

Medieval English Towns

Florilegium

The aim of the Medieval English Towns site is to provide historical information about cities and towns in England during the Middle Ages, with particular but not exclusive emphasis on medieval boroughs of East Anglia and on social, political and constitutional history. A growing selection of primary documents (translated into English) relevant to English urban history is included.

The image above is an edited version of a line drawing by Mary Houston, based on an illustration in the Luttrell Psalter, commissioned ca.1325 by a Lincolnshire knight. Although the medieval artist's intent was just to create a generalized representation of a town of that period – with churches, houses, taverns and market square, all surrounded by defensive walls – he may have conjured up mental pictures of Stamford or Lincoln when executing the illumination.

RECENT PUBLICATION: PERSONAL ENDORSEMENT

Those with an interest in church history or in local history will find a valuable research resource in the CD-ROM English Parish Churches. Volume 1: East Anglia South produced by Dr. Philip Lindley and Alex Moseley and issued by Brepols Publishers, as the first in an intended series (the second due out in 2004). Built around a collection of photographs taken by Dr. Donna Chaproniere, showing exterior shots and interior details of some 300 churches, accessible through a range of navigational tools, the CD-ROM also incorporates an excellent set of introductory essays describing the factors involved in the development of Suffolk and the construction and enlargement of parish churches, some of which are among the finest in England. An extensive glossary is also included. For further information, visit the Brepols Web site.

Resources on this site

Introduction to the history of medieval boroughs

(image-heavy page – please be patient)

Problems of definition | Continuity or creation? | Wiks, burhs, and ports
Planned/planted towns | Growth of self-government | Urban economy | Urban society

Capsule histories of selected towns

Norwich

- Calendar of customs of Norwich

King's Lynn

- Lynn by-laws
- Oaths of officers and burgesses
- Rental of community property, 1391

Great Yarmouth

- Yarmouth by-laws
- Register of the Hospital of St. Mary

Ipswich

- Account of the setting up of self-government in A.D. 1200
- Calendar of usages and customs of Ipswich
- Oaths of officers and burgesses
- Account of revenues and expenditures, 1446/47

Colchester

Maldon

- Ancient usages and customs of the borough of Maldon

York

Florilegium Urbanum

A selection of primary documents, in modern English translation, illustrating aspects of urban society.

THE MEN BEHIND THE MASQUE: Office-holding in East Anglian boroughs, 1272-1460

An in-depth study of the character of government in six medieval towns

Glossary

Browse the glossary by clicking on that link, or choose a term from the click-down list and hit the "Find" button

Biographical Master List

About the author

Links to other sites

1. Bibliographies

- The Urban Past: An International Urban History Bibliography. IV The Medieval City
- Medieval history: Freedom and the City
- Anglo-Saxon History: A Select Bibliography. Section P: Land, Towns, and Trade
- Fifteenth Century Life: An Annotated Bibliography
- Medieval Trade and Industry - Bibliography

2. General urban history

- History of Western Civilization: Medieval Society: The Towns
(Page on society includes a very general introduction to distinguishing features of medieval European towns)
- The Development of Towns
- Medieval Sourcebook: The Rise of Towns
- On the earlier origins of English towns
- Anglo-Saxon England. Settlement - rural and town life
- Domesday England Map of Towns
- How urban was medieval England?
- The Middle Ages – Town Life
- Medieval Towns and Cities
- Medieval England - daily life in medieval towns
- Town Life in Colchester, London, Sandwich and Coventry
- The Medieval Fiefdom
(includes brief, general sections related to towns: The Fortification of the Town Walls, The Town Church and Its Effect on the People, The Medieval Craftsman, The Town Merchants)
- English medieval boroughs: privileged urban communities
-

(particularly the section "Churches in an Historic Town")

(These studies cannot be accessed directly, but only through the Archaeology Data Service CBA Research Reports front page, which leads to a listing of reports available in PDF format)

○

(These studies cannot be accessed directly, but only through the Archaeology Data Service CBA Occasional Papers front page, which leads to a listing of reports available in PDF format)

- Morphological Regions in English Medieval Towns
- A Survey of the History of English Place-names
- Medieval Towns
(a brief Marxist interpretation, part of a much larger page on Historical Materialism)
- The Domesday Book Online

- Domesday Book and Beyond: Three Essays in the Early History of England
(Maitland's classic study of English social structure and administration in the decades under the Norman-Angevin kings)
- Bracton: On the Laws and Customs of England
(although not strictly a source on urban history, much of what Bracton has to say is relevant to to judicial administration in English towns)

3. Urban economy and society

- Rural and urban elites in England during the later Middle Ages
- Urban Economic Regulation and Economic Morality in Medieval England
- The Law Merchant and the Fair Court of St. Ives, 1270-1324
- Gazetteer of markets and fairs in England and Wales to 1516
- Markets and fairs in Britain and Ireland before 1216
- The Marketing of Grain in England, 1250-1350
- Medieval Trade and Industry - Seminar reports
- Joining the medieval fleet
(shipbuilding at medieval ports)
- Medieval Sourcebook: Coinage Regulations, c. 902-925
- Medieval Sourcebook: The Laws of London, 978 (regulations concerning minting in towns)
- Medieval Sourcebook: Statuta de Mercatoribus (Statutes of Merchants), 11 Edw. I (1283) & 13 Edw. I (1285)
- Medieval Commodities
- The Rise of Capitalism, ca. 1300-1500: The Guild System
- Guilds and Commerce
- Medieval Guilds and Economics
(several brief articles broadly relevant to aspects of borough economy)
- The Symbiosis of Towns and Textiles: Urban Institutions and the Changing Fortunes of Cloth Manufacturing in the Low Countries and England, 1280 - 1570
- The 'Industrial Crisis' of the English Textile Towns, c.1290-c.1330
- Women in Medieval Guilds
(another copy here)
- Medieval Coal and Industry: Newcastle and the North East, 1100AD-1500AD
- Dominion and Domination of the Gentle Sex: The Lives of Medieval Women – The Marketplace (on the role of women in trade and commerce)
- Medieval Domestic Life
(a large number of brief articles, many broadly relevant to aspects of borough society)
- The Wife of Bath and the Painting of Lions
- Tales of the Middle Ages: Inns and Taverns
- Medieval Professions
(also found here)

- Corpus of Middle English Prose and Verse: English guilds
(Toulmin Smith's classic study of socio-religious guilds)
- Gazetteer of the Religious Guilds and Services of Late Medieval Yorkshire
- Medieval Sourcebook: Concerning Loans From The Jews
- Market Towns and the Countryside in Late Medieval England
- Price-setting in English Borough Markets, 1349-1500
- The Rise and Fall of Markets in Southeast England
- Spoilheap: Selected Themes in Archaeology
(includes information on the medieval pottery industry and medieval burial practices)
- The Construction and History of Medieval Timber-framed Houses in England and Wales
- Medieval Sourcebook: Reginald of Durham: Life of St. Goderic [12th Cent]
- Medieval Sourcebook: Roger of Hoveden: The Persecution of Jews, 1189
- The Heritage of University Planning: Medieval Colleges
- Pilgrims Passing To and Fro: The Lives and Times of the Canterbury Tales Pilgrims

4. Particular English towns

a) LONDON

- History of the Corporation of London
- A Narrative History of London
- Medieval London
- Lord Mayors of London
- Governing London: Lessons from 1000 Years (pdf file)
- The Keeping of the Peace in the City of London (circa A.D. 1309)
- Penalties for a breach of the peace in London, 1340
- Saxon London in a tale of two cities
- When London became a European capital
- Historical Gazetteer of London before the Great Fire
- Medieval Architecture in London
- London Bridge, 1500s
- The History of London Bridge (includes a virtual reality reconstruction, requiring a plug-in)
- Medieval Sourcebook: Leges Edwardis Confessoris: The Liberties of London, c. 1120
- Medieval Sourcebook: Grant of Tax Liberties to London, 1133
- Subsidy Roll 1319, Cheap ward
- Medieval Sourcebook: List of Tolls Exacted at Billingsgate, c.978-1016
- Medieval Sourcebook: Grants of Privileges at London to the Hanse of Cologne, 1157-1194
- Medieval Sourcebook: Grant of a New Fair at Westminster, 1248

- Medieval Merchants etc. in (mainly) London
- Livery Companies of the City of London
- City Livery companies
- Medieval Sourcebook: Grant to London Abolishing the Weavers' Guild, 1202
- Ordinances of the Cordwainers, 1272
- Renewed Ordinances for the Cordwainers of the city of London, 1303
- Articles of the Cordwainers, 1375
- An anthology of Chancery English: Petition of the Mercers of London
- A Brief History of the Worshipful Company of Bakers
- The Worshipful Company of Pewterers: The Company, Past and Present
- The Worshipful Company of Barbers: The history of the Company
- Featherbedds and Flock Bedds: A History of the Worshipful Company of Upholders of the City of London
- The Social Position of the Surgeon in London, 1350-1450
- Family Strategies in Medieval London: Financial Planning and the Urban Widow, 1123-1473
- Narratives of a Nurturing Culture: Parents and Neighbors in Medieval England (considers London evidence)
- A Wrestling Match in the City of London A.D. 1222
- Lease granted to Geoffrey Chaucer in 1374
- Richard Whittington
- Extracts from Inquisitions Taken at the Trial of John Northampton
(the trial concerns actions taken by Northampton when mayor of London; see also accusations made against Northampton)
- Why Thomas Corbett stood in the Pillory
- London Lickpenny
(a satirical medieval poem about London)
- Medieval London's Military History

b) SOUTHERN AND WESTERN ENGLAND

- Medieval Dartford
- Dartford Town Archive: Medieval Period c.1000-1500
- The History of Canterbury
- The Canterbury Tour
- Canterbury Buildings
- Roman and Anglo-Saxon Canterbury Reconstructed
- The Cinque Ports
- The Cinque Ports
- The Ancient Cinque Ports of England
- Sandwich Studies
- Excavations on the Site of the Leper Hospital, New Romney

- History of Rye
- Medieval Dover
- Faversham Charters
- Hastings Town
- Chichester Timeline: Saxons, Normans and Tudors
- Historic Winchester
- Medieval Sourcebook: The Law of the Fullers & Weavers of Winchester, 1209
- The Council, Siege and Rout of Winchester
- Saxon Southampton
- Hamwic
- Medieval Southampton
- Medieval House Project
(based on the Medieval Merchant's House at Southampton)
- Medieval Sourcebook: Southampton Guild Organization, 14th Century
- An anthology of Chancery English: Petition of the Mayor and Citizens of Southampton
- Medieval Basingstoke
- Salisbury - The Cathedral City
- Medieval Sourcebook: Documents of the Church of Salisbury in the Early 13th Century
- History of Shaftesbury
- Marlborough Charter, 1204
- Shepton Mallet: The Middle Ages
(not strictly a medieval borough, but an example of a small market town)
- The Medieval Jews of Exeter
- Gild of the Cordwainers, Exeter, 1481
- Dartmouth before 1860
- Bristol: The Old City
- Bristol: Historical Perspective
- The Siege of Bristol and other matters from the Gesta Stephani
- The Widening Gate: Bristol and the Atlantic Economy, 1450-1700
- Bristol's medieval church dedications
- An anthology of Chancery English: Bristol Deposition
- Saxon Bath: The Legacy of Rome and the Saxon Rebirth
- Bath Past
(A collection of articles, many on medieval Bath)

c) EASTERN ENGLAND

- Vikings and the new East Anglian towns
- (This study cannot be accessed directly, but only through the Archaeology Data Service CBA Research Reports front page, which leads to a listing of reports available in PDF format)
- The History of Norwich

- Norwich, the Old City
- Norwich 800
- Photographs of Old Norwich
- The Foundation of Norwich Cathedral
(includes maps of Saxon and Norman Norwich)
- Medieval Sourcebook: Thomas of Monmouth: The Life and Miracles of St. William of Norwich, 1173
- The Catholic Encyclopedia: St. William of Norwich
- Medieval Cromer
- Great Yarmouth's History
- Great Yarmouth History (Crisp)
- Yarmouth Archaeology, 1990
- Palmer's Perustration of Great Yarmouth
- History of the Waites of Lynn
- Some Background on the Life of Margery Kempe
(resident of medieval Lynn)
- Margery Kempe
- Excerpts from *The Book of Margery Kempe
- Notes on the Book of Margery Kempe
- Mapping Margery Kempe: A Guide to Late Medieval and Spiritual Life
- The Churches of Ipswich
- Medieval Sourcebook: Charter of Privileges Granted to Men of Dunwich, 1200
- A Short History of Clare, Suffolk
- St. Edmundsbury: Our Historic Past
- Moyses Hall Museum: History of the Building
- Medieval Sourcebook: A Dispute Over the Exaction of Taxes at Bury St. Edmunds, 1198
- Abbey of St. Edmund
(includes a virtual reality reconstruction, requiring a plug-in)
- The Abbey Church of St. Edmund, Bury St. Edmunds
- Medieval Colchester
(a very rich site with authoritative material by the leading expert on the subject)
- Colchester Town Wall - A Virtual Tour
- Maldon: The First Two Thousand Years
- Maeldune: Light on Maldon's Distant Past
- Cambridge History
- Medieval Sourcebook: Charter Granted to the Citizens of Cambridge, 1201
- The History of Huntingdon 1000 to 1599
- Ramsey Town: History between 1100-1600

d) CENTRAL ENGLAND (including the Welsh Marches)

- A History of the City of Gloucester
- The Story of Gloucester
- Worcester - The Founding of the Faithful City
- The Worcester Story
- The City of Worcester's Historic Defenses and Religious Sites
- Medieval Towns in Herefordshire
- The Story of Oxford
- Oxfordshire County Council: The Story of Oxford
- Medieval Oxford
- A Brief History of Oxford and its Castle
- An anthology of Chancery English: Petition of the Weavers of Oxford
- Medieval Sourcebook: Grant of a Gild to the Oxford Cordwainers, 1175
- An anthology of Chancery English: Petition of the Citizens of Oxford
- Lincoln diocese documents, 1450-1544: Will, 1459, of Henry Philip, alderman of Oxford
- Medieval Bridges in Oxfordshire, England
- Medieval Hospitals in Oxfordshire, England
- Wallingford: a brief history
- The Story of Wallingford
- Wallingford's History
- The History of Stevenage
- The St. Albans Archaeology and History Site
- History of the Town and Manor of Hungerford
- General History of Rugby
- Highlights of Banbury's History
- A History of the County of Warwick: Volume VIII: The City of Coventry and Borough of Warwick
- Coventry History
- The Historic City of Coventry
- Chronology of the Coventry Area
- History of Kenilworth
- A Brief History of Northampton
- Wolverhampton 985-1985
- A note on the wool trade in Wolverhampton
- BBC Online - Around Leicester - History
- Leicester Civic History: The Making of a City
- Leicester: The Dignity of a City 655-1926
-
- (This study cannot be accessed directly, but only through the Archaeology Data Service CBA Research Reports front page, which leads to a listing of reports available in PDF format)
- Historical Overview of Hereford
- Pre-Conquest Nottingham
- Nottingham, the City

- An Itinerary of Nottingham
- The Mayor of Nottingham - History
- Sheriffs of Nottingham - History and Information
- St. Peter's parish, Nottingham
- The Rectors of St. Peter's Church, Nottingham. Part One: 1241 - 1499
- Brown's History of Nottinghamshire: Nottingham
- Brown's History of Nottinghamshire: Newark
- Brown's History of Nottinghamshire: Retford
- Piercy's History of Retford
- Derby's Heritage: Timeline
- Lincolnshire Lay Subsidy, 1332
(includes entries for Boston and Stamford)
- A Brief History of Lincoln
- Boston in Medieval Times
- Boston
- The Early History of Barton Upon Humber

e) NORTHERN ENGLAND

- Chester History Timeline
- Welcome to Chester
- Chester Entry in the Domesday Book
- Chester: A Virtual Stroll Round the Walls
- Manchester History
- Clues to Medieval Manchester's vigour
- Medieval Towns of the North East, 1100AD-1500AD
- York - Heritage and History
- City of York
- Medieval York
- A Short History of York
- A Brief History of York
- History of the ancient city of York
- A History of York from Baine's Gazetteer (1823)
- Jorvik
- Layers of History: A Virtual Tour of York, England
- City of York Walls Tour
- Secrets Beneath Your Feet: Medieval York c. AD 1067 - c. 1550
- Historic York - A Guided Tour of a Beautiful City
- Medieval Sourcebook: Ephraim of Bonn: The York Massacre 1189-90
- York Bridgmasters' Accounts
- The Medieval Carmelite Priory at York: A chronology
- Barley Hall (York)
- The Celebration of the Corpus Christi Festival in York

- York Mystery Plays
- Corpus of Middle English Prose and Verse: The York plays
- York PSim (Pageant Simulator)
(a fascinating map-based simulation of the progress of the pageant wagons through the streets of York.)
- A Brief History of Beverley
- Medieval Sourcebook: Charter Granted to Men of Beverley, 1130
- City of Durham History
- Buried with the Friars (Hull)
- A brief history of Richmond
- Newcastle upon Tyne History
- Tour of the Medieval Newcastle Quayside
- A History of the Mayors and Lord Mayors of Newcastle upon Tyne
- Berwick upon Tweed History
- A Short History of Gateshead
- Congleton Borough Charters
- Stamford: The Development of an Anglo-Scandinavian Borough
- The verdict of those of greater standing of the town of Stamford in Kesteven in the third year of the reign of King Edward
- The History of Barton Upon Humber

5. Selected sites related to medieval cities outside of England

- Historic Cities: Maps and Documents
- Feeding Medieval European Cities, 700-1500
- Medieval Cork
- Medieval Dublin
- History and Antiquities of Dublin
- Newport and its Medieval Ship
- Sigtuna - Royal Stronghold and Early Town
- The History of Birka
- The Hanseatic Town of Visby
- Medieval Sourcebook: The Garment Cutters of Stendal: Guild Law Revision, 1231
- Medieval Sourcebook: Lübeck and Hamburg Treaty, 1241
- Tales from Froissart: Urban Unrest
- Paris at the time of Philippe-Auguste
- Quercy Médiéval - L'histoire du Quercy au Moyen âge
- La Cité de Carcassonne
- Monetary Policies, Guild Labour-Strife, and Compulsory Arbitration during the Decline of the Late-Medieval Flemish Cloth Industry, 1390-1435
- The General Taille of Marseille, 1360-1361: a social and demographic study
- Notaries, courts, and the legal culture of late medieval Marseille

- Cities in History: The Uses of Decorum
- Medieval Cities, Bruges and Florence
- The Statutes of the Commune of Bugelle (Biella) and the Documents Which Have Been Added, part 1
- The Statutes of the Commune of Bugelle (Biella) and the Documents Which Have Been Added, part 2
- The Evolution of the Statutes of Bologna in the 13th Century
- Politics and Piracy: Urban Life in Medieval Italy, 800-1400
- Giovanni Villani: Florentine Chronicle
- Florentine Renaissance Resources: Online Tratte of Office Holders 1282-1532
- Florentine Renaissance Resources: Online Catasto of 1427
- Medieval Sourcebook: Bartolo of Sassoferrato, Treatise on City Government, c. 1330
- A Medieval Response to Municipal Pollution (another copy found here)
- Plague and Public Health in Renaissance Europe

Introduction to the history of medieval boroughs

(click on photo for more information)

An overview of the origins and growth of towns and cities in England during the Middle Ages, indicating some of issues and trends in the urbanization process, and suggesting some of the defining characteristics of urban society in the medieval period.

Origins: problems of definition

Origins: continuity or creation?

Origins: wiks, burhs, and ports

Origins: planned/planted towns

The growth of self-government

The urban economy

Urban society

further reading

main menu

History of medieval Norwich

[MAIN MENU]

ORIGINS OF SETTLEMENT | The pre-Conquest borough | Effects of the Conquest
Evolution of a self-governing community | Power struggles with rivals
A division of interests | Summary/Recap | Information sources
Map of Anglo-Saxon Norwich | Map of Norwich ca.1260
Appendix 1: Calendar of customs of Norwich

Origins of settlement

The topographical features of the site that was to become Norfolk's county town were such as to encourage settlement. At a time when heavy forestation of eastern Norfolk hindered land travel, Norwich's site lay on a ford at the highest navigable point of the river Wensum (which ran into the Yare), on a well-drained gravel terrace that was the product of the formation of the Wensum valley. Around it lay a highly fertile soil, another result of valley formation. It had easier access to the sea than there now is, for a higher sea level covered large areas of eastern Norfolk and formed the Great Estuary, which came to within a few miles of the site of Norwich; only later did the Yarmouth sandbank block this access. By the early Saxon period the sea had receded to its present level, but the continuing free-flow of the tide kept parts of Norwich's site marshy for several centuries, making the medieval river wider and shallower than today. It also made the valleys surrounding local streams (or cockeys), wide and marshy. The result was to isolate a ridge of high ground (later Berstrete) running northwards towards the river as far as the future site of the castle; this ridge then gradually descended to the river. Opposite, on the northern bank, another ridge continued the direction along Fybriggate.

The marsh may have discouraged settlement at the site during prehistoric and Roman times, although historians suspect that Roman roads may have passed through the site; if the north-south Berstrete and the east-west Holmstrete were such (largely hypothesis), then they would have reached a cross-roads just south of a point in the Wensum where there is some evidence of a ford or, at least by late Saxon times (if not in Roman times), a bridge.

Crossroads tend to be magnets for settlement. So too proximity to a navigable river, when water traffic became as important as roads, if not more so, in the post-Roman period. Also influential was the fact the north-south river crossing was easier here than anywhere else on the River Wensum, above the point where it joined with the Yare. Despite the legendary associations of Norwich castle, there is no evidence of such a fortification in that locale until the Normans. By circa 500 A.D., there is evidence of occupation in the area, at least on the northern bank of the Wensum. This was probably Coslanye, whose name ("Cost's long island") indicates a Saxon origin. Initially centered on the Eade Road cemetery, it seems to have moved south (relocation being common enough in seventh century East Anglia), resettling around St. Martin at Oak, which appears to be an early foundation. The bounds of settlement north of the Wensum remained confined, throughout the medieval period, to the area defined by the gravel terrace. Additional early settlements seem possible: in the southern end of the (future) town, focused around St. Etheldreda in the eighth century; and, more clearly, in the west around St. Benedict's gates as early as the sixth century. These were likely only minor settlements – a handful of homesteads.

More important was the settlement known as Conesford (possibly a Danicized version of a Saxon name meaning King's Ford). Archaeological remains suggest this was contemporary with, but larger than, the western settlement. Conesford was probably located east of the crossroads along Holmstrete, within the river-bend, giving proximity to the two likely fords indicated by those roads. Yet another modest settlement appears to have been located on the west side of the crossroads, although the subsequent disruption due to building of the castle in that location makes it difficult to assess the extent or importance of that hamlet. The crossroads between those two settlements would have been a natural place for the siting of a market to serve the local population; the name of this site, Tombland, means "unoccupied ground" and the size of medieval Tombland was ample for a large market. Such a marketplace would have helped knit the two settlements into one, with the name Conesford taking precedence over that of the other, whose name is lost to us (although "Needham" has been suggested as a possibility, the roots of this seem more likely associated with some hamlet south-west of the conglomeration that came to form Norwich).

What attracted settlement to this locale? Besides easy access to water and fertile soils, there was abundant timber, chalk and flint in the area; there was meadow-land for pasture, and the river current fuelled water-mills (present by the time of Domesday). Perhaps most important was the route to the rich herring fishery of the North Sea; fish was a staple of the medieval diet, and herring were particularly valuable for their salt. As part of the fee-farm paid to the king, Norwich owed six-score fresh herring in 25 pies; there is indirect evidence this obligation may have existed as early as Domesday. There was a quay for unloading fish on the north bank of the Wensum, just across from Conesford, in an area known in Danish times as Fishergate. A second quay, near the site of St. Laurence's, was associated with the western settlement. As forest was cleared away in Norfolk, more fertile land was opened up to agriculture, the population increased, and farmers produced more than they needed for subsistence alone, market centres were required and Norwich's central location in the agricultural region brought it to greater prominence.

It appears, therefore, that on the site of Norwich prior to circa 850 there stood only a collection of unrelated villages, of which those around the crossroads/marketplace – coming to be perceived as a single entity – were the most important. After the arrival of the Danes, these expanded towards each other, particularly in the first half of the eleventh century. The Conesford expansion was primarily directed southwards, along Southgate, and then up the slope away from the river, towards Berstrete ridge – houses there were later destroyed to make room for the castle. Between the western settlement at St. Benedict's and the pair of eastern settlements, the Danes settled along west Holmstrete and later spread southwards to Pottergate, following the courses of the cockeys. It may have been they who named this settlement Westwyk (in reference to its location relative to the more important settlement around the marketplace), or possibly that name had been applied even prior to Danish settlement. Marsh surrounding the banks of the river inhibited expansion northwards until that area was reclaimed in the twelfth century.

North of the Wensum, expansion seems to have been directed from Conesford, rather than Coselanye. The northwards extent of this expansion is suggested by the location of St. Botolph's (a dedication typically found at the entrance to a settlement) and evidence for a defensive ditch around the northeastern expansion area; this would have helped control the Fye bridge and a second river crossing further east. Slightly later, a second ditch was constructed to take in Coselanye. This was part of the wider trend begun in the tenth century to create "burhs" – fortified settlements responding in part to unsettled times, but also to the need to control commerce by restricting it to locations where there was an established market and one of the dozens of royal mints that were spread across the country. It is not known whether there were similar earthworks around the southern settlements; archaeology has failed to find clear evidence of such.

By the time of the Conquest, these various settlements had been superseded by a single town – one of the largest in England; the origins of the town were recalled in its later division into administrative wards:

- Conesford, occupying the southern and eastern (below the Wensum) areas of Norwich;
- Westwyk covering the area running east-west along the southern bank of the Wensum (before the river curves southwards);
- Mancroft (a later expansion) lying in the western part of the town between Westwyk and southern Conesford; and
- Ultra Aquam covering the part of the town north of the Wensum.

See Map of Anglo-Saxon Norwich (82K)

If "Norwich" emerged out of the amalgamation of these various settlements, (apparently by at least 1004 A.D.) why did not the larger entity take on the name of its principal and central settlement, Conesford? Some historians have thought that Conesford was the "northern wik", but there is no convincing explanation of why a settlement already having a name should be given a new one (particularly when Conesford continued to be used), nor of what feature Conesford could be considered to be north. Since Westwyk appears to have been named because of its geographical position in relation to either Conesford or the crossroads/marketplace, Norwich probably originated as the name of the expansion area north of Conesford; the term "wic" was often used for subsidiary settlements, serving a larger settlement. Coselanye, although north of the river, had a name and needed no other. Its relative unimportance (lying in the northwestern corner of the conglomeration) is reflected in that its name did not persist as one of the later four wards. Instead we have for the area north of the Wensum Ultra Aquam – "on the other side of the river" – in effect, no name at all. This is explicable if the name of the more important northern settlement could not be used for a ward, because it was already in use for the whole borough.

So, if Norwich originated as the northern colony of Conesford, by what right did its name take precedence over that of its mother? Perhaps by right of greater 'publication'. The earliest evidence for the name is from coins, which bore the name of the place where minted. These coins spread the assumption that Norwich was the correct name of the borough. This theory assumes that when a mint was set up in the community, it was established in the northern wic, where there was doubtless more room than in overpopulated Conesford, and probably close to one of the quays where goods were unloaded and to the bridge leading across to the Tombland market. King Athelstan (925-939) had restricted all minting to the port/burh. In connection with this we may note three things:

- although wic was one of the words meaning "settlement", in tenth century terminology it could also mean "little port" and seems to have been frequently used for locations that were trading centres;
- coins bearing the name Nordwic became much more common from the reign of Athelstan on;
- it was in the tenth century that the burh fortifications were constructed around the northern settlement.

That coins from Norwich have been found earlier than Athelstan's reign does not diminish this theory, since it is concerned not with when a mint was first set up, but with why "Norwich" predominated over "Conesford". The mint was not located in the northern wic because it was a burh; rather, burh defences were placed around the northern settlement to satisfy royal regulations concerning a mint that already existed there.

main menu

next

History of medieval Norwich

[MAIN MENU]

APPENDIX 1: Calendar of Norwich customs

The Rev. William Hudson included a transcription of the Latin custumal and an English translation in the compilation of selections from medieval documents that he and J.C. Tingey edited (The Records of the City of Norwich, 2 vols., Norwich: Jarrold & Sons, 1906-1910). As a local vicar and officer of the county archaeological society, Hudson and his numerous articles and books about medieval Norwich – beginning with the history of his own parish (St. Peter Parmentergate) in 1889 and continuing up to his major work compiling the Records – may be considered part of the tail-end of the "antiquarianism" whereby enthusiasts, mostly residents, examined (and sometimes catalogued) the archives of their counties, towns or villages and used their contents to write local histories. The quality of the work of these antiquaries, which began in the early modern period and climaxed in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries (when local history became a major enthusiasm) was mixed, although the historian is nonetheless indebted to these men for drawing attention to and making more widely available primary sources related to medieval boroughs, some of which have since been lost. Norwich in particular is a borough that has been well-served by its antiquaries, and Hudson's work represents the best of antiquarianism. Indeed, it may be doing Hudson a disservice to lump him in with mainstream antiquarianism, for he was trained in history to the postgraduate level, and his work was of such a learned quality that in many fields of local study he remains the authoritative source – not least his extensive introduction to the Records. (On a personal note, Hudson's impressive reconstruction of the administrative history of medieval Norwich was a factor in persuading me to focus my own attentions on urban history).

The text of Norwich's medieval custumal is to be found in the Records, vol.1, pp.132-199. This publication is not, however, available in many library collections. Consequently, even though I have not examined the original document myself, I think it worthwhile (not least for purposes of comparison with the customs of other towns, transcribed or calendared on this site) to provide a calendar of the Norwich custumal. For the original text or a precise translation, you should refer to the Records. Here I provide an abstract of each capitulum, to communicate in (for the most part) modern English the sense of the chapter.

Hudson found the custumal in a mid-fifteenth century volume of memoranda known as the Book of Pleas, and this was the version he included in his publication. Only as the Records was close to completion did there come to light an older, long-missing volume entitled the Liber Consuetudinum (Book of Customs – referred to in 1344 as the "Book of Ancient Usages of the said City") which, from internal evidence, Hudson deduced to have been written ca.1308, with minor later additions within the following few years; the custumal – whose primary focus is legal procedures and regulation of commerce – was the initial and principal feature of this volume, with various local agreements and national laws added, which only increase the impression that this may have been intended as a formal compilation for the reference of city administrators. Hudson's comparison of the two versions led him to suspect that the later was not copied directly from the earlier, but probably through an intermediary copy possibly made (as some medieval memoranda books were) for the personal reference of an individual city administrator who held office during the 1330s and '40s. Hudson further believed that the Book of Customs was itself probably a copy from an even earlier document, and hypothesised that this version may have been compiled in consequence to a withdrawal and restitution of the city liberties in 1285 – as also happened at Ipswich.

Custumal

Norwich history

main menu

History of medieval Lynn

[MAIN MENU]

ORIGINS AND EARLY GROWTH | Development of local government

Buildings and fortifications | Economy | Information sources

Map of Lynn in the fifteenth century

Lynn mayors and chamberlains

Biographies of Lynn townsmen

Appendix 1: Lynn by-laws

Appendix 2: Oaths of officers and burgesses

Appendix 3: Rental of community property, 1391

Origins and early growth

The site of Lynn stood at the south-eastern tip of the great estuary known as the Wash; it had more direct access to the Wash than it does today, after centuries of silting and land reclamation. The light soils of the countryside to the east were suitable for raising sheep, which provided the fertilizer for growing cereals such as barley, wheat and rye. To the west, the rich, heavy soil of the Fenland supported sheep and cattle and therefore dairy products. Lynn's location represented a convergence of road, river and sea routes. The Little Ouse river ran south from Lynn and, before it turned westwards, was connected to the Great Ouse and thereby the Nene (which two served several inland counties) via artificial channels. At the same time, the site was close to several important land routes, including the major east-west route across the northern fens, which led into northern Lynn. These linkages into the rich agricultural hinterland of the Fens, western Norfolk and the east Midlands, and (in the other direction) to the ports of northern Europe, put it in a good position to become a trading centre.

The town now known as King's Lynn was, in medieval times, rather Bishop's Lynn. This is because it was taken under the wing of the Bishop of Norwich in the late eleventh century, one of the earliest of numerous deliberate seigneurial foundations of "new towns" that took place between that time and the mid-thirteenth century. When Henry VIII took over the lordship of the town it was renamed King's Lynn.

The name "Lynn" derives from a Celtic term meaning "pool", referring to the fact that it was part of an estuary lake where various rivers flowed into the Wash. This lake was surrounded by earth banks and the site of Lynn sat at the narrow neck leading from the estuarine lake into the Wash; this was a likely crossing point of the estuary – an ancient ferry right was located here – and here too the channel would have been deep enough to accommodate ships. The sea bank had contributed to silting and the formation of salt marshes. So many of the local settlers were harvesting the salt through saltpans in the neighbourhood of Lynn, as scattered references in the Domesday book reveal, that a trade surplus must have been produced. The salt was attached to sand and the separation process resulted in piles of discarded sand; this process having been going on for centuries, it was a major factor in raising the level of the land above the marsh, to the point where it became possible to build on the often quite sizable waste heaps thus created. Many of these saltern mounds are still visible today. The same process of reclamation left the site riddled with watercourses (locally called "fleets", from the Anglo-Saxon term meaning creek) ranging in size from streams to small rivers, and the course of these likewise exercised an influence on the topography of settlement.

At this time there seem to have been people living in all of the areas that later became West Lynn (on the far side of the river), North Lynn, Bishop's Lynn, and South Lynn, and the last was sufficiently populous to be considered a village. However, it was apparently traders who were tenants of the Bishop's nearby manor of Gaywood (where many other saltpans were located) who in about 1095 requested that he found a town endowed with commercial privileges and with its own parish church. Probably they were already holding an unofficial market there by the waterside, and some may even have been residing there. The industry producing salt, which was important for the curing of meat and fish, would itself have attracted traders; and the reclaimed fenland was suitable for sheep-farming and agriculture, which made for trade in wool and grain, while fishing was also likely an early source of trade goods.

The Bishop complied with this request, at the same time founding St. Margaret's church to serve the community; attached to St. Margaret's was a small priory. The northern and southern bounds of this new town were two tidal fleets that were wide enough to be navigable and had been the sites of salting operations at some time; they were later known as Purfleet and Millfleet, respectively. They provided an added advantage to Lynn as a site attracting trade, since the fleets offered a sheltered anchorage for ships carrying visiting merchants. The western boundary was the location of the weekly market, held each Saturday on the water's edge – it being described as a "sand market" (perhaps implying the site was partly underwater at high tide, a ploy to avoid having to pay market tolls to the king) – while an annual three-day fair, beginning on St. Margaret's day, was authorized (or, more likely, confirmed). The eastern boundary was the sea bank. The priory-church was built on the edge of the Saturday Market. In 1101 the Bishop transferred St. Margaret's to the jurisdiction of the monastic priory of Norwich cathedral. There was already a church (All Saints) established in South Lynn, which was similarly transferred. Early building in Lynn seems to have focused along the river-bank north of the market and perhaps even more so in the area east of the market and priory; by mid-century the population was heavy enough to warrant founding St. James' Chapel in that easterly quarter. A public quay – the Bishop's Staith – was built at the point where Purfleet entered the river.

St. Margaret's Church

western end (as seen from near the gildhall)
photo © S. Alsford

By establishing a town and helping develop its facilities, the Bishop could hope to increase his own revenues – from such sources as tolls, rents, building licences, and court fines – as a result of the stimulation of local commerce and increased settlement on the site that the commerce would in turn stimulate. We cannot ignore the possibility that the foundation was part of a larger policy of Bishop Herbert de Losinga, of which the contemporaneous transfer of the episcopal see from Thetford to Norwich and the attention paid to Yarmouth may have been other components. By mid-century the population had increased to the point where settlement had spread north of the Purfleet, facilitated by the presence of a bridge across the fleet; part of the population expansion was due to the introduction of a Jewish community, which was the target of attacks in 1190, perhaps mainly from foreigners in Lynn. The Bishop treated this secondary area of settlement like a separate town, confirming (ca.1146-50) to the settlers on this "new land" a market (on Tuesdays) and fair they had probably already established, and founding the chapel of St. Nicholas there to provide for the spiritual life of the residents of this northern section of Lynn. This Newland he kept under his direct jurisdiction. A second bridge was subsequently built further east.

This second "new town" was bounded by Purfleet on the south and the River Gay to the north. If planned, the layout may have envisaged a parallel series of roughly evenly-spaced north-south roads, cross-cut by Damgate, and with the market absorbing the northwest corner adjacent to the river; but more likely the lines of roads were already dictated by existing residences. It was perhaps the anchorage in the mouth of the River Gay that had encouraged the growth of this market nearby, which in turn attracted settlement. There were lesser fleets connected to the Gay, in part by canals dug by the settlers, and here several staiths are known to have been located. A mill for grinding the townspeople's corn was built by the Bishop and served by another such channel. Before the end of the Middle Ages, the Common Staith had been established on the river-bank at the Tuesday Market, although originally the whole of the bank there was likely a landing place for ships. The Bishop's steward administered justice and collected tolls from a hall in the marketplace; court sessions were held each Monday. At the southern end of the marketplace were temporary booths where visitors and residents could buy the medieval equivalent of "fast food"; in time these booths evolved into permanent buildings. As land was reclaimed from the river, the western side of the market, facing the river, similarly came to be occupied by buildings; this was likewise the case with the Saturday marketplace.

Just as the small market settlements pre-existing the episcopal "foundations" in both central Lynn and the Newland mitigate against calling Lynn a "planted town", it might also be going too far to suggest that Lynn was a "planned town". Although some features were doubtless the result of forethought, the topography of the site was a great influence on the evolution of the layout of the town. This was determined partly by stretches of raised ground (the product of silting and salting) west of the sea bank and to a lesser extent by the firm banks of the fleets, both of which provided natural locations for roads; and partly by the need to connect east-west land routes and the points where ships could load or unload goods. However, it was the north-south road connecting the Saturday and Tuesday markets, thanks in part to the original bridge over the Purfleet, that was the focus for settlement.

main menu

next

History of medieval Lynn

[MAIN MENU]

APPENDIX 1: Lynn by-laws

No custumal has survived from medieval Lynn. Perhaps there never was a single document of that character comparable to Ipswich's Domesday books. Lack of control over local courts in the early decades of self-government may have inhibited the compilation of a written record of customs relating to legal procedures. Although there was reference in February 1439 to a set of ordinances, made tempore Henry III, being read out to and reconfirmed by the congregation, this appears to be in the context of criticism of electoral procedures, and probably refers to one of the compositions between Bishop and borough (possibly that of 1234) on matters of self-administration. A similar reference in October of the same year to the reading out to, and confirmation by, the congregation of statutes contained "in the book with the image of the crucifix [on its cover]" leaves us none the wiser. As early as 1342 we find reference to certain statutes that had been written down, so that knowledge of them would not be distorted over the passage of time, and read out before the community at election time; but again, these appear to have been constitutional reforms rather than a comprehensive set of customs. References to the borough possessing copies of statutes of London and Oxford suggest that these were applied in Lynn. It may be that the customs of Lynn were scattered among a variety of documents.

A collection of ordinances that was begun in 1423/24 starts only with by-laws made in that year and was not continued beyond the following year. A volume in the British Museum (Add.Ms.37791) is there described as a "Custumal", but in fact is the Red Parchment Book occasionally mentioned to in other documents of the first half of the fifteenth century. This is rather a compilation of various records that would have served as the town clerk's reference tool for precedents; in that sense it is not dissimilar to the Ipswich Domesday Books, although its main difference is the absence of a formal list of town customs. However, the volume does include the constitutional ordinances referred to in 1342 (see above).

The collection that follows is a gathering together of by-laws, made at various times and presented in chronological order, which might theoretically have comprised a custumal (except that older customs would have become redundant or been superseded). Most of these come from the core records of the assembly/congregation, the legislative branch of Lynn's government: the Red Register and the Hall Books and Rolls. However, I have also included: an abstract of the key composition of 1309 between the Bishop of Norwich and the burgesses, since this was one foundation of the constitutional and legal framework of local government; an undated list of market ordinances recorded in an early 15th century town clerk's book of memoranda – these would have been among the articles dealt with by the leet court. I have omitted the more ephemeral of the by-laws related to the constitutional contests which shook the borough in the fifteenth century. From the rest I have selected, from ordinances made between the beginning of the fourteenth century and mid-fifteenth century, some of those that seem mostly to have been made for long-term use (as opposed to orders for specific, time-limited actions). Some by-laws are presented as abstracts, others are more detailed renderings in modern English. My own explanatory notes or elaborations for purposes of clarity are inserted in square parentheses [].

I have gathered the texts for these ordinances from the original sources and from published versions of those sources, including The Making of King's Lynn, ed. Dorothy Owen, British Academy Records of Social and Economic History, New Series vol.9 (1984), a very welcome compilation of extracts (in their original language) from the medieval records of Lynn which, however, is sadly marred by a large number of errors, particularly in the dating of the extracts. My own compilation here is a mixed bag: in some cases I give a fairly full rendering of ordinances, in others an abstract only, but in all cases presenting them in (relatively) modernized English – which inevitably involves taking a few liberties with the original text.

The value of these by-laws is, in part, that they reflect some of the preoccupations, concerns and issues related to borough government and society.

The by-laws

Lynn history

main menu

appendix 2

History of medieval Lynn

[MAIN MENU]

APPENDIX 2: Oaths of officers and burgesses

Oaths are useful sources for showing the expectations that the community had of the performance of its official representatives or its servants, and of the return obligation of the members of the community. At the ceremonies for swearing in officers, or for men entering the franchise, the text of the appropriate oath would be read out while the oath-taker had his hand on the Bible and (presumably) stated his agreement/compliance at the end of the reading of the oath.

Oaths of Lynn officers are scattered among several records, notably:

- the so-called Custumal (B.M. Add.Ms. 37791), which was probably the Red Parchment Book, a collection of documents mostly from the fourteenth century (particularly the latter half), and which was referred to several times in fifteenth century records including as a source of the oaths administered to elected officers;
- an early fifteenth century volume of memoranda (KL/C10/2);
- the Register of Freemen (KL/C9/1) likely begun by a town clerk in the third quarter of the fifteenth century, and may have superseded the Red Parchment Book in that function as the official source of oaths to be administered.

Most oaths are undated, and I have had to estimate dates based on their context. One version of the mayor's oath is dateable because it is known to have been administered to Robert Brunham in 1415, but since this was in a time of constitutional upheaval we cannot be certain whether this was the normal oath or one redrafted for the occasion. The same applied to one version of the jurat's and town clerk's oaths, which likely date from the same time.

Burgess' oath, late 14th century

He swears to maintain the franchises of the town, while both inside and outside town, to conceal the counsels of the town, to be obedient to the mayor, [his sergeant – interlined] and all officers of the town.

Burgess' oath, second quarter of the 15th century

Hear this, the mayor and community, that [I] shall with all my power truly maintain the franchises of Lynn, inside and outside, and be obedient to the mayor and his successors and the council of this town, [and] obey and assist the officers of the town in performance of their duties. So help me God.

Electors' oath, late 14th century

[They swear] to elect a sufficient and profitable man as mayor, 4 sufficient and profitable men as chamberlains, 24 good and wise men to counsel the mayor, a clerk and sergeant, 3 keepers for the East, South and St. Anne's gates, a bedeman and wait, and the mayor's sergeant.

[Parts of this record are damaged to the point of illegibility. Waits (minstrels) were on the borough payroll in the late 1360s and early 1370s, which suggests a date for the group of ordinances in the "Custumal"; in 1456 they were assigned a borough tenement in which to live while in office, but seem not to have had a salary as such. The bedeman seems to have been a shared employee of borough and Merchant Gild and his chief responsibility was to make public announcements (notably of the deaths of townsmen). St. Anne's gate was the northern gate, at Dowshill. A holder of the office mayor's sergeant, as opposed to the common sergeant, is identified in 1414-16, but generally it is difficult to know during what period(s) there may have been two separate sergeants.]

Electors' oath, second quarter of the 15th century

Sirs, you shall swear to use your discretion well and truly, without favouritism, fraud or evil intent, to choose as mayor for the coming year (from Michaelmas onward) a man able and sufficient for the profit of the community. So help you God. Furthermore you shall choose 4 sufficient burgesses to occupy the office of chamberlain in the town, a common clerk, a sergeant, 3 gatekeepers for the east gate, the south gate, Dowshill gate, and two Gannock gates, and a bellman; you shall make a good and true choice of them for the year to come. So help you God.

Mayor's oath, 1415

Sir, you shall place your hand upon the book and swear that you shall govern and rule the entire community of this town well and truly, with all your ability and diligence, from this time forth to Michaelmas when the mayor is chosen. And maintain all the franchises of the town, and every parcel thereof both within and without, with all your power, so help you God.

Mayor's oath, late 14th century

[This has no substantial differences from the version given above, although it is phrased in the third person, rather than the second as above.]

Mayor's oath, second quarter of the 15th century

Sir, you shall place your hand upon the book and swear that you shall govern and rule the community of this town well and truly, with all your might, ability and diligence, during the year that you are mayor. And maintain all the franchises of the town, and every parcel thereof both within and without, with all power, wisdom and business [acumen], and perform all other duties that pertain to the office of mayor of this town. So help you God.

Oath of the mayor to the Bishop, given at Gaywood manor, 14th century

[With his hand] in the hand of the Bishop or his deputy he takes oath that he shall faithfully and diligently perform each and every [duty] for which the mayor is responsible. And that he shall preserve all rights and liberties of the church of Norwich in their fullest entirety.

Alderman's oath, second quarter of the 15th century

Sir, place your hand upon the book. Sir, you shall swear that you shall well and truly use your discretion, without favouritism, fraud or evil intent, to choose and nominate four "indifferent and not suspect" persons for the election of the mayor. So help you God.

[This oath related to the Merchant Gild alderman solely in his role in the election of a mayor, which was to choose the initial four members of an electoral committee; those four co-opted the remainder of the committee that would elect the mayor. The reference to choosing electors who were "indifferent and not suspect" means individuals not known to favour any particular political faction, and particularly not members of the jurats.]

Chamberlains' oath, late 14th century

They put their hands on the book and swear that they will to the best of their ability well and faithfully receive the revenues due the community, well and faithfully spend the same, and account faithfully for the same to the community, [after completing their term of office] delivering back to the mayor all things pertaining to their office.

Chamberlains' oath, second quarter of the 15th century

Sir, you shall well and truly collect and receive the common goods [i.e. revenues] and make lawful and true expenditures from the same, as appropriate and when you are duly requested or ordered by the mayor. And give a good and true reckoning of the same, before the mayor and community, when you are required to or reasonably forewarned to by the mayor's officers. So help you God.

Jurats' oath, ca. 1415

Sir, you shall place your hand upon the book and swear that you shall be obedient to the mayor and be ready to [attend on] him at all times when he sends for you on matters concerning the community. And well and truly advise the mayor and support his decisions, so help you God.

Jurat's oath, late 14th century

[This is essentially the same as the first sentence of the above version.]

Oath of the 24 [deleted] venerable jurats, second quarter of the 15th century

Sir, you shall be obedient to and ready to [attend on] the mayor when you are given reasonable and true notice thereof by the common serjeant or are summoned by the mayor for the business of the town. And well and truly advise and assist him. So help you God.

Oath of the 24 jurors for the view of land within Lynn, late 14th century

Sir, you shall swear that you shall make a true investigation concerning freeholds within this borough, and make a true judgement between the king and the party, and between party and party, when you are lawfully required to or duly warned by the common serjeant, and act honestly with your colleagues in dealing with [the legal claims], making judgement and submitting a verdict. So help you God. [And keep to yourself the deliberations of you and your colleagues, so help you God – added later, probably in the same hand as that of the Recorder's oath].

Oath of the common councillors, October 1418

Sir, you shall swear that you shall come to the gildhall for the common council when you are warned by the common serjeant, and give good and true counsels for this town and the business concerning the town – that is to say, in all [matters concerning] taxes, tallages, fifteenths, [and] loans; repairs to houses, bridges, fleets, [and] ditches; expenditures and giving of accounts, and making of valid allowances. Unless you have a good excuse [for not being able to come], you shall let nothing prevent you from doing this, so help you God.

[It was probably soon after the institution of the common council that this oath was formulated and recorded in the earliest Hall Book. "Loans" refers to loans sought occasionally by the king, which were a matter of some debate since they were often difficult to recover. "Allowances" refers to monies the chamberlains were released from having to account for, such as anticipated revenues that proved uncollectable, or additional expenses authorized during the accounting session (often fees of officers).]

Oath of the 27 persons of the common council, second quarter of the 15th century

Sir, you shall come to the gildhall for the common council [meetings] when you are duly warned by the common serjeant, and give true counsel for this town and the business concerning the town – that is to say, in all [matters concerning] taxes, tallages, fifteenths, [and] loans; repairs to houses, walls, bridges, fleets, [and] ditches; expenditures and giving of accounts, and making of valid allowances, and other charges and discharges that may need to be made, as need arises. So help you God.

Charge to the electors of the common council, second quarter of the 15th century

Let it be remembered that folk resident in the constabularies do not take an oath, but must be charged in this manner: Sirs, you shall put your heads together and choose from the most sufficient, reasonable and discreet burgesses of this constabulary, possessing a suitable residence in town, three to be [present for – added later] matters and business concerning the town, that is, all taxes [etc. as in the common councillor's oath]. [And if you fail (to find) any of your three, you shall choose from the next constabulary – added later].

[See the article dealing with the election of the common council in the ordinances

Common clerk's oath, 1416

You shall swear to be faithful to the mayor, jurats and rest of the burgesses of Lynn at all times and in all duties associated with the office of common clerk, [performing them] without favouritism or hatred and without [outside] influence. You will not spread among mayor, jurats and comburgesses any inaccurate, distorted or false report on any matter with which you have official dealings, but without any fraud will communicate information accurately (to the best of your knowledge) between the degrees of the town. In all matters you will behave disinterestedly towards mayor, jurats, burgesses of every degree, and the community, whether in writing, examining, reporting or any other action required by your official duties. You will reveal to no-one the deliberations of the same, to the damage or discredit of the town. If you know or learn of anything which you believe may bring harm or disgrace to the town, you will warn the mayor or one of the jurats who you consider will be willing and able to help you remedy the situation as you think best. You shall not stir up discord or dissension between the mayor, jurats, degrees of the borough, and community, or between any of their members, either openly or secretly; if you become aware of any such discords or dissensions you shall do your best to quell them, and may – for the purpose of such suppression – reveal your knowledge of them to others who may be able to assist in the suppression. So help you God and the holy evangelists.

[An oath with the degree of emphasis seen here might be considered paranoid, were it not to be understood within the context of the particularly divisive political conflict of that period between the classes ("degrees") within urban society. In essence the clerk is being required to stay neutral in any political conflict within the community, except that his principal loyalty is to the town government. I cannot think that the terminology of this oath had any particular individual in mind; the town clerk throughout the period of political troubles, William Ashebourne, seems to have behaved professionally enough, although his sympathies were with the potentiores party.]

Common clerk's oath, second quarter of the 15th century

Sir, I shall be faithful and obedient to the mayor of Lynn, and write true records, and give honest counsel when I am asked or ordered to. And [I shall] perform all other duties that are associated with the office of common clerk of Lynn. So help me God. [And keep to yourself the deliberations of the town – added later].

Recorder's oath, second quarter of the 15th century

Sir, you shall give true counsel, based on your knowledge and discretion, when you are required to do so. And perform all other duties associated with the [office of] Recorder of this town, and keep to yourself the counsels of the town. So help you God.

[This oath was added to the rest in a later, possibly post-medieval, hand. The Recorder's office replaced that of the common clerk in 1456 (a change whose significance I hope to address in detail at some time in the future).]

Sergeant at mace's oath, second quarter of the 15th century

Sir, you shall swear to be ready [to serve] and obedient to the mayor at all times; and to warn the 24 and 27 to come to the gildhall when the mayor so orders it, and [to warn] all others [to come] when the mayor orders you, and make honest answer [for having performed the duty?]. And all defaults [in appearance] of those who have been warned accurately record in the gildhall. And enforce the king's peace to the best of your ability within this franchise. And carry out arrests when you are ordered to by the mayor, and bring the parties before the mayor. And honestly perform all duties that are associated with the office of common sergeant within the franchise of this town. So help you God. [And keep to yourself the deliberations of the town – added later].

Constable's oath, early 15th century

Sir, you shall well and truly, to the best of your ability, keep and sustain the peace; [you shall] make rightful arrests and attachments of trespassers, evil-doers, troublemakers, and disturbers of the peace, and bring them before the mayor or to the gaol of Lynn. And well and honestly undertake and direct the [night]watches when your turn comes, according to the Statute of Winchester. And, when you are asked or required, present to the mayor the names of all who default or resist, concerning [participation in] the watch. And honestly perform all duties associated with the office of constable to the best of your ability, so help you God.

Constable's oath, second quarter of the 15th century

Sir, you shall truly, to the best of your ability, maintain and sustain the king's peace within this franchise. And rightful arrests of trespassers, evil-doers, troublemakers, disturbers and upsetters of the king's peace, and bring them before the mayor or to the gaol of Lynn. And undertake the watches in the time of year [to which your watch is assigned] and direct them as their turn comes in the franchise, according to the statute of Winchester. And once a year present or deliver up to mayor and community in the gildhall the names of any who are rebellious or default concerning the watch. And perform all duties associated with the office of constable within the franchise of Lynn. So help you God.

Oath of the keepers of the east and Gannock gates, second quarter of the 15th century

Sir, you shall well and truly keep the east gate and the Gannock gate, and let people in and out within the lawful hours. And give honest warning to the [night]watch [of those abroad after curfew?] according to the Statute of Winchester, and report any defaulters, and be obedient to the constables of the town when they perform their duties during the watch. And perform all duties that are associated with the office of porter. So help you God.

Tax assessors' oath, late 14th century

It is agreed, with the assent of the community, that those who shall assess the tax shall swear to assess it well and faithfully, sparing no man through love or friendship, nor taxing any man excessively through hate or malice, but assessing each man's tax through consideration of his goods and chattels, his estate, and goods that he uses in mercantile activities.

Oath of 12 tax assessors, second quarter of the 15th century

Sir, you shall swear that you shall well and truly levy the king's fifteenth and [the special tax to cover] the expenses for the parliamentary burgesses of this town, and spare no man through fear, friendship or relationship, nor burden any man through hate or malice, but treat every man fairly according to his situation. So help you God. [And keep to yourself the deliberations behind the assessment – added later].

Capital pledges' oath, second quarter of the 15th century

Sirs, you shall truly and duly make inquiry concerning [offences against] all articles belonging to the leet, and not spare [any offender] for love nor [falsely accuse for?] hate, but present [the offences] truthfully after you have made honest inquiry. So help you God.

Leet affeerors' oath, second quarter of the 15th century

Sirs, you shall duly levy [ameracements on offences of] this leet that the headboroughs have presented and, using your discretion, truly assess [the appropriate fine] according to the presentment, sparing none for love or for hate. So help you God.

[Four men were "elected" – in fact, nominated by the mayor in open guildhall for community consent – to assess the fines on offenders. In this period they were often pre-assigned a set amount which they had to raise through the assessment of fines, indicating the leet was treated by borough government more as a licensing than a punitive mechanism.]

Leather inspectors' oath, second quarter of the 15th century

By right of his office, the mayor may elect each year two inspectors of leather from bulls, cows, and other animals and beasts found within the liberty of Lynn, who shall take oath to supervise that [the leathers] shall be well worked without the use of salt water and that they not be badly made or burnt, so that [a buyer] not be deceived by false claims made of them (under [penalty for which deceit of] the pillory).

Trade in leather hides was restricted to a house on the Common Staith, and sales were prohibited except in the presence of the inspectors (an office also found in [Maldon). Little is heard of these inspectors; they appear not to have been salaried officers, but received a fee of 2d. from (the sellers of) each measure of hides sold.]

Lynn history

main menu

appendix 3

History of medieval Lynn

[MAIN MENU]

APPENDIX 3: Rental of community property, 1391

The compilation of rentals – lists of rents due the community annually – was at Lynn a by-product of the initiative in the 1380s to develop that source of borough income. The chief catalyst for the formulation of this policy (aside from difficulty in balancing the borough budget) appears to have been a grant (KL/Be 575) in 1378 by the executors of Margaret Kenyngdale, né Burghard, of numerous properties she had inherited from her father. The grant was made to a group of burgesses, headed by leading jurat and Merchant Gild alderman Thomas de Botkesham; this group doubtless was representing the interests of the borough community – which was not yet formally empowered to act corporately and, if it had, would have risked breaking the statute of mortmain. The properties were:

- 1 tenement with 4 shops and solars in Stonegate
- 1 tenement on the south side of Bulwer Row [a.k.a. Butcher Row], opposite St. Margarets
- 3 tenements in Briggate
- 1 tenement with 5 shops and a curtilage in Moor Lane (a.k.a. Pillory Lane)
- 1 tenement in Gresemarket
- 1 tenement in Damgate, on the corner of Pakker Lane
- 1 tenement in Pakker Lane
- 2 tenements in Webster Row
- 1 tenement on the highway next to Purfleet probably [Purfleet Lane]
- 1 tenement on the north side of Purfleet, and south of the fleet in Webster Row this would place it in Burghard Lane a.k.a. [Fincham Street]
- 1½ tenements in Burghard Lane
- annual rents of 53s.4d from tenements in Stonegate, Skinner Row, Briggate, Purfleet [Lane], Mercer Row, Gresemarket, and Ratton Row
- the reversion of tenements in Purfleet and Damgate

- o the reversion of annual rents of 32s. from tenements in Damgate

In 1379 we find the same group of burgesses leasing these properties to individuals. In 1381/82 these properties brought to the borough an income of £20.13.4d in rents.

Rentals are referred to in the chamberlains' accounts of the early '80s. By the time of the one translated here, compiled in 1391, the borough had acquired other properties, and the Burghard properties were distributed throughout the document, rather than identified en bloc – some having been subdivided. Apart from the so-called Newland Survey of ca.1279, which is actually a rental produced for the Bishop and his officers and is therefore not a borough document proper, the earliest surviving rental from Lynn is that which follows (King's Lynn archives C48/6).

Text from the original document in 1391 is presented in bolded black text. In the years immediately following its compilation, a few alterations were made to reflect changes in tenants and changes in value. Figures given in red are those which were inserted at a later date. Eventually a new rental would have had to be compiled.

The next, and only other medieval, rental to survive (KL/C48/7) can be dated to either September 1424 or September 1425 from the name the mayor; the death of tenant Robert Burgeys around October 1424 favours the earlier date, but the transfer of the town mill to John Wynch occurred in November 1424. Possibly the compilation of this rental was begun in September 1424 and was not completed until later in the year.

Whether there was any intermediate rental between 1391 and 1424 is uncertain, although it would seem probable. However, the section in the chamberlains' accounts on income from rents and farms had become so detailed by 1398/99 that it almost has the appearance of a rental; reflections of the order of listings in the 1391 rental can be seen in the 1398 account, although the latter is not as comprehensive. By that date the borough had added a grain mill and a fulling mill to its properties.

Light has been thrown upon the history of some tenements by those surviving of the deeds that the borough acquired along with the properties themselves. The 1398/99 chamberlains' account has also been helpful, and I append a few notes from this in blue text. Updates from the 1424 rental are similarly given as notes in blue text. Items in the 1424 document – parts of which also reflect the ordering in the 1391 rental – but seemingly not in that of 1391 (at least, not clearly identifiable with a 1391 item) are appended as a separate table following the 1391 rental; N.B. these are only extracts. For interest and comparison, I give at bottom of this page a list of the Gild Merchant income from property, extracted from the 1385/86 financial account of the Gild scabins.

It will be noted in that most cases property values appear to have fallen during the 1390s, but by 1424 some had recovered to the 1391 level. On the other hand, around that later period increasing expenditures on repairs and renovations were becoming necessary and several tenants were taken to task for not fulfilling their obligations in that regard. In 1434 the borough finally appointed an officer to take responsibility for supervision and upkeep of community-owned tenements.

Readers should beware of thinking that the tenants, lessees or farmers of the properties were necessarily personally resident therein.

Rental of all rents belonging to the community, made at Michaelmas in the 15th year of King Richard II, together with the reversion of rents of tenements and lands [? the last four words are faded and difficult to read] with [payments of] rents resolute for the same.

