnia peccata, et Diabolus esse homicidii auctor ostenditur.

Articulus 3

[38214] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 3 arg. 1

Ad tertium sic proceditur. Videtur quod iudicialia praecepta non sint convenienter tradita quantum ad extraneos. Dicit enim Petrus, Act. X, in veritate comperi quoniam non est acceptor personarum Deus; sed in omni gente qui timet Deum et operatur iustitiam, acceptus est illi. Sed illi qui sunt Deo accepti, non sunt ab Ecclesia Dei excludendi.

Inconvenienter igitur mandatur Deut. XXIII, quod Ammonites et Moabites, etiam post decimam generationem, non intrabunt Ecclesiam domini in aeternum; e contrario autem ibidem praecipitur de quibusdam gentibus, non abominaberis Idumaeum, quia frater tuus est; nec Aegyptium, quia advena fuisti in terra eius.

[38215] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 3 arg. 2

Praeterea, ea quae non sunt in potestate nostra, non merentur aliquam poenam. Sed quod homo sit eunuchus, vel ex scorto natus, non est in potestate eius. Ergo inconvenienter mandatur Deut. XXIII, quod eunuchus, et ex scorto natus, non ingrediatur Ecclesiam domini.

[38216] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 3 arg. 3

Praeterea, lex vetus misericorditer mandavit ut advenae non affligantur, dicitur enim Exod. XXII, advenam non contristabis, neque affliges eum, advenae enim et ipsi fuistis in terra Aegypti; et XXIII, peregrino molestus non eris, scitis enim advenarum animas, quia et ipsi peregrini fuistis in terra Aegypti. Sed ad afflictionem alicuius pertinet quod usuris opprimatur. Inconvenienter igitur lex permisit, Deut. XXIII, ut alienis ad usuram pecuniam mutuarent.

[38217] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 3 arg. 4

Praeterea, multo magis appropinquant nobis homines quam arbores. Sed his quae sunt nobis magis propinqua, magis debemus affectum et effectum dilectionis impendere; secundum illud Eccli. XIII, omne animal diligit simile sibi, sic et omnis homo proximum sibi. Inconvenienter igitur dominus, Deut. XX, mandavit quod de civitatibus hostium captis omnes interficerent, et tamen arbores fructiferas non succiderent.

[38218] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 3 arg. 5

Praeterea, bonum commune secundum virtutem est bono privato praeferendum ab unoquoque. Sed in bello quod committitur contra hostes, quaeritur bonum commune. Inconvenienter igitur mandatur Deut. XX, quod, imminente proelio, aliqui domum remittantur, puta qui aedificavit domum novam, qui plantavit vineam, vel qui despondit uxorem.

[38219] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 3 arg. 6

Praeterea, ex culpa non debet quis commodum reportare. Sed quod homo sit formidolosus et corde pavidus, culpabile est, contrariatur enim virtuti fortitudinis. Inconvenienter igitur a labore proelii excusabantur formidolosi et pavidum cor habentes.

[38220] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 3 s. c.

Sed contra est quod sapientia divina dicit, Prov. VIII, recti sunt omnes sermones mei, non est in eis pravum quid neque perversum.

[38221] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 3 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod cum extraneis potest esse hominum conversatio dupliciter, uno modo, pacifice; alio modo, hostiliter. Et quantum ad utrumque modum ordinandum, lex convenientia praecepta continebat. Tripliciter enim offerebatur Iudaeis occasio ut cum extraneis pacifice communicarent. Primo quidem, quando extranei per terram eorum transitum faciebant quasi peregrini. Alio modo, quando in terram eorum adveniebant ad inhabitandum sicut advenae. Et quantum ad utrumque, lex misericordiae praecepta proposuit, nam Exod. XXII dicitur, advenam non contristabis; et XXIII dicitur, peregrino molestus non eris. Tertio vero, quando aliqui extranei totaliter in eorum consortium et ritum admitti volebant. Et in his quidam ordo attendebatur. Non enim statim recipiebantur quasi cives, sicut etiam apud quosdam gentilium statutum erat ut non reputarentur cives nisi qui ex avo, vel abavo, cives existerent, ut philosophus dicit, in III Polit. Et hoc ideo quia, si statim extranei advenientes reciperentur ad tractandum ea quae sunt populi, possent multa pericula contingere; dum extranei, non habentes adhuc amorem firmatum ad bonum publicum, aliqua contra populum attentarent. Et ideo lex statuit ut de quibusdam gentibus habentibus aliquam affinitatem ad Iudaeos, scilicet de Aegyptiis, apud quos nati fuerant et nutriti, et de Idumaeis, filiis Esau fratris Iacob, in tertia generatione reciperentur in consortium populi; quidam vero, quia hostiliter se ad eos habuerant, sicut Ammonitae et Moabitae, nunquam in consortium populi admitterentur; Amalecitrae autem, qui magis eis fuerant adversati, et cum eis nullum cognationis habebant consortium, quasi hostes perpetui haberentur; dicitur enim Exod. XVII, bellum Dei erit contra Amalec a generatione in generationem. Similiter etiam quantum ad hostilem communicationem cum extraneis, lex convenientia praecepta tradidit. Nam primo quidem, instituit ut bellum iuste iniretur, mandatur enim Deut. XX, quod quando accederent ad expugnandum civitatem, offerrent ei primum pacem. Secundo, instituit ut fortiter bellum susceptum exequerentur, habentes de Deo fiduciam. Et ad hoc melius observandum, instituit quod, imminente proelio, sacerdos eos confortaret, promittendo auxilium Dei. Tertio, mandavit ut impedimenta proelii removerentur, remittendo quosdam ad domum, qui possent impedimenta praestare. Quarto, instituit ut victoria moderate uterentur, parcendo mulieribus et parvulis, et etiam ligna fructifera regionis non incidendo.

[38222] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 3 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod homines nullius gentis exclusit lex a cultu Dei et ab his quae pertinent ad animae salutem, dicitur enim Exod. XII, si quis peregrinorum in vestram voluerit transire coloniam, et facere phase domini; circumcidetur prius omne masculinum eius, et tunc rite celebrabit, eritque simul sicut indigena terrae. Sed in temporalibus, quantum ad ea quae pertinebant ad communitatem populi, non statim quilibet admittebatur, ratione supra dicta, sed quidam in tertia generatione, scilicet Aegyptii et Idumaei; alii vero perpetuo excludebantur, in detestationem culpae praeteritae, sicut Moabitae et Ammonitae et Amalecitae. Sicut enim punitur unus homo propter peccatum quod commisit, ut alii videntes timeant et peccare desistant; ita etiam propter aliquod peccatum gens vel civitas potest puniri, ut alii a simili peccato abstineant. Poterat tamen dispensative aliquis in collegium populi admitti propter aliquem virtutis actum, sicut Iudith XIV dicitur quod Achior, dux filiorum Ammon, appositus est ad populum Israel, et omnis successio generis eius. Et similiter Ruth Moabitis, quae mulier virtutis erat. Licet possit dici quod illa prohibitio extendebatur ad viros, non ad mulieres, quibus non competit simpliciter esse cives.

[38223] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 3 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod, sicut philosophus dicit, in III Polit., dupliciter aliquis dicitur esse civis, uno modo, simpliciter; et alio modo, secundum quid. Simpliciter quidem civis est qui potest agere ea quae sunt civium, puta dare consilium vel iudicium in populo. Secundum quid autem civis dici potest quicumque civitatem inhabitat, etiam viles personae et pueri et senes, qui non sunt idonei ad hoc quod habeant potestatem in his quae pertinent ad commune. Ideo ergo spurii, propter vilitatem originis, excludebantur ab Ecclesia, idest a collegio populi, usque ad decimam generationem. Et similiter eunuchi, quibus non poterat competere honor qui patribus debebatur, et praecipue in populo Iudaeorum, in quo Dei cultus conservabatur per carnis generationem, nam etiam apud gentiles, qui multos filios genuerant, aliquo insigni honore donabantur, sicut philosophus dicit, in II Polit. Tamen quantum ad ea quae ad gratiam Dei pertinent, eunuchi ab aliis non separabantur, sicut nec advenae, ut dictum est, dicitur enim Isaiae LVI, non dicat filius advenae qui adhaeret domino, dicens, separatione dividet me dominus a populo suo. Et non dicat eunuchus, ecce ego lignum aridum.

[38224] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 3 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod accipere usuras ab alienis non erat secundum intentionem legis, sed ex quadam permissione, propter pronitatem Iudaeorum ad avaritiam; et ut magis pacifice se haberent ad extraneos, a quibus lucrabantur.

[38225] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 3 ad 4

Ad quartum dicendum quod circa civitates hostium quaedam distinctio adhibebatur. Quaedam enim erant remotae, non de numero illarum urbium quae eis erant repromissae, et in talibus urbibus expugnatis occidebantur masculi, qui pugnaverant contra populum Dei; mulieribus autem et infantibus parcebatur. Sed in civitatibus vicinis, quae erant eis repromissae omnes mandabantur interfici, propter iniquitates eorum priores, ad quas puniendas dominus populum Israel quasi divinae iustitiae executorem mittebat, dicitur enim Deut. IX, quia illae egerunt impie, introeunte te deletae sunt. Ligna autem fructifera mandabantur reservari propter utilitatem ipsius populi, cuius ditioni civitas et eius territorium erat subiiciendum.

[38226] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 3 ad 5

Ad quintum dicendum quod novus aedificator domus, aut plantator vineae, vel desponsator uxoris, excludebatur a proelio propter duo. Primo quidem, quia ea quae homo de novo habet, vel statim paratus est ad habendum, magis solet amare, et per consequens eorum amissionem timere. Unde probabile erat quod ex tali amore magis mortem timerent, et sic minus fortes essent ad pugnandum. Secundo quia, sicut philosophus dicit, in II Physic., infortunium videtur quando aliquis appropinquat ad aliquod bonum habendum, si postea impediatur ab illo. Et ideo ne propinqui remanentes magis contristarentur de morte talium, qui bonis sibi paratis potiti non fuerunt; et etiam populus, considerans hoc, horreret; huiusmodi homines a mortis periculo sunt sequestrati per subtractionem a proelio.

[38227] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 3 ad 6

Ad sextum dicendum quod timidi remittebantur ad domum, non ut ipsi ex hoc commodum consequerentur; sed ne populus ex eorum praesentia incommodum consequeretur, dum per eorum timorem et fugam etiam alii ad timendum et fugiendum provocarentur.

Articulus 4

[38228] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 4 arg. 1

Ad quartum sic proceditur. Videtur quod inconvenienter lex vetus praecepta ediderit circa personas domesticas. Servus enim id quod est, domini est, ut philosophus dicit, in I Polit. Sed id quod est alicuius, perpetuo eius esse debet. Ergo inconvenienter lex mandavit Exod. XXI, quod servi septimo anno liberi abscederent.

[38229] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 4 arg. 2

Praeterea, sicut animal aliquod, ut asinus aut bos, est possessio domini, ita etiam servus. Sed de animalibus praecipitur Deut. XXII, quod restituantur dominis suis, si errare inveniantur. Inconvenienter ergo mandatur Deut. XXIII, non tradas servum domino suo, qui ad te confugerit.

[38230] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 4 arg. 3

Praeterea, lex divina debet magis ad misericordiam provocare quam etiam lex humana. Sed secundum leges humanas graviter puniuntur qui nimis aspere affligunt servos aut ancillas. Asperrima autem videtur esse afflictio ex qua sequitur mors. Inconvenienter igitur statuitur Exod. XXI, quod qui percusserit servum suum vel ancillam virga, si uno die supervixerit, non subiacebit poenae, quia pecunia illius est.

[38231] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 4 arg. 4

Praeterea, alius est principatus domini ad servum, et patris ad filium, ut dicitur in I et III Polit. Sed hoc ad principatum domini ad servum pertinet, ut aliquis servum vel ancillam vendere possit. Inconvenienter igitur lex permisit quod aliquis venderet filiam suam in famulam vel ancillam.

[38232] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 4 arg. 5

Praeterea, pater habet sui filii potestatem. Sed eius est punire excessus, qui habet potestatem super peccantem. Inconvenienter igitur mandatur Deut. XXI, quod pater ducat filium ad seniores civitatis puniendum.

[38233] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 4 arg. 6

Praeterea, dominus prohibuit, Deut. VII, ut cum alienigenis non sociarent coniugia; et coniuncta etiam separarentur, ut patet I Esdrae X. Inconvenienter igitur Deut. XXI conceditur eis ut captivas alienigenarum ducere possint uxores.

[38234] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 4 arg. 7

Praeterea, dominus in uxoribus ducendis quosdam consanguinitatis et affinitatis gradus praecepit esse vitandos, ut patet Lev. XVIII.

Inconvenienter igitur mandatur Deut. XXV, quod si aliquis esset mortuus absque liberis, uxorem ipsius frater eius acciperet.

[38235] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 4 arg. 8

Praeterea, inter virum et uxorem, sicut est maxima familiaritas, ita debet esse firmissima fides. Sed hoc non potest esse, si matrimonium dissolubile fuerit. Inconvenienter igitur dominus permisit, Deut. XXIV, quod aliquis posset uxorem dimittere, scripto libello repudii; et quod etiam ulterius eam recuperare non posset.