Rents of assize

| | | |
|-------------|---|------|
| Stonegate | John de Brunham for a tenement flanked by the tenement of the Prior of Lynn to the south, and the tenement of John Chaundeler to the north. [Brunham is best known as Margery Kempe's father. He was still the tenant in 1398. William Spire held for 12d in 1424.] | 12d. |
| | John Chaundeler [deleted and "Richard Peyntour of London" substituted] for a tenement flanked by the tenement of John Brunham to the south and the tenement of Thomas de Massingham to the north. [John Kenynghale was the tenant in 1398. Benedict Norwold held for 12d in 1424.] | 12d. |
| Skinner Row | William Foot for a tenement flanked by the tenement of John de Dounham brazier to the west and the tenement of Margaret de Betele to the east. [Thomas Scarlet was tenant, paying 14s., in 1424; his neighbours were Alan de Dounham (w.) and Thomas Spicer (e.).] | 14s. |
| Briggate | Robert Gryme chaplain for a tenement once of Giles Gryme, flanked by the tenement recently of John Shancel to the north and the tenement of John de Brunham to the south. [He was still the tenant in 1398; judging from a 1403 feoffment, he may have been holding as a trustee for the dower rights of Gile's widow, Margaret. Thomas Selby was tenant in 1417. Robert Gyle held for 20s. in 1424; the heirs of Nicholas de Geyton mason then held the tenement to the north.] | 20s. |

| | | |
|-----------------------------|---|-------------|
| Purfleet Lane | Richard Denby for a tenement flanked by the tenement of the same [Richard] to the west and the tenement of John Home to the east. [He was still the tenant in 1398 and in 1424, although Hugh Home had succeeded John Home by the latter date.] | 4d. |
| Mercer Row | John Home [deleted and "John Mafey" substituted] for a shop once of William de Ellingham flanked by the tenement of John Creyke to the north and the tenement of Peter Barbour to the south. [John Gryme had succeeded Mafey by 1424, paying 8s., with Bartholomew Systemer (n.) and Robert Sutton draper (s.) his neighbours.] | 8s. |
| | John Kempe [deleted and "Simon Kempe" substituted] for a tenement recently of Thomas Bury flanked by the tenement of Simon de Colkirke to the north and vacant land of the heirs of Roger de Buttele to the south. [John Kempe was father-in-law to Margery Kempe; he died in 1393. Simon Kempe (son of John) was in possession by 1398, and probably upon the death of his father. In 1424 William Spyr was tenant for 2s. and he also held the tenement to the north; Roger Galyon had held the tenement to the south (until his death ca. 1418).] | 2s. |
| Gresemarket | Cecilia de Massingham [deleted and "Thomas Lord" substituted] for a tenement flanked by the tenement of Thomas de Couteshale to the east and the messuage of Thomas Lord to the west. | 2s. |
| | Thomas Lord for a messuage flanked by the tenement of the said Cecilia to the east and a tenement once of William Hobeys to the west. [At some time before 1424, the two properties in Gresemarket were combined and William Whappelod was the tenant; in 1424 William Waterden was holding them for 3s.; his neighbours were Walter Barbour (w.) and George Holkham (e.)] | 12d. |

| | | |
|-------------------|--|---------------|
| Ratton Row | Agnes Crede for a tenement once of Robert Curre flanked by the tenement of Thomas de Waterden to the west and diverse cottages of John Wace and associates to the east. [She was still the tenant in 1398. Robert Burgeys held in 1424 for 4s.; on the grounds of old age, he retired from the office of constable in May 1424 (40 years after becoming a freeman) and his death required a replacement to be elected to the jurats in November. The rental shows no sign of awareness of his death – this document was not updated in the way the 1391 rental was.] | 4s. |
| | Total | 53s.4d |

Tenements demised at fee farm

| | | |
|---|--|-----------------------|
| The corner next to St. Margaret's church [Briggate] | John Waryn [deleted and "Thomas Abnale" substituted] for a tenement flanked by the tenement of Robert Braunch to the north and the tenement once of Hugh Folkard to the east. [This was one of the Burghard properties and was leased in 1379 to John Waryn and Adam de Aylesham (alias Waryn). Documents associated with Folkard's tenement in Butcher Row (see below) state that Waryn was operating a tavern there; this may have been named "The Bull" which, together with the early fourteenth century family after which "Bullweresrowe" (alias Butcher Row) was named, suggest that sale of livestock or meat had long been associated with this location. Aylesham and Abnale were tenants in 1402. Abnale was sole tenant in 1424 for 36s.8d. and still in 1428. The flanking tenement of the Braunch family, or perhaps a rent therefrom, also came into community hands, at some time after 1429.] | 36s. 30s. |
| Briggate | John Lokke [deleted and "Margery Lok" substituted] for a tenement flanked by the tenement of John de Brunham to the north and a tenement of John Lokke to the south. [Lokke died in 1393; he had probably sold this tenement to the community after suffering severe mercantile losses in 1388. (A young) Thomas Lok, John's grandson, was tenant in 1424 for 12s.; he also held the tenement to the south (two items down).] | 12s. |

| | | |
|----------------------------|---|-----------------------------------|
| | Thomas Hilberworthe [deleted and "Simon Kempe" substituted] for a tenement flanked by the tenement of the said Thomas to the south and a tenement of John Scot to the north. [This item ought to be reversed with the one that follows, in terms of topographical sequence. Kempe was the tenant in 1398. Thomas Belleyeter held in 1424 for 20s.; his neighbours were John Bryghtzeve (n.) and the master of the hospital of St. John (s.).] | 20s. 12s. |
| | Robert de Fransham for a tenement flanked by the tenement of Thomas de Couteshale to the north and a tenement once of John Scot to the south. [This tenement had previously been held by Robert's father Geoffrey de Fransham (died ca.1391) and by John Grantham (who received the lease in 1379 and likely held it until his death in 1384). The lease to Grantham indicates that the tenement was on the west side of Briggate and that Couteshale's was on the corner of Wingate; Grantham also held the property to the rear (west). Thomas Lok was tenant in 1424 for 20s.; his neighbours were John Bryghtzeve (s.) and John Bury vintner (n.).] | 20s. 10s. |
| Pillory Lane | Denise widow of John Chaundeler [deleted but substitution is illegible] for diverse shops flanked by [the tenement of] Alice S[wanton] to the east and the tenement recently of Buttele to the west. [By 1388 the community had acquired these 5 shops, saving the life right of Denise, widow of John de London chandler. See the Reversions section. They were on the north side of the lane. From 1409 John Thoresby held them; in 1419 he sought release from the farm and the corporation appointed a committee to make sure the properties were in good condition, before releasing Thoresby. However, after this good review, he then took up the lease again. Thoresby was still the tenant for 24s. in 1424., when the properties were described as 5 renters or cottages; Andrew Swanton was his neighbour to the east.] | 30s. for life 16s. |
| Gresemarket | Richard Methewolde for a tenement flanked by the tenement of Agnes de Couteshale to the west and the tenement of John Spayne to the east. [Robert Bowyer was the tenant in 1424 for 30s.] | 30s. |

| | | |
|--|---|-------------------------|
| At the Friars Preacher | Robert Burgeys lister for a tenement flanked by his tenement to the east and the tenement of Andrew de Swanton to the west. [Lister or listester was a medieval name for a dyer. He was still the tenant in 1398 and in 1419, when the tenement was described as "once of William Derham". Nicholas Aldirman had succeeded Burgeys by 1424, at the same rent.] | 20s. |
| Burghard Lane [Fincham Street in 1424] | John Bolt [deleted and "Richard Bole lister" substituted] for a tenement flanked by the tenement of Richard Dun to the west and a tenement of Elwis de Witton [? faded] to the east. [The was possibly the tenement with a quay on Purfleet in which John Bole et al. were enfeoffed in 1379. Richard Bole, or Beale, was followed (by 1419) as tenant by Bartholomew Petipas. Nicholas Martyn was tenant in 1424, for 33s.4d.; his neighbours were Edmund Bonet (e.) and (until recently) Thomas atte Lathe (w.) – earlier Robert de Docking.] | 40s. |
| | Thomas de Brunham of Happisburgh [deleted and "William Amberwyk" substituted] for a tenement flanked by the tenement of John Kempe to the east and a tenement of John Mafey to the west. [Amberwyk was the tenant in 1398. Thmas atte Lathe held in 1424 for 12s., having been preceded in tenancy by Amberwyk and (earlier) Robert de Docking; his neighbours were John Kempe (son of the 1391 tenant) (e.) and Edmund Bonet (w.).] | 12s. |
| | Geoffrey Gaysele for a tenement flanked by the tenement of dom. John de Docking chaplain to the west and a tenement of John Mafey to the east. [He was still the tenant in 1398.] | 26s.8d 30s. |
| Webster Row | Robert Chynche [deleted and "Thomas Waterden" substituted] for a tenement flanked by the tenement of Hugh Holbech to the north and the tenement of Thomas de Waterden to the south. [John de Jernemuth was the lessee in 1384 of 2 messuages on the east side of the Row. Waterden became the tenant in 1395, was still so in 1424 (for 12s.) when the property is described as 2 cottages or renters, and apparently so until his death, since his executor was dealing with the property in 1437; Holbech was still the northern neighbour in 1424.] | 12s. 10s. |

| | | |
|-----------------------------|---|-----------------------------|
| Purfleet Lane | John de Walsingham lister [deleted and "Simon Kempe for 5 marks" substituted] for a tenement flanked by the tenement of John de Brunham to the west and the tenement of Robert Bailly to the east, together with a quay there. [Walsingham leased this from the borough in 1386, probably for the £4 annually he was paying in 1388 when the property was referred to as formerly belonging to William de Ellingham. Kempe was the tenant in 1398, and was followed by John Brekerop (who had married Kempe's widow) who was still holding in 1422 but resisting paying arrears of the farm. Robert Narburgh held in 1424 for 53s.4d; his neighbours were John Chaundeler (w.) and Robert Hamond chaplain (e.).] | £4.10s.4d 53s.4d |
| Butcher Row | John Body for a tenement flanked by community tenements on either side, the which was once of Hugh Folkard while he was alive. [Folkard acquired this from Sir Thomas fitzRichard in 1364, and granted it to mayor and burgesses in 1382, when reference was made to John Waryn's tavern to the west (see above). However, community possession does not seem to have been secured until further legal transactions in 1384. The first reference to the borough farming it out is in the 1384/85 chamberlains' account; stalls were associated with the property. Why the flanking tenements do not appear to have been listed in the rental is a mystery, unless they were among those listed below in the section "Stalls next to St. Margaret's cemetery"; (see the 1424 rental extracts below for all three). Body was still tenant in 1408.] | 26s.8d |
| Pillory Lane | Robert de Kent [deleted and "John Lakinghithe and John Waryn" substituted, the latter name itself scored through] for a shop with curtilage flanked by the tenement of John de Houton to the east and diverse shops of Alice Swanton to the west. [A curtilage was a piece of open land adjacent to a building, such as a yard or courtyard. The shop was on the north side of the lane; before coming into the hands of the borough it was owned by John de Dunham (1376). Lakinghithe was the borough's tenant in 1398. It was possibly this property that in 1424 was described as a cottage, rented for 7s. by John Baker porter.] | 8s. 12d. |

| | | |
|--|--|-----------|
| | Total | £18.3s.4d |
| | [The figure has been deleted and £19.4s substituted, which would represent the correct total, rather than a later calculation based on the inserted changes in values.] | |

List [pagina] of tenements, shops, stalls, marshes and pastures leased annually

| | | |
|--------------------|--|----------------|
| Butcher Row | Thomas de Walsingham butcher for 1 stall. | 13s.4d 10s. |
| North gates | Henry Oldecorn [deleted and "John Aleyn" substituted] for 1 stall. | 12s. 8s. |
| | Hamon Bocher for 1 stall. | 10s. 8s. |
| | John Tydde for the tenement of Margaret Folkard. | 36s.8d |
| | John Tydde for 1 stall in front of the said tenement. | 16s. 30s. |
| | William Yorke for 1 tenement and 1 stall in front of it. [An inserted note indicates that this and the previous two items were (subsequently) held by Tydde for £4. 13s.4d.] | 28s. |
| | William Pye [deleted and "William Walpole carpenter" substituted] for 1 tenement. | 14s. |
| | John Wilowes for 1 tenement. [Later additions indicate that William Walpole held this and the previous item together for 40s. in 1393, and that later still Richard Clerk was the tenant.] | 13s.4d |
| South gates | Nicholas Taillour for 1 tenement, garden and herbage-croft. [At some point in the mid-1380s, Taillour (alias Tydde) – who was the gatekeeper (1386-1401) – leased this property for 10 years; it had previously been held by Alan Lister (a John Lister having been gatekeeper 1372-83). It was probably the property being leased out by the borough by 1367, when described as at the South Bretask (but in 1370 as at the south gates); at that time the land was not built on and was fetching only 10s. This property is listed in the 1424 rental, at the same rent, but no holder is mentioned; possibly it was understood as still being held by the gatekeeper.] | 53s.4d 40s. |

| | | |
|----------------------------------|--|--------------------------|
| Common Staith | Thomas Heryng [deleted and "William Caus" substituted] for the farm of a small boat there. [This would have been for a ferry-boat and the right to operate it across the Ouse. Hugh de Ellingham, who died sometime in the mid-1380s, bequeathed it to the community. Heryng was farming it from at least 1388. In 1424 the farm was valued at 20s.; no farmer was named but it had recently been John Spicer.] | 16s. 20s. |
| Outside East gates | John Cokfield [deleted and "John Jobard chaplain for 12d." substituted] for farm of chapel and garden. [The 1376/77 chamberlains' account refers to 2s. received from the farm of a garden next to the hermitage outside the East Gate (it lay to the east of Rondeshill); but see next item. In 1424 Jobard was still tenant, at the same rent, of what was described as a hermitage or chapel with garden. John Wesenham took over the farm of the hermitage (for 6s.8d) in 1428.] | 6s.8d |
| | Robert Pulter [deleted and "Alice wife of" substituted] for farm of pasture. [The 1388/89 chamberlains' account indicates that in 1386 Thomas Curson and Robert Pulter had taken a 10-year lease on this pasture, which was by the hermitage.] | 6s.8d 3s.4d |
| | INTERLINED: Thomas Morton [deleted and "Thomas Trussebut 2s.6d" substituted] for pasture. [This was part of a property – house, pasture and arable land at Dowshill – acquired in 1388 from Richard de Houton's executors and then leased to Morton, Lynn's town clerk, as a package for 16s.; however, Dowshill to the north of the town can only be considered "outside the east gates" by a stretch of the imagination.] | 2s.6d now 5s. |
| | William Draper for farm of a cottage and marsh. [This entry was voided because the community sold the property.] | 26s.8d |
| | Henry Cornish for farm of a parcel of herbage at the rear of St. John's. | 20d. nothing |
| Stonegate | Semela Parker for a shop. | 6s.8d |
| | John de Wormegeye for a shop. | 6s.8d |
| | Richard Waterleder [deleted and "Stephen Lucas" substituted] for a shop. | 6s.8d |

| | | |
|--------------------------------|--|----------------|
| | John Shepe [deleted and "Balteys" substituted] for a shop. [These four entries for Stonegate are jointly referred to by two subsequent additions: "John Brunham has them for 20s." and "now 16s.".Brunham was still the tenant of the 4 shops in 1398. In 1424 they were described as 4 renters and were still leased for 20s., but no lessee is identified.] | 6s.8d |
| Burghard Lane | William Lystere for 1 tenement. [This was one of the Burghard properties.] | 53s.4d 40s. |
| | INTERLINED: Thomas Wryght for 1 shop. | 10s. |
| | Diverse tenants for 1 tenement. | 40s. |
| Damgate and Pakker Lane | Margaret Colyn for 1 tenement. | 16s. |
| | Roger Spicer for 1 cottage. | 4s. |
| | John Smyth for 1 cottage. [These entries for Colyn, Spicer and Smyth are jointly superseded by a subsequent addition: "Richard de Thorpe 20s." Thorpe was the tenant of the tenement in Damgate and 3 cottages in Pakker Lane in 1398. In 1419 he was granted what appears to have been a renewal of the farm of 8 tenements and 4 cottages on the corner of Pakker Lane, but tried to back out of the arrangement a few days later; threatened with the collection of substantial arrears (£18), he shortly after reversed his position again and sought a renewal of the lease. In 1422 he was in trouble again, both for the arrears still owing and for failing to have carried out renovations on the properties. By May 1424 his son, Richard Thorpe junior had taken over, from his aged and ailing father, responsibility for the property and repairs thereto (the arrears were mostly pardoned); it was he who is listed in the rental drawn up in September, holding for 20s. what was then described as a tenement on the corner of Damgate and Pakker Lane.] | 4s. |
| | John de Kyrketon for 1 cottage. | 4s. |
| Ratton Row | Roger Spirlyng [deleted and "Agnes Mouth" substituted] for 1 cottage. | 4s. |
| | John Leek for 1 cottage. | 4s. |
| | Cecilia Shakhore for 1 cottage. | 4s. |

| | | |
|--------------------------------|---|-----------------|
| | Agnes de Bury for 1 cottage. | 4s. |
| | Thomas Clerk for 1 cottage. | 3s.4d |
| | Agatha Rideout for 1 cottage. | 4s. |
| | Thomas de Gedney for 1 cottage. | 4s. |
| | John de Bricham [deleted and "Chapman" substituted] for 1 cottage. | 5s. also 12d |
| | William Derby [deleted and "Cecilia Michel" substituted] for 1 cottage. | 4s.4d |
| | Agnes Mouth [deleted and "John Betteson" substituted] for 1 cottage. | 4s.4d |
| | John Colyn [deleted and "Carbrigge" entered superscript] for 1 cottage. | 4s also 2d |
| | John Neketon [deleted and "Lode" substituted] for 1 cottage. | 16s also 4d |
| | John Chamberleyn for 1 cottage. | 4s. |
| | Anna Doke for 1 cottage. | 4s. |
| | Alan atte Brygge [deleted and "John Moot" substituted] for 1 cottage. | 4s.6d |
| | John Burell for 1 cottage. | 5s. |
| | John Cranehouse for 1 cottage. [All these entries for Ratton Row are jointly superseded by a subsequent addition: "Andrew Swanton for £4"; at a later he claimed to have held the farm since 1395/96. Swanton was still the tenant of 21 cottages and 9 curtilages there in 1398 – in fact, until 1419, when the borough authorities released him from the farm, the cottages having fallen into disrepair. Bartholomew Systerne, who owned property immediately to the north, then took over the farm for 53s.4d annually; in the 1424 rental he is still found farming the 22 adjoining cottages there for the same amount.] | 4s. |
| Rear of Friars Preacher | Julian Scryven [deleted and "Geoffrey Pouchemaker" substituted] for 1 cottage. | 4s. 40s. |

| | | |
|--|---|------------|
| | Thomas Fower for 2 cottages. | 8s. |
| | Total [The figure has been deleted and £24 substituted; neither agrees with my calculations of just over £26.9s., but the numerous alterations and uncertainty about precisely when any alteration was made renders any calculation difficult.] | £22.13s.2d |

Curtilages in Ratton Row and places [called] tenters

[Curtilages and tenters were parcels of open land, probably used for some kind of industrial or artisan activity. Tenters seem to have been located to the east and southeast of Ratton Row.]

| | | |
|--|---|-------------|
| | Thomas Sherman for 1 parcel of curtilage. | 8d. |
| | William Waplode for 1 parcel of curtilage. | 8d. |
| | Bartholomew Cordewaner [deleted and "Geoffrey Evek shoemaker" substituted] for 1 parcel of curtilage. | 12d. |
| | Thomas Fower [deleted and "William Haireman" substituted] for 1 parcel of curtilage. | 10d. |
| | John Skulton for 1 parcel of curtilage. | 18d. |
| | John Hardy for 1 parcel of curtilage. | 18d. |
| | William Lystere [deleted and "John Skulton" substituted] for 1 parcel of curtilage. | 18d. 2s. |
| | John Colyn for 1 parcel of curtilage. | 2s. |
| | William Blakeney for 1 tenter. | 4s. |
| | [William Blakeney?] for 1 tenter. [The tenter entries have been voided.] | 4s. |
| | Total [The figure (which is correct) has been deleted and 10s.2d substituted.] | 17s.8d |

Couteshale's

Thomas Couteshale holds them at farm for £9

[These properties were likely those sold ca. 1390 by the executors of Cecilia, widow of John de Couteshale senior; Thomas was one of their sons.]

| | | |
|--------------------|---|-------------------------|
| Gresemarket | John de Brynkelowe for 1 tenement. | 24s. |
| | John Juwell [deleted and "Tailleur" substituted] for 1 tenement. | 24s. 22s. |
| | Thomas Sadeler for 1 tenement. | 46s.8d |
| | William Runham for 1 tenement. | 33s.4d |
| | Robert Furbour for 1 tenement. | 30s. |
| Jews Lane | Alice Herman [deleted and "John Watteson" substituted] for 1 tenement. | 28s. |
| | Robert Dekes [deleted and "John Chandeller" substituted ca.1395] for 1 tenement. | 16s. 24s. |
| | John Plesant [deleted and "William Candeller" substituted] for 1 tenement. | 32s. |
| | Alice Candeller [deleted and "Andrew Denby" substituted] for 1 tenement. | 14s. |
| | Henry Oldecorn [deleted and "John Aleyn" substituted] for 1 tenement. | 30s. |
| | John Watteson [deleted and "Bole" substituted] for 1 tenement. | 10s. |
| | INTERLINED: Also he [Couteshale?] holds a tenement in Jews Lane which Robert Pykerel held for life. [In 1424 a tenement with garden, once of Cecilia de Couteshale and afterwards of Robert Pykerel chaplain, had a rent of 24s but no tenant identified; it was flanked by the tenement once of Henry de Betele to the west and the tenement of the heirs of Thomas Hunt to the east. Pykerell had been Cecilia's chaplain and executor and had been bequeathed the property for life, in return for celebrating for her soul.] | 20s. |
| | Total | £14.8s |
| | [The figure (which is correct, ignoring the interlined item) has been deleted and £14.4s substituted.] | |

Stalls next to St. Margaret's cemetery

[This was the butchers' market. A few of the stalls were acquired ca. 1365 from townsmen and from Sir Thomas Beaupre, but the majority in 1369/70 from Sir Thomas fitzRichard. The rent resolute owed the Bishop (see below) was due from the former batch. By 1421 some butchers had transferred their place of business to Jews Lane or to their homes, to the damage of the butchers' market, and it was necessary to warn them against selling meat elsewhere than in the market; two years later a general ordinance to this effect was required. The 1424 rental seems to show that this was successful.]

| | |
|---|--------|
| William Hayward [deleted and "John de Tyd jun." substituted] for 1 stall. | 20s. |
| Henry Oldecorn for 1 stall. [This entry was voided.] | 18s. |
| William Dobbes [deleted and "John Watteson" substituted] for 1 stall. | 16s. |
| Herman Hayward [deleted and "William Pye" substituted] for 1 stall. | 16s. |
| Robert Dekes [deleted and "Richard Bocher" substituted; "Simon Body" also added] for 1 stall. | 8d. |
| John Brown for 1 stall. [This entry was voided.] | 15s. |
| John Tyd jun. [deleted and "John Glover" substituted] for 1 stall. | 16s. |
| Roger Bocher [deleted and "John Balteys" substituted] for 1 stall. | 13s.4d |
| Richard Clerc [deleted and "Thomas Barker" substituted; "Herman Hayward" also added] for 1 stall. | 8s. |
| John Watteson [deleted and "Richard Clerc" substituted] for 1 stall. | 8s. |
| John Tameworth [deleted and "John Kyng" substituted; "Walter Kyng" also added] for 1 stall. | 8s. |
| Roger Bailly for 1 stall. | 6s.8d |
| Roger de Geywode for 1 stall. | 6s.8d |

| | | |
|--|--|-----------|
| | John Bay [deleted and "Tameworth" substituted] for 1 stall. | 6s.8d |
| | Total [The figure is correct. See below for the 1424 listing.] | £8.13s.4d |

Coventry, near the aqueduct

[This was apparently property acquired from the Coventry family – a family not very prominent or long-lasting.]

| | | |
|-------------------|---|--------------------|
| | Agnes Gryme for the principal tenement recently of M. Coventre. [The added phrase "Thomas Brygge for 5 marks" appears to relate to this entry] [The tenement was described in 1337 as on the west side of Briggegate and north side of the common way leading to the Gildhall; i.e. it faced the Saturday Market. William de Coventry was working on acquiring it by 1353 and secured his possession through certain (typical) legal transactions in 1364. The borough acquired it – again through a group of burgess representatives – from the executors of William's widow in 1391. Brygge was still the tenant in 1398 of the tenement and a shop, which were opposite the St. Margaret's aqueduct, as well as of 4 other shops there - presumably those in the following items. In 1424 John Stephenson butcher held a tenement with a stall opposite St. Margaret's aqueduct, for 26s.8d and the property was categorized as being in Briggate.] | 40s. 36s. |
| | Nicholas Barbour for 1 shop. [The added phrase "26s. Richard Clerc holds" relates to this entry] | 20s. |
| | John de Lakinghithe for 1 shop. | 13s.4d |
| | John Betteson [deleted and "Roger Mercer" substituted] for 1 shop. | 12s. plus 1s.4d |
| | Maurice Baxter for 1 shop. | 3s. |
| | Roger Baxter for 1 stall. | 3s. |
| Lazarshill | John de Brunham [deleted and "Ralph Bedyngham" substituted] for pasture next to the Round Tower. [Brunham was still the tenant in 1398, when the tower was said to be near the north ditch. Lazarshill was in the northeast corner of the town, and the tower may have been part of the east gate. The same rent applied in 1424 but no tenant is mentioned.] | 4s. |

| | | |
|--|---|-----------|
| | Total [The figure (which is correct) has been deleted and £4.12s.8d substituted.] | £4.15s.4d |
|--|---|-----------|

Rents resolute

[These were rents paid BY the community on property it owned.]

| | | |
|----------------|---|-------|
| | To the Bishop of Norwich for the rent of butchers stalls next to St. Margaret's cemetery. | 16d. |
| | To the same for a close. [This rent due from "Le Scluse" (known by 1424 as the North Close) is an item in the earliest surviving chamberlains' roll (1319/20), as is the next item re. Gaywood water. Until the butchers stalls were acquired, these two properties appear to have been the only ones from which the borough was burdened with rents resolute.] | 12d. |
| Gaywood | To the same for watering at Gaywood. | 4d. |
| | To the same for a pasture called Rondeshill outside the east gates. [Rondeshill lay between the east gates and a mill at the northeast corner of the town. The pasture was being rented out for 4s. in 1424.] | 12d. |
| | To the same for a marsh there, once of Richard de Houton. [This was presumably part of the property acquired in 1388 from Houton's executors (see above).] | 9s. |
| [Butcher Row?] | To the same for a tenement recently of Hugh Folkard. | 8d. |
| | To the same for a tenement once of Robert de Shuldham and recently of Margaret Coventre. | 2s.6d |
| Gresemarket | To the same for a tenement once of Geoffrey Denby, now of Cecilia Couteshale. [Cecilia, widow of John Couteshale sen. died in 1389; the Cecilia mentioned here as if alive and holding property in 1391 may have been the Cecilia de Alemannia who received a bequest in the widow's will.] | 8d. |
| Jews Lane | To the same for a tenement once of John Mayn. | 21d. |

| | | |
|--------------------------------|---|--------|
| | To the same for a tenement in which John Couteshale sen. lived. [According to his widow's will, the capital tenement of herself (and presumably her husband) lay between Gresemarket and Jews Lane.] | 8d. |
| Burghard Lane | To the same for a tenement in which William Lystere dwells. | 6d. |
| Damgate | To the Prior of Lynn for a tenement in Damgate next to Pakker Lane. [This was one of the Burghard properties.] | 3s. |
| Gresemarket | To the Prior of Lynn for a tenement recently of Cecilia de Couteshale. | 16d. |
| Rear of Friars Preacher | To the Prior of Westacre for a cottage. [This was one of the Burghard properties.] | 2s. |
| South gates | To the Prior of Westacre for a tenement next to the gates. | 18d. |
| | To the collector of the leet of South Lynn for Bournewind. [Evidence from 1405 indicates that this property was near the South gate and probably the same as in the above item; the rent was owed to the leet of South Lynn itself.] | 4d. |
| Gresemarket | To Henry de Betele for a tenement next to that recently of John de Couteshale jun. | 12s. |
| [Butcher Row?] | To the Abbess of Chateriss for a tenement recently of Hugh Folkard. | 13s.4d |
| Gresemarket | To the Abbot of Sawtry for a tenement recently of Cecilia de Couteshale. | 12d. |
| Lazarshill | To the Prior of Chosele for pasture next to the round tower. | 12d. |
| | Total [I make the figure 54s. 11d.] | 55s.5d |

Reversions of tenements, curtilages and rents of assize

| | | |
|----------------------|---|---------------------|
| Burghard Lane | The tenement in which William Lystere dwells, with tenement and quay opposite; to revert to the community after the death of Thomas de Kenyng hale. [Kenyng hale was the husband and executor of Margaret, daughter of John Burghard. He continued to have life rights in some of his late wife's property; the borough was paying him a £13.6.8d annuity, as part of the deal, until about 1408. When combined with the costs of an annual mass for the Burghards and of maintenance of the properties the borough appears to have been running a deficit from this bequest.] | [no value assigned] |
| Ratton Row | Two cottages which, for the life of Thomas de Kenyng hale, are inhabited by paupers. Value of their farm: | 6s.8d |
| | An annuity held by the said Thomas shall also revert after his death. | £13.6s.8d |
| Damgate | From Robert de Waterden, after the death of Alice Furbour, from a tenement flanked by the tenement of Robert to the east, the Hospital of St. John Baptist to the west, and the highway to the south. [This reversion was acquired in the mid-1380s.] | 10s. |
| Damgate | From Thomas Paynot, after the death of Alice Furbour, from a tenement flanked by the tenement of William Bawsey to the west and the tenement of William de Snetesham, now steward of Lynn, to the east. | 4s. |
| | From John de Welle [deleted and "Lakinghithe for 2 marks" substituted], after the death of Alice Furbour, from a tenement flanked by the his tenement to the west and the tenement of Thomas Drewe to the east. [Lakinghithe was the tenant in 1398.] | 16s. |
| Butcher Row | From a tenement in which John Tydde sen. dwells, with a garden, in Butcher Row near St. Margaret's church, after the death of Margaret widow of H. Folkard. | 40s. |
| Pillory Lane | From 5 shops flanked by the shops of Alice de Swanton to the east and the tenement of the heirs of Buttele to the west, after the death of Denise Chaundeler. | 20s. |
| Jews Lane | From a tenement, after the death of Robert Pykerell chaplain. | [no value assigned] |

| | | |
|------------------|---|---------------------|
| Jews Lane | From a garden flanked by a tenement of the community to the west and the tenement of the Henry de Betele to the east, after the death of the said Robert. | [no value assigned] |
| | A rent, after the death of Alice widow of Adam Clerk. [In his will (1390) Adam prescribed that all the properties he had left his widow for life be sold and from the proceeds mayor and community were to have enough to buy 20s. annual rent.] | 20s. |
| | A ferry-right, after the death of [blank] daughter of Robert Braunch deceased, for which the community must celebrate annually one mass in St. Margaret's for the souls of Robert, his wife, his sons and daughters. [This arrangement was made in 1378 by the daughter Joan, the only offspring mentioned in Robert's will; she was still alive in 1399. The right was valued in 1398 at 16s. In 1424 its farm was valued at 24s.; no farmer was named, although Alice Dymmok had recently held the farm.] | [no value assigned] |

Memorandum that the tenements below were leased out in 1394/95

| | | |
|----------------------|--|---------------------|
| Damgate | John Lakinghithe, one tenement. | 43s.4d |
| Butcher Row | William Walpole, a house. | 40s. |
| [Butcher Row?] | A tenement which John Tydde and Wilowes now lease. | [no value assigned] |
| Purfleet Lane | A tenement with a shop, to a certain Walter. | [no value assigned] |
| Jews Lane | A tenement with garden, leased as a result of the death of Robert Pykerell. | [no value assigned] |
| At St. James' | John Clerk for 1 cottage. | 5s. |
| | Matilda Geynesbergh for 1 cottage. | 5s. |
| | William Tailleur for 1 cottage. | 5s. |
| | Richard Porter for 1 cottage. | 6s. |
| | Robert Salisbury for 1 garden. | 6s.8d |

Rental of all rents [2 or 3 words illegible due to damage] of the community of Lynn, renewed 17 September in the time of John Permonter mayor.

Rents of assize

| | | |
|------------|---|------|
| Damgate | Edmund Massyngham for a tenement once of Thomas Paynot flanked by the tenement of John Mafey (e.) and the tenement of John Dalham (w.). | 4s. |
| | William Norfolk draper for a tenement once of Robert Waterden. | 9s. |
| Baxter Row | Thomas Waterden for a tenement once of Margaret Sharyngton opposite "le Baxtercunte" [conduit?]. [The conduit may have been the one running along Damgate past the north end of Baxter Row. Sharyngton was Waterden's mother-in-law; she died in 1392. Waterden was renting the tenement from the community by 1398.] | 10s. |

Fee farms

| | | |
|-------------|---|--------|
| Gresemarket | Walter Aleyn for two shops. | 26s.8d |
| | Hugh Sporier for a tenement. | 24s. |
| | Thomas Scarlet for a tenement flanked by a tenement of the community (w.) and a tenement recently of John Broun and now of John Copnote (e.). [It is probable that some or all of these 3 items were listed in 1391 in the "Couteshale's" section.] | 30s. |
| Jews Lane | Thomas Scarlet for a tenement flanked by the garden of John Permonter (w.) and the tenement of John Perche (e.). And for another tenement, flanked by the tenement of the heirs of Henry de Betele, now of Walter Reyms (e.). | 33s.4d |

| | | |
|-----------------|--|--------|
| | John de Wesenham for a tenement flanked by his own tenement (e.) and by the tenement recently of Thomas Hunte (w.). [Wesenham claimed to have been farming this since 1395/96 (for 33s.4d); at the time of this claim, in 1419, he was 7 years in arrears of payment of the farm. Because of money owed him by the corporation, it pardoned him the arrears and reduced his farm to 26s.8d.] | 26s.8d |
| Damgate | Walter Thornage for a tenement flanked by the tenement of Ellen Ferour (w.) and the tenement of William Waterden (e.). | 26s.8d |
| | The master of St. John's hospital for an empty plot of land behind the hospital. | 12d. |
| Sparrow Hall | Thomas Lok for a tenement called Sparrow Hall opposite the Charnel, flanked by the tenement of Thomas Burgh (n.) and the lane (s.). [The Charnel was in St. Margaret's churchyard.] | 23s.4d |
| Butcher Row | Robert Pynder for half a tenement with a stall. | 32s. |
| | John Petyclerk for the eastern half of the tenement (above) with a stall. [The tenement jointly held by Pynder and Petyclerk was to the east of the Braunch and Abnale properties listed in the 1391 rental as flanking the tenement in Briggegate, opposite St. Margarets] | 32s. |
| | Nicholas Martyn for a tenement with two stalls, flanked by the tenement of Petyclerk and Pynder (w.). [This is the property held by John Body in 1391 (see the "fee farm" section).] | 26s.8d |
| | Simon Body for a tenement with 2 stalls, flanked by the tenement of Nicholas Martyn (w.) [Body, a butcher, leased this in 1408, when it was described as a messuage with 2 stalls and a garden.] | 33s.4d |
| Baxter Row | John Saltwyn for a tenement. | 13s.4d |
| Fee farm leases | | |
| Gresemarket | Walter Aleyn for two shops. | 26s.8d |
| Butcher Row | Robert Pynder for 2 stalls. | 18s.4d |

| | | |
|----------------|--|--------|
| | Thomas Bateman butcher for 1 stall. | 7s. |
| | John Perche butcher for 1 stall. | 16s. |
| | John Parfey butcher for 1 stall. | 14s. |
| | William Walpole butcher for 1 stall. | 14s. |
| | William Pye butcher for 1 stall. | 14s. |
| | William Fraunceys butcher for 1 stall. | 8s. |
| | William Keele butcher recently held a stall. | 10s. |
| | Geoffrey Somerby butcher for 1 stall. | 14s. |
| | Thomas Seyver butcher recently held a stall. | 8s. |
| | Henry Oldecorn butcher for 1 stall. | 5s. |
| | Robert Makerell butcher recently held a stall. | 5s. |
| | Richard Gylberd butcher for 1 stall. | 5s. |
| | Ralph Shirewynd butcher for 1 stall. | 5s. |
| | Clement Makerell butcher for 1 stall. | 5s. |
| | Thomas Bocher recently held a stall. | 5s. |
| Briggate | John Beelson chapman for a tenement. | 13s.4d |
| | Richard Rust for a tenement. | 13s.4d |
| | Peter Palgrave for a tenement. | 26s.8d |
| Gresemarket | William Stowe joiner for a tenement. [Possibly listed in 1391 in the "Couteshale's" section.] | 33s.4d |
| Fincham Street | John Feltewell lister for a tenement flanked by the tenement recently of John Berewyk bowyer (e.) and the tenement of John Kempe (w.). | 60s. |
| | William Furbour for a parcel of garden by the chapel and hermitage of St. John. | 18d. |

| | | |
|---|--|-----|
| | A pasture under the walls, extending within the town from the North Close to Mill Fleet and beyond to Scales Mill gates. | 4s. |
| Mill | John Wynch miller for a mill leased him with 2 cottages and gardens opposite St. James chapel. (Of the rent, 20s. belongs to the Bishop and 20s. to the Prior of Lynn). [This would have been the grain mill, whose site was acquired by the town from the Bishop, for an annual farm of 20s., in August 1392. The king's ratification of this agreement, the following month, indicated the site (to be selected by the burgesses) was to be on Millfleet where Swagges Mill had once stood, or between that site and the Gannock gate (one of the lesser gates on the east boundary of the town). The burgesses were admonished: not to damage the fleet when excavating for the new mill; not to block the fleet's course, which ran eastwards to the Bishop's demesne at Mintling; not to allow the mill to back up water so that floods resulted, as had happened with Swagges Mill; and to ensure the causeway (raised road) on the north side of the fleet was maintained. Robert Perch miller had leased the mill for three years in July 1424, but he later complained that bakers and others were not bringing corn to him to have it ground; in November the borough released him from the arrangement and leased the mill to Wynch for seven years. Wynch probably encountered the same problem for, in March 1426 the borough issued an order for all bakers to grind their grain at the town mill; but the problem persisted and, shortly after the end of Wynch's term, the borough passed an ordinance obliging townsmen to take their grain to the town mill. The cottages and gardens had been associated with the farm of the mill since at least 1399.] | £26 |
| Other rents belonging to the community [Additions, probably ca. 1426-28.] | | |
| The Chequer | The heirs of William Spire for an empty plot of land on the north side of their tenement. [Spire died in 1427. The Chequer was a street leading south from the Tuesday Market.] | 5s. |
| | The mayor and community for a new extension of a common fleet into an empty plot lying between the road and the lands of the hospital of St. John and the Friars Preacher (w.) and the meadow of John Ashenden (e.), extending between Sewolds Bridge (n.) and the road lying by John's meadow (s.). | 2d. |
| Webster Row | John Waryn for a lane north of his tenement. | 6d. |

Richard Eberard plumber for licence to build on the common fleet east of his tenement.

4d.

go to top of page

[Extracts from] The account of John Dunham, William Wyth, Thomas de Waterden and Thomas Fawkes, scabins of Holy Trinity Gild, 28 May 1385 to 17 June 1386.

Rents of assize, farms of houses, and ferry liberties

Rents of assize and the account of the ferry [right] belonging to the gild.
[Operation of the ferry to West Lynn was farmed to Thomas Outlagh for 13s.4d. This was probably the ferry sold to the gild in 1323 by William de Benecroft and Henry de Betele.]

£4.7s.8d

The farm of shops on the east side of the common quay and of the tenement next to the gildhall.
[The individual (i.e. unamalgamated) accounts of each scabin, which also survive for this year, indicate that the gild received rents from the following structures on east, north and south sides of the quay (the west side being the river): 11 cellar/solars, 2 cellars, 1 solar, and 9 shops. Roger Paxman was the tenant of the property next to the gildhall.]

£7.15s.4d

The farm of all cellars with solars on the south side of the common quay, with shops at the Watergate.
[The Watergate was a lane leading from the Tuesday Market to the common quay. The gild received rents from 11 shops there.]

£12.6s.8d

The farm of tenements and shops with quays in Stokfish Row.
[The properties from which the gild received rents included 1 booth with 2 cottages, 1 booth alone, and a tenement, all of which had part of a quay associated.]

£7.9s.0d

The farm of the tenement recently of William de Swanton in Briggate.
[Lambert Draper was the tenant at this time.]

£3.6s.8d

The farm of all cellars and solars on the north side of the common quay, with the farm of the tenement recently of Sabina Blower opposite St. Margaret's.

£12.17s.8d

The farm of all gild houses in the Woolmarket.
[The Woolmarket was a street heading eastwards to St. Nicholas' from the northeast corner of the Tuesday Market.]

£5.0s.0d

| | | |
|---|-------|-----------|
| | Total | £53.4s |
| The farm of rents of Joan Costyn, widow of John Costyn, from various tenements, as appears in a rental made of the same, which he bequeathed to the gild. | | £13.6s.9d |

Lynn history

main menu

appendix 1

History of medieval Yarmouth

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth | Development of local government
Buildings and fortifications | Economy | Information sources
Plan of Yarmouth at the close of the Middle Ages
Yarmouth bailiffs and chamberlains
Appendix 1: Yarmouth by-laws
Appendix 2: Register of the Hospital of St. Mary

Origins and early growth

In the medieval mind, Yarmouth was associated with herring, a high-protein food important to the diet of the lower classes, which featured less meat than is eaten today. The thirteenth century seal of the borough bore depictions of a ship sailing herring-inhabited waters and, on the other side, St. Nicholas, a patron saint of fishermen. The fishery provided the reason for Yarmouth's foundation and the principal source of its medieval economy.

Great Yarmouth – the qualifier distinguishing it from its southern neighbour, Little Yarmouth – is situated near where several rivers, among them the Yare, flow into what was once a very broad estuary (much larger than the present-day Breydon Water) opening out into the sea. In Roman times there was a port and market town a little further north, at Caistor, and a small fort at Burgh Castle; these were later abandoned. Subsequent settlement focused on the site of Great Yarmouth itself. Tradition has the first settlement there established by the Saxon leader, Cerdic, ca. 495, but this is unsubstantiated and doubtful.

More certain is that silting in the mouth of the "Great Estuary" over time formed a huge sandbank that came to be several miles long, leaving the Yare access into the sea through two channels at either end of the sandbank; one channel separated Yarmouth and Caister, the other ran southwards for some miles and separated Great and Little Yarmouth/Gorleston before entering the sea. This sandbank eventually became firm enough to support dwellings, perhaps preceded by more temporary facilities for the drying, salting and smoking of herring, as well as the sale of herring. Fishermen from the Cinque Ports claimed a long-standing right to beach their boats and to dry their nets there. A fair may have been in operation there by the time of Edward the Confessor, during the forty days from Michaelmas to Martinmas when the fishery was at its peak; in later times this important fair attracted not only the Cinque Ports men, but also fishermen from the continent. The Cinque Ports had authority over the fair, through officers they appointed, which was subsequently resisted and then contested by Yarmouth. Another indication that Cinque Ports fishermen were likely among the founders of the town is that rents from some Yarmouth properties were due to the Ports.

Yarmouth was a borough in the royal domain before and at the time of the Domesday survey, but an earlier shared jurisdiction is reflected in that Yarmouth had to pay every "third penny" of all public revenues (e.g. tolls and rents) to the earl. The number of burgesses living there – 70 in 1066 according to Domesday – suggests that its fishery was already important by this date, although Yarmouth was certainly a small town compared to Norwich or Ipswich, with a few hundred residents in all. As a "frontier town" it had no important role in regional administration; the king never licensed a mint there. Domesday noted one church there, dedicated to St. Benedict.

Throughout the late medieval period the town suffered from progressive silting of parts of the channel used as a haven for ships. Early settlement appears to have focused on the most elevated part of the sandbank, near the northern channel. In 1101 the Bishop of Norwich built a chapel in that neighbourhood (superseding a more modest building on the beach intended to celebrate divine service during the fishing season) and, in the 1120s founded St. Nicholas' church by the northern channel; a Benedictine cell of the Norwich cathedral-priory was established in association with St. Nicholas'. Here too was the site of the borough marketplace, perhaps originally stretching east-west across the width of the town from the river channel to the beach facing the sea, although over the course of the Middle Ages the original shape of the market was obscured as parts were built upon – including the hypothetical western section, but also a large chunk on the eastern side was consumed by the foundation of St. Mary's Hospital.

Silting of the northern channel, to the point where it was unusable, subsequently encouraged population to expand southwards along the line of the southern-running channel and to relocate the haven in this channel. The bank of this channel became lined with quays, in contrast to the opposite side of the town – the great beachy area, or "Denes" (dunes?) facing the sea, on which would have been visible fishing-boats, nets stretched out to dry, and windmills. Although the section around St. Nicholas had been abandoned by most residents when wall construction was begun, the church itself remained important to the town; a major expansion was undertaken shortly before the mid-fourteenth century. Consequently, the line of the town wall was extended just far enough north to encompass the church. The southern channel too, however, experienced problems and at various times in the Late Middle Ages the townsmen had to cut new harbours.

Development of local government

In the twelfth century we have mentions of a reeve as the governing authority of Yarmouth, but this was an officer appointed by the king. In 1208, the king leased to the town (in return for a fee farm of £55) its first powers of self-administration; the royal charter granted:

- the status of a "free borough";
- the right to choose the executive officer of local government;
- administration of justice (in certain matters of common law and local custom) through a weekly husting court;
- a merchant gild, although such an institution has no prominence in Yarmouth's medieval records – its role and privileges (such as the right to make the first offer for newly-arrived herring catches) perhaps quickly being absorbed into local citizenship/government; in the sixteenth century, the Trinity Gild had ceremonial functions that suggest it to have been a possible successor to, or remnant of, a merchant gild;
- exemption for the burgesses from paying tolls on goods they brought into other English towns (London excepted);
- and various other powers or exemptions typical of that period.

When, in the 1220s, holders of the borough executive office begin to be identified, we see there to be 4 bailiffs, elected annually, rather than the earlier single reeve. This multiplication is probably associated with the fact that the town was divided into four "leets" (wards) for administrative purposes. Unlike in Norwich, where the leets reflected early settlements that coalesced into one city, there seems no special rationale in the Yarmouth divisions; the original boundaries are unknown and the names indicate a straightforward division of the town into northern and southern halves, each of which was in turn subdivided.

Political conflict in or shortly before 1272, serious enough to have become violent, resulted in a set of reform ordinances which included the introduction of a town council to assist the bailiffs in governing Yarmouth. A few years later, officers responsible for the borough treasury (known as "the pyx") – its safeguard and the deposit and withdrawal of funds – were introduced. In 1426 we see further constitutional changes, as the balance of power within the community shifted from democracy to oligarchy; the number of bailiffs was reduced, a second-tier council was created, and chamberlains were put in charge of borough finance. Lesser officials of Yarmouth's administration included, in addition to the usual town clerk and sergeants (or sub-bailiffs), a water-bailiff involved in the collection of customs at the port, and occasionally officers (muragers) responsible for supervising the building of town walls and collecting the revenues to support that activity (later the chamberlains took over the collecting duty).

The centre of medieval administration was originally the Tolhouse (which still stands today), the site of the borough court; this building must have been too small for community assemblies and we hear in mid-fourteenth century of a "common hall", which may have been the same as the sixteenth-century Guildhall on the south side of St. Nicholas' churchyard.

The Tolhouse

Note the grill (below), which allowed prisoners in the gaol to beg necessities from passers-by.

photos © S. Alsford

The borough court sat each Monday to deal with civil pleas, most criminal pleas being reserved for the borough coroners or the king's courts. As the volume of business increased, sessions were extended to other days and some specialization – such as in legal transactions dealing with real estate or debt – began to take place, although this ceased when court business dropped off in the fifteenth century. One day each June was dedicated to hearing presentments from each of the leet courts. Cases involving merchants from other places might be held on any day, in order to render swift justice. During the annual fair, court sessions were held daily rather than weekly – again reflecting the need for quick resolution of commercial disputes; these sessions were, at least by 1277, presided over jointly by Yarmouth's bailiffs and those representing the Cinque Ports, although perhaps previously by the latter only. The Cinque Ports bailiffs had been given by the king, in 1215, the right to administer justice in cases involving their fellow townsmen while in Yarmouth, and Hastings had (or claimed) an even older legal jurisdiction there.

The jurisdiction of Cinque Ports bailiffs during the time of the herring fair did not sit well with the Yarmouth authorities, and relations with the Cinque Ports were frequently quarrelsome – if not violent – in the thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries. Following the suppression in 1265 of de Montfort's rebellion, which the Cinque Ports had supported, Henry III showed some favour to Yarmouth, but in 1272 disturbances in the town and Yarmouth's role in the Norwich riots counteracted this. In 1277, after complaints from Yarmouth, Edward I intervened to impose a compromise involving shared jurisdiction. But this proved no solution, and there were repeated mediations, attempts at settlements, as well as fines for breaches of the peace during the reign of Edward I. At one point the Yarmouth and Cinque Ports contingents of a royal fleet set to fighting each other, with the loss of at least 25 Yarmouth ships resulting. In 1300, Yarmouth's administration passed ordinances attempting to regulate the fair; for example, they specified that townsmen should be appointed to assess the quality of goods offered for sale. By 1314, the Yarmouth authorities were so much in the ascendant that it was the Portsmen's turn to seek the king's support for their jurisdictional rights at the fair. By 1316, matters had deteriorated to the point where the sides were preparing fleets to attack each other. The Cinque Ports' rights were confirmed by Edward III in the Statute of Herring (1357), which revealed the extent of Yarmouth's control over the fishery. The quarrel between the two sides gradually quietened, as they refocused their hostilities against a common enemy, France, but was not finally resolved until the Tudor period.

Yarmouth also turned its attentions to another rival. The constant silting up of Yarmouth's harbour, combined with merchants' desire to avoid paying borough customs, was during the second half of the fourteenth century prompting ships to land goods at Kirkley Road in the Lowestoft area. Using the argument that the town had become depopulated and impoverished and its ability to defend the coast as well as its financial obligations to the king were in jeopardy, Yarmouth successfully petitioned Edward III to annex this haven and to prohibit loading or unloading of cargo (or the holding of a rival fair) anywhere else within a seven-mile radius (1372); the king added £5 to the town's fee farm as payment for this extended jurisdiction. Naturally, Lowestoft was not pleased about this. The Yarmouth-Lowestoft struggle became a factor in national politics: the king (who had to be concerned about the supply of herring as well as the viability of Yarmouth as an element in coastal defence) was largely sympathetic, but parliament was hostile to Yarmouth and repealed the annexation in 1376. However, Yarmouth managed to obtain the patronage of John of Gaunt and overturn the repeal. For some years the matter went back and forth, with repeals and restorations, ending eventually in a compromise in 1401.

The interminable and largely insoluble disputes with the Cinque Ports and Lowestoft were fairly typical manifestations in a medieval town seeking to define and expand its authority. Similar rivalries found expression with Norwich, a long-standing rival for trade using the River Yare, and with Little Yarmouth/Gorleston, regarding jurisdiction over the Yare and associated harbourage. The latter produced several royal charters attempting, with little success, to bring matters to a satisfactory compromise; the general tenor was to confirm Great Yarmouth's jurisdiction over the haven, allowing the men of Little Yarmouth that victuals or goods not subject to customs could still be landed on their side of the river, but forbidding them to try to entice other cargoes there.

Buildings and fortifications

Yarmouth is famous for its "Rows", a series of passages – too narrow to be called streets – separating the medieval tenements; by the end of the Middle Ages there were some 150 of them. The close packing of buildings, with only narrow streets separating the rows of houses, was not unusual in medieval towns, although the extent to which this was applied in Yarmouth is atypical; many of Yarmouth's passages survived into the twentieth century only to be destroyed (with a few exceptions) during the Second World War. This system of laying out the land-holdings of the townsmen is evidenced as early as 1198, and continued into the thirteenth; most rows were named after some prominent family residing there. During that period the population of Yarmouth expanded considerably; we hear from chroniclers that 2,000 inhabitants died during floods in 1286, and 7,000 died in the Black Death, although these figures must be taken with a pinch of salt – the town's population in the early fourteenth century was more likely around 5,000. The rows all ran east-west (i.e. between the river and the shore), while the few main streets of the town ran north-south, reflecting the gradual spread of population southwards from its original focus. Apart from routes by the waterfronts, there were three main streets cross-cutting the rows: Northgate, Middlegate and Southgate. However, it is debateable whether this grid pattern warrants Yarmouth being considered a "planned town".

During the fourteenth century, Yarmouth's government was faced with two major construction challenges which were very expensive: the provision of stable harbour facilities, and the building of town defences.

Yarmouth is one of the English towns where a relatively large percentage of the medieval town walls is still standing. These walls were built over a long period, without any apparent overarching plan, although the intent was primarily defence against maritime-based enemies: the line of the wall, with its many gates and towers, protected the seaward facing side of the town, leaving the Yare channel to be an obstacle to any attack from landside.

Yarmouth's medieval defences

Two towers from the southern stretch of the borough's walls.
photos © S. Alsford

Royal licence to enclose the town with wall and ditch, and to collect special tolls under the title of murage, was first acquired in 1261 (in the context of the de Montfort rebellion). The following year saw complaints from non-local merchants that murage was being collected from them, but they saw no evidence that any wall-building was going on; the king consequently seized the money collected. In 1279 he audited the town's murage accounts, after receiving complaints of corruption. It seems that construction work had still not begun; in fact, no work is known to have been undertaken before 1285. Nonetheless, the king recognized the importance of Yarmouth as a coastal defence and authorized murage on several occasions during the fourteenth century. However, particularly in those periods of greatest threat of invasion, which spurred renewed efforts on the defences, income could not keep pace with expenditure, despite occasional bequests from townsmen towards the work. In the face of a renewed French offensive, all townsmen were, in 1369, ordered by the king to contribute to the costs of strengthening the defences. By 1385/86, construction was still incomplete, and some of the walls that had been built were by now falling into disrepair; again the threat of invasion prompted the king to order everyone owning property in the town to contribute to costs. In 1457 the king allowed Yarmouth to apply to the work £20 of the fee farm due him.

Maintenance and periodic relocation of the haven must have been a similarly daunting task, but one even more crucial to Yarmouth since the commerce on which the borough economy (including local government revenues) depended was in turn dependent on a safe harbour. Silting had necessitated a new harbour entrance to be cut in 1346. By 1378, silting had resulted in the water no longer being deep enough to admit ships into the harbour. Despite a partial refocus of its attentions on the harbour at Kirkley Road, in the 1390s Yarmouth built a new haven, financed partly through a special levy of a shilling per last of herring. But by 1409 this too was in trouble and the king gave permission for £100 to be taken each year for 5 years from import/export customs, to finance yet another new haven. This one lasted for the remainder of the medieval period, although costly to maintain (again prompting the king to release the town, for several years, from part of its fee farm).

Economy

Like several other East Anglian towns, Yarmouth's location gave it advantageous access to the Low Countries and the Baltic, as well as to the river system leading into the English interior. Its economy was relatively specialized, it being the country's principal centre for the herring fishery; this stimulated related industries, such as the curing of herring, and boat-building – an industry which also provided vessels for other mercantile activities.

Yarmouth did all it could to monopolize the trade in herring, largely through provisions for hosting. One of the forms this took was that visiting merchants were assigned to townsmen, who supplied accommodations and business assistance in return for a quarter of the hosted merchant's merchandize. Another form was for a townsman to equip and supply a fishing-boat during a season, in return for the right to purchase the entire catch of that boat. Yarmouth's leading merchant families dominated the hosting system; they also acted contrary to fair market practice by buying herring catches while still at sea and by threats of violence to encourage fishermen to sell their catches or to discourage foreign merchants from buying herring. The king's Statute of Herring (1357) – targeted particularly at Yarmouth, after complaints were voiced in parliament – attempted to combat such monopolistic features, as well as to limit the commission hosts demanded for selling the herring of hosted merchants and to limit the amount of profit from re-sale of herring by merchant middlemen. But it proved difficult to enforce the provisions, there being no will locally to do so. Ordinances drawn up by the Yarmouth administration aimed at reinforcing the dominance of local men. Those of 1300 restricted the rights of outsiders with fish to sell, while defining the rights of hosts and the rights of all townsmen to demand a share of cargoes. Those of 1413 created wardens to supervise the herring trade and required fishermen to sell a portion of their catches (regardless of any arrangements with hosts), through these wardens, to townsmen.

In part because of its fishery, but also because it was a key defensive post on the east coast, Yarmouth was also an important maritime base. Many townsmen were ship-owners, and during the first half of the fourteenth century the town was the largest provider of ships north of the Thames for the navy during the wars with Scotland and France; for the siege of Calais in 1346, for example, it supplied 43 ships – compared to 25 from London, 19 from Lynn, 12 from Ipswich, and 25 of the king's own ships. At different times, three townsmen were even appointed to the rank of admiral of the northern fleet (notably John Perbroun, who commanded the northern fleet at the victory of Sluys).

Contributing ships was an unpopular obligation and was resisted. It of course exposed townsmen to the risks of damage or loss of their ships during war – for which the king rarely provided compensation. Equally important, the often long periods of "arrest" of ships, in preparation for their being called into action, deprived townsmen of the transportation needed to pursue their livelihoods. Furthermore, the town was occasionally required to provide supplies for expeditionary forces, and the king was not prompt in paying for these. By the middle of the fourteenth century, Yarmouth was seeking fee farm relief on the grounds that it had lost more than half of the fleet of some 90 ships that served it in the 1330s, while the war had made fishing boats one of the targets for attack and had generally disrupted maritime trade. Yarmouth's loss of a maritime defensive capability, and the failure of the townsmen to invest in rebuilding their fleet, is one reason why the king put more emphasis in the second half of the century on completing Yarmouth's walls.

A large fleet whose sailors were experienced in naval warfare doubtless contributed in encouraging Yarmouth ships to resort to piracy. Such acts were sometimes directed against the ships of England's enemies, but might equally well be against ships of its allies, or even English ships. An investigation of 1340 accused 34 Yarmouth ships of piratic activities. Yarmouth's ships were similarly the target for piratic attacks. The fleet also came in useful for raiding the Cinque Ports.

Yarmouth's geographical advantages resulted in it surpassing in wealth the larger and longer-established Norwich by mid-fourteenth century; of provincial towns, it had the fifth highest assessment in the national tax of 1334. But it suffered from the general economic recession later in the century, from the continual problems with the silting of its harbour, from the draining effects of the constant competition with rivals for control of trade, and from losses to its merchant fleet from war, piracy and shipwreck. In the second half of the fourteenth century, the herring trade was in decline, perhaps initially as depopulation caused by the Black Death reduced demand, but later because the coastal supply of herring was itself dwindling – fifteenth century fishing took place further out to sea – and was subject to greater competition from the fishermen of northern France and the Low Countries. This was offset a little by rising prices – by the close of the century herring was no longer the cheap dietary staple it had been at the beginning.

In the latter half of the fourteenth century, Yarmouth became a rival to Norwich for the status of staple town controlling the wool export trade. As early as 1319, Yarmouth was trying to persuade the king to appoint it a staple town. When Norwich was so appointed in 1353, Yarmouth expressed its resentment by stopping vessels from proceeding up-river to the city. In 1369, however, Yarmouth was chosen over Norwich as the staple, and in the 1390s the role fluctuated between the two towns. Nonetheless, wool exports never became a very significant part of Yarmouth's trade, nor was the trade in wine particularly important to the local economy. Local merchants appear to have relied on smuggling to increase their profits, which was not too difficult when they themselves were the holders of the various royal posts associated with customs collection or policing of smuggling. As the wool trade diminished, Yarmouth followed the regional trend of turning to the export of cloth, and this trade was of some importance to the town into the early sixteenth century.

Information sources

The following is a small selection of published sources of information about medieval Yarmouth. For additional secondary sources as well as primary sources, see the bibliography to The Men Behind the Masque.

Ecclestone, J.P., and J.L. Ecclestone. The Rise of Great Yarmouth: the Story of a Sandbank. Norwich, 1959.

Palmer, Charles John, ed. The History of Great Yarmouth by Henry Manship, Town Clerk, temp. Queen Elizabeth. Great Yarmouth, 1854.

Palmer, Charles John. The History of Great Yarmouth, Designed as a Continuation of Manship's History of that Town. Great Yarmouth, 1856.

Palmer, Charles John. The Perlustration of Great Yarmouth, with Gorleston and South-town. 3 vols. Great Yarmouth, 1872-75.

Rutledge, Elizabeth and Paul Rutledge. "King's Lynn and Great Yarmouth, two thirteenth-century surveys." Norfolk Archaeology, vol.37 (1978), 92-114.

Saul, A. "Great Yarmouth and the Hundred Years War in the fourteenth century." Bulletin of the Institute of Historical Research, vol.52 (1979), 705-15.

Saul, A. "Local Politics and the Good Parliament." Pp.156-71 in Property and Politics: Essays in Later Medieval English History, ed. T. Pollard. Gloucester, 1984.

main menu

appendix 1

History of medieval Yarmouth

[MAIN MENU]

APPENDIX 1: Yarmouth by-laws

The local records of medieval Yarmouth are focused on a fine series of court rolls; unfortunately these do not extend a great deal beyond coverage of judicial matters (albeit broadly interpreted), although in mid-fifteenth century they diversified a little to include accounts of borough revenues. There is no extant medieval custumal, nor any volume compiling local by-laws until the Book of Oaths and Ordinances (Yarmouth C18/1) begun in the Tudor period. This does, however, include the texts of older documents giving ordinances made at several times between 1272 and 1491 (when a custumal was compiled – which must to some degree reflect earlier practices). The ordinances of 1300 were copied from a now missing volume called the "Golden Book", which might have been a medieval custumal (but more probably was a book of general memoranda such as are found at Lynn, Ipswich and Colchester); we also hear of a Domesday Book, Little Red Book and Great Black Book, all of similarly unknown character.

The value of these by-laws is, in part, that they reflect some of the preoccupations, concerns and issues related to borough government and society.

The by-laws

Yarmouth history

main menu

appendix 2

Created: October 31, 1998. Last update: November 7, 1998

© Stephen Alsford, 1998-2003

History of medieval Yarmouth

[MAIN MENU]

APPENDIX 2: Register of the Hospital of St. Mary: A Calendar

The Register of the Hospital of St. Mary, Great Yarmouth, is written on vellum in a fair script. A compilation of various documents relating to the hospital may have been begun soon after the borough authorities took responsibility for the hospital in 1386 – an initiative which it is tempting to associate with the same spirit that produced constitutional reform of the same year, although the two survivals are probably only coincidence. On the other hand, medieval pagination suggests that the 1398 rental of the properties which provided the operating fund for the hospital was originally a separate document entirely. The creation of a register incorporating the rental would therefore seem to post-date 1398. Various hands are seen in the register, whose compilation continued into the reign of Henry VIII, if one includes amendments to the rental. Henry Manship, who had been town clerk of Yarmouth from 1579 to 1585 and thereafter served the corporation in a variety of roles, was engaged from 1612 in a project to organize and catalogue the borough records. He added to the hospital register an English translation of the whole, and the binding together of the original document and his translation may also be his work. The register, like many of the other documents listed in his catalogue, subsequently disappeared from the borough archives. It is now to be found in the Bodleian Library as Ms. Gough Norfolk 20 (Bodleian 18076).

The hospital is said to have been founded by Thomas Fastolf, in the early years of the reign of Edward I; the Fastolfs were one of the most prominent and longest-lived of the medieval dynasties in Yarmouth (and are best known for being the source of Shakespeare's Falstaff). At about the same time, a leading member of another important (and sometimes rival) local family, William Gerberge, bequeathed money to support priests at the hospital. Its purpose was to support 8 men and 8 women – possibly impoverished or disabled townspeople, although there is mixed evidence in this regard – living a semi-monastic life. It should be remembered that today "hospital" is applied specifically to health-care facilities, but its medieval use was broader – more akin to uses to which we would apply terms such as "hospice", "lodgings" and particularly "a home". St. Mary's hospital was established on a chunk of territory apparently carved out of the marketplace (in the north-east sector of town); an Elizabethan plan of the town shows a fairly extensive structure with a north-south orientation, but with two wings on the east side and a large house at the south end. The marketplace was on the west side of the hospital and the town wall formed its western boundary (there being gates in the wall on either side of the hospital precinct, which may indicate the hospital predated that section of the town wall.

From the time of the original foundation, bailiffs and community were given a certain amount of control over the hospital. It appears to have been a jurisdictional claim over the hospital by the cathedral-priory of Norwich that prompted the local authorities to intervene and assert their own rights (although the decline or disappearance of the rents bequeathed by Gerberge may also have warranted intervention); a compromise settlement of the dispute between the rival claimants, largely in Yarmouth's favour, resulted in the promulgation of a set of regulations in 1386 to provide a framework for governance. This was a prelude to the corporation taking firmer possession of the hospital, a fairly involved process due to the obstacles of the statute of mortmain and the lack of formal borough incorporation; the process was completed by 1398. In addition to this hospital, the borough government oversaw the running of leper houses outside the north gate.

My aim here is to provide a calendar, not a complete transcript, of the document, although in a few, select cases the calendared text follows the original closely. The abbreviations N., S., E. and W. are used in regard to locations of real estate, to refer to abutting property or topographical features lying to the north/south/east/west of the real estate being itemized.

 Ordinances

 Endowment documents

 Rental

Yarmouth history

main menu

ordinances

History of medieval Ipswich

[MAIN MENU]

ORIGINS AND EARLY GROWTH | Development of local government

Buildings and fortifications | Economy | Information sources

Map of Ipswich at the close of the Middle Ages

Ipswich bailiffs, coroners, chamberlains, and treasurers

Appendix 1: Account of the setting up of self-government in A.D. 1200

Appendix 2: Calendar of usages and customs of Ipswich

Appendix 3: Oaths of officers and burgesses

Appendix 4: Account of revenues and expenditures, 1446/47

Origins and early growth

The area surrounding Ipswich attracted habitation from the Stone Age on. Although there was a Roman villa near the northern boundary of what became Ipswich and a Roman road ran through the site, the origins of Ipswich are considered to lie in the seventh century. An earlier Anglo-Saxon settlement in the vicinity lay on the west bank of the River Gipping, but seems to have been no more than a few farms. The town's name, which in medieval times was Gippeswyc, probably refers to the wic on the Gipping (or possibly both hark back to the personal name of a leader of a Saxon group of settlers); another proposed derivation of the name connects it with the Saxon "gip", meaning corner of the mouth, and alluding to the point where the mouth of the fresh-water Gipping turned to enter the salt-water Orwell estuary. This associates the name with a later focus of Anglo-Saxon settlement, on an east-west ridge (now the line of Westgate/Tavern/Carr Streets) crossing the present town centre. On the eastern side of that later settlement have been found kilns which were used for firing pottery made on a slow wheel; this distinctive type of pottery was called "Ipswich ware" and the techniques for making it were introduced from the Rhineland/Frisia ca. 625/650, either by Frisian merchants or immigrating Rhenish potters. Remains of Ipswich ware have been found along a 160-metre stretch of the southern side of Carr Street, indicating that this was quite an important early industry here. "Ipswich People", however, is the name given to Scandinavians who arrived in the 6th century, founding the kingdom of the East Angles.

Another factor in dating Ipswich's emergence is that at towards the western end of this line of Saxon settlement was St. Mildred's church; this is an unusual dedication, attributable to the fact that St. Mildred (who died ca. 700) had connections with the East Anglian royal family, and suggests the foundation would have taken place soon after her death. The church later became associated with local administration. A possible memory, albeit distorted, associating the foundation of Ipswich with patronage of the Wuffing dynasty may be seen in a statement stemming from a royal inquisition at Ipswich in 1340, which concluded that Ipswich was named after a pagan king "Ypus", who made the town the capital of Suffolk (in part because of its port facilities).

This legend may well reflect some historical truth. It seems quite likely that Ipswich was established ca.625 on vacant, low-lying land stretching north of the river, along whose northern bank simple revetements were built to make it easier for ships to dock. The Wuffingas, who had a royal residence in the area, were the probable agents of this foundation, with the intent to create a port/market to supply their needs for imported goods. This commerce in turn stimulated the development of an export industry in ceramics. However, it also attracted the attention of the kings of landlocked Mercia, who expanded their rule into East Anglia in the late eighth century. Based on evidence from coins found at Ipswich, this change of rulers was followed by a period of economic decline, but renewed prosperity came after the Danish conquest of East Anglia (869).

Deforestation and expansion of the population in Suffolk – which by the time of Domesday was one of, if not the, most heavily populated county in England – helped the Ipswich region (like the Norwich region in Norfolk) become an economic centre. The economic status of Ipswich in the Late Saxon Age is seen in the number of moneys minting coins there. The earliest coins found date from the 970s, decades after a royal decree had allowed towns, burhs and ports to have mints; large numbers of moneys have been identified operating at Ipswich in the eleventh century. By that time, and probably earlier, there were burh defences at Ipswich. However, Ipswich is more commonly characterized as a "port" (a centre of commerce), and its inhabitants were known as portmen – a term later restricted, perhaps honorifically, to the town council. Port and burh were probably simply two sides of the same coin.

Ipswich's prosperity in the Late Saxon period is reflected in the fact it was frequently plagued by Danish raiders; their plundering of the town in 919 is the first documentary reference to the town. Another serious assault took place in 991, by a large force that moved on to Essex and fought the battle of Maldon. It was again the starting-point of a Danish campaign in 1010, which led to the temporary overthrow of the Anglo-Saxon monarchy. The town was among the last targets of Danish raids on East Anglia, in 1069. It may have been this, combined with the borough's association with the rebellious Earl of East Anglia, Ralph de Guader – who had a one-third share in the revenues from the borough – that had a devastating effect on Ipswich between 1066 and 1086. Immediately before the Norman Conquest Ipswich had 538 burgesses paying customary dues to the king; by the time of Domesday there were only 110, with another 100 burgesses too poor to give more than a penny each, while 328 manses (burgage properties) which had previously contributed scot towards the geld due the king were lying waste.

How long it took for Ipswich to recover from the damage done by Vikings and Normans is unknown, but its advantageous location in terms of access to international trade across the North Sea and to regional trade, in a part of the country where there were at that time relatively few market centres, likely helped it bounce back quickly. The large number of burgesses living in Ipswich just before the Conquest, in contrast to there being only 40 acres of arable land held by the burgesses (apparently within the borough boundaries), suggests a high proportion of the residents were earning a living from other than agricultural pursuits. The town had the status of a half-hundred, with its own hundred court; four villages were (at least later) also considered to be part of this half-hundred: Wicks Bishop, Wicks Ufford, Stoke-by-Ipswich, and Brooks. The maritime boundaries of the town also came to extend beyond its local port on the riverside to most of the Orwell estuary.

The 'town centre' was at Cornhill, with various retail markets there and in neighbouring streets. From the principal east-west route (mentioned above) that passed through the town centre, a few streets – particularly Brook Street – led south to the riverfront. The crossroads character of early Ipswich is reflected in the location of the medieval parish churches, which cluster around these two principal east-west and north-south routes, apart from those churches created to serve suburbs or quayside residents. The exception to this pattern being St. Nicholas', a post-Conquest foundation to serve population expansion along a north-south route connecting the town centre with the bridge across the Orwell. The quayside was in a suburb to the south-east; the absence of churches from the area between quayside and town centre indicates the sparseness of population there and helps explain why the Dominican and Franciscan friaries and the Priory of St. Peter and St. Paul were able to build large precincts there. In the northern part of the liberties was Holy Trinity Priory (now parkland). The town and its suburbs were divided into four leets, which were given points-of-the-compass names, suggesting a division on purely administrative grounds rather than on any early concentrations of settlement.

main menu

next

History of medieval Ipswich

[MAIN MENU]

APPENDIX 1: Account of the setting up of self-government in A.D. 1200

[translated from Latin]

On Thursday following the festival of the Nativity of St. John the Baptist in the second year of the reign of King John [29 June], the whole town of the borough of Ipswich gathered in the churchyard of St. Mary at Tower to elect two bailiffs and four coroners for the town, according to the specifications of the charter of the aforesaid lord King, which that king recently granted to the the borough. On which day the burgesses, by common assent and with one voice, elected two upright and law-abiding men of their town, viz., John fitz Norman and William de Beaumes, who were sworn to the administration of the ballivalty of the town and that they shall behave well and faithfully to both poor and rich.

They also unanimously elected on that day four coroners, viz. John fitz Norman, William de Beaumes, Philip de Porta, and Roger Lew, who were sworn to the administration of pleas of the crown and to doing other things which concern the crown in the borough, and to supervise the bailiffs in the just and legal treatment of poor as well as rich.

On the same day it was ordained by common counsel of the town that henceforth there ought to be in the borough twelve sworn capital portmen, such as there are in other free boroughs of England, and that they should have full power on behalf of themselves and the whole town to govern and maintain the borough and all its liberties, and to render judgements of the town; and also to take care of, ordain and do in the borough whatever may need to be done to maintain the status and reputation of the town. And on this matter the bailiffs and coroners declared that the whole town should come to the churchyard on Sunday following the festival of the Apostles Peter and Paul, to elect 12 capital portmen, according to the intent of this ordinance.

On Sunday following the festival of the Apostles Peter and Paul [2 July], the whole town of Ipswich gathered before the bailiffs and coroners to elect 12 capital portmen for the town, as was previously decided. By consent of the town, the bailiffs and coroners elected four upright and law-abiding men from each parish of the town, who were sworn to elect 12 capital portmen from the better, wiser and more able townsmen to make ordinances for the well-being of the town, as was already said. And those sworn men of the parishes came and elected, on behalf of themselves and the whole town, these 12 names written below, viz. John fitz Norman, William de Beaumes, Philip de Porta, Roger Lew, Peter Everard, William Goscalc, Amise Bolle, John de Saint George, John le Mayster, Sayer fitz Thurstan, Robert Parys and Andrew Peper. Who took oath before the whole town that they would govern the borough of Ipswich well and faithfully, maintain as best they could all the liberties recently granted to the burgesses of the borough by the charter of the lord King, maintain all liberties and free customs of the town, render just judgements in the town court without discrimination towards any individual, and moreover ordain and do all things touching the status and reputation of the town, and to deal lawfully and justly with poor as well as rich.

On the same day as the 12 capital portmen were sworn in this fashion, they required the whole town to raise its hands over the book and in one voice to solemnly swear that from that hour forth they would obey, attend, counsel and support the bailiffs, coroners, and each and every of the 12 capital portmen, with their bodies and their chattels for the purpose of preserving and maintaining the reputation, liberties and free customs of the town in whatever location necessary (excepting against the lord King or his power), with all their might, insofar as they ought to do within justice and reason.

On the same day it was agreed that the new charter of the King be handed over to two upright and law-abiding townsmen for safekeeping, viz. John fitz Norman and Philip de Porta, who were sworn to faithfully keep the charter and deliver it to the town when it shall be necessary and when they shall be warned and required to do so by the town. And because as much had been ordained and done for the status and reputation of the town as could be that day, it was agreed that the bailiffs, coroners and all capital portmen should come together on Thursday next after the festival of the Translation of St. Thomas the Martyr to ordain and do whatever might be required for the status and reputation of the town.

On Thursday following the festival of the Translation of St. Thomas the Martyr [13 July], the bailiffs, coroners and all capital portmen gathered to deal with and ordain for the status of the town of Ipswich.

- First, they ordain that all custom of the borough henceforth be collected by the hand of the bailiffs and four upright and law-abiding men of the borough. And that they pay this annually to the King's Exchequer for the rightful and traditional farm of the town.
- Also, they ordain that there be two beadles in the borough, sworn to make all attachments and distrains, and carry out all orders from bailiffs, coroners and capital portmen which ought to be done in the borough. And that one of the beadles be keeper of all prisoners who shall be arrested by the bailiffs; which keeper is to find surety for his safekeeping of all prisoners etc.
- Also, they ordain that, [it was decided] by common counsel of the town, there be made a common seal of the borough to be used in important business concerning the borough community, and for sealing letters giving the official opinion of all burgesses of the borough, and for doing all things that need to be done for the common reputation and utility of the town. The common seal is to be in the custody of three or four upright and law-abiding men sworn to that task before the community of the borough.
- Also, they ordain that, [it was decided] by common counsel of the town, there be in the borough an upright, law-abiding and suitable man to be alderman of the Merchant Gild in the borough. And that four upright and law-abiding townsmen be associated with him. The alderman and those four shall be sworn to well and faithfully maintain the Gild and all that belongs to it.
- Also, they ordain that the new charter be conveyed into open session of the county court of Suffolk and to Norwich into open session of the county court of Norfolk. And that the charter be manifestly read out in those courts, so that the liberties contained therein be publicly known and disseminated in locations throughout the counties.
- Also, they ordain that no burgess of the town may be exempt from customs [collected] in the town on his merchandise, if he be a merchant, unless he be at lot and scot in the common aids and business of the town.

On Sunday following the festival of the Nativity of the Virgin Mary [10 September], the community of Ipswich gathered before the bailiffs, the coroners, and the other capital portmen of the town to hear all the above ordinances, which were read out before the people in the churchyard of St. Mary at Tower. After the reading, the whole community unanimously consented to the ordinances. Afterwards they elected bailiffs to hold office during the coming year, viz. John fitz Norman and William de Beaumes. On the same day they elected four men to join with the bailiffs in collecting town customs, viz. Peter Peper, Norman Halynoth, Clement le Palmer, and Leman de Ponte. On the same day they elected two beadles, viz. John Prikehert and John Hawe, who were sworn to well and faithfully collect attachments and distrains and to carry out all orders given by bailiffs, coroners and portmen that pertain to their official duties. John Prikehert was elected to be keeper of the prisoners of the town, and he found sureties for answering for any escapes by prisoners, should that happen (which God forbid), viz. Edmund de Marisco, Peter Peper, John Hawe and Thomas de Horner. And because no more could be accomplished on that day, it was agreed that bailiffs and community would be here on Thursday following the festival of St. Faith to elect an alderman and do other things not possible now. The bailiffs were asked, in the interim, to have a common seal made, as ordained above.

On Thursday following the festival of St. Faith [12 October], the bailiffs, coroners, and other capital portmen, and the whole community assembled in the church of St. Mary at Tower. The bailiffs showed the common seal of the town which had recently been made. Then there were elected three of the more law-abiding and capable men of the borough to have safekeeping of the seal, viz. John fitz Norman, William de Beaumes, and Philip de Porta, who were sworn before the community to well and faithfully take care of the seal, and not allow it to be applied to any letter or other [written] instrument, unless it shall be to the common honour and utility of the town or the burgesses of the town, and that by agreement of their peers. And furthermore it was agreed that the town charter remain in their custody.

On the same day was elected, by common counsel of the town, an alderman, viz. William Goscalc. And four were elected to be his associates, viz. Peter Everard, John le Mayster, Roger Lew and John de Saint George, who were sworn together with the alderman to well and faithfully govern the Merchant Gild of the borough of Ipswich and all articles belonging to the Gild; and that they treat all brethren of the Gild well and lawfully. Afterwards the alderman and his four associates, in the presence of the townspeople, said that all who are of the liberty of the town shall come before them on a certain day, time and place to be announced, to place themselves in the Gild and contribute to the hanse of the Gild.

The following section is found only in the 16th century copy of the Ipswich Domesday. Other factual evidence (e.g. custumal, [cap.75), along with spelling of certain words, make it unlikely this is a post-medieval insertion, yet it is not clear why this section, if part of thirteenth century source records from which medieval copies of the Domesday were made, is not in those earlier copies. Possibly it was omitted because recorded separately in the Merchant Gild's own records and not considered relevant to the daily work of borough administration, for which the Domesday was a reference tool (rather than being an historical record).]

On the same day the bailiffs, coroners and other portmen, and the whole community discussed together how and by what means it would be best to provide for the maintenance of the Merchant Gild and all that belongs to it. The bailiffs, coroners, and other portmen, and the whole community with one voice agreed and ordained that the alderman who had now been elected and all aldermen who should be elected in the future might have and control for the profit of the Gild the buying and selling of all the merchandise listed below, viz. millstones, rubstones, dogstones, quernstones, grindstones, gravestones, mortars of marble, and pavingstones of marble. The alderman, by his oath, ought to render a correct and just account each year, before the bailiffs and coroners, of all profits made and interest acquired from the year passed as a result of the buying and selling of the aforementioned merchandise. Furthermore they unanimously agreed that henceforth no resident of the town – not anyone, denizen or alien – may be involved in the buying or selling of the said merchandise within the town or within its liberties and precinct, except only the alderman of the Gild for the use and profit of the Gild. And this under penalty of forfeiture of all such merchandise bought or sold.

The same day it was permitted by the whole community, at request of the 12 capital portmen, that for the labour they undertake for the community, they may have Odenholm meadow for feeding their horses.

Also, it was ordained and agreed by the whole community that the laws and free customs of the town should be set down in a particular roll, which shall be called the Domesday. This roll shall always be kept in the custody of those who shall at the time be bailiffs of the town, so that they may know how to carry out their office. All statutes of the Merchant Gild shall be placed in another roll, just as is done in other cities and boroughs where there is a Merchant Gild. The alderman may always have this roll in his possession, so that he know how to carry out his office.

Ipswich history

main menu

appendix 2

History of medieval Ipswich

[MAIN MENU]

APPENDIX 2: Calendar of usages and customs of Ipswich

A transcription of two versions of the custumal was published in The Black Book of the Admiralty or Monumenta Juridica, ed. Travers Twiss. Vol.II: "Le Domesday de Gipewyz." Rolls Series, no. 55 (1873). One version, in French (British Museum Add.Ms.25012), is from a copy made in the early fourteenth century (possibly 1309) and still in use as a reference tool ca. 1350. The second was an English translation (British Museum Add. Ms.25011) made in the fifteenth century. These versions list 83 chapters, although whether all were in the reconstitution of the custumal in 1291 cannot be said with certainty; the English version's numbering of the chapters goes from 1-80, because of errors in counting (double use was made of two numbers in the sequence). That reconstruction of the customs took place from memory, through the work of a committee several of whose members were past or present bailiffs or portmen, and as such dealing with the application of local law, while others were wealthy citizens whose business activities would also have given them experience of the courts. Several of the chapters read almost as though notes of a committee discussion. There would be nothing unnatural in the committee having taken the opportunity to update the customs; e.g. the enrolment of testaments (cap. 15) is not evidenced before 1281. If any of the first 83 chapters represent outright additions to the original custumal, however, it is most likely to be the later ones; see notes to caps. 75, 78 and 81, which surely post-date the theft of the original. Certainly the older version shows several hands were involved in copying the chapters, which may also suggest compilation over a period of time.

My aim here is to provide an abstract in modern English (technical terms excepted) and to add to the core of the custumal abstracts of later ordinances recorded, in various copies of the Domesday, as though extensions of the custumal – these are not to be found in Twiss. I preface the list of customs with a modern English abstract of the rationale of their redrafting in 1291. I have inserted explanatory notes or elaborations for purposes of clarity in square parentheses [].

Twiss' edition of the custumal added, after the 83 chapters, a list of fees payable to porters of merchandize and extensive lists of tolls due on merchandize sold in the various town markets – these tolls being part of the fee farm. These are not strictly speaking part of the custumal, although one town clerk in the fifteenth century decided to extend the English version of the custumal by adding to them the chapter numbers 81-91 (again a double use of one number meant that the numbering should properly have extended to 92). This version of the custumal also has, as its cap.81, a chapter that Twiss omitted entirely. It is a curious chapter since, from its date, it appears to be a continuation of the chronicle of the setting up of Ipswich's government, and later in the volume is repeated in that context. It states that on 19 October 1200 the bailiffs had an inquisition made by 12 men to determine which ecclesiastic landowners in the countryside around Ipswich ought to be quit of toll in the town; the results of the inquisition, naming the ecclesiastics, are given.

At some point in the fifteenth century, two sets of ordinances – one enacted by the borough government in 1429 and the other in 1474 – were treated as if extensions of the custumal, by the addition of chapter numbers and titles (as marginalia) to the individual ordinances. The 1429 ordinances appear in Add.Ms. 25011, but are not treated there as part of the custumal. It is in the White Domesday (so-called because of its white leather cover), a fifteenth-century version held among the archives of the borough of Ipswich, that both sets are numbered as if a continuation of the custumal. This was evidently an afterthought. The earlier set of ordinances are on folios 17-19, the original custumal on ff.20-49, and the later set of ordinances on ff.74-77. The numbers and titles were added in a later hand than either of these sets of ordinances. Other important ordinances in the same book, from the late 13th and mid-14th century, were ignored by the clerk who perceived the later ordinances as part of the custumal, suggesting that they were too out-dated to be of interest although the fifteenth century ones clearly were still in force.

I include these later additions to the custumal for interest in comparing thirteenth and fifteenth century preoccupations; I give in some cases just a brief indication of the theme of a chapter and in others a fuller abstract of the Latin original. The ordinances of 1429 are capitula 84-89 and those of 1474 are capitula 90-101. It is evident that cap.93-100 are an artificial division of what is really one ordinance dealing with treatment of outsiders as defendants in the borough court.

CONTENTS:

preface

- cap 1: Of the days of great pleas, called portmanmoots; and of pleas of the crown and lesser pleas initiated by gage and pledge; and of pleas governed by law merchant and law marine; and of pleas at fair time; and of essoins in all these pleas.
- cap 2: Of essoins by tenants in common or partnership
- cap 3: Of essoins by executors
- cap 4: Of essoins in service of the king

- cap 5: Of writ of right
- cap 6: Of fresh abatement
- cap 7: Of fresh nuisance
- cap 8: Of waste
- cap 9: Of recognizance of free tenement
- cap 10: Of a house that abuts on another
- cap 11: Of recognizance of free tenement in cases of reversion
- cap 12: Of recognizance of rent
- cap 13: Of fresh abatement of an enclosed tenement
- cap 14: Of tenements lying fresh
- cap 15: Of fresh abatement against a tenant who counterpleads the landlord
- cap 16: Of bequeathable tenements and probate of testaments
- cap 17: Of tenements bequeathed to underage children
- cap 18: Of tenements bequeathed but not bequeathable
- cap 19: Of tenement bequeathed to someone while he is out of the country
- cap 20: Of rents bequeathed
- cap 21: Of having nurture
- cap 22: Of processes initiated by sheriff's writs and in pleas by gage and pledge
- cap 23: Of assault and battery
- cap 24: Of trespass made against chief bailiffs or coroners
- cap 25: Of trespass made against sub-bailiffs
- cap 26: Of forestalling of fish and poultry
- cap 27: Of regraters who sell to other regraters
- cap 28: Of the time ordained for regraters in the fish market
- cap 29: Of fish cut in the same market
- cap 30: Of fish kept fresh beyond an appropriate time
- cap 31: Of millers who mix in bad corn
- cap 32: Of poulterers
- cap 33: Of mercantile contracts
- cap 34: Of recovery of debts or damages
- cap 35: Of increase of damages
- cap 36: Of those buying goods from outsider merchants and failing to pay
- cap 37: Of an end to wrangling
- cap 38: Of reasonable division [of property]
- cap 39: Of denial of quitclaim or other writing during a trial
- cap 40: Of proof of tally without seal
- cap 41: Of the render of a sword
- cap 42: Of distress made by one burgess on another
- cap 43: How a burgess can distrain on an outsider
- cap 44: How a burgess ought to share merchandise with burgess or with outsider
- cap 45: Of view of frankpledge
- cap 46: Of prohibition of waste during a plea

- cap 47: That no one take as pledge wool or thread from poor carders
- cap 48: Of missing goods
- cap 49: Of taking attorney
- cap 50: Of taking recognizances outside the court in cases of contracts of merchandise
- cap 51: How a widow ought to have her free bench
- cap 52: Of dower
- cap 53: How a widow should enjoy the franchise of the town
- cap 54: That homage and fealty not be done for Ipswich tenements
- cap 55: How a married woman ought to answer without her husband in plea of trespass
- cap 56: How the husband ought to answer for his wife's debt
- cap 57: Of butchers who bring carcasses without skins
- cap 58: Of butchers who sell spoiled meat
- cap 59: Of cooks who keep victuals too long
- cap 60: Of hosting of outsider merchants
- cap 61: Of a burgess of the town who impleads fellow burgesses contrary to the franchise
- cap 62: Of those who counterplead allowance of the franchise
- cap 63: That no foreign merchant be accepted as a burgess
- cap 64: Of sale of pledges after the day of payment passes
- cap 65: Of those who disclose the private counsels of the town and who counterplead the franchise out of malice
- cap 66: Of a burgess who pretends to another's chattels
- cap 67: Of merchandise taken away by water
- cap 68: Of the time for sale of merchandise at the quay
- cap 69: Of sales of shellfish
- cap 70: Of the age [of majority] in the town
- cap 71: Of menacing actions
- cap 72: Of drawing of weapons in presence of bailiffs
- cap 73: Of procedure in a plea of slander
- cap 74: Of common scolds
- cap 75: Of the 12 sworn men of the town
- cap 76: Of sub-bailiffs negligent in their duties
- cap 77: Of sub-bailiffs spreading discord between folk
- cap 78: Of the common clerk of the town
- cap 79: Of process in plea of debt between burgesses
- cap 80: Of bakers who trespass against the assize
- cap 81: Of brewers
- cap 82: Of the condemnation of bad wine
- cap 83: Of testing of the town measures
- cap 84: [Execution of judgement on a convicted party]
- cap 85: [Frequency of holding ballival office]
- cap 86: [Restrictions on commercial activities of bailiffs]
- cap 87: [Rejecting Portman's livery]

- cap 88: [Chamberlains' accounts]
- cap 89: [Sergeants of the town]
- cap 90: [Government by majority rule]
- cap 91: [Voting rights]
- cap 92: [Patronage for office-seekers]
- cap 93: [Conviction of a defendant who fails to appear in court]
- cap 94: [Of a defendant who appears after arrest]
- cap 95: [Execution of judgements]
- cap 96: [Execution against the pledges]
- cap 97: [Provision of distrains by the defendant]
- cap 98: [Attachment by goods or chattels]
- cap 99: [Execution on goods or chattels]
- cap 100: [Delivery of goods or chattels]
- cap 101: [Inciting an outsider to sue a burgess]

This is the Domesday of the laws and usages of the town of Ipswich.

The old Domesday of the laws and ancient usages of the town, along with other rolls and memoranda, were illegally carried off by a deceitful Common Clerk of the town. After which, the customs were often altered from their original tenor, through the perversion of justice; as a result of which some folk have been harmed, to the disgrace of the town. The community of the town, wishing to remedy this situation and ensure that the laws are correctly known, unanimously ordained in the 19th year of King Edward son of King Henry, in the time when John Clement and Vivian Silvester were bailiffs, that as soon as the correct form of the laws and usages could be determined, they should be recorded in a Domesday and sealed with the common seal. In that way the bailiffs and burgesses, both present and future, may have certain knowledge of the customs. To accomplish this task the community chose 24 of the wisest townsmen who were most knowledgable about the town's laws and usages; viz. Philip Harneys, John Clement, Vivian Silvester, Thomas Aylred, John de Causton, John Harneys, Laurence Haraud, Hugh Haraud, John Leu, Richard Leu, Thomas Stace, John de Whatefeld, Thomas le Rente, Thomas le Mayster, Laurence Cobbe, Arnold le Pelleter, Thomas dil Stone, Nicholas le Clerk, William le Maiden, Elias le Keu, Richard Clement, Gilbert Robert, Alexander Margaret, and John de Bresete.

Ipswich history

main menu

cap. 1-21

Created: August 29, 1998

© Stephen Alsford, 1998-2003

History of medieval Ipswich

[MAIN MENU]

APPENDIX 3: Oaths of officers and burgesses

Oaths are useful sources for showing the expectations that the community had of the performance of its official representatives or its servants, and of the return obligation of the members of the community. At the ceremonies for swearing in officers, or for men entering the franchise, the text of the appropriate oath would be read out while the oath-taker had his hand on the Bible and (presumably) stated his agreement/compliance at the end of the reading of the oath.

Most oaths are known only from undated but late versions recorded in the Ipswich Domesday books, although some of the key elements are found in the account of the setting up of self-government in 1200 or implied in the custumal. A proto-version of the oath required from the new burgess is found in a court roll from 1339/40, with minor elaborations made in 1346. My aim here is to render them in modern English, rather than give an absolutely literal translation.

Burgess' oath, 1346

They are sworn that they shall be at lot and scot in all aids [imposed on] the town of Ipswich whenever and to whatever extent shall be necessary and whenever they are forewarned to contribute to the same by the officers of the town. And that they shall not pretend to be their own the goods or merchandize of foreigners or outsiders. And that they shall resolutely conceal the secrets of the town. And that they shall be obedient to the bailiffs and their [i.e. the bailiffs'] officers and to the coroners of the town who are, or shall be, not causing any dissension or conspiracy to the disturbance of the town. And that each one of them shall have a residence within the town liberties within a year and a day; if not, then the liberties granted to them shall forever be considered void.

Burgess' oath, late 15th century

Hear this, you bailiffs, coroners and portmen, and all other men present, that I shall henceforth be a true burgess and keep [to myself] the counsels and private matters of the town and its Great Courts, and not discuss them. Nor shall I in any way disguise the goods of any man as my own goods, so that the town should lose any right or profit – that is, custom, toll or other profit to which the town has a right. And also I shall be obedient to present or future bailiffs and portmen, and at all times obey to the best of my ability the commands of the bailiffs. And also I shall be to the best of my ability at lot and scot as a burgess to all types of charges that must be borne by the town or the franchise. And I shall support and maintain the town and franchise with my body, goods and chattels against all men, except our sovereign lord the king and his royal authority, so help me God. And also I shall have within a year and a day a freehold within the town (as a burgess should), at which I may be summoned, or else lose my burgess status forever.

[to which a slightly later hand has added]

Every man who strives to become a burgess of this town shall first be examined under oath upon a Book that he is no bondman, but free-born and of free status. For no bondman shall be admitted as a burgess, not for gold, nor silver, nor any other thing. Ordained in the 23rd year of King Henry VII [1507/08].

Bailiff's oath, early 15th century

You swear that you shall serve our lord the king well and loyally in the office of bailiff of the town of Ipswich, keep his borough safe and sound, protect it for him and his heirs, perform all duties for preserving the rights of king and crown, and not allow any concealment of the rights of franchises of the king. And if you know of any rights of the king that are contravened or concealed, do your utmost to combat it; and if you cannot, then you will inform the king or those of his council who you anticipate will advise the king. And you will treat the people of your ballivalty properly, doing right to anyone – resident or stranger, rich or poor – in all things that belong to you to do. And not through shame nor for riches, gift, promise or favour shall you disturb anything or take anything so that the king or his rights suffer. And that you take good care in the assizes of bread, wine, ale and all other victuals and measures in the borough, taking swift action against infringements that are found, and well and faithfully administer all constitutions and ordinances recorded in the common book called the Book of Constitutions of the Borough. And you shall well and faithfully perform all other duties pertaining to the office of bailiff, so help you God.

Chamberlain's oath, early 15th century

You swear that you shall collect and levy, or make to be collected and levied, to the works and profit of the town, all rents, farms, customs, tolls, ameracements of court and leet, and all other dues, profits and commodities of the town that pertain to your office of chamberlain. And that you handle the revenues of the town honestly, to the best of your ability, not concealing a penny nor the value of a penny to your own use and to the loss of the town, but well and truly render account to the community of the town, or to those whom they assign, at any reasonable time when required, so help you God.

Sergeant-at-mace's oath, early 15th century

You swear that you shall duly and honestly execute all summonses, attachments, decrees, orders and requirements of court, bailiffs and coroners that pertain to your office of sergeant, carrying out and making return on all you are charged to do. Not concealing any complaint, nor making any summons, attachment or decree without orders from the bailiffs, [justices of the peace interlined in a later hand], coroners or court. And well and honestly performing your duties within a reasonable time, so help you God.

Portman's oath, mid-15th century

You shall swear to well and faithfully keep and govern the town of Ipswich and maintain, to the best of your ability, all liberties, franchises and good customs of the town. And to give your full aid and support to the indifferent rendering of judgements of the court, with equal regard to every person, both rich and poor. And do the best you can for the honour of the town, so help you God.

Councillor's oath, mid-15th century

You shall swear to be diligent in attending the Great Courts and assemblies of the general council of the town of Ipswich, and [in responding to] commands of the bailiffs. And not to procure, agree to, or give advice to any major decision that you consider prejudicial or to the damage or dishonour of the town. But to give your fullest support, advice and agreement to the preservation of the liberties of the town, for the profit, benefit and honour of the town and its burgesses, so help you God.

Common clerk's oath, late 15th or early 16th century

[this oath was hurriedly scrawled out, with deletions and interlined additions, and parts are illegible - which I indicate by ellipses]

You shall swear to keep a true record of all pleas, executions [of judgements], [legal] processes and actions [brought] before the bailiffs and the coroners [deleted] ... and record extracts of all that ... pleas and ... as for your ... that may be profitable to the town. And behave well and honestly in all things that pertain to your office, so help you.

Ipswich history

main menu

appendix 4

History of medieval Ipswich

[MAIN MENU]

APPENDIX 4: Account of revenues and expenditures, 1446/47

Only two sets of financial accounts have survived from medieval Ipswich, one from the 1446/47 fiscal year, the other from 1463/64; these happen both to be years in which a royal charter was obtained by the borough, but this is surely no more than coincidence. Of the two, that of 1446/47, on parchment, is more complete although the writing is faded in parts; it was the final document drawn up as a record of the end-of-year audit. The later document has the appearance of a more detailed, but rougher, working copy and was written on paper (with the result that parts have been lost through deterioration over time), probably with items of receipt and expenditure in some chronological order; the 1446/47 account also makes reference to a paper copy, perhaps used for the interim quarterly audits.

The purpose here is to give a summary of the sources and amounts of income and expenses, divided as per the sub-headings of the original document, with my clarifications/elaborations in square parentheses [].

The account of Richard Tough and John James, chamberlains there [in Ipswich] from the festival of St. Michael Archangel [September 29] in the twenty-fifth year of the reign of King Henry VI to the same festival in the twenty-sixth year

Receipts

Town rents [i.e. from community-owned properties]
Plus [rents separately listed] in the rental

15s.6d
£1.0s.0d

| | |
|--|-------------------------|
| Renders paid in cash [viz. licences purchased by manors to have freedom from local tolls on merchandise; 4d per manor] | 3s.6d |
| Renders paid for toll on grain [viz. licences purchased by manors to have freedom from toll] Plus, [outstanding] from the account of Roger Stannard [chamberlain the previous year] | 11s.6d £1.7s.7d |
| Leases of lands Plus, [outstanding] from the account of Roger Stannard | 2s.8d 4d |
| Leases of houses [including market stalls and the Gildhall cellar] | £2.9s.4d |
| Farm of mills, fisheries and weirs [notably, Horswade mill, and two mills at Stoke Bridge] | £22.16s.8d |
| Farm of fullers stalls in the moothall Plus, [outstanding] from the account of Roger Stannard | 14s.11d 7s.10d |
| Farm of stalls in the butchery building Plus, [outstanding] from the account of Roger Stannard | £12.1s.8d £5.15s.0d |
| Stallage in the market and other places [the other places included under the Moothall, a draper's stall being mentioned there] | 5s.2d |
| Customs from woolpells and carcasses Plus, [outstanding] from the account of Roger Stannard | £7.0s.4d £3.17s.8d |
| Farm of the Woodbridge market with customs therefrom. Paid by the Prior of Woodbridge, as per the composition between town and priory made in time-beyond-memory | £1.0s.1d |
| Tronage and mensurage of salt, grain and coal Plus, [outstanding] from the account of Roger Stannard [these were fees for weighing and measuring amounts] | £2.13s.11d £11.6s.1d |
| Customs on ships and boats, with cranage [cranage was a fee for using the town crane to load or unload cargo] | £2.11s.11d |

| | |
|---|-----------------------|
| Great Custom [on wool exports, imposed 1275] | £17.9s.6d |
| Fines paid by foreigners for [exemption from] toll and custom Plus, [outstanding] from the account of Roger Stannard [all of the 50 men purchasing the annual licence to trade without paying toll appear to be inhabitants of Ipswich; the fee ranged from 2d. to 3s.] | £2.17s.5d £1.5s.0d |
| Toll on grain Plus, [outstanding] from the account of Roger Stannard [this was collected at the Cornhill market; an excuse was offered for the low yield on the grounds that many men had bought exemption from the toll] | 8d 1s.10½d |
| Fines from [admission of] newly made burgesses [three entrance fees of 40s. each; a fourth fee was said to have been received but not accounted for, due to concealment on the part of the chamberlains] | £6.0s.0d |
| Profits from leet and courts Remaining in the hands of Thomas Heyle, Richard Baker and George Page [this section was a mini-account, viz: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • £4 delivered by the sergeants (as above plus John Burgon) as court estreats • 32s. taken out of estreats by the sergeants, to pay for their liveries • 20s.4d from leet and courts already in the pyx (treasury) • 8s. from Burgon for court and leet profits • 6s.8d from Heyle for the same] | £7.7s.0d £11.0s.2d |
| Hawgable Plus, [outstanding] from the account of Roger Stannard taken from diverse persons as per ancient custom, viz. 1d from every message in town under a single roof | 14s.0d 2s.0d |
| total [apparently calculated in exclusion of the amounts outstanding from Stannard and estreats 'still in the hands of' (probably meaning not yet collected by) the sergeants, although a small discrepancy still remains] | £88.6.3d |
| Expenses | |
| Rents resolute and fee farm [the borough owed rents from its property to the bailiffs of Wykes Ufford and of St. Peter's Priory; the fee farm was, and had been since the late 13th century, £60] | £74.15s.0d |

| | |
|---|---|
| Fees of bailiffs, officers and counsel of the town: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ● bailiffs, nothing – the money due from the sergeants having been [punitively?] allocated to their annual fees ● Reginald Rous, counsellor to the town ● William Bury of Colchester, counsellor to the town ● Thomas Bishop, clerk of the courts ● sergeants [as named above] ● John Bole, collector of the Great Custom ● Thomas Denys, town attorney in the common law courts ● Thomas Depden, town attorney in the Exchequer ● John James and Richard Tough, chamberlains ● William Rideout and John Smith, parliamentary burgesses at Bury St. Edmunds (26s.8d each as per an agreement made with the bailiffs) | 0 £1.0s.0d £1.0s.0d £2.0s.0d £4.0s.0d £2.0s.0d £1.0s.0d 13s.4d £3.0s.0d £2.13s.4d |
| Liveries of the servants [of the borough] [amounts paid for coloured woollen cloth for the uniforms of town clerk, collector of Great Custom, and sergeants] | £2.12s.4d |
| Costs of houses [payments for repair and maintenance of community-owned properties, such as the Fleshhouse (butchery), Woolhouse, and the tavern underneath the moothall] | 13s.2d |
| Costs of stalls [repair and maintenance of market stalls] | 10s.4d |
| Costs of mills [the numerous payments under this heading indicate that the mills required quite a bit of maintenance] | £6.15s.8d |
| Costs of [maintaining] the quay and the crane | 9s.7d |
| Purchase of cowskin [this section dealt with minor expenses of bureaucracy, including purchase of parchment and paper, and maintenance of the gaol] | 9s.7d |

| | |
|--|-------------------|
| Expenses of bailiffs, burgesses and officers: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ● 6s.8d for breakfast for bailiffs and counsellors of the town, in the house of Thomas Bishop on 6 October 1446, to discuss and deal with town business ● 5s.4d for breakfast for bailiffs, capital pledges and leet affeerors at the affeering of leet ameracements ● 14d for breakfast for bailiffs and John Smith, with payment to Smith for his expenses in riding to London on town business ● 12d for a gallon and a half of wine for bailiffs and other officers when they collected moneys to pay a certain debt of Isabelle Astley [widow of a former bailiff] ● 21s.6d for expenses of bailiffs and others of the town council on the day of arbitration with John Andrew [a Suffolk J.P., but perhaps in this context as son and executor of James Andrew, a prominent burgess] ● 3s.4d for dinner of Reginald Rous when he came at the order of the bailiffs ● 3s.8d to Christiana James for expenses [in lodging?] Reginald Rous when he came on town business at Corpus Christi ● 3s.1d for expenses of Reginald's horses at that time, paid at Colchester | £2.5s.9d |
| Extrinsic expenses [viz. entertainment of, or rewards to, outsiders] | £5.12s.10d |
| Foreign expenses: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ● 20d to John Wode for conducting town business at London ● 12s. to Thomas Bishop for riding to London on town business, taking money collected as a loan to the king; 3s.8d for his horse ● 26s.8d to Thomas Denys and Roger Stannard for having the charter of town liberties enrolled in the king's court ● 40s. to William Donton for riding to London, to the Duke of Suffolk, on town business ● 2s. to Thomas Bishop for a horse when he went to London to obtain a new charter ● 6s.8d to John Burgon for leading Henry Parker [a prisoner?] to London ● 16s.8d to John French and John Douche as compensation for damages received from the sheriff, in matters touching the town liberty ● 10s. for expenses of John Tough and John Bishop in riding to | £7.6s.8d |

| | |
|--|------------------|
| Norfolk, to speak with Isabelle Astley and John Holdirnesse [her husband?] on town business | |
| <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • 3s.4d for expenses of Thomas Bishop in riding to the said Isabelle and John • 6s.8d for a cart with two drivers taking victuals to the parliament at Bury • 8d to George Page for carrying the town charter to London • 23s.4d to Thomas Depden for his work in the Exchequer | |
| And paid to the bailiffs for their fee [it seems the auditors relented on their earlier decision to penalize the bailiffs for the failure of their sergeants to collect all the estreats] | £10.0s.0d |
| total [again the calculations are imperfect] | £111.6.5d |
| Thus the expenses exceed receipts by £23.0s.2d. Later 46s.8d handed over by William Whethereld, from the surplus of the king's fifteenth , was applied to this, leaving a deficit of £20.13s.6d. And 5s. was paid to the clerk for drawing up this account; therefore, £20.18s.6d. | |

For purposes of comparison, the account of the sheriff from 25 March 1285 to 29 September 1286 included the following revenues for the last six months of that period:

- 110s. from the farm and rent of Horswade mill and the New Mill
- 41s.6d from hawgable
- 14s.1d from stallage
- £10.11s. from customs collected at the quay
- 78s.4d from toll on corn and barley sold
- 79s. from petty customs
- £4.8s. from the leet court, mensurage, and fines for transgressions
- 40s. from court pleas and perquisites

Ipswich history

main menu

appendix 1

History of medieval Colchester

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth | Development of local government
Buildings and fortifications | Economy | Information sources
Map of Colchester at the close of the Middle Ages
Colchester bailiffs and receivers/chamberlains

Origins and early growth

Few, if any, of England's towns can lay claim to the longevity that Colchester can; certainly none in East Anglia. The site was inhabited by the seventh century B.C. and was in the first century B.C. the capital of one of the various kingdoms of which ancient Britain was composed. This settlement lay on the ridge above, and the slope stretching down to, the southern bank of the Colne River, just a few miles northwest of where the Colne emptied into the North Sea. This capital was an early target of the Roman invaders (A.D. 43) and within a few years they had converted it into Roman Britain's first colony of retired legionaries and the administrative centre of a canton; a solid wall was built to protect a rectangular-shaped area beside the river. The wall and the Roman streets influenced the layout of medieval Colchester.

After the Romans left Britain, the Saxons settled within the old walls (an atypical case of Saxon habitation of a Roman town), but we have no mention of the town until 917, when it is evident that it was being contested between Danes and Anglo-Saxons. Its walls continued to make it an important regional stronghold and, by the time of Domesday, it was a borough of some significance, with the status of a hundred, its own court, a mint (an indication of the importance the king placed on a town), and several churches. The Colchester entry in Domesday is more detailed than those for most East Anglian towns, and the term civitas (city – although here possibly implying "district") is applied alongside that of borough. There were 276 burgesses in 1086 under the direct lordship of the king, and about 450 households in all within the borough's boundaries.

The Normans recognized Colchester's strategic value and, perhaps within a decade of the Conquest, began constructing a castle which included the largest keep in Europe, built atop the foundations of the principal Roman temple. The king included control of this fortress among various properties and authorities in Essex given to his steward, Eudo, as reward for his long support; Eudo may have been in charge of its construction (at least, later generations thought so). Henry I went so far as to turn over his lordship of Colchester to Eudo in 1101, although it reverted to the king after Eudo's death (1120). Eudo in 1096 founded St. John's Abbey just south of the walled town; the abbey held an annual fair for a few days in June. A little to the east of the Benedictine abbey site, again just outside the walls, was a church whose dedication – to St. Botolph – indicates it of Anglo-Saxon origin. A few years after, and probably in response to, the foundation of the abbey, this church became an Augustinian priory. Still further east, Eudo founded a leper hospital dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene; Richard I granted that the hospital have the right to hold a fair in July.

The twelfth century saw the town expanding beyond the walls, particularly into a suburb to the south, around the abbey and priory. A thriving, if somewhat detached, suburb also developed to the south-east around the town's harbour at New Hythe; this was successor to an earlier haven at Old Hythe further south along the river, which was revived in the 1340s, perhaps being about as far along the river as sea-going ships could navigate. Lesser suburbs arose around the bridges across the Colne to the north and east of the walled area. This was the shape of medieval Colchester. Nonetheless, we should hardly think of the town as crowded by modern standards; its population in the Late Middle Ages probably fluctuated between 3,000 and 8,000.

Colchester domestic architecture

There remain a few examples of 15th / 16th century architectural styles, such as those in the Stockwell Street area and [top] near North Bridge; they leave a faint impression of how Colchester might have looked at the close of the Middle Ages.

photos © S. Alsford

Development of local government

Colchester's first known royal charter was received in 1189 and gave the borough the foundations of self-government. The similarity between the terms of this and the 1133 charter of London liberties has led to speculation that the 1189 grant may have been only a confirmation, or modification of an earlier one, perhaps from just before the period (1178-94) when burgess representatives seem to have been answering for the borough farm; however, we should not read too much into this. Through the 1189 charter the king permitted the townsmen the right to choose, from among their number, two bailiffs to head the administration of local justice, which included authority over matters relating to commercial and real estate transactions; he recognized the pre-eminence of local customs within the borough bounds (or "liberty"), while exempting the borough from certain external authorities or obligations. Freedom from paying tolls on merchandise in other English localities was granted, and the holding of any market (other than the borough's own) within the liberty was prohibited. Fishing rights along a particular stretch of the Colne (regardless of who owned the land along the banks) were confirmed, as was the right to hunt fox, hare or polecat within the liberty.

Archaeology has provided evidence that the seat of local government, the moot hall, may have been built around that time. Administration focused around the sessions of the town court held there. The official "hundred court" was held on Mondays – usually fortnightly, but sometimes weekly – to deal with normal legal business; additional court sessions were introduced as the fourteenth century wore on, on any weekday necessary, to take care of extra business, pleas introduced by non-citizens, and cases whose handling required speed. In addition, 3 lawhundred sessions were held annually, at which all those owning land in the town (whether burgesses or not) were supposed to attend; here were made the public presentments of breaches of local custom, ordinances and national statutes. Four administrative wards cross-cut the geographical entity that was Colchester, comprising the walled town, its suburbs and neighbouring villages (see under Economy).

Colchester underwent the growth pains typical of most medieval towns, in terms of contests for jurisdiction with neighbouring authorities. The bailiffs had to share jurisdiction in the rural parts of the liberty with manorial lords, who would have preferred complete independence for their estates. As early as Domesday the town was complaining that some of the properties which had formerly contributed to paying the customary dues owed by town to king were evading that obligation. In Colchester's case the main rivals were the Abbot of St. John's, a powerful and wealthy ecclesiastic, and John FitzWalter lord of Lexden manor together with his steward (and tenant of Langenhoe manor) Lionel de Bradenham. The latter lost their contest – which focused on rights relating to the river – after resorting to illegal methods, including intimidation of individual townsmen and a 13-week siege of the town (1350), which led to the king imposing crushingly heavy fines on them.

The abbey was the single most important landlord of the properties within the borough liberty, although his lands were mainly in the villages; the abbots pursued a policy of improving their estates, which often involved enclosing parcels of land. The not surprising result was that the abbot and the town would come into conflict over jurisdiction regarding those areas. The townsmen were quick to challenge any encroachment on what they considered their rights of passage, pasturage, hunting or fishing within the liberty. Furthermore, up to mid-fourteenth century, many of the men who led the town government as bailiffs were themselves prominent landholders. Much space in the medieval borough records is taken up with documents pertaining to the legal battles. In 1254, for example, a settlement of disputes between the parties led to the abbot acknowledging the right of the burgesses to hunt hare, fox and cat in parts of Greenstead and West Donyland (hamlets within the liberty), with catches tolerated even in the abbot's own hunting warren so long as the townsmen called back their dogs once the prey was caught, and so long as reparations were made for any damage to crops. In return the borough recognized the abbey's warren in West Donyland, granted the monks and their tenants freedom from tolls on goods for personal use (goods for purposes of resale, however, were still to be subject to tolls), and agreed to the abbey having pillories and cucking-stools in West Donyland and Greenstead.

Agreements such as this tended to fall by the wayside when new disputes arose. A series of complaints made by the townsmen in the 1280s before the law hundred or to the king indicate the kinds of disputes that continued to plague town-abbey relations; charges included that the abbot:

- was holding his own court and summoning townsmen to answer charges;
- had set up a gallows and cucking-stool (for adulterers), and was claiming jurisdiction in the assize of bread and ale within Greenstead and Berechurch; (in fact, in 1253 the abbot had complained about a Colchester mob pulling down his gallows and cucking-stool at Greenstead);
- was refusing borough coroners jurisdiction on lands held by the abbey within the liberty, calling in the county coroners instead;

- was claiming hunting rights in Greenstead and Berechurch and had enclosed in the former some land on which the townsmen traditionally had hunting rights;
- had built a weir across a waterway belonging to the town, and had blocked and enclosed one the roads in the liberty;
- had enclosed a meadow at Hythe on which the townsmen had communal rights;
- was preventing townsmen's right-of-way on several other roads or paths within the liberty;
- was withholding payments of rents that ought to contribute to the fee farm of the town;
- had created a drainage ditch from the abbey infirmary that was foul-smelling;
- claimed that he and his tenants were exempt from paying local tolls on any goods produced on his properties within the liberty;
- was refusing to pay 3s. due towards the fee farm for the abbey's right to hold a fair.

The abbot's defence was, essentially, that the abbey and its properties were not, administratively, within the borough liberty. Inquisitions into the disputes for the most part came to the opposite opinion. In the second half of the century, the disputes between town and abbey quietened, but flared up again at the close of the century – with a particularly assertive abbot having been accused, in 1398, of sending armed riders into the town to terrorize the citizens – and continued in the fifteenth, when the abbot's name again features prominently in lawhundred presentments.

A royal charter of 1447 was acquired by the townsmen in order to try to overcome local disputes. The charter included the specification of which hamlets were part of the liberty, and additional specification (beyond the terms of earlier charters) of the types of cases that fell within the jurisdiction of the borough court.

Constitutional reform, to place checks on the government of the bailiffs and to introduce a system in which there was greater accountability for expanding and more diversified borough revenues, took place in Colchester in 1372; whether it was provoked by specific abuses of power or physical expressions of popular discontent, as in some other towns (e.g. Ipswich), is unknown. The reforms laid out somewhat involved procedures for electing bailiffs, and introduced financial officers and a council chosen from the "wisest" townsmen to work with the bailiffs in governmental decision-making. Urban administration was becoming a more formalized affair, requiring a larger number of officials, with more specialized roles. In the years immediately following the reform, Colchester's records paint a picture of a revitalized administration undertaking a variety of actions improving the borough fabric and expressing civic pride, including a perambulation of the liberty (a symbolic assertion of the extent of geographical jurisdiction).

By contrast, subsequent constitutional adjustments, in the fifteenth century and later, were a response to the growing complexity of administrative responsibilities placed on towns by the king, combined with the social tensions resulting in part from a downturn in the borough economy. The outcome was an ultimately successful effort by the wealthier townsmen to protect their group interests by at first formalizing their domination of government and later monopolizing it. The royal charter of 1447 strengthened ballival authority by adding to it powers formerly exercised by royal officers – the Clerk of the Market and the Justices of the Peace, while that of 1462 incorporated the borough and redefined its governmental structure.

Buildings and fortifications

Apart from a few medieval cellars, little of the medieval borough remains today except for the fortifications and ecclesiastical structures. Holy Trinity church still has its Saxon tower (ca. 1000). The remains of St. Botolph's priory, although partial and ruinous, are nonetheless sufficient to give a strong impression of the size and solidity of the church as it would have been in the twelfth century. Of St. John's Abbey only the fifteenth century gatehouse remains, although this too is an impressive structure reflecting the wealth of the house.

All that still stands of the medieval castle is its keep (which is a broader version of the Norman keep in the Tower of London, although its upper floors were torn down in the post-medieval period), a portion of the earthen ramparts that surrounded it, and foundations of a second, minor building. The castle was probably begun in the 1070s, perhaps as much a response to threats of Danish or Flemish invasion at that time as an element in the Conqueror's attempt to control his new realm (Colchester apparently having offered him no trouble, in contrast to Norwich). The castle was always held by the king, although when it underwent its only siege (1216) it was the supporters of the rebellious barons who surrendered it to King John's men. Colchester had managed to avoid involvement in the civil war between Stephen and Matilda, and again in the baronial wars of mid-thirteenth century. After the end of those wars, the main role played by the castle during the Middle Ages was as one of the county prisons and the site of some trials of prisoners (Colchester records describe a trial by combat there in 1375); Chelmsford, as a more central location in Essex, however, was chosen as the seat of the shire court. By the end of the Middle Ages the castle was starting to decay from lack of use and maintenance.

Two views of Colchester castle

[left] western end, with entrance constructed in the 12th century
(the small dome being a post-medieval addition)

[right] eastern end
photos © S. Alsford

Parts of the town walls and the ruins of one of its gates also survive today, having served the Romans, the Anglo-Saxons and the medieval townsmen. It was the walls that the townsmen chose to symbolize them on the borough seal; a similar expression of attitudes is reflected in medieval paintings of towns, which tend to overemphasize the walls and towers. However, that did not stop the townsmen from plundering them for building materials, or for building houses right up against the wall. Efforts were made to keep the walls in good condition, beginning at least as early as King Edward the Elder's repair efforts after Colchester had been besieged and recaptured from the Danes in 917. In 1382 local records talk of ongoing repair work on the walls, and it was at this time that Richard II granted Colchester the first of three exemptions from the costs of sending representatives to parliament, in view of the expense of wall maintenance. Part of the costs involved adding bastions. Possibly the work on the walls was prompted by the Peasants' Revolt – one of whose leaders, John Ball, had lived in Colchester – during which a mob had disrupted the government of the town, threatened to destroy town records, and actually followed through on a similar threat against St. John's Abbey.

Economy

Archaeology has found evidence that Colchester's inhabitants were already engaged in trade with the continent in the time of the ancient Britons; they were importing pottery, as well as imitating Belgic pottery in kilns in the vicinity of Colchester. The town's position near the coast, giving access across the North Sea to the markets in the Low Countries and the Baltic, and at the mouth of a major river system leading into East Anglia, was an advantage, as similar circumstances were for other East Anglian towns such as Lynn, Yarmouth and Ipswich. Colchester had an added advantage of proximity to London, as well as a good connection thereto via the old Roman roads system, although this later proved disadvantageous when (in the fifteenth century) the export of products of Colchester's cloth-finishing industry fell under the influence of the Hanse merchants based at the London Steelyard. In the opposite direction, a road ran to Ipswich.

Yet despite its long-standing international trade and its road connections to other English towns, Colchester was not as important a mercantile centre as towns such as Norwich, Lynn or Ipswich; the market for its agricultural produce or for the products of most local industries was primarily regional. The Colne provided it with a minor fishery – notably sole and the oysters for which Colchester was famous; a related annual fair was held at the beginning of the oyster season (October) and probably dates back to at least the twelfth century, although its first formal recognition was in a royal charter of 1319. None of the fairs held by the various religious houses seems to have been significant enough to attract foreign merchants. On the other hand, the town flourished sufficiently to encourage Jewish settlement in the reign of Henry II – the royal castle there being another attraction; this community had its own bailiff by 1220 but declined in later decades, so that by 1290 only a handful of relatively poor Jewish householders remained.

The pursuits of Colchester's residents were a combination of agrarian, fishing, mercantile and industrial, in a more even balance than other East Anglian towns of comparable size. Many burgesses were involved to some extent – whether personally or through employees – in agricultural activities as one of the means of earning their livelihood (e.g. crops might be grown to supply brewing retail). The area south of the walls in particular held many of the townsmen's pastures and fields; the type of soil favoured the cultivation of rye. The boundaries of the liberty of Colchester (i.e. the hundred) in fact extended well beyond the Roman walls to encompass, in addition to the immediate suburbs, four nearby villages: Lexden (west of the town), Greenstead (east), Mile End (north), and Berechurch (south), although these were also affiliated in some regards with manorial estates. At the time of Domesday, about 120 residents seem to have owned houses but no land, whereas the majority held tracts of land varying from one to ten acres each, suggesting an interest, although not an exclusive one, in farming. In the national taxations of 1296 and 1301 we see almost exactly the same proportion of townsmen (69%) on both occasions owning livestock; some owned only one or two animals, whereas others had large flocks or herds. Agricultural pursuits were, not surprisingly, most prevalent in the villages within Colchester's bounds, whereas the residents of the walled area were more engaged in commercial activities.

In the thirteenth century Colchester acquired a small role in cloth-making, and this industry gradually became more important to the town as the Middle Ages wore on, helped by the immigration of Flemings in the second half of the fourteenth century. Colchester merchants had a modest involvement in the wool trade, while local cloth, such as the russet for which the town had some fame, found markets across England and abroad. There were already a few fullers operating in the town in the twelfth century and the area around Colchester became a focus for the building of mills either partially or wholly used for fulling. Eight mills are known to have operated within the bounds of Colchester itself during the fourteenth century, although not all continuously. As the cloth-finishing industry became more important, mills switched from grinding grain to fulling cloth; the mill at New Hythe, for example, was made available by the town authorities to fullers, for a per-cloth fee.

In the thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries cloth-making was hardly a major industry in Colchester; leather-based industries – such as tanning and shoemaking – seem to have been equally important (at least in fulfilling the needs of local markets), and locally-made pottery found a regional market. While the leather industry declined, however, from the second half of the fourteenth to the early fifteenth century Colchester cloth-makers and merchants, like those of other east coast towns, benefited from the expansion of markets in the Baltic and Gascony; Colchester russet even found a market in Mediterranean countries, although via the London trade. But as the fifteenth century progressed, the cloth industry too went into a decline, as war and depopulation damaged the Baltic and Gascon markets. It came more under the control of, on the one hand, craft guilds whose role in assuring quality standards also meant restricting participation in the industry and, on the other hand, of wealthier townsmen who could afford to be involved in all aspects of clothmaking (purchase of wool, operation of mills, employment of cloth-finishers, exporting of cloth).

There were two wool and cloth fairs held in Colchester each year, in June and July; by the second half of the fourteenth century these had outgrown their original sites. One citizen's home hosted a privately-run wool market at the beginning of the 1370s, but the borough authorities soon took this over, settling it in the newly spruced-up cellar under the moothall (1373/74). They quickly followed this up by taking control over the fairs and accommodating elements of these too in the moothall cellar and the nearby High Street (the rents for stalls there helping with the borough budget); trading in private houses was prohibited.

Wine was the leading item among goods imported by Colchester's merchants, and grain prominent among their exports, although many simply dealt in whatever goods were available or in demand at any given point. However, generally Colchester was by no means as important a centre for import/export as Ipswich, to which Colchester's harbour was purely a subsidiary within the national system of customs collection. While Colchester's High Street market remained a regional distribution mechanism, wholesaling increasingly focused around the New Hythe suburb; Edward IV's charter to the borough restricted the buying and selling of imported goods to New Hythe, where ships landed goods. Yet only a handful of townsmen owned ships large enough for crossing the sea and mooring space at the Hythe was limited. Much of the international trade conducted through Colchester was in the hands of outside merchants. During the Middle Ages, Colchester never developed the degree of wealth that some of the younger, and often smaller, towns in East Anglia achieved.

Information sources

The following is a small selection of published sources of information about medieval Colchester. For additional secondary sources as well as primary sources, see the *bibliography to *The Men Behind the Masque.

Benham, W.G., ed. The Red Paper Book of Colchester. Colchester, 1902.

Benham, W.G., ed. The Oath Book or Red Parchment Book of Colchester. Colchester, 1907.

Britnell, R.H. Growth and Decline in Colchester, 1300-1525. Cambridge, 1986.

Britnell, R.H. "Colchester Courts and Court Records, 1310-1525." Essex Archaeology and History, vol.17 (1986), 133-40.

Britnell, R.H. "Bailiffs and burgesses in Colchester 1400-1525." Essex Archaeology and History, vol.21 (1990), 103-09.

Martin, G.H. The Story of Colchester: from Roman Times to the Present Day. Colchester, 1959.

Morant, Philip. The History and Antiquities of Colchester. London, 1768.

Powell, W.R. "Lionel de Bradenham and his siege of Colchester in 1350." Essex Archaeology and History, vol.22 (1991), 67-75.

Rodwell, W. Historic Churches: A Wasting Asset. Council for British Archaeology Research Report, no.19 (1977).

main menu

History of medieval Maldon

[MAIN MENU]

ORIGINS AND EARLY GROWTH | Development of local government
Buildings and fortifications | Economy | Summary/Recap | Information sources
Map of Maldon at the close of the Middle Ages
Maldon bailiffs and chamberlains
Appendix: borough custumal

Origins and early growth

Maldon is not one of England's better-known medieval towns. It never assumed any prominence and consequently has had little attention paid to it by historians. Yet, as a town relatively late in maturing, it provides an interesting comparison to larger towns.

Maldon's name is principally known for its association with the Danish victory at the Battle of Maldon (991), whose fame rests principally on the fact of it being immortalized in a fine Anglo-Saxon poem. The battle took place to the southeast of the town. There are no references in the poem to the site or its proximity to Maldon, nor any hints that refuge for the defeated Anglo-Saxons might have been nearby, but nor should we expect to find any, for the poem is an ode to heroism not a chronicle of events. However, the Danish raid that led to the battle may have been targeting Maldon, as one of Essex's only two towns (and easily accessible from the water).

Maldon's name points to Saxon origins, dun being the word for hill; archaeology has shown that a late Roman port on low ground (later Heybridge) was thereafter settled by Saxons from the times of their earliest arrival, although this site became marshy and forced settlement to move to higher ground. Maldon's centre stands on a hill atop the south bank of the River Blackwater which, immediately east of Maldon, becomes a wide estuary for several miles before entering the North Sea. In 916 Edward the Elder, whose forces had camped there during a campaign a few years earlier, constructed a burh at Maldon as part of his programme to reconquer (from the Danes) and fortify eastern England. A rectangular earthen rampart is known to have existed to the west of the medieval settlement, on high ground. Whether this was the burh defences, or evidence of a Roman fort guarding the road from Chelmsford near its crossing of the river, is uncertain. That Maldon was among the minority of Edward's burhs to have developed into a medieval borough is doubtless due to the fact that it also served as a regional market centre. Its value as a protected magnet for trade was subsequently recognized through the establishment of a mint at Maldon, Athelstan's law of 928 decreeing that every town and burh should have one, with the number of moneys varying (from one to eight) depending on the settlement's importance – Maldon and Colchester together seem to have been served by four.

Maldon was fragmented into several manorial estates after, if not before, the Norman Conquest. Great Maldon (as opposed to adjacent Little Maldon) was a manor in the king's hand. At the time of Domesday there were 180 houses held by the king's burgesses. It had the status of a half-hundred, and as such had its own court. The half-hundred had been carved out of the hundred of Dengie, whose lands surrounded it. This is perhaps why Domesday reports only 81 acres of land as being associated with the borough, and these were in the hands of a small minority of the householders. In the twelfth century, the lordship of Great Maldon was divided.

The town comprised three parishes (two of which were united in the thirteenth century), with settlement dispersed among a number of foci:

- All Saints, located on the highest part of the site adjacent to the earthen ramparts; here was the town's marketplace, and here the Carmelites had established a friary by 1293. The church itself was in existence by the twelfth century.
- St. Peter's, stretching eastwards along the road linking the marketplace and the harbour, and northwards to incorporate settlement around a bridge across the Chelmer; craftsmen and merchants established were settled near the church itself – this perhaps representing the earliest focus of urban settlement.
- St. Mary's, which was founded shortly before the Conquest to serve the growing settlement around the harbour facilities on the Blackwater, and rebuilt in the Norman period.

To the west of the town was Little Maldon, a manor that was part of the Honour of Peverell. There Beeleigh Abbey and the Hospital of St. Giles were founded (the latter before 1235). The hospital, named for the patron saint of cripples and lepers, was to take care of leprous burgesses and the king granted that it should receive all bread, ale, meat and fish that the town authorities confiscated because of sub-standard quality. A further separate estate was Earl's Maldon.

main menu

next

Created: August 29, 1998. Last update: November 11, 2002

© Stephen Alsford, 1998-2003

History of medieval Maldon

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth | Development of local government
Buildings and fortifications | Economy | Summary/Recap
Map of Maldon at the close of the Middle Ages
Maldon bailiffs and chamberlains
APPENDIX: BOROUGH CUSTUMAL

APPENDIX:

Ancient usages and customs of the borough of Maldon

The earliest surviving draft of the list of local customs was written into the oldest Court Book in March 1444, but apparently copied from a much older source possibly pre-dating the earliest known ordinance registered in the court records (1389); this source was probably the "book of customs" to which there are a few references – taken jointly these references seem to imply that the book was compiled around 1380/81. The town's acquisition of jurisdictions from its lords would have been a sufficient motivation to compile a written set of customary usages of the town. A more expansive list was drawn up and approved by the General Court held on 8 January 1468, with the earlier version incorporated as capitula 1-13 and many of the other ordinances made since the 1380s gathered from court records and added; a few later ordinances were entered at the end of the list (cap.47 onwards). The next edition was compiled in 1555.

Below is a summary and paraphrase (not a verbatim transcription) of the 1468 edition of the custumal with the later additions; clarifying insertions of my own are in square parentheses [] and I add notes concerning sources or later changes. For chapter titles I have used both the 1468 and the 1555 recensions. The chapter numbering is my own, and the loss of a parts of some of the pages (between chapters 14 and 15, and 24 and 25) may indicate that some customs are missing, although it is not clear from the 1555 recension what these might have been – possibly the 9th chapter of that recension is one of the missing items. This, based on a local ordinance of 1389, states that all types of pleas may be brought before the borough court each Monday.

CONTENTS

- cap 1: Descent of inheritance
- cap 2: Bequests of land
- cap 3: Lands for blood-kin
- cap 4: Four suits at court for burgage
- cap 5: Three essoins
- cap 6: Bakers and brewers
- cap 7: Right of freemen
- cap 8: Hides
- cap 9: Masters
- cap 10: Markets
- cap 11: Butchers
- cap 12: By what means a freeman
- cap 13: Elections
- cap 14: Measures sealed
- cap 15: Orders to the bailiffs
- cap 16: Suits between freemen
- cap 17: Wardemen
- cap 18: Butchers market
- cap 19: Pigs in the town
- cap 20: Security of the peace
- cap 21: Imprisonment
- cap 22: Mortar in Maldon
- cap 23: Blood
- cap 24: Amercement
- cap 25: Freemen to colour nothing
- cap 26: Foreigners
- cap 27: Pigs on causeways
- cap 28: Sealed measures
- cap 29: Cleaning of the town
- cap 30: Selling distance
- cap 31: Payment of account
- cap 32: Loose pigs
- cap 33: Writ regarding the liberties
- cap 34: Heybridge
- cap 35: Complaint about the bailiffs
- cap 36: Rental of bridges
- cap 37: No alien to be armed
- cap 38: Lodging of aliens
- cap 39: Bridge customs
- cap 40: Honouring officers
- cap 41: Swearing of aliens
- cap 42: [brewers]
- cap 43: Bailiffs' oath
- cap 44: Burgess' oath
- cap 45: Constables' oath
- cap 46: Oath of sergeants at mace
- cap 47: Counsel of the town
- cap 48: Livery of the bailiffs
- cap 49: Hoods of the chamberlains
- cap 50: Costs of the constables
- cap 51: Almshouse

| | |
|---|---|
| cap. 1 inheritance | The heir to a man's lands is to be the youngest son of his first wife. If the man only has daughters, the lands are to be divided between them, but the youngest may have first pick. If the children are underage, their mother (or stepmother, if applicable) shall be their guardian; if she fails to maintain the property, she shall lose guardianship to the nearest friends of the deceased. The widow has dower right in her late husband's property, even if she remarries – although the children are not to lose their inheritance as a result of her remarriage. Notes: the points about guardianship and dower were omitted from the 1555 recension. |
| cap. 2 bequests of land | A man may devise any properties that he has purchased during his lifetime, so long as the devise is confirmed in court before the bailiffs at the next or the second court [after his decease?], failing which the properties shall go to the heir [see cap.1]. Notes: the 1555 recension seems to imply the devise had to be brought before the court during the lifetime of the townsman, whereas the earlier version above suggests a form of local probate of wills (or at least those portions relating to property within the town). This custom did not apply to property which the townsman had inherited. |
| cap. 3 lands for blood-kin | If any man wishes to sell any burgage property, the sale must be announced at the next court when, if any of his kinsman wishes to buy the property, he may do so at a lower price than anyone else. Notes: omitted from the 1555 recension. |
| cap. 4 suits for burgage | Every holder of burgage lands must perform suit for them at the four General Courts. |
| cap. 5 essoins | Every freeman shall have the right to make 3 essoins before having to appear to answer a charge in court. Upon pain of fine (3d for freemen, 6d for foreigners), no man shall answer without finding attachments. Notes: it is not clear here whether "foreigners" is being used to refer to those from outside the town, or to residents who were not freemen. |
| cap. 6 bakers/brewers | If any baker or brewer is convicted of using false weights or measures, he shall be fined for the first two offences; for the third, he shall go to the pillory. All measures are be sealed [i.e. be marked with a stamp indicating borough approval]. Notes: omitted from the 1555 recension. |

| | |
|---|---|
| cap. 7 freeman's right | If any merchandise comes to the town by land or water, every freeman may demand a share. Ships must remain in port for 3 tides to allow freemen the time to buy before foreigners; after the elapse of that period, the merchant may sell to whom he pleases. However, if a freeman who takes a share fails to pay for it, or the seller may recover his losses by the bailiffs and council imposing a tax on the whole town. Notes: in the 1555 recension, this was elaborated and divided into two chapters, to distinguish between victuals and other merchandise; the above conditions were retained in the case of victuals, but for other merchandise cash-on-the-spot conditions applied. |
| cap. 8 hides | Only freemen are allowed to buy fresh hides in the town. Notes: omitted from the 1555 recension. |
| cap. 9 masters | No man being in the borough shall have a servant or tenant unless prepared to answer for him in court, with regard to trespasses and fines. Notes: omitted from the 1555 recension. |
| cap. 10 markets | On market day no man shall regrate, nor sell meat, fish or other foodstuffs until the hour of prime, when the bell is rung. Notes: omitted from the 1555 recension. |
| cap. 11 butchers | Butchers are not to sell unwholesome meat. Notes: the 1555 recension adds that peddlars should not sell unwholesome or stinking fish; any such meat or fish would be confiscated. |
| cap. 12 qualifications for the franchise | No alien that marries the widow of a freeman is to be received into the franchise on those grounds. However, the widow may retain the rights of a freeman while she remains single. A freeman's daughter may make her husband free, by fact of the marriage. No man is to be received into the franchise unless he takes oath before the bailiffs and 4 or 6 wardemen to be true to the franchises of the town and obedient to its officers. Notes: an expanded version of this was included in the 1555 recension; it included specifications about the admission fee, and the provision that all children born to a man after he had become a freeman had the right to the franchise at a minimal fee (this was clearly the case with sons in the fourteenth century and was probably so taken for granted that not felt worth mentioning in the earliest custumal). |

cap. 13
elections

All freemen are to assemble in the common hall on Friday after Epiphany [6 January] to hear the bailiffs' accounts [i.e. of annual revenues and expenditures]. On that day the wardemen shall choose the new bailiffs and other officers, from the more worthy men. If it is necessary to fill gaps in the ranks of the wardemen, then new members are to be chosen from the most able and most discrete townsmen. If any of the wardemen is found to act contrary to the interests of the community, he shall be removed and a replacement chosen by assent of the community. Once a man has been elected bailiff, he shall never afterwards be elected to any other office, except representative to parliament.

*Notes: the 1555 recension edited this so that only the matter of freemen attending elections was included; a separate chapter was devoted to the question of the cursus officiorum

cap. 14
measures

No man is to sell by any measure that is not sealed with the town's seal, upon pain of fine (or, if the culprit refuse to pay a fine, loss of franchise).

Notes: omitted from the 1555 recension; it seems that the need was felt for a more explicit or more general statement of this custom than is found in cap.6, and such a statement originated as an ordinance passed in April 1421.

cap. 15
orders to bailiffs

Every resident who has borne the estate of bailiff is to be ready to come to the moothall at all times, upon command of the bailiffs, to discuss matters related to the common benefit. Any refusing without reasonable excuse shall be fined.