[38236] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 4 arg. 9

Praeterea, sicut uxor potest frangere fidem marito, ita etiam servus domino, et filius patri. Sed ad investigandam iniuriam servi in dominum, vel filii in patrem, non est institutum in lege aliquod sacrificium.

Superflue igitur videtur institui sacrificium zelotypiae ad investigandum uxoris adulterium, Num. V. Sic igitur inconvenienter videntur esse tradita in lege praecepta iudicialia circa personas domesticas.

[38237] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 4 s. c.

Sed contra est quod dicitur in Psalmo XVIII, iudicia domini vera, iustificata in semetipsa.

[38238] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 4 co.

Respondeo dicendum quod communio domesticarum personarum ad invicem, ut philosophus dicit, in I Polit., est secundum quotidianos actus qui ordinantur ad necessitatem vitae. Vita autem hominis conservatur dupliciter. Uno modo, quantum ad individuum, prout scilicet homo idem numero vivit, et ad talem vitae conservationem opitulantur homini exteriora bona, ex quibus homo habet victum et vestitum et alia huiusmodi necessaria vitae; in quibus administrandis indiget homo servis. Alio modo conservatur vita hominis secundum speciem per generationem, ad quam indiget homo uxore, ut ex ea generet filium. Sic igitur in domestica communione sunt tres combinationes, scilicet domini ad servum, viri ad uxorem, patris ad filium. Et quantum ad omnia ista lex vetus convenientia praecepta tradidit. Nam quantum ad servos, instituit ut modeste tractarentur et quantum ad labores, ne scilicet immoderatis laboribus affligerentur, unde Deut. V, dominus mandavit ut in die sabbati requiesceret servus et ancilla tua sicut et tu, et iterum quantum ad poenas infligendas, imposuit enim poenam mutilatoribus servorum ut dimitterent eos liberos, sicut habetur Exod. XXI. Et simile etiam statuit in ancilla quam in uxorem aliquis duxerit. Statuit etiam specialiter circa servos qui erant ex populo, ut septimo anno liberi egrederentur cum omnibus quae apportaverant, etiam vestimentis, ut habetur Exod. XXI. Mandatur etiam insuper Deut. XV, ut ei detur viaticum. Circa uxores vero, statuitur in lege quantum ad uxores ducendas. Ut scilicet ducant uxores suae tribus, sicut habetur Num. ult., et hoc ideo, ne sortes tribuum confundantur. Et quod aliquis in uxorem ducat uxorem fratris defuncti sine liberis, ut habetur Deut. XXV, et hoc ideo, ut ille qui non potuit habere successores secundum carnis originem, saltem habeat per quandam adoptionem, et sic non totaliter memoria defuncti deleretur. Prohibuit etiam quasdam personas ne in coniugium ducerentur, scilicet alienigenas, propter periculum seductionis; et propinquas, propter reverentiam naturalem quae eis debetur. Statuit etiam qualiter uxores iam ductae tractari deberent. Ut scilicet non leviter infamarentur, unde mandatur puniri ille qui falso crimen imponit uxori, ut habetur Deut. XXII. Et quod etiam propter uxoris odium filius detrimentum non pateretur, ut habetur Deut. XXI. Et etiam quod, propter odium uxorem non affligeret, sed potius, scripto libello, eam dimitteret, ut patet Deut. XXIV. Et ut etiam maior dilectio inter coniuges a principio contrahatur, praecipitur quod, cum aliquis nuper uxorem acceperit, nihil ei publicae necessitatis iniungatur, ut libere possit laetari cum uxore sua. Circa filios autem, instituit ut patres eis disciplinam adhiberent, instruendo eos in fide, unde habetur Exod. XII, cum dixerint vobis filii vestri, quae est ista religio? Dicetis eis, victima transitus domini est. Et quod etiam instruerent eos in moribus, unde dicitur Deut. XXI, quod patres dicere debent, monita nostra audire contemnit, commensationibus vacat et luxuriae atque conviviis.

[38239] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 4 ad 1

Ad primum ergo dicendum quod, quia filii Israel erant a domino de servitute liberati, et per hoc divinae servituti addicti, noluit dominus ut in perpetuum servi essent. Unde dicitur Lev. XXV, si paupertate compulsus vendiderit se tibi frater tuus, non eum opprimes servitute famulorum, sed quasi mercenarius et colonus erit. Mei enim sunt servi, et ego eduxi eos de terra Aegypti, non veneant conditione servorum. Et ideo, quia simpliciter servi non erant, sed secundum quid, finito tempore, dimittebantur liberi.

[38240] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 4 ad 2

Ad secundum dicendum quod mandatum illud intelligitur de servo qui a domino quaeritur ad occidendum, vel ad aliquod peccati ministerium.

[38241] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 4 ad 3

Ad tertium dicendum quod circa laesiones servis illatas, lex considerasse videtur utrum sit certa vel incerta. Si enim laesio certa esset, lex poenam adhibuit, pro mutilatione quidem, amissionem servi qui mandabatur libertati donandus; pro morte autem, homicidii poenam, cum servus in manu domini verberantis moreretur. Si vero laesio non esset certa, sed aliquam apparentiam haberet, lex nullam poenam infligebat in proprio servo, puta cum percussus servus non statim moriebatur, sed post aliquos dies. Incertum enim erat utrum ex percussione mortuus esset. Quia si percussisset liberum hominem, ita tamen quod statim non moreretur, sed super baculum suum ambularet, non erat homicidii reus qui percusserat, etiam si postea moreretur. Tenebatur tamen ad impensas solvendas quas percussus in medicos fecerat. Sed hoc in servo proprio locum non habebat, quia quidquid servus habebat, et etiam ipsa persona servi, erat quaedam possessio domini. Et ideo pro causa assignatur quare non subiaceat poenae pecuniariae, quia pecunia illius est.

[38242] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 4 ad 4

Ad quartum dicendum quod, sicut dictum est, nullus Iudaeus poterat possidere Iudaeum quasi simpliciter servum; sed erat servus secundum quid, quasi mercenarius, usque ad tempus. Et per hunc modum permittebat lex quod, paupertate cogente, aliquis filium aut filiam venderet. Et hoc etiam verba ipsius legis ostendunt, dicit enim, si quis vendiderit filiam suam in famulam, non egredietur sicut ancillae exire consueverunt. Per hunc etiam modum non solum filium, sed etiam seipsum aliquis vendere poterat, magis quasi mercenarium quam quasi servum; secundum illud Levit. XXV, si paupertate compulsus vendiderit se tibi frater tuus, non eum opprimes servitute famulorum, sed quasi mercenarius et colonus erit.

[38243] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 4 ad 5

Ad quintum dicendum quod, sicut philosophus dicit, in X Ethic., principatus paternus habet solam admonendi potestatem; non autem habet vim coactivam, per quam rebelles et contumaces comprimi possunt. Et ideo in hoc casu lex mandabat ut filius contumax a principibus civitatis puniretur.

[38244] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 4 ad 6

Ad sextum dicendum quod dominus alienigenas prohibuit in matrimonium duci propter periculum seductionis, ne inducerentur in idololatriam. Et specialiter hoc prohibuit de illis gentibus quae in vicino habitabant, de quibus erat magis probabile quod suos ritus retinerent. Si qua vero idololatriae cultum dimittere vellet, et ad legis cultum se transferre, poterat in matrimonium duci, sicut patet de Ruth, quam duxit Booz in uxorem. Unde ipsa dixerat socrui suae, populus tuus populus meus, Deus tuus Deus meus, ut habetur Ruth I. Et ideo captiva non aliter permittebatur in uxorem duci nisi prius rasa caesarie, et circumcisis unguibus, et deposita veste in qua capta est, et fleret patrem et matrem, per quae significatur idololatriae perpetua abiectio.

[38245] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 4 ad 7

Ad septimum dicendum quod, sicut Chrysostomus dicit, super Matth., quia immitigabile malum mors erat apud Iudaeos, qui omnia pro praesenti vita faciebant, statutum fuit ut defuncto filius nasceretur ex fratre, quod erat quaedam mortis mitigatio. Non autem alius quam frater vel propinquus iubebatur accipere uxorem defuncti, quia non ita crederetur (qui ex tali coniunctione erat nasciturus) esse filius eius qui obiit; et iterum extraneus non ita haberet necessitatem statuere domum eius qui obierat, sicut frater, cui etiam ex cognatione hoc facere iustum erat. Ex quo patet quod frater in accipiendo uxorem fratris sui, persona fratris defuncti fungebatur.

[38246] I^a-IIae q. 105 a. 4 ad 8

Ad octavum dicendum quod lex permisit repudium uxoris, non quia simpliciter iustum esset, sed propter duritiam Iudaeorum; ut dominus dicit, Matth. XIX. Sed de hoc oportet plenius tractari cum de matrimonio agetur.

[38247] I^a-II^ae q. 105 a. 4 ad 9

Ad nonum dicendum quod uxores fidem matrimonii frangunt per adulterium et de facili, propter delectationem; et latenter, quia oculus adulteri observat caliginem, ut dicitur Iob XXIV. Non autem est similis ratio de filio ad patrem, vel de servo ad dominum, quia talis infidelitas non procedit ex concupiscentia delectationis, sed magis ex malitia; nec potest ita latere sicut infidelitas mulieris adulterae.

John of Paris

(Called also Quidort and de Soardis).

Theologian and controversialist; born at Paris, date unknown; died at Bordeaux, 22 September, 1306. Having obtained the degree of Master of Arts with distinction, he joined the Dominican Order, when about twenty years of age, at the convent of St. James in his native city. There he taught philosophy and theology, and obtained the degree of Master of Theology. He was endowed with great ability, was the most subtle dialectician of the age, possessed great literary and linguistic attainments, and was considered one of the best theologians of the university. Some ten of his works on theology, physics, and metaphysics, still exist in manuscript; two others, "De Antichristo" and "De modo existendi corporis Christi in sacramento altaris", appeared in print centuries after his death. A treatise, "Contra corruptorem Sancti Thomae", published in 1516 under the name of Aegidius Romanus, is commonly attributed to John of Paris; it was certainly not written by Aegidius. All these show vast erudition. In his work on the temporal and spiritual power, "De potestate regia et papali", written during the controversy between Boniface VIII and Philip the Fair, he favours the king, and advances some untenable propositions. He holds, for instance, that the pope, for grave crimes, e.g. heresy, may be deposed. The treatise on the Blessed Sacrament, in which he maintained that the Body of Christ is, or might be, present by assumption (I. e. by the body of Christ assuming the bread and wine), and that the doctrine of transubstantiation was not of faith, brought him into trouble. The faculty of the university reported the error to William of Baufet, Bishop of Paris, who forbade him under penalty of excommunication to defend such a doctrine, and deprived him of the offices of lecturing, preaching, and hearing confessions. John appealed to the Holy See, but died soon after, and the case was dropped. In justice to him, it must be said that he advanced these propositions tentatively; for in the beginning of the treatise he writes that he believes in the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, and if it is shown that transubstantiation is of faith, or should it be defined, he will willingly retract.

Marsilius of Padua

Physician and theologian, b. at Padua about 1270; d. about 1342. Contrary to the assertion of several authors, he was only a layman and neither a religious nor the legitimate Archbishop of Milan, though he was a canon of his native city. He served at first in the army of the emperor, and after wards, on the advice of Mussato, began the study of medicine at the University of Padua. To complete his medical studies he proceeded to Paris, and before 25 December, 1312, became rector of the university there, A little later he went to Avignon and obtained from John XXII letters appointing him to one of the canonries of the Church of Padua (Reg. Vat., a. I, p. 2, n. 1714). It was at this time that Louis of Bavaria was about to reopen against the pope the struggles of Philippe le Bel against Boniface VIII. John XXII had just denounced Louis as a supporter of heretics, excommunicated him, and ordered him to cease within three months administering the affairs of the Empire. The emperor was looking for help, and Marsilius, who had now begun the study of theology, joined with Jean de Jandun, canon of Senlis, in offering him his assistance. Together they composed the "Defensor pads" at Paris, and, about 1326, setting out for Germany, presented their work to the emperor. They became his intimate friends, and on several occasions expounded their teaching to him. What were the doctrines of these two Parisian doctors, the very audacity of which at first startled Louis of Bavaria? They recalled the wildest theories of the legists of Philippe le Bel, and Cæsarian theologians like Guillaume Durand and the Dominican John of Paris. The teachings of these last mentioned had been proposed with hesitation, restrictions, and moderation of language which met with no favour before the rigorous logic of Marsilius of Padua. He completely abandoned the olden theocratic conception of society. God, it is true, remained the ultimate source of all power, but it sprang immediately from the people, who had in addition the power to legislate. Law was the expression, not of the will of the prince, as John of Paris taught, but of the will of the people, who, by the voice of the majority, could enact, interpret, modify, suspend, and abrogate it at will. The elected head of the nation was possessed only of a secondary, instrumental, and executive authority. We thus arrive at the theory of the "Contrat Social". In the Church, according to the "Defensor Pacis", the faithful have these two great powers -- the elective and the legislative. They nominate the bishops and select those who are to be ordained. The legislative power is, in the Church, the right to decide the meaning of the old Scriptures; that is the work for a general council, in which the right of discussion and voting belongs to the faithful or their delegates. The ecclesiastical power, the priesthood, comes directly from God and consists essentially in the power to consecrate the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ and remit sins, or, rather, to declare them remitted. It is equal in all priests, each of whom can communicate it by ordination to a subject legitimately proposed by the community. Luther would have recognized his theories in these heretical assertions, and the Gallicans of later times would willingly have subscribed to such revolutionary declarations. The two writers are just as audacious in their exposition of the respective roles of the Empire and the Church in Christian society and of the relations of the two powers.