Notes: a similar requirement appears in the 1555 recension but restricted only to members of the town council. In May 1408 we find a number of wardemen fined for failing to respond to a summons to discuss town business.

cap. 16
suits between freemen

No freeman is to sue another freeman outside the borough, without first having pursued his case as far as it can be taken in the borough court, and then must obtain ballival licence to transfer the case elsewhere.

Notes: that this was a serious problem is suggested by the fact that the 1555 recension expands this chapter by noting that failure to comply would result in 40 days imprisonment, a great fine, and loss of the franchise.

| | |
|--|---|
| cap. 17 wardemen | Anyone chosen as wardeman who induces strife or argument among his fellowship during council meetings shall be fined. Notes: omitted from the 1555 recension. |
| cap. 18 butchers market | No butcher is to sell in the market on Sunday after matins is rung on the bell of All Saints church, on pain of a fine and confiscation of the meat (which will be equally divided between the town and the supervisors of the market). Shops may open their doors, but not their windows, on Sundays [up until the matins bell]. Notes: the 1555 recension included other trades in this prohibition, although this may have been understood in earlier times. |
| cap. 19 pigs | The owner of any pig allowed to run loose shall be fined 4d., of which 2d. to the town and 2d. to the man who finds the pig and drives it to the town pound. Notes: based on an ordinance made January 1411; the 1555 recension added to this a fine for keeping hogs in town at all. |
| cap. 20 security of the peace | The bailiffs may take surety for [keeping of] the peace if necessary, at the suit of any resident of the borough, or imprison individuals until they find sureties. Notes: omitted from the 1555 recension, for by this time the king had given the bailiffs powers of Justices of the Peace, a higher authority than local custom. |
| cap. 21 imprisonment | The bailiffs have full power to punish all manner of "naughty brauleres and bryboures, nyght walkerres, stastrykeres and evese dropperes" by fine or by imprisonment. Notes: omitted from the 1555 recension, probably for the same reason as cap.20. |
| cap. 22 mortar | "Brothelled brawlers" who refuse to submit to the bailiffs' judgement for their crimes – viz. a fine of 6d. for a man and 4d. for a woman – shall bear the mortar, according to old custom of the town, as appears in [records dated] 4 Richard II (1380/81). Notes: I am not certain what the mortar was, but it was a punishment of humiliation also applied to scolds and whores and was something carried or perhaps worn; omitted from the 1555 recension. |

| | |
|--|---|
| cap. 23 blood | No man is to make affray against another so that blood is drawn, on pain of 40d. fine. Notes: omitted from the 1555 recension, probably for the same reason as cap.20. |
| cap. 24 amercement | Notes: the text is lost, nor is this theme dealt with in the 1555 recension. |
| cap. 25 freemen to colour nothing | No freeman is to pretend that a foreigner's goods are his own, for purposes of buying or selling, upon pain of loss of franchise. Notes: the concern here was with evasion of tolls on market goods coming into the town. |
| cap. 26 foreigners | No foreigner may buy or sell within the town unless he has bought a licence to do so (40s.) from the bailiffs. Notes: the 1555 recension has something similar, but the licensing requirement is more specifically directed at foreigners buying merchandise or victuals at the port with the intent of re-selling it in town (presumably in the market). |
| cap. 27 pigs on causeways | Any pig lacking a ring [i.e. through its nose, by which to be tied up] and damaging a causeway shall incur a fine of 4d. Notes: based on an ordinance made in January 1423; it is not clear if/how this goes beyond the provisions for vagrant pigs in cap.19, and the 1555 recension omits it. |
| cap. 28 sealed measures | Notes: this is basically the same as cap.14, except that a fine of 6s.8d is specified; omitted from the 1555 recension. |
| cap. 29 cleaning the town | Any resident who places dung or wastes on the common roads shall be fined 40d. Notes: omitted from the 1555 recension, although it contains chapters prohibiting women, servants or children from casting dust or domestic refuse into the High Street, or from throwing refuse within forty feet of the highway when dumping on the dunghills at the Hythe or at town's end. |

cap. 30
selling distance

No resident may sell victuals within 5 miles of the town, under penalty of 6s.8d for the first offence and loss of franchise for the second.

Notes: the object here was to prevent the rise of competition to the town's market, which was of course excepted from the prohibition (although this was not made explicit until the 1555 recension).

cap. 31
payment of account

Each bailiff shall give an accounting for [borough finances during] his term each year. All debts due from the account are to be paid, from the accountant's own money if necessary. The accountants may not withdraw from the court until all debts and arrears are fully paid.

Notes: this originated in ordinances of 1423 and 1426; outgoing bailiffs had to present the borough accounts at the January General Court following election of their replacements. The 1555 recension continues this principle, although by that time it was the chamberlains who were the accounting officers. This custom reveals one of the disincentives to office-holding, in personal liability for the successful collection of anticipated revenues, although the intent was really to ensure the bailiffs took their responsibilities seriously – they were absolved from paying from their own pocket revenues that genuinely could not be levied.

cap. 32
loose pigs

Any pig found wandering loose in the town may be sold publicly for the profit of the town. If anyone finds an alien pig in his pasture, or on any pasture belonging to the town, and sets his dogs on it or attacks it with a stick, so that the pig dies, the attacker cannot be prosecuted [by the pig's owner].

Notes: this further chapter dealing with loose pigs suggests they were a persistent nuisance at this period, which perhaps explains the strength of the descriptor "alien" applied to them; omitted from the 1555 recension.

cap. 33
writ re. liberties

The town has two markets, on Wednesdays and Saturdays, and many other liberties. No-one is allowed to set up a market within a great distance of the town, nor to anything else against the liberties, upon pain of £10 fine.

Notes: this is said to stem from a writ obtained from the king, perhaps (given the tenor of the next chapter) one related to the dispute over a rival market in Heybridge in 1338; omitted from the 1555 recension.

cap. 34
Heybridge

It has been the custom since time beyond memory that no vessel sail to Heybridge to load or unload without paying a fee.

Notes: in fact, it had been a matter of long dispute, but one gradually resolving in the town's favour; an ordinance to similar effect was passed in June 1423, and another ordinance on the same theme in July 1448.

cap. 35
complaint about the bailiffs

A common custom is that the counsel of the borough in all things is to be concealed and the judgements made by bailiffs shall be observed. No one fined by bailiffs and council for any transgression in a public matter may complain [i.e. appeal] to a lord or foreign gentleman, under pain of 20s. fine or loss of franchise.

Notes: an ordinance to this effect is referred to during the case of Giles Morvyle who had lied about his birthplace when becoming a freeman and, when later accused of being an alien and failing to prove otherwise, had tried to get help from some external lord to counteract his condemnation by the bailiffs (1458).

cap. 36
rental of bridges

Notes: the text of this chapter, omitted from the 1555 recension, is simply a cross-reference to information about rental of bridges and causeways in the "the new edition of the great book of ancient customs" (itself not extant) It is not clear what the tenor of this information would have been, but it was probably connected with farming out collection of tolls on merchandise travelling via the town bridge and the causeway leading through the marsh to it (see cap.39).

cap. 37
no alien to be armed

No Dutchman or other alien may bear a weapon, on pain of its confiscation.

Notes: based on an ordinance of April 1463 which adds the exception of a knife with which to cut meat; the 1555 recension adds the further proviso that an alien could carry a weapon when leaving town on a journey, or when returning. "Dutchman" was a catch-all term for people from the Low Countries and Germany, likely the leading sources of alien residents in Maldon.

cap. 38
lodging of aliens

Every alien must be in his house by 10 o'clock in the summer and 8 o'clock in the winter; any officer or freeman may bring a defaulter to the hall to pay a fine or provide an excuse.

Notes: based on an ordinance of April 1463; the 1555 recension included the servants of aliens in the curfew.

| | |
|--|---|
| cap. 39 bridge customs | Each cart and each pack-horse carrying merchandise across the bridge shall pay 1d. Notes: the town court proclaimed, in January 1465, that this was an old custom; omitted from the 1555 recension. |
| cap. 40 honouring officers | No resident burgess is in anger to call a bailiff or wardemen by any name such as thief, knave, backbiter, whoreson, false, foresworn, cuckold, or bawd. Notes: the 1555 recension specifies a fine of 6s.8d for this offence. |
| cap. 41 swearing of aliens | It is ancient custom that each alien take oath to be obedient to the bailiffs and not to complain of them to any person of superior rank, on pain of 20s. fine. Notes: the 1555 recension has a lower fine of 15s. |
| cap. 42 (title destroyed) | Any brewer who sends ale from his house to gannokers on Sundays at the time of matins, mass or other divine service, shall be fined 12d. Notes: gannokers were ale-wives – women who retailed (and sometimes brewed) ale; this chapter is struck through and was omitted from the 1555 recension. |
| cap. 43 bailiffs' oath | <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ● to well and truly govern the town and maintain its franchises; ● to give equal justice to all men, without favour to any party; ● to supervise the sale of goods coming by water and see that all burgesses have their share. Notes: oaths are omitted from the 1555 recension; they are not typical elements of customals. |
| cap. 44 burgess' oath [see cap.12] | <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ● to be loyal to the king; ● to uphold town customs and liberties; ● to keep secret the counsels of the town [see cap.35]; ● not to pretend to own the goods of others [see cap.25]; ● to be obedient to the bailiffs in all things; ● to be at scot and lot; ● if within 7 miles of the town, to be in attendance at the town court meeting held on the Friday following Epiphany [6 January]. |

| | |
|--|--|
| cap. 45 constables' oath | <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ● to keep the peace; ● to execute orders of the bailiffs. |
| cap. 46 oath of sergeants at mace | <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ● to be obedient to the bailiffs and court at all times; ● to collect court amercements and not to conceal any money collected; ● to make no arrest without a warrant from the court; ● to gather tolls on goods coming, by water or by land, to market or fair, and to bring the master of any arriving ship before the bailiffs with his billet. Notes: the last item was a later addition to the original text. |
| cap. 47 counsel of the town | The whole ward ordained on 10 January 1477 that if any wardeman disclose the counsel of the town [i.e. deliberations of its administration] he shall be fined 20s. Notes: the 1555 recension extends this specifically to include bailiffs and town clerk. |
| cap.48 bailiff's livery | Every bailiff shall have 16s.8d for his livery, to be worn on Corpus Christi day in procession, on condition he buy a gown of the same colour, failing which they shall have the old allowance of 13s.4d. Notes: omitted from the 1555 recension. |
| cap. 49 chamberlain's hood | Each chamberlain shall have 5s. for livery, on condition he buy a hood, failing which he shall have only 3s.4d. Notes: omitted from the 1555 recension. |
| cap. 50 constables' costs | Every constable charged to the [court] sessions shall have 8d a day for ward of the town box. Notes: the box referred to was presumably used to hold money collected from fines; omitted from the 1555 recension. |
| cap. 51 almshouse | It was ordained at the court of election on 9 January 1484 that the two wardens of the almshouses shall, each year on this day, render account and deliver any surplus therefrom to the chamberlains. Notes: omitted from the 1555 recension. |

previous

main menu

Created: August 29, 1998. Last update: November 11, 2002

© Stephen Alsford, 1998-2003

History of medieval York

[MAIN MENU]

ORIGINS AND EARLY GROWTH

The pre-Conquest borough and effects of the Conquest
Development of local government | Power struggles with rivals
Buildings and fortifications | Economy | Information sources
Map of York at the close of the Middle Ages

Origins and early growth

As the Roman invasion of Britain moved north, a garrison was established on York's site by the Romans and the fortress was called Eboracum. They evidently recognized that the site was strategically located to control the principal south-north route through the country: the Vale of York. It was not only a natural focus of ancient land-routes, which Roman-built roads subsequently augmented, but also well-placed to connect with the inland waterway system that later developed; the Ouse was part of this system, and had a reasonably convenient connection to the North Sea via the Humber. The fortress, situated in the northwestern section of the future medieval York, attracted a civilian population which settled on the opposite bank of the Ouse and York became one of the provincial capitals and, after the Christianization of the empire, the centre of a bishopric. It was to remain one of England's most important cities for the next 1,300 years, although this was a double-edged sword, for it meant that York would often be caught up in national conflicts.

What happened to York after the departure of the Romans is hazy. Little evidence of the Anglo-Saxon newcomers has been turned up in York by archaeologists, as yet. The Roman roads probably helped keep it a settlement of some importance as the remnants of the Christian Romano-British society disintegrated. This is suggested by two pieces of evidence: when Augustine was sent to Britain (601) to begin the process of restoring orthodox Christianity it was intended that York be the centre of one of two planned episcopal sees; and when the king of Northumbria was converted to Christianity (627) his baptism took place at York, where a modest wooden church dedicated to St. Peter was hastily constructed for the purpose – the king initiated a project to reconstruct it on a larger scale, in stone.

Possibly York's importance in this early period of the Middle Ages was more as an administrative centre – both religious and secular – than one of population or trade. This role is reflected in further rebuilding of the Minster church in the late seventh century, and again after severe fire damage in 741. On the other hand, York was also subject to the political instabilities of the period; during the wars between the various kingdoms into which the country was divided, York was captured several times in the seventh century.

By the eighth century the picture is clearing. There is evidence of an Anglo-Saxon settlement in the Fishergate area, by the River Foss – perhaps an industrial and trading community serving the resident administrators – which justified the "wik" in the Anglo-Saxon name for the town: Eoforwic. The Anglo-Saxons may have been deliberately avoiding the area of Roman habitation on the south-west bank of the Ouse. This shift of the civilian settlement would help explain why the medieval bridge across the Ouse was further east than the likely site of the Roman crossing at the end of Stonegate. In 735 York's bishop acquired archiepiscopal status and York was beginning to acquire a reputation as a centre of learning, thanks to a school attached to the church of St. Peter. There seems to have followed a period of prosperity – yet also one of complacency for, whereas an eighth-century writer mentions the city having high walls (presumably the remnants of the Roman fortifications), the existence of strong walls was denied by a later writer, referring to events of the 860s, so perhaps the walls had been allowed to fall into disrepair.

In 866 the Danes, having conquered East Anglia, spread northwards and captured York, in the following year defeating the Northumbrian forces that tried to retake it. The Danes subsequently refortified the city and made it, under the name Jorvik, the centre of their northern kingdom; this attracted further Danish settlement to the area, leading to an economic boom, in part thanks to the energy of Danish craftsmen and traders and their improved access to markets in northern Europe. Christianization of some of the Danish kings lessened the impact of this on the city's role in religious administration, although there appears to have been some disruption and paganism flourished alongside the Christian church.

The city continued to be a target in the struggle for control of England. The Viking kingdom of the north faced threats from both from Wessex and Norsemen from Ireland, the latter succeeding in taking over York. Athelstan of Wessex took it during his invasion of 927 but was unable to hold it. Control of Yorkshire swung back and forth until just after mid-century when Northumbria was united with southern England into a single kingdom, although earls continued to rule the north from York. In this unstable environment, the role of York as a centre of Christian learning declined.

main menu

next

Created: December 28, 1999. Last update: March 7, 2004

© Stephen Alsford, 1999-2004

Florilegium Urbanum

Introduction | Community | Economy | Government | Lifecycle

The INTRODUCTION presents perspectives on English towns and cities by commentators at different periods, and features in particular FitzStephen's "Description of London".

Prologue

The aim of Florilegium Urbanum is to provide a considered selection of primary source texts illustrative of various aspects of medieval urban life, and to present those texts in modern English. The texts have been translated from the original Latin or Anglo-Norman French, or converted from Middle English; the language of the original is indicated in the header for each document. My underlying purpose is not simply to put online a set of primary documents, however, but to provide a richer understanding of medieval English towns and townspeople by presenting extracts from medieval records in a framework of commentary and explanation that will, I hope, give readers better insight into the character, perspectives and preoccupations of urban society.

The term florilegium refers to a compilation of excerpts from other writings. It is formed from two Latin words and means, in a literal sense, a sampling of flowers; that is, a collection of choice blooms into an appealing floral arrangement. The same concept is seen in "anthology", which is likewise based on Greek words for "flowers" and "gathering".

Medieval florilegia were extensive (almost encyclopedic) and systematic collections of extracts drawn mainly from the writings of the Church Fathers and other early Christian authors, as far back as the Gospels, although classical writings might also be sampled. The aim was to pull out passages that exemplified certain topics and, taken together, might present an overall treatment of some ethical or doctrinal theme.

In the post-medieval period, "florilegia" was applied less discriminately to miscellanies or compilations of literary or scientific character. I therefore do not feel too guilty if my application of the term to this collection of extracts from medieval archives is not precisely in the spirit of the earliest florilegia. Although in that my intent is to try to present (in most cases) texts casting a general light on urban life, as opposed to texts highly particular to unique circumstances, and is also of course to educate, I hope I have not strayed too far from that spirit.

Documents such as are excerpted here give some indication of the range of source materials available for the study of medieval towns; the majority are still unpublished. For the most part they derive from the official record of medieval government, rather than intimate accounts of private matters; but they can be revealing.

"Such things may be only shadows, but they are the shadows of men and women."

G.H. Martin, 1973

Note on editing conventions

Most of the documents included here were accessed via published transcripts. Not a few of those transcripts were accompanied by translations by the transcriber, or a colleague. I have chosen to provide a fresh translation in the great majority of cases, since my emphasis is on conveying the sense of the originals in a form that a wide audience can easily understand. To achieve this it has sometimes been necessary to take small liberties in interpreting terminology of the original, or in modifying the structure of the original – although I have avoided the latter where practicable. In cases where I felt it advisable to retain terms that were either technical or now not in usage, footnotes (or links to my glossary) are provided to explain those terms. I have striven for consistency in translating terms across the numerous documents, but in some cases different translations of the same expression were necessitated by differences of context. Punctuation is used to support the modern translation, and does not necessarily reflect any medieval punctuation in the originals.

The earlier translations into English to which I refer above are in a form truer to the language and manner of expression of the original, but at the cost of using an English style that is today not always easy to understand. Readers wishing for this kind of stricter translation are referred to the print sources identified in the headers. However, they should note that I have also taken opportunity of my new translation to correct occasional errors or omissions in some of the earlier translations. Where the primary sources themselves lack explicit internal evidence for dating, I have usually relied on dates estimated by the original transcriber/translator.

I must echo the sentiments of Salzman, in his preface to English Life in the Middle Ages (1926) when he says:

"My quotations are important for their meaning, and it is more essential that the reader should grasp that meaning than that he should have the exact original before his eyes and be left to gape amazedly at unfamiliar combinations of vowels and consonants. But no one will be more pleased than myself if any readers are moved to turn to those originals and tackle them for themselves."

In a few cases, I have chosen to include texts that were only available to me in English translation. I have thought it sensible not to attempt modernization of those texts, without having reference to the version in its original language.

Minor interpolations to make the sense of the text clearer or more explicit, or occasionally to provide a synopsis of extensive omitted sections of text, are represented by text enclosed within square parentheses []. These interpolations are, I recognize, uncomfortably frequent; but I have felt them necessary, since my readers in the democratized environment of the Web will include newcomers to medieval urban history. Doubtful readings or meanings are indicated by inclusion of a question mark in those parentheses. An ellipsis indicates either missing or illegible text in the original, or my decision to omit some text from my translation.

I have modernized and standardized Christian names, but have left surnames in the form found in the original source, except in occasional cases where a single document contains variants of the same surname – in which case I have selected one – or where I have found it necessary to make a correction or clarification, such as when a name has been incorrectly transcribed or is well-known in a different spelling. Occupational qualifiers have been translated only in those cases where, in my judgement, they appear to be designating an actual occupation, rather than indicating an affixed surname. Names of places (when referring to places, as opposed to use as surnames) I have modernized, when able to identify the actual location, past or present.

Keywords have been included at the beginning of each page, to give a quick sense of the principal or significant subjects dealt with by each document. These keywords are taken from a controlled vocabulary, and a search on any one or combination should retrieve other documents dealing with the same subject; the thesaurus will be added to this Web site at a later date.

Introduction | Community | Economy | Government | Lifecycle

main menu

Created: August 18, 2001.
Last update: April 27, 2003

© Stephen Alford, 2001-2003

About the title illustration

"There is, perhaps, in everything of any consequence, a secret history which it would be amusing to know, could we have it authentically communicated."

James Boswell

A prosopographical study of politics, the character of local government (democracy or oligarchy ?), and its officials – the ruling class – in cities and towns of East Anglia (Colchester, Ipswich, King's Lynn, Maldon, Norwich and Great Yarmouth) during the Late Middle Ages.

Contents

INTRODUCTION

- Notes

chapter 1:

THE STRUCTURE OF BOROUGH GOVERNMENT

- Introduction: The architecture of borough records
- The executive office
- Checks and balances
- The town council
- The community as political entity
- Representation and election
- Limits to participation
- Notes

chapter 2:

THE SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC BACKGROUND OF OFFICE-HOLDERS

- Introduction: Class and wealth
- Occupational analysis
- The ruling class as plutocracy?
- Origins of the ruling class
- The mercantile interest
- Class consciousness and the dignity of office
- Social cohesion and mobility within the ruling class
- Gentrification
- Notes

chapter 3:

THE MONOPOLISATION OF OFFICE

- Introduction: A question of perception
- Frequency of office-holding
- Membership of town councils
- The executive committee
- Power and dynasty
- The degree of popular participation in office-holding
- Notes

chapter 4:

ATTITUDES TOWARDS OFFICE-HOLDING

- Introduction: The human factor
- Incentives to office-holding
- The burdens of office
- Reluctance to serve
- The pursuit of power and prestige
- Notes

chapter 5:

PROFESSIONALISM IN ADMINISTRATION

- Introduction: A tradition of service
- Promotion and the hierarchy of experience
- Career administrators
- Expertise as a factor in selecting officers
- Notes

chapter 6:

THE QUALITY OF GOVERNMENT

- Introduction: Chronicles of sin
- The theory: "Good and vertuous governance"
- The practice: reconciling paternalism and self-interest
- The practice: offences against law, customs, and morals
- The practice: sins of avarice
- The practice: crimes of violence
- The practice: abuses of power
- Notes

chapter 7:

CONFLICT AND SOLIDARITY IN URBAN POLITICS

- Introduction: At moments of crisis
- The mask of unanimity
- Discontent and division
- Discords and disputes: Maldon and Colchester
- Discords and disputes: Ipswich
- Discords and disputes: Yarmouth and Norwich
- Discords and disputes: Lynn
- The Petypas affair (Lynn)
- Forces for political change
- Notes

CONCLUSION

- Notes
-

APPENDICES:

I The officers of borough government

1. Governmental structure
2. Lists of office-holders 1272-1460

II Statistical tables

1. Occupational divisions
2. Monopolisation of office
3. Ages of office-holders \(Lynn\)
4. Families prominent in Yarmouth government

III Parliamentary representation

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Principal abbreviations used in Notes and Bibliography

Primary sources: manuscripts

Primary sources: printed transcripts, extracts, calendars, and catalogues

Secondary sources

MEDIEVAL ENGLISH TOWNS

Medieval English Towns - Glossary

[\[MAIN MENU\]](#)

abatement

Sometimes called "fresh abatement", or in some towns "fresh force", this was a crime of recent unlawful intrusion (sometimes by force – in which case the term hamsoken, or housebreaking, is applied) into a property in order to gain physical possession thereof; this sort of thing might occur, for example, when the owner died and there was a dispute over who inherited. The assize of abatement was a legal action to recover possession; it was the borough equivalent of novel disseisin, although its emphasis was on quick remedy (no essoins were allowed). Consequently the concern of the court was less with who had rightful title to a property than with whether an occupant had been dispossessed; thus the rightful owner, if seizing a property from its tenant for (for example) non-payment of rent, without going through due process of law (initiated by writ), could be obliged to restore the property to the tenant. The object was to restore the status quo and thereby oblige a claimant to seek his rights through the courts, which involved obtaining a writ from the king.

aids

SEE taxation

alderman

The Anglo-Saxon ealdorman (meaning "chief man") was an officer of the king who was essentially leader of a shire, which included the presidency of the shire court; as they became more powerful and transformed into earls, the shire-reeve took their place at head of a shire. The name survived for two types of town official, of far lesser status yet important locally. One type was the executive officer of a gild, notably a Merchant Gild. The earliest expression of organized association (as opposed to the folk moot an unwieldy institution because insufficiently organized) among townsmen may have been, in not a few cases, a Merchant Gild. In some towns (e.g. Lynn, Leicester) the gild alderman seems to have been the community leader in the establishment of initial self-government and later surrendered place to a mayoralty perhaps considered more representative of all segments of the community. Similarly, the alderman's assistants the scabins foreshadowed borough chamberlains, although their (continental) origins had them as the equivalent of jurats. The second use of the title was for the members of the town council. This use is not common until the fifteenth century, when the conciliar structure was becoming two-tiered as class differentiation necessitated separate representation; "aldermen" referred to the members of the upper council, more influential. The choice of name may have been the influence of London, where the aldermen were ancient and had roles not dissimilar to the "lawmen" (associated with boroughs which developed under Danish influence) who, in groups usually of 12, formulated judgements; certainly each alderman exercised authority over one of the London wards and jointly the aldermen were the city's council. It may have been at London that the term "ealdorman" was extended from heads of shires to heads of boroughs.

alien

SEE foreigner

amercement

The term refers to a financial penalty imposed by judicial authorities on guilty parties (both parties guilty of a crime of which accused, or guilty of making a charge found by the court to be groundless). It means to be "subject to the mercy of" a judgemental power, although "mercy" itself derives from a Latin term used for a punitive compensation; a party found guilty of anything was said to be "in mercy" – that is, subjectible to a penalty to be judged by the court. Amercement was the common punishment for most crimes of lesser gravity, since there was no extensive prison system in the Middle Ages. Today we would use the term "fine", but in medieval England this had a slightly different application, being a sum of money paid voluntarily (although still with a compensatory connotation, and usually after some kind of formal legal or quasi-legal proceeding) to some other individual – often the king – in return for the grant of some right (e.g. freeman's status), benefit, or property.

assize

Assize was a term for a type of legal procedure; it came to be applied in a general sense to a session of a court applying such procedures, and gradually came to be used more specifically (but variously) for the jury, the judges or the enactments of the court. Grand and Petty Assizes were invoked for actions concerning real estate; although essentially civil actions and thus potentially within the jurisdiction of borough courts, there could be a criminal element where dispossession had occurred, resulting in a breach of the peace – a plaintiff could initiate an action in such cases by obtaining a writ of novel disseisin, whose equivalent in the boroughs was called "fresh force". A slightly different, but related, use of the term was for assizes of bread, wine and ale and assizes of weights and measures. These were concerned with the regulation of retailing practices, through the assessment of prices and quality, and the examination and enforcement of standards (including prices). They were thus of a quasi-judicial character. In towns, existing officers and/or individuals specifically appointed to the task would be charged with keeping the assizes (i.e. surveying business practices, testing measures used to dispense food or drink); dealing with offences against the assizes was often amalgamated with leet proceedings.

For further background information see:

- Medieval Sourcebook: The Assizes of Bread, Beer, & Lucrum Pistoris
- Medieval Sourcebook: Judicium Pillorie \(The Judgment of the Pillory\)

attachment

SEE distrain

bailiff

The landlord of a franchise (be it manor or town) did not get involved in the daily administration of his property and its inhabitants; he appointed officials to undertake duties such as collection of gable rents or the supervision of services due him from his tenants. He might select one from his tenants to exercise the office of reeve (from the Anglo-Saxon gerefa); the medieval sheriff was simply the king's shire-reeve. Or he might employ a man to act as the bailiff of his estates. The first administrative officers we find in English towns are reeves: in Anglo-Saxon times there are passing mentions of portgerefa and wicgerefa. In the first centuries after the Conquest they are usually referred to by their Latin name of prepositus (provost) meaning "leading man"; they too were appointees of the lord of the borough, but presided over (although did not directly control) the folk moot. After self-government was acquired, the term ballivus (implying jurisdiction over a certain area – bailiwick) gradually came to be preferred in towns, although it is not clear whether there is any real significance to the change. In most towns one or more bailiffs acted as the executive officer, presiding over local courts, at first, and only later were they superseded by mayors.

borough

Derives from the Old English term burh, which was originally applied to any fortified place, such as a thegn's house or a hilltop – not necessarily a populated place. During the wars between Anglo-Saxons and Danes it was particularly applied to centres of population which were protected with defensive earthworks; such of those centres which continued to flourish in later times came to be boroughs. The term burgus often appears to be used in a technical sense, as distinct from "town" (villata), such as in the 1200 proceedings at Ipswich, usually relating to the town as a legal/administrative entity. Another term sometimes used in a general sense, but sometimes with a more technical meaning, was liber burgus, "free borough", (or the slightly older liber burgagium, referring to burgage tenure); this came into vogue at the close of the twelfth century and was popular throughout the thirteenth, when many communities sought this status through charters from their lords. It involved the grant of special privileges reducing the degree of servitude of burgesses to their lord and/or increasing the degree of corporate autonomy from external authorities; the precise set of privileges varied from town to town. This status was most commonly given to new town foundations, and implied their acquisition of privileges already in possession of many of the older, established towns (a specific town might be used as a model for a new foundation).

burgage

A burgage tenement was a piece of property within a borough, normally comprising a house with or without additional land, and held by certain distinctive customs ("burgage tenure") that typically involved a money rent – as opposed to labour services which characterized rural tenures – known as hawgable or landgable and payable to the lord of the borough (regardless of what other rents payable a property might accumulate over the course of time). A burgage tenement was typically a large plot – distinctively, long and narrow (with the narrow end facing the street) – as originally settled or built on, as the town developed; population growth often led to the plot being subdivided and new rents might be applied to the subdivisions, but the original burgage rent of the whole is sometimes still evidenced in documents. Another characteristic of burgage tenure ("tenure" being a term connoting occupation more than outright ownership, since most real estate was held of some lord and ultimately the king) was that a burgage property could be sold, inherited or otherwise disposed of more freely than was normally the case with rural property. Not all properties within borough boundaries were burgage tenements. What was important about the latter to boroughs, at the time when they were securing their first grants of self-government, was that the holders of burgage tenements owed suit to the borough court and were (at first) an important source of revenue that was put towards payment of the fee farm. Boroughs therefore sought to confirm, within the terms of the grants, the local customs affecting the conditions of burgage tenure and the jurisdiction of their local court over cases relating to burgage properties, and early customals show some preoccupation with tenurial matters; by the thirteenth century burgage tenure was a sufficiently standardized characteristic of boroughs that it was considered implicit in the grant of liber burgus status.

burgess

Although Domesday seems to have used this term fairly consistently to apply to town residents contributory towards the customary payments due the king from boroughs, later in the Middle Ages its varied application does not suggest a precise, universally agreed, technical definition. Broadly, however, it referred to residents of a borough, usually those residents who were members of the borough community in terms of sharing in communal responsibilities and rights; hence we often find the term "comburgess" used, to emphasise that an individual was a fellow member of the enfranchised community (although the term also came to be used, on occasion, to refer to burgesses of higher status). At Lynn the poorest townsmen were clearly described as non-burgesses, "burgesses" evidently being equated with those residents who had become freemen; this appears also the case in Ipswich. Yet in Colchester the same class of poorer residents was described as being burgesses. Outsiders ("strangers" or "foreigners") were sometimes allowed to acquire some of the same – notably commercial – privileges by entering the franchise under the special status of "foreign burgess". Towards the end of the Middle Ages "burgess" was more likely to be used to distinguish one group of privileged townsmen from a less privileged group.

burh

SEE borough

chamberlain

The title originated with an officer of a royal household who was responsible for the Chamber, which included the administration of the king's household's budget. Boroughs later mimicked this, introducing officers to take charge of collecting revenues and paying expenses in part to relieve executive officers of some of their work but perhaps more to place a check on possible embezzlement by those officers. It is not clear how early there were dedicated financial officers in borough administration (the absence of mention in the Ipswich proceedings of 1200 is notable), but merchant guilds appear to have had them from the beginning. It was probably London who first gave its financial officers the title of "chamberlain", perhaps in part because the city treasury was kept safe in a particular chamber in the Guildhall. Treasurers and receivers were other names used for this type of officer.

comburgess

SEE burgess

community

The Latin term communitas was frequently used in late medieval England to characterize (among other associations) the residents of a town as a group, in a way that implied common action, common obligations or responsibility, or common rights or privileges. It was often used too vaguely to let us know if at any time a technical meaning – such as restriction to the burgess or enfranchised element of the town population – was intended. The town community is to some degree a later expression of the folk moot and is often seen acting as an entity, before the law formally recognized it as corporate entity. Occasionally one hears of the "commune", which means something similar but connotes a sworn association whose goal is the achievement of self-government; this was more a continental manifestation which could pursue its aims through violent rebellion against noble overlords, and so English kings tried to prevent this extreme expression of community within their realm.

See also:

- Political values and attitudes

For further information about communes see:

- Information Please Encyclopedia: "commune"

compurgator

SEE pledge

constable

Two linked challenges faced by the monarchy after the Norman Conquest, as it sought to expand the scope and control of a national government, concerned the enforcement of law (beyond the unsatisfactory local mechanism of frankpledge) and preservation of the peace, and the ability to muster the populace for military service at need. In 1181 the Assize of Arms required every adult free man to be in possession of weaponry of certain types (determined by socio-economic status). When invasion from France was feared in 1205, the military and police duties of county sheriffs were turned over to constables, each to take charge of the militia of a hundred, and themselves subordinate to chief constables; the name (deriving from Latin terms meaning "count of the stable") had originally been applied to imperial officers whose duties included responsibility for military equipment. In 1252 a royal writ reiterated both the role of the constables (who may not have lasted once the scare in 1205 was over) and the Assize of Arms, which was also more closely defined; in boroughs, mayors or bailiffs were allowed to exercise the duty of constables. A second royal order of that year required "watch and ward", which established (or confirmed) in boroughs a nightwatch of 12 men to apprehend any suspicious characters until it could be ascertained what the reason was for them being abroad in the dark. These initiatives were all tightened up by the Statutes of Winchester and Westminster in 1285 which, among other things, required that town gates be kept closed and guarded from sunset to sunrise. It is probably from this time that Norwich, for example, had one constable for each of its four hundredal leets with sub-constables for each sub-leet, while Lynn (only a single hundred/leet) was nonetheless divided into ten constabularies or wards which also served for militia musters as well as for administrative purposes not envisaged by the royal legislation. Although elected locally, constables were strictly speaking officers of the king. They had the power to hold inquisitions in cases of individuals arrested at night. By the close of the Middle Ages, the constables were being subordinated to aldermen with minor judicial authority (echoing the London aldermanry system that predated the Plantagenet constables).

customs

Customary rules which formed one basis for local administration of justice; some features of these hark back to Anglo-Saxon traditions – the local practices which were established (in a non-literate age) as law through repetitive application, while others are the product of specific ordinances made by borough governments during the Late Middle Ages. Although these customs may vary in details from one borough to another, most reflect the same general concerns and preoccupations. When these rules were compiled in lists, as reference tools for town officers, the resulting document was called a "custumal". The term "customs" was also applied to customary dues (monetary, in-kind, or personal service) owed to the king or to some other lord of a territory. A third use of the term was for duties payable on merchandise being imported or exported; these customs might be for the profit of the town levying them (although, to avoid confusion, I have used the term "tolls" for these) or be part of the national system of customs collection.

discreet

This adjective was a quality used to refer to men with decision-making authority in borough government – as a group they were sometimes referred to as the discretiores. In fact, the term was used in a variety of contexts in the Late Middle Ages (e.g. see Bracton), usually with connotations of wisdom, prudence, sound judgement, or responsible behaviour; it was typically, although not exclusively, applied to individuals or groups acting in some kind of official capacity, and reflects the medieval belief that the ideal ruler combined intelligence and justice. That it is so often used in a way suggesting not simply a quality, but a recognized status – sometimes social, sometimes political – gives the term an almost technical character. There is no single modern descriptor that well captures the full medieval meaning. However, I have chosen to translate the term as "judicious", with discretiores translated as "the more judicious men"; my intent being to choose a quality with connotations of officialdom.

SEE ALSO prudhommes

distrain

In legal actions it was sometimes necessary to compel a defendant to come to court to answer a charge. One method of compulsion was to distrain on the personal property of the defendant; that is, to seize some of the defendant's possessions so that he could only regain them by providing sureties for coming to court, or by an illegal rescue. Usually moveables at the defendant's residence or place of business were targeted. "Distrain" might refer to the action of arrest (also called distress) or to the objects arrested. Sometimes a recalcitrant defendant might have to be distrained repeatedly. Distrain could also be applied to compensate a plaintiff in cases of debt, arrears of rent, or the cost of damages awarded by the court, where the convicted party refused to pay. Unless distrain was authorized by the court (so that a town officer, or even the plaintiff himself, could undertake it), it was itself a crime – with some exceptions. The process of distrain is described somewhat in the customal of Ipswich, cap.34, and that of Norwich, cap.14 and cap.30. "Attachment" was a more general term for the means by which a defendant could be obliged to answer a charge; it might be accomplished by pledges, through personal property voluntarily offered or (if necessary) distrained, or by having the defendant arrested ("attached by the body"). Goods or items that were subject to dispute or involved in a supposed crime could also be attached, for production as evidence in court.

Domesday Book

Briefly, the Domesday Book was the outcome of King William I's attempt to find out just what it was he'd conquered in 1066. As a newcomer, he knew little of the resources of England, and particularly of those resources on which the king had direct call. But he knew well enough that the land was the source of wealth and power. And so in 1086 he sent inquisitors through the shires to conduct a survey. This resulting and nameless description of the country was coming, less than a century later, to be called "Domesday" – the day of judgement; for the survey officially established who owned what (or whom) and who owed what (money or services) to whom. There were two volumes, which have been styled Great Domesday and Little Domesday, the latter covering East Anglia. While not comprehensive in its coverage, the survey provides a picture of much of the country which is unparalleled in medieval England. In particular there are gaps in coverage of the towns (London, Bristol and Winchester being the most notable absences), but over 100 places inhabited by burgesses are surveyed. So Domesday gives us our first real look at English medieval towns, with comparative information applicable to both the period immediately preceding the Conquest, and the period when the survey was undertaken; the comparison allows us to see, for example, the adverse effects of the Conquest – many boroughs had suffered damage and depopulation, either in the course of the resistance to the Normans, or because of the planting of castles in key strategic urban centres, to control the local and regional populations.

For further background information see:

- Focus on... The Domesday Book
- The Domesday Book Online
- Domesday Book
- Medieval Sourcebook: The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle: The Domesday Book, 1086
- Medieval Sourcebook: The Domesday Book 1086 - Instructions and Extract
- World Wide Words
- The Domesday Texts

essoin

Essoins were excuses for non-attendance at a court session. It was anticipated that, for various reasons, a man might not be able to attend a court session to prosecute or defend a charge and so provision was made for a certain number of absences without penalty, which were expected to be genuine and valid. Permissible excuses were: illness serious enough to confine one to bed; absence abroad; being busy in the king's service; and misadventure en route to court. The excuse had to be presented by some friend or agent of the essoined party; some men appear so frequently delivering essoins that it seems they did it as part of their livelihood. Since only in certain cases could judgements be rendered in the persistent absence of a defendant, essoins were often used as part of a strategy to delay the progress of cases. Some types of case, requiring speedy remedy, restricted or eliminated them.

farm

One party might acquire, on a basis similar to a lease, from another party one or more rights, jurisdictions, revenues or properties – often a combination thereof – by taking them to farm (today we still talk about "farming out" sources of revenue). A farm was a pre-determined lump-sum amount assessed for one year (although payments might be made in instalments) on an estimation of the value of the revenues. In theory at least, a farm was a fixed, or "firm", amount from year to year, as opposed to a rent, which might fluctuate according to property values; however, in practice farms were often renegotiated if the value of the sources of revenues changed, while "rents of assize" were considered to have a fixed value that could not be changed by, for example, a new owner (such rents themselves being subject to sale, gift or bequest, quite independently from the ownership of the real estate itself). The firma burgi, or fee-farm of a borough, was the annual sum due the Exchequer in return for the king allowing the farmer to administer the borough – or rather, administer its sources of revenue (which might include property rents and taxes, local tolls, court amerancements). Before the period of self-government, boroughs were farmed by local potentates (e.g. county sheriffs) or entrepreneurs; the aim was to be able to make a profit from the revenues beyond the amount due for the farm, and this could result in extortionate measures. Hence the desire of the townsmen to acquire the farm for themselves, which necessitated taking the reins of local administration. With the grants of self-government to boroughs by (principally) kings Richard I and John, the farm became in effect a perpetual lease. The amount of the fee-farm was fixed at the time of the original negotiation, but might increase if subsequent additions to jurisdictions, revenues etc. were granted, or decrease if the value of borough revenues demonstrably decline: thus, for example, we see many adjustments in valuations at the time of Domesday Book, while towards the end of the Middle Ages many towns were making cases for reduction of their fee-farm due to local hardship or abnormal expenses (e.g. building defensive fortifications). Boroughs themselves sometimes farmed out to townsmen sources of revenue (with associated offices, if applicable) or communal properties, since this assured the borough a guaranteed (lump sum) revenue, regardless of what income the farmer was able to extract.

folk moot

SEE moot

foreigner / alien

The perspectives of the everyday person of the medieval world were more parochial than today (when the mass media and telecommunications have given us a global outlook). Sense of identity, and feelings of "patriotism" were more focused on the local community and less on the nation-state, which was a relatively undeveloped concept at that time. Today we apply the term "foreigner" to someone who is from outside of the national community, and "alien" (other than the technical application in regard to immigration) to a being from another planet. Within the narrower focus of the medieval English mind, a foreigner was someone who was not strictly a member of the local community although was likely to be from some other community in England – often a neighbouring one; an alien was someone from another country. "Outsider" and "stranger" were terms applied less discriminately to such individuals. "Foreign" could, however, also be applied to someone who was resident in a town but not a fully enfranchised member of the burgess community. Aliens could likewise take up residence in a town and might integrate into the community – in some towns reliant on international trade, they could found important dynasties – but as the Late Middle Ages worn on, with growing nationalism (complicated by other factors such as commercial rivalries) fostered prejudice against non-natives, it became harder for aliens to settle and win acceptance within town society.

forestalling or regrating

Forestalling and regrating were similar offences in which middlemen purchased goods, particularly victuals, in order to resell them; regrators usually divided the goods into small lots to sell by retail, whereas forestallers might sell them again by wholesale. Forestalling was the more serious, involving interception of goods en route to market (or before the hour when the market could legally begin business), in order to buy them and then sell them in open market at a price higher than for what they would originally have sold; or, since town authorities kept a close eye on market prices and could control them somewhat, the profiteering might be achieved by buying wholesale at lower than the current market price and then reselling close to the market price. Sometimes the purpose was artificially to create a shortage of goods, so that the "fair" price established in the marketplace would be higher than it ought. The seriousness of forestalling, as an infringement of community rights (viz. the right of all burgesses to have the opportunity to obtain sufficient supplies for household needs at the lowest cost possible), is reflected in the fact that the term – which came, in legal use, to mean to stop goods before they reached a market stall (although in its Anglo-Saxon origins the term may have been applied to other kinds of interception) – has a broader, metaphoric application in modern vocabulary. The term "pre-empt", which has a similar meaning today, likewise derives from the purchase (Latin emptio) of goods before they could reach a public venue. However, commercial enterprise – including the resale of goods by middlemen – was fundamental to the economic character of towns, and regrating was controlled more through licencing and limitation than by suppression (at Oxford, for instance, the number of regrators operating from shops was fixed by an agreement between university and town, the latter taking a licence fee per shop), while instances of forestalling constantly appear in borough court records. The danger, or fear, was that regrators would resort to forestalling.

For further background information see:

- Medieval Sourcebook: Statuta de Forstallariis \(Statute of Forestallers\), c. 1300

franchise

SEE freedom

frankpledge

A system of policing and law enforcement found at the lowest level of society; later part of the manorial system of administration of justice and, by extension, that of towns. It harks back to the earliest application of the "jury" in Anglo-Saxon England which relied on the knowledge of an accused man's peers and neighbours to vouch for guilt or innocence. Late Anglo-Saxon law required, in most parts of England, every commoner (unless part of the household of a lord) to be a member of a "tithing" – "ten people" (although in practice groupings were not necessarily of the exact number) – or a frankpledge. The group was jointly responsible for ensuring that any of its members accused of a crime appeared in court to answer for it (failing that, the group could be answerable for compensating an injured party); they were essentially pledges for the behaviour of their members. The group was also responsible for bringing to the court's attention, through presentments made by their leader (the tithingman – later known as the capital pledge), any crimes committed by its members. These presentments were made by the capital pledges together, acting as a jury representing the local community, and might also extend to identifying crimes committed by others outside the tithing system. What were called "views of frankpledge" were held periodically to ensure that all adult males were members of a tithing, to take an oath from them that they would not engage in illegal behaviour, and to hear presentments. Membership of tithings was likely organized on a neighbourhood basis, and groups of tithings were associated together in wards, or leets. Important men were outside the frankpledge system; however, their households formed a kind of tithing, its members being in the "mainpast" of the head of the household, who was answerable for their behaviour. Migration and freeholding (under which a man's property could become a pledge for him answering to justice) undermined the tithing system, although leet administration remained a useful component of judicial administration until the end of the Middle Ages.

For further background information see:

- Bracton: "On the Laws and Customs of England: At the view of frankpledge"

- Police: Anglo-Saxon beginnings

freedom

The borough freedom is not a reference to the vaunted but questionable adage that "town air makes free", but rather to the set of rights and privileges – which were referred to collectively as the liberty or the franchise (or in their plural form, liberties or franchises) – that townsmen acquired through chartered grants from their lords, as well as traditional rights (usages) as indicated in custumals. A freeman in the borough context was not therefore one who was personally free, i.e. not a serf or villein (although this was normally a sine qua non), but a member of the enfranchised community; the rights possessed by the community (e.g. burgage tenure) tended towards promoting more personal freedom than most of the extra-urban population had. A resident was not, in most towns, automatically a freeman but acquired this privileged status by entering the freedom, or taking up the franchise, which might happen automatically in some cases, or in others be acquired through a one-time membership fee (or fine). Women might enjoy a similar set of franchises, if unmarried daughters of resident freemen or widows of freemen, although while they were married their rights were determined by the status of their husbands. Depriving someone of freeman's rights (disfranchisement) was one of the more drastic non-corporeal punishments available to borough authorities. "Franchise" or "liberty" could also be used to refer to the territorial area within which the borough rights and freedoms were in effect; territory and jurisdiction were conceptually intertwined.

fresh force

SEE abatement

gild

Gilds (more commonly spelled today as "guilds") were associations of men and women sharing common interests. There were various types of such associations. Some gilds were fraternities created for socio-religious purposes, which included conviviality, communal religious celebration, and charity (usually mutual support). Other gilds had a more businesslike purpose. Members of the same craft or trade came to organize themselves in the Late Middle Ages into gilds. On one hand this was a response to efforts of borough governments to control trade and craft practices: craftsmen needed to band together to protect their interests, but also for self-regulation, to satisfy government requirements for the setting and policing of standards. On the other it was a mechanism for established practitioners to suppress competition by restricting practice of a trade or craft to gild members. The two purposes intersected in the apprenticeship system, which ensured that young men interested in following a craft acquired the necessary skills and were inculcated with the values of the gild establishment, while at the same time restricting competition to qualified craftsmen, by requiring several years of apprenticeship before an individual could graduate to running his own business. The same two principles applied to merchants, whose gilds came into existence earlier than those of the crafts. Since the mercantile element of the community was prominent and influential, merchant gilds could be powerful institutions within a town, although this varied considerably from place to place.

For further background information see:

- Information Please Encyclopedia: "guilds or gilds"

hamsoken

SEE abatement

hanse

This Old English term was sometimes applied to the commercial (as opposed to the social) aspect of merchant guilds, or to the fee (which might be monetary or in-kind goods) for becoming a partner in the mercantile advantages accorded to guild members. It was possible, in some towns at least, for non-burgesses to acquire a membership in the hanse component of a merchant guild, which allowed them to trade in the town without paying tolls. The term is more commonly known, however, in application to the Hanseatic League, an association (i.e. an informal guild) of mercantile towns in what is today northern Germany. The German Hanse established a permanent base in London and from there expanded its influence to provincial towns so that, by the fifteenth century, it was dominating much of England's international commerce.

For further background on the Hanseatic League see:

- ORB Online Encyclopedia: Hanseatic League

hosting

"Hosting" or "hostage" was practiced in a number of towns (e.g. Yarmouth, Ipswich, Norwich, Southampton), particularly those active in international commerce, even before it became the subject of a royal statute. A visiting merchant from abroad, if intending more than just an overnight stay, would be taken under the wing of a merchant of the town. This might include providing the visitor with lodging and storehouse facilities for his merchandise, and usually involved the host assisting the visitor to sell his goods – sometimes simply through advice, but sometimes as a deal-maker. In principle it could be beneficial to the visitor, unfamiliar with local marketing rules or without local business connections, and also beneficial to the town, since the host could then supervise the business activities of the visitor – and be held accountable by the town if the visitor committed any fraud. However, the practice was subject to abuse by the hosts, who had a competitive advantage regarding the visitor's merchandise and who might try to cheat the visitor or to cheat the town of tolls due on imported merchandise.

hue and cry

In the absence of a police force, apart from the town sergeants (who served an enforcement rather than a crime detection role), apprehending criminals was partly the responsibility of the community. This was handled either by reporting crimes after the fact (often through formal mechanisms such as view of frankpledge), or – if the crime were discovered in process or freshly committed – by raising hue-and-cry. This involved loud proclamation by the discoverer or the victim, male or female, in order to alert those in the vicinity. Those persons then had the obligation to join with the declarer of the crime in pursuing the criminal, usually to the boundary of the community, continuing the clamour in the process. Anyone participating in hue-and-cry had the right to arrest a criminal. In this context the carrying of arms was permitted and a criminal violently resisting arrest might be killed with impunity, but not otherwise – lynchings were very rare, and even wounding or killing a criminal to hinder flight was unlawful. Victims of conspicuous crimes (e.g. rapes or assaults) might also raise hue-and-cry, even if the culprit had escaped, in order to summon those who could witness the effects of the crime. A similar concept to hue-and-cry has survived in the contemporary Western convention that someone seen fleeing the scene of a crime should be met with cries of "Stop, thief!", in order to encourage the public to apprehend the criminal. A post-medieval counterpart of the hue was the posse of the American frontier, but this was organized and led by an officer, whereas the hue was more spontaneous (although capital pledges or constables may have played a role). Arrests could sometimes be effected through the hue, with captured criminals either being marched off to gaol or held until the authorities could arrive; felons caught red-handed were easier to convict. Anyone discovering a corpse was expected to raise the hue immediately, even if the body was cold so that no pursuit was practicable; to fail to do so would have cast suspicion on that "first finder". Failure to raise hue, or of the community to respond to the hue, could result in a neighbourhood being fined once the crime was reported to the courts. At night, when many crimes were committed, the hue would have been a less efficient mechanism; towns instituted night-watches – again a community-based mechanism – to compensate.

For further background see:

- Bracton on procedure in pleas of the Crown

hundred

A unit of local administration introduced in the tenth century, (normally) larger than a village but smaller than a county; the name has some connection to a territory of 100 "hides" (a measurement of area), although this was not consistently the case in practice. In the former Danelaw the "wapentake" had a similar role. Many towns had acquired, by the time of Domesday, the status of a hundred (or at least a half-hundred – which made little practical difference). The hundred court developed out of, and superseded, the older folkmoot; it dealt with less serious criminal and civil cases.

For further background information see:

- The Laws of King Edgar, 959-975 A.D.: This is the Ordinance how the Hundred shall be held

husting

SEE moot

incorporation

The borough community is seen acting jointly to pursue common interests or goals – i. e. in a corporate fashion – from at least the twelfth century on. However, the law made no formal recognition of this (even though the king effectively recognized the existence of communities in his dealings with towns), which was often inconvenient. One of the last major concessions, in terms of chartered liberties, that the king made to towns in the Middle Ages was their incorporation (i.e. making the town a fictitious personality in the eyes of the law). There were five characteristics associated with this: the right of perpetual succession; the right to use a "common seal" as the signature of the borough to official documents expressing community will; the right to sue, and be sued; the right to make by-laws; and the right to hold property communally. Since almost all of these features had been in use in boroughs prior to incorporation, the recognition of this by royal grant was probably not such a significant step forward for boroughs that it might appear to us; however this grant often went hand in hand with other powers, such as the right to have a mayor as the executive officer (once associated with the dreaded commune, whose spectre had greatly diminished by the time of incorporation), and the grant of local jurisdiction over Sessions of the Peace. Perhaps equally important to the borough government was that incorporation reduced the liability of individual officers to be sued for transgressions or defaults of the community, while it made it easier for the borough to acquire communal property which was an increasingly important source of revenue to support administrative costs. To the historian, incorporation is simply the logical culmination of the development of borough government throughout the Late Middle Ages, creating the form of the post-medieval borough.

inquest, or inquisition

SEE law, waging of

jurat

Meaning "sworn man", the term was principally applied specifically to burgesses who took oath to assist and counsel the borough executive – i.e. the town councillors. Like "mayor", "jurat" came to England from the continental commune, where "scabin" was another term used for the same type of officer, although jurats were from the start officers selected by and from the ranks of citizens, whereas scabins had ties to the feudal establishment. In England, town councils were referred to somewhat obliquely by a variety of terms, including potentiores, bon hommes or probi homines (although those terms might also be more widely applied to members of the ruling class), or simply by the number of members of the council – normally "the 12" or "the 24"; jurat similarly is a term usually encountered in the plural, collective form. In some towns they might have more localized (yet no less indistinctive) names, such as "portmen" or "wardmen". But it was not until the close of the Middle Ages that, as the ruling class – represented by borough executive and upper council – began to monopolize power, the dignity and greater distinctiveness of "alderman" came to be used as their title.

law, waging of

One of the ways for a plaintiff to initiate a legal action was to establish reasonable cause in the eyes of the court by producing a body of supporters – secta, whence the term "suit" – and some "good proof", perhaps no more than the word of the supporters that the complaint had foundation. This practice gradually lapsed, although the concept was retained in the legal formula of court records referring to the plaintiff "producing suit". One of the options that might be open to a burgess to defend himself against a plea or suit was to "do his law" through purgation; it could also be used by the plaintiff to uphold his accusation. For the defendant, waging law meant finding men who would take oath to his innocence, in support of the defendant's own oath; the number of these

compurgators varied according to the crime; twelve "hands" (i.e. individuals) was the number for many charges. For the plaintiff it meant an oath that the accusation he had made was genuine. Doing, or waging, one's law was a principle of Anglo-Saxon law. The other standard option for judicial investigation was by inquest, a Norman introduction, allowed to boroughs to try civil cases (whereas the king reserved criminal cases for his own legal system); an inquest, which was sometimes referred to as putting oneself "on the country", might be called upon for various purposes, such as the assessment of legal damages or the valuation of property. From this, as well as from an Anglo-Saxon group responsible for identifying crimes (like the later capital pledge presenters of the leet court), evolved trial by jury. The jury was, in some regards, similar to the compurgators, except that it was called into being by public authorities to state (under oath) its opinion on the guilt or innocence of an individual, rather than participating voluntarily to support an individual's claim of innocence.

leet court

A type of court with a similar jurisdiction to view of frankpledge; it seems to have been the Assize of Clarendon (1166) that led to the amalgamation of presentments of crimes with administration of frankpledge. The leet was essentially the territorial aspect of frankpledge: numbers of tithings were organized into leets, or wards, which were normally sub-units of the hundred; in some towns, constabularies were similar sub-units. A leet might have its own court (as in Norwich) although more usually it simply made its presentments in a special (full) session of the town's hundred court. In less developed towns, the leet court might be essentially the legislative arm of local government. Offences were presented by a jury of capital pledges, also known as headboroughs (from "borh" meaning pledge), after the articles of leet jurisdiction were read out to them. These articles were typically concerned with breaches of the assizes of bread and ale and offences against the community – such as matters affecting public health and safety, private usurpation of public property (e.g. encroachments of buildings, or blocking of rights-of-way), and performance of public officials. The only punishment within the power of a leet court was the setting of ameracements, the amount of each being assessed by a second jury (affeerors). As a result of this limited punitive power, the repetitive offences by the same individuals brought before leet proceedings year after year sometimes have more the appearance of a licensing system. Crimes of a more serious nature could also be presented (i.e. made public) by the leet jury, but were referred to higher authorities. In some towns the leet system was partially superseded by the constabulary system.

liber burgus

SEE borough

liberties

SEE freedom

mayor

A mayor was an elected executive officer of a borough, with similar powers and responsibilities to a bailiff. However, it may be that townsmen had difficulty ridding themselves of the image of the bailiff as the servant of a higher authority, and that a mayor (whose title emphasizes a relationship with the community of which he is leader) represented by contrast the borough's aspirations to administrative independence; over the course of the Middle Ages, many towns persuaded the king to let them replace bailiffs with mayors. We cannot push this theory too far, for urban political development in England (in the context of a relatively strong and centralized monarchy) was less revolutionary than in many parts of the European continent. Nonetheless, the mayor of London – the earliest example in England – is associated with the period of the commune (an emulation of continental examples of self-assertive efforts to gain independence). And in some towns, such as Lynn, perhaps inspired by London's example, mayors were created to lead the community in pressuring borough lords to cede power, particularly where bailiffs (controllers of local courts) remained appointees of the lords. However, while the king gradually became willing to permit the introduction of mayors as chief officers of boroughs, he made sure that these officers remained answerable to the Crown.

message

SEE tenement

moot

Deriving from a Old English term meaning "meeting", a moot was a decision-making mechanism. As folkmoot, it was a usually open-air gathering of a community, sometimes headed by a royal official (in which manifestation it might be a shiremoot, hundred-moot, or burh-moot), for the administration of local affairs and particularly the administration of justice through local custom. Under Alfredian law, the folkmoot seems to be the mainstay of legal administration. Towns had their own version of the moot, which had aspects both of court and of council meeting; the various names by which versions of this was known in different towns included burhgemot, portmoot, portmanmoot, assembly, and congregation. Assembly and congregation represented more the legislative aspect of the folkmoot, while the others were more the judicial aspect; decision-making remains at the root of each. Husting was yet another term used for a court whose origins may be said to lie with the moot. The term, with Norse derivations (possibly associated with a verb "to speak"), refers to a meeting of the folk (Anglo-Saxon "thing") – that is male adult free men – inside a building (house), in contrast with the open-air folkmoot. The Viking "thing" had legislative and judicial functions; its method of voting, said to be by participants making a noise with their weapons, was known as "wapentake", and this later became associated with the region over which the thing had jurisdiction. Although medieval London had both a folkmoot and a husting (the latter visible as early as the tenth century), we should not read too much into this differentiation.

murage

A special toll or tax that boroughs could levy, if they received royal licence to do so, on condition that the proceeds to be put towards the building or repair of town walls. The licences specified a limiting period within which the levy could take place. The king was normally inclined to grant such licences, since it was in his interest that his towns be well protected. We find such licences granted from early thirteenth to late fifteenth centuries; examples can be seen at Norwich, Lynn, and Yarmouth.

oligarchy

A form of government in which power is deliberately monopolized by an organized elite and applied to the social and/or economic benefit of that elite, and in which the power of the elite is maintained by force or by shaping the constitution to confine or avoid requirements for consultation of, or accountability to (including by election), the populace. Many historians have considered medieval borough governments to be oligarchies, particularly towards the end of the Middle Ages, when they were becoming the "closed corporations" of the Tudor period. Life membership of councils and co-optation - in which members of the corporation have exclusive control over the filling of vacancies in their ranks - have been considered indicators of oligarchic forms of government in medieval towns. While it can be argued that all government involves, to some degree, a ruling elite, oligarchy is characterised by the self-interested policies or actions of the rulers. By contrast, aristocracy is a form of government by a usually hereditary elite which is in theory paternalistic. Some historians have used the terms "patriciate" and "meritocracy" to describe a ruling elite which governs by right of superior abilities or experience (but not necessarily birth), and "plutocracy" to describe an elite whose power derives from economic status rather than birth. However, these terms should not be considered synonymous with oligarchy, since they do not carry the baggage of the self-interested exercise of power.

peer

Today the term is used in phrases such as "peer of the realm" or "a jury of my peers". In either case the term means "equal" in legal or social status, and so it was with the use of the term in medieval boroughs where the term was used to refer to members of the enfranchised community – theoretically a community of equals. The term "commoner", which today we associate with connotations of non-aristocracy, similarly really meant member of a community (although by the end of the Middle Ages it was already acquiring, in the usage in official borough records, connotations of socio-political inferiority); "comburgess" was used in a similar fashion, although it also came to be applied to the mayor's peers (i.e. the town councillors). In the cases of both "peer" and "commoner" there was the implication of sharing in communal rights, and the terms can be connected with the concept of being at scot and lot. I am inclined to suspect an etymological connection between the Latin term for peers (pares) and pars, which can refer both to sharing in something and the concept of membership.

piepowder

"Piepowder" comes from a French term meaning "dusty feet" and applied to the judicial system of trying cases involving travellers (usually merchants) from outside the town, in order to render swift justice.

For further background information see:

- World Wide Words

pledge

"No man without a lord" was an ancient adage of English law. It was important to the administration of justice, which required compensation for most crimes, that accused parties could be obliged to answer charges either by having property which could be arrested (later, "attached") or "lords" who would oblige them to answer. Also ancient was the practice of an accused man clearing himself by obtaining supporters (compurgators) who would take oath to his innocence. In the borough, where men were "free", this manifested itself in the form of pledges (sometimes referred to as "gage and pledge"), sureties, and mainprise; such guarantees of behaviour might be required in a variety of circumstances – including repayment of debts, performance of official duties or entrance into the franchise – but are most commonly associated with legal procedures. The accused was expected to provide a guarantee (money or goods, often referred to as pledges) or to find guarantors (variously known as pledges, sureties, manucaptors or mainperners) for his appearance in court to answer a charge, or at a later stage for complying with a court judgement. In certain cases where the accused failed to fulfill a judgement (e.g. repayment of a debt) the guarantors might themselves be liable for it. Similar concepts today are seen in bail, or bonding and collateral in cases of debt or financial contract; the terms surety and mainpernor are still used in specific technical senses, different from each other, although it is not clear that there was any real differentiation in the Middle Ages. In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, an accuser might, in some cases, initiate an action through a pledge, to assure the court that his charge was with foundation, not frivolous or malicious, and that he would pursue it. At a slightly earlier time, an accuser might have to produce several supporters at the initiation of a legal action to establish reasonable cause for a case to proceed. Initiation of charges before a leet court was made by Capital Pledges (or the equivalent), each representing a tithing.

probi homines

SEE prudhommes

provost (or prepositus)

SEE bailiff

prudhommes

Prudhommes or prodeshommes (Latin: probi homines) was a term used to refer to a particular subset of the urban population. In its earlier occurrences it is found in contexts related to judicial or political administration, and refers to a category of townsman active in, or qualified for, authoritative roles involving the giving of testimony or making of decisions. It increasingly came to be a synonym for the urban rulers and the class from which they were drawn. It is not easy to come to grips with a precise rendering of the term which conveys in modern language the medieval connotations. After much thought and examination of contexts in which the term is used, I have settled on the translation of "reputable men". H.T. Riley, editor of key records of medieval London, translated it as "substantial men", but this focuses primarily on the economic status of the councillors, whereas the term was, I am certain, intended more (though not necessarily exclusively) to express something about moral/ethical fibre and social responsibility – which is reflected in one of the medieval English equivalents of the term: "good men". I have elsewhere suggested "law-abiding" as a rendering, although this alone does not capture the complexities of the term. Upright, judicious, prudent, respectable, trustworthy, proven, credible, creditable, capable are all adjectives reflecting facets of what medieval people understood from the term. We have the same expectations that our "rulers" today be persons of integrity. SEE ALSO discreet.

purgation

SEE law, waging of

recognizance

This was a formal acknowledgement before witnesses of a binding transaction between parties. Making the acknowledgement before legal authorities, or reporting it to them, with a view to having it registered in court rolls, established an official record to which reference could be made to prove or disprove subsequent legal disputes related to the transaction; this was superior to any other means of proof. Recognizances could be applied to the incurrence of a debt, a transfer of real estate (including via testamentary bequest), or certain disclaimers of rights to real estate. Recognizances represent a consensual situation, as opposed to the adversarial situations legal authorities more often dealt with, and were intended to avoid the risk of drawn out legal disputes. In situations where property involved in a transaction was considered by the law to be jointly owned by a husband and wife (normally this was the case with property owned by a woman prior to the marriage), it was required for the wife to make a personal and free-will acknowledgement (before the authorities) of consent to her husband alienating the property.

reeve

SEE bailiff

regrating

SEE forestalling

scot and lot

Brewer's Dictionary of Phrase and Fable (1898) defined "scot and lot" as

"A levy on all subjects according to their ability to pay. Scot means tribute or tax, and lot means allotment or portion allotted. To pay scot and lot, therefore, is to pay the ordinary tributes and also the personal tax allotted to you."