According to the idea of the State propounded by Marsilius all ecclesiastical power proceeded from the community and from the emperor, its principal representative, there being no limit to the rights of the lay State (cf. Franck, "Journal des savants" March, 1883; Noël Valois, "Histoire littéraire de la France", XXXIII). As to the Church it has no visible head. St. Peter he goes on, received no more power or authority than the other Apostles, and it is uncertain that he ever came to Rome. The pope has only the power of convoking an ecumenical council which is superior to him. His decrees are not binding; he can impose on the people only what the general council has decided and interpreted. The community elects the parish priest and supervises and controls the clergy in the performance of their duties; in a word -- the community or the state is everything, the Church playing an entirely subsidiary part. It cannot legislate, adjudicate, possess goods, sell, or purchase without authorization; it is a perpetual minor. As is clear, we have here the civil constitution of the clergy. Marsilius, moreover shows himself a severe and often unjust censor of the abuses of the Roman curia. Regarding the relations between the emperor and the pope, it is maintained in the "Defensor Pacis", that the sovereign pontiff has no power over any man, except with the permission of the emperor; while the emperor has power over the pope and the general council. The pontiff can act only as the authorized agent of the Roman people; all the goods of the Church belong by right to Cæsar. This is clearly the crudest concept of the pagan empire, an heretical assault on the Church's constitution, and a shame less denial of the rights of the sovereign pontiff to the profit of Cæsar. Dante, the Ghibelline theorist, is surpassed. Arnold of Brescia is equalled. William Occam could never have proposed anything more revolutionary.

The pope was stirred by these heretical doctrines. In the Bull of 3 April, 1327, John XXII reproached Louis of Bavaria with having welcomed duos perditionis filios et maledictionis alumnos (Denifle, "Chart", II, 301). On 9 April he suspended and excommunicated them ("Thesaurus novus anecdotorum", ii, 692). A commission, appointed by the pope at Avignon, condemned on 23 October five of the propositions of Marsilius in the following terms: "1) These reprobates do not hesitate to affirm in what is related of Christ in the Gospel of St. Matthew, to wit that He paid tribute . . . that he did so, not through condescension and liberality, but of necessit -- an assertion that runs counter to the teaching of the Gospel and the words of our Saviour. If one were to believe these men, it would follow that all the property of the Church belongs to the emperor, and that he may take possession of it again as his own; 2) These sons of Belial are so audacious as to affirm that the Blessed Apostle St. Peter received no more authority than the other Apostles, that he was not appointed their chief and further that Christ gave no head to His Church, and appointed no one as His vicar here below -- all which is contrary to the Apostolic and evangelic truth; 3) These children of Belial do not fear to assert that the emperor has the right to appoint, to dethrone, and even to punish the pop -- which is undoubtedly repugnant to all right; 4) These frivolous and lying men say that all priests, be they popes archbishops, or simple priests are possessed of equal authority and equal jurisdiction, by the institution of Christ; that whatever one possesses beyond another is a concession of the Emperor, who can moreover revoke what he has granted,-which assertions are certainly contrary to sacred teaching and savour of heresy; 5) these blasphemers say that the universal Church may not inflict a coactive penalty on any person unless with the emperor's permission." All the pontifical propositions opposed to the declarations of Marsilius of Padua and Jean de Jandun are proved at length from the Scriptures, traditions, and history. These declarations are condemned as being contrary to the Holy Scriptures, dangerous to the Catholic faith, heretical, and erroneous and their authors Marsilius and Jean as being undoubtedly heretics and even heresiarchs (Denzinger, "Enchiridion", 423, ed. Bann wart, 495; Noel Valois, "Histoire littéraire de la France", XXXIII, 592).

As this condemnation was falling on the head of Marsilius, the culprit was coming to Italy in the emperor's train and he saw his revolutionary ideas being put into practice. Louis of Bavaria had himself crowned by Colonna syndic of the Roman people; he dethroned John XXII, replacing him by the Friar Minor, Peter of Corbara, whom he invested with temporal power. At the same time he bestowed the title of imperial vicar on Marsilius and permitted him to persecute the Roman clergy. The pope of Avignon protested twice against the sacrilegious conduct of both. The triumph of Marsilius was, however, of short duration. Abandoned by the emperor in October, 1336, he died towards the end of 1342. Among his principal works, the "Defensor Pacis", which we possess in twenty manuscripts, has been printed frequently and translated into various languages. The "Defensor Minor" a résumé of the preceding work compiled by Marsihus himself, has just been recovered in the Bodleian Library, Oxford (Canon. Miscell., 188). It throws light on certain points in the larger work; but has not yet been published. "De translatione Imperii Romani" has been printed four times in Germany and once in England. "De jurisdictione Imperatoris in causa matrimoniali" has been edited by Preher and by Goldast (Monarchia sancti Rom. Imperii, II, c. 1283). The influence of the "Defensor pacis" was disastrous, and Marsilius may well be reckoned one of the fathers of the Reformation.

Medieval Sourcebook: Bartolo of Sassoferrato Treatise on City Government, c. 1330

© Trans. Steve Lane [slane@tezcat.com]

Based on the text of Diego Quaglioni, "Per una edizione critica e un commento moderno del Tractatus de Regimine civitatis" di Bartolo da Sassoferrato," Pensiero Politico 9 (1976).

TREATISE ON CITY GOVERNMENT ACCORDING TO BARTOLUS OF SASSOFERRATO

1. The first sort of government there was in the city of Rome, after the expulsion of the kings, was "for the people," which Aristotle calls "political."

A democracy is the name of a government of those who are ruling for their own advantage, in opposition to the rich, or to any people.

2. The second kind of government in the city of Rome was by the senators, and this sort of government is good if it tends toward the common good, which Aristotle calls a government of the elders.

Oligarchy is called by Aristotle the reign of a few rich people who have no interest in the common good.

3. The third sort of government was government by one man. He is called a lord if he inclines to a good and common end, a tyrant if he is inclined to pursue bad or [merely] personal ends.

4. There are six types of government, three good, three bad.

5. The seventh kind of government now rules in the city of Rome, and is called a monstrous government. (Also number 28)

6. It pertains to the jurist to investigate which sort of government is better.

7. The three forms of good government.

8. Monarchy, that is, the governance of one king, is the best sort of government.
9. Three things are required of any ruler, namely perfect reason, right intention, and perfect stability.
10. Not every sort of one-man rule is called the rule of a king.
11. Whether it is good to be ruled by kings. (And no. 13)
12. What a king may demand from his subjects.
14. A consideration of what may happen when that which is being discussed tends naturally toward this.
15. A threefold division of populaces, because some cities are large, some larger still, some the largest of all.
16. A large city, in the first degree of magnitude, is better off with a government "for the people" than it is being ruled by a few people, or by only one.
17. The city of Siena was ruled by rich nobles for eighty years, and that government was expelled by the "populars" in the time of king Charles the Fourth.
18. Government "for the people" should be called a government of God rather than of men.

Charles the Fourth approved of the government "for the people."

19. [Both] magnates and the most wretched are excluded from a government "for the people."
20. A larger city, according to the scale of magnitude, is better ruled by a few good rich men, rather than by the populace, or by one person.

The city of Venice and the city of Florence are among the "larger" cities, and are ruled by a few of the wealthy.

21. A city accustomed to being ruled in a certain way should be governed in that way.
22. The largest cities or peoples are best ruled by a single king.
23. A government which results from election is more divine than one which results from succession.
24. It is dangerous to have a king of another nation.

All Christians are called brothers.

25. The Roman empire, after it was separated from the Italians, grew ever weaker.
26. Small populaces cannot be governed in themselves, unless they submit or adhere to another people.
27. A tyrant is the worst of all of the forms of government.
28. The rule of several bad men is not so evil as the rule of a single tyrant; and how this may be determined.
29. The rule of several bad men does not last long, and easily decays to the rule of a single tyrant.

Because this is the last part of the Tiber, and thus in the city of Rome, which is the head of the world, let us therefore examine some things concerning the ways of ruling a city. And this inquiry is twofold: in the first place an inquiry into ways of ruling as far as the laws are concerned, which may concern either the written or the unwritten law,^[1] and this is an inquiry I will not pursue, since this is treated in various ways in various [other] places. In the second place an inquiry into ways of ruling as far as concerns the persons of the rulers, and this deserves some sort of examination. In the first place let us see in how many ways a city may be ruled. In the second place, which ways are better, which worse. In the third place let us examine some of the doubts which arise about these matters in the course of daily events.

In the first place, in how many ways a city may be ruled, three forms of good government can be garnered from our laws, and three which are contrary to them. Aristotle discusses a number of these forms quite clearly in the third book of his Politics and there he supplies his own names for those forms;^[2] we will both make mention of those names and also insert names more fitting for the present time.

1 In the city of Rome, when the kings had been expelled, there were three forms of government.^[3] The first by the people:^[4] Aristotle called this sort of government policratia or "political," and we will call it a government "for the people," when the government is a good one, [that is] when the rulers chiefly consider the common good of all according to [each person's] state.

But if this multitude looks to its own good, and to oppose the rich, or any gens, this is a bad government and Aristotle describes it with the Greek word democratia: we call it a perverse populace. We have these two forms of government [in the laws]^[5], where, when honors and rewards are divided [in society] according to the appropriate degrees, we call it a good or worthy government; when these are divided unequally, such that some are burdened, others treated lightly, it is called a bad government, through which the republic is destroyed.

2 The second form of government in the city of Rome was by the senators, and thus by a few wealthy men who were good and prudent.^[6] And if these few incline to the common good their lordship [principatus] is good and is called by Aristotle a government of the elders; the more common name is the one I used earlier, namely a lordship or government of the good. And if these few men do not incline to the common good, but are merely a few rich and powerful men oppressing others, eager for their own gain, then the government is a bad one, and is called by Aristotle oligarchy, which is the same as a lordship of the rich or a government of the bad: a name which is fairly common.[\[7\]](#)

3 The third form of government is that of one person,[\[8\]](#) and this according to Aristotle is called kingship. If this person is a universal lord, we call this form of government an empire [imperium]; if the rulership is particular, it is sometimes called kingship, sometimes a duchy, mark or county.[\[9\]](#) A duchy is what we commonly call the rule of a natural lord, if this lord works for a good and common purpose. If he works for a bad end, and for his own advantage, according to Aristotle he is called a tyrant, and is so called by the laws and customs.[\[10\]](#)

4 We have therefore six forms of government, three good, three bad, each one called by its own name; in truth, every bad kingship can be called in common parlance a tyranny, namely the tyranny of the people, the tyranny of certain people, and the tyranny of one person.

5 There is a seventh form of government, the worst, which now exists in the city of Rome; where there are many tyrants in different areas, so strong that none can overcome the others. There is also a common government over the whole city, so weak that it can do nothing against any of those tyrants, nor against any of their adherents except insofar as they are willing to suffer it. This sort of government Aristotle does not treat, and rightly so, for it is a monstrous thing. What is one to think, seeing a single body with a weak head, and many other heads stronger than that one, contesting among themselves? Certainly this thing would be a monster. Therefore it is called a monstrous government. It comes about through divine permission, to show how far is fallen every glory of the world. The city of Rome, the head of customs, the head of polities, has fallen into such monstrosity in its government that it can truly be said that it is no government at all, and has not even the form of a government.[\[11\]](#)

6 In the second place we must see which is a better form of government. This inquiry is a necessary one for jurists, since universal lords, when they consider the reformation of a city, either consult jurists or entrust the case to them; or, when the jurists are in session, an argument concerning city government may be brought before them. Therefore an inquiry as to which is the better form of government is necessary, a subject treated by Aristotle in the third book of the 7 Politics; but Aegidius Romanus, of the order of St. Augustine, who was a great philosopher and a master in theology, treats this more clearly in the book he wrote on the government of princes. I will therefore use his opinions and his arguments, in his own words, but I will not use the words of Aristotle, for they are unknown to the jurists to whom I address myself; but I will use his arguments and test them according to the laws, and afterwards I will relate my own opinion of the matter.

So: this Aegidius says that there are three good forms of government, as was mentioned above. The first is a form for ruling [by] the multitude, or "for the people," and it is good if it tends toward this end. The second form of government is better, namely the rule of a few.

8 The third form of government is best, namely monarchy, or the government of one king;[\[12\]](#) this fact, namely that the rule of one person is the best lordship, he demonstrates by four reasons,^[13] from which he concludes these two things, the first being: the peace and union of the citizens should be the final intention of the ruler.^[14] But this peace and unity can be better brought about and observed if it is overseen by one, than if it is overseen by several: therefore it is better to be ruled by one person. This is proved in this way: in a government of several people there can be no peace except insofar as these several are of one will, which is clear since if they disagree, their action is impeded by their competition.^[15] But the government of several is good as regards its unity; therefore the good government of this unity is much better when it is brought about through one person. Secondly this is proved in this way, since through this the city and republic is made stronger, which is proved thusly: the more strength is united, the stronger it is in comparison to its being dispersed among many.^[16] If therefore the whole strength of the city were gathered into one person it would be more effective, and will better be able to be governed by that prince, on account of his greater strength.^[17] In the third place an art or artifice is better insofar as it imitates nature;^[18] but the whole city is a single person and a single artificial and imagined man.^[19] But in a natural man we see one head and many members; therefore if a city is ruled thus it is ruled better, because it imitates nature more closely. On this see [X.1.31.14] and this is determined in Gratian [ii, c. 7, q. 1.41], where bees, and many other creatures lacking reason, set up a king for themselves. In the fourth place Aegidius says that this is established through experience, since he says he sees that provinces which are not governed by one king are in poverty, and do not enjoy peace, but rather are beset by strife and wars. Those which are under a king do not know wars, rejoice in peace, flourish in abundance.^[20] From these things Aegidius concludes that the government of the people or multitude, which tends to a single end, is good, but that the government of a few is better, since it has a measure of unity. Monarchy though, of the rule of single king, is best, because a perfect unity is found therein.^[21]

But against the aforementioned arguments the same Aegidius proposes other arguments, which he draws from the sayings of Aristotle, and 9 attempts to respond to them.^[22] I will pass on these arguments, testing them by the laws. I will preface my examination of these arguments with the statement that three things are required in anyone who rules well. The first is a perfect discerning reason, so that he may know how to separate the just from the unjust, the licit from the illicit.^[23] Second, he must have right intention. Third, he must have a perfect stability. These things are proven by the definition of justice, since it is said that justice is a constant and perpetual will which renders to each one his due.^[24] from these three things there are three arguments against the aforementioned arguments. The first is this: the more people there are, the more things they see, and in them there is a more perceptive and discerning reason than in one person:^[25] therefore, in this respect, it is better to be ruled by many. The second is this: the ruler has right intention when he looks more to the public good than to his own.^[26] But if the multitude is in command, assuming that they look to their own good, they nonetheless withdraw from the common good no further, in so doing, than if one person were ruling and were acting for his personal good: therefore it is better to be ruled by many.^[27] Thirdly, the ruler must have a perfect stability so that he may on no account be corrupted: because, as the law says, the will must be constant, and perpetual. But the multitude is born and is corrupted with more difficulty than is a single person.^[28] Therefore it is better to be ruled by many people.^[29]

Responding to these arguments he says that a single king or prince should have with him many counselors and powerful men, and therefore he will see things as if he were many, nor will he easily be able to be corrupted, unless his entire council is corrupted. But if this king were

10 to follow his own head he would not be a king, but a tyrant. It would not be good for such a person to rule, so says Aegidius.[\[30\]](#) I do not put forward these arguments to be understood simply, and for that reason, speaking in the manner of jurists on behalf of the aforementioned arguments I say at the beginning that not every government of that one person is the government of a king. For sometimes there is one who rules, and that one is only a judge, such as the praesides provinciarum and the proconsuls.[\[31\]](#) There are also podestà and civic rectors.[\[32\]](#) It falls to these people to judge according to the law, and they hold a regal position, namely that which pertains to ministers, but regalian powers do not pertain to them, but rather to the cities which they rule, or to some other superior, or to the fisc.[\[33\]](#) through judges like these God ruled the Jewish people for a long time,[\[34\]](#) as we can see throughout the Jewish book. Whenever one person rules a city or a province, and makes laws as he wishes, all things pertain to him, and this is called the rule of a king.[\[35\]](#)

11 But let us see what is the rightness [ius] of this kingship, so that we may thus see whether it is good to be ruled by kings. Of this the Lord says, through the prophet Samuel, I Kings 8:[\[36\]](#) "This shall be the law of the king who will rule over you: he shall take your sons and appoint them to his chariots, and to be his horsemen and to run before his chariots, and he shall appoint for himself tribunes and centurions and tillers of his fields. He will take your daughters to be perfumers and cooks and bakers, and he shall take your finest fields and vineyards and olive-groves and give them to his servants. He will take the tenth of your crops and vines, to give to his eunuchs and his servants. He will take the best of your servants and maids and your asses and the best of your youth and put them to work for him. He shall take the tenth of your flocks and you shall be servants to him" etc.

Here are the words of God, according to which it seems worst of all to be ruled by kings, because they bring so much ill upon their subjects and (what is worse) reduces them to slavery, which is like death.[\[37\]](#)

But these words are explained by the holy doctors in the following way, namely that all of these things should not be understood to be permitted to the king, but only those things which are set out above, since the king does these things when he begins to become a tyrant, which happens easily.[\[38\]](#) And because this was going to happen to them, therefore Samuel made the following prediction, "This shall be the law of the king who will rule over you," as if to say: let this not be permitted to every king, but rather to the one who is going to rule over you, since he will usurp this right for himself. It was displeasing to God that a king should have been made at all, as the chapter [of Scripture] says. That this is true appears in what one reads in Deuteronomy 17 [16-20], where it is taught what a good and right king ought to do.

And the Lord said these things concerning the future king: "When he has been established he shall not multiply horses for himself, nor shall he lead his people into Egypt to swell the ranks of his horsemen, since the Lord has said to you that you shall not return that way again, he shall not have many wives to beguile his soul, nor great masses of gold and silver. After he sits upon his throne he shall copy out for himself the Deuteronomy of this law in a book, taking his example from the priests of the Levite tribe, and he shall keep it with him and read from it all the days of his life, that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, to keep His words and ceremonies which are laid down in the laws, that his heart not be lifted up in pride against his brothers, that he turn aside neither to the right nor to the left. And he shall rule for a long time, as will his son, in Israel." These are the words of God which we should examine somehow. For he says "when he has been established." From this it is conceded that one must be made king by another, rather than assuming the kingship on one's own authority: in this case one would not be a king, but a tyrant, as we have said above. Then he says "he shall not multiply horses for himself:" "to multiply" is to have more than is sufficient for one's needs. "Nor shall he lead his people into Egypt" etc.: these words can be taken literally as they stand, namely that the king of the Jews ought never to go forth to occupy the land of Egypt. They can also be understood allegorically, as though He were saying: let the king not lead his people into slavery, which slavery is represented by Egypt, where that people was being held in captivity. With these words, therefore, He prohibits burdening the people with personal burdens, which are a sort of slavery. "He shall not have many wives:" above he forbade empty glory, here he forbids luxury to the king. for luxury separates the king's soul from true judgement, not only toward men, but toward God, as befell in the case of Solomon, who became an idolator as is read in 3 Kings 11.[\[39\]](#) "Nor great masses of gold and silver:" here He prohibits avarice. Inasmuch as through excessive ceremony a great deal of money is expended, and through this the people are burdened, so also through avarice a great deal is extorted from the people. After He has above prohibited certain things from being done, he then orders that certain things be done: "he shall write out for himself the Deuteronomy" of this law, this is interpreted by Isidore as a second law, and it is the image [figura] of the evangelic law.[\[40\]](#) The king must therefore be faithful and catholic.[\[41\]](#) "Taking his example from the priests of the Levite tribe:" in those priests holy mother Church is figured, from which every king must take the exemplar of the Christian law. "Nor let his heart be lifted up in pride:" here He goes back in order to prohibit something again, namely that pride of the heart which is the root of all evils. "Against his brothers:" it is plain, therefore, that those who are subjects are not the king's slaves, but his brothers, and thus what the preceding authority said concerned not the true king, but the tyrant. "That he turn aside neither to the right nor to the left," it is as if He said: let his judgement be right, neither out of love nor out of hatred, as if He had said: let him be just. The good king must therefore be faithful, Christian, just, neither overweening nor one who burdens his people, no lover of luxury, neither greedy nor proud.

The king must also do other things which are laid down by Gratian.[\[42\]](#)

12 But the things put forward there are adapted to the foregoing statements: although it is there established what the king should do and how he should be in himself, it is not there established what he may exact from his subjects. This is my answer: he may exact expenses which are appropriate for the royal majesty. But we have this written expressly [in the feudal laws], where it is said that all tributes, public rents [vectigalia] and public taxes [census], which are named there explicitly, pertain to the king; and that it also pertains to the king to impose taxes [collectas] out of necessity, as is written there, and it is also shown by the law of the Digests that kings have every power.[\[43\]](#)

13 Having seen what the rights of a king are, let us return to the question whether it is useful for a city or a people to be ruled by a king; insofar as that king is a good one according to the above conditions, the best rule is the rule of a king, for the reasons discussed above. And this is how I understand the opinion of Aristotle and of Aegidius.

14 If we then consider the things which may come about, since a king sometimes turns into a tyrant, either he or his descendants, then I say we must consider what can happen when the situation being examined has a natural and likely tendency toward this end.[\[44\]](#)

15 Having said this I will make a three-fold division of cities or of populaces; for one may have a large city or a people [gens], in the first degree of magnitude, a city or people which is larger and hence in the second degree of magnitude, or a city or people of the largest sort, and hence in the third degree of magnitude.

16 If we talk about a large city or populace, in the first degree, then I will say that it not suitable to that populace to be ruled by a king. This is shown in the first place by a text, because, when the city of Rome was in the first degree of magnitude it expelled the kings, who had fallen into tyranny.[\[45\]](#) And it is also proved by reason, since it is in the nature of kings to be magnificent in making great expenditures:[\[46\]](#) but the royal revenues of a populace large only in the first degree are not going to be enough for royal expenses, and so the king will have to extort them from his subjects, and thus he will become a tyrant. The situation of such a king tends very likely toward tyranny, and hence this is not a good form of government, if you consider how the situation is likely to turn out. This is the reason, because it displeases God when a people seeks a king, as in I Kings.[\[47\]](#) Nor is it useful to such a populace to be ruled by a few people, as, for example, by the city's rich men. For if it happens that in these cities the rich are few in number, one of two things will happen: the populace may well be offended by the rule of these few now matter how well the populace is ruled, as occurred in the city of Siena. There was for about eighty years a certain group of rich men who governed the city wisely and well, but nevertheless, since the multitude of the populace was angry with them, they had to hold on by armed force. This group was thrown out upon the arrival of Charles IV, most illustrious emperor of the Romans, who was ruling at that time. The deed of this prince shows that this sort of government is not good in cities of this type.

Another inappropriate thing can follow from this, because those few people, as it naturally happens, could be divided among themselves, from which fact rumors, plots, fires and civil wars run round the cities, as we often see in the city of Pisa. It is therefore fitting for that populace which is in the first degree of magnitude to be ruled by the multitude, which is called a government "for the people."[\[48\]](#) That this is a good form of government is clear, because in that time the city of Rome grew greatly.[\[49\]](#) It also is clear from the aforementioned authority of the book of Kings: it seems more a government of God rather than of 17 men. And we have seen this in the city of Perugia, which in this way is ruled in peace and grows in unity and flourishes, and those who rule the city according to their offices are on guard against no one, but they themselves are guarded by the people, and it is often seen that something will be decided by the common counsel of the city's men that the wiser and more prudent may think to be a bad decision; but, as things turn out, the decision is seen to have been an excellent one.

18 This is so because it is a government more of God than of men: the aforementioned and most illustrious emperor commended this form of government, when I was in his presence.[\[50\]](#)

This sort of government is so called when jurisdiction lies with the populace or with the multitude, not that the whole multitude should rule at once, but that the government should be committed to different people over time, according to the offices, and according to a cycle.[\[51\]](#) The 19 things I say concerning the multitude, I understand to mean "excluding the lowest people."[\[52\]](#) One can also exclude from this government any magnates so powerful as to oppress others,[\[53\]](#) and we see that this is done. But in the above-mentioned cities, if honors and rewards are distributed according to the appropriate ranks, the government is good and looks toward a superior reform.[\[54\]](#)

20 In the second place we need to inquire about a larger populace or a people in the second degree of magnitude. It does not suit them to be ruled by one king, for the previous reasons, nor does it suit them to be ruled by the multitude: it would in fact be extremely difficult and dangerous to get such a multitude together. But it does suit these people to be ruled by a few, that is, by the good and rich men of the city; this is shown expressly [in the laws][\[55\]](#), where, when the city of Rome had grown, senators were created and all power was given to them. the city of Venice is ruled this way, as is the city of Florence. These cities I rank among the "larger" cities. In these cities the previous worries do not apply. For although they are said to be ruled by "a few," I say that they are a few with respect to the multitude of [their own] citizens, but many with respect to other cities: hence they are many, since the multitude does not scorn to be ruled by them. Further, since they are many, they may not easily be divided among themselves, since many will remain in the middle and sustain the city. And the Gloss speaks of this way of ruling a city, when the city has grown into the 21 second degree of magnitude.[\[56\]](#) These things are true, unless something else appears concerning the old way of ruling the city. It is possible for a populace or a people to become so accustomed to a certain form of government that it becomes a sort of nature to them, and they do not know how to live otherwise: then the old form of government is to be preserved.[\[57\]](#)