Historians have followed suit in focusing on the taxation aspect, in part because of the slightly misleading breakdown of borough charter privileges made by Ballard. However, the actual situation is more complex. To be "at scot and lot" meant having a share in the obligations and responsibilities of a member of the community; in return members shared in communal privileges and advantages –not all town-dwellers were part of that privileged community. In essence, scot and lot was an indicator of status, in terms of membership. Some historians have connected the status of being at scot and lot with householding; this, however, was not a prerequisite (although in some towns it later became a requirement of citizenship), but there was a natural concern that members of the community have property –whether real or moveable –by which they could be distrained if they failed to pay their contributions. "Scot" seems clearly enough associated with being contributory to taxations, aids or customary dues imposed on the community (e.g. see the Norwich custumal). The term survives today in the idiom that someone "got off scot-free". Similarly, "lot" survives in concepts such as "lottery" and "to cast one's lot in with". It is a Teutonic term that found its way into Norse, Old English and the Romance languages; the derivation is uncertain, but may be associated with a term for a piece of wood, in reference to the use of such in the drawing of lots. Drawing lots was associated with such things as the order of dividing plunder; by extension, the term "lot" came to be associated with a share in a distribution of goods or property, calling to mind the customary right of each burgess –an urban status possibly synonymous with being at scot and lot –to claim a share in any commercial bargain underway in a public place (again, see the Norwich custumal, and for the reciprocity of obligation and privilege, that of Yarmouth). The Leges Quatuor Burgorum explicitly applied the term lot to that situation, while the Northampton custumal talks about dividing up essential goods (victuals) by "divination" (i.e. casting lots). A royal charter to Chesterfield (1294) uses the entire phrase "lot and scot" in this context of sharing in bargains. If, as seems possible, scot and lot referred to the two-sided coin of sharing in both obligations and advantages, the nearest modern equivalent to the concept may be the colloquialism "You pays your money, and you takes your chances", although this –decontextualized from a social setting –has lost the original's nice expression of reciprocity. There is a further application of "lot" which must be considered. The drawing of lots was anciently a method of selecting from a group one or more individuals for some role –such as a winner, or an office-holder. "Accepting one's lot in life" may hark back to election to office. This form of election was considered to call into play divine judgement, and could still be found in Yarmouth at the end of the Middle Ages. The London authorities explicitly defined lot, in 1415, as liability to hold office. It is evident that "scot and lot" is not, as in Brewer's definition, two terms with essentially the same meaning, but presents two separate yet related concepts. The two may represent dual responsibilities, of contributing to taxation and bearing one's fair burden in administrative duties, or the opposites of obligation and benefit; perhaps "lot" itself communicated more than one idea.

tallage

SEE taxation

taxation

In addition to specialized taxes such as customs duties on merchandise, medieval townsmen were subject to general taxes, similar in some ways to modern income tax. Aids were not regular impositions, in contrast to the fee farm which was a fixed annual payment. They were, in theory, voluntary gifts of money to the king to assist him with unusual expenses (such as the costs of marrying off a daughter); however, when the king requested an aid, it was unwise not to comply. Tallages were more explicitly obligatory and were lump sums which borough authorities had to distribute fairly among individual burgesses; this was usually done proportionately according to personal wealth, as determined by a valuation of real estate or goods and chattels.

Royal tallages came to absorb aids under their heading, and were themselves superseded after 1275 by taxes imposed through parliament, called lay subsidies, or tenths (reflecting the percentage of personal wealth due as payment, which was higher in towns than in rural areas where the rate was a fifteenth). Borough authorities might themselves impose local tallages, as a way of raising special funds for particular purposes or sometimes – before other sources of revenue were well-developed – as a foundation of borough finances (such being the case in thirteenth-century Lynn). Taxes were no more popular in the Middle Ages than they are today, and there occurred resistance, evasion, and complaints of unfair assessments; special measures sometimes had to be taken to protect tax-collectors.

tenement

The word is little used today, except as a specialized legal term restricted to certain situations. Essentially it means no more than a piece of real estate that was subject to tenure (being held under definable conditions) under common law. It was used in this general sense in the Middle Ages, but most commonly for property with buildings on it (in contrast to a field or meadow, for example). A "capital tenement" was the property where an individual normally lived, or had at one time lived, i.e. his or her principal property. A similar term to "tenement" was "messuage" and it is often difficult to tell if these terms were being used interchangeably or if some significant difference was understood. This was the French version of the Latin mansio, which (although it too could be used in a general sense for a piece of property) was usually applied to a plot of land on which a residence stood; and the term later came to be applied specifically to a residential property. However, the Middle Ages it seems often to have been used generally for a piece of owned land, of no fixed size or purpose. Our poor understanding of how messuage and tenement were used is partly due to a lack of more detailed description of the properties in the original documents.

tithing

SEE frankpledge

waste

The medieval application of the term is much like its modern connotations, but it was used in a legal sense referring to land that was unoccupied, undeveloped or uncultivated. As a result the land could not be the source of any tax or other revenue to its owner. Borough governments were keen to obtain control (from the lord of the town) over wasteland within the town boundaries, since they could then lease out plots of land. The term was similarly applied to property that had been allowed to deteriorate, or had even been purposely damaged, so that its value (whether in terms of selling price or rentability) decreased.

withernam

In its strict sense, withernam was the possible resort of an individual whose goods had been distrained to force him to answer in court for an accusation brought against him by another. Should the defendant feel the distraint to be unjust he could seek from the authorities an act of counter-distraint, to restore the distress taken (this procedure subsequently being known as replevin) or, if the goods originally distrained were not within the area of the authorities' jurisdiction, to seize other goods of the plaintiff. This found application in the urban environment in a broader form. If, for example, a burgess visiting another town committed (or was accused of committing) some wrong against a resident but, having departed, could not be brought to justice, it might be allowable to distrain on any other of his fellow-burgesses at that time in town. Alternatively, if a burgess, while in another town, suffered financial loss as the result of unjust actions of the town (e.g. collecting toll from a merchant of a borough exempt, by royal charter, from paying tolls) or of one of its townsmen, then compensation might be exacted in the home-town of the offended party through distraint from any within-reach resident of the erring town. Thus the innocent individual was considered liable for the wrong committed, by reason of being a member of the same community to which belonged the actual perpetrator of the wrong. In extreme cases, this could lead to a cycle of reprisals and counter-reprisals, and to a breakdown of relations between towns.

[\[top\]](#)

main menu

Biographical Master List

The purpose of this page is to provide a central reference to the more substantive of the biographical sketches of medieval townspeople dispersed across various of the Medieval English Towns pages. Links to key external sites with biographical information are also included. The list comprises names, an indicator of the main claim(s) to fame, and the location with which principally associated.

A B C D E F G H I J K L M N O P Q R S T U/V
W X/Y/Z

- A -

Acton, Richard; wool merchant and mayor, Newcastle

Albeyn, John; tanner and bailiff, Nottingham

Alestre, John; wool merchant and mayor, Nottingham

Amyas, William; merchant and chantry founder, Nottingham

Ashebourne, William; town clerk, Lynn

Askham, William; fishmonger and mayor, London

Aylward, Robert; merchant and mayor, Southampton

- B -

Baker, William; netter and constable, Reading

Bamme, Adam; goldsmith and mayor, London

Bannebury, Alan; hat-maker?, Reading

Barentyn, Drew; goldsmith and alderman, London

Baret, John; merchant, Bury St. Edmund's

Barton, Henry; skinner and mayor, London

Baxter, John; mayor, Reading

Bedeham, John; chantry founder, London

Bedingham, Ralph; merchant, Lynn

Belleyetere, Edmund; merchant vintner, Lynn

Betele, Henry; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Bilney, John; merchant and reformer, Lynn

Bitering, William; vintner and mayor, Lynn

Bixley, John; mercer and mayor, Norwich

Blakeney, William; sailor, Lynn

Blakburn, Margaret; wife of Nicholas Blakburn, York

Blakburn, Nicholas; merchant and mayor, York

Blaunche, John; cooper, Lynn

Bolt, John; merchant, Lynn

Bolton, John; mercer and mayor, York

Botkesham, Robert; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Botkesham, Thomas; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Bramptone, William; fishmonger and alderman, London

Brandon, John; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Braunch, Ancelm; merchant and jurat, Lynn

Braunch, John; merchant and jurat, Lynn

Braunch, Robert; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Brembre, Nicholas; grocer and mayor, London

Brewer, William; town founder, Axminster, Bridgwater, Chesterfield

Brigge, Thomas; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Brompton, John; merchant and keeper, Beverley

Brunham, John; merchant, mayor, father of Margery Kempe, Lynn

Brunham, Robert; vintner and mayor, Lynn

Bruyn, John; bailiff, Bridgnorth

Brycham, William; fishmonger and merchant, Lynn

Bryghtzeve, John; merchant and jurat, Lynn

Brycham, William; fishmonger and merchant, Lynn

Brynton, William; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Bukerel, Andrew; merchant and mayor, London

Bukworth, John; reformer, Lynn

Burghard, John; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Bury, William; gentleman, Colchester

Bye, Thomas; fuller? and mayor, Reading

- C -

Caldwell, John; merchant and bailiff, Ipswich

Cambridge, William; grocer, alderman, London

Carleton, Thomas; embroiderer and alderman, London

Carpenter, John; town clerk, London

Carpenter, Thomas; mercer and mayor, Reading

Causton, John; chantry founder, London

Chichele, Robert; grocer and mayor, London

Clech, Richard; draper and mayor, Reading

Clopton, Robert; draper and mayor, London

Cokesford, Hamon; jurat, Lynn

Cokesford, John; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Cokesford, Robert; lawyer/administrator, Lynn

Cooke, Thomas; jurat, Lynn

Couteshale, John; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Costyn, Geoffrey; bailiff, Ipswich

Coventre, John; mercer and mayor, London

Crowmere, William; draper and mayor, London

- D -

Danvers, Agnes; gentlewoman, widow of Fray, Wenlock and Say, London

Denton, John; administrator and mayor, Newcastle

Drayton, Thomas; merchant, administrator, Yarmouth

Drewe, Geoffrey senior; jurat, Lynn

Drewe, Geoffrey junior; merchant guild alderman, Lynn

Drewe, John; merchant and jurat, Lynn

Drewe, Thomas senior; mayor, Lynn

Drewe, Thomas junior; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Drye, Robert; bailiff, Ipswich

- E -

Ellingham, Hugh; mercer and vintner, Lynn

Ellingham, William; mercer and jurat, Lynn

Elys, Henry; jurat, Lynn

Emeldon, Richard; wool merchant and bailiff, Newcastle

Erl, William; vintner, Lynn

Erpingham, Thomas; knight, soldier, arbitrator, Norwich

Essex, William; draper and parliamentary representative, London

Esyngton, William; wool merchant, Newcastle

- F -

Falyate, John; merchant, Lynn

Fastolf, Hugh; sailor, administrator, Yarmouth

Fastolf, Hugh; grocer and alderman, London (same as Yarmouth man)

Fauconer, Thomas; mercer and mayor, London

Faukes, Thomas; merchant, Lynn

Feld, John; fishmonger and alderman, London

FitzThomas, Thomas; draper, mayor and Montfortian, London

Fox, John; mayor, Lollard sympathiser, Northampton

Frank, Philip; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Frank, Richard; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Fransham, Geoffrey; merchant, Lynn

Fray, John; lawyer and administrator, London

Frere, Richard; town clerk, Lynn

Frost, William; mayor, York

Fyncham, John; administrator, Lynn

- G -

Galt, Henry; goldsmith?, Lynn

Galyon, Roger; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Gaysele, Geoffrey; merchant, Lynn

Gedney, John; draper and mayor, London

Godestone, Thomas; administrator, Colchester

Gosselyn, Richard; chantry founder, London

Graper, Peter; bailiff, Newcastle

Gunter, William; merchant and mayor, Southampton

Gunton, Simon; merchant and mayor, Lynn

- H -

Hadley, John; grocer and mayor, London

Halleyate, William; reformer, Lynn

Halteby, John; "king of Ipswich"

Haukyn, Gilbert; bailiff, Newcastle

Hervey, Walter; populist mayor, London

Hibburn, Robert; merchant and mayor, Newcastle

Hunderpound, William; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Hunte, Thomas; merchant and mayor, Lynn

- K -

Keep, John; merchant and administrator, Lynn

Kempe, John; merchant, father-in-law of Margery Kempe, Lynn

Kempe, Margery; mystic, Lynn

Kenynghale, John; merchant, Lynn

Knolles, Thomas; grocer and mayor, London

- L -

Lakinghithe, John; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Lambert, John; merchant, Lynn

Lathe, John; vintner?, Lynn

Lech, Richard; mayor, Reading

Lede, Jakemin; Flemish merchant's factor, Leicester

Lendall, William; constable, Reading

Linacre, William; mayor, Reading

Lok, John; merchant, Lynn

Louthe, William; goldsmith and alderman, London

Lyndeseye, William; merchant and mayor, Lynn

- M -

Mafey, Peter; merchant, Lynn

Malyn, William; wool merchant and smuggler, Ipswich

Mapurley, Thomas; lawyer and recorder, Nottingham

Martyn, Nicholas; merchant, reformer, Lynn

Melcheburn, Thomas; king's merchant, administrator, Lynn

Metcalfe, Miles; lawyer, York

More, John; reformer and alderman, London

Muriell, John; merchant, reformer, Lynn

- N -

Neell, Richard; sailor, Lynn

Nicholas, Cristin; mayor, Reading

Nicholasson, James; shoemaker, foreigner, Lynn

Nicholl, William; merchant and mayor, Southampton

Norbury, Richard; mercer and alderman, London

Northampton, John; reformer and mayor, London

Northwold, William; clergyman, heretic, Northampton

- O -

Ormeshead, William; merchant and mayor, York

Oxneye, William; merchant, Lynn

- P -

Paxman, Roger; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Paynot, Thomas; merchant, Lynn

Perbroun, John; admiral, administrator, Yarmouth

Permonter, John; vintner and mayor, Lynn

Petypas, Bartholomew; reformer and mayor, Lynn

Philpot, John; grocer and mayor, London

Polle, Thomas; goldsmith and alderman, London

Preston, John; administrator, Ipswich

Preston, John; administrator, Ipswich

Pulter, Robert; victualler?, Lynn

- R -

Rafman, Henry; administrator and debtor, Yarmouth and Norwich

Ramsey, Ralph; administrator, soldier, Yarmouth

Reppes, Laurence; villein?, tanner, jurat, Lynn

Revetour, William; clergyman, playwright?, York

Russell, Richard; vintner and mayor, York

Ryghtwys, Thomas; merchant and mayor, Lynn

- S -

Salisbury, Robert; merchant, Lynn

Say, John; Speaker of the House of Commons, administrator, London

Segrym, Ralph; mercer and mayor, Norwich

Sevenok, William; mayor, London

Shadworth, John; mercer and mayor, London

Silesden, William; merchant, Lynn

Snawsell, William; mayor, York

Soper, William; merchant, mayor, clerk of the king's ships, Southampton

Sparham, Thomas; merchant and violence victim, Lynn

Spicer, John; victualler?, customs administrator, Lynn

Spyr, William; mercer and jurat, Lynn

Stace, Geoffrey; administrator and kidnapper, Ipswich

Stace, Thomas; bailiff, Ipswich

Staundon, William; grocer and mayor, London

Stokdale, John; brasier, Newcastle

Stokker, John; draper and alderman, London

Stormesworth, Richard; bailiff, Lollard opponent, Northampton

Style, John and Thomas; merchants, Lynn

Style, William; bailiff, Ipswich

Sustede, John; merchant and jurat, Lynn

Sutton, John; merchant, Lynn

Swanton, William; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Swerdestone, Alan; merchant, Lynn

Swerdestone, John; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Swerdestone, Nicholas; disgraced burgess, Lynn

Systerne, Bartholomew; merchant and coroner, Lynn

Systerne, Reginald; merchant and jurat, Lynn

- T -

Taillur, Philip; mercer and alderman, London

Thewyt, Richard; merchant, Lynn

Thirsford, John; parliamentary representative, Lynn

Thirsk, John; merchant and mayor, York

Thornhegge, Joan; widow of John de Thornhegge, merchant, Lynn

Thornton, Roger; merchant and mayor, Newcastle

Thorpe, Richard; merchant, Lynn

Tilney, John; draper, Lynn

Tilney, John; lawyer and administrator, Lynn

Trussebut, Thomas; merchant, Lynn

- U/V -

Urry, Walter; merchant, Lynn

Usk, Thomas; scribe and author, London

Vannere, Henry; vintner and alderman, London

Venour, William; grocer and alderman, London

Vyell, John; mayor and cloth merchant, Bristol

- W -

Wace, John; mercer and mayor, Lynn

Walden, William; brewer, reformer, Lynn

Waldern, Geoffrey; draper and councillor, London

Waldern, William; mercer and mayor, London

Walpole, Robert; draper, Lynn

Walsoken, Adam; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Walton, Robert; wool merchant, Lynn

Walworth, William; fishmonger and mayor, London

Warner, John; ironmonger and alderman, London

Waryn, John; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Waterden, John; lawyer, Lynn

Waterden, Robert; mercer, Lynn

Waterden, Thomas; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Welles, John; grocer and mayor, London

Wenlock, John; parliamentarian, knight, London

Wentworth, John; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Wesenham, John; merchant and mayor, Lynn

Weston, John; chantry founder, London

Wetherby, Thomas; mayor, Norwich

White, John; clergyman, London

Whittington, Richard; "thrice lord-mayor of London"

Willeford, Henry; mayor, Nottingham

Woodcock, John; mercer and mayor, London

Wyth, William; jurat, Lynn

- X/Y/Z -

Yelverton, William; judge, Norwich

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE: The nature of surviving records from borough, national, or ecclesiastical archives of medieval England is such that it is the mercantile and property-holding segment of urban society that is best documented. We know little about individuals from the lower rungs of the social ladder, and even with those at the apex of that society, biographical reconstruction is often sketchy. Some modern studies of particular towns include biographies of a few selected townsmen. The single most useful source, however, is J.S. Roskell, L. Clark, and C. Rawcliffe eds., The History of Parliament: The House of Commons 1386-1421, Stroud: Alan Sutton, 1992. Although not entirely free of errors, the biographies are scholarly and often detailed.

main menu

About the author

I was born in Enfield, England, but emigrated to Canada as a youth. My interest in medieval urban history began during my undergraduate days at Carleton University, thanks to Dr. Joan Greatrex. I chose to pursue it at Leicester University, in order to study under Professor Geoffrey Martin, and completed my Master of Philosophy thesis there.

Returning to Canada after completing my degree, I found employment as a researcher in the Canadian Museum of Civilization, and developed a second interest in museology (in which field I have various works published -- for anyone interested in that subject, here are some examples of my books and articles). I also pursued a degree in Library and Information Science (University of Western Ontario) to the Masters level. I am presently manager of the Museum's Web site.

My involvement with the Web made me aware that medieval urban history is one of the fields for which there is a lack of information online. I therefore decided to create the Web site you are now visiting, in hopes of encouraging others who have studied the history of medieval towns to share some of their knowledge through this medium.

I dedicate this site to those giants upon whose shoulders I stand, some of whom I have been privileged to know personally.

If you know of any online information on the subject of English medieval towns to which I do not have a link, I would be grateful to learn of it.

e-mail: tristan@trytel.com

Stephen Alsford

main menu

Introduction to the history of medieval boroughs

[MAIN MENU]

PROBLEMS OF DEFINITION | Continuity or creation? | Wiks, burhs, and ports
Planned/planted towns | Growth of self-government | Urban economy | Urban society
further reading

Origins: problems of definition

The origins and defining characteristics of medieval English boroughs have been for over two centuries, and remain today, a matter of debate among historians. The wide degree of diversity among England's towns, at all stages in their historical development, hinders the formation of a definitive, one-size-fits-all theory. Theory after theory has been devalued by pointing to particular cases which do not fit, or are even in opposition, and these cannot simply be dismissed as "exceptions proving the rule".

The issues of origins and of attributes are closely related, for part of the debate has focused around whether towns evolved gradually or were each a specific act of creation; the question of what characterizes a town (i.e. differentiates it from other types of settlement) would thus help provide a guide to when towns appeared on the landscape. It should be borne in mind, however, that definition, classification and categorization are the preoccupations of scholars – in the human sciences almost as much as in the physical sciences – not those of the people inhabiting medieval towns; indeed, the inconsistency in medieval times of application of "borough" or related terms makes the historian's task that much harder.

Let us first begin with what may seem obvious, but should not be neglected: towns are gatherings of human beings. Many great writers and scholars have made statements along the lines of "what is a city but its people"; this is useful in preventing us from focusing exclusively on towns as a more-or-less permanent collections of architectural structures with some kind of planned organization based on function and/or topography. Human beings are social animals who for reasons such as mutual support (breeding, feeding, protection) and territoriality are inclined to form communities. However, those communities need not take the form of collective dwelling-places of fixed location, let alone of towns.

It is tempting to think of villages as smaller, less complex precursors of towns, and to think in terms of when one evolved into the other. There are two dangers here regarding medieval towns (and some would argue that the same applies to the earliest urbanization of the ancient world). One is that it is not a straightforward division. We should rather think in terms of a spectrum along which lie conventional markers such as hamlets, villages, market centres, towns, and cities; as a related aside, it should be noted that "town" is strictly an English usage, sometimes applied as a distinguisher from "city", whereas for most other parts of medieval Europe "city" alone is usually applied to urban settlements of varying sizes.

It is human nature to take a spectrum and, sometimes artificially, break it up into distinct categories; this is how we reduce the world to something we can understand. In doing so we look for distinguishing points between cities and towns, or between towns and boroughs. For instance, it has generally been held that in England it was the presence of a cathedral that accorded city status (although Domesday could use the term to apply to county towns that were not diocesan centres), while some argue that cities had a more diversified class structure (insofar as one can talk about "class" at all in the medieval period) and highly organized craft guilds that were a political force. While it is useful to try to make such distinctions, they are just organizing tools, and we should not imagine that every urban place can be neatly fitted into one category or other, any more than we should pursue too far the notion of a rigid separation of town and countryside.

The second danger is that we – particularly in today's highly urbanized society, in which some of our key concepts (civilization, politics) derive from terms assuming urbanization – tend to envisage a progression that has both hierarchical and chronological aspects. That is, regarding the former, that the categories are distinguished from each other by degree (e.g. size); a useful yardstick to an extent, yet, as just one example of the difficulty here, some medieval towns were no larger than large villages – although neither by modern, nor by medieval continental, standards were any English cities besides London very large. Regarding a chronological progression, we might think that towns are likely to have grown out of villages. While this did happen in some cases, it is more helpful to think of both towns and villages as integral parts of a wider pattern of settlement and utilization of the land, emerging from a common environment shaped by economic and political forces.

Having acknowledged this, however, to understand the urban phenomenon of the Middle Ages we still need to risk over-generalization and the artificiality of classification by exploring some of the key attributes that might be considered "defining" of the medieval English town. Historians have approached this from a number of perspectives:

- An early approach was to try for a legalistic definition distinguishing towns from other types of settlement based, for example, on special rights and privileges (or "liberties") recognized before the law, or distinctive constitutional forms. Since grants of liberties can usually be dated to a precise year, this approach often allowed for a clear marker of when a settlement acquired urban status. Too clear; this definition is now considered, by itself, artificial.

- A similar line of approach has focused on both human clustering (i.e. relatively large population size within a compact geographical area) and architectural or topographical forms characterising the populated space, such as planned layout of streets, burgage style residential plots, protective fortifications, administrative buildings (e.g. castles, cathedrals, town halls), marketplace, or immediate access to long-distance transportation routes.
- Another approach emphasizes the social forms, relationships (including differentiation of the inhabitants into "classes") and customs distinguishing towns from the (so-called) feudal society, and tends to portray towns as anomalies recognized by their own inhabitants and by those living outside as socially distinct.
- More recent decades have favoured an economic differentiation in which occupational activity in towns was not predominantly agrarian, but the prosperity of a settlement was dependent more on economic diversification and particularly on a continuous role as a redistributor (i.e. market) of goods produced locally and regionally. Similarly, towns can be viewed as focal points for the provision of services, whether they be commercial, industrial, or administrative.

This 15th-century depiction of a scene from a continental city (probably in Flanders) reflects the diverse characteristics of towns: as a focus for habitation and social life; as an economic centre

(note the retail stalls in the foreground, while within the tower a craftsman works to produce goods for sale); as a place of security and government (symbolized by the fortifications and the building-interior scene at rear).

All these theories have both merit and drawbacks, and we shall revisit them all in the sections to follow. The reality is that each of England's medieval towns had, at some point in its history, characteristics that fall into one or more of these categories; but the mix and balance varied considerably, geographically and chronologically.

main menu

next

Introduction to the history of medieval boroughs

[MAIN MENU]

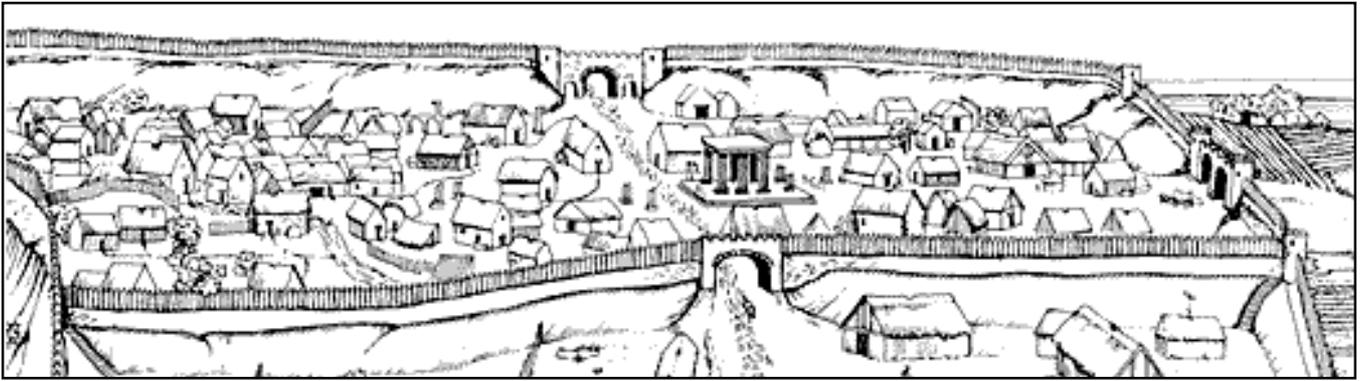

Introduction menu

Problems of definition | CONTINUITY OR CREATION? | Wiks, burhs, and ports
Planned/planted towns | Growth of self-government | Urban economy | Urban society
further reading

Origins: continuity or creation?

The rebirth of an organized society and its community centres following the disintegration of the Roman Empire is obviously a key theme in the history of European civilization. Quite a few English cities and towns can trace their history and their names back to the Romans, but the question is whether there was continuous and organized settlement at those locations? It is now believed that in most Roman cities, although habitation may have continued after the legions withdrew and through to the period of Anglo-Saxon settlement, social order and organization in the towns was not maintained.

However, the walled Roman cities offered some refuge and were not entirely abandoned. Although the society of the Germanic immigrants was not so highly organized as to make urbanization an important feature of it, they could appreciate the value of the fortifications, and a few of their settlements were established within or adjacent to the Roman sites. Colchester provides an example of an ancient settlement, converted by the Romans into a walled colony and administrative centre, where there was probably a brief break-down in society (despite continued, if sparse, occupation) in the fifth century, prior to the arrival and settlement of Saxons there by the end of that century. In most of the Roman towns where Saxons or later invaders settled it does not seem that settlement patterns simply adopted the gridlike street patterns of the Roman colonies; there is not a close correspondence of the lines of Roman and medieval streets, except insofar as gateways through the Roman walls or to a lesser extent lines of surviving Roman buildings (even if ruinous) had a deterministic effect on the placement of streets.

An artist's impression of the core of Lincoln, as it might have looked in the early 11th century. The invading Romans established a base on a ridge to the north of the River Witham, which initially served as a frontier fort in the early phase of their conquest of Britain. Ermine Street, the main north-south route built by the legions, and the Fosse Way, a southwest/northeast route marking the boundary of the Roman advance at that time, converged at Lincoln. As the Romans extended their sway further north, Lincoln transformed from fort to colony and settlement spread beyond the walls towards the river. What happened after the Roman legions left Britain is uncertain, but there is some evidence of continued habitation within Lincoln. The sturdy Roman walls continued to offer protection. It was one of five key places around which the Danish invaders/settlers focused their interests and commercial activities, which helped revitalize the town. The Roman walls (whose route was followed by medieval replacements), their gates, and the roads linking the gates exercised some influence over the layout of the medieval settlement. The Normans later built a castle on the site of the old legionary buildings (southwest corner of the part of the city shown here), while the Norman cathedral close absorbed the site of the Roman temple at the centre of the Roman colony, atop whose foundations a church was built.

It would be risky, however, to categorize even those settlements as "towns"; our knowledge of the early Saxon settlements at those sites is poor. Not only government but also long-distance commerce had been severely disrupted, and what was left of trade was not enough to stimulate forms of settlement that we might want to describe as truly urban; in fact, economic breakdown (reflected in the discontinuation of money circulating) may have encouraged migration out of towns, back to a life of subsistence on the land. On the other hand, the survival of the Roman road system connecting towns could have helped at least some communities hang on until England became more peaceful and the economy revived; some towns were just too well-located to go under. The obvious example is London: at the hub of the Roman road system, with sea access for foreign merchants, and with a bridge across the Thames. Yet even in London's case the walled Roman city appears to have been depopulated and it was immediately to the west that the Saxons established their trading wik in the sixth century, later adding a defensive ditch; although the threat of the Vikings subsequently encouraged a shift back into the western end of the walled area, south of the cathedral that had been built there in the early seventh century.

As London's case exemplifies, the role of the Christian church in maintaining some measure of local or even regional (diocesan) administrative organization and leadership may have been a factor in the continued role of a few towns, such as Canterbury and possibly York and Winchester. On the other hand, in some other cases a disaggregation of functions occurred, with commercial, governmental and religious elements being dispersed among non-urban settlements within the same administrative region. As Anglo-Saxon England crystallized into kingdoms, the process of centralizing power and seeking to impose that power through fortified settlements or regional administrative centres likely encouraged interest in existing towns and in either the foundation of new ones or the patronage of settlements that gave added impetus to their evolution into towns. Colchester again provides a possible example of the former, while Ipswich an example of a settlement established by the Wuffing dynasty (probably from Sweden) and shown favour by the royal family as it extended its control over East Anglia; Ipswich in fact may be the oldest Anglo-Saxon town foundation in England. On the other hand, some argue that the conversion of towns into administrative centres was a disincentive to their commercial function which, in the case of Winchester at least, may have decentralized somewhat to smaller settlements in the neighbourhood.

In the absence of good archaeological evidence for all but a few places, the physical survival of many of the Roman towns cannot be assigned a large, if any, role in the urbanization of medieval England, not least because that survival was not paralleled by the continuation of Roman urban society or institutions.

previous

main menu

next

Introduction to the history of medieval boroughs

[MAIN MENU]

Introduction menu

Problems of definition | Continuity or creation? | WIKS, BURHS, AND PORTS
Planned/planted towns | Growth of self-government | Urban economy | Urban society
further reading

Origins: wiks, burhs, and ports

Until the important studies of James Tait, the conventional view was that urbanization was one of the Norman introductions, or at best an initiative begun by King Alfred and his successors. Certainly it is true that evidence of urban entities in the earlier period is sparse, but archaeology in particular has helped show that the process was more ancient and more gradual. In the Early Saxon period, international trade – that is, largely, the trade in "luxury" goods – had, if not disappeared, then declined and most people's basic needs could be met through local or regional production. This economic environment could not have been conducive to more than very modest urbanization, and that centering around markets redistributing regional products and some growth in industries such as pottery-making whose goods gradually reached wider markets both inside and outside England.

The situation gradually improved during the eighth and ninth centuries, as the consolidation of the Anglo-Saxon kingdoms brought a measure of peace that encouraged some revival of long-distance trade, particularly to the closer markets of the Frankish kingdom, the Low Countries and Germany. This trend became particularly marked in the eleventh century, whose evidence of widespread revival of international commerce led Henri Pirenne to portray a comparable resurgence of urbanization, dismissing earlier post-Roman towns as mere fortresses and administrative bases. Although his theory, influential for half a century, is now largely discredited, he at least set historians thinking more about economic characteristics as defining towns. International commerce in earlier centuries had not so much disappeared as been redirected away from the embattled Mediterranean to northern Europe, while regional and local trade were still a factor in the economic fabric.

By the tenth century in England new invaders, the Danes, had made their mark in northern and eastern England, establishing new settlements alongside existing ones and breathing new life into some towns (York being the notable example). Although the Viking raiders had initially disrupted long-distance trade, Danish settlement gave an impetus to agriculture, commerce and industry alike. At the same time, or even earlier, kings of many of the Anglo-Saxon kingdoms had been fostering urban development to some degree. One key indicator is the appearance of settlements with names ending in "-wich", one derivation of which is from the Scandinavian term wik applied to numerous locations around the North Sea and meaning originally "bay" or "inlet" but becoming applied particularly to landing-places where travelling merchants would disembark from their vessels to conduct trade – these were not necessarily permanent marketplaces but were likely the locations of locally-based industries (similar to the situation which gave rise to Lynn).

In time, some of these trading destinations became more permanent, perhaps with encouragement from the Anglo-Saxon kings. In fact, the wik phenomenon predated the Danish arrival and can be traced back to at least the beginning of the eighth century. It is notable that of the settlements incorporating wik in their names – including Lundenwic (the site of the Saxon settlement at London being remembered later as Aldwych, the old wik), Fordwich (the outport for Canterbury), Swanawic (Swanage), Eoforwic, Gippeswyc, Westwyk, Nordwic, Sandwich, Hamwic (Southampton, the outport for Winchester) – several were the principal leading estuarine-based settlements and/or sites of royal administration in one or other of the royal kingdoms; every kingdom had at least one such trading centre associated with a place that later became one of the country's leading towns. To what extent these types of settlement, with market functions, can be considered towns is still debated, although some have tried to skirt the issue by suggesting a category of "proto-urban" – i.e. settlements with the potential to development into towns; this, of course, incorrectly assumes we are agreed upon a precise and clear set of qualifications for "town" status. Whether urban or not in intent, it is nonetheless becoming clear that the wiks were an important innovation as foci for commerce, rather different from rural settlements or administrative centres; Hamwic, or Hamtun, with two to three thousand inhabitants, was important enough to give its name to the larger administrative unit of Hamp[ton]shire, before Viking raids prompted its inhabitants to relocate into a fortified area at Southampton.

Of course, we cannot look to coastal- or estuarine-based settlements alone for examples of settlements with some urban attributes. Others with -wic terminations are also found inland and may well have been so designated because one of their aspects was as trading centres, if only for the surrounding region. However, to complicate matters, "-wich" in some instances may derive from the Latin vicus, which was used broadly for dwellings, farms, hamlets, or subsidiary settlements.

An alternative origin for town-like settlements lies in the response to the Danish invasion from the kings of Wessex. Alfred initiated a fortification programme within Wessex, involving both new forts and the addition of defences to existing settlements; his son Edward the Elder did the same in the early tenth century as he gradually took the Danelaw away from the Danes – beginning with East Anglia (e.g. Maldon) and then the Midlands and the north – while the related rulers of West Mercia did the same there. These fortified places, perhaps inspired by earlier examples of planned settlements in Mercia, the Danelaw, and Wessex itself (Hamwic), were called burhs. From that term derives our "borough", although burh originally applied to any fortified place (notably royal residences) endowed with a royal guarantee of enforcement of law and the peace there.

It was natural enough that burhs, which were often located on water transportation routes (for strategic reasons) would attract settlers. Rivers by themselves were attractors of settlement, particularly in the Early Middle Ages, when road transportation was less easy and much of the country still forested; they were trade routes, provided for domestic and industrial needs, and were natural defences. This is not to say land transportation routes were not important. Oxford provides an example of a town that originated as a small settlement that arose outside the gates of a monastery, itself lying beside a road linking Mercia and Wessex (and crossing the Thames by a ford there); it was an important enough place by the time of Edward the Elder to warrant him making Oxford a burh.

The protective environment of the burhs was incentive to the location of markets within or nearby, if they were not already present (as is probable) in those existing settlements converted into burhs. This added an unplanned and purely commercial dimension to the burh which was distinguished by another name: port (a late example is seen at Norwich, a composite settlement with two wics, later burh defences, and still later a Newport added with a strong commercial character). Not all burhs developed into towns, nor were all towns burhs at some point in their life. Similarly, not all ports were burhs. But, just as the burh benefited from special royal protection, so ports were privileged by the restriction of minting and of all but minor commercial transactions to such places (the latter restriction proving impossible to enforce). Portmen was a name by which townsmen, or burgesses, were occasionally known in later centuries, as at Canterbury and Ipswich. As a generalization only, it can be suggested that the earlier of the burh foundations outside of the Danelaw were particularly likely to develop into towns, since they had more time take advantage of economic circumstances by adding market aspects; the later burhs there were more likely to remain no more than forts. The burhs established within the Danelaw, after reconquest, were typically within settlements already fostered by the Danes into commercial centres and so also tended to become important towns later in the Middle Ages.

If burhs were not guaranteed to develop into towns, it is in part because other factors were at play. After the unification of England under the Wessex dynasty, the country entered a period of considerable population growth and corresponding economic growth, as more land was put under cultivation, heavier farming and improved techniques produced a surplus of foodstuffs for trade, and market centres were able to benefit from this and from expanded international trade in luxury goods.

Some centres prospered faster, and at the expense of others; as they grew, they in turn provided a population of consumers for agricultural produce. Improved records give us a clearer picture of the urbanization process, which was in full swing, particularly in eastern England where there was room for expansion (not least due to the reclamation of marshland), rich farmland and only a handful of large settlements to compete for the role of regional trade centres. The Domesday Book identifies 112 places as boroughs, most of them with mints and features that do seem truly urban; yet we know this was not a complete list of English towns at that time. England's prosperity by mid-eleventh century was surely a factor in persuading William of Normandy to pursue his claims to dominion there, which in turn resulted in the introduction of a new aristocracy with its own interests in fostering the luxury trade and market centres.

previous

main menu

next

Introduction to the history of medieval boroughs

[MAIN MENU]

Introduction menu

Problems of definition | Continuity or creation? | Wiks, burhs, and ports

PLANNED/PLANTED TOWNS | Growth of self-government | Urban economy | Urban society
further reading

Origins: planned / planted towns

When we study urban development, we should be wary of thinking too much in terms of an organic process, even though one phase of development of a settlement frequently seems a natural continuation from a previous phase. For instance, the crossing point of two highways was a natural meeting-place where trade might occur and, if it did so with regularity, the spot might become a marketplace which attracted settlement; or the foundation of an abbey might be followed by the clustering, outside the abbey gates, of houses of those providing services or selling goods to the monks; or again, a ford across a river might attract settlement, expansion of which might follow a ridge of higher ground paralleling the river and/or the courses of streams leading off the river.

While there may be no formal planning behind such patterns of growth, we can assume a measure of deliberateness and forethought, even when that growth was piecemeal over time or was dictated by the topography of the site, as was often the case. To give one example: the initial settlement in the marshy area of Lynn relied on the creation of relatively firm areas of terrain which were a by-product from a human activity that gave no thought to facilitating habitation; while the gradual spread of the residential area westwards over the course of the Middle Ages, into spaces once occupied by river, was prompted not only by natural silting but also (and perhaps even more) by deliberate land reclamation, and building on the extended river-bank was not a matter simply of filling in available space but a conscious relocation by the merchant community to ensure direct access for their warehouses to the points where cargo ships could dock. Urban growth was to some degree an adaptation to the landscape, but it was also a re-shaping of the landscape to meet individual and community needs and ambitions – which themselves altered over time.

(above) Detail from William Smith's view of Bristol, 1568. Bristol was a flourishing port with a mint at the beginning of the 11th century, but its origins and measure of planning that may have gone into its layout are still uncertain. Impetus to settle there came from the protective and commercial benefits of the Rivers Avon (south) and Frome (a tributary). Early settlement lay on raised ground between these two; it was much smaller than in this depiction, a defensive bank defining its perimeter – still visible in 1568 in the almost circular course of the inner ring road – later replaced by a wall. The north-south road between bridges across the two rivers, and a cross-cutting east-west road were the original foci for habitation, their names – respectively Broad Street/High Street and Corn Street/Wine Street – indicating their importance and the commercial character of the settlement. It was the river crossing which gave Bristol its name, derived from Saxon terms meaning "place of assembly by the bridge".

Those core features were what an artist chose to highlight, in an illustration (at right) for Ricart's Kalendar of 1479, to represent the medieval town: the four main streets converging at the marketplace, with its high cross (erected 1373); the inner walls with the four gates – St. John's to the north, guarding the entrance from the Frome bridge, St. Nicholas' gate to the south (the saints names reflecting the addition of churches onto the gate structures) near the Avon bridge, St. Leonard's gate to the west giving access to the far end of the quayside along the Frome, and the New Gate on the east side near the Norman castle (built by 1088), which sealed off the land-based access to the peninsula formed by the two rivers and became the administrative centre for the earldom of Gloucester until 1175. By the end of the 13th century, large suburbs had developed in all directions of the compass, all but the northern one (where most of the major religious houses were established) protected by new lines of walls.

Allowing for this proviso, it is useful to restrict the concept of "planned town" to places where provision for settlement at a given point in time has resulted in a deliberate layout of streets and apportionment of land among multiple settlers. This can apply to the alteration or extension of an existing settlement as much as to the creation of a new one; in the latter case, where a settlement is deliberately created with some urban features, the term "planted town" has been applied. Towns that grew "organically" are those in which deliberate decisions affecting development were made in an uncoordinated fashion over a long period of time (Norwich providing a good example). Although the evidence is not always unequivocal, there are numerous cases in which town planning in England occurred on a larger scale than the gradualistic development of most settlements, most evidently in regard to towns which were planted by some individual founder.

We might put in this category the burhs – a programme on a scale unparalleled in other European countries of that time – even though scarcity of evidence prevents us from being sure whether the importance of this programme lay in founding places that later became towns, or in giving added stimulation to market/population centres already headed in that direction. In at least some of the cases, the erection of the defensive banks of the burhs undoubtedly had some influence, if only temporarily, in defining boundaries for expansion, and in a few places the laying out of streets was part of the effort.

The king was certainly a key player in stimulating urban (or proto-urban) development, through burhs and ports and the competitive advantages (such as those already mentioned) he could give to places he favoured, including their incorporation in the organization of a national administration, which of necessity was founded upon a hierarchy of regional and local mechanisms, some based in towns. More generally, the relative peace and order that were consequent to the establishment of a national monarchy were conditions conducive to trade and urban growth. It was in the king's interest, both from a financial perspective and from that of the extension of royal authority throughout England, to develop a network of regional centres of trade and administration. Towns and kings were natural allies. Furthermore, as an absentee landlord he was less likely to act as a drag upon local initiatives. The example he set may in part have prompted his leading subjects to follow suit, and the king was supportive in assisting those subjects – lay or ecclesiastical – to develop their own market centres.

On the other hand, the combination of growth in population, agrarian productivity, and trade from the tenth century was in itself encouragement for lords, both lay and ecclesiastical, to establish markets within their estates to tap into commercial profits – which for them was the tolls and other dues from market activities – or to attract more settlers to points where trading was taking place. This was also in fact a great age of village creation, for villages provided a more efficient way of organizing agricultural production than did scattered farms or hamlets; to some extent we should see the formation of villages and market towns as two sides of the same coin, rather than as different stages in urban evolution. Manor houses and churches (whether small parish churches or monastic foundations), were natural magnets for settlement, being sources of authority, protection and consumption. Bury St. Edmunds and St. Albans provide examples of new or revived towns with ecclesiastical patrons. Episcopal foundations were fewer than those by monasteries, the former perhaps being a facet of the inclinations or vision of individual bishops. In either case, the church was, until the thirteenth century, more active than secular lords in town foundation – not surprisingly, if we keep in mind that, as holders of great wealth and vast estates, ecclesiastical institutions were both major producers of wool and crops for export and communities of consumers with a relatively high standard of living.

The Conquest temporarily depressed the urbanizing environment as the kingdom was subjugated – Domesday Book evidences depopulation and impoverishment in a number of leading towns in association with rebellions and the subsequent imposition of castles (e.g. York, Ipswich) – and as William I imposed heavy new financial burdens on communities. But the new Norman lords, looking to England to make their fortunes, made more positive contributions to urbanization through the building of castles, cathedrals and monasteries, providing new consumer groups for existing towns or attractors for new settlers, while new settlements of French traders (and later Jews) were inserted into a few towns (e.g. Norwich).

Lynn presents an example of a multi-phase seigneurial foundation in which the episcopal lord of the manor at first converted a modest existing settlement into a town by granting market rights and building a parish church, and a half-century later a successor founded a second town alongside with its own market and port facilities. There was likely more planning of initial street layout in the latter case than in the former. It is even possible that a suburban area of settlement in the area, known as Littleport, might have been under consideration as a third market centre, although this was pre-empted by the amalgamation of the various areas into one borough. There is some indication that the foundation of Lynn may have been part of a wider programme to stimulate the development of urban centres within the bishopric. On the other hand, Lynn's example also suggests that the establishment of a market with formal commercial privileges may sometimes have been a belated recognition of trading already going on at such sites.

It was the commercial success of places such as Lynn that encouraged imitation; any investment required on the part of the founder was likely to be repaid from new sources of income (licence fees, rents, tolls, court fines etc.) generated. The fervour for seigneurial foundation of new market centres or towns reached its peak during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries; in the same period, many existing non-urban settlements were given market rights by their lords.

In many of the planted towns streets were laid out in a grid pattern that seems to have some consistent features from place to place. We should not read too much into identifying a common pattern not merely in this period, but in at least the larger of the burhs, in the Roman towns, as well as in a number of medieval villages; a grid layout reflects a human desire for orderliness, efficient intra-mural travel (including convenient connection to a central marketplace), and evenly and equitably distributed building plots.

However, nor should not place too much emphasis on this type of town plan, for numerous new towns did not have a grid layout. In some the layout focused on the market (such as a gathering of dwellings around the marketplace, or along the route of a highway of which a short stretch is widened to create a marketplace), or on the road linking marketplace with a seigneurial structure such as castle or abbe. In a smaller number of cases, settlement might curve around part of a castle bailey, follow the course of a winding river bank, or be confined within a peninsula. Hybrids are also identifiable. The landscape had an influence, of course; flat or sloping stretches of land, if regular, were suitable to a grid layout, while ridge-tops and rivers (whether the banks, or approaches to a river crossing) favoured linear layouts.

By the second half of the thirteenth century, the country was so saturated with markets that the heavy competition for a share in regional commerce led to the decline or failure of a number of planted towns and market centres. Some survived only as modest redistribution centres for the rural neighbourhood; a few were not able to grow further until the post-medieval period (e.g. Leeds).

previous

main menu

next

Introduction to the history of medieval boroughs

[MAIN MENU]

Introduction menu

Problems of definition | Continuity or creation? | Wiks, burhs, and ports
Planned/planted towns | GROWTH OF SELF-GOVERNMENT | Urban economy | Urban society
further reading

The growth of self-government

Towns and town creation played a role in the efforts of English kings (and by imitation their greater subjects) to impose control over the country and direct the activities of urban residents towards the larger purposes of establishing an administrative network and building national prosperity. The burhs and ports exemplify this and, earlier, after the Roman collapse some towns may have continued to serve as bases of administration for local rulers or Christian authorities – although this was more a continental than an English phenomenon. By the time of the Conquest, towns had been integrated into the national administrative structure; the Norman and succeeding dynasties did not re-invent so much as adapt this structure.

If urbanization was given shape on the one hand by the economic and political forces of the Anglo-Saxon period and on the other by established habits and values of collectivity and mutually supportive association, then the process was crystallized by grants of powers leading in the direction of a certain measure of governmental autonomy and self-determination. While we should not over-emphasize a separation between urban and rural society, it is hard to imagine that some sense of common interests and ambitions, different from those of country-dwellers but not necessarily exclusively economic, did not emerge during the period of physical and economic growth of the tenth to twelfth centuries; unfortunately, paucity of urban records from that period make this very difficult to demonstrate. What is better documented is the separation of town and country in terms of judicial and political forms.

It is reasonable to expect that social and legal traditions of Anglo-Saxon (and Scandinavian) England had to be adapted somewhat to an urban environment and circumstances. Anglo-Saxon society placed a great emphasis on association of its members, to provide mutual support and to answer for one another in a period when the effective power of the monarchy was limited. In a time without investigative policing, the guilt or innocence of a man accused of a crime might be determined by the number of kin, friends or neighbours who would vouch for or against him. The frankpledge system was an expression of this by ensuring that almost everyone was part of an association. Such elements found their way into the administration of legal customs and common law in towns, but were overlaid with other mechanisms of administration of justice stemming from the hundred system. In both cases the population density of urban areas necessitated some adaptation of the mechanisms.

The gild was another form of Anglo-Saxon association, which served individuals' social (including religious) needs and brought together individuals of similar interests, as well as being utilized by the legal system in a similar way to frankpledge. It was probably the fact of shared interests that directed some of the guilds towards common pursuit of economic improvement, which in turn gave rise to the impulse towards urban self-government. Just how common were these interest/lobby groups – later known as merchant guilds – is difficult to say. But it is not hard to believe that, in the period before self-government and urban ruling classes, at least those residents with the highest investment (regardless of whether commercial or landholding) in their towns would have sought, through associated influence and joint action, to direct the ambitions of the townspeople at large and to persuade superior authorities to delegate to their town powers that would protect and increase prosperity. At a later point guilds served as a vehicle for united expression of the interests of townsmen active in one or other of the local crafts; we do not need to seek Anglo-Saxon precedents to explain the appearance of craft guilds.

Nor must we, in discussing association, forget to mention briefly the folk moot, not a purely urban form but a vehicle for broader community self-awareness, expression and decision-making, which however did not outlive its usefulness. Nonetheless, the principle of consulting the wider community on particularly weighty matters, through assemblies of citizens, remained in effect throughout the Middle Ages, even though there was a growing tendency – the product both of elitism and of bureaucratization – to control this through formalizing it within the constitution.

"Seal of the community of burgesses of Bristol " (inscription on left-hand view).

Imprints from 'common seals' were affixed to documents to indicate the town's official approval of a document's contents. As important instruments of borough government these seals were stored in locked chests and their use was often controlled within the constitution.

They bore images that symbolized urban characteristics considered significant by townspeople. In the case of Bristol, the town fortifications and a quayside are represented on the left-hand view, while on the reverse of the seal (right-hand view) we see a ship approaching the "secret quay" – though whether a fishing boat (as fish and eels swimming beneath it might imply) or a merchant ship is unclear; in either case it is the importance of a maritime-based economy which is being referred to. By the close of the Middle Ages it was recognized that such seals indicated the corporate nature of borough government.

The desire for self-government seems to find a clamorous upsurge in the late eleventh and the twelfth centuries – not just in England, but across Europe – with varying results. The power of the monarchy in England, while an economic boon to towns, naturally restricted the scope of independence attainable. Nor should we automatically assume from continental examples that complete independence was even desired by English towns, apart perhaps from a few radicals. Although outbreaks of revolutionary indépendantisme of the London commune in the twelfth century (themselves prompted by power vacuums created during the civil war and Richard I's absence abroad) helped persuade kings to grant concessions, London was always precocious and had a strong sense of its own power in the realm; it may have been an inspiration, but cannot be considered a yardstick, for English urban history generally. For the most part, the king staved off any extreme efforts towards local autonomy through a gradual devolution of powers, countered by the development of a system of regional administrative controls into which the towns were slowly integrated.

It is in the context of legal and constitutional development that we use the term "borough" for towns. The early phases of debate regarding urban origins tended to focus on those aspects, notably issues such as the nature of the Anglo-Saxon burhgemot (was it a purely urban court?), whether there was a distinctive burhriht (i.e. set of legal customs applicable exclusively to towns) by the eleventh century, to what extent a non-feudal set of conditions governing landholding (burgage tenure) characterized towns, and the date and significance of early charter grants of liberties and the associated trend of towns acquiring control over the firma burgi. Anyone interested in these technical matters should read James Tait's important study. Unfortunately, waters are muddied by the fact that some places were credited with borough status even though they do not appear to have possessed features we might consider urban, while some market centres that seem urban did not acquire the legal attributes associated with "borough".

For brevity's sake, a series of general, but key, points will be listed here; readers may refer to the capsule histories of individual towns for case studies showing a few of the many variations that make it hard to generalize.

- The number of Anglo-Saxon terms incorporating "port", "wic" or "burh" is suggestive of a certain administrative, legal and social distinctiveness of towns and townspeople from at least the tenth century.
- Density of population, economic importance, and the intensity of commercial activity probably helped accord a special status to the towns and necessitated some divergence in legal customs from those governing rural society; this included the substitution of money rents for labour services due from occupants of urban property, and more flexibility in the disposal of landed property viz. right of free sale and free heritability of real estate.
- Leading towns had a special place within the system of judicial administration, both as hundreds separate from rural jurisdictions and as places with home-grown courts such as the husting.
- Local administration was, however, in the hands of executive officers appointed by and answerable to the king (or, in some cases, a town's lord), and this appears to have particularly rankled the townsmen in regard to those officers' collection of the various revenues due from the town to the king, especially when (under the Normans) these offices were leased to individuals whose aim was to make a profit, which they probably achieved by extortionate measures. Thus the initial aim of the townsmen, or at least of the influential members among their number, was to take control over the collection of these revenues – later extended to taxation in general – and negotiate a fixed sum payable to the king annually (so that any profits could be put to the use of the town), which in turn meant controlling the choice of the officers who collected them and ensuring that those officers dealt directly with the royal government on fiscal matters, rather than through an intermediary level of government such as the county sheriff.
- Above and beyond control of the farm and executive officer, towns were interested in two things. First, in obtaining grants or recognitions of legal conditions (such as burgage tenure) which themselves implied a degree of personal freedom, or of instruments compatible with the conduct of a commerce-oriented way of life and with the upholding of distinctively urban legal customs (e.g. merchant guilds, and locally-run courts with exclusive jurisdictions). And second, in obtaining exemptions from laws or impositions that were disincentives, if not obstructions, to that way of life (e.g. freedom from paying tolls on merchandise taken for sale to other places in England, and the substitution of trial by compurgation for trial by battle).

- Negotiations with the king (or other lord) for such liberties assumes one or more townsmen representing their communities, a principle continued in urban forms of self-government. The ancient folkmoot was not an effective mechanism for democratic government and (if Ipswich provides a reliable example) immediately gave way to more representative institutions.
- One form of those institutions was executive officers: sometimes communities were content to continue with bailiffs or reeves who had served the king (and to some extent continued to); in other cases, particularly where the town had a lord other than the king, the merchant gild's alderman might take a leadership role, or the burgesses elected a mayor. A second form of representative institution was a town council; a handful of towns, including Ipswich, evidence elected councils in the early thirteenth century, but elsewhere they may have existed as informal advisory bodies of leading townsmen, before eventually finding a formal place as the borough constitution became more sophisticated. By the end of the Middle Ages, practically every town had some kind of council. In a few towns – where executive officers were under the control of lords and where government by mayor or alderman was either unattainable or undesirable – councils were, during some periods, the sole decision-making element of local government.

Henry I was the first king to lease the royal revenues to the towns from which they were due and to concede a handful of chartered privileges. London, not surprisingly, led the way. Its ambitions were imitated, although its gains not quite duplicated, by lesser towns (e.g. Oxford, Northampton, Winchester) which in turn became models for others. Under Henry II a large number of towns claimed to have received concessions from Henry I and, although charters proving this have not survived, Henry II was prepared to accept the claim and confirm the claimed privileges; but he was not prepared to let urban ambitions proceed to the point they had, often violently, in some parts of continental Europe. Under his sons, however, the leasing of borough farms and associated grants of powers including locally-elected officers multiplied, for Richard and John had not the strength of will of their father, and other preoccupations made them needy of the cash payments for such grants and the annual revenues they would bring.

Henry III and Edward I largely tried to maintain the status quo, by simply confirming the grants of their predecessors (the incentive being the financial "gifts" from towns seeking such renewals), although a few new privileges were extended, and – prompted by the civil wars – the monarchy encouraged towns to fortify themselves, by granting the right to collect special tolls to fund wall-building. At the same time, the king reasserted his dominance through temporary, punitive withdrawals of the chartered liberties, in the event of civil disobedience or lawlessness; it was always clear that urban self-government was obtained in the form of the grant of privileges from a higher authority, not as a recognition by such an authority of innate rights. The king also gave towns a voice – albeit a soft one – in national determination, through parliamentary representation; this helped make the towns aware that they were not islands, but part of a larger community.

Subsequent development of urban government focused largely on closer definition of the scope of jurisdiction of borough authorities and borough courts, on consolidation through the attainment of a formal corporate identity in the eyes of the law, and on the continued integration of the towns into the growing national system of judicial administration, particularly through adding Commission of the Peace to the duties of the urban executive. The internal activities of town governments should not be ignored either, in terms of greater systematizing of record-keeping, the expansion of bureaucracy with lesser officials responsible for a range of new activities and jurisdictions, and greater initiatives to develop new sources of revenue (such as property ownership) and more efficient mechanisms to manage the borough budget. By the close of the Middle Ages, municipal governments were engaged in much the same range of activities that they are today.

Model depicting the York Shambles (butcher's market), from the York Heritage Centre. One of the principal tasks of borough government was to regulate local commerce and industry:

- the charter-granted advantages of burgesses were to be protected, but monopolistic practices discouraged (with exceptions);
- fair prices had to be established and enforced, and the appropriate tolls on imports and exports paid to the town – with efforts made to detect ruses to avoid tolls;
- honest trading conducted openly, within regulated hours, in public markets or other designated areas, as opposed to in private establishments, was to be encouraged;
- making deals in private, intercepting goods before they arrived at the market, or other abuses aimed at forcing prices up, had to be suppressed;
- use of the correct measures for selling goods in quantity had to be investigated periodically;
- quality of goods similarly had to be policed, which might involve periodic searches of retailing establishments, or the imposition of controls, exercised via craft guilds, over who would be licenced as master craftsmen.

The butchers' market presented particular problems due to the human health hazards involved in the slaughter of animals and disposal of their entrails, as well as risks from sale of spoiled meat.

Photo © S. Alsford

Not all towns proceeded smoothly to a state of semi-autonomy. Towns of seigneurial foundation or those that became "mesne boroughs" when the king gave away his lordship to reward followers (a feature of the eleventh and early twelfth centuries) were often retarded in their development, compared to royal boroughs; Maldon provides an example. They might find themselves with an ongoing struggle on their hands over jurisdictional claims, with competing institutions of local government – those representing the town's lord and those representing its community. Again the best example from the small set of case studies here is Lynn; in the efforts of the local authorities in Lynn to undermine the jurisdiction of the borough lord, the Bishop of Norwich, it was not for nothing they sought the patronage of the king – although Bishop's Lynn succeeded in becoming King's Lynn only after it had passed its medieval peak.

previous

main menu

next

Introduction to the history of medieval boroughs

[MAIN MENU]

Introduction menu

Problems of definition | Continuity or creation? | Wiks, burhs, and ports
Planned/planted towns | Growth of self-government | URBAN ECONOMY | Urban society
further reading

The urban economy

The purpose of townsmen in pursuing self-government was not some abstract philosophy of liberty or self-determination. Its principal thrust was towards creating conditions favouring entrepreneurial endeavour (or, on the other side of the coin, removing obstacles inhibiting such endeavour). First and foremost towns are entities within the economic fabric. This has led some historians to define towns primarily according to economic characteristics:

- that they must be the site of permanent market activity; and
- that a significant proportion of the inhabitants earn their livelihood from some other source than agriculture.

A 20th-century artist's depiction of a street scene from a 14th century English town, illustrating the retailing of goods – such as cloth or (far left) cooked foods – from stalls outside of houses, the ground-floor interior being used rather for the production of goods. A reminder that agriculture still had a place in many medieval towns, however, is the ever-troublesome pig.

The former criterion assumes a dedicated market site at which trading is regularized, including occurring at regular and frequent intervals, rather than ad hoc situations governed by whenever travelling merchants appear on the doorstep (e.g. the early wicks), or the larger-scale commerce at fairs held once a year; the muddy area is settlements that, aside from a regular market, did not possess other characteristics considered urban. It was in southern England particularly that a network of small market centres initially prospered; only later did many fall before the competition of large towns centralizing trade.

The latter criterion aims at distinguishing towns from villages, where the community, for the most part, produced its own means of subsistence – those villagers not directly involved in agriculture undertaking supportive roles (e.g. blacksmith). We know that many of the residents of towns engaged in agriculture to some degree – the common fields and pastures that are features of most towns are one piece of evidence; this was in part to furnish their own larders but also to supply the businesses of themselves or others – such as commerce in victuals, brewing and baking, or operating taverns and cook-shops. It will be noted that the definition does not require that a majority of the townspeople be in non-agricultural occupations, but nor does it try to specify what proportion might be considered significant. The numbers are less important than the fact of what is referred to as "occupational heterogeneity", that is, townsmen earning their living through a variety of activities, including agriculture, land-holding (i.e. income from rents), commerce, crafts and industry, and administrative and other professional services. The original "bourgeoisie" was not necessarily a mercantile class. Medieval townsmen in fact tended to be multi-occupational; although many had a primary source of income, they also had side-activities that earned them money.

The popular image of medieval towns (insofar as there is one!) tends to be of the industrial centres of Flanders or the great mercantile cities of Italy. In England, only London was within that kind of scale; its key location enabled it to maintain throughout the Middle Ages a leading role in commerce, even when long-distance trade was at a low ebb. However, it was not so dominant as to overpower other English towns, particularly those on the coast or with good river connections to the sea. Nonetheless, the fortunes of individual towns fluctuated with changing economic circumstances and growing competition. The coastal town Yarmouth, for instance, for a while in the fourteenth century became more prosperous than larger and otherwise more important rival Norwich; but Norwich's more central location and access to both road and river transportation routes made it more adaptable in weathering hard times, whereas Yarmouth's reliance on the sea and particularly the fishery left it vulnerable to a variety of setbacks. The competitive environment could provoke sometimes bitter struggles to suppress neighbouring markets, as in the cases of Norwich vs. Yarmouth, Yarmouth vs. Lowestoft, Ipswich vs. Harwich, and Maldon vs. Heybridge.

Coastal ports, such as Lynn and Yarmouth, between them had the lion's share of long-distance (whether international or coastal) trade; the involvement of their burgesses in agriculture was correspondingly lower. The residents of inland towns were, by contrast, more involved in both the production and the re-distribution of local and regional materials (notably foodstuffs and wool); their markets and fairs were some of the channels through which that produce was routed to export towns, although the prosperity of these towns probably relied more on purely regional trade. At the same time, the wide range of crafts usually present in towns meant that the local economy was not overly dependent on imports.

England's wool was its single most important export, shipped abroad for making into cloth which the English then bought back. As townsmen involved in the wool trade became aware of the economic folly of this – particularly as the king sought to obtain a greater cut from the wool trade through export customs and wool taxes – they invested in developing a local cloth-making industry, beginning in the twelfth century but more intensively in the Late Middle Ages. In most towns where this happened, the industry eclipsed even the leather-making trades that were very important to medieval society. A large number of townspeople were employed in one aspect or other of the cloth industry. Both industry and trade underwent fluctuations during the Late Middle Ages, varying so considerably from place to place that any generalization is difficult; the cloth industry in particular locations might be affected by factors such as competition from lesser towns or from rural areas (as well as from the continental cloth-making centres), technological changes, the growth of craft guilds and corresponding attempts by urban authorities to suppress or control them, as well as more general problems such as changes in trade routes, both locally and internationally, or the silting of local harbours.

Drawing based on a English manuscript illustration of ca.1400, touching upon aspects of the economic system. In the foreground a packhorse, loaded with merchandize, is driven towards an inn (with welcoming hostess); a network of inns across the country was important for commerce. The building at lower right, with hanging sign indicating it some kind of commercial or industrial establishment, may represent a craft workshop that produced some of the goods being transported by the horse. At rear right, the artist has depicted a walled town, location of major marketplaces for goods, while at left stands a castle or fortified manor-house – residence of aristocracy who were consumers of luxury goods imported by merchants. The packhorse reflects the role of land-based transportation in the economy, while the ships and boats represent the importance of water transportation.

Economic fortunes were equally tied up with the political and social troubles of late medieval England. The population expansion and opening up of new farmland that contributed to urban prosperity in the tenth and eleventh centuries had now reached its limits; there was no more good agricultural land to bring under the plough, and in fact the ecological and competitive balances had swung in the opposite direction to start a process of environmental degradation. Together with adverse climatic conditions, the result was a number of bad harvests and famines in the first half of the fourteenth century. An atmosphere of social malaise and economic instability was created, thanks to factors such as:

- the drawn-out war with France, particularly its damaging effect on maritime trade;
- the fiscal needs of the king (themselves partly due to the war), which led to a growing burden of taxation, the licensing by Edward III and his successors of almost monopolistic practices in the area of trade, and a preparedness to give advantages (for a price) to foreign merchants in English trade;
- the trauma of the Black Death of 1348/49 and its less severe but largely urban recurrences at intervals;
- social conflict both within the towns and the nation at large (the Peasants' Revolt).

Similar instability abroad, both economic and political, affecting markets for English goods, also had a part to play.

In this atmosphere some towns declined while others did fairly well – the situation is so complex that historians still do not understand it well. Although townspeople's standard of living seems to have improved, many urban governments were complaining of a troubled local economy and financial difficulty in meeting public obligations (such as the maintenance of town walls or payment of the fee farm); that difficulty may have been partly a consequence of reduction in the local tax base after the plague, yet a growth in public responsibilities that put ever greater demand on the municipal budget. Nor should we ignore that what represented hard times to some townsmen, meant opportunity for others; plague, for instance, purged the ranks of the urban merchant class and created openings for new men, while armies at war provided good business for victuallers, and a select number of merchants were beneficiaries of royal favouritism or illicit profits from customs administration.

Despite the difficulty with generalizing when individual towns' fortunes varied so considerably, on the whole the Late Middle Ages was not a period of further urban growth. Far fewer new towns were created, existing towns did not grow much beyond their established boundaries (while in some the populated areas shrank), but many towns – particularly those well-established and with diversified economies – were resilient enough to either weather the storm or to prosper at the expense of smaller towns or market centres, some of which went under.

previous

main menu

next

Introduction to the history of medieval boroughs

[MAIN MENU]

Introduction menu

Problems of definition | Continuity or creation? | Wiks, burhs, and ports
Planned/planted towns | Growth of self-government | Urban economy | URBAN SOCIETY
further reading

Urban society

The essential role of towns within the economic fabric of England should not let us downplay their importance as social institutions. Man is, after all, a social animal, and urban environments were shaped to provide for human social needs, just as much as they were shaped to provide for political needs, in terms of organizing, controlling and directing groups of people. It is natural enough for people living in close proximity to form a community not just in the sense of a defined physical space but a group sharing similar interests and values, which in turn are expressed through a set of rules and institutions that direct acceptable behaviour.