22 In the third place we have to consider the largest populace or people, which is in the third degree of magnitude. This could come about in a city which is "one in itself": but if it were a city which ruled over many other cities and provinces, it would be better for that people to be ruled by one person. This is shown [in the laws],[\[58\]](#) where, when the Roman empire had grown greatly and taken over many provinces, rulership devolved upon one person, the princeps. All of the above arguments of the aforementioned brother Aegidius show this; this is the point at which counter arguments fail. In such a great multitude there will be of necessity many good men with whom it will befit the king to take counsel, people whom it will befit him to entrust with the duties of justice. We commonly see this in actual fact, because a people or populace is better ruled, the greater or more powerful the king who rules it. For this we have the authority of holy Scripture, as in Deuteronomy 17, where the Lord speaks thus: "When you have entered the land which the Lord God shall give you and possessed it, and have inherited within it, you shall say: 'I will set up for myself a king like those of the nations all around.' You will set up him whom the Lord your God chooses, out of the number of your brothers, nor shall you make a king from another people, who is not your brother." These are the words of the Lord. Concerning his words: "when you have entered and possessed and inherited" etc., one can see that a small people is not going to have a king: but a large people, in an important position and ruling over many, [will have a king], as was said above. Concerning the words "your God shall elect," it is clear that all kings are chosen by God, either directly or indirectly, or by electors with the inspiration of God. For the heart of the electors is in the hand of God, and he turns it whither he wishes.[\[59\]](#)

23 And from this you should note that a government [which is created] by election is more divine than [one which comes about] by succession. For this reason succession is absolutely abhorred where ecclesiastical goods are concerned,[\[60\]](#) and therefore the election of a prince who is a universal lord comes about through election by the princes and prelates, and it does not occur through succession.[\[61\]](#)

Now this is an empire [imperium] which God has constituted from the beginning, and the law warns us concerning these things.[\[62\]](#) Particular kings, though, more often are set up by men.[\[63\]](#) In this case it is permitted that the government should be passed on through succession: this is the sense in which Aegidius' statements in his book on princely government should be taken.[\[64\]](#) He determined that it was better for this government to descend by succession, for it should be transmitted, like all other goods and rights; but it is otherwise in the case of universal [governance], for [such transmission] would be against the canons and divine authority. Now, from His words "out of the number of your brothers" note that it is dangerous to have a king of another nation. But, you will say, in that case, how was the empire of the Romans handed over [translatum] to the Germans, that is, the Teutons, by the Church?[\[65\]](#) My answer: all Christians are called our brothers, and so there was no contravention of the aforementioned authority. But it may not be transferred to a man of the Saracens, to a pagan or an infidel, and thereupon it follows that "you shall not make a king from another people," and on this account one needs to look closely at the person who is going to be crowned emperor. Or you could explain the words the way Augustine does,[\[66\]](#) as the Gloss says in the same place "you may not: that is, you should not"[\[67\]](#) about the king, since the rulership of another 25 people is not preserved so faithfully. And therefore the Roman empire, once it was separated from the Italians, grew ever weaker in our eyes: this could nevertheless not have about without the hidden judgement of God.

26 I will not speak of small populaces. These are either subject to another city,[\[68\]](#) or are tied to another city or a king by some treaty so that that revere some other majesty.[\[69\]](#) We see this in castles and cities which are under the protection of this city of Perugia. Much as a small and weak human body cannot govern itself without the air of a caretaker and guardian, thus these small peoples can in no way be ruled in themselves, unless they are subjected or bound to another.

So much for the three forms of good government.

27 I ask then, of the three bad forms of government, which is worse. In this matter all the philosophers says that a tyranny is the worst principate, and occupies the final degree of malice. And the same Aegidius in his book said, as has been said, that a government is called good insofar as it tends toward the common good. But under a tyranny the common good is looked to least: whence a tyranny is the worst principate. Whence if several are ruling, who are held to be wealthy and good, or the multitude rules, even if these rulers incline to their own good, which is indeed not of God, and thus it is a rule "of the bad" or "of a perverse populace," nevertheless it would not diverge much from the intention of the common good; because, since they are many, they know something about the nature of the common good. But if the tyrant is a single person then he does recede from the common good. Furthermore, since virtue united for a good thing is better, virtue united for a bad thing is worse. [70] That a tyrant is the worst is so obvious as to require no demonstration. and what was said above, that the rule of several bad men is not so bad as the rule of a single tyrant, should be understood to be true when the many tend to one purpose, and can do nothing except together: it is a different matter if each exercises his own tyranny, so that one cares not about the other, as I said above concerning the monstrous regime which now exists in Rome. Similarly when in one body there is a single corrupt humor which predominates and is bad; but if all the humors are corrupted they oppose each other etc., as has already 29 been said. Woe then to that city which has many tyrants with no common ground. This warning should be made, that the rule of several bad men or of a perverse people does not last long, but easily turns into a one-man tyranny; we often see this actually happen. This is God's own will, as it is written: "He who makes a hypocrite to rule, for the sins of the people," Job 34, [71] and because Italy today is full up with tyrants.

Baldus de Ubaldis died in Pavia while writing a consilium on April 28, 1400. At his death he had outlined only the sketchiest facts of the case, and the unfinished text is preserved in a Vatican manuscript. We learn that the men of the commune of Brugnano (perhaps the modern Brugherio) had been condemned to pay 160 florins when they negligently seized 'wrongdoers and exiles' (malefactores et banniti) of Baldus' lord, Giangaleazzo Visconti.⁽¹⁾ The commune imposed a tax to pay the fine. Some of the inhabitants (familiars, inquilini, coloni et fictabiles) claimed to be immune from the tax because their possessions had been held in fee, and, consequently, they had never been considered men of the commune.⁽²⁾ One may guess that the inhabitants or their lord asked Baldus for an opinion about the legality of the tax.

The case reflected the circumstances of Baldus' last ten years. After he moved to Pavia in 1390 and became the 'court jurist' of Giangaleazzo, Baldus occupied himself with many questions of feudal law. He finished a commentary on the Libri feudorum in 1393 and devoted much time and effort to Visconti's legal problems and those of his vassals.⁽³⁾ He was seventy-two when he began his last consilium, and he died scribbling or, more accurately, dictating, thus ending an extraordinarily productive life with his boots on.

Baldus of Perugia, who has been described as 'the most cultivated of the jurists, as the one most nurtured on philosophy',⁽⁴⁾ was born in Perugia on October 2, 1327, the son of Franciscus de Ubaldis, a medical doctor and master at the University of Perugia.⁽⁵⁾ Although modern historians refer to him as 'de Ubaldis', medieval jurists, and he himself, almost invariably called him 'Baldus de Perusio'.⁽⁶⁾ In his will dated 26 October, 1399, he described himself as born a citizen of Perugia, from the quartiere of the Gate of St. Peter and the parish of St. Lucia.⁽⁷⁾ Since stories of his early brilliance were widely reported, he must have been a very precocious student. With brotherly pride, Angelus de Ubaldis reported that his brother held a repetitio on the law, Centum Capuae [Dig. 13.4.8(9)], when he was fifteen years old.⁽⁸⁾

Biographers from the sixteenth to the twentieth centuries have reported many contradictory facts about his early years, but we can now outline the beginnings of his career with more certainty. A very old tradition dated his birth to 1319 and his doctorate to 1344.⁽⁹⁾ The first date was not supported by good evidence, and another, reliable birth date of 1327 is found in Baldus' own papers and is now commonly accepted. The date of 1344 for his doctorate is unlikely, since he would have been only 17. Baldus was precocious but his having finished a doctorate at 17 seems improbable. Domenico Maffei has now shown that a clever forger inserted a few pseudo-autobiographical lines into the Practica iudiciaria, falsely attributing them to Baldus when he printed the book. Consequently, historians have believed and repeated the litany of the forger: Baldus received his doctorate in 1344, taught for a short time in Bologna, and bested Bartolus in a disputatio.⁽¹⁰⁾ These 'facts' about his early life cannot be given any credence.⁽¹¹⁾

Maffei's sifting of the facts permits us to construct a more probable history of Baldus' early years. In the Proemium to his commentary on the Libri Feudorum, he mentioned that he had been teaching for 46 years.⁽¹²⁾ Since he finished this work in 1393, his examination for the doctorate must have been held in ca. 1347, perhaps even later. Stories of his early precociousness could be true, as he would have been still a very young teacher of twenty. Since Baldus studied with Bartolus in Perugia for a 'long time' and since Bartolus arrived there in 1343, the date of 1347 fits well into what we know of his early education.⁽¹³⁾ He also mentioned that he sat at the feet of a number of other jurists in Perugia: Federicus Petrucci de Siena in canon law, Johannes Palliarenis (Pagliarenis), and Franciscus de Tigrinis in civil law.⁽¹⁴⁾ Federicus Petrucci left Perugia to become a Benedictine monk in 1343. As Franciscus de Tigrinis moved from Pisa to Perugia in 1345 and remained there until 1355, Baldus must have studied with him in the late 1340's.⁽¹⁵⁾ We have no information about when or where Johannes Palliarenis taught, but since Baldus referred to him as his 'first doctor', he probably heard his lectures in Perugia before 1345.⁽¹⁶⁾

After receiving his doctorate, Baldus began teaching at Perugia with his old teacher Bartolus and was soon joined by his brother Angelus in 1351.⁽¹⁷⁾ Late in life, Baldus wrote that he and Bartolus (1357) both participated in a legal case in which he opposed Bartolus' opinion on an issue. It is not clear from his comment whether the two jurists were on opposing sides or whether they simply disagreed about a particular legal point.⁽¹⁸⁾ Whatever the case, Baldus did not immerse himself solely in teaching but practiced law early in his career.

Teaching was in his blood, and he taught until the time of his death. He began at Perugia and remained until 1357, moved to Pisa from 1357-1358, to Florence in 1359-1364, returned to Perugia in 1365-1376, received a call to Padua in 1376-1379, but again returned to Perugia in 1379-1390. The powerful ruler of Milan, Giangaleazzo Visconti offered him at a salary of 90 Florins per month to teach at his university. It was a princely offer that Baldus could not refuse. He sold his house to the distinguished teacher of medicine in Perugia, Antonius de Scarperia, for 390 Florins of gold⁽¹⁹⁾ and moved to Pavia in February, 1390. He was still teaching civil law there when he died.⁽²⁰⁾ Among his many students he counted Petrus Ancharanus, Franciscus Zabarella, Paulus de Castro, and Johannes de Imola.

He also educated a pope. Petrus Belforte heard his lectures in Perugia and later became Pope Gregory XI (1370-1378). Gregory negotiated the delicate politics of moving the papacy back to Rome from Avignon, but after his premature death the College of Cardinals split into Italian and French factions. Baldus must have felt an obligation to defend what he believed was the intention of his former student: the papacy should reside in Rome. In 1378 he wrote a consilium that was included in his Commentary on the sixth book of the Codex, De schismate, in which he justified the claims of the Roman claimant, Pope Urban VI.⁽²¹⁾ In 1380, Baldus and Johannes de Legnano were summoned to Rome to defend Urban's legal position.⁽²²⁾ Both jurists wrote consilia for the pope while in Rome. For Baldus' efforts, Urban granted him a castle near Gubbio, of which, it seems, he was never able to take possession.⁽²³⁾

Perugia honored him with many important public offices. After returning to his native city in 1364 he was sent on several legations to Rome. In 1370, he was elected one of the Tre della guerra when the city was on the brink of war with Pope Urban V and later served as a legate on a mission to negotiate with the pope. In 1379, Baldus was the city's representative to Charles III of Durazzo.⁽²⁴⁾ He was appointed ambassador for Perugia in 1381, 1382, 1384, 1385, and 1389.

He married and had at least two sons, possibly three, who became jurists: Johannes Zenobius and Franciscus.⁽²⁵⁾ We do know that during his stay in Florence, his wife, Landa di Vanni de' Conti di Collemedio, gave birth to male twins, but he did not reveal their names in his commentary.⁽²⁶⁾ The twins very likely grew up to become the two jurists, since Franciscus and Johannes Zanobius are the only two sons mentioned in his will.⁽²⁷⁾ Baldus does mention another 'most beloved' son named Giliolus (Ziliolus) in a rubric at the end of a consilium written in the mid-1390's, in which he endorsed his son's opinion.⁽²⁸⁾ This Giliolus must have written a consilium, not extant, on the same case. Since this text is the only known reference to this son in the sources, one might suspect that Baldus meant Zenobius and that Giliolus was a nickname for him. From the evidence of the texts at the end of the Barberini lat. 1409, Johannes Zenobius inherited the manuscripts. Johannes died shortly after Baldus in 1401, and his son, who wrote the obituary notices of his brother Amadeus and his mother, Lambertina, inherited them after Johannes' death.⁽²⁹⁾ Vallone conjectures that his name was either Carlo or Galeazzo.⁽³⁰⁾

Baldus had special connections to Florence and was made a citizen during his stay from 1359-1364,⁽³¹⁾ writing a number of consilia that dealt with Florentine litigants or problems.⁽³²⁾ At the height of his career, the Florentines tried to persuade him to return. In 1385 Coluccio Salutati wrote in the name of the Republic of Florence to the Republic of Perugia and asked that Baldus be given permission to teach in Florence.⁽³³⁾ Perugia refused and declared that if Baldus left, his departure would destroy the Studium. The priors and the camerarii of the guilds forbade his departure without their permission.⁽³⁴⁾ He did not leave but must have had continuing interests in Florence. In his will, he bequeathed property in Tuscany. According to its provisions he also had holdings in Pavia, Milan, Genoa, and Perugia.⁽³⁵⁾ He did not die a poor man.

Over the course of his long life he wrote many different types of legal works, and it is difficult to generalize about their character. An important feature of his work, however, is his attention to practical problems. This tendency is illustrated by his preoccupation with the statutes of the Codex and Libri feudorum as the primary focus of his exegetical work and by the reams of consilia that he wrote over his lifetime. Although the consilia were substantial sources of income, his devotion to this work, even on the eve of his death, betrays a passion for the genre that transcends simple explanations.