This is not to say that town-dwellers were socially distinct from rural folk in the Anglo-Saxon period, nor that they were later anomalies in a feudal society, notwithstanding that the classic medieval division of society into those who fought, those who prayed, and those who laboured does not seem to make much provision for the merchant class. Part of Pirenne's hypothesis of the emergence of towns in eleventh century was based on the notion of "wandering traders" settling down to form the core of urban society; his chief example was an English trader named Godric, but no evidence of other examples has yet been found in England. One of the key questions, therefore, is how did a merchant class emerge?

Towns and villages were rooted in the same traditions, the same forms of social organization (e. g. clans, guilds, tithings, parishes), and it was largely from the countryside that towns built and replenished their populations; as already noted, probably a majority of townsmen in most places continued to engage to some degree in agricultural activities. Even though we hear of "burhmen" and "portmen" in the Late Anglo-Saxon period, town-dwellers probably did not perceive much difference between themselves and their rural neighbours, in terms of their overall view of society. While the Norman Conquest influenced the urbanization process through the changes wrought on many leading towns by the introduction of castles and cathedrals, on the established fundamentals of urban society the Conquest had only minor effects.

The differentiation of urban and rural society becomes more clearly defined only with the grants of special privileges, including a degree of personal freedom, from about the twelfth century onwards. Although this may be partly the historian's perception, stemming from the fact that documentation of urban communities improves greatly in the period following such grants, it was in conjunction with the development of local government that the economic and administrative roles of boroughs, and the customs by which inhabitants' lives were governed, became more distinctive. After this, "burgess" seems to have become a more technical term – although inconsistency in its application from place to place, time to time, writer to writer, makes this difficult to pin down; even Domesday Book's use of "burgess" has seemed to some to intend a distinction from other types of residents of towns, although again the evidence is open to interpretation.

By the twelfth century, however, urban society had already become fairly structured; it was characterised by diversity – the leading burgesses (who are the most visible in historical records) cannot be described as a merchant class, even if we follow medieval practice in using "merchant" broadly to include small retailers as well as wholesalers. While most towns drew the majority of their immigrants from the neighbouring countryside – large cities attracting from further afield, and London being a magnet for the ambitious from all parts of the country – these were not necessarily poor peasants seeking to make their fortunes, and still less were they the "fugitive serfs" of Victorian tradition (examples of such are uncommon). They included people already active in trade or craft, seeking to move to where there was a larger market. They included scions of landed families, some of whose property might already be in or adjacent to the town. They included at least a small number of individuals earning their livelihood from administrative or other services. In towns such as Colchester and Ipswich we find evidence that some burgesses based their wealth and social status on landholding; whereas in coastal towns commerce was a more important source of wealth and these locations (e.g. Lynn) and some of the merchants who visited to trade decided to settle. The diversification was therefore not only one of occupation but one of culture, and was furthered in a number of the larger towns by an influx of Normans after the Conquest, and of Jews in the twelfth century – although it is unclear to what extent their communities integrated with urban society before the expulsion of Jews from England in 1290.

It is dangerous to talk of "class" in the medieval context; yet, although we must avoid some of the modern (largely Marxist) connotations attached to the term, we cannot avoid it. To imagine urban society as egalitarian would be to ignore its essence. It is clear that within the towns there was the perception of a tripartite division between the "lesser", "middle" and "powerful" townsmen. The contexts in which we find this perception expressed, however, suggest that the differentiation was a somewhat vague one of wealth, associated with political power. It would be a mistake to translate it into an occupational division of labourers, craftsmen and merchants (even though that might, in very general terms, be more accurate than not), or to assume that the powerful townsmen formed a patriciate with an exclusivist grip on local government (although, again, this is not entirely without foundation), or again to think of these divisions as closed castes – social mobility was both possible and necessary.

Nor is it clear whether the concept of "community" encompassed all three groups, or whether the lesser townsmen were residents who did not benefit from the chartered privileges. Perhaps from the time that such privileges were acquired (as the Ipswich evidence implies), "burgess" began to acquire a more restricted application comparable to citizenship in twentieth-century nation-states: membership had to be acquired by a specific act, which might be birth as the son of an existing citizen, purchase, or (later) completion of apprenticeship to a citizen. We need not read anything sinister into this; it seems a natural enough application of the common notion that rights and responsibilities go hand-in-hand. Unfortunately, our present state of knowledge of individual towns does not allow us to determine whether terms like "community" and "burgess" had the same meaning everywhere or at different periods.

Depiction of a gild feast, from the tomb brass of Adam de Walsoken; perhaps intended as the merchant gild of Lynn, of which Adam was a member, feasting in Trinity Hall, its walls hung with star-embellished cloths. The symbolic 12 participants, dining on delicacies, entertained by minstrels, and several in lively conversation, are unlikely to represent specific townspeople (although it has been suggested that the depiction is of a feast at which the gild hosted Edward III, this is unlikely even though the king often came to nearby Castle Rising to visit his mother).

Complicating the picture are medieval guilds. The first guilds in towns were probably formed for social and religious association. They and their successors seen in the Late Middle Ages may have cross-cut class divisions to some degree, although in the latter period membership fees may served exclusivist purposes as the wealthiest townspeople sought to associate more with country gentry than with lesser townfolk. More important, guilds – not a solely urban institution – transformed in the urban context to represent different economic interests. Thirteenth-century evidence from Lynn and Ipswich suggests that a large part of the populace belonged to the merchant guild, at a time when that was likely the principal institution representing community aspirations. As community-based government grew, merchant guilds might become redundant and disappear (or perhaps merge into local government) or become restricted to true mercantile interests within the town, while the interests of others – notably craftsmen – sought expression through their own guilds, each representing either one craft or a group of related crafts. These various interests were not always in harmony, provoking efforts at first to suppress and, when suppression failed, to control them through regulation.

The violent conflicts recorded in various towns between late twelfth and fifteenth centuries have sometimes been portrayed as a guild-based struggle between merchants and craftsmen; yet the concerns or grievances that gave rise to such conflicts seem for the most part more related to the conduct of local government than economic control (although the two cannot be easily separated). Whether such conflicts represent political struggles between democratic and oligarchic factions I have elsewhere explored in detail and will not revisit here except to say that medieval townsmen were far less concerned with political ideology than they were with honest, fair and beneficial government; it was natural for the reins of government to fall to the wealthier burgesses, and equally natural that, in some cases, self-interest or group interest factored into the conduct of government. Medieval urban government was, in many of its fundamentals, not so different from that of our own time.

Government is rarely an easy task; in its efforts to balance interests, the hard decisions that have to be made rarely find total support within a community. It would be a mistake to take the evidence of socio-political conflicts, which feature disproportionately large in surviving records (predominantly judicial), and visualize an urban environment in which discord was the norm. Then, as today, good news is no news. It may be that problems – such as finding the revenue to pay for the growing list of responsibilities of local government – increased and tensions rose from the late fourteenth century on, as the economy declined and there was greater competition for a piece of a shrinking pie; but since economic conditions varied from one part of the country to another, we cannot generalize.

Expressions of discontent within urban society are as likely to have been result of local circumstances (e.g. misgovernment) as much as any broader trend. However, there are signs in the fifteenth century of some closing of ranks in the ruling class, in the direction of the post-medieval closed corporation, assisted by constitutional changes which confined democratic tendencies by institutionalizing them and by the direction of royal policy regarding the integration of the towns into a system of national administration. The urban rulers relied more on social and political ceremonies – such as feasts, processions, official greeting of visiting dignitaries, swearing-in of borough officials – intended at once to reinforce community identity and pride in membership, while demonstrating social distinctions and precedences within the community.

Before concluding, it must be acknowledged that much of the terminology used in referring to townspeople is male-oriented. As for many periods of history, males figure much more heavily in the historical record than females, and the study of women's history has only in recent years begun to examine the limited evidence related to female roles in medieval towns. Marriageable women were their fathers' tools for social, political or economic alliances; sometimes a way for a wealthy merchant to establish links with the gentry. Married women did not have much legal status independent of their husbands, although in some regards this was less so within towns than outside. Some examples of this (varying from town to town) are that the property that a woman brought into a marriage could not safely be disposed of by her husband without his wife's freely-given consent; a woman (if childless) might bequeath such property to whomever she chose, allowing for a surviving husband's lifetime right; similar provision was made for widows to ensure their lifetime continuance in the marriage residence.

There seems to have been no provision for women to become burgesses in the technical sense of being admitted to the freedom and acquiring rights of participation in political life. On the other hand, there are some indications that they shared with their husbands in the commercial advantages of citizenship and retained such rights as widows; they could undertake business contracts in their own right. They might learn enough of their husband's business to be of assistance; although this would not go so far as for them to travel as merchants (widows used factors or apprentices for this), women were quite prominent among producers and retailers of ale and some other prepared foods – a reflection of the entrepreneurial attitude of townspeople, making money in whatever ways they might. Among the few records that give any detail about them are their testaments and documents related to charitable foundations – another activity in which they were quite prominent.

This leads us to a final topic needing to be touched upon in this brief introduction to some of the main themes and issues of the medieval history of English towns, and that is the role of religion in the life of townspeople. This was structured initially through the parish system, which was shaped and reshaped in response to shifting population density. Parish churches played an important role in town life, as the earliest public buildings serving secular uses and of course as the focus of spiritual life of the community. The association with many socio-religious guilds with one or other church, and the late medieval penchant for the private foundation of chantries and large donations to expand and beautify parish churches (an expression of civic pride), are examples of this. Other religious foundations were also important elements in urban history and urban society: the friaries were very popular with townspeople and another target of charitable donations; by contrast, abbeys and monasteries were looked upon with some suspicion as rival sources of jurisdiction. Nor must we forget the hospitals, almshouses and leper-houses which contributed to urban society care-giving to the poor, ill, or aged members of society, and which also relied on the charity of townspeople.

St. Laurence,
Norwich
(by Corbridge, 1724)

St. Mary Elms,
Ipswich
(by Ogilby, 1674)

St. Mary Coslany,
Norwich
(by Corbridge, 1724)

St. Peter,
Ipswich
(by Ogilby, 1674)

For the most part medieval townspeople were conventionally religious; many members of urban families were among the parish priests or locally-based friars, monks or nuns. But they were also worldly. Sometimes their donations or bequests to religious houses were motivated by bad conscience over un-Christian business practices; provisions for charitable bequests were occasionally very elaborate. Similarly, a religious order established within an environment could find itself subject to temptations in appropriate to Catholic spirituality. Although medieval cities, where people from many countries crossed paths, are perceived of hot-beds of heresy this is not so much the case in England. Instances of heresy in English towns are relatively scarce. The Church was not the centre of life in urban society, but it was a valued part and townsmen on the whole were disinclined to jeopardise their investments in the established ecclesiastical fabric.

previous

main menu

next

Created: April 5, 1999. Last update: March 26, 2000

© Stephen Alsford, 1999-2003

Introduction to the history of medieval boroughs

[MAIN MENU]

Introduction menu

Problems of definition | Continuity or creation? | Wiks, burhs, and ports
Planned/planted towns | Growth of self-government | Urban economy | Urban society

FURTHER READING

Further reading

BARLEY, M.W., ed. The Plans and Topography of Medieval Towns in England and Wales. Council for British Archaeology, Research Report no.14 (1976).

HASLAM, Jeremy, ed. Anglo-Saxon Towns in Southern England. Chichester: Phillimore, 1984.

HILTON, R.H. English and French towns in feudal society: A comparative study. Cambridge: University Press, 1992.

HOLT, Richard and Gervase ROSSER, eds. The Medieval Town. London: Longman, 1990.

LILLEY, Keith. Urban Life in the Middle Ages. Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2002.

NICHOLAS, David. The Growth of the Medieval City: from Late Antiquity to the Early Fourteenth Century. London: Longman, 1997.

NICHOLAS, David. The Later Medieval City 1300-1500. London: Longman, 1997.

PALLISER, D.M., ed. The Cambridge Urban History of Britain. Volume I: 600-1540. Cambridge: University Press, 2000.

PLATT, Colin. The English Medieval Town. London: Secker & Warburg, 1976.

REYNOLDS, Susan. An Introduction to the History of English Medieval Towns. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1977.

RUSSO, Daniel. Town Origins and Development in Early England, c.400-950 A.D. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1998.

SCHOFIELD, John and Alan VINCE. Medieval Towns: The Archaeology of British Towns in Their European Setting. 2nd ed. London: Continuum, 2003.

TAIT, James. The Medieval English Borough: Studies on its origins and constitutional history. Manchester: University Press, 1936.

Further secondary sources relevant to medieval urban history are listed in a separate bibliography.

previous

main menu

History of medieval Norwich

[MAIN MENU]

Origins of settlement | THE PRE-CONQUEST BOROUGH | Effects of the Conquest
Evolution of a self-governing community | Power struggles with rivals
A division of interests | Summary/Recap | Information sources
Map of Anglo-Saxon Norwich | Map of Norwich ca.1260
Appendix 1: Calendar of customs of Norwich

The pre-Conquest borough

That a mint was established in Anglo-Saxon Norwich indicates that the location was already a focus of regional trade. An expanding population, especially after the arrival of the Danes, led to a shift in the economic centre of the region: away from western East Anglia to the Norwich and Ipswich areas, following the direction of the clearing of forests. Improved tools and techniques allowed large-scale deforestation of areas south and east of Norwich and exploitation of the rich soils. Pottery-making was one of the principal activities of the townsmen, along with the production of other goods from leather, metal and wood. Norwich also became a centre of manufacture of Thetford ware, a type of pottery prominent from ninth to twelfth centuries, with that industry probably based in Westwyk (Pottergate). Iron-working was another industry for which archaeological evidence has been found, with the smiths furnishing the tools the farmers needed.

Equally important was Norwich's role as a principal port for trade with northwestern Europe, before Yarmouth appeared to challenge for that role. Evidence of long-distance trade indicates connections with the Rhineland by the ninth century, and with France and Scandinavia by the eleventh. Pottery from the Midlands has also been found by archaeologists, although the barrier of the Fens (contrasted with the navigability of the Wensum) would favour trade with the continent rather than central England. Tombland would have been the logical site for the local market; after the Mancroft market later supplanted it, the Prior held his fair on Tombland, but the citizens claimed and were conceded precedence in selecting where to place their stalls.

Since it was a trade centre, it may also have been an administrative centre for the region. Certainly the Normans saw it in that light, establishing there the only royal castle (until 1166) in East Anglia; the county courts of Norfolk and Suffolk also met there. That it may have been equally important in pre-Conquest times is suggested by the fact that it was chosen as the target of Danish attacks in 869 and 1004; the Danes chose to execute King Edmund close to Norwich. There is tradition of an "earl's palace" on Tombland, but little supporting evidence. As a royally-sponsored community, the borough was probably governed by a single administrator appointed by the king - a Portreeve; it was thus treated as a separate administrative unit from the rest of Norfolk. Domesday appears to identify the last such official under Edward the Confessor: one Edstan, who had an unusually large holding and was so much the king's man that he could not give homage to anyone else, nor depart from the borough, without getting the king's permission. All other king's burgesses were free to commend themselves to other lords, reflecting the fact that freedom of personal status was greater in East Anglia than in other parts of England.

Whether this reeve consulted informally with the more important townsmen, we can only speculate. Such a group of leading townsmen who gained some knowledge of the law (particularly concerning commerce or land transactions) through participation in the courts as jurors, official witnesses, or compurgators, is likely to have existed. That Norwich's court was probably held at Tombland is suggested by the fact that when St. Michael's church there was demolished to make way for the cathedral, its dedication was transferred to a nearby church, renamed St. Michael de Motestow – note referring to the Anglo-Saxon folk-court, and stowe to the slightly raised and level area of Tombland.

We shall now examine what effects the Conquest had on the thriving community of Norwich.

previous

main menu

next

History of medieval Norwich

[MAIN MENU]

Origins of settlement | The pre-Conquest borough | EFFECTS OF THE CONQUEST
Evolution of a self-governing community | Power struggles with rivals
A division of interests | Summary/Recap | Information sources
Map of Anglo-Saxon Norwich | Map of Norwich ca.1260
Appendix 1: Calendar of customs of Norwich

Effects of the Conquest

The first few decades following the Norman Conquest saw drastic changes in settlement patterns at Norwich, as three new features were imposed on the landscape: a castle, a cathedral, and a French quarter. By 1065 Norwich had become one of the most populous boroughs in the country, with 1,238 burgesses on the land jointly owned by the king and earl Gyrth Godwinson, 50 in the soke of archbishop Stigand, and 32 in that of Harold Godwinson (a former earl of East Anglia). In 1086 we also hear of 480 bordarii, though whether this was a non-burgess class that had also existed in the Confessor's time, or was a group of former burgesses impoverished by events following the Conquest, is uncertain. The total population of the borough in this period was likely in the range of 7,000 to 10,000 people.

Construction of castle and cathedral

Many burgesses were displaced when their houses were torn down to make room for the castle and its fee, in a central location in the borough. The castle was in existence by 1075 and may have been built within a year of William the Conqueror's victory over King Harold Godwinson – if, as seems likely, the "Guenta" where William FitzOsbern built a castle from which to take charge of the northern half of the kingdom (in the Conqueror's absence abroad) may be identified with Norwich. Its site chosen for height and for proximity to the crossroads and fords/bridges, the purpose of the castle was not so much to protect as to control the inhabitants of a town where the Conqueror's principal enemies (the Godwinsons) had held influence. An original wooden structure would have been replaced by the present stone keep within a few decades.

Norwich castle keep viewed from the far side of the (Mancroft) marketplace still appears to impose authority over this part of the town as it must have done eight hundred years ago.

photo © S. Alsford

Ironically, the castle became a centre of resistance to the Conqueror during the rebellion (1075) of Ralph de Guader, Earl of East Anglia and son-in-law of FitzOsbern. The earl may have been supported by the burgesses, for a larger garrison was stationed there by the king after the rebellion was put down, and Domesday reveals that 32 burgesses had fled the town, while others had been ruined by confiscations of their property. Perhaps as additional punishment of the borough, the yearly farm (a lease of the revenues due from tolls, court fines and other sources – see below) owed by the burgesses to king and earl was tripled from £30 to £90 (although the pre-1066 farm may have been antiquated, and farms were raised in most towns where castles were built). This sudden increase must have been a blow, at a time when the number of burgesses capable of contributing to the farm had decreased. Ninety-eight houses had been replaced by the castle, 201 were tenantless for other reasons, and only 665 burgesses contributed to the farm.

Further disruption occurred in 1096, when the East Anglian episcopal see was moved to Norwich (a plan conceived earlier, but delayed by the rebellion) and construction of a cathedral began; enough was completed by 1100/01 for the consecration to take place. Most of the original Benedictine monks were Normans. The lands given by king and earl for the purpose covered much of the old borough centre in northern Conesford; they stretched eastwards from Tombland (intruding into that space) to the marshy banks of the river. While we cannot be sure that it was a conscious plan to subjugate the Anglo-Saxon burgesses, the combined positioning of castle and cathedral served to cut off southern Conesford from the other sectors of the borough; and the two major Anglo-Saxon buildings – St. Michael's and the earl's palace – were pulled down. The benefits to Norwich were that it was now an even more important administrative centre than ever before, while the cathedral brought to it "city" status. Cathedral and castle doubtless attracted more trade and industry to the borough, as well as providing buyers for the citizens' goods. However, Tombland – overshadowed by the cathedral precinct walls – began to lose its role as the focus of local trade. Wares were unloaded further upstream, on Westwyk and Coselanye banks, while the Prior began to claim fair rights on Tombland.

Norwich cathedral tower and spire viewed from within the Close, looking northwards to the south face. The cathedral took almost two hundred years to complete; the unusually high spire was built at the close of the Middle Ages to replace an earlier one.

photo © S. Alsford

New settlers and their influence on Norwich

An alternative marketplace had already presented itself, before 1086, in the French quarter established by Earl Ralph on the west side of the castle, just beyond the Great Cockey. This foundation had "new town" status and was part of a broader Norman policy of deliberate colonization of Anglo-Saxon centres (although the establishment of a separate but adjacent Norman quarter was itself rare). Yet we should not ignore the need to relocate existing residents displaced by the castle. This new town is later found with the name of Man(nes)croft, recalling the large open area around which the settlers spread and on which a parish church was built by the earl; this open area was likely (perhaps consequently) used for trading. The name of this area implies that it had once served as common fields of the townsmen, and it was perhaps a shortened form of "portmancroft"; however, recent excavations have revealed that there was some Late Saxon settlement there. It is significant that the original main access to the castle fee was on the Mancroft side – in the opposite direction to the old borough centre. Some of the land in Mancroft was held by Norman soldiers, while there is evidence of a number of houses in other parts of the town held custom-free by men associated with the castle-guard (e.g. crossbowmen, watchment). After Ralph's rebellion, the number of French burgesses increased from 36 to 125, while the Anglo-Saxon population decreased.

Although we cannot dissociate the foundation, within a decade of the Conquest, with the building of the castle, Mancroft was more than an outer garrison for the castle. It must have been intended as a mechanism for provisioning for the castle and the type of settlers sought were merchants and tradesmen. Mancroft was made a borough in its own right, as its original name "Newport" indicates, with customary dues kept down to 1d. a head, to attract traders. It may well have had its own reeve and court. Its market, with a monopoly on castle business, gradually superseded Tombland and became the focus of the city. The Tolbooth established there to collect market dues would have been a preferable choice for the administration of justice to the open-air Tombland. When the rival Norman and Anglo-Saxon boroughs amalgamated into a single administration, we cannot say. Certainly we have the impression of a unified community when Norwich received its first royal charter of liberties in 1194, although there is some evidence that the new local administration (now to be chosen by the burgesses, rather than by the king) involved two or more reeves, with Normans and Anglo-Saxons sharing power.

However, by this time the cultural difference had dulled. Commercial intercourse, common ambitions (such as self-government), and common hatreds (such as against the Jews), helped forge Norman and Saxon into one community. Despite Mancroft's rise and Conesford's decline, the character of the borough owed as much, if not more, to Anglo-Saxon than to Norman culture. A study of the customary laws of the borough shows little indisputable influence of French legal precedents. The burgesses resisted Norman innovations such as trial by combat or ordeal, or murdrum (a fine for an unsolved murder), obtaining exemptions from these in their first charter. The Anglo-Saxon preference for compurgation, as proof of guilt or innocence, persisted and only gradually gave way to trial by jury. That assizes of mort d'ancestor and novel disseisin were inoperative in towns was, however, a reflection more of the essentially mercantile interests of burgesses, rather than a cultural matter. And the abolition of the Anglo-Saxon miskennung (invalidation of a case in which pleading was not carried out according to strict formula) shows that the burgesses were not averse to discarding old custom when it hampered them.

On the other hand, there were some important consequences to Norwich from the Norman Conquest. The local authority of the sheriff (a king's man) was enhanced at the expense of the earl, particularly by making him constable of the castle. It was aversion to his government, in part, that motivated the burgesses to seek self-rule. More important was the stimulus the effects of the Conquest gave to trade, although these did not fully realized until the twelfth century, and Anglo-Saxon and Norman had equal roles in this.

Nor must we ignore the less direct stimulus of the settlement of Jews in English boroughs, mainly from the time of William Rufus on (although an Isaac was living in Mancroft in 1086). Norwich was probably one of the earlier destinations of Jewish settlers – who came principally from northern France and the Rhineland – being a county town with a royal castle. A Jewish community there is evidenced in the mid-twelfth century chronicle of Thomas of Monmouth; the building of a synagogue in the reign of Henry II furthered the development of a Jewish quarter in Norwich. It was located at the castle entrance, on the route leading thence to the market. This placement gave it immediate access to the protection offered by the king (whose chattels the Jews were in law) and proximity to the place of business. Their principal business was money-lending, most others being closed to them. They had no role in city government, not being given citizenship (which involved the taking of Christian oaths), and this in turn disadvantaged them in commercial activities. Nor was membership in craft guilds open to them, again because of the religious aspects. On the other hand, Christian dictates made Jews the source of the necessary financial backing for commercial ventures; if they charged a high price for this service, it was because of the risks from unpaid debts and absorption of much of their profits by the king (in the form of heavy fines). The Abbey of St. Edmunds and the sheriff of Norfolk (William de Caineto) were among heavy debtors to Norwich Jews in time of Henry II.

Resentment at this state of indebtedness, combined with the burgess' instinctive antipathy towards any newcomer, fuelled by religious tension, resulted in aggression. The massacre of Jews in 1190, in Norwich as elsewhere, was in part "a new way to pay old debts", by getting rid of creditors. It was in fact at Norwich that the first accusation of ritual murder of a Christian by Jews was used as an excuse for hostility, and where a burgess community first meditated wholesale massacre of Jews (1144). Thanks largely to the protection of king, sheriff and castle, the Jewish community prospered in the face of adversity, such as:

- an attack on their cemetery (1200);
- refusal to communicate with or sell supplies to them (1223); and
- attacks on them and their houses (as well as on royal sergeants who came to their rescue) with the tacit approval of city bailiffs, who declined to investigate (1235).

St. Peter Mancroft

built by the earl to serve his new borough as parish church; rebuilt on a magnificent scale in the first half of the 15th century by the city's merchants in gratitude for their prosperity. The western tower, illuminated at night, illustrates the imposing scale (note the castle in the background).

photo © S. Alsford

The growing prosperity of the city, as the leading market centre of one of the most populous areas of the country, is reflected in a number of things. Hatred of the Jews for living off the needs of traders itself implies flourishing commerce. Apart from beggars there is little indication of poverty; everyone seems to have had 3d. for masses, offerings or candles (of course, the records tend not to pay much attention to the poor). We hear of two minters by name, but there were certainly more in the city; the bishop himself was allowed to have one, and we hear of six in 1235, when the city's minting privilege was withdrawn. Over 130 trades and occupations can be identified in Norwich from records of this century. The leather industry was particularly important in Norwich in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, first with the skimmers and later the tanners. More important in the long run was the cloth trade and weaving – the latter associated with the Flemings, who settled in numbers in the Norwich region in the reigns of the Conqueror and his sons. Attempting to explain the capture by siege of Norwich in 1174, a French chronicler pointed out that many burgesses were weavers, not warriors. Like the Jews, Flemings were disliked by the other burgesses (particularly for trying to establish a monopolistic trade guild), despite the prosperity they brought to Norwich. The extension of markets in Normandy and the lower Rhineland in the century following the Conquest was beneficial particularly to towns on the east coast. The Anarchy of the first half of the twelfth century left Norfolk relatively untouched, so that the century was one of general stability, conducive to commercial activity. The establishment of a shrine to St. William (the boy supposedly murdered by Jews) also helped attract more trade.

The fee farm

It was this prosperity that gave the citizens the resources to acquire a certain measure of administrative independence. In 1065 the king was the principal, but not the only, lord of Norwich. The private sokes of Stigand and Harold, however, gradually disappeared when cathedral, castle and Mancroft were raised on the sites of the sokes. The king still shared his lordship with the earl, who took the "third penny" of all dues until at least 1191; but that was probably his only surviving right in the borough, the sheriff having absorbed the earl's administrative duties. One of those chief duties was the collection of royal revenues from the boroughs. A popular method of doing this was to "farm" it: to negotiate a lump sum to be paid at the Exchequer in London. If revenues failed to meet the sum in any year, the sheriff had to make up the difference from his own purse. Naturally, he attempted the reverse: to collect more revenues than the negotiated sum, so that he could keep the surplus. Since large sums were often paid for shrieval office, we may guess that the profit was good, and there is evidence of various types of extortion. Often the sheriff made his profit by sub-leasing his farming rights to other individuals.

The burgesses were anxious to rid themselves of this drain on their income, by taking the farm into their own hands. Yet Norwich did not achieve this until 1194, although the burgesses were wealthy enough to have together afforded the money gift necessary to persuade the king to grant them the farm. Perhaps the Anglo-Saxon and Norman communities were still too much at odds to work in unison. More likely it was simply a case that Henry II, fearing that to give the boroughs too much power over their own affairs might lead to emulation of the continental communes, only experimented with grants of the farm to boroughs; his charter granted to Norwich circa 1158 went no further than recognizing unspecified local customs that the citizens claimed to be theirs by tradition. His sons Richard and John, on the other hand, had more pressing needs for money and were more amenable to selling to towns the privileges they wanted.

The burgesses paid 200 marks for taking the farm out of the hands of the sheriff (this in addition to the actual amount of the farm itself, which was £108). Historians have debated whether grant of fee farm automatically involved the right of the burgesses to elect their own officer to take responsibility for collecting the farm and accounting for it at the Exchequer. In Norwich's case, the 1194 charter clearly makes the association: after confirming to the citizens all their traditional liberties, in return for render to the king of the fee farm, by the hand of the prepositus (literally the "foremost" member of the community, usually translated as "reeve" or "bailiff"), the charter continues that the citizens may elect annually their own reeves (with the proviso that those elected be acceptable to the king). This represents the beginning of self-government in Norwich.

previous

main menu

next

History of medieval Norwich

[MAIN MENU]

Origins of settlement | The pre-Conquest borough | Effects of the Conquest
EVOLUTION OF A SELF-GOVERNING COMMUNITY | Power struggles with rivals
A division of interests | Summary/Recap | Information sources
Map of Anglo-Saxon Norwich | Map of Norwich ca.1260
Appendix 1: Calendar of customs of Norwich

Evolution of a self-governing community

Even before the 1194 charter set the citizens of Norwich on the road to local self-government, "burgess" was not simply someone who lived in the borough; it implied a status with certain privileges. The principal criterion for laying claim to that status was to be "at scot and lot", which entailed the reciprocity of rights and responsibilities that is fundamental to the concept of citizenship in today's society. A burgess was a resident who contributed towards all payments required from the borough by the king, and in return had a right certain advantages in the commerce conducted in the borough (e.g. an equal share to a bargain offered in the market). One particular concern addressed in borough customs (i.e. local laws) was closely to regulate buying and selling to protect the communal rights of citizens. The bordarii carefully distinguished in Domesday from the burgesses were residents who made no contribution to the king's custom. Stephen's reign saw an attempt by unspecified burgesses (perhaps the French immigrants of Mancroft) to refuse contribution to borough taxes, while still claiming mercantile liberties. Henry II ordered that anyone who had vexed the burgesses in this way should "return to being of their society and custom and share in their scot". The precise determination of which residents were at scot and lot continued to cause trouble, necessitating further royal instructions in 1203, 1228/29 and 1256; the tenants of the cathedral in particular were constantly trying to evade contributing to communal obligations.

There were other requirements associated with burgess status. The burgess had to be a free man – no lord's serf. The Jews were declared by Edward I not to be at scot and lot, since they were his bondsmen. To qualify this, however: it may not have been necessary for the burgess to be a man; Stigand's sister was identified by Domesday as a burgess. All the borough required was that a burgess be able to pay his or her share of taxes. As guarantee of this, the burgess was expected to own a house which could be distraigned in the event of default of payment. When, in 1296, citizen Richard de Knapton sold his house to take up lodging in St. Giles' Hospital, he was accused before the leet court of not being in scot and lot. Burgess status was thus restricted to those residents able to afford its obligations and desiring to trade under privileged conditions.

To what extent there was a sense of "community" within the burgess group is more difficult to say. It appears that the burgesses as a group were responsible for payment of the Domesday custom and for later tallages and aids. In cases of default of payment the king would first require a borough's head official to make up the difference, or sometimes a small group of the wealthier burgesses; but ultimately he had recourse to the seizure of the goods of any burgess, or even withdrawal of the charter-granted community liberties. Further signs of communality are seen in the common ownership of lands and churches in Domesday, in the grants of charters to the burgesses as a group, common assembly in the moot, and common subjection to the same set of customs. As yet, however, the "community" had only an unofficial existence.

This formally changed with the royal grant of "incorporation", although most of the features of communal identity associated with such grants were already operational in boroughs, so that the grants were little more than official stamp of approval to an existing state of affairs. Norwich's incorporation came with the grant to the city of county status, in 1404. Incorporation was later defined according to five particular criteria; we can see indications of the fulfillment of these criteria prior to 1404:

Possession of a common seal

Norwich's oldest known seal was made in the early thirteenth century; although inscribed "The seal of the bailiffs of Norwich", it was referred to in 1285 as "the seal of the community of Norwich", and it was kept safe in a locked chest for which special key-keepers were elected (as a guard against misuse by any individual) by mid-fourteenth century.

The right to make by-laws

The community had in fact long been used to modifying customary law to respond to particular problem, or new circumstances, that might arise. In a royal charter of 1380, the Norwich authorities were specifically granted the power to amend any customs which were out-of-date or problematic, so long as any changes were to the benefit of the community.

Perpetual succession (i.e. the automatic continuation of city liberties from one monarch's reign to another)

This was anticipated in the custom of obtaining new charters at the beginning of each reign simply to confirm the existing liberties. (Even after formal incorporation, borough authorities continued this 'insurance policy').

Communal ownership of property

Although kings were reluctant to grant this, Norwich successfully negotiated with the king for ownership of waste-land within its boundaries in the fourteenth century. Precedent was also set by the communal ownership of certain moveable property.

Creation of a fictitious legal personality which could sue and be sued

This was accomplished in the promotion to county status in 1404. Yet the terminology used in that charter suggests that "the bailiffs, citizens and community of the city" were perceived as something of a corporate entity much as their successors under the 1404 charter – "the mayor, sheriffs, citizens and community".

In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries the citizens of Norwich became increasingly aware of their shared identity and interests. In some ways the "community" acted as though it were already a corporate entity, for it was (in principle, at least) the fundamental source of local authority. For example, in 1285 permission was given "by the community of the city of Norwich" to John de Ronhale to build over a stream; and in the following year, thief Walter Eghe was tried before "the bailiffs and the community of the whole city in the Tolbooth".

We can hardly imagine that the whole community would fit into one building in the city. In practice, of course, the principle of representation was applied. The city sent representatives to parliaments when summoned by the king, who expected that those representatives have full authority to act on behalf of their communities; although in cases of decisions that were likely to prove unpopular (such as the granting of new taxes) the representatives might defer giving their approval by insisting they first consult the community they represented.

To an extent the executive officers of the city, over the choosing of which the community acquired control in 1194, were representatives of the community. On the other hand, they were also answerable to the king. By the 1220s it appears that there were four bailiffs acting each year as the city executive. This was probably associated with the division of the city into four leets – corresponding roughly to the old division of separate settlements – each with jurisdiction equivalent to a court of a hundred. Towards the end of the fourteenth century, the citizens felt the desire to be ruled by a mayor, in emulation of London, the leading city of the kingdom; since Richard II would not grant this, the city supported Henry of Lancaster in his quest for the crown, and was rewarded with the grant of a mayor in 1404. The change does not seem to have brought the city any greater independence for its executive officer; the mayor continued to be responsible to the king for a number of duties, including some new ones (notably, the role of escheator). On the other hand, accountability for the fee farm was transferred to new officers – two city sheriffs (a reflection of the city's new county status) – who were otherwise subordinate to the mayor. A few years later this new status of the city was symbolized in the replacement of the old Tolbooth, as the home of city administration, with a new, enlarged Guildhall.

The Guildhall

built between 1407 and 1412, presumably on the site of the earlier Tolbooth; it remained the seat of city government up to the 1930s. Part of a more general imitation of London's forms of government (only that city's guildhall being larger in all the kingdom), it reflected growth not only in civic pride but also in the division between government and governed.

photo © S. Alsford

The change is also reflective of a general increase in the ranks of city officialdom over time, as new powers were obtained through royal grants and as the business of urban administration became increasingly complex. The city's acquisition of its own coroners, sometime in the mid-thirteenth century, was indicative of growing judicial independence from Norfolk authorities. And the appearance of chamberlains and treasurers (by at least the end of the thirteenth century), evidences the greater complexity of city finances as the sources of revenues diversified and the growing list of communally-owned properties requiring management.

The root cause of this proliferation of officials was the citizens' ambition for freedom from the interference in local affairs of external authorities – notably from the county sheriff and other royal officers. This ambition won its first victory in the gaining of the fee farm in 1194. The city's responsibilities to the king did not change; it was simply that accountability was now directly through city-elected officers rather than men appointed by the king. Subsequent charters show the citizens' strategy for gradual increasing their liberties. They obtained exemptions from various judicial obligations and, more importantly, assured that a growing number of types of judicial process would be held in borough courts, rather than courts outside the city's jurisdiction. In some cases, the charters really only confirmed powers that the city had already assumed; such was the case of a city prison (as opposed to the one in the castle), which received royal authorization in the charter of 1305, although the city had already maintained a gaol in its Tolbooth since at least 1274. That the Crown was prepared to turn over to boroughs some of the powers of royal officials is an indication not so much of any royal policy favouring borough self-government as of the Crown's constant need for money and burgesses' preparedness to pay for grants of new liberties. Slowly, but surely, Norwich thus excluded the authority of all but its own officers in most matters with city bounds.

The lowest jurisdictional level in the hierarchy of city courts was the leet system. Its initial objective was to bring offences to light and then decide which court had jurisdiction over them. Thefts were referred to the city court presided over by the bailiffs; homicides were reserved for the coroner, other felonies were held for the attention of the itinerant king's justices. The leet court itself – also presided over by the bailiffs – dealt with infringements of local custom and common law, such as minor assaults, public nuisance, breaches of the assize of ale and other market offences; all were fineable offences (the fines going towards payment of the fee farm).

The Anglo-Saxon origins of the leet system were related to an approach to maintaining law and order by dividing the adult male population into "tithings" of 10 or 12 men each, responsible for each other's conduct. A number of tithings made up a leet, and a number of leets made up the hundred already mentioned. Norwich had the status of a hundred before the Norman Conquest, and the various settlements that it comprised were treated as separate leets. After the Conquest, the leet courts were held by the sheriff in the castle fee. The burgesses are seen resisting this control in 1184, and probably took over leet administration in 1194. By this time the amount of business the leet courts had to handle was difficult to manage, however, and circa 1223 each leet was given the status of a hundred and divided into sub-leets, each of which made its presentations on a different day. There is some evidence that each leet elected one of the four bailiffs, but all four jointly presided over each leet's court, to emphasize the unity of the city.

By the end of the fourteenth century, the leet system was breaking down. Although a good tool for detecting breaches of the law, it was inefficient for punishing them. Many burgesses were willing to pay the small fines imposed on them periodically in order to continue illegal practices which brought them profits (e.g. breaking the assize of ale). With the constitutional remodelling in the early fifteenth century, many of the administrative and judicial functions of the leets were absorbed by the new officials, and the leets survived only as units in the election of city officers.

previous

main menu

next

History of medieval Norwich

[MAIN MENU]

Origins of settlement | The pre-Conquest borough | Effects of the Conquest
Evolution of a self-governing community | POWER STRUGGLES WITH RIVALS
A division of interests | Summary/Recap | Information sources
Map of Anglo-Saxon Norwich | Map of Norwich ca.1260
Appendix 1: Calendar of customs of Norwich

Power struggles with rivals

In order to consolidate the growing control over its own administration, the city had to face challenges from a variety of rivals in the areas of legal jurisdiction and economic matters.

See Map of Norwich ca.1260 (60K)

To a community becoming increasingly conscious of its social and political "personality", it was intolerable that its physical personality be so vaguely defined. The first step in remedying this was to delineate the city limits. At some time during Stephen's reign the boundary of Westwyk was indicated by a ditch, and that of southern Conesford by a gate on Berstrete and a few decades later by another gate on Southgate; the latter may have been a response to territorial claims of Carrow Abbey, founded south of the town in 1146. In 1235 the city was fined for attempting to assert its jurisdiction in common fields outside the hundredal limits of Norwich. Although we don't know where those fields were exactly, they may have been in the southwestern quadrant of the city that the citizens made a point of taking in, when the king gave them licence to enclose the city, in 1253, with a ditch and nine gates. This ditch swept in a wide arc, connecting Westwyk and southern Conesford and advancing into Taverham hundred in the north. It represented a territorial claim, and one that was challenged both by country-dwellers (who complained that their old paths had been blocked) and by the cathedral priory, which accused the city of illegally enclosing lands belonging to itself, Carrow Abbey, and rural hundreds.

Undaunted, the citizens consolidated this coup by building a stone wall along the same boundary. The importance of boundaries, in terms of control over territories and commerce, is seen in that wall-building was an expensive and long-term undertaking. To finance it, the city obtained royal grants of murage in 1297, 1305, 1317, and 1337. On the last occasion they farmed the murage to citizen Richard Spynk, who also contributed out of his own wealth to ensure the completion of the walls – in return for generous concessions by the city. Although there was provision for artillery and portcullises, it would be a mistake to think of these walls as exclusively defensive in purpose. The length of their line, the poor quality of construction, and the disinclination of the citizens to keep it in repair, together with the fact that the eastern boundary had no wall (only the river as a barrier), meant that they would not be a real obstacle to any serious attacker. As part of Spynk's contract with the city, the latter was required to take steps to prevent abuse of the walls, such as by citizens hanging cloths to dry on them. By the 1370s, however, the city itself was leasing out the defensive towers for commercial uses, such as milling. Despite this, the walls were an expression of city pride and independence, intended to channel trade into and out of the city at set points where tolls could be collected (which explains the anger of the country people in 1253, no longer able to evade those payments).

Norwich fortifications

[left] The southernmost element of the wall, watching down from the top of Carrow Hill, was this large tower, which came (in the 15th century) to be called the Black Tower.

[centre] A western stretch of wall and tower just south of St. Stephen's Gate

[right] On the bank of the Wensum, where it looped southwards around the meadow of the Great Hospital, the Prior had a tower, probably related to collecting tolls on river-bound traffic, but also used as a prison. In 1378 this was turned over to the city. Later used to house cows pastured in the meadow, it acquired the name "Cow Tower".

photos © S. Alsford

The monks' complaint in 1253 was prompted by other reasons. It was part of an ongoing defense against the encroachments of the citizens. From early in the century there had been a number of points of contention between city and cathedral-priory. Not all of the lands given to the cathedral priory were enclosed by the cathedral precinct wall; the Prior's Fee included a number of areas within the city, whose residents (based on royal grants to the Prior) refused to contribute to taxes imposed on the city or to acknowledge any authority of city officers over them. The city tried to claim jurisdiction over the inhabitants of those areas, countering the monks' accusations with those of its own. In 1244 one issue was settled when it was agreed the Prior's tenants would contribute £20 towards the fee farm (£100 at this time). In 1249-50 the city complained that the Prior was taking "holy-day" tolls on bakers and other citizens, but the Prior successfully defended that this was a customary right. In 1256/57 the Priory's baker was killed in a quarrel with a citizen and, since he had died on the Priory grounds, the city bailiffs were denied permission to hold the inquest. The same year saw a conflict over the Prior collecting landgable, while the following year saw the bailiffs assaulted by a party of monks and their servants in a jurisdictional dispute over a piece of property.

All this came to a head in the summer of 1272 when the citizens erected a quintain (a target for lance practice) on Tombland, in a location probably chosen to annoy the monks. A quarrel broke out with servants of the Priory, who were forced to retreat, but one of the servants shot a citizen with a crossbow. After an inquest, the city coroners arrested two priory servants, following which the Prior excommunicated and interdicted the citizens. By August things had reached a state of siege, with the Priory gates closed and its servants taking potshots at citizens from behind the walls. An attempt to negotiate a peaceful settlement when the Prior refused to endorse an agreement. Instead he brought in three barges full of armed men from Yarmouth, which had its own reasons for enmity with Norwich. These and the Priory servants sallied forth into the city at night: killing one man, wounding others, robbing, looting and burning. Despatching a complaint to the king, the city authorities called for a muster of citizens in the marketplace the following morning (August 8th or 9th). An attack was then made on the Priory; one of its gates was burned down to effect an entry into the precinct and a church immediately within was looted and burned. The fire spread to other buildings, even to the cathedral (although the damage was much exaggerated in the subsequent legal proceedings); 13 defenders were killed – some in formal execution style – while others were taken off to prison, and the attack disintegrated into general plundering of cathedral treasures. It was not a total rout, however, for the following day the Prior, William de Brunham, himself killed one of his opponents.

Within a week the king was taking action, despatching commissions to bring matters under control and ordering the sheriff and the constable of the castle to assist the commissioners. In September he set out for the city in person to supervise the investigation; arriving on September 14, he subsequently placed both city and Priory under wardens. The accused included citizens who had played leading roles in local government. Following the trial at least 29 were hanged. A further investigation in December reached the conclusions that the fault in the affair lay with the Prior's violence against the city, and that the fire in the church had been an accident of smiths employed by the Priory; Brunham was arrested and turned over to his bishop to be tried (but his punishment was light). In 1275 the affair was finally settled through arbitration by the king, who set damages payable by city to Priory at £2000, in return for which the excommunication was lifted from the city. Arguments between the two sides continued, however, and eventually the king urged them to a compromise (1306), which conceded the city much of the jurisdiction it wanted.

Ethelbert Gate

One of the two principal gates leading from Tombland into the cathedral close (the other built ca.1420 by Sir Thomas Erpingham), the Ethelbert Gate was built in the early 14th century at the cost of the citizens as part of a settlement with the cathedral, and particularly in recompense for the burning down of St. Ethelbert's church during the 1272 riot. Perhaps its carving of St. George and the dragon is an allegory on the event?

photos © S. Alsford

Encouraged by this success, the citizens immediately turned their attention to the waste-land in the borough, which belonged to the king. This land had developmental potential which represented annual rents for the city treasury. In 1307 Norwich petitioned the king for a grant of all the waste-land ... and was refused. So the citizens did what was commonly done in other boroughs and built on the land anyway, accumulating rents adding up to £9.11s.8d annually by 1329, when the royal escheator demanded these rents be handed over to the king. An appeal to the king, however, produced a decision in the citizens' favour, conceding them the waste-land.

Their next target was the Castle Fee, an area encompassing not only the castle but an expanse of surrounding land housing many persons, under castle rather than city jurisdiction.

The citizens resented this exempt jurisdiction in the midst for much the same reasons as they did that of the Prior's Fee: the lay inhabitants might profit from city liberties without being liable to the obligations of citizenship, and they might commit crimes in the city and then seek sanctuary of the Fee, where they could obtain trial from a favourably-disposed jury of their fellows. There was also the potential physical threat, exemplified during the barons' wars: in 1264 men from the castle threatened the city coroners so that they could not complete inquests, and burned down the house of a citizen.

In 1344, the citizens took advantage of the king's presence in Norwich to plead their case. Investigation revealed to Edward that the castle was of no military value and that a grant of the Fee would mean only a very minor loss in revenue, since most revenues would continue to come to him through an (inevitable) increase in the city's fee farm. So in 1345, he transferred to the city all but castle, shirehouse (the seat of the county court), and their immediate enclosure. This area was not integrated with adjoining leets, but maintained an independent one, with city bailiffs replacing the sheriff in its court.

A similar series of rivalries is seen in economic affairs, as the city sought to monopolize trade and control the conditions under which it took place. The first step in the process was to obtain the right to exact tolls on merchandize passing through the city gates, as well as freedom for the citizens from paying such tolls in other boroughs. The latter was one of the grants in the 1194 charter. The former was not explicitly granted but was probably implicit in that charter's grant to Norwich of all customs valid in London. In 1305 the citizens obtained a more specific list of tolls from which they were exempt.

Naturally, the right to take tolls and the exemption from tolls elsewhere – which the king granted to many towns – worked against each other. Merchants from other towns coming to Norwich might claim to be exempt from Norwich's tolls, while Norwich merchants might face demands from towns they visited that they pay tolls there. The 1194 charter therefore granted that, should toll be illegally taken from a Norwich citizen and the offending town refuse to compensate, Norwich's reeve could exact the amount due from the goods of any merchant of the offending town found in Norwich. Again, since this was a common grant to towns, it only exacerbated the situation, leading to arguments, reprisals, and counter-reprisals. A further round of royal grants (in Norwich's case, in 1255) specified that no citizen's goods should be seized elsewhere in relation to any debt for which they were not the debtor or guarantor, except in the case where the citizen was a member of a community which has refused to give satisfaction to the legitimate claims of a creditor. This was in tune with the medieval concept of every burgess sharing in the rights and obligations of his peers. But it did not help merchants whose goods might be seized through no fault of their own. Sometimes it was probably easier to avoid arguments with the officials of other towns, and just pay the tolls demanded. But then the capitulating merchant might be fined by his own leet court, for setting a precedent prejudicial to the chartered liberties of the city. The consequence of all this was to foster feelings of hostility between towns; particularly if foreign towns were involved, there could be political repercussions not to the liking of the king. Eventually the king banned the reprisal mechanism.

Norwich's concern to regulate local trade is clearly seen in its custumal (the collection of local laws). Many of the customs were devoted to rules of fair trade: equal opportunity trading for every citizen; no trading privately outside the market, nor before the ringing of the cathedral bell for the mass of the Virgin; no citizen was to assist a non-citizen avoid paying toll (for example, by pretending the latter's merchandize was his own); payment on the spot for goods bought from country-dwellers. The bailiffs duties included regular examination of the weights and measures of taverners, brewers, and other merchants, to ensure their accuracy; none was valid unless stamped with city seals intended for that purpose.

Once the problems associated with administrative jurisdiction were settled (by 1346) and after recovery from the effects of the Black Death (with property values rising again), efforts towards strengthening control over trade were redoubled. A special tax was levied in 1378 to buy up shops and market stalls, and it was then ruled that meat and fish could be sold only from these stalls. Similarly, two quays were acquired in 1379 and designated as the only legitimate places for loading and unloading goods; incoming goods of visiting merchants had to be stored in a community-owned warehouse while in the city. A new list of tolls was drawn up. In 1384 a large building just north of the market-place was acquired; part was converted into a Common Inn, where visiting merchants had to lodge, another part into the Worsted Seld, the only place from which country weavers could sell their worsted cloth to the citizens. Norwich's wealth in the late Middle Ages was founded primarily upon the cloth industry, especially manufacture of worsteds, a fine cloth sold throughout England and exported to the continent. When an inventory of city property was made, in 1397, it was quite extensive.

Part of the effort in controlling trade was directed at reorganizing the craft guilds. As rivals for control of trade conditions, craft guilds were at first suppressed by Norwich authorities. Besides fixing wages, prices and standards of manufacture, the guilds also deprived city courts of revenues from fines, by settling quarrels between members through internal arbitration. The 1256 royal charter included a clause outlawing guilds, and tanners, fullers, saddlers and cobblers were fined by the leet courts in the 1280s and '90s for having guilds. But by the second half of the fourteenth century it had become clear that suppression was ineffective; it gave way to a policy of recognition combined with supervision. An addition to the custumal authorized the bailiffs and city council to appoint annually a few members of each craft to act as wardens and check, several times a year, on the conduct of the city craftsmen; any fraudulent practices or defective work were to be reported to city authorities to act on. In the first half of the fifteenth century further steps were taken to control the guilds, climaxing in a lengthy set of ordinances (1449) by which guilds were to be governed.

In the area of trade, there were other rivals over which the city had less control. One source of dispute between monks and citizens was the fair rights on Tombland. The 1306 compromise mentioned above conceded the citizens first choice of which part of Tombland they would use for their stalls. The citizens also resented the Prior's right to hold a piepowder court (a speedy dispute-resolution process for travelling merchants) during the fair; in 1380 city authorities jealously ruled that any citizen taking a case to the Prior's court would be deprived of citizenship. Norwich petitioned to have its own piepowder court in 1443; although this was granted a few years later, there is no sign they ever went ahead and held one.

The Merchants of the Staple represented another independent jurisdiction, via the law-merchant. Norwich was one of a handful of staple towns (exclusive ports for the export of wool) during the reigns of Edward II and Edward III. In 1353 a royal statute set up organizations in those towns, each headed by a Mayor of the Staple, whose court had sole jurisdiction over foreign merchants and cases of debt, trespass, or breach of contract involving their members. However, since Norwich's staple organization was dominated by its own merchants, there was probably no serious conflict here.

Norwich's role as a staple was one factor in a long-standing rivalry with Great Yarmouth, which was made staple town in 1369 in place of Norwich. However, the hostility really went back to the question of which town was the port having right to exact tolls on boats using the Wensum. As early as 1257 Norwich complained that Yarmouth was stopping ships from coming upriver and forcing the merchandize on board those ships to be sold in its own market. This would mean a loss of some of the revenues Norwich needed to pay its fee farm. An argument of that nature was always guaranteed to be persuasive to the king. Renewed complaints in 1333 prompted a royal mandate to Yarmouth bailiffs to desist. By this time Yarmouth appears to have captured enough of the disputed commerce to have become wealthier than Norwich.

Rivalries such as those described above played their part in the historical process which brought Norwich to the point of incorporation. The conflicts revealed to city authorities the need to strengthen their powers, and incorporation represented the highest expression of privileges that might be attained by local government of that time. A burning sense of identity and local pride is revealed by these conflicts, as well as by general distrust of any outsider (the difference in breadth of outlook between those times and ours being illustrated by the fact that to the medieval townsmen a "foreigner" was anyone living outside the borough, while someone from parts we today would classify as foreign was termed an "alien").

The impulses towards incorporation, from the borough's point of view, were a tangled web of circumstances reacting upon themselves. Gaining control of the fee farm may have brought a degree of political independence, but it did not profit the borough financially. Decreasing revenue from tolls, as the result of royal grants of exemption, and from rents (which remained at a fixed level), in the face of mounting costs as the size of bureaucracy grew, public properties needed maintenance, and city walls were built – on top of annual payment of the fee farm as well as frequent royal taxes, made things difficult financially for the city. Traditional revenues became inadequate to meet the fee farm, and so that had to be given first call on new revenues. In 1305 the king gave the bailiffs the power to levy local taxes. It became clear that property-holding was the likeliest cure for the city's economic ills; yet the lack of a formal existence in the eyes of the law was a hindrance to this. The 1404 charter remedied that.

A reflection of the improvement of city fortunes and the crystallization of the spirit of community is seen in the development of record-keeping. Norwich's first century of independence saw the appearance only of "records of necessity": court proceedings, financial accounts, and registration of deeds to property. In the decades following the completion of the walls and acquisition of the Castle Fee we see the commencement of a Book of Memoranda (memorabilia concerning the city, later used for enrolling the names of new citizens), the drawing up of a new version of the custumal, the recording of proceedings of the city council, and the inventorying of city property. All this reflects growing self-confidence and maturity.

In many ways, the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries were the heyday of medieval Norwich (and other boroughs). We see signs of a deep satisfaction with living in urban communities, and expressions of civic patriotism and a sense of all-for-one and one-for-all. Yet, as the fourteenth century wore on, the idea of the common good was losing its hold and, partly as a result of the trend towards incorporation (which, from the king's point of view, was an attempt to impose a certain uniformity on his boroughs), new forces of self- and class interest came to the fore to undermine the notion of community in the borough.

previous

main menu

next

History of medieval Norwich

[MAIN MENU]

Origins of settlement | The pre-Conquest borough | Effects of the Conquest
Evolution of a self-governing community | Power struggles with rivals
A DIVISION OF INTERESTS | Summary/Recap | Information sources
Map of Anglo-Saxon Norwich | Map of Norwich ca.1260
Appendix 1: Calendar of customs of Norwich

A division of interests

In the previous section, much was said about common purpose of the citizens of Norwich, of the sense of community, and unified action against common enemies. However, we must remember that this was only one side of the coin. The medieval urban community comprised individuals who, like today's communities, had divergent outlooks and attitudes, and whose personal ambitions and interests were not always in harmony with each other. In particular we can see, especially in the later Middle Ages (when our records become more detailed and more intimate), a growing division between groups within the population, along lines which can be described - if not entirely accurately – as class interests. Historians have interpreted the internal conflicts of this period as a struggle between democracy and oligarchy, although this is really too dogmatic an interpretation for a society that was more concerned with the practical aspects of government (e.g. was it financially efficient, did it treat citizens fairly, were its actions to the benefit of the town?), than with its political character.

We have seen that Norwich, like most other towns, developed out of simpler communities and that throughout most of the Middle Ages the community was – in theory at least – considered to be the fundamental source of authority, in terms of decision-making related to purely local matters. Yet in any sizable community whose affairs are sufficiently complex to require constant attention, a general assembly of residents is not a very practical mechanism of day-to-day decision-making. It was natural that this should be delegated to representatives. From Anglo-Saxon times provisions had been made for small groups of senior members of a community to have a special role in judicial administration, and it is generally felt that a town's executive officers would have consulted, if informally, on important decisions with others of the group of prominent townsmen from whom they themselves were chosen.

The identity of these few is not too difficult to determine. As already noted, a key qualification for citizenship was ownership of landed property, as collateral for the citizen's financial responsibilities. Since, in cases such as a failure of a city to pay its fee farm or the amount set for a royal tallage, or again in the event of a breakdown of order, the king would seek redress from the city representatives, it was advisable that they be those citizens most capable of bearing the financial burden. The wealthier citizens were also likeliest to be those with the most experience in administration. The frequency of cases involving commercial transactions in the borough court would prompt the participation of merchants as witnesses or jurors. The need to bargain with royal commissioners concerning tallages, and the ability to divide the assessment among citizens according to their property, also required certain financial ability and knowledge of property values. The "stewardship of the rich" was considered a natural state of affairs by medieval townsmen. The wealth of some of the leading townsmen is reflected in the latter half of the fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries by the large donations they made to the rebuilding of many of Norwich's parish churches, and the expansion of their own residences (e.g. adding upper storeys) to reflect their socio-economic status.

Those who were expected to bear the burdens of office, because "sufficient" (as the medieval description had it) in experience and wealth, may have felt it reasonable to use their power to further their own interests. The charters they obtained from the king may have benefited the city as a whole, but particularly themselves, by improving mercantile conditions and by acquiring new powers that gave greater control over matters touching the city. As part of this tightening of control, it seems, one of the aims was to replace the unwieldy popular assembly with a more restricted decision-making body.

Abuses of power also occurred, or were perceived to occur; although the exception rather than the rule, it is in the nature of surviving documentary evidence that we hear much of such situations. Complaints by the Norwich community to the king are typical of those of other towns; accusations against the city rulers included levying unreasonable taxes and then putting the money to their private use, and attempts to monopolize trade through private transactions outside designated markets. The ruling class reacted by trying to bolster their privileged access to power. They were assisted in this by incorporation, which gave formal expression to the principle of delegation.

There are various signs of this process of differentiation between rulers and ruled in Norwich. We hear of a group of "magnates" in the thirteenth century: men outside the tithing system because so well-known that they needed no-one to vouch for them. When these men appear in leet records it is often to intervene in cases to persuade bailiffs to pardon offenders. These were likely the probi homines ("upright men", with bones gentz and prudeshommes being alternate terms) who were considered reliable witnesses or suitable choices for cities to send to parliament. The term crops up in a variety of circumstances. In 1213 and 1287 the king addressed documents to the bailiffs and probi homines of Norwich. In 1327 the probi homines of Norwich loaned the king 300 marks. Such references do not necessarily suggest a specific group within the citizenry. More revealing is a reference in the Bull of Excommunication (1273) following the citizens riot against the cathedral-priory the previous year, which was directed to the whole community, but especially to the named bailiffs and 16 other citizens "by whose counsel the community was at that time governed"; most of these were former bailiffs. Ten years later we see the bailiffs and a group of 24 others witnessing an important deed on behalf of the community.

That these and other pieces of evidence (too numerous to list here) suggest the existence of an advisory council, whether formal or informal, of members of the same social strata from which the bailiffs were drawn, is bolstered by later evidence (1344) from the custumal which lists the names of the "24" elected that year by the community. The same group is seen on other occasions in that decade. Its duties were stated vaguely (but therefore, by implication, broadly) as to take action in business concerning the community. In other words, a city council. It may be the same body which is found in the 1360s and later electing the bailiffs. By this time, it had become the practice to summon a few citizens from each leet to attend particular assemblies. Fines were set for those failing to answer the summons, and there is evidence of difficulty in raising a quorum, on occasion. There were different levels of fines for members of the "24" and for craftsmen who were summoned. It is difficult to say whether the goal of summoning specific citizens was to ensure that a representative group be present to give assent to ballival actions, or to respond to pressure from the craft guilds for more say in local government. Probably both. It was also decided at this period, to counter complaints of unjust taxation, that tax assessments would be made only by specially-elected committees made up of craftsmen.

We do not know to what extent the craft guildsmen may be associated with the "middle class" (les menes gentz) who were complaining to the king about unjust taxation by the bailiffs and "the rich men". Separate complaints were made by a "lower class" (pauperes). There is no indication that the burgesses were conscious of any clear-cut, economically-defined class divisions at the time of Domesday. Such arose from property qualifications for purposes of tax assessment, became more marked as economic growth furthered the prosperity of merchants, and took on political implications as the wealthier citizens were accorded the principal responsibilities of local government.

By the late fourteenth century there are clear indications of a sense of class differentiation based on wealth. The Staple organization may have contributed by fostering an elite of merchants, with divided loyalties between their towns and the interests of the Staple. The Black Death (1349) is another possible factor in encouraging elitism. In the pre-plague years agricultural depression, contrasted with Norwich's rising fortunes, encouraged greater migration into the city. The Black Death decimated the longer-established families of the city and was followed by a new influx of migrants from the countryside. Poverty and ambition combined in some of these migrants to produce a measure of lawlessness and disregard for city customs. This, together with ingrained distaste for newcomers, encouraged the surviving urban "aristocracy" to close ranks and assert superior rights. The Peasants' Revolt, in whose local expression some townsmen participated, reaffirmed to this group the need to take a firm hand in controlling "the commons", and an equally-nervous national government was prepared to give local authorities the powers they needed to do so.

Constitutional conflict

The complaints of the middle and lower classes show that they wished to challenge the ruling class' grip on local government, by reasserting the fundamental authority of the community and its right to be consulted in the decision-making process and to have local officers accountable to the community for their actions. Following violent protests against the city government in 1371, the ruling class petitioned the king for an increase of powers; in 1380 they were given the power to make by-laws and to remedy existing local laws which they considered defective. This grant was modelled on one to London in 1341, but was given to the bailiffs and "24", without London's qualification of requiring consent of the commonalty to any legislative action.

The 1404 charter seemed to enshrine class differentiation into the city constitution, by addressing the grants to "mayor, sheriffs, citizens and community". Authority was now vested in the two estates of citizens and commonalty. To work out electoral procedures for the new city officers, a body of 80 persons was created to represent the commonalty. In 1413 this body was instituted as a Common Council, 20 men chosen from each leet (by this time called "wards"), which would elect city officers. Trouble soon arose over electoral procedure, when the ruling class exercised a power of intervention it believed was accorded it by the 1380 charter. Open hostilities erupted, making it difficult to run city affairs and the treasury ran out of money. After a great fire destroyed large areas of the city in 1413, both sides came to their senses and submitted their grievances to the arbitration of Sir Thomas Erpingham, a local landowner who was also an officer of the king and had proven a helpful connection in the royal court for the city in the past. The complaints submitted to the arbitrators reveal the attitudes and aims of each party. The commons, describing themselves as the "greater part of the citizens and community" protested that:

- The 1380 charter had been obtained from the king without their knowledge or consent; in particular they objected to the omission of the clause requiring community assent to governmental decisions.
- The ruling class had subsequently attempted to deny them a part in the election of city officials, and had used a group known as le Bachelery to use violence to disrupt elections.
- City rulers had abused their power by using public funds for private purposes and by illegal trading practices (e.g. trading in private places rather than the market).

The respondents, calling themselves "the sheriffs and 24 prudeshommes of the city ... as well as others of equal status to those who have held the estate of mayor, sheriff and bailiffs of the said city, like other sufficient persons of the commonalty", counter-argued that:

- The 1380 charter was vital to the proper running of the city; rather than reinserting the London clause, the term "community" should be removed from the 1404 charter, since it led the commons to believe that "every person of the smallest reputation in the said city should have as much authority and power in all the elections and other affairs ... as have the most sufficient persons."
- That their intervention in the disputed election had been necessary, as the commons had contravened correct electoral procedure by electing the same man as mayor two years running.
- That it was the complainants, not themselves, who used force to disturb elections, and these disturbances that had obliged the respondents to conduct trade in the safety of their homes rather than in public places.
- That the government of the city was disturbed by confederacies, congregations and alliances of the complainants. (Perhaps suggesting the craft guilds were involved in the opposition to the ruling class).

A compromise was embodied in the Composition of 1415. Conditions were laid down for the election of mayor, sheriffs, upper council of 24, and lower (Common) council. The requirement for community consent to ordinances was affirmed, but delegated to the Common Council. The 24 were to be chosen only from "sufficient" men (the mayor having the power to veto unsuitable choices) and were to hold office for life, thus placing them beyond democratic control. This group was to be the pool from which the commonalty could nominate two candidates for the mayoralty, with the decision between them being made by mayor and 24. One of the sheriffs was to be chosen by the commonalty, the other by mayor and 24. Although the commonalty had won back some lost ground, the effect was essentially to entrench the concept of two separate political estates and to limit popular participation in government. This settlement was formalized through a royal charter in 1417. The city rulers attempted to strengthen their ranks through an internal agreement (the Tripartite Indenture) in 1424, by which, the mayor, sheriffs and upper council (now called "aldermen") promised each other that all would present a common front in future.

This, however, was not to be. Many of the wealthier citizens had acquired property outside Norwich and had ambitions to rise in status and join the county gentry. Their loyalties were divided, and their politics pursued interests which were not necessarily those of the city. The city, taking advantage of its new status after 1404, was trying to extend its jurisdiction to lands outside the walls, which made some enemies from local landowners. At the same time, some of Norfolk's landed gentry were taking an interest in commerce and resented Norwich's monopoly of commercial advantages. But they were denied direct influence in Norwich by the stipulation, in the Composition of 1415, that no outsider could hold any city office. So they had to exercise influence indirectly, through political factions they encouraged within the city. It appears this was already a worry for the city rulers by 1415, since the Composition forbade any citizen to take the livery of any lord while holding office. The Tripartite Indenture was also an attempt to close ranks against partisanship from within.

It was to no avail. In 1432, one of the most prominent aldermen and a man with county connections, Thomas Wetherby, supported by the city clerk and some other bureaucratic officials, attempted to engineer the election of his nominee, William Grey, as mayor.

Thwarted, the conspirators were deprived both of office and citizenship, but secured a royal commission headed by their patron, the Earl of Suffolk, which restored their citizenship and Wetherby to office. Wetherby continued, unsuccessfully, to try to dominate future elections, then changed tactics and induced local ecclesiastical dignitaries to bring charges over the city's attempts to exert control over lands beyond the walls. The city was convicted, as a result of a betrayal by its Recorder (an officer who gave legal advice, often chosen from the gentry class), John Heydon, another Wetherby supporter; he was then cast from office. Meanwhile, the furious citizens rioted. When the mayor went to London to explain to the situation to the king, he was thrown into prison and a city attorney, acting on Wetherby's instructions, relinquished his plea of defence. The king seized the city liberties, and for a while Wetherby had a free hand in the city.

If the death of Wetherby in 1445 and restoration of the liberties two years later eased the situation, it was only slightly, for Wetherby's policy was continued by Heydon and former Norfolk sheriff Sir Thomas Tuddenham, both followers of the Earl of Suffolk. The city was encouraged in its resistance by William Paston and his friends. It had thus become embroiled in a larger struggle between county factions, which was in its turn one expression of the national power struggle underway that eventually climaxed in the Wars of the Roses.

Wetherby, Grey, Tuddenham and Suffolk were all members of the Norwich-based St. George's Guild (founded 1385, possibly to unite the local upper classes in reaction to the Peasants' Revolt), whose membership included many prominent lay and ecclesiastical figures from the city and countryside. In response to city policy to either suppress or control guilds, St. George's Guild obtained a royal charter in 1417, protecting its existence but also giving the city authorities the power to dismiss guild-members for misconduct. That guild members played an active role in the troubles that plagued Norwich over the next few decades is indicated by Norwich's strategy to try to resolve the disputes by bringing the guild over to its side. In 1452, guild and corporation were amalgamated. By this agreement, the mayor was to follow his year of office with a year as chief officer of the guild; city aldermen were all to be guild members (as might Common Councillors, if they wished); dismissal for misconduct from either guild or corporation meant automatic dismissal from the other.

Again with a view to resolving the disputes dividing the ruling class, the same year saw a further constitutional adjustment, embodied in a royal charter. Additional powers (particularly judicial) were given to the city officers. Significantly, reference to the "community" disappeared from the terms of the charter.

These two settlements, along with new ordinances regulating the crafts in 1449, served to restore solidarity within the ranks of the ruling class, while widening the gap between them and the lower classes. Members of the socially more respectable crafts were made eligible for office, thus broadening the ruling class and weakening its opponents. The way had been paved for the Closed Corporation of post-medieval times.

previous

main menu

next

Created: August 29, 1998. Last update: January 25, 2004

© Stephen Alsford, 1998-2004

History of medieval Norwich

[MAIN MENU]

Origins of settlement | The pre-Conquest borough | Effects of the Conquest
Evolution of a self-governing community | Power struggles with rivals
A division of interests | SUMMARY/RECAP | Information sources
Map of Anglo-Saxon Norwich | Map of Norwich ca.1260
Appendix 1: Calendar of customs of Norwich

Summary / Recapitulation

A variety of influences, national and local, played a part in moulding the course of Norwich's development. The beginnings of the city lay in an aggregate of several village communities, loosely bound together by the geographical and commercial advantages of their location. The Danish immigration was a catalyst in uniting these, and the subsequent reintegration of East Anglia into the English kingdom was a further stimulus. The new settlers filled in the gaps between the Saxon vills, the trade links across the North Sea with continental Scandinavian colonies enhanced local prosperity, and this in turn prompted the king to endow the community with the official attributes of a burh/portus. Royal interest in the borough also served to limit the authority of other lords who might have proven a greater hindrance to borough self-determination.

Commercial pursuits, furthered again by the effects of the Conquest, gave rise to a distinctive burghal character. As the burgesses became increasingly conscious of this, they sought recognition of special status and accommodation of the needs of their lifestyle. Aware of the financial advantages to itself and of the political value of patronage of towns, the crown conceded what the burgesses desired, in such a way as to integrate the borough into its own developing system of national administration. While a traditional view is that medieval towns were the bastions of English freedom, it is unlikely that such sentimental ideals had any great part in the thinking of practical, business-minded burgesses. They were motivated rather by a pragmatic assessment of the harassment potential of unsympathetic and self-interested royal officials, and the advantages of direct relations with the king. Far from seeking to set themselves up as independent communes (as was happening with some cities on the continent), they were prepared to take on heavier responsibilities within the national administrative system in return for greater control over local affairs.

Local conditions dictated the rate and extent of the development of self-government in different boroughs. The imposition of a French settlement in post-Conquest Norwich may have delayed the impetus towards self-government, by temporarily inhibiting the united effort necessary for successful pursuance of common goals. On the other hand, the emergence of the Mancroft market as the new focus of the town suggests that the newcomers contributed a new vitality to Norwich. However, we should not ignore the fact that Norwich's development continued to be shaped by Anglo-Saxon precedents - in legal procedure and in the use of the old settlement divisions as the basis of the leet system. For a long time the leets served as the foundation of local administration. When political reorganization became necessary in the fifteenth century, the leet division still proved useful.

By the close of the Middle Ages, Norwich had become one of the largest, wealthiest and most influential cities in England. But this prosperity also undermined its democratic roots. At its medieval peak in the first half of the fourteenth century, with trade booming and the city's physical and jurisdictional limits largely defined to its satisfaction, the rot was already setting in. The old communal assembly and the leet courts were no longer effective mechanisms for handling administrative and judicial affairs, in the face of the increasingly complex governmental responsibilities and the pressure from above to ensure the maintenance of law and order in a society where men appear to have been more inclined to resort to violence to redress perceived wrongs or to achieve their ambitions. Furthermore, the lack of recognition of the community as an entity in the eyes of the law left it vulnerable in ways inconsistent with the advantages accorded it by royal grant (e.g. in the inability to profit fully from the lands now within its jurisdiction). But perhaps above all, the growth in prosperity was concentrated in the hands of a small section of the population.

The solution to the problem of outdated institutions was the development of a political system which favoured, instead of the potentially unruly character of communal assemblies or to the influence of interest groups outside of the constitution (i.e. the craft guilds), administrative mechanisms characterized by delegation and representation, and the acquisition of greater police powers to control dissent. The political representatives were almost inevitably drawn from the wealthier townsmen, a group which, as time went on, became increasingly differentiated along class lines from the rest of the townsmen. This separation and sense of social and economic superiority was likely furthered by the effects of the Black Death and the Peasants' Revolt, and the ruling class came to desire a corresponding political superiority which ran counter to the original concept of the burgesses as a community of equals.

While alterations in the political theory underlying borough government might not have greatly bothered the majority of the burgesses, they were concerned about the conduct of their rulers; whether the charges of abuses of power, made periodically through the fourteenth century, had foundation is less important than the fact that such abuses were believed to take place. Popular discontent found a means of organized resistance through the craft guilds. But a period of struggle over the constitution ended only in a compromise; which itself was undermined by incorporation, increasing the powers of the city rulers and limiting democratic expression to representative institutions (which themselves became not much more than an extension of the ruling class), and by the impact of "bastard feudalism", infecting the community with internal faction and interference from outside interests. The resolution to these problems pushed the city further away from its essentially democratic roots and towards the oligarchic form of government that characterized the post-medieval city.

previous

main menu

next

History of medieval Norwich

[MAIN MENU]

Origins of settlement | The pre-Conquest borough | Effects of the Conquest
Evolution of a self-governing community | Power struggles with rivals
A division of interests | Summary/Recap | INFORMATION SOURCES
Map of Anglo-Saxon Norwich | Map of Norwich ca.1260
Appendix 1: Calendar of customs of Norwich

Information sources

The following is a small selection of published sources of information about medieval Norwich. For additional secondary sources as well as primary sources, see the bibliography to The Men Behind the Masque.

Blomefield, Francis. An essay towards a topographical history of the county of Norfolk, vols. 3 and 4. London, 1806.

Campbell, James. Norwich. Historic Towns Trust, 1975.

Carter, A., J.P. Roberts and H. Sutermeister. "Excavations in Norwich - 1973." Norfolk Archaeology, vol.26 (1974), 38-71.

Green, Barbara and Rachael Young. Norwich: the growth of a city. Norfolk Museums Service, 1975.

Hudson, William, and J.C. Tingey, eds. The Records of the City of Norwich. 2 vols. Norwich, 1906-10.

Hannah, Ian C. The Heart of East Anglia: the Story of Norwich from Earliest to Latest

Times. London, ca. 1913.

Kirkpatrick, John. The Streets and Lanes of the City of Norwich. Ed. W. Hudson. Norwich, 1889.

Lipman, V.D. The Jews of Medieval Norwich. London, 1967.

McRee, Ben. "Religious Guilds and Civic Order: The Case of Norwich in the Late Middle Ages." Speculum, vol.67 (1992), 69-97.

Tingey, John Cottingham. "The Grants of Murage to Norwich, Yarmouth and Lynn," Norfolk Archaeology, vol.18 (1914), 129-48.

previous

main menu

Appendix

History of medieval Norwich

Sketch-map of Anglo-Saxon Norwich

This is a clickable imagemap.

KEY TO CHURCHES:

T.R.E. – in the time of Edward the Confessor

T.R.W. – in the time of William the Conqueror

1. St. Olave. No. 21 is the same dedication, which is to a Scandinavian king martyred in 1030; this fact, and the extreme positions of the two churches suggest their foundation was part of the borough expansion close to the Conquest.
2. St. Sepulchre. Although it has been claimed that this dedication is post-Conquest, Domesday mentions the church T.R.W. but in a fashion as to imply its existence T.R.E. There is structural evidence for a pre-1100 origin, and finds of Late Saxon pottery are associated with the site. Its position with regard to Berstrete (most churches gathered around Southgate) makes it doubtful whether it existed at the time of the creation of the burh.
3. St. Edward. The dedication is most probably to the king murdered in 978, who had become considered a martyr by the end of the century. This and the church's position suggest it the product of late expansion.
4. St. Etheldreda. The dedication, to an East Anglian queen who became a nun c.679, together with pottery found in the area indicate an early settlement here, perhaps 8th century.
5. St. Clement. Generally accepted as pre-Conquest on the grounds of its dedication (to the pope-martyr c.100), although this seems a weak argument. However, its position on the principal road through Conesford bolsters the possibility, and late Saxon pottery has been found near the site.
6. St. Julian. Again, the dedication is usually cited as proof, although it is uncertain whether the 3rd century figure or the 9th century St. Julian Hospitaller is intended. Late Saxon pottery has been found in the vicinity. The round tower could be Saxon, although it might equally be Norman (as is that of St. Benedict's).

7. St. Vedast. The dedication places a lower limit of 539. The presence of a pre-Conquest carved stone, late Saxon pottery and metalwork finds, point to a pre-1066 origin.
8. St. Mary in the Marsh. The name indicates an origin in a time when the site was still marshy (although this does not necessarily exclude the post-Conquest period). The church may very well be that mentioned in the will of Sifflaed (c.990/1066). Dugdale's Monasticon claims a pre-Conquest origin for the church.
9. St. Ethelbert. The dedication, to the East Anglian king executed by Offa in 794, suggests an origin prior to the Danish settlement. Late Saxon pottery has been found in the vicinity of St. Ethelbert and St. Mary.
10. St. Michael. Mentioned in Domesday for T.R.E. An important church, in that it held much land and was sited on Tombland. Its successor's qualifier "de Motestow" links the dedication with the site of early government of the community, the folk moot, for which Tombland was a logical meeting-place. There may be significance in the church having being held by Stigand, former bishop of East Anglia. It is not implausible that the original St. Michael may also have been known as de Motestow.
11. Church of the Holy Trinity. This was demolished at the building of the cathedral, which took over the dedication. Its site was once thought to lie under the east end of the cathedral, but are now associated with remains east of the bishop's palace. It is mentioned in Domesday T.R.E., and may have been the Christ Church mentioned in Sifflaed's will. Its position on Holmstrete suggests antiquity and importance.
12. St. Martin at Palace. Mentioned in Domesday, T.R.E. Saxon finds in the vicinity from all periods. "At Palace", however, surely refers to the bishop's palace, not that posited for the pre-Conquest earl.
13. St. Simon and St. Jude. Mentioned in Domesday, T.R.E., when held by the bishop.
14. St. Andrew. Little is heard of this church. Its position would suggest an early origin, and (not surprisingly) late Saxon pottery has been found in that vicinity. Dedications to this saint were popular in the Anglo-Saxon period (e.g. Rochester cathedral, Hexham abbey).
15. St. John de Maddermarket. The date of origin of this church is uncertain. Hudson thought it an Anglo-Saxon foundation, but probably on the basis of Francis Blomefield's unlikely identification of it with Domesday's church of the Holy Trinity. However, its position again persuades me to a tentative inclusion on this map. Madder was a source of dye, so the maddermarket was the dyers market.
16. St. Gregory. There is structural evidence for an Anglo-Saxon origin, and Late Saxon pottery has been found in the area. Archaeologist Alan Carter suspected it to have been the focus of a Middle Saxon settlement.

17. St. Lawrence. Mentioned in Domesday, T.R.E., but does not appear to have been built by c.1035/1038, when its site is mentioned in the will of Bishop Aelfric.
18. St. Swithun. The dedication, to a missionary (later bishop) associated with Winchester, sets a lower limit of 863. Its position, within an area of Middle and Late Saxon finds, and lying just within an early boundary formed by a stream, suggests a possible late ninth or early tenth century foundation.
19. St. Martin at Oak. An early origin is indicated by its position just inside the burh ditch (as if the ditch's path was dictated by the need to include the church in its protection) and by Late Saxon pottery finds nearby. Carter considered it the likely focus of Coslanye, following the transferral of the settlement southwards from the Eade Road cemetery.
20. St. Mary Coslany. There is structural evidence for a pre-1100 date, and it has been generally held that the tower is Anglo-Saxon (although not all agree).
21. St. Olave. See no.1.
22. St. Botolph. The dedication, a popular one in East Anglia, is to an abbot who introduced the Benedictine Rule into the area, c.700. This dedication was frequently given to churches standing at settlement entrances. Unlike its neighbour, St. Olave's, it was included within the area encompassed by the burh ditch.
23. All Saints. The dedication is to a festival which had its origins in 731. A church of this name is mentioned in Domesday in a way that implies pre-Conquest existence. Of the two medieval churches of that name, the position of this one, on Fybriggate/Cowgate and within the burh, suggest it as that of Domesday.
24. St. Clement. An early origin is suggested by the typically Anglo-Saxon dedication and the location of the church.
25. St. Edmund. The dedication is to the East Anglian king executed by the Danes in 870. Domesday mentions the church T.R.E.
26. (not shown on map) The foundations of a church of unknown dedication were discovered in 1979 on the site that was cleared to make way for the Norman castle; a large Anglo-Saxon cemetery was excavated nearby.

The Earl's Palace

The earliest reference to this that I have come across is a city document relating to the foundation of the cathedral, but itself dating no later than 1297. Even this refers to it as the palace of Roger Bigot, earl at the time of the cathedral foundation, and gives only an approximate location on Tombland. The cathedral register itself makes no reference to a palace in its account of its foundation. However, there was evidently a local tradition to this effect, accepted by Norwich historians such as Blomefield and Hudson. It is not implausible that the ealdorman/earl of Anglo-Saxon times had a residence in the chief town of East Anglia; Tombland would be the logical spot for such.

St. Benedict's Gates

An area on either side of which was the later site of St. Benedict's Gates, perhaps extending north to the later Heigham Gate (a lesser gate, near the south bank of the river), appears to have been one of the earliest foci of settlement, preceding Westwyk; archaeology has found here locally-made Ipswich ware and imported pottery dating from the 9th century. Perhaps this was the precursor from which Westwyk developed after an influx of Danish settlers on the eastern side (i. e. in the gap between the St. Benedict's Gates settlement and Conesford).

Merholt

The name means "boundary wood" or possibly "wood by the marsh". Hudson thought this referred to the point to which marshland extended in early Saxon times, but it may possibly relate to the extent of the settlement north of the river, as later defined by the burh fortification. Alternatively it might be a reference to the extent of the hundred of Taverham.

Great Cockey

The word "cockey" is of Saxon derivation, meaning simply a watercourse. Some were later called "fleets". The Great Cockey was the largest of these various streams (only a few of which are shown on my map), penetrating farther into the city than the others, and is frequently mentioned as a boundary in property deeds. For much of the Saxon period it was probably fairly wide and marshy, perhaps acting as a separator between Westwyk and Conesford.

Tombland

As the meeting-point of two major roads, the possible meeting-place (folk moot) of the community, with at least one important church (St. Michael de Motestow) and the (hypothetical) "Earl's palace" on its outskirts, Tombland is generally assumed to have been the centre of the Anglo-Saxon town and – given that the land remained largely unbuilt on – perhaps the marketplace. Possibly part of the land may have had an association with St. Michael, although "tomb" does not refer to a burial-ground but means "vacant". However, Tombland was not the property of the community but of one of the town's lords; and it was the earl who gave it to the Bishop to expand the developing cathedral-priory precinct. The Bishop pulled down church and palace; and the monks thereafter claimed rights on Tombland which became a source of dispute between them and the citizens.

Holmstrete

The "street" termination suggests an early and possibly Roman origin, by contrast with the "gate" termination which was Danish. The name refers to the Cowholm – the riverside meadow used as pasturage – through which the road ran to reach a ford across the river (later the site of Bishop's Bridge). The section immediately east of Tombland was supplanted by the cathedral precinct, and the road diverted north of that; the section further east, however, retained the name Holmstrete during part of the Middle Ages. Despite the diversion, Holmstrete continued to serve as the main route out of the city towards more easterly regions.

Berstrete

The "street" termination suggests an early and possibly Roman origin, by contrast with the "gate" termination which was Danish. That this road was atop a ridge equally suggests its origin at a time when lower ground, to the east, was marshy and impassable. The northern end was subsequently covered by the Norman castle fee; in the late 18th century, workmen sinking a well in the castle grounds were said to have come across the site of this part of the road. This was primarily a road into the city; the lack of early churches along its route suggests it was not heavily settled in Saxon times.

Southgate

The southern stretch of what was known as Conesford Street, or Upper Conesford Street, for much of the post-Conquest period was also called Southgate (while the northern stretch had the alias of Parmentergate). Settlement in the late Saxon period lay along Conesford Street and between Southgate and Berstrete. Southgate probably represents an area of riverfront settlement providing quayage for boats without them having to travel further upriver to Fybridge. It has been debated how heavily this southern part of the city was occupied before the Conquest. However, the fact that the new Norman settlement was located west of the castle, rather than south of it along the riverside, may itself indicate there was insufficient unoccupied land along Southgate.

Sandgate/Skeythgate/Holgate

These secondary roads evidence a spread of population between Southgate and Berstrete. Bearing in mind that this was a steep slope, down which rainwater would have rushed, the antiquarian Kirkpatrick interpreted "Holgate" as meaning a hollow route created by erosion from rainwater. This is supported by the fact that Skeythgate was on occasion referred to as a cava via ("hollowed-out route"); its name may derive from a Saxon term referring to a steep descent.

St. Faith's Lane

The road leading to St. Vedast's (gradually corrupted into St. Faith's) was also known as Lower Conesford Street.

Pottergate

Likely represents a line of later expansion of settlement upslope from the main road (to its north) running through Westwyk, perhaps not occurring until the end of the Saxon period. Westwyk Street's early origin is itself indicated by the clustering of churches; the western end of the street later split (see map for ca.1260), as land was reclaimed from the marsh, with a fork (Lower Westwyk) running close to the river's edge. The name Pottergate reflects the early industry of pottery-making that archaeology has evidenced in Westwyk. However, the earliest pottery remains found there are from the late Saxon period. The road probably stretched west only as far as a cockey (a source of water being important to potters); when the city wall was built, no gate was created for Pottergate, so it may still not have extended as far as the wall then.

Hosyergate

This road represents an even later phase of expansion, as settlement continued to spread south. It likely pre-dated the introduction of the castle (the later line of the road being clearly diverted around the fee) and Mancroft, where archaeology has recently shown that Norman settlement was preceded by Late Saxon – and just possibly Norse – settlement; after the foundation of Mancroft, the western part of the road was known as Lower Newport, while the section between Mancroft and the castle was called Hosyergate. Based on the line of Lower Newport, it seems that Hosyergate would not have extended as far as the line of the later city walls, but only as far as one of the cockeys, which perhaps represented an earlier boundary line. After that cockey, Lower Newport diverts south to meet Upper Newport, the road on the southern boundary of Mancroft, which is unlikely to have existed until after Mancroft was created. The introduction of Mancroft and the castle having significantly disrupted the topography of the Anglo-Saxon town, the application of Hosyergate to the entire stretch of this east-west route is only hypothesis, based on the "gate" termination suggesting some antiquity (in contrast to other names assigned to portions of the street in the later Middle Ages, which are all clearly post-Conquest).

Fybriggate

The fact that this road alone incorporates "bridge" (other than the later connecting road of Neubriggate, running over what was evidently an additional, or "new", bridge), indicates that the Fye Bridge was the first to be built across the Norwich stretch of the Wensum. Whether the bridge existed pre-Conquest or was simply preceded by a ford or causeway, is less easy to say.

Snailgate/Cowgate

The line of the burh defences, suggested by archaeological evidence, along with the "gate" termination, argues for the existence of these roads in the late Saxon period. It was common for there to be access routes around the inner edge of the defensive perimeter of the burh. Archaeological evidence for a cluster of habitation around the southern end of Cowgate and St. Edmund's and around St. Martin's in north-east Conesford argue for a linkage via a second river crossing on the future site of Whitefriars Bridge (and again, the line of the burh defences encourages the notion of protecting two river crossings).

Fishergate/Colegate

The "gate" termination betokens a pre-Conquest date (although we cannot rule out the possibility of the Danish naming protocol having survived the Conquest for a period). The two roads represent riverside settlement. However, they did not quite meet up, St. Clement's and its surrounding land interposing between them. They cannot be seen as a single development, but two areas of separate development, each joining up with Fybriggate. It would be reasonable to associate the name Fishergate with the quayside where fishing-boats would have docked; a logical place for the fishermen to live. This was probably one of the more built-up residential streets north of the river. One possible derivation of the name Colgate is from an Anglo-Saxon term for lake (see below re. Muspolgate).

Muspolgate

Named after the Muspol, a small lake fed by a cockey. Hudson suspected that at an early time the north-south route at the western edge of Coslanye (itself named Coslanye Street) may have met up with Colgate only via Muspolgate, because of the extreme marshiness of the ground in the bend of the river, of which Muspol represented a shrunken survival. I do not myself subscribe to this theory; it would have been more logical for the line of Muspolgate to have continued east or south-east to Snailgate rather than swing directly south again. Muspolgate has more the appearance, from later topography, of a secondary route from the rear of St. Mary's; its junction with Colegate was later diverted when St. George's church was built there.

Origins of settlement | The pre-Conquest borough | Effects of the Conquest

Evolution of a self-governing community | Power struggles with rivals

A division of interests | Summary/Recap

MAP OF ANGLO-SAXON NORWICH | Map of Norwich ca.1260

Appendix 1: Calendar of customs of Norwich

[\[MAIN MENU\]](#)

Created: December 3, 1998. Last update: December 24, 2000

© Stephen Alsford, 1998-2003

History of medieval Norwich

Sketch-map of medieval Norwich, ca.1260

This is a clickable imagemap.

NOTES:

DITCH / BANK

It has been hypothesized from the name of one of the principal roads through Conesford, Berstrete, together with the deviation in the curve of the town wall at the southern end of the city (suggestive of a direction northwards up Berstrete, rather than the actual more westerly curve taken by the main part of the wall), that a burh defence may have at one time existed along the line of this route to protect the south-western side of Conesford. Archaeology has not substantiated this (in contrast to evidence of a ditch in the northwestern sector of the Anglo-Saxon settlement), and it seems unlikely that burh fortifications would have extended so far south beyond the main concentrations of settlement, but the theory remains.

As one of the most important, populous and prosperous towns of the kingdom, it was caught up in national conflicts and was used as a base, or targeted for attack, by rebels on several occasions between the Conquest and the baronial revolt of mid-13th century. The civil war between Stephen and Matilda had prompted the townspeople to devote effort to ditch-digging in the (formerly unprotected?) area of Westwick, although such efforts were also motivated by the desire to define boundaries. The assault by Flemings in 1174 apparently went undefended and the city was sacked. Each generation must have had occasion to perceive the vulnerability of the place. A city ditch is again heard of in 1235.

The ditch-bank dug in 1252/53 may have been an extension of existing defenses or may have followed a new line (in either case, it is generally assumed to have been that later taken by the stone walls), enclosing a large area of about a square mile, and serviced by 9 gates (see below) with wooden gatehouses. As complaints by the surrounding countryside and by the monks attest, the line of the new ditch encompassed lands that were sparsely settled or simply fields (e.g. Gildencroft, Normannesland, Great Newgate) – these might have been considered "suburbs" (and parish churches of late Saxon or early Norman period are associated with those to the north of the burh-ditch line) but the complaints suggest that some were strictly speaking outside of the jurisdiction of Norwich proper. However, since the monks were defending their own jurisdictional claims, their complaints cannot entirely be trusted. The new defensive line bulged out well beyond the lines (actual or hypothetical) of any Anglo-Saxon burh defense, to incorporate areas not then protected and those of 11th century expansion – notably Westwyk and Mancroft (now the urban centre) – as well as unsettled lands, some of which may however have once been borough fields subsequently lost to encroachments following the Conquest. Although the course of the ditch was dictated in part by the desire for a line that did not undulate in a way that would have created defensive problems, it also represented an assertion – if not a re-assertion – of territorial claims.

INDEPENDENT JURISDICTIONS:

- A The Cathedral-priory precinct. The site acquired by Bishop Losinga was unusually large; he envisaged not only a cathedral but also a priory for 60 Benedictine monks and an episcopal palace. The eastern section of the site was meadow, but western parts were previously built on and two churches had to be demolished; according to the complaint about the 1253 ditch, the meadowland – known as Cowholm – and the land on which St. Michael's had stood were not part of the hundred of Norwich). The Prior's Fee included not only the close proper (east of Tombland and south of Holmestrete) but also Tombland itself and the settled area along Holmestrete, as well as Normannesland and Great Newgate (see below); the townspeople in these areas fell under a jurisdiction separate from that of the city.
- B The Great Hospital. In 1249, Bishop Suffield founded the Hospital of St. Giles to take care of priests who were too poor (i.e. lacking a living) or too ill to work; 30 beds were provided for the sick and infirm, while provision was made for feeding other of the poor there daily. The hospital was endowed with meadow-land stretching eastwards to the river. Over time it gradually strayed from its mandate and became a desirable retirement home for wealthy citizens.
- C The Castle Fee. The size of the fee can be imagined from the fact that 98 burgesses lost their homes when the earthworks were constructed. Even though it is only the keep and the mound raised beneath it which now survive, they are still imposing. The extensive fortification, which was the single royal castle in Norfolk and Suffolk, must have had a daunting effect on any remaining Anglo-Saxon ambitions for independence. When the city took over the Fee in 1345, the keep and its mound were excluded.
- D The Shirehouse. The location where the county court was held, presided over by the sheriff. Consequently, this remained outside city jurisdiction even after acquisition of the surrounding Fee (1345).

- E Normannesland. An area of land here was part of the Prior's Fee and came to be known as Spitelond. According to the complainants made about the 1253 ditch, this area was never actually part of the hundred of Norwich. At the time that a hospital dedicated to St. Paul (although often known as Normanspitel) was founded thereon, in the first half of the 12th century, new endowments extended the area northwards, new settlers were found, and a new parish church (with the same dedication) provided for them. The hospital served poor invalids.
- F Great Newgate. This was mainly agricultural land, and was earlier known as Thedwardscroft. The name "Newgate" was inherited from the street on which it subsequently lay, which must at some point (probably in the 11th century) have been a new offshoot from Nedham Street. From ca.1100 it was part of the Prior's Fee, remaining agricultural in character but possibly with some minor settlement of townsmen thereon prior to 1253. After lengthy disputes between city and priory as to ownership, the king took it away from the Prior (1291) and handed it over to the city (1305); this decision may have been motivated more by a consequent increase to the fee farm than to clear evidence of ownership.
- H Little Newgate. Fields held by Carrow Abbey, but possibly with some minor settlement thereon prior to 1253 (when the area was named among others in the complaint about the ditch). The Abbey held leet court for its tenants there, but surrendered its jurisdiction to the city in 1290. The name was inherited from the area being adjacent to the lower (and lesser) part of the street known as Newgate.

Pockthorpe

The manor of Pockthorpe was part of the Prior's Fee and extended along the northern bank of the river to where it turned south. It served as a home farm for the cathedral-priory. After having been truncated by the line of the 1253 ditch, the area within the ditch was within a century, acquired by the Carmelites for their friary.

Carrow

Carrow Abbey was founded in 1146, by grant of the king to some Benedictine nuns, to the south of the (future) walled area, but on lands that had earlier served as townsmen's fields, thus setting the scene for future jurisdictional disputes. One such was the nunnery's claim to have the right to collect a toll on corn sold in the city during the time of the Carrow Fair; this too was relinquished in the settlement of 1290, with the city authorities promising in return not to obstruct the holding of the fair.

Chapel in the Fields

This chapel occupied quite a large site (described as a croft) by mid-13th century. It originally included a hospital, but shortly before the 1253 ditch was dug, was converted to the collegiate church of St. Mary's, housing a community of priests. In the 14th century, before the large Guildhall superseded the small Tolbooth, this chapel was occasionally used for major civic assemblies.

CITY GATES:

- G1 Conesford (later King Street) Gate. This was the first gate to receive a mention, in 1186.
- G2 Berstrete Gate
- G3 Swinemarket Gate (later the Brazen Doors). This was an entrance/exit of lesser importance; when the wall was built it was provided only with a postern gate here.
- G4 Nedham (later St. Stephen's) Gate. This was the major entrance to the city from the south. A leper house was later established a short distance beyond this gate.
- G5 Newport (later St. Giles) Gate. Named for the street which led here through the novus portus (new borough) founded for French settlers. A leper house was later (ca.1343) established immediately outside this gate.
- G6 Westwyk (later St. Benedict's) Gate. A leper house was later established immediately outside this gate.
- G7 Coselanye (later St. Martin's) Gate
- G8 St. Augustine's Gate. A leper house was later established a few hundred yards beyond the gate.
- G9 Fybriggate (later Magdalen) Gate. A leper house was later established immediately outside this gate.
- G10 Barregates (later Pockthorpe Gate).

OTHER FEATURES:

- I Bishop's Bridge. It does not seem that a gate was erected to protect this entrance into the city until the 1330s, and then as part of citizen Richard Spynk's contribution towards the development of defences, even though jurisdiction over the bridge was a bone of contention between city and priory.
- J Gosehill. An area of unsettled land belonging, according to the complaints about the 1253 ditch, to Carrow Abbey and not part of Norwich hundred – although the presence of Conesford gate there earlier suggests the townsmen considered the area part of Norwich. The area was later renamed after an owner John le Boteler, the name becoming Butler Hills and later corrupted to Butter Hills.
- K Gildencroft. A large area of open (and presumably partly agricultural) land to the north of Coslanye and outside the burh boundaries. At the time of the complaints about the 1253 ditch, when referred to as the croft of St. Augustine (being adjacent to that churchyard), it was in use for meetings of the court of an external jurisdiction (either Tokethorpe manor or Taverham hundred). It later was held by the Great Hospital. A large part remained undeveloped long after the medieval period.
- L The Tolbooth (later called the Tolhouse). This original base for city self-government was likely on the site where the 15th century Guildhall was later built, on a scale unequalled in medieval England outside of London. The Tolbooth was of a much more modest size. As the name suggests, it was likely the point of collection of market tolls, as well as serving as courthouse and gaol.
- M Marketplace. This market was doubtless a feature of the Newport (later Manecroft) from the foundation of that settlement, and probably part of the rationale for the foundation, although the Newport also made provision not only for the housing of Norman merchants in Norwich but also that of Norman barons and soldiers. By mid-13th century this was the central marketplace for the retail of provisions; there were numerous secondary, specialized markets elsewhere in the city.
- N Hildebrond's Hospital. Founded in the early 14th century by Hildebrond le Mercer and dedicated to the Virgin Mary, it served as a hospice for poor travellers and vagrants.

Jewry

At its peak, in the second half of the 12th century, the Jewish community in Norwich was the second wealthiest (after that of London) in England; it declined in size during the 13th century. Most Jews in Norwich lived close together, within the shadow of the royal castle, although this was not mandatory – for instance, the wealthiest, Jurnet, had a stone house in Conesford Street (perhaps for the easy access to the river).

SUB-LEETS:

The principal administrative divisions of the city – the leets – reflected development of settlement in the area: the settlement most distant in time and of far lesser significance by the thirteenth century, now was remembered only as that "on the other side of the river"; on the other hand, the name of the focus of Anglo-Saxon settlement, Conesford, survived despite its dismemberment with the superimposition of castle and cathedral fees over land formerly housing townsmen; the secondary settlement Westwyk also survived in name, although during the thirteenth century the name was superseded by "Wymer" (a townsman of this name being mentioned in the Domesday account of Norwich); and the Norman foundation known apparently at first as the Newport, but later as Manecroft (a name whose precise meaning is disputed but at least reflects that the settlement was established on formerly agricultural land, just beyond the edge of the Anglo-Saxon settled area – and possibly therefore borough fields, so that the name may reflect Anglo-Saxon resentment at their loss to Norman newcomers).

By contrast, there is no apparent topographical logic to the sub-divisions which are first documented in the thirteenth century, not even in terms of the number of parishes each comprised, since this varied considerably. Hudson, who considered the matter in some depth, concluded that the boundaries of the sub-leets were dictated by the need to ensure that each contained at least 12 tithings, so that each would be represented by the jury of 12 Capital Pledges required by law to make presentments in the leet court. Adjustments in the number and size of the sub-leets were made occasionally in the Late Middle Ages, presumably prompted by shifts in population.

By the last quarter of the 14th century, the sub-divisions were being treated as leets in their own right, seemingly superseding the earlier, larger divisions. Those four divisions persisted, however, for serving an administrative purpose in the 15th century electoral system, under the name of "great wards", each later subdivided into 3 aldermanries which were very similar in extent to the original sub-leets.

- 1 Southern Conesford. At least following the disruptions resulting from the Conquest, there was little commercial or industrial activity in this part of the city, although some of the wealthier citizens lived there or in Northern Conesford, and a number of private quays were located on the riverside here.
- 2 Northern Conesford. The two Conesford sub-leets were amalgamated by mid-14th century, likely the result of reduced population (and therefore the number of tithings) in the area, as large areas of land were acquired by the Augustinians and Franciscans for their friary precincts.

- 3 Berstrete. Named after the Anglo-Saxon road which was the sub-leet's backbone and which ran along a ridge above the slope down to the river (on the western side of the ridge lay a natural valley through which ran the Great Cockey).
- 4 St. Stephen.
- 5 St. Peter de Manecroft. The most populous parish in the city, as might be expected of the parish encompassing the marketplace. The location of the parish church is marked on the map with a red cross. The original church belonged to the earl who was (with the king) co-founder of the Newport, although the present structure was a rebuilding of the second quarter of the 15th century. The prosperity and grand proportions of the church reflect that its parishioners included many of Norwich's richest merchants.
- 6 Referred to by the collective names of its parishes: St. Giles, St. Margaret, St. Swithun, and St. Benedict. By late 14th century, this division had become known by the principal parish of the district, St. Giles.
- 7 Referred to by the collective names of its parishes: St. Lawrence and St. Gregory. By late 14th century, this division had become known by just the name of one of the parishes, St. Gregory.
- 8 Referred to by the collective names of its parishes: St. John de Maddermarket, Holy Cross, St. Andrew, St. Michael de Motestow, and St. Peter. By late 14th century, this division had become known by the name only of St. Andrew.
- 9 Referred to by the collective names of its parishes: SS. Simon and Jude, St. George before the Gates of the Holy Trinity, and St. Martin before the Gates of the Bishop. By late 14th century, this division had become known by the principal parish of the district, St. George. The boundaries of the Wymer sub-leets were around this time adjusted to reduce to number to three.
- 10 Referred to by the collective names of its parishes: St. Michael de Coselanye, St. George, St. Mary, and St. Martin. By late 14th century, this division had become known by the name only of St. Michael.
- 11 Referred to by the collective names of its parishes: St. Olave, St. Botulph, St. Clement, St. Mary Combust (a term apparently reflecting that the parish had been devastated by fire at some earlier period), St. Saviour, All Saints, St. James, St. Edmund the King, and St. Margaret Combust. By late 14th century, this division had become known by the name only of St. Clement, perhaps the principal parish of the district. The boundaries of the two Ultra Aquam sub-leets were adjusted in the late 14th century to make three subdivisions.

Origins of settlement | The pre-Conquest borough | Effects of the Conquest
Evolution of a self-governing community | Power struggles with rivals
A division of interests | Summary/Recap
Map of Anglo-Saxon Norwich | MAP OF NORWICH ca.1260
Appendix 1: Calendar of customs of Norwich

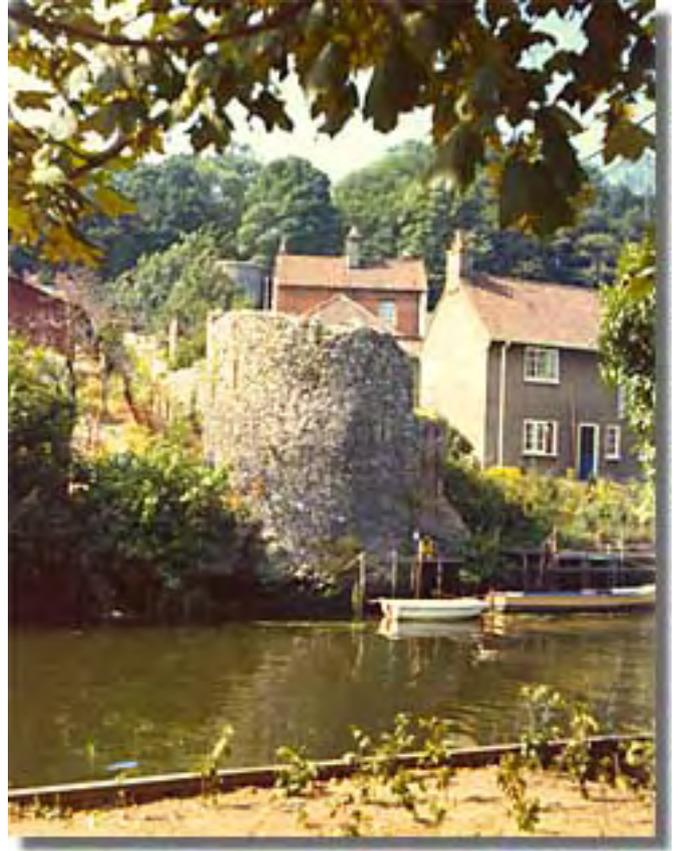

[MAIN MENU]

Created: December 28, 1998. Last update: July 1, 1999

© Stephen Alsford, 1998-2003

Norwich - River Wensum

It is no coincidence that the development of numerous medieval towns owes much to their location at the intersection of land routes and navigable waterways. While the Romans (no lovers of maritime travel) favoured roads, in the Early Middle Ages there was a shift in preference towards water-based routes, which affected settlement patterns and established the roots of many future towns. Whether a town prospered and grew, or stagnated, depended in part upon its ability to compete with other regional settlements as a market centre; the better its connections to other trading centres in other parts of the country or overseas, the more likely it was to flourish. Mobility was important to the medieval merchant. Matthew Paris' map of Britain (mid-13th century) showed the principal rivers as abnormally prominent features, and most of the towns or castles on the map were located either on the coast or on one or other of the rivers; the importance of rivers continued to be highlighted on later maps, including the Gough map of mid-14th century. This importance was due not only to their transportation role, but to roles as sources of fresh water (despite their opposing role as sewers) and sources of power for mills.

The River Wensum flowed in one direction into the Yare, which in turn provided quick access to the sea and thereby to coastal trade (and other rivers flowing into northern Norfolk and Suffolk), to foreign ports, and to the fishing-grounds of the North Sea. It nourished not only commerce but also excellent meadow-lands for grazing livestock, while it and the streams that ran off it fed corn-fields and served the development of local industries such as (at different periods) the manufacture of pottery and the finishing of cloth.

In addition the river provided an obstacle to hostile forces, making it unnecessary to extend city walls along the southeastern stretch of the city, where the Wensum acted as the boundary. On the other hand, for boats the river provided an easy access through the defensive lines – too easy. Consequently, where the river entered the city from the south, the local authorities built, where the city walls terminated a tower on each bank of the river (that on the west is shown here); between these were hung "two great chains of good Spanish iron across the river with the machines wound by a windlas in the tower on the west so that no ship nor barge nor boat might come in or depart without leave, nor against the will of those who have to govern the city." [Hudson and Tingey, The Records of the City of Norwich, Norwich: Jarrold, 1910, vol.2, p.218] York was using chains for a similar purpose on the Ouse in 1380.

main menu

Medieval English Towns - Glossary

[MAIN MENU]

abatement

Sometimes called "fresh abatement", or in some towns "fresh force", this was a crime of recent unlawful intrusion (sometimes by force – in which case the term hamsoken, or housebreaking, is applied) into a property in order to gain physical possession thereof; this sort of thing might occur, for example, when the owner died and there was a dispute over who inherited. The assize of abatement was a legal action to recover possession; it was the borough equivalent of novel disseisin, although its emphasis was on quick remedy (no essoins were allowed). Consequently the concern of the court was less with who had rightful title to a property than with whether an occupant had been dispossessed; thus the rightful owner, if seizing a property from its tenant for (for example) non-payment of rent, without going through due process of law (initiated by writ), could be obliged to restore the property to the tenant. The object was to restore the status quo and thereby oblige a claimant to seek his rights through the courts, which involved obtaining a writ from the king.

aids

SEE taxation

alderman

The Anglo-Saxon ealdorman (meaning "chief man") was an officer of the king who was essentially leader of a shire, which included the presidency of the shire court; as they became more powerful and transformed into earls, the shire-reeve took their place at head of a shire. The name survived for two types of town official, of far lesser status yet important locally. One type was the executive officer of a gild, notably a Merchant Gild. The earliest expression of organized association (as opposed to the folkmoot an unwieldy institution because insufficiently organized) among townsmen may have been, in not a few cases, a Merchant Gild. In some towns (e.g. Lynn, Leicester) the gild alderman seems to have been the community leader in the establishment of initial self-government and later surrendered place to a mayoralty perhaps considered more representative of all segments of the community. Similarly, the alderman's assistants the scabins foreshadowed borough chamberlains, although their (continental) origins had them as the equivalent of jurats. The second use of the title was for the members of the town council. This use is not common until the fifteenth century, when the conciliar structure was becoming two-tiered as class differentiation necessitated separate representation; "aldermen" referred to the members of the upper council, more influential. The choice of name may have been the influence of London, where the aldermen were ancient and had roles not dissimilar to the "lawmen" (associated with boroughs which developed under Danish influence) who, in groups usually of 12, formulated judgements; certainly each alderman exercised authority over one of the London wards and jointly the aldermen were the city's council. It may have been at London that the term "ealdorman" was extended from heads of shires to heads of boroughs.

alien

SEE foreigner

amercement

The term refers to a financial penalty imposed by judicial authorities on guilty parties (both parties guilty of a crime of which accused, or guilty of making a charge found by the court to be groundless). It means to be "subject to the mercy of" a judgemental power, although "mercy" itself derives from a Latin term used for a punitive compensation; a party found guilty of anything was said to be "in mercy" – that is, subjectible to a penalty to be judged by the court. Amercement was the common punishment for most crimes of lesser gravity, since there was no extensive prison system in the Middle Ages. Today we would use the term "fine", but in medieval England this had a slightly different application, being a sum of money paid voluntarily (although still with a compensatory connotation, and usually after some kind of formal legal or quasi-legal proceeding) to some other individual – often the king – in return for the grant of some right (e.g. freeman's status), benefit, or property.

assize

Assize was a term for a type of legal procedure; it came to be applied in a general sense to a session of a court applying such procedures, and gradually came to be used more specifically (but variously) for the jury, the judges or the enactments of the court. Grand and Petty Assizes were invoked for actions concerning real estate; although essentially civil actions and thus potentially within the jurisdiction of borough courts, there could be a criminal element where dispossession had occurred, resulting in a breach of the peace – a plaintiff could initiate an action in such cases by obtaining a writ of novel disseisin, whose equivalent in the boroughs was called "fresh force". A slightly different, but related, use of the term was for assizes of bread, wine and ale and assizes of weights and measures. These were concerned with the regulation of retailing practices, through the assessment of prices and quality, and the examination and enforcement of standards (including prices). They were thus of a quasi-judicial character. In towns, existing officers and/or individuals specifically appointed to the task would be charged with keeping the assizes (i.e. surveying business practices, testing measures used to dispense food or drink); dealing with offences against the assizes was often amalgamated with leet proceedings.

For further background information see:

- Medieval Sourcebook: The Assizes of Bread, Beer, & Lucrum Pistoris
- Medieval Sourcebook: Judicium Pillorie \(The Judgment of the Pillory\)

attachment

SEE distrain

bailiff

The landlord of a franchise (be it manor or town) did not get involved in the daily administration of his property and its inhabitants; he appointed officials to undertake duties such as collection of gable rents or the supervision of services due him from his tenants. He might select one from his tenants to exercise the office of reeve (from the Anglo-Saxon gerefa); the medieval sheriff was simply the king's shire-reeve. Or he might employ a man to act as the bailiff of his estates. The first administrative officers we find in English towns are reeves: in Anglo-Saxon times there are passing mentions of portgerefa and wicgerefa. In the first centuries after the Conquest they are usually referred to by their Latin name of prepositus (provost) meaning "leading man"; they too were appointees of the lord of the borough, but presided over (although did not directly control) the folk moot. After self-government was acquired, the term ballivus (implying jurisdiction over a certain area – bailiwick) gradually came to be preferred in towns, although it is not clear whether there is any real significance to the change. In most towns one or more bailiffs acted as the executive officer, presiding over local courts, at first, and only later were they superseded by mayors.

borough

Derives from the Old English term burh, which was originally applied to any fortified place, such as a thegn's house or a hilltop – not necessarily a populated place. During the wars between Anglo-Saxons and Danes it was particularly applied to centres of population which were protected with defensive earthworks; such of those centres which continued to flourish in later times came to be boroughs. The term burgus often appears to be used in a technical sense, as distinct from "town" (villata), such as in the 1200 proceedings at Ipswich, usually relating to the town as a legal/administrative entity. Another term sometimes used in a general sense, but sometimes with a more technical meaning, was liber burgus, "free borough", (or the slightly older liber burgagium, referring to burgage tenure); this came into vogue at the close of the twelfth century and was popular throughout the thirteenth, when many communities sought this status through charters from their lords. It involved the grant of special privileges reducing the degree of servitude of burgesses to their lord and/or increasing the degree of corporate autonomy from external authorities; the precise set of privileges varied from town to town. This status was most commonly given to new town foundations, and implied their acquisition of privileges already in possession of many of the older, established towns (a specific town might be used as a model for a new foundation).

burgage

A burgage tenement was a piece of property within a borough, normally comprising a house with or without additional land, and held by certain distinctive customs ("burgage tenure") that typically involved a money rent – as opposed to labour services which characterized rural tenures – known as hawgable or landgable and payable to the lord of the borough (regardless of what other rents payable a property might accumulate over the course of time). A burgage tenement was typically a large plot – distinctively, long and narrow (with the narrow end facing the street) – as originally settled or built on, as the town developed; population growth often led to the plot being subdivided and new rents might be applied to the subdivisions, but the original burgage rent of the whole is sometimes still evidenced in documents. Another characteristic of burgage tenure ("tenure" being a term connoting occupation more than outright ownership, since most real estate was held of some lord and ultimately the king) was that a burgage property could be sold, inherited or otherwise disposed of more freely than was normally the case with rural property. Not all properties within borough boundaries were burgage tenements. What was important about the latter to boroughs, at the time when they were securing their first grants of self-government, was that the holders of burgage tenements owed suit to the borough court and were (at first) an important source of revenue that was put towards payment of the fee farm. Boroughs therefore sought to confirm, within the terms of the grants, the local customs affecting the conditions of burgage tenure and the jurisdiction of their local court over cases relating to burgage properties, and early customals show some preoccupation with tenorial matters; by the thirteenth century burgage tenure was a sufficiently standardized characteristic of boroughs that it was considered implicit in the grant of liber burgus status.

burgess

Although Domesday seems to have used this term fairly consistently to apply to town residents contributory towards the customary payments due the king from boroughs, later in the Middle Ages its varied application does not suggest a precise, universally agreed, technical definition. Broadly, however, it referred to residents of a borough, usually those residents who were members of the borough community in terms of sharing in communal responsibilities and rights; hence we often find the term "comburgess" used, to emphasise that an individual was a fellow member of the enfranchised community (although the term also came to be used, on occasion, to refer to burgesses of higher status). At Lynn the poorest townsmen were clearly described as non-burgesses, "burgesses" evidently being equated with those residents who had become freemen; this appears also the case in Ipswich. Yet in Colchester the same class of poorer residents was described as being burgesses. Outsiders ("strangers" or "foreigners") were sometimes allowed to acquire some of the same – notably commercial – privileges by entering the franchise under the special status of "foreign burgess". Towards the end of the Middle Ages "burgess" was more likely to be used to distinguish one group of privileged townsmen from a less privileged group.

burh

SEE borough

chamberlain

The title originated with an officer of a royal household who was responsible for the Chamber, which included the administration of the king's household's budget. Boroughs later mimicked this, introducing officers to take charge of collecting revenues and paying expenses in part to relieve executive officers of some of their work but perhaps more to place a check on possible embezzlement by those officers. It is not clear how early there were dedicated financial officers in borough administration (the absence of mention in the Ipswich proceedings of 1200 is notable), but merchant guilds appear to have had them from the beginning. It was probably London who first gave its financial officers the title of "chamberlain", perhaps in part because the city treasury was kept safe in a particular chamber in the Guildhall. Treasurers and receivers were other names used for this type of officer.

comburgess

SEE burgess

community

The Latin term communitas was frequently used in late medieval England to characterize (among other associations) the residents of a town as a group, in a way that implied common action, common obligations or responsibility, or common rights or privileges. It was often used too vaguely to let us know if at any time a technical meaning – such as restriction to the burgess or enfranchised element of the town population – was intended. The town community is to some degree a later expression of the folk moot and is often seen acting as an entity, before the law formally recognized it as corporate entity. Occasionally one hears of the "commune", which means something similar but connotes a sworn association whose goal is the achievement of self-government; this was more a continental manifestation which could pursue its aims through violent rebellion against noble overlords, and so English kings tried to prevent this extreme expression of community within their realm. See also:

- Political values and attitudes

For further information about communes see:

- Information Please Encyclopedia: "commune"

compurgator

SEE pledge

constable

Two linked challenges faced by the monarchy after the Norman Conquest, as it sought to expand the scope and control of a national government, concerned the enforcement of law (beyond the unsatisfactory local mechanism of frankpledge) and preservation of the peace, and the ability to muster the populace for military service at need. In 1181 the Assize of Arms required every adult free man to be in possession of weaponry of certain types (determined by socio-economic status). When invasion from France was feared in 1205, the military and police duties of county sheriffs were turned over to constables, each to take charge of the militia of a hundred, and themselves subordinate to chief constables; the name (deriving from Latin terms meaning "count of the stable") had originally been applied to imperial officers whose duties included responsibility for military equipment. In 1252 a royal writ reiterated both the role of the constables (who may not have lasted once the scare in 1205 was over) and the Assize of Arms, which was also more closely defined; in boroughs, mayors or bailiffs were allowed to exercise the duty of constables. A second royal order of that year required "watch and ward", which established (or confirmed) in boroughs a nightwatch of 12 men to apprehend any suspicious characters until it could be ascertained what the reason was for them being abroad in the dark. These initiatives were all tightened up by the Statutes of Winchester and Westminster in 1285 which, among other things, required that town gates be kept closed and guarded from sunset to sunrise. It is probably from this time that Norwich, for example, had one constable for each of its four hundredal leets with sub-constables for each sub-leet, while Lynn (only a single hundred/leet) was nonetheless divided into ten constabularies or wards which also served for militia musters as well as for administrative purposes not envisaged by the royal legislation. Although elected locally, constables were strictly speaking officers of the king. They had the power to hold inquisitions in cases of individuals arrested at night. By the close of the Middle Ages, the constables were being subordinated to aldermen with minor judicial authority (echoing the London aldermanry system that predated the Plantagenet constables).

customs

Customary rules which formed one basis for local administration of justice; some features of these hark back to Anglo-Saxon traditions – the local practices which were established (in a non-literate age) as law through repetitive application, while others are the product of specific ordinances made by borough governments during the Late Middle Ages. Although these customs may vary in details from one borough to another, most reflect the same general concerns and preoccupations. When these rules were compiled in lists, as reference tools for town officers, the resulting document was called a "custumal". The term "customs" was also applied to customary dues (monetary, in-kind, or personal service) owed to the king or to some other lord of a territory. A third use of the term was for duties payable on merchandise being imported or exported; these customs might be for the profit of the town levying them (although, to avoid confusion, I have used the term "tolls" for these) or be part of the national system of customs collection.

discreet

This adjective was a quality used to refer to men with decision-making authority in borough government – as a group they were sometimes referred to as the discretiores. In fact, the term was used in a variety of contexts in the Late Middle Ages (e.g. see Bracton), usually with connotations of wisdom, prudence, sound judgement, or responsible behaviour; it was typically, although not exclusively, applied to individuals or groups acting in some kind of official capacity, and reflects the medieval belief that the ideal ruler combined intelligence and justice. That it is so often used in a way suggesting not simply a quality, but a recognized status – sometimes social, sometimes political – gives the term an almost technical character. There is no single modern descriptor that well captures the full medieval meaning. However, I have chosen to translate the term as "judicious", with discretiores translated as "the more judicious men"; my intent being to choose a quality with connotations of officialdom. SEE ALSO prudhommes

distrain

In legal actions it was sometimes necessary to compel a defendant to come to court to answer a charge. One method of compulsion was to distrain on the personal property of the defendant; that is, to seize some of the defendant's possessions so that he could only regain them by providing sureties for coming to court, or by an illegal rescue. Usually moveables at the defendant's residence or place of business were targeted. "Distrain" might refer to the action of arrest (also called distress) or to the objects arrested. Sometimes a recalcitrant defendant might have to be distrained repeatedly. Distrain could also be applied to compensate a plaintiff in cases of debt, arrears of rent, or the cost of damages awarded by the court, where the convicted party refused to pay. Unless distrain was authorized by the court (so that a town officer, or even the plaintiff himself, could undertake it), it was itself a crime – with some exceptions. The process of distrain is described somewhat in the custumal of Ipswich, cap.34, and that of Norwich, cap.14 and cap.30. "Attachment" was a more general term for the means by which a defendant could be obliged to answer a charge; it might be accomplished by pledges, through personal property voluntarily offered or (if necessary) distrained, or by having the defendant arrested ("attached by the body"). Goods or items that were subject to dispute or involved in a supposed crime could also be attached, for production as evidence in court.

Domesday Book

Briefly, the Domesday Book was the outcome of King William I's attempt to find out just what it was he'd conquered in 1066. As a newcomer, he knew little of the resources of England, and particularly of those resources on which the king had direct call. But he knew well enough that the land was the source of wealth and power. And so in 1086 he sent inquisitors through the shires to conduct a survey. This resulting and nameless description of the country was coming, less than a century later, to be called

"Domesday" – the day of judgement; for the survey officially established who owned what (or whom) and who owed what (money or services) to whom. There were two volumes, which have been styled Great Domesday and Little Domesday, the latter covering East Anglia. While not comprehensive in its coverage, the survey provides a picture of much of the country which is unparalleled in medieval England. In particular there are gaps in coverage of the towns (London, Bristol and Winchester being the most notable absences), but over 100 places inhabited by burgesses are surveyed. So Domesday gives us our first real look at English medieval towns, with comparative information applicable to both the period immediately preceding the Conquest, and the period when the survey was undertaken; the comparison allows us to see, for example, the adverse effects of the Conquest – many boroughs had suffered damage and depopulation, either in the course of the resistance to the Normans, or because of the planting of castles in key strategic urban centres, to control the local and regional populations.

For further background information see:

- Focus on... The Domesday Book
- The Domesday Book Online
- Domesday Book
- Medieval Sourcebook: The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle: The Domesday Book, 1086
- Medieval Sourcebook: The Domesday Book 1086 - Instructions and Extract
- World Wide Words
- The Domesday Texts

essoin

Essoins were excuses for non-attendance at a court session. It was anticipated that, for various reasons, a man might not be able to attend a court session to prosecute or defend a charge and so provision was made for a certain number of absences without penalty, which were expected to be genuine and valid. Permissible excuses were: illness serious enough to confine one to bed; absence abroad; being busy in the king's service; and misadventure en route to court. The excuse had to be presented by some friend or agent of the essoined party; some men appear so frequently delivering essoins that it seems they did it as part of their livelihood. Since only in certain cases could judgements be rendered in the persistent absence of a defendant, essoins were often used as part of a strategy to delay the progress of cases. Some types of case, requiring speedy remedy, restricted or eliminated them.

farm

One party might acquire, on a basis similar to a lease, from another party one or more rights, jurisdictions, revenues or properties – often a combination thereof – by taking them to farm (today we still talk about "farming out" sources of revenue). A farm was a pre-determined lump-sum amount assessed for one year (although payments might be made in instalments) on an estimation of the value of the revenues. In theory at least, a farm was a fixed, or "firm", amount from year to year, as opposed to a rent, which might fluctuate according to property values; however, in practice farms were often renegotiated if the value of the sources of revenues changed, while "rents of assize" were considered to have a fixed value that could not be changed by, for example, a new owner (such rents themselves being subject to sale, gift or bequest, quite independently from the ownership of the real estate itself). The firma burgi, or fee-farm of a borough, was the annual sum due the Exchequer in return for the king allowing the farmer to administer the borough – or rather, administer its sources of revenue (which might include property rents and taxes, local tolls, court ameracements). Before the period of self-government, boroughs were farmed by local potentates (e.g. county sheriffs) or entrepreneurs; the aim was to be able to make a profit from the revenues beyond the amount due for the farm, and this could result in extortionate measures. Hence the desire of the townsmen to acquire the farm for themselves, which necessitated taking the reins of local administration. With the grants of self-government to boroughs by (principally) kings Richard I and John, the farm became in effect a perpetual lease. The amount of the fee-farm was fixed at the time of the original negotiation, but might increase if subsequent additions to jurisdictions, revenues etc. were granted, or decrease if the value of borough revenues demonstrably decline: thus, for example, we see many adjustments in valuations at the time of Domesday Book, while towards the end of the Middle Ages many towns were making cases for reduction of their fee-farm due to local hardship or abnormal expenses (e.g. building defensive fortifications). Boroughs themselves sometimes farmed out to townsmen sources of revenue (with associated offices, if applicable) or communal properties, since this assured the borough a guaranteed (lump sum) revenue, regardless of what income the farmer was able to extract.

folk moot

SEE moot

foreigner / alien

The perspectives of the everyday person of the medieval world were more parochial than today (when the mass media and telecommunications have given us a global outlook). Sense of identity, and feelings of "patriotism" were more focused on the local community and less on the nation-state, which was a relatively undeveloped concept at that time. Today we apply the term "foreigner" to someone who is from outside of the national community, and "alien" (other than the technical application in regard to immigration) to a being from another planet. Within the narrower focus of the medieval English mind, a foreigner was someone who was not strictly a member of the local community although was likely to be from some other community in England – often a neighbouring one; an alien was someone from another country. "Outsider" and "stranger" were terms applied less discriminately to such individuals. "Foreign" could, however, also be applied to someone who was resident in a town but not a fully enfranchised member of the burgess community. Aliens could likewise take up residence in a town and might integrate into the community – in some towns reliant on international trade, they could found important dynasties – but as the Late Middle Ages worn on, with growing nationalism (complicated by other factors such as commercial rivalries) fostered prejudice against non-natives, it became harder for aliens to settle and win acceptance within town society.

forestalling or regrating

Forestalling and regrating were similar offences in which middlemen purchased goods, particularly victuals, in order to resell them; regrators usually divided the goods into small lots to sell by retail, whereas forestallers might sell them again by wholesale. Forestalling was the more serious, involving interception of goods en route to market (or before the hour when the market could legally begin business), in order to buy them and then sell them in open market at a price higher than for what they would originally have sold; or, since town authorities kept a close eye on market prices and could control them somewhat, the profiteering might be achieved by buying wholesale at lower than the current market price and then reselling close to the market price. Sometimes the purpose was artificially to create a shortage of goods, so that the "fair" price established in the marketplace would be higher than it ought. The seriousness of forestalling, as an infringement of community rights (viz. the right of all burgesses to have the opportunity to obtain sufficient supplies for household needs at the lowest cost possible), is reflected in the fact that the term – which came, in legal use, to mean to stop goods before they reached a market stall (although in its Anglo-Saxon origins the term may have been applied to other kinds of interception) – has a broader, metaphoric application in modern vocabulary. The term "pre-empt", which has a similar meaning today, likewise derives from the purchase (Latin emptio) of goods before they could reach a public venue. However, commercial enterprise – including the resale of goods by middlemen – was fundamental to the economic character of towns, and regrating was controlled more through licencing and limitation than by suppression (at Oxford, for instance, the number of regrators operating from shops was fixed by an agreement between university and town, the latter taking a licence fee per shop), while instances of forestalling constantly appear in borough court records. The danger, or fear, was that regrators would resort to forestalling.

For further background information see:

- Medieval Sourcebook: Statuta de Forstallariis \(Statute of Forestallers\), c. 1300

franchise

SEE freedom

frankpledge

A system of policing and law enforcement found at the lowest level of society; later part of the manorial system of administration of justice and, by extension, that of towns. It harks back to the earliest application of the "jury" in Anglo-Saxon England which relied on the knowledge of an accused man's peers and neighbours to vouch for guilt or innocence. Late Anglo-Saxon law required, in most parts of England, every commoner (unless part of the household of a lord) to be a member of a "tithing" – "ten people" (although in practice groupings were not necessarily of the exact number) – or a frankpledge. The group was jointly responsible for ensuring that any of its members accused of a crime appeared in court to answer for it (failing that, the group could be answerable for compensating an injured party); they were essentially pledges for the behaviour of their members. The group was also responsible for bringing to the court's attention, through presentments made by their leader (the tithingman – later known as the capital pledge), any crimes committed by its members. These presentments were made by the capital pledges together, acting as a jury representing the local community, and might also extend to identifying crimes committed by others outside the tithing system. What were called "views of frankpledge" were held periodically to ensure that all adult males were members of a tithing, to take an oath from them that they would not engage in illegal behaviour, and to hear presentments. Membership of tithings was likely organized on a neighbourhood basis, and groups of tithings were associated together in wards, or leets. Important men were outside the frankpledge system; however, their households formed a kind of tithing, its members being in the "mainpast" of the head of the household, who was answerable for their behaviour. Migration and freeholding (under which a man's property could become a pledge for him answering to justice) undermined the tithing system, although leet administration remained a useful component of judicial administration until the end of the Middle Ages.

For further background information see:

- Bracton: "On the Laws and Customs of England: At the view of frankpledge"
- Police: Anglo-Saxon beginnings

freedom

The borough freedom is not a reference to the vaunted but questionable adage that "town air makes free", but rather to the set of rights and privileges – which were referred to collectively as the liberty or the franchise (or in their plural form, liberties or franchises) – that townsmen acquired through chartered grants from their lords, as well as traditional rights (usages) as indicated in custumals. A freeman in the borough context was not therefore one who was personally free, i.e. not a serf or villein (although this was normally a sine qua non), but a member of the enfranchised community; the rights possessed by the community (e.g. burgage tenure) tended towards promoting more personal freedom than most of the extra-urban population had. A resident was not, in most towns, automatically a freeman but acquired this privileged status by entering the freedom, or taking up the franchise, which might happen automatically in some cases, or in others be acquired through a one-time membership fee (or fine). Women might enjoy a similar set of franchises, if unmarried daughters of resident freemen or widows of freemen, although while they were married their rights were determined by the status of their husbands. Depriving someone of freeman's rights (disfranchisement) was one of the more drastic non-corporeal punishments available to borough authorities. "Franchise" or "liberty" could also be used to refer to the territorial area within which the borough rights and freedoms were in effect; territory and jurisdiction were conceptually intertwined.

fresh force

SEE abatement

gild

Gilds (more commonly spelled today as "guilds") were associations of men and women sharing common interests. There were various types of such associations. Some gilds were fraternities created for socio-religious purposes, which included conviviality, communal religious celebration, and charity (usually mutual support). Other gilds had a more businesslike purpose. Members of the same craft or trade came to organize themselves in the Late Middle Ages into gilds. On one hand this was a response to efforts of borough governments to control trade and craft practices: craftsmen needed to band together to protect their interests, but also for self-regulation, to satisfy government requirements for the setting and policing of standards. On the other it was a mechanism for established practitioners to suppress competition by restricting practice of a trade or craft to gild members. The two purposes intersected in the apprenticeship system, which ensured that young men interested in following a craft acquired the necessary skills and were inculcated with the values of the gild establishment, while at the same time restricting competition to qualified craftsmen, by requiring several years of apprenticeship before an individual could graduate to running his own business. The same two principles applied to merchants, whose gilds came into existence earlier than those of the crafts. Since the mercantile element of the community was prominent and influential, merchant gilds could be powerful institutions within a town, although this varied considerably from place to place. For further background information see:

- Information Please Encyclopedia: "guilds or gilds"

hamsoken

SEE abatement

hanse

This Old English term was sometimes applied to the commercial (as opposed to the social) aspect of merchant gilds, or to the fee (which might be monetary or in-kind goods) for becoming a partner in the mercantile advantages accorded to gild members. It was possible, in some towns at least, for non-burgesses to acquire a membership in the hanse component of a merchant gild, which allowed them to trade in the town without paying tolls. The term is more commonly known, however, in application to the Hanseatic League, an association (i.e. an informal gild) of mercantile towns in what is today northern Germany. The German Hanse established a permanent base in London and from there expanded its influence to provincial towns so that, by the fifteenth century, it was dominating much of England's international commerce. For further background on the Hanseatic League see:

- ORB Online Encyclopedia: Hanseatic League

hosting

"Hosting" or "hostage" was practiced in a number of towns (e.g. Yarmouth, Ipswich, Norwich, Southampton), particularly those active in international commerce, even before it became the subject of a royal statute. A visiting merchant from abroad, if intending more than just an overnight stay, would be taken under the wing of a merchant of the town. This might include providing the visitor with lodging and storehouse facilities for his merchandise, and usually involved the host assisting the visitor to sell his goods – sometimes simply through advice, but sometimes as a deal-maker. In principle it could be beneficial to the visitor, unfamiliar with local marketing rules or without local business connections, and also beneficial to the town, since the host could then supervise the business activities of the visitor – and be held accountable by the town if the visitor committed any fraud. However, the practice was subject to abuse by the hosts, who had a competitive advantage regarding the visitor's merchandise and who might try to cheat the visitor or to cheat the town of tolls due on imported merchandise.

hue and cry

In the absence of a police force, apart from the town sergeants (who served an enforcement rather than a crime detection role), apprehending criminals was partly the responsibility of the community. This was handled either by reporting crimes after the fact (often through formal mechanisms such as view of frankpledge), or – if the crime were discovered in process or freshly committed – by raising hue-and-cry. This involved loud proclamation by the discoverer or the victim, male or female, in order to alert those in the vicinity. Those persons then had the obligation to join with the declarer of the crime in pursuing the criminal, usually to the boundary of the community, continuing the clamour in the process. Anyone participating in hue-and-cry had the right to arrest a criminal. In this context the carrying of arms was permitted and a criminal violently resisting arrest might be killed with impunity, but not otherwise – lynchings were very rare, and even wounding or killing a criminal to hinder flight was unlawful. Victims of conspicuous crimes (e.g. rapes or assaults) might also raise hue-and-cry, even if the culprit had escaped, in order to summon those who could witness the effects of the crime. A similar concept to hue-and-cry has survived in the contemporary Western convention that someone seen fleeing the scene of a crime should be met with cries of "Stop, thief!", in order to encourage the public to apprehend the criminal. A post-medieval counterpart of the hue was the posse of the American frontier, but this was organized and led by an officer, whereas the hue was more spontaneous (although capital pledges or constables may have played a role). Arrests could sometimes be effected through the hue, with captured criminals either being marched off to gaol or held until the authorities could arrive; felons caught red-handed were easier to convict. Anyone discovering a corpse was expected to raise the hue immediately, even if the body was cold so that no pursuit was practicable; to fail to do so would have cast suspicion on that "first finder". Failure to raise hue, or of the community to respond to the hue, could result in a neighbourhood being fined once the crime was reported to the courts. At night, when many crimes were committed, the hue would have been a less efficient mechanism; towns instituted night-watches – again a community-based mechanism – to compensate.