A close examination of an important collection of Baldus' consilia in the Barberini fond of the Vatican Library, most of which were in his personal library, can do much to illuminate his working methodology.⁽³⁶⁾ Of these manuscripts Barberini lat. 1408, containing consilia of his last years, is a particularly important witness to Baldus' 'working style'. Many marginal additions, notations, and corrections that probably come, in part, from the hand of Baldus or his amanuensis,⁽³⁷⁾ provide information about the purpose of individual consilia and sometimes indicate that Baldus did his share of pro bono work for the Franciscans,⁽³⁸⁾ his parish priest,⁽³⁹⁾ and others.⁽⁴⁰⁾ Some notations indicate the amount that Baldus for paid for an opinion.⁽⁴¹⁾ Baldus called his two short consilia for the Franciscans 'allegationes,' which may indicate that he distinguished between his opinions that he wrote as 'advisory' and those that he presented to a court. Undoubtedly, more shades of purpose and meaning could be culled from the genre of the consilia, but we are just beginning to appreciate the many purposes for which the jurists wrote them.⁽⁴²⁾

Baldus wrote his commentaries on Roman law over a long period of time. There is some evidence in the printed editions that he wrote 'additiones' to works that he had already written.⁽⁴³⁾ Any future examination of Baldus' thought will require a careful exploration of the manuscripts upon which the printed editions were based.

2. Works of Civil law

Baldus taught Roman law at Perugia, Florence, and Pavia and wrote commentaries on all parts of the Corpus iuris civilis. He also wrote many repetitiones to various leges that were included in his commentaries or which circulated separately. Savigny noted that many of his commentaries are incomplete with large lacunae between parts. He concluded from this evidence that Baldus did not lecture comprehensively on Roman law but only on certain parts of it. Savigny considered this practice common to the teaching of law in the later Middle Ages, and the manuscript evidence supports his assumption.⁽⁴⁴⁾ The printed edition of Baldus' Opera omnia includes commentaries on all parts of the Corpus iuris civilis,⁽⁴⁵⁾ but Gero Dolezalek's survey of Baldus' manuscripts of Roman law clearly demonstrates that his commentaries on the Authentica and some books of the Digest were not widely circulated, and in the case of the Digestum novum, there do not seem to be any manuscript witnesses. He seems not to have written a commentary on the Institutes.⁽⁴⁶⁾ This evidence casts doubt on the 'orderly' presentation of Baldus' works in early printed editions. Consequently, the manuscripts should be explored in order to understand the genesis and authenticity of these works that early modern editors have attributed to him. As Manlio Bellomo has observed, the editors of early modern legal texts have 'constructed' commentaries to fit their publishing needs, and Baldus' lecturae produced over a number of years were probably put together without undue respect for their original shape and form.⁽⁴⁷⁾

In contrast, Baldus' Commentarium on the various books of the Codex circulated widely, with many manuscripts still extant. The scope of his work was broad as well. The manuscripts demonstrate that he commented on each book of the Codex individually and extensively. The early printed editions adhered to the divisions of the manuscripts.⁽⁴⁸⁾ Although we cannot generalize much about his work since his commentaries on the Codex remain largely unexplored, it is striking that he immersed himself in the explication of ancient Roman statutory law at a time when the Italian city states were promulgating massive numbers of statutes, the interpretation of which Baldus undertook quite often in his consilia.⁽⁴⁹⁾ The challenge of understanding statutory law must have seemed very relevant and helpful at a time when he was frequently called upon to explain how a statute of a city state fit into the Ius commune.⁽⁵⁰⁾

Baldus also wrote an extraordinarily large number of tracts on various aspects of civil law, which have never been systematically listed or explored. These small works most often were extensive repetitiones on individual leges and were often printed at the appropriate place as part of his commentaries on the Corpus iuris civilis. In the manuscripts, however, they quite often circulated separately. The most important seem to have been a Tractatus de syndicatu officialium [Dig. 1.16.4.2],⁽⁵¹⁾ Tractatus de constituto,⁽⁵²⁾ Tractatus de statutis,⁽⁵³⁾ but there are many others.⁽⁵⁴⁾ A number of these tracts have been printed in the Tractatus universi iuris.⁽⁵⁵⁾ As mentioned earlier, Domenico Maffei has demonstrated that a work on procedure, the Practica iudiciaria, with its autobiographical interpolations, long attributed to Baldus, is not his.⁽⁵⁶⁾

3. Works of canon law

We do not know where or when Baldus taught canon law, but he wrote several purely canonistic works. His consilia also contain many cases of canonistic interest.⁽⁵⁷⁾ Like most legal scholars of his time, Baldus very likely did not think of himself as learned in one law or the other; rather, he considered himself a jurist of the Ius commune.

During the last ten years of his life, he completed a partial Commentary to the Decretals of Gregory IX that ends at X 3.2.8, but skips some early sections.⁽⁵⁸⁾ In book two his text presents particular problems. In the manuscripts and in the printed editions, there is a lacuna from X 2.1.12 to 2.4.1, in medio. His commentary to 2.4.1 begins in mid-stream, with a citation, 'Iudex, lege Consentaneum, ibi "Incontinenti",' <Cod. 7.43.8> as if a portion of his text had been lost. The printer of a fifteenth century edition wrote:⁽⁵⁹⁾

Hic deficit Lectura Baldi . . . unde autem hoc provenerit ignoratur. Sed vitio et culpa primi scriptoris tribuendum censemus, cum in lecturis antiquis illa dictio "Iudex" ita praecedentibus sit connexa, ut nil novi inducere videatur, quod non nisi scribentis errore factum fuisse iudicandum est.

There is another jump from X 2.13.11 to 2.14.4.⁽⁶⁰⁾ Baldus' Lectura was an important text in the late Middle Ages and was first printed in Milan in 1476-1478. The first edition was followed by a number of later printings.⁽⁶¹⁾

Thomas Izbicki discovered that Baldus also wrote commentaries on the Sext, Clementines, and De regulis iuris.⁽⁶²⁾ Since these works have not been edited, I give the incipits from Munich, Staatsbibl. Clm 24164, a carefully written Italian text:

1. De regulis iuris, fol. 1r-27r: 'Vicarius Iesu Christi qui totius ecclesie monarcha omnium Christianorum supremus et unicus patriarcha in monarchia vero imperii dudum est, quod non multum laboravit ad sui iuris dubia decidenda'.

2. Liber Sextus, fol. 48v-85r: Rubric: 'Incipit lectura domini Baldi super Sexto'. 'Gratia per papam facta et nondum scripta in solita litterarum forma vel scripta sed non bullata non expirat morte pape'.

3. Clementinae, fol. 35r-48r: Rubric: 'Baldus super Clementinis. De constitutionibus'. 'Constitutiones que occultantur non ligant etiam si conditor velit ligare'. In Vat. lat. 1398, the incipit reads: 'Nota quod constitutiones que occultantur non ligant etiam si conditor velit ligare'.

The commentaries on the Sext and Clementines are sketchy and not of great juristic interest. In addition, Baldus wrote additiones or apostillae to the Speculum iuris of Guilelmus Durantis,⁽⁶³⁾ to the Novella in Sextum and Mercuriales of Johannes Andreae,⁽⁶⁴⁾ and to the consilia of Oldradus de Ponte.⁽⁶⁵⁾ He also compiled an index to the apparatus of Pope Innocent IV, the Margarita or, as he may have named it, Repertorium super Innocentium compilatum et additionatum.⁽⁶⁶⁾ It is printed before or after Innocent's Commentary in most editions. He also compiled a Repertorium iuris that may be primarily canonistic if one may judge the contents from its incipit: 'Abbatis electio qualiter fiat? De iure civili fit per monachos'.⁽⁶⁷⁾

Baldus wrote other brief canonistic tracts, and more will probably come to light as detailed manuscript catalogues are produced. The recent catalogue of the College of Spain's manuscripts has uncovered several canonistic texts of which the most important seems to be an excerpt of dicta from the Apparatus of Innocent IV:⁽⁶⁸⁾

4. Dicta Innocentii papae IV super decretalibus cum additionibus Baldi de Ubaldis. Bologna, College of Spain, 83, fol. 397v-407v: 'Hec sunt dicta domini Innocentii pape super decretalibus per patrem et dominum meum dominum Baldum de Perusio. Nota quod licet administratoribus et ordinariis iudicibus ratione casuum emergentium leges egredi'.

4. Commentary on the Libri feudorum

If one may judge by its manuscript tradition and its printing history, Baldus' Commentary on the Libri feudorum was his most important single work.⁽⁶⁹⁾ He published it in 1393 while teaching at Pavia under the patronage of Giangaleazzo Visconti.⁽⁷⁰⁾ The rubrics of the manuscripts almost always name it a Lectura super usibus feudorum, which conforms to the name the Libri feudorum were most often given, Liber usus feudorum.⁽⁷¹⁾ In the last twenty years of his life, Baldus devoted much time and energy to feudal matters, especially in his consilia. Feudal law had become of great practical importance in the Duchy of Milan, but the aristocracy from other regions of Italy lived under regimes in which feudal law was flourishing as well.⁽⁷²⁾ There is some evidence that Baldus had been called upon to resolve problems of feudal law long before his stay in Pavia. Mattaeus de Afflittis reported on a consilium that Baldus wrote about a problem of feudal law during the reign of Queen Joanna I of Naples (1343-1382).⁽⁷³⁾

Giangaleazzo may have commissioned him to write his commentary, although there is no evidence that Baldus taught feudal law at the university.⁽⁷⁴⁾ In any event, the feudal regime in Milan and its prince, Giangaleazzo, provided Baldus with many occasions to 'consiliare'. Baldus wrote a number of consilia in the period after 1390 in which he discussed and analyzed the feudal rights and privileges of Giangaleazzo. As the manuscript copies of these texts show, he struggled with these matters and only gradually came to understand all the complicated issues involved.⁽⁷⁵⁾

Baldus' work was an enormous success. Cristina Danusso has listed 34 manuscripts in libraries stretching from Spain to Poland and from England to Italy.⁽⁷⁶⁾ Antonio and Raffaele da Volterra produced the first printed edition in Rome ca. 1474, and their edition was quickly followed by seven more before 1500 and fifteen between 1502 and 1585.⁽⁷⁷⁾ As Danusso has demonstrated, there are only minor differences between the manuscript and printed editions.⁽⁷⁸⁾

5. De pace constantiae

Sometime after 1393, Baldus finished his Commentum on the Treaty of Constance (25 June, 1183). In it he referred to his Commentarius on the Libri feudorum as having been completed.⁽⁷⁹⁾ The Treaty of Constance or Acta pacis Constantiae had been occasionally added to the Libri feudorum since the late twelfth century, but usually circulated separately.⁽⁸⁰⁾ Odofredus Denari had provided an important commentary on it in the thirteenth century.⁽⁸¹⁾ By the advent of printing, the Acta pacis Constantiae was commonly added to the end of the Libri feudorum, as it had been in some manuscripts much earlier.⁽⁸²⁾ By not including the Acta pacis Constantiae in his Commentary to the Libri feudorum and by writing a separate commentary on it, Baldus was respecting a long tradition.

The Acta was an important document for establishing the rights of his patron, Giangaleazzo Visconti, because it helped to define the relationship of the duke and the emperor. The emperor had granted the duke an imperial privilege confirming his ducal authority and appointing him imperial vicar in 1395.⁽⁸³⁾ Giangaleazzo claimed a ducal title for himself and argued that all cities and lordships formerly subject to the Visconti vicariate were now subject to him as their feudal lord.⁽⁸⁴⁾ Wenceslaus had granted Giangaleazzo all imperial rights and lordships in Lombardy. He declared that he made this grant with certain knowledge and from his fullness of power, notwithstanding any concessions, constitutions, immunities, liberties, and privileges that anyone might possess.⁽⁸⁵⁾ Visconti's privilege raised several legal problems that had parallels with the Treaty of Constance. It encroached upon the rights of imperial vassals in Lombardy and broke longstanding diplomatic ties between the emperor and local authorities. Some German princes claimed that the emperor did not have the authority to grant such a privilege because it injured the imperial patrimony. Baldus struggled with Giangaleazzo's legal position until the last days of his life. The issue of feudal rights, obligations, and privileges remained important for the next two centuries. Consequently, Baldus' Commentary became the standard interpretation of the Acta and was commonly printed as the Ordinary Gloss in the sixteenth century.⁽⁸⁶⁾

5. Consilia

Alexander Tartagnus reported that Baldus claimed to have earned 15,000 ducats just writing consilia dealing with testamentary substitutions.⁽⁸⁷⁾ If he were paid 100 ducats for each consilium, there is no doubt that he earned significant amounts of money from them. To 'consiliare', 'allegare', and 'dubitare' became a compulsive part of Baldus' professional life. There are ca. 2500 consilia in the printed editions, and at least several hundred more in the manuscripts. A simple calculation taken on the basis of the Barberini manuscripts reveals the extent of Baldus' devotion to the genre. Vallone estimates that the Barberini manuscripts, written between ca. 1380 and 1400, contain ca. 1600 consilia. Baldus had to write a consilium every four and one half days to finish just those in these manuscripts.

Manuscripts

For more than ten years, Vincenzo Colli has been compiling a repertorium-incipitarium of Baldus' consilia in all known manuscripts. Consequently, any conclusions about the transmission of his consilia must be preliminary until Colli has finished his massive project. Only two manuscripts have been analyzed to date: Thomas Izbicki and Julius Kirschner have printed a complete list of consilia in Chicago, University of Chicago, Regenstein Library, 6. There the consilia follow more closely the arrangement of the Brescian-Venetian edition.⁽⁸⁸⁾ Colli has partially analyzed Lucca, Biblioteca Capitolare, 351 that was copied from drafts in the Ubaldi library at Perugia during the fifteenth century.⁽⁸⁹⁾ Both manuscripts contain a large number of consilia that have never been printed.

The richest collection of Baldus' consilia is found in the Fondo Barberini of the Vatican Library. Colli has demonstrated that these manuscripts must have been the ultimate source for the editors. Nonetheless, many questions remain about exactly how they arranged their material.

Colli has demonstrated the chronological sequence of the Barberini manuscripts. This information will be invaluable for following the development of his thought:⁽⁹⁰⁾

Barb. lat. 1405 [--] [a]

Barb. lat. 1403 [- August 1384] [c]

Barb. lat. 1399 [- January 1384] [d]

Barb. lat. 1401 [1388 -] [f]

Barb. lat. 1412 [1389 -] [g]

Barb. lat. 1407 [1390 -] [h]

Barb. lat. 1410 [1391 -]

Barb. lat. 1408 [1396 -]

Barb. lat. 1406 [--]

Barb. lat. 1409 [- April 28, 1400]

Later these Barberini manuscripts were arranged by Baldus' son Francesco, and he labeled the volumes containing consilia written in Perugia with the first twelve letters of the alphabet, a-l.

Of these manuscripts the seven listed above are still extant. The remaining five Barberini manuscripts contain the consilia that he wrote after he arrived in Pavia.⁽⁹¹⁾ Baldus dictated the consilia in these manuscripts to an amanuensis, revised them with his help sometimes the manuscripts give evidence that he corrected texts himself. They are invaluable examples of a working jurist's personal papers and in some cases permit us to follow the evolution of Baldus' thought.⁽⁹²⁾ In addition, Baldus' consilia are scattered among a large number of manuscripts in various libraries.⁽⁹³⁾

Printed Editions

Like Bartolus, Baldus never arranged his consilia for 'publication', and that task was left to the editors and publishers of the first printed editions.⁽⁹⁴⁾ At the end of the fifteenth century, three different editions of his consilia, interspersed with those of other jurists, were printed almost simultaneously in Brescia, Venice and Milan. All three printings are quite rare, and, consequently, scholars have not given them the attention they deserve.⁽⁹⁵⁾ The extraordinary number of consilia presented fifteenth-century editors of Baldus with significant problems. Since he had never arranged his consilia for 'publication', and since his family probably still had copies made by his amanuensis with corrections and deletions by Baldus himself, the manuscripts in the Barberini fond were very likely the indirect source for the printed editions.

By the end of the fifteenth century, there was a demand for printed editions of Baldus' consilia. Boninus de Boninis Ragusius Dalmatini supervised the first edition printed in four volumes at Brescia between July, 1490 and February 1491.⁽⁹⁶⁾ He wrote in a prefatory letter, dated March, 1491:⁽⁹⁷⁾

Verum enimvero haud parvam huiusce muneris atque officii laudem gratiamque videor mihi summo iure posse vindicare, qui nunc, ut que antehac ad communem liberalium studiorum utilitatem contulerim, <c>ommittam quatuor hec preclara ingentiaque Baldi Perusini volumina multis, sed et multo meo cum sumptu atque labore, exemplis quam accuratissime quamque fieri potuit emendatissime impressa proposui.

His efforts may have been herculean, but they were not well received. Angelus Britannicus and his brother Jacobus decided within months that a new edition was needed. Angelus criticized the Brescian edition in his prefatory letter of the Venetian printing:⁽⁹⁸⁾

Arbitror te inscium non esse in hac nostra florentissima urbe Brixia Baldi Perusini iurisconsulti celeberrimi consilia hoc anno impressa fuisse in quibus sive correctoris incuria sive impressorum, quod credibilius est, negligentia qui ut scis non modo litteras et syllabas invertere sed et dictiones immutare . . . Nostre civitatis iurisconsulti . . . hortati sunt me ut opus rursus curarem.

At the end of his letter, Angelus listed four improvements that he made to the Brescian edition:

1. The addition of 178 consilia in a fifth volume;⁽⁹⁹⁾ 2. A table of incipits; 3. 'Additiones' or 'Rubrice'; 4. The correction of twenty thousand errors(!).⁽¹⁰⁰⁾ The Venetian edition was printed between February and June of 1491 and follows the arrangement of the Brescian edition.⁽¹⁰¹⁾ The printers in Brescia were quick to take advantage of Angelus's initiative. In December, 1491 they printed a fifth volume of consilia based on the Venetian printing.⁽¹⁰²⁾

Then in 1489-1493, according to the dates printed at the end of the first and last volumes, Leonardus Pachel issued an expanded edition of Baldus's consilia in Milan.⁽¹⁰³⁾ However, this edition could not have been printed in 1489 because the editor included many new consilia not included in the Brescian and Venetian collections, marking those with an asterisk in the list of incipits not heretofore printed. The asterisk is not absolutely accurate, but, by and large, the consilia not found in the Brescian-Venetian editions are so marked, while all others are not. Ludovicus Peregrinus, who wrote an introductory letter to Pachel's edition, mentioned that he had seen earlier editions,⁽¹⁰⁴⁾ and Pachel himself at the end of his edition called Boninus's edition the first.⁽¹⁰⁵⁾ Since there were no printings before 1490, the 1489 date is a mistake; Pachel's entire edition must date between 1492 and 1493. Pachel wrote in the rubric preceding the list of incipits at the beginning of his edition:

Nos vero ea habuimus Rome ex codicibus reverendissimi d.d. cardinalis Sabelli qui cum longo tempore legationis Perusine officio fungeretur ab ipsius Baldi nepotibus copiam sumpsit.

Pachel had received copies of the consilia from Nicolaus Antiquarius, a medical doctor, who had obtained them from Giovanni Battista Cardinal Savelli. Antiquarius was a native of Perugia. According to his prefatory letter in the Milan edition, the grandsons of Baldus had given their copies of Baldus's consilia to Savelli, who had them copied and arranged in four volumes (perhaps the model for the Brescian-Venetian editions). Because friends of Savelli had given them to printers who produced inferior editions, Antiquarius obtained Savelli's permission to negotiate a proper printing.⁽¹⁰⁶⁾

Itaque cum non solum meruisset a Perusinis obsequium verum etiam statuas et cetera benegestorum insignia inter alias curas Baldi quoque eterne memorie iurisconsulti libros, si quos ille occultius scripsisset ab Petro Juliotto atque Antonio pronepotibus eius . . . conquisivit. Neque magis letari unquam visus est, quam cum illius viri consilia in triginta sex amanuenses⁽¹⁰⁷⁾ -- ut ita dixerim -- libros congesta consequutus est, que statim in quattuor volumina exscribi curavit . . . Qua re petii pro clientele mee iure et pro patrie merito ab ipso Sabello ut integra volumina mihi per eum liceret impressoribus tradere.

If Savelli's manuscripts could be traced, they might shed much light on the genesis of the printed editions.⁽¹⁰⁸⁾

Savelli and other members of his family were important figures in the fifteenth-century Perugia. Pope Paul II sent Giovanni as Protonotarius apostolicus to Siena in 1466. He held this position until 1468.⁽¹⁰⁹⁾ Upon his arrival in Perugia he undertook the task of repairing the aqueduct supplying water to the city and the fountain in the piazza.⁽¹¹⁰⁾ Paul also entrusted matters touching the governance of the university to him, granting him the right to determine professorial salaries in 1466 and the responsibility of reforming the Studium in 1467.⁽¹¹¹⁾ Although there is no evidence for Savelli's having attended law school, his interest in Baldus's consilia and in university affairs would lead one to believe that he did. Pope Sixtus IV elevated him to the cardinal-deaconate of SS. Vito and Modesto in 1480 and transferred him to S. Nicola in Carcere in 1483. At the time he became cardinal he was also given the office of papal legate to the province of Perugia. His relationship with people of Perugia remained particularly good. Upon his elevation to the cardinalate, the city granted Savelli and his family a number of honors.⁽¹¹²⁾ It is not surprising that the descendants of Baldus would have entrusted their manuscripts to him.

The Milanese printing differs considerably from its two predecessors. It is not possible to discern any order, thematic or chronological, in the arrangement of the consilia in the first two printings. Pachel completely rearranged the consilia for his new edition, but he too did not impose any discernable pattern. Most of the rearrangement may simply be reflect a desire to have 500 consilia in each part.⁽¹¹³⁾ The question remains open whether Pachel changed the order of the Brescian and Venetian editions to conform to the order he found in manuscripts that Antiquarius gave him. Pachel added a substantial number of new consilia. The Brescian-Venetian printing contained 2036 consilia (some, however, are not numbered), while the Milanese added ca. 464 (with the same caveat).⁽¹¹⁴⁾ Only one later sixteenth-century edition added anything to the Milanese collection;⁽¹¹⁵⁾ a seventeenth-century Liber sextus of his consilia increased the number of printed consilia modestly (see below).

The importance of the Brescian-Venetian editions lies in the evidence that they provide for illuminating the shaping of a massive collection of consilia by fifteenth-century printers. The transmission of Baldus's consilia had been concealed from us, because later printers decided that the Milanese edition was more complete than the Brescian-Venetian and after 1493 published only its order and form.⁽¹¹⁶⁾ Although the earlier editions were not entirely forgotten, all the sixteenth-century editions follow the Milanese model.⁽¹¹⁷⁾ It becomes the 'vulgate' edition of the consilia. However, it is clear that Baldus had nothing to do with the arrangement of his consilia. There is some evidence that the first two editions were used fairly widely in the sixteenth century. Thomas Diplovatatus had a copy of either the Brescian or the Venetian edition in his library and cited consilia from it in his lives of Baldus and Hostiensis.⁽¹¹⁸⁾ Colli has demonstrated that Felinus Sandeus did not possess the Milan edition when he worked on Baldus' consilia in a manuscript now in Lucca, Biblioteca Capitolare 351.⁽¹¹⁹⁾

Liber Sextus of Baldus' Consilia

Flavius Tortus published a 'sixth book' of Baldus' consilia in 1602 that was probably meant to supplement the five books of the vulgate edition.⁽¹²⁰⁾ The book is rather rare.⁽¹²¹⁾ Maffei had noted that most of the consilia are not Baldus', and Vallone determined that only 26 of 129 can be attributed to him, although not all with certainty.⁽¹²²⁾ Vallone also compared Vat. Barb. lat. 1396 with the Liber Sextus and discovered that many of the consilia in the 1602 edition are also in this manuscript, although Tortus may not have used it for his printing. Between 1602 and the twentieth century, none of Baldus' consilia was printed. Modern scholars have edited a small number of them.⁽¹²³⁾

The consilia are Baldus' most important works, and scholars have yet to take full advantage of the richness of this source for the history of the Ius commune. Since we can date many of them, at least roughly, they can demonstrate how Baldus' thought evolved, and the problems that he faced interpreting the Ius proprium through the Ius commune. The consilia also provide an invaluable guide to the legal questions that most frequently bedeviled jurists in late fourteenth-century Italy. Our knowledge of Baldus' achievement will remain incomplete until we have thoroughly explored them.

On p. 328, Baldus' will names him 'de Ubaldis' twice.

8. Since several jurists repeat this fact but give ages ranging from 15 to 17 years, the manuscripts of Angelus' Commentary should be checked. Cf. Savigny, Geschichte 6.209.

9. On the basis of a clearly erroneous date of 1388 in Baldus' Commentary to the Cod. 5.7.1: 'quam dedi domino Baldo qui recepit insignia doctoratus anno domini 1388, mensis Jul. In vigilia sanctorum Petri et Pauli', Savigny, Geschichte 210, concluded that 1388 must have been 1344, since that Arabic 8 and 4 were easily confused in fifteenth-century manuscripts. His conjecture was accepted until the work of Maffei in note 11 below.

10. There is a note in Vat. Barb. lat. 1399, fol. 175v, which states that Baldus held a 'repetitio' at Bologna in which he differed with his master: 'Super ista questione uide omnino Baldum . . . in repetitione quam fecit Bononie de lege, Pater filium, ff. eodem titulo [Dig. 5.2.14] ubi hac subtiliter discutit reprobando Bartolum ibi tenentem contrariam opinionem Jacobi Butrigarii'. Cited by Vallone, 'La raccolta Barberini' 82. Having held a 'repetitio' in Bologna does not mean that Baldus ever taught there.

15. Savigny, Geschichte 6.194-195. Savigny assumed that Baldus finished his legal training in 1344 and was forced to assume that he studied in Pisa for a time.

16. See note 7 above for the text. Several consilia of Johannes Palliarensis are found in the library of the College of Spain in Bologna, see I codici del Collegio di Spagna di Bologna, edd. Johannes' consilia were printed among those of Federicus Petrucci and are linked in these three manuscripts with other jurists who taught in Perugia. Consequently, Baldus most likely studied with Johannes there.

In his will, dated six months before his death, he is described as 'incola civitatis papie in qua legendo iura civilia in felici studio papie', see Scalvanti, 'Notizie e documenti sulla vita di Baldo' 328.

21. Cod. 6.33. See Fodale, 'Baldo degli Ubaldi' 78-81. Baldus' second consilium of 1380 never seems to have had an independent textual tradition in legal texts but was printed in Odorico Raynaldi, Annales ecclesiastici (Cologne 1593) 17.14-15. Odorico connects Baldus' consilium with Johannes de Legnano's. The incipit is: 'Quod tumultuans populus Romanos'. Scalvanti, `Notizie e documenti sulla vita di Baldo' 223-233 has doubts about whether the text Odorico printed was written in 1380. Scalvanti discusses the consilium printed at Cod. 6.33 and Johannes' contribution on pp. 233-236. He thinks that the consilium printed in the Codex was written in 1380.

Fodale, 'Baldo degli Ubaldi' 81-83, believes that Baldus took possession of the castle in 1386. These events merit further study. Fodale did not seem to know of Paulus de Castro's testimony that Baldus never obtained possession. Since Paulus was Baldus' student and heard his lectures, his evidence is important. 37. Vat. Barb. lat. 1403 also contains similar notations and additions. The additions were written in two distinct hands. Vallone, 'La raccolta Barberini' passim, has attempted to identify Baldus' hand and the hands of his amanuenses in the Barberini manuscripts. Jolande Rummer, 'A Fourteenth-Century Legal Opinion', The Quarterly Journal of the Library of Congress 25 (1968) 178-193, published photographs of Baldus' hand, probably written ca. 1370.

46. If Baldus wrote a complete commentary to the Institutiones, manuscripts have not survived. Domenico Maffei has shown that the printed editions of a commentary attributed to Baldus were not his but Bartolomeo da Novara († 1408) (editio princeps Cologne 1477 [Hain *2271 (N. B. printer's error in n.46, *22710)]). Although the commentary in Lyon, Bibliothèque municipale 385 (n.46) is Bartolomeo's, it is attributed to Baldus (Maffei, "Bartolomeo da Novara" p. 15 n.31). Uppsala C532 contains Baldus' commentary on Book four of the Codex (Maffei, "Bartolomeo da Novara" p. 15 n.31 in fine).

For a complete discussion of these points, See Domenico Maffei, "Bartolomeo de Novara († 1408) autore della 'Lectura institvtionvm' attribuita a Baldo delgi Ubaldi," Rivista di storia del diritto italiano 63 (1990) 5-22, reprinted in Studi di storia delle università de delle letteratura giuridica (Bibliotheca Eruditorum, 1; Goldbach: Keip Verlag, 1995) 207-224; Baldus' commentary to the books of the Digestum vetus: Madrid, B.N. 2137; Munich, Staatsbibl. lat. 3062, 6538, 6640; Rome, Bibl. 48. E.g. Lectura super primo, secundo, et tertio Codicis (Venice 1474). Lucca, Bibl. Cap. 339 contains the first three books. Of the ca. forty manuscripts of the Baldus' Commentarium to the Codex that Dolezalek lists, none contains more than three books. The nine books of the Codex were printed sine loco et anno (Hain *2279); the individual books were printed frequently (Hain 2280-2300) before 1500.

49. See, for example, M 1.10, 1.78, 1.110, 1.168, 1.234, 1.413, to give just a small sample. 55. Eleven tracts of Baldus were printed in the great sixteenth-century compilation of legal tractates, the Tractatus universi iuris (Venice 1583-1584), listed by G. Colli, Per una bibliografia dei trattati giuridici pubblicati nel XVI secolo: Indici dei 'Tractatus Universi Iuris' (Ius nostrum 20; Milano 1994) 211: Apparatus substitutionum, 8.1, fol. 201r-211v; Regulae generales statutorum, 2, fol. 155r-157v; De aditione cum inventario, 8.2, fol. 323r-v; De carceribus, 11.1, fol. 200v-201v; De constituto, 6.1, fol. 38r-39r; De iure prothomiseos, 17, fol. 18r-20r; De pactis, 6.1, fol. 2r-8r; De sindicatu officialium, 7, fol. 224v-226v; De statutis, 2, fol. 86ra-154v; De tabellionibus, 3, fol. 364v-366v; De testibus, 4, fol. 71r-73r. 60. At this point the transition from one section of the Decretals of Gregory IX is clear in the printed edition, but in Munich, Staatsbibl. Clm 3629, a manuscript of Baldus's Commentary to Books 2 and 3 of the Decretals, on fol. 58r-v, with unnumbered blank folia inserted between, and on fol. 59r-63r, there are two fragments of Baldus. Fol. 58r-v: 'ut erat in casu illius, quando extraneus erat institutus et gravatus . . . non habet locum dicta lex, Omnimodo'. Fol. 59r-63r: 'c. Petimus <C.11 q.1. c.19?> l. Si pretor, de inst. <Cod. 6.25.4 (Si pater)> . . . pro parte testatum et pro parte intestatum'. Vincenzo Colli informs me that this fragment is his commentary on Roman law. Leipzig, Universitätsbibl. 1059 (to Book I) and 1047 (Book II) may contain a different version of his commentary.

95. In his supplement to Hain, J.A. Copinger no. 819 lists an edition of Consilia quaedam (Cologne 1477) of 20 folios; he noted a copy in the University Library at Halle.

96. Hermann Lange, Die Consilien des Baldus de Ubaldis (1400) (Abhandlungen der Akademie der Wissenschaften und der Literatur, Mainz, Geistes- und sozialwissenschaftlichen Klasse 12; Wiesbaden 1973) 18, thinks that Baldus was responsible for the division of his consilia into five volumes.

97. Partes consiliorum primae-quartae (4 volumes; Brescia 1490-1491) (Hain *2330); Lange, Consilien 18, notes that 926 consilia were printed in the Brescia edition, taking this number from Ernst Stampe, Das Zahlkraftrecht der Postglossatorenzeit (Abhandlungen der preussischen Akademie, Phil. Hist. Klasse 165; Berlin 1928) 24, n. 1, who saw only the first two parts of the Brescian edition of 1490 at the University Library at Greifswald, hence 926 consilia (if he had added correctly, 924). The Brescian volumes number (which means, since some are not numbered and other numbers are skipped, that the numbered consilia can only roughly give us the number of consilia in the volumes) in part 1: 453, part 2: 470, part 3: 453, part 4: 503. Numbers revised according to those of Colli, 'Il Cod. 351', 256 n. 4.

I have seen copies of volumes 1 and 2 in Munich, Staatsbibliothek and a complete copy (including the later part 5: 172 consilia) in Vienna, Nationalbibliothek. The catalogue of incunabula in Italian libraries Indice generale degli incunaboli delle biblioteche d'Italia 5 (Rome 1972) lists copies in nine Italian libraries. There is also a copy in Grenoble, Bibl. mun., and, presumably, a copy of parts one and two may still be in Greifswald. Canning, Baldus de Ubaldis 12, cites a complete copy of this edition from the Library of Gonville and Gaius College in Cambridge. On the Brescian edition see P. Veneziani, La tipografia a Brescia nel XV secolo (Florence 1986) 77-78.

98. Partes consiliorum primae-quintae (5 vols; Venice 1491) Hain *2329. Hain lists only parts 1, 2, and 5. I have located the entire edition in Eichstätt, Universitätsbibliothek (Signature: D I 958-960; in 3 volumes). Further copies can be found in Lucca, Bibl. cap., Trevisio, Bibl. com., and Rome, Bibl. naz. Parts 1 and 2 are in Munich, Cambridge, Harvard Law Library, and the Library of Congress, Washington, D.C.; parts 3-5 are in Augsburg, Staatsbibl. and Modena, Bibl. Estense.

99. Volume five actually contains 171 numbered consilia; the index to volume 5 lists 179.

100. Stampe, Zahlkraftrecht 24-33, printed five consilia from the Frankfurt 1585 edition and collated them with the Brescian edition. As his notes demonstrate, there are, in fact, many mistakes in the Brescian edition. Cf. Canning, Baldus de Ubaldis 13.

101. Except for slight differences in the numbering of consilia; parts 1 and 2 are the same; part 3: 450, part 4: 502.

102. (Hain *2230); See Veneziani, La tipografia 100. According to the colophon, Boninus did not participate in the printing of the last volume: 'Consiliorum quinta pars nuperrime elucubrata ac diligentis castigatione emendata cum ipso originali collatione habita per D. presbyterum Baptistam de Farfengo. Brixie impressa die xvii. men. Dec. Mccclxxxxi'. I have located the fifth volume in three libraries: Vienna, Nationalbibliothek (Signature: Ink. 11.B.5), Mantua, Bibl. com. and Padua, Bibl. univ.

103. Partes consiliorum primae-quintae (5 vols. Milan 1493) Hain *2328. This edition seems to be even more rare than the first two. There are complete copies in Munich (2 copies of part 1; a single copy of 2-5) and Vienna, Nationalbibliothek, signature Ink. 10.B.18, and incomplete copies in Namur, Sémin., Madrid, Bibl. nac.; parts 1 and 2 in Washington, D.C., The Library of Congress; parts 3-5 in Aberdeen, University Library; part one in Rome, Bibl. naz. and Cambrai, Bibl. mun.

104. Vincenzo Bini, Memorie storiche della Perugina Università degli studi e dei suoi professori (Perugia 1816) 129, records a printing in Padua 1486. There is no evidence of its existence.

105. He wrote: 'Consilia infrascripta numero xxii. non sunt stampata in prima impressione consiliorum Baldi facta Brixie per Boninum de Boninis, sed solummodo ista fuerunt addita in secunda impressione facta per Angelum et Jacobum de Britannicis'.

106. (Hain *2328), vol. 1, unfoliated (see note 85 for details on copies).

107. 'Amanuenses libros' must mean manuscript, not printed, books. Robert Feenstra has suggested to me in a letter that 'triginta sex' could have the same meaning as the French 'trente-six', that is a 'great many'. Savelli may have had access to a collection of Baldus's consilia written for specific cases and confirmed with his seal. These might not have been bound together. Contemporary examples of such consilia are found today in many Italian libraries: e. g. Florence, Bibl. naz. Magliabecchi 173.

108. Colli, 'Il Cod. 351', 276-278, discusses the letter and the manuscripts of Savelli. He is doubtful that four manuscripts containing all the consilia ever existed. Colli believes that Pierto Antonio Castiglione probably was the moving force for the new edition. Vallone, 'La raccolta Barberini' 80 n.21, misread what I wrote and thinks that I believe the Vatican manuscripts were the copies made for Savelli.

114. Colli, 'Il Cod. 351', 256, has counted the consilia as a part of his project to list the incipits; I take the numbers from him.

115. An edition printed in Lyon 1559, under the editorship of Matthaëus Antonianus published a consilium at the end of book 4. He noted: 'Hoc responsum numquam antea editum a me vero ex sterquilino nostri Marchi desepultum'. The consilium begins: 'Ad evidentiam premittendum est cum queritur an ille qui intulit alicui aliquod vulnus'. For information about the Liber Sextus of Baldus' consilia see Popes, Canonists, and Texts XX p.10.

116. Until Il Cigno undertook the reprinting of Baldus' works, the most commonly available edition of Baldus's consilia was Venice, 1575-1576, reprinted by Bottega d'Erasmus (Torino 1970).

117. A. Campitelli and F. Liotta, 'Notizia del Ms. Vat. lat. 8069', Annali di storia del diritto 5-6 (1961-62) 387-406 at p. 391 n. 24 examined the editions of Venice 1526, Milan 1543, Lyon 1548, Venice 1575, Venice 1580, Frankfurt 1589, Venice 1608. I have also seen Trino 1516, Lyon 1540, Lyon 1559. I have not been able to find any trace of an edition printed in Pavia 1499 recorded by Bini and Mazzuchelli and mentioned by Campitelli and Liotta. This may be a volume of Angelus de Ubaldis' consilia published in Pavia 1499 (Hain *15866).

118. In his life of Baldus, De claris iuris consultis, ed. F Schulz, H. Kantorowicz, G. Rabotti (Studia Gratiana, 10; Bologna 1968) 302: 'Et vide de Baldo in consiliis Baldi in consilio 287 incipit "Comes Bellimontis" in 3. volumine in fine <= Brescia-Venice 3.289, Milan 1.337>'. Also in his life of Hostiensis, p. 143: Brescia-Venice 2.166 = Milan 4.500. Cf. Canning, Baldus de Ubaldis 13 and Colli, 'Il Cod. 351', 282 n. 47.

119. Colli, 'Il Cod. 351' 277-278.

120. Volumen sextum consiliorum sive responsorum (Venice 1602).

121. I have listed, with the help of Domenico Maffei and Filippo Liotta, four copies of the book in Pennington, 'Baldus de Ubaldis' Appendix II, p. 10 (Aldershot 1993).

122. Pennington, loc. cit. Vallone, 'La raccolta Barberini' 102.

123. Pennington, 'Baldus de Ubaldis' Appendix I, p. 9. Vallone, 'La raccolta Barberini' pp. 130-135, lists 84 unedited consilia from the Barberini manuscripts; when Colli has completed his Incipitario we will know exactly how many of his consilia have never been printed.