For further background see:

- Bracton on procedure in pleas of the Crown

hundred

A unit of local administration introduced in the tenth century, (normally) larger than a village but smaller than a county; the name has some connection to a territory of 100 "hides" (a measurement of area), although this was not consistently the case in practice. In the former Danelaw the "wapentake" had a similar role. Many towns had acquired, by the time of Domesday, the status of a hundred (or at least a half-hundred – which made little practical difference). The hundred court developed out of, and superseded, the older folkmoot; it dealt with less serious criminal and civil cases.

For further background information see:

- The Laws of King Edgar, 959-975 A.D.: This is the Ordinance how the Hundred shall be held

husting

SEE moot

incorporation

The borough community is seen acting jointly to pursue common interests or goals – i. e. in a corporate fashion – from at least the twelfth century on. However, the law made no formal recognition of this (even though the king effectively recognized the existence of communities in his dealings with towns), which was often inconvenient. One of the last major concessions, in terms of chartered liberties, that the king made to towns in the Middle Ages was their incorporation (i.e. making the town a fictitious personality in the eyes of the law). There were five characteristics associated with this: the right of perpetual succession; the right to use a "common seal" as the signature of the borough to official documents expressing community will; the right to sue, and be sued; the right to make by-laws; and the right to hold property communally. Since almost all of these features had been in use in boroughs prior to incorporation, the recognition of this by royal grant was probably not such a significant step forward for boroughs that it might appear to us; however this grant often went hand in hand with other powers, such as the right to have a mayor as the executive officer (once associated with the dreaded commune, whose spectre had greatly diminished by the time of incorporation), and the grant of local jurisdiction over Sessions of the Peace. Perhaps equally important to the borough government was that incorporation reduced the liability of individual officers to be sued for transgressions or defaults of the community, while it made it easier for the borough to acquire communal property which was an increasingly important source of revenue to support administrative costs. To the historian, incorporation is simply the logical culmination of the development of borough government throughout the Late Middle Ages, creating the form of the post-medieval borough.

inquest, or inquisition

SEE law, waging of

jurat

Meaning "sworn man", the term was principally applied specifically to burgesses who took oath to assist and counsel the borough executive – i.e. the town councillors. Like "mayor", "jurat" came to England from the continental commune, where "scabin" was another term used for the same type of officer, although jurats were from the start officers selected by and from the ranks of citizens, whereas scabins had ties to the feudal establishment. In England, town councils were referred to somewhat obliquely by a variety of terms, including potentiores, bon hommes or probi homines (although those terms might also be more widely applied to members of the ruling class), or simply by the number of members of the council – normally "the 12" or "the 24"; jurat similarly is a term usually encountered in the plural, collective form. In some towns they might have more localized (yet no less indistinctive) names, such as "portmen" or "wardmen". But it was not until the close of the Middle Ages that, as the ruling class – represented by borough executive and upper council – began to monopolize power, the dignity and greater distinctiveness of "alderman" came to be used as their title.

law, waging of

One of the ways for a plaintiff to initiate a legal action was to establish reasonable cause in the eyes of the court by producing a body of supporters – secta, whence the term "suit" – and some "good proof", perhaps no more than the word of the supporters that the complaint had foundation. This practice gradually lapsed, although the concept was retained in the legal formula of court records referring to the plaintiff "producing suit". One of the options that might be open to a burgess to defend himself against a plea or suit was to "do his law" through purgation; it could also be used by the plaintiff to uphold his accusation. For the defendant, waging law meant finding men who would take oath to his innocence, in support of the defendant's own oath; the number of these compurgators varied according to the crime; twelve "hands" (i.e. individuals) was the number for many charges. For the plaintiff it meant an oath that the accusation he had made was genuine. Doing, or waging, one's law was a principle of Anglo-Saxon law. The other standard option for judicial investigation was by inquest, a Norman introduction, allowed to boroughs to try civil cases (whereas the king reserved criminal cases for his own legal system); an inquest, which was sometimes referred to as putting oneself "on the country", might be called upon for various purposes, such as the assessment of legal damages or the valuation of property. From this, as well as from an Anglo-Saxon group responsible for identifying crimes (like the later capital pledge presenters of the leet court), evolved trial by jury. The jury was, in some regards, similar to the compurgators, except that it was called into being by public authorities to state (under oath) its opinion on the guilt or innocence of an individual, rather than participating voluntarily to support an individual's claim of innocence.

leet court

A type of court with a similar jurisdiction to view of frankpledge; it seems to have been the Assize of Clarendon (1166) that led to the amalgamation of presentments of crimes with administration of frankpledge. The leet was essentially the territorial aspect of frankpledge: numbers of tithings were organized into leets, or wards, which were normally sub-units of the hundred; in some towns, constabularies were similar sub-units. A leet might have its own court (as in Norwich) although more usually it simply made its presentments in a special \(full\) session of the town's hundred court. In less developed towns, the leet court might be essentially the legislative arm of local government. Offences were presented by a jury of capital pledges, also known as headboroughs (from "borh" meaning pledge), after the articles of leet jurisdiction were read out to them. These articles were typically concerned with breaches of the assizes of bread and ale and offences against the community – such as matters affecting public health and safety, private usurpation of public property (e.g. encroachments of buildings, or blocking of rights-of-way), and performance of public officials. The only punishment within the power of a leet court was the setting of ameracements, the amount of each being assessed by a second jury (affeerors). As a result of this limited punitive power, the repetitive offences by the same individuals brought before leet proceedings year after year sometimes have more the appearance of a licensing system. Crimes of a more serious nature could also be presented (i.e. made public) by the leet jury, but were referred to higher authorities. In some towns the leet system was partially superseded by the constabulary system.

liber burgus

SEE borough

liberties

SEE freedom

mayor

A mayor was an elected executive officer of a borough, with similar powers and responsibilities to a bailiff. However, it may be that townsmen had difficulty ridding themselves of the image of the bailiff as the servant of a higher authority, and that a mayor (whose title emphasizes a relationship with the community of which he is leader) represented by contrast the borough's aspirations to administrative independence; over the course of the Middle Ages, many towns persuaded the king to let them replace bailiffs with mayors. We cannot push this theory too far, for urban political development in England (in the context of a relatively strong and centralized monarchy) was less revolutionary than in many parts of the European continent. Nonetheless, the mayor of London – the earliest example in England – is associated with the period of the commune (an emulation of continental examples of self-assertive efforts to gain independence). And in some towns, such as Lynn, perhaps inspired by London's example, mayors were created to lead the community in pressuring borough lords to cede power, particularly where bailiffs (controllers of local courts) remained appointees of the lords. However, while the king gradually became willing to permit the introduction of mayors as chief officers of boroughs, he made sure that these officers remained answerable to the Crown.

message

SEE tenement

moot

Deriving from a Old English term meaning "meeting", a moot was a decision-making mechanism. As folkmoot, it was a usually open-air gathering of a community, sometimes headed by a royal official (in which manifestation it might be a shiremoot, hundred-moot, or burh-moot), for the administration of local affairs and particularly the administration of justice through local custom. Under Alfredian law, the folkmoot seems to be the mainstay of legal administration. Towns had their own version of the moot, which had aspects both of court and of council meeting; the various names by which versions of this was known in different towns included burhgemot, portmoot, portmanmoot, assembly, and congregation. Assembly and congregation represented more the legislative aspect of the folkmoot, while the others were more the judicial aspect; decision-making remains at the root of each. Husting was yet another term used for a court whose origins may be said to lie with the moot. The term, with Norse derivations (possibly associated with a verb "to speak"), refers to a meeting of the folk (Anglo-Saxon "thing") – that is male adult free men – inside a building (house), in contrast with the open-air folkmoot. The Viking "thing" had legislative and judicial functions; its method of voting, said to be by participants making a noise with their weapons, was known as "wapentake", and this later became associated with the region over which the thing had jurisdiction. Although medieval London had both a folkmoot and a husting (the latter visible as early as the tenth century), we should not read too much into this differentiation.

murage

A special toll or tax that boroughs could levy, if they received royal licence to do so, on condition that the proceeds to be put towards the building or repair of town walls. The licences specified a limiting period within which the levy could take place. The king was normally inclined to grant such licences, since it was in his interest that his towns be well protected. We find such licences granted from early thirteenth to late fifteenth centuries; examples can be seen at Norwich, Lynn, and Yarmouth.

oligarchy

A form of government in which power is deliberately monopolized by an organized elite and applied to the social and/or economic benefit of that elite, and in which the power of the elite is maintained by force or by shaping the constitution to confine or avoid requirements for consultation of, or accountability to (including by election), the populace. Many historians have considered medieval borough governments to be oligarchies, particularly towards the end of the Middle Ages, when they were becoming the "closed corporations" of the Tudor period. Life membership of councils and co-optation - in which members of the corporation have exclusive control over the filling of vacancies in their ranks - have been considered indicators of oligarchic forms of government in medieval towns. While it can be argued that all government involves, to some degree, a ruling elite, oligarchy is characterised by the self-interested policies or actions of the rulers. By contrast, aristocracy is a form of government by a usually hereditary elite which is in theory paternalistic. Some historians have used the terms "patriciate" and "meritocracy" to describe a ruling elite which governs by right of superior abilities or experience (but not necessarily birth), and "plutocracy" to describe an elite whose power derives from economic status rather than birth. However, these terms should not be considered synonymous with oligarchy, since they do not carry the baggage of the self-interested exercise of power.

peer

Today the term is used in phrases such as "peer of the realm" or "a jury of my peers". In either case the term means "equal" in legal or social status, and so it was with the use of the term in medieval boroughs where the term was used to refer to members of the enfranchised community – theoretically a community of equals. The term "commoner", which today we associate with connotations of non-aristocracy, similarly really meant member of a community (although by the end of the Middle Ages it was already acquiring, in the usage in official borough records, connotations of socio-political inferiority); "comburgess" was used in a similar fashion, although it also came to be applied to the mayor's peers (i.e. the town councillors). In the cases of both "peer" and "commoner" there was the implication of sharing in communal rights, and the terms can be connected with the concept of being at scot and lot. I am inclined to suspect an etymological connection between the Latin term for peers (pares) and pars, which can refer both to sharing in something and the concept of membership.

piepowder

"Piepowder" comes from a French term meaning "dusty feet" and applied to the judicial system of trying cases involving travellers (usually merchants) from outside the town, in order to render swift justice.

For further background information see:

- World Wide Words

pledge

"No man without a lord" was an ancient adage of English law. It was important to the administration of justice, which required compensation for most crimes, that accused parties could be obliged to answer charges either by having property which could be arrested (later, "attached") or "lords" who would oblige them to answer. Also ancient was the practice of an accused man clearing himself by obtaining supporters (compurgators) who would take oath to his innocence. In the borough, where men were

"free", this manifested itself in the form of pledges (sometimes referred to as "gage and pledge"), sureties, and mainprise; such guarantees of behaviour might be required in a variety of circumstances – including repayment of debts, performance of official duties or entrance into the franchise – but are most commonly associated with legal procedures. The accused was expected to provide a guarantee (money or goods, often referred to as pledges) or to find guarantors (variously known as pledges, sureties, manucaptors or mainpernors) for his appearance in court to answer a charge, or at a later stage for complying with a court judgement. In certain cases where the accused failed to fulfill a judgement (e.g. repayment of a debt) the guarantors might themselves be liable for it. Similar concepts today are seen in bail, or bonding and collateral in cases of debt or financial contract; the terms surety and mainpernor are still used in specific technical senses, different from each other, although it is not clear that there was any real differentiation in the Middle Ages. In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, an accuser might, in some cases, initiate an action through a pledge, to assure the court that his charge was with foundation, not frivolous or malicious, and that he would pursue it. At a slightly earlier time, an accuser might have to produce several supporters at the initiation of a legal action to establish reasonable cause for a case to proceed. Initiation of charges before a leet court was made by Capital Pledges (or the equivalent), each representing a tithing.

probi homines

SEE prudhommes

provost (or prepositus)

SEE bailiff

prudhommes

Prudhommes or prodeshommes (Latin: probi homines) was a term used to refer to a particular subset of the urban population. In its earlier occurrences it is found in contexts related to judicial or political administration, and refers to a category of townsman active in, or qualified for, authoritative roles involving the giving of testimony or making of decisions. It increasingly came to be a synonym for the urban rulers and the class from which they were drawn. It is not easy to come to grips with a precise rendering of the term which conveys in modern language the medieval connotations. After much thought and examination of contexts in which the term is used, I have settled on the translation of "reputable men". H.T. Riley, editor of key records of medieval London, translated it as "substantial men", but this focuses primarily on the economic status of the councillors, whereas the term was, I am certain, intended more (though not necessarily exclusively) to express something about moral/ethical fibre and social responsibility – which is reflected in one of the medieval English equivalents of the term: "good men". I have elsewhere suggested "law-abiding" as a rendering, although this alone does not capture the complexities of the term. Upright, judicious, prudent, respectable, trustworthy, proven, credible, creditable, capable are all adjectives reflecting facets of what medieval people understood from the term. We have the same expectations that our "rulers" today be persons of integrity.

SEE ALSO discreet.

purgation

SEE law, waging of

recognizance

This was a formal acknowledgement before witnesses of a binding transaction between parties. Making the acknowledgement before legal authorities, or reporting it to them, with a view to having it registered in court rolls, established an official record to which reference could be made to prove or disprove subsequent legal disputes related to the transaction; this was superior to any other means of proof. Recognizances could be applied to the incurrence of a debt, a transfer of real estate (including via testamentary bequest), or certain disclaimers of rights to real estate. Recognizances represent a consensual situation, as opposed to the adversarial situations legal authorities more often dealt with, and were intended to avoid the risk of drawn out legal disputes. In situations where property involved in a transaction was considered by the law to be jointly owned by a husband and wife (normally this was the case with property owned by a woman prior to the marriage), it was required for the wife to make a personal and free-will acknowledgement (before the authorities) of consent to her husband alienating the property.

reeve

SEE bailiff

regrating

SEE forestalling

scot and lot

Brewer's Dictionary of Phrase and Fable (1898) defined "scot and lot" as

"A levy on all subjects according to their ability to pay. Scot means tribute or tax, and lot means allotment or portion allotted. To pay scot and lot, therefore, is to pay the ordinary tributes and also the personal tax allotted to you."

Historians have followed suit in focusing on the taxation aspect, in part because of the slightly misleading breakdown of borough charter privileges made by Ballard. However, the actual situation is more complex. To be "at scot and lot" meant having a share in the obligations and responsibilities of a member of the community; in return members shared in communal privileges and advantages –not all town-dwellers were part of that privileged community. In essence, scot and lot was an indicator of status, in terms of membership. Some historians have connected the status of being at scot and lot with householding; this, however, was not a prerequisite (although in some towns it later became a requirement of citizenship), but there was a natural concern that members of the community have property –whether real or moveable –by which they could be distrained if they failed to pay their contributions. "Scot" seems clearly enough associated with being contributory to taxations, aids or customary dues imposed on the community (e.g. see the Norwich custumal). The term survives today in the idiom that someone "got off scot-free". Similarly, "lot" survives in concepts such as "lottery" and "to cast one's lot in with". It is a Teutonic term that found its way into Norse, Old English and the Romance languages; the derivation is uncertain, but may be associated with a term for a piece of wood, in reference to the use of such in the drawing of lots. Drawing lots was associated with such things as the order of dividing plunder; by extension, the term "lot" came to be associated with a share in a distribution of goods or property, calling to mind the customary right of each burgher –an urban status possibly synonymous with being at scot and lot –to claim a share in any commercial bargain underway in a public place (again, see the Norwich custumal, and for the reciprocity of obligation and privilege, that of Yarmouth). The Leges Quatuor Burgorum explicitly applied the term lot to that situation, while the Northampton custumal talks about dividing up essential goods (victuals) by "divination" (i.e. casting lots). A royal charter to Chesterfield (1294) uses the entire phrase "lot and scot" in this context of sharing in bargains. If, as seems possible, scot and lot referred to the two-sided coin of sharing in both obligations and advantages, the nearest modern equivalent to the concept may be the colloquialism "You pays your money, and you takes your chances", although this –decontextualized from a social setting –has lost the original's nice expression of reciprocity. There is a further application of "lot" which must be considered. The drawing of lots was anciently a method of selecting from a group one or more individuals for some role –such as a winner, or an office-holder. "Accepting one's lot in life" may hark back to election to office. This form of election was considered to call into play divine judgement, and could still be found in Yarmouth at the end of the Middle Ages. The London authorities explicitly defined lot, in 1415, as liability to hold office. It is evident that "scot and lot" is not, as in Brewer's definition, two terms with essentially the same meaning, but presents two separate yet related concepts. The two may represent dual responsibilities, of contributing to taxation and bearing one's fair burden in administrative duties, or the opposites of obligation and benefit; perhaps "lot" itself communicated more than one idea.

tallage

SEE taxation

taxation

In addition to specialized taxes such as customs duties on merchandise, medieval townsmen were subject to general taxes, similar in some ways to modern income tax. Aids were not regular impositions, in contrast to the fee farm which was a fixed annual payment. They were, in theory, voluntary gifts of money to the king to assist him with unusual expenses (such as the costs of marrying off a daughter); however, when the king requested an aid, it was unwise not to comply. Tallages were more explicitly obligatory and were lump sums which borough authorities had to distribute fairly among individual burghers; this was usually done proportionately according to personal wealth, as determined by a valuation of real estate or goods and chattels. Royal tallages came to absorb aids under their heading, and were themselves superseded after 1275 by taxes imposed through parliament, called lay subsidies, or tenths (reflecting the percentage of personal wealth due as payment, which was higher in towns than in rural areas where the rate was a fifteenth). Borough authorities might themselves impose local tallages, as a way of raising special funds for particular purposes or sometimes – before other sources of revenue were well-developed – as a foundation of borough finances (such being the case in thirteenth-century Lynn). Taxes were no more popular in the Middle Ages than they are today, and there occurred resistance, evasion, and complaints of unfair assessments; special measures sometimes had to be taken to protect tax-collectors.

tenement

The word is little used today, except as a specialized legal term restricted to certain situations. Essentially it means no more than a piece of real estate that was subject to tenure (being held under definable conditions) under common law. It was used in this general sense in the Middle Ages, but most commonly for property with buildings on it (in contrast to a field or meadow, for example). A "capital tenement" was the property where an individual normally lived, or had at one time lived, i.e. his or her principal property. A similar term to "tenement" was "messuage" and it is often difficult to tell if these terms were being used interchangeably or if some significant difference was understood. This was the French version of the Latin mansio, which (although it too could be used in a general sense for a piece of property) was usually applied to a plot of land on which a residence stood; and the term later came to be applied specifically to a residential property. However, the Middle Ages it seems often to have been used generally for a piece of owned land, of no fixed size or purpose. Our poor understanding of how messuage and tenement were used is partly due to a lack of more detailed description of the properties in the original documents.

tithing

SEE frankpledge

waste

The medieval application of the term is much like its modern connotations, but it was used in a legal sense referring to land that was unoccupied, undeveloped or uncultivated. As a result the land could not be the source of any tax or other revenue to its owner. Borough governments were keen to obtain control (from the lord of the town) over wasteland within the town boundaries, since they could then lease out plots of land. The term was similarly applied to property that had been allowed to deteriorate, or had even been purposely damaged, so that its value (whether in terms of selling price or rentability) decreased.

withernam

In its strict sense, withernam was the possible resort of an individual whose goods had been distraigned to force him to answer in court for an accusation brought against him by another. Should the defendant feel the distraint to be unjust he could seek from the authorities an act of counter-dstraint, to restore the distress taken (this procedure subsequently being known as replevin) or, if the goods originally distrained were not within the area of the authorities' jurisdiction, to seize other goods of the plaintiff. This found application in the urban environment in a broader form. If, for example, a burgess visiting another town committed (or was accused of committing) some wrong against a resident but, having departed, could not be brought to justice, it might be allowable to distrain on any other of his fellow-burgesses at that time in town. Alternatively, if a burgess, while in another town, suffered financial loss as the result of unjust actions of the town (e.g. collecting toll from a merchant of a borough exempt, by royal charter, from paying tolls) or of one of its townsmen, then compensation might be exacted in the home-town of the offended party through dstraint from any within-reach resident of the erring town. Thus the innocent individual was considered liable for the wrong committed, by reason of being a member of the same community to which belonged the actual perpetrator of the wrong. In extreme cases, this could lead to a cycle of reprisals and counter-reprisals, and to a breakdown of relations between towns.

[\[top\]](#)

main menu

Medieval Sourcebook: The Anglo-Saxon Dooms, 560-975

Contents

- The Laws of Æthelberht, King of Kent 560-616 A.D.
 - The Laws of Kings Hlothhære and Eadric 673-686 A.D.
 - The Laws of King Wihtræd 690-725 A.D.
 - The Laws of King Alfred 871-901 A.D.
 - The Laws of King Edward the Elder, 901-924 A.D.
 - The Laws of Alfred, Guthrum, and Edward the Elder
 - The North People's Law
 - Mercian Law
 - The Laws of King Athelstan 924-939 A.D.
 - The Laws of King Edmund I 939-946 A.D.
 - The Laws of King Edgar 959-975 A.D.

 - Glossary I
 - Glossary II
-

The Laws of Æthelberht, King of Kent, 560-616 A.D.

These are the dooms which King Æthelberht established in the days of Augustine.

Of church-frith.

1. The property of God and of the church, twelvefold; a bishop's property, elevenfold; a priest's property, ninefold; a deacon's property, sixfold; a clerk's property, threefold; churchfrith, twofold;. . . .
2. If the king calls his leod to him, and any one there do them evil, (let him compensate with) a twofold bot, and fifty shillings to the king.
3. If the king drink at any one's home, and any one there do any lyswe, let him make twofold bot.

4. If a freeman steal from the king, let him pay ninefold.
5. If a man slay another in the king's tun, let him make bot with fifty shillings.
6. If any one slay a freeman, fifty shillings to the king, as drihtinbeah.
7. If the king's ambihtsmith, or laadrinc, slay a man, let him pay a half leodgeld.
8. The king's mundbyrd, fifty shillings.
9. If a freeman steal from a freeman, let him make threefold bot; and let the king have the wite and all the chattels.
10. If a man lie with the king's maiden, let him pay a bot of fifty shillings.
11. If she be a grinding slave, let him pay a bot of twenty-five shillings. The third (class) twelve shillings.
12. Let the king's fedesl be paid for with twenty shillings
13. If a man slay another in an eorl's tun, let him make bot with twelve shillings.
14. If a man lie with an eorl's birele, let him make bot with twelve shillings.
15. A ceorl's mundbyrd, seven shillings.
16. If a man lie with a ceorl's birele, let him make bot with six shillings; with a slave of the second (class), fifty scaetts; with one of the third, thirty scaetts.
17. If any one be the first to make an inroad into a man's tun, let him make bot with six shillings; let him who follows, with three shillings; after, each, a shilling.
18. If a man furnish weapons to another where there is strife, though no evil be done, let him make bot with six shillings.
19. If wegreaf be done, let him make bot with six shillings.
20. If the man be slain, let him make bot with twenty shillings.
21. If a man slay another, let him make bot with a half leodgeld of 100 shillings. . . .
31. If a freeman lie with a freeman's wife, let him pay for it with his wergeld, and provide another wife with his own money, and bring her to the other.

32. If any one thrust through the riht hamscyld, let him adequately compensate.

33. If there be a feahfang, let there be fifty sceatts for bot.

34. If there be an exposure of the bone, let bot be made with three shillings.

35. If there be an injury of the bone, let bot be made with four shillings.

36. If the outer hion be broken, let bot be made with ten shillings.

37. If it be both, let bot be made with twenty shillings.

38. If a shoulder be lamed, let bot be made with thirty shillings.

39. If an ear be struck off, let bot be made with twelve shillings.

40. If the other ear hear not, let bot be made with twenty-five shillings.

41. If an ear be pierced, let bot be made with three shillings.

42. If an ear be mutilated, let bot be made with six shillings.

43. If an eye be (struck) out, let bot be made with fifty shillings.

44. If the mouth or an eye be injured, let bot be made with twelve shillings.

45. If the nose be pierced, let bot be made with nine shillings.

46. If it be one ala, let bot be made with three shillings.

47. If both be pierced, let bot be made with six shillings.

48. If the nose be otherwise mutilated, for each let bot be made with six shillings.

49. If it be pierced, let bot be made with six shillings.

50. Let him who breaks the chin-bone pay for it with twenty shillings.

51. For each of the four front teeth, six shillings; for the tooth which stands next to them four shillings; for that which stands next to that, three shillings; and then afterwards, for each a shilling.

52. If the speech be injured, twelve shillings. If the collar-bone be broken, let bot be made with six shillings.

53. Let him who stabs (another) through an arm, make bot with six shillings.

54. If a thumb be struck off, twenty shillings. If a thumb nail be off, let bot be made with three shillings. If the shooting [i. e. fore] finger be struck off, let bot be made with eight shillings. If the middle finger be struck off, let bot be made with four shillings. If the gold [i. e. ring] finger be struck off, let bot be made with six shillings. If the little finger be struck off, let bot be made with eleven shillings.

55. For every nail, a shilling.

56. For the smallest disfigurement of the face, three shillings: and for the greater, six shillings.

57. If any one strike another with his fist on the nose, three shillings.

58. If there be a bruise, a shilling; if he receive a right hand bruise, let him [the striker] pay a shilling.

59. If the bruise be black in a part not covered by the clothes, let bot be made with thirty scaetts.

60. If it be covered by the clothes, let bot for each be made with twenty scaetts.

61. If the belly be wounded, let bot be made with twelve shillings; if it be pierced through, let bot be made with twenty shillings.

62. If any one be gegemed, let bot be made with thirty shillings.

63. If any one be cear-wund, let bot be made with three shillings.

64. If any one destroy (another's) organ of generation, let him pay with three leud-gelds; if he pierce it through, let him make bot with six shillings; if it be pierced within, let him make bot with six shillings.

65. If a thigh be broken, let bot be made with twelve shillings; if the man become halt, then the friends must arbitrate.

66. If a rib be broken, let bot be made with three shillings.

67. If a thigh be pierced through, for each stab six shillings; if (the wound be) above an inch, a shilling; for two inches, two; above three, three shillings.

68. If a sinew be wounded, let bot be made with three shillings.
69. If a foot be cut off, let fifty shillings be paid.
70. If a great toe be cut off, let ten shillings be paid.
71. For each of the other toes, let one-half be paid, like as it is stated for the fingers.
72. If the nail of a great toe be cut off, thirty scaetts for bot; for each of the others, make bot with ten scaetts. . . .
77. If a man buy a maiden with cattle, let the bargain stand, if it be without guile; but if there be guile, let him bring her home again, and let his property be restored to him.
78. If she bear a live child, let her have half the property; if the husband die first.
79. If she wish to go away with her children, let her have half the property.
80. If the husband wish to have them, (let her portion be) as one child.
81. If she bear no child, let her paternal kindred have the fioh and the morgengyftt.
82. If a man carry off a maiden by force, let him pay fifty shillings to the owner, and afterwards buy (the object of) his will of the owner.
83. If she be betrothed to another in money, let him make bot with twenty shillings.
84. If she become gaengang, thirty-five shillings; and fifteen shillings to the king.
85. If a man lie with an esne's wife, her husband still living, let him make two-fold bot.

The Laws of Kings Hlothhære and Eadric, 673-686.

These are the dooms which Hlothhære and Eadric, Kings of the Kentishmen, Established 673-686.

Hlothhære and Eadric, kings of the Kentishmen, augmented the laws, which their elders had before made, by these dooms, which hereafter say:

1. If any one's esne slay a man of an Eorl's degree, whoever it be, let the owner pay with three hundred shillings, give up the slayer, and add three manwyrths thereto.
2. If the slayer escape, let him add a fourth manwyrth, and let him prove, with good aewdas, that he could not obtain the slayer.

3. If any one's esne slay a freeman, whoever it be, let the owner pay with a hundred shillings, give up the slayer, and a second manwyrth thereto.

4. If the slayer escape, let the owner pay for him with two manwyrths; and let him prove, with good aewdas, that he could not obtain the slayer.

5. If a freeman steal a man; if the man return, and denounce him before the stermelda; let him clear himself, if he be able, and let him have the number of free aewda-men, and one with (himself) in the oath, each at the tun to which he belongs; if he be unable, let him pay. . .

16. If any Kentish-man buy a chattel in Lundenwic, let him then have two or three true men to witness, or the king's wic-reeve. If it be afterwards claimed of the man in Kent, let him then vouch the man who sold it to him to warranty, in the wic at the king's hall, if he know him, and can bring him to the warranty; if he can not do that, let him prove at the altar, with one of his witnesses or with the king's wic-reeve, that he bought the chattel openly in the wic, with his own property, and then let him be paid its worth; but if he can not prove that by lawful averment, let him give it up, and let the owner take possession of it.

The Laws of King Wihtræd, 690-725 A.D.

These are the Dooms of Wihtræd, King of the Kentish-Men.

In the reign of the most clement king of the Kentish-men, Wihtræd, in the fifth year of his reign, the ninth indiction, the sixth day of Rugern, in the place which is called Berghamstye, where was assembled a deliberative convention of the great men, there was Birhtwald, archbishop of Britain, and the forenamed king; also the bishop of Rochester, the same was called Gybmund, was present; and every degree of the church of that province spoke in unison with the obedient people. There the great men decreed, with the suffrages of all, these dooms, and added them to the lawful customs of the Kentishmen, as it hereafter said and declared. . . .

16. Let the word of a bishop and of the king be, without an oath, incontrovertible.

17. Let the aldor of a minster clear himself with a priest's canne.

18. Let a priest clear himself by his own sooth, in his holy garment before the altar, thus saying: "Veritatem dico in Christo, non mentior." In like manner, let a deacon clear himself.

19. Let a clerk clear himself with four of his fellows, and he alone with his hand on the altar, let the others stand by, make the oath.

20. Let a stranger (clear himself) with his own oath at the altar; in like manner, a king's thane.

21. Let a ceorlish man clear himself with four of his fellows at the altar; and let the oath of all these be incontrovertible; then is the church canne right.

The Laws of King Alfred, 871-901 A.D.

The Lord spoke these words to Moses, and thus said: "I am the Lord your God. I led you out of the land of the Egyptians, and of their bondage.@"

Of oaths and of weds.

1. At the first we teach, that it is most needful that every man warily keep his oath and his wed. If any one be constrained to either of these wrongfully, either to treason against his lord, or to any unlawful aid; then it is juster to belie than to fulfil. But if he pledge himself to that which it is lawful to fulfil, and in that belie himself, let him submissively deliver up his weapon and his goods to the keeping of his friends, and be in prison forty days in a king=s tun; let him there suffer whatever the bishop may prescribe to him; and let his kinsmen feed him, if he himself have no food. If he have no kinsmen, or have no food, let the king's reeve feed him. If he must be forced to this, and he otherwise will not, if they bind him, let him forfeit his weapons and his property. If he be slain, let him lie uncompensated. If he flee thereout before the time, and he be taken, let him be in prison forty days, as he should before have been. But if he escape, let him be held a fugitive, and be excommunicate of all Christ's churches. If, however, there be another man's borh, let him make bot for the borhbryce, as the law may direct him, and the wedbryce, as his confessor may prescribe to him.

Of churchsocns

2. If any one, for whatever crime, seek any of the mynsterhams to which the king's feorm is incident, or other freehired which is worthy of reverence, let him have a space of three days to protect himself, unless he be willing to come to terms. If during this space, any one harm him by blow, or by bond, or wound him, let him make bot for each of these according to regular usage, as well with wer as with wite: and to the brotherhood one hundred and twenty shillings, as bot for the churchfrith: and let him not have forlongen his own.

Of borhbryce

3. If any one break the king's borh, let him make bot for the plaint, as the law shall direct him; and for the borhbryce with five pounds of maerra pence. For an archbishop's borhbryce, or his mundbyrd, let him make bot with three pounds: for any other bishop's or an earldormans borhbryce, or mundbyrd, let him make bot with two pounds.

Of plotting against a lord.

4. If any one plot against the king's life, of himself, or by harbouring of exiles, or of his men; let him be liable with his life and in all that he has; or let him prove himself according to his lord's wer.

Of churchfryth

5. We also ordain to every church which has been hallowed by a bishop, this fryth: if a fahman flee to or reach one, that for seven days no one drag him out. But if anyone do so, let him be liable in the king's mundbyrd and the churchfryth; more if he there commit more wrong, if, despite of hunger, he can live; unless he fight his way out. If the brethren have further need of their church, let them keep him in another house, and let not that have more doors than the church. Let the churchealdor take care that during this term no one give him food. If he himself be willing to deliver up his weapons to his foes, let them keep him thirty days, and then let them give notice of him to his kinsmen. It is also churchfryth: if any man seek a church for any of those offences, which had not been before revealed, and there confess himself ill God's name, be it half forgiven. He who steals on Sunday, or at Yule, or at Easter, or on Holy Thursday, and on Rogation days; for each of these we will that the bot be twofold, as during Lent-fast.

Of stealing in a church.

6. If any one thief aught in a church, let him pay the angylde, and the wite, such as shall belong to the angylde; and let the hand be struck off with which he did it. If he will redeem the hand, and that be allowed him, let him pay as may belong to his wer.

In case a man fight in the king's hall.

7. If any one fight in the king's hall, or draw his weapon, and he be taken; be it in the king's doom, either death, or life, as he may be willing to grant him. If he escape, and be taken again, let him pay for himself according to his wergeld, and make bot for the offence, as well wer as wite, according as he may have wrought.

Of fornication with a nun.

8. If any one carry off a nun from a minster, without the king's or the bishop's leave, let him pay a hundred and twenty shillings, half to the king, half to the bishop and to the church-hlaford who owns the nun. If she live longer than he who carried her off, let her not have aught of his property. If she bear a child, let not that have of the property more than the mother. If any one slay her child, let him pay to the king the maternal kindred's share; to the paternal kindred let their share be given. . . .

Of those men who lend their weapons for man-slaying.

19. If any one lend his weapon to another that he may kill some one therewith, they may join together if they will in the wer. If they will not join together, let him who lent the weapon pay of the wer a third part, and of the wite a third part. If he be willing to justify himself, that he knew of no ill-design in the loan; that he may do. If a sword-polisher receive another man's weapon to furbish, or a smith a man's material, let them both return it sound as either of them may have before received it: unless either of them had before agreed that he should not hold it angylde. . . .

Of confession of debt.

22. If any one at the folk-mote make declaration of a debt, and afterwards wish to withdraw it, let him charge it on a righter person, if he can; if he cannot, let him forfeit his angylde [and take possession of the wite.] . . .

Of kinless men.

27. If a man, kinless of paternal relatives, fight, and slay a man, and then if he have maternal relatives, let them pay a third of the wer; his guild-brethren a third part; for a third let him flee. If he have no maternal relatives, let his guild-brethren pay half, for half let him flee.

Of slaying a man thus circumstanced.

28. If a man kill a man thus circumstanced, if he have no relatives, let half be paid to the king; half to his guild-brethren.

Of hloth-slaying of a two-hynde man.

29. If any one with a hloth slay an unoffending twy-hynde man, let him who acknowledges the death-blow pay wer and wite; and let every one who was of the party pay thirty shillings as hloth-bot.

Of a six-hynde man.

30. If it be a six-hynde man, let every man pay sixty shillings as hloth-bot; and the slayer, wer and full wite.

Of a twelve-hynde man.

31. If he be a twelve-hynde man, let each of them pay one hundred and twenty shillings; and the slayer, wer and wite. If a hloth do this, and afterwards will deny it on oath, let them all be accused, and let them then all pay the wer in common; and all, one wite, such as shall belong to the wer.

Of those who commit folk-leasing.

32. If a man commit folk-leasing, and it be fixed upon him, with no lighter thing let him make bot than that his tongue be cut out; which must not be redeemed at any cheaper rate than it is estimated at according to his wer. . . .

Of a holdgetael.

37. If a man from one holdgetael wish to seek a lord in another holdgetael, let him do it with the knowledge of the ealdorman whom he before followed in his shire. If he do it without his knowledge, let him who entertains him as his man pay 120 shillings as wite; let him, however, deal the half to the king in the shire where he before followed, half in that into which he comes. If he has done anything wrong where he before was, let him make bot for it who has their received him as his man; and to the king 120 shillings as wite.

In case a man fight before an ealdorman in the gemot.

38. If a man fight before a king's ealdorman in the gemot, let him make bot with wer and wite as it may be right; and before this 120 shillings to the ealdorman as wite. If he disturb the folkmete by drawing his weapon, one hundred and twenty shillings to the ealdorman as wite. If aught of this happen before a king's ealdorman's junior, or a king's priest, thirty shillings as wite.

Of fighting in a ceorlish man's flet.

39. If any one fight in a ceorlish man's flet, with six shillings let him make bot to the ceorl. If he draw his weapon and fight not, let it be half of that. If, however, either of these happen to a six-hynde man, let it increase threefoldly, according to the ceorlish bot to a twelve-hynde man, twofoldly, according to the six-hynde's bot.

Of burh-bryce.

40. The king's burh-bryce shall be 120 shillings. An archbishop's, ninety shillings. Any other bishop's, and an ealdorman's, sixty shillings. A twelve-hynde man's, thirty shillings. A six-hynde man's, fifteen shillings. A ceorl's edorbryce, five shillings. If aught of this happen when the fyrð is out, or in Lent fast, let the bot be twofold. If any one in Lent put down holy law among the people without leave, let him make bot with 120 shillings.

Of boc-lands.

41. The man who has boc-land, and which his kindred left him, then ordain we that he must not give it from his maeg-burg, if there be writing or witness that it was forbidden by those men who at first acquired it, and by those who gave it to him, that he should do so; and then let that be declared in the presence of the king and of the bishop, before his kinsmen.

Of feuds.

42. We also command: that the man who knows his foe be homesitting fight not before he demand justice of him. If he have such power that he can beset his foe, and besiege him within, let him keep him within for seven days, and attack him not, if he will remain within. And, then, after seven days, if he will surrender, and deliver up his weapons, let him be kept safe for thirty days, and let notice of him be given to his kinsmen and his friends. If, however, he flee to a church, then let it be according to the sanctity of the church; as we have before said above. But if he have not sufficient power to besiege him within, let him ride to the ealdorman, and beg aid of him. If he will not aid him, let him ride to the king before he fights. In like manner also, if a man come upon his foe, and he did not before know him to be homestayng; if he be willing to deliver up his weapons, let him be kept for thirty days, and let notice of him be given to his friends; if he will not deliver up his weapons, then he may attack him. If he be willing to surrender, and to deliver up his weapons, and any one after that attack him, let him pay as well wer as wound, as he may do, and wite, and let him have forfeited his maegship. We also declare, that with his lord a man may fight orwige, if any one attack the lord: thus may the lord fight for his man. After the same wise, a man may fight with his born kinsman, if a man attack him wrongfully, except against his lord; that we do not allow. And a man may fight orwige, if he find another with his lawful wife, within closed doors, or under one covering, or with his lawfully-born daughter, or with his lawfully-born sister, or with his mother, who was given to his father as his lawful wife.

Of the celebration of mass-days.

43. To all freemen let these days be given, but not to theow-men and esne-workmen: twelve days at Yule, and the day on which Christ overcame the devil, and the commemoration day of St. Gregory, and seven days before Easter and seven days after, and one day at St. Peter's tide and St. Paul's, and in harvest the whole week before St. Mary-mass, and one day at the celebration of All-Hallows and the four Wednesdays in the four ember weeks. To all theow-men be given, to those whom it may be most desirable to give, whatever any man shall give them in God's name, or they at any of their moments may deserve.

The Laws of King Edward the Elder, 901-924 A.D.

Of doom and suit.

King Edward commands all the reeves: that you judge such just dooms as you know to be most righteous, and as in the doom-book stands. Fear not on any account to pronounce folkright; and that every suit have a term when it shall be brought forward, that you then may pronounce.

Of buying.

1. And I will that every man have his warrantor; and that no man buy out of port, but have the port-reeve's witness, or that of other unlying men whom one may believe. And if any one buy out of port then let him incur the king's oferhyrnes, and let the warranty nevertheless go forward, until it be known where it shall stop. Also we have ordained: that he who should vouch to warranty should have unlying witness to the effect that he rightfully vouched it; or should bring forward an oath which he might believe who made the claim. So we have ordained the same respecting ownership; that he should adduce unlying witness thereof, or bring forward the oath, if he could, of persons unchosen, by which the claimant should be bound. But if he could not, then should be named to him six men of the same neighbourhood wherein he was resident, and of the six let him get one for one ox, or for that cattle which may be the worth of this, and afterward let it increase, according to the value of the property, if there ought to be more. Also we have ordained: if there were any evil-minded man who would put another's property in borh for wither-tihthe, that he should then declare on oath that he did not Afrom any knavery, but with full right, without fraud and guile," and that he then should there do as he durst with whom it is attached: "like as he it owned, so be it vouched to warranty."

Of him who denies justice to another.

2. Also we have ordained of what he were worthy who denied justice to another, either in boc-land or in folc-land, and that he should give him a term respecting the folc-land when he should do him justice before the reeve. But if he had no right either to the boc-land or to the folc-land, that he who denied the right should be liable in thirty shillings to the king; and for the second offense, the like: for the third offense, the king's oferhyrnes, that is, 120 shillings, unless he previously desist.

Of perjurers.

3. Also we have ordained concerning those men who were perjurers; if that were made evident, or an oath failed to them, or were out-proved, that they afterwards should not be oath-worthy, but ordeal-worthy.

Of frith.

4. King Edward exhorted his witan when they were at Exeter, that they should all search out how their frith might be better than it had previously been: for it seemed to him that it was more indifferently observed than it should be, what he had formerly commanded. He then asked them, who would apply to its amendment, and be in that fellowship that he was, and love that which he loved, and shun that which he shunned, both on sea and land? That is, then, that no man deny justice to another: if any one do so, let him make bot as it before is written; for the first offence, with thirty shillings; and for the second offence, the like; and for the third, with 120 shillings to the king.

Of the reeve who does not lawfully exact.

5. And if the reeve do not lawfully exact it, with the witness of those men who are assigned him to bear witness, then let him make bot of my oferhyrnes, with 120 shillings.

Of those accused of theft.

6. If any one be accused of theft, then let those take him in borh who before commended him to his lord, that he may justify himself thereof; or let other friends, if they have any, do the same. If he knows not who will take him in borh, then let those on whom it is incumbent take an in borh on his property. If he have neither property nor other borh, then let him be held to judgment.

Of those who will not seek their own.

7. Also I will that every man have constantly those men ready on his land, who may lead those men who desire to seek their own, and for no meed-monies prevent them, nor anywhere protect or harbour a convicted offender, willfully nor violently.

Of those who protect a convicted offender.

8. If any one disregard this, and break his oath and his wed, which all the nation has given, let him make bot as the doom-book may teach: but if he will not, let him forfeit the friendship of us all, and all that he has. If any one harbour him after that, let him make bot as the doom-book may say, and as he ought who harbours a fugitive, if it be here within. If it be within the east-country, let him make bot according as the frith-gewritu say.

Of him who forfeits his freedom.

9. If any one, through a charge of theft, forfeit his freedom, and deliver himself up, and his kindred forsake him, and he know not who shall make bot for him; let him then be worthy of the theow-work which thereto belongs, and let the wer abate for the kindred.

Of him who receives another man's man without leave.

10. Let no man receive another man's man without his leave whom he before followed, and until he be blameless towards every hand. If any one do so, let him make bot of my oferhyrnes.

Of gemot-terms.

11. I will that each reeve have a gemot always once in fourweeks; and so do that every man be worthy of folk-right: and that every suit have an end and a term when it shall be brought forward. If that any one disregard, let him make bot as we before ordained.

The Laws of Alfred, Guthrum, and Edward the Elder

These are the dooms which King Alfred and King Guthrum chose. And this is the ordinance also which King Alfred and King Guthrum, and afterwards King Edward and King Guthrum, chose and ordained, when the English and Danes fully took to peace and to friendship; and the witan also, who were afterwards, oft and unseldom that same renewed and increased with good.

This is the first which they ordained: that they would love one God, and zealously renounce every kind of heathendom. And they established worldly rules also for these reasons, that they knew that else they might not many control, nor would many men else submit to divine bot as they should: and the worldly bot they established in common to Christ and the king, wheresoever a man would not lawfully submit to divine bot, by direction of the bishops.

1. And this then is the first which they ordained: that church-grith within the walls, and the king's hand-grith, stand equally inviolate.

2. If any one violate Christianity, or reverence heathenism, by word or by work, let him pay as well wer, as wite or lah-slit, according as the deed may be.

3. And if a man in orders steal, or fight, or forswear, or fornicate, let him make bot for it according as the deed may be, as well by wer, as by wite or by lah-slit; and, above all things, make bot before God as the canon teaches, and find borh thereof, or yield to prison. And if a mass-priest misdirect the people about a festival or about a fast, let him pay thirty shillings among the English, and among the Danes three half-marks. If a priest fetch not the chrism at the right term, or refuse baptism to him who has need thereof, let him pay wite among the English, and among the Danes lah-slit; that is, twelve ores.

Of incestuous persons.

4. And concerning incestuous persons, the witan have ordained that the king shall have the upper, and the bishop the nether, unless bot be made before God and before the world, according as the deed may be; so as the bishop may teach. If two brothers or near kinsmen commit fornication with the same woman, let them make bot very strictly, in such wise as it may be allowed, as well by wer, as by wite or by lah-slit, according as the deed may be. If a man in orders fordo himself with capital crime, let him be seized and held to the bishop's doom.

5. If a man guilty of death desire confession, let it never be denied him. And all God's dues let every one zealously further, by God's mercy, and by the wites which the witan have annexed thereto.

6. If any one withhold tithes, let him pay lah-slit among the Danes, wite among the English. If any one withhold Rom-feoh, let him pay lah-slit among the Danes, wite among the English. If any one discharge not light-scot, let him pay lah-slit among the Danes, wite among the English. If any one give not plough-alms, let him pay lah-slit among the Danes, wite among the English. If any one deny any divine dues, let him pay lah-slit among the Danes, wite among the English. As if he fight and wound any one, let him be liable in his wer. If he fell a man to death, let him then be an outlaw, and let every one of those seize him with hearm who desire right. And if he so do that any one kill him, for that he resisted God's law or the kings, if that be proved true, let him lie uncompensated.

Of workings on a festival-day.

7. If any one engage in Sunday marketing, let him forfeit the chattel, and twelve ores among the Danes, and thirty shillings among the English. If a freeman work on a festival-day, let him forfeit his freedom, or pay wite or lah-slit. Let a theow-man suffer in his hide or hide-gild. If a lord oblige his theow to work on a festival-day, let him pay lah-slit within the Danish law, and wite among the English.

Of feasts.

8. If a freeman break a lawful feast, let him pay wite or lahslit. If a theowman do so, let him suffer in his hide or hide-gild.

Of ordeals and oaths.

9. Ordeal and oaths are forbidden on festival-days and lawful fast-days; and he who shall break that, let him pay lah-slit among the Danes, and wite among the English. If it can be so ordered, no one condemned should ever be executed on the Sunday festival, but be secured and held till the festival be gone by.

10. If a limb-maimed man who has been condemned or forsaken, and he after that live three days then any one who is willing to take care of sore and soul may help him, with the bishop's leave.

Of witches, diviners, perjurers, etc.

11. If witches or diviners, perjurers or morth-workers, or foul, defiled, notorious adulteresses, be found anywhere within the land; let them be driven from the country, and the people cleansed, or let them totally perish within the country, unless they desist, and the more deeply make bot.

Of ecclesiastics and foreigners.

12. If any one wrong an ecclesiastic or a foreigner, through any means, as to money or as to life, then shall the king or the eorl there in the land, and the bishop of the people, be unto him in the place of a kinsman and of a protector, unless he have another; and let bot be strictly made, according as the deed may be, to Christ and to the king, as it is fitting; or let him avenge the deeds very deeply who is king among the people.

How a twelve-hynde man shall be paid for.

13. A twelve-hynde man's wer is twelve hundred shillings. A two-hynde man's wer is two hundred shillings. If any one be slain, let him be paid for according to his birth. And it is right that the slayer, after he has given wed for the wer, find, in addition, wer-borh according as shall thereto belong; that is, to a twelve-hynde's wer-borh, eight of the paternal kins and four of the maternal kin. When that is done, then let the king's mund be established, that is, that they all of either kindred, with their hands in common upon one weapon, engage to the mediator that the king's mund shall stand. In twenty-one days from that day let 120 shillings be paid as heals-fang at a twelve-hynde's wer. Heals-fang belongs to no kinsman, except to those who are within the degrees of blood. In twenty-one days from that day that the heals-fang is paid, let the manbot be paid; in twenty-one days from this, the fight-wite; in twenty-one days from this, the frum-gyld of the wer; and so forth, till it be fully paid, within the time that the witan have appointed. After this they must depart with love, if they desire to have full friendship. All men shall do with regard to the wer of a ceorl that which belongs to his condition, like as we have said about a twelve-hynde man.

Of Oaths.

Thus shall a man swear fealty oaths.

1. By the Lord, before whom this relic is holy, I will be to ____ faithful and true, and love all that he loves, and shun all that he shuns, according to God's law, and according to the world's principles, and never, by will nor by force, by word nor by work, do ought of what is loathful to him; on condition that he keep me as I am willing to deserve, and all that fulfil that our agreement was, when I to him submitted and chose his will.

Thus shall a man swear when he has discovered his property and brings it in process.

2. By the Lord, before whom this relic is holy, so I my suit prosecute with full folk-right, without fraud and without deceit, and without any guile, as was stolen from me the cattle ____ that I claim, and that I have attached with ____.

The other's oath with whom a man discovers his cattle.

3. By the Lord, I was not at rede nor at deed, neither counsellor nor doer, where were unlawfully led away _____'s cattle. But as I cattle have, so did I lawfully obtain it. And: as I vouch it to warranty, so did he sell it to me into whose hand I now set it. And: as I cattle have, so did it come to my own property and so it by folk-right my own possession is, and my rearing.

The oath of him who discovers his property that he does it not either for hatred or for envy.

4. By the Lord, I accuse not _____ either for hatred or for envy, or for unlawful lust of gain; nor know I anything soother; but as my informant to me said, and I myself in sooth believe, that he was the thief of my property.

The other's oath that he is guiltless.

5. By the Lord, I am guiltless, both in deed and counsel, and of the charge of which _____ accuses me.

His companion's oath who stands with him.

6. By the Lord, the oath is clean and unperjured which _____ has sworn.

Oath if a man finds his property unsound after he has bought it.

7. In the name of Almighty God, you did engage to me sound and clean that which you sold to me, and full security against afterclaim, on the witness of _____, who then was with us two.

How he shall swear who stands with another in witness.

8. In the name of Almighty God, as I here for _____ in true witness stand, unbidden and unbought, so I with my eyes over-saw, and with my ears over-heard, that which I with him say.

Oath that he knew not of foulness or fraud.

9. In the name of Almighty God, I knew not, in the things about which you sued, foulness or fraud, or infirmity or blemish, up to that day's-tide that I sold it to you: but it was both sound and clean, without any kind of fraud.

10. In the name of the living God, as I money demand, so have I lack of that which _____ promised me when I mine to him sold.

Denial.

11. In the name of the living God, I owe not to ____ sceatt or shilling, or penny or penny's worth; but I have discharged to him all that I owe him, so far as our verbal contracts were at first.

Of the oath and degree-bot of men in orders.

12. A mass-priest's oath, and a secular thane's, are in English law reckoned of equal value; and by reason of the seven church-degrees that the mass-priest, through the grace of God, has acquired, he is worthy of thane-right.

Of the Mercian oath.

13. A twelve-hynde man's oath stands for six ceorls oaths: because, if a man should avenge a twelve-hynde man, he will be fully avenged on six ceorls, and his wer-gild will be six ceorls' wer-gilds. Bequeathed it and died, he who it owned, with full folk-right, so as it his elders, with money and with life, lawfully got, and let and left, in power of him, whom they well gifted. And so it have, as he it gave, who had it to give, without fraud and unforbidden; and I will possess it, as my own property, that that I have; and ne'er for thee design, nor plot nor ploughland, nor turf nor toft, nor furrow nor foot-mark, nor land nor leasowe, nor fresh nor marsh, nor rough nor plain, by wood nor field, by land nor by strand, by weald nor by water, but that will maintain, the while that I live; for there is no man alive, who ever heard that any one made plaint against, or summoned him at the hundred, or anywhere at gemot, in market-place, or among church-folk, the while that he lived. Sackless he was in life, be he in the grave, so as he may. Do as I teach: be you with yours, and leave me with mine: I covet not yours, nor laeth nor land, nor sac nor soen: nor need you mine; nor design I to you anything.

The North People's Law.

1. The North people's king's geld is thirty thousand thrymsas; fifteen thousand thrymsas are for the wergild, and fifteen thousand for the cynedom. The wer belongs to the kindred, and the cynebot to the people.

2. An archbishop's and an aetheling's wer-gild is fifteen thousand thrymsas.

3. A bishop's and ealdorman's, eight thousand thrymsas.

4. A hold's and a king's high-reeves, four thousand thrymsas.

5. A mass-thane's and a secular thane's, two thousand thrymsas.

6. A ceorl's wergeld is two hundred and sixty-six thrymsas, that is two hundred shillings by Mercian law.

7. And if a Welsh-man thrive so that he have a hide of land, and can bring forth the king's gafol, then in his wergeld 110 shillings. And if he thrive not except to half a hide, then let his wer be eighty shillings.
8. If he have not any land, and yet be free, let him be paid for with seventy shillings.
9. And if a ceorlish man thrive, so that he have five hides of land for the king's ut-ware, and any one slay him, let him be paid for with two thousand thrymsas.
10. And though he thrive, so that he have a helm and a coat of mail, and a sword ornamented with gold, if he have not that land, he is nevertheless a ceorl.
11. And if his son and his son's son so thrive, that they have so much land; afterwards the offspring shall be of gesithcund race, at two thousand thrymsas.
12. And if they have not that, nor to that can thrive, let them be paid for as ceorlish.
13. Let the king's wergeld be with the English race, by folkright, thirty thousand thrymsas, and of these, let fifteen thousand be for the wer, and the other fifteen thousand for the cynebot. The wer belongs to the kindred of the royal family, and the cynebot to the people of the country.
14. An archbishop's and an eorl's wergeld is fifteen thousand thrymsas. . . .
18. A ceorl's wergeld is 267 thrymsas by the Danish law.
19. And a Welshman's wergeld, if he be to that degree enriched that he have a hide of land and property, and pay gafol to the king, it is then 220 shillings. But if he be only risen to half a hide, then let his wer be eighty shillings.
20. If he have no land, but is free, let him be paid for with seventy shillings.
21. If a ceorl be enriched to that degree, that he have five hides of land, and anyone slay him, let him be paid for with two thousand thrymsas.
22. And if he acquire so that he have a coat of mail and a helmet, and an over-gilded sword, if he have not that land, he is sithcund.
23. And if his son and the son's son that acquire, that they have so much land, let their successors be of the sithcund kin, and let them be paid for with two thousand thrymsas.

Of Mercian Law

A ceorl's wergeld is by the Mercian law 200 shillings. A thane's wergeld is six times as much, that is, twelve hundred shillings. Then is a king's simple wergeld six thanes' wer by Mercian law, that is, thirty thousand sceatts, and that is altogether 120 pounds. So much is the wergeld in the people's folkright by Mercian law. And for the cynedom there is due another such sum as bot for cynegild. The wer belongs to kindred, and the cynebot to the people.

Ranks.

Of people's ranks and law.

1. It is whilom, in the laws of the English, that people and law went by ranks, and then were the counsellors of the nation of worship worthy, each according to his condition, eorl and ceorl, thegn and theoden.
2. And if a ceorl thrived, so that he had fully five hides of his own land, church and kitchen, bell-house and burhgate-seat, and special duty in the king's hall, then was he thenceforth of thane-right worthy.
3. And if a thane thrived, so that he served the king, and on his summons, rode among his household; if he then had a thane who him followed, who to the king's utware, five hides had, and in the king's hall served his lord, and thrice with his errand went to the king; he might thenceforth, with his fore-oath, his lord represent, at various needs, and his plaint lawfully conduct, wheresover he ought.
4. And he who so prosperous a vice-gerent had not, swore to himself according to his right, or it forfeited.
5. And if a thane thrived, so that he became an eorl, then was he thenceforth of eorl-right worthy.
6. And if a merchant thrived, so that he fared thrice over the wide sea by his own means, then was he thenceforth of thane-right worthy.
7. And if there a scholar were, who through learning thrived, so that he had holy orders, and served Christ; then was he thenceforth of rank and power so much worthy, as then to those orders rightfully belonged, if he himself conducted as he should; unless he should misdo, so that he those orders' ministry might not minister.
8. And if it happened, that any one a man in orders, or a stranger, anywhere injured, by word or work; then pertained it to king and to the bishop, that they that should make good, as they soon might.

The Laws of King Athelstan 924-939 A.D.

I, Aethelstan king, with the counsel of Wulfhelm, archbishop, and of my other bishops, make known to the reeves at each burh, and beseech you, in God's name, and by all his saints, and also by my friendship, that you first of my own goods render the tithes both of livestock and of the year's earthly fruits, so that they may most rightly be either meted, or told, or weighed out; and let the bishops then do the like from their own goods, and my ealdormen and my reeves the same. And I will, that the bishop and the reeves command it to all those who ought to obey them, that it be done at the right term. Let us bear in mind how Jacob the patriarch spoke: "Decimas et hostias pacificas offeram tibi;" and how Moses spoke in God's law: "Decimas et primitias non tardabis offerre Domino." It is for us to think how awfully it is declared in the books: If we will not render the tithes to God, that he will take from us the nine parts when we least expect; and, moreover, we have the sin in addition thereto. And I will also that my reeves do, that there be given the churchscots and the soulscots at the places to which they rightly belong: and plow-almes yearly, on this condition; that they shall enjoy it at the holy places who are willing to serve their churches, and of God and of me are willing to deserve it: but let him who will not, forfeit the bounty, or again turn to right. Now you hear, says the king, what I give to God, and what you ought to fulfil by my oferhyrnes. And do you also so that you may give to me my own what you for me may acquire. I will not that you unjustly anywhere acquire aught for me; but I will grant to you your own justly, on this condition, that you yield to me mine; and shield both yourselves, and those whom you ought to exhort, against God's anger and against my oferhyrnes.

Of thieves.

1. First: that no thief be spared, who may be taken hand-haebbende, above twelve years, and above eight pence. And if any one so do, let him pay for the thief according to his wer, and let it not be the more settled for the thief, or that he clear himself thereby. But if he will defend himself, or flees away, then let him not be spared. If a thief be brought into prison: that he be forty days in prison, and let him be released thereout with 120 shillings, and let the kindred enter into borh for him that he evermore desist. And if after that he steal, let them pay for him according to his wer, or bring him again therein: and if any one stand up for him, let him pay for him according to his wer, as well to the king as to him to whom it lawfully belongs: and let every man of those there who stand by him pay to the king 120 shillings as wite.

Of lordless men.

2. And we have ordained: respecting those lordless men of whom no law can be got, that the kindred be commanded that they domicile him to folkright, and find him a lord in the folkmote; and if they then will not or cannot produce him at the term, then be he thenceforth a flyma, and let him slay him for a thief who can come at him: and whoever after that shall harbour him, let him pay for him according to his wer, or by it clear himself.

Of denial of right.

3. And the lord who denies justice, and upholds his evil-doing than, and the wite be applied to on that account; let him pay the ceapgeld, and give to the king 120 shillings: and he who applies to the king before he has prayed for justice, as oft it shall behove him; let him pay the like wite that the other should if he had denied him justice. And the lord who is privy to his theow's theft, and it is made manifest against him, let him forfeit the theow, and be liable in his wer, for the first time. If he do so oftener, let him be liable in all that he has: and, also, such of the king's horderes, or of our reeves, as shall be privy to the thieves who have stolen, let him be subject to the like. . . .

Of Witchcrafts.

6. And we have ordained respecting witch-crafts, and lybacs, and morthdaeds: if any one should be thereby killed, and he could not deny it, that he be liable in his life. But if he will deny it, and at threefold ordeal shall be guilty; that he be 120 days in prison: and after that let kindred take him out, and give to the king 120 shillings, and pay the wer to his kindred, and enter into borh for him, that he evermore desist from the like.

Of incendiaries.

7. Let incendiaries, and those who avenge a thief, be worthy of the like law. And he who will avenge a thief, and wounds no man, let him give to the king 120 shillings, as wite for the assault.

Of the single ordeal.

8. And we have ordained respecting the single ordeal, for those men who have been often accused, and have been found guilty, and they know not who shall take them in borh; let them be brought into prison: and let them be delivered out as here before is ordained.

Of landless men.

9. And we have ordained: if any landless man should become a follower of another shire, and again seek his kinsfolk; that he may harbour him on this condition, that he present him to folkright if he there do any wrong, or make bot for him.

Of attaching cattle.

10. He who attaches cattle, let five of his neighbours be named to him; and of the five let him get one who will swear with him that he takes it to himself by folkright: and he who will keep it to himself, to him let there be named ten men, and let him get two of them, and give the oath that it was born on his property, without the rimath; and let his cyreath stand for over twenty pence.

Of exchange.

11. And let no man exchange any property without the witness of the reeve, or of the mass-priest, or of the landlord, or of the hordere, or of other unlying man. If any one do so, let him give thirty shillings, and let the landlord take possession of the exchange.

Of wrongful witness.

12. But if it be found that any of these have given wrongful witness, that his witness never stand again for aught, and that he also give thirty shillings as wite.

That a man buy not out of port.

13. And we have ordained: that no man buy any property out of port over twenty pence; but let him buy there within, on the witness of the portreeve, or of another unlying man: or further, on the witness of the reeves at the folkmote.

Of repairing of burhs.

14. And we ordain: that every burh be repaired fourteen days over Rogation Days. Secondly: that every marketing be within port.

Of moneyers.

15. Thirdly: that there be one money over all the king's dominion, and that no man mint except within port. And if the moneyer be guilty, let the hand be struck off that wrought the offense, and, be set up on the money-smithy but if it be an accusation, and he is willing to clear himself; then let him go to the hot-iron, and clear the hand therewith with which he is charged that fraud to have wrought. And if at the ordeal he should be guilty, let the like be done as here before ordained.

In Canterbury seven moneyers; four the king's, and two the bishop's, one the abbot's.

At Rochester three; two the king's, and one the bishop's.

At London eight.

At Winchester six.

At Lewes two.

At Hastings one.

Another at Chichester.

At Hampton two.

At Wareham two.

At Exeter two.

At Shaftesbury two.

Else, at the other burhs one.

Of shieldwrights.

16. Fourthly: that no shieldwright cover a shield with sheep's skin; and if he so do, let him pay thirty shillings.

17. Fifthly: that every man have to the plough two well-horsed men.

Of those who take meed-money of a thief.

18. Sixthly: if any one take meed-money of a thief, and suppress another's right, let him be liable in his wer.

Of horses.

19. Seventhly: that no man part with a horse over sea, unless he wish to give it.

Of a theowman who is guilty at the ordeal.

20. And we have ordained respecting a theowman: if he were guilty at the ordeal, that the ceapgeld should be paid; and that he be scourged thrice, or a second geld be given: and be the wite of half value for theows.

Of him who fails to attend the gemot.

21. If any one, when summoned fail to attend the gemot thrice; let him pay the king's oferhyrnes, and let it be announced seven days before the gemot is to be. But if he will not do right, nor pay the oferhyrnes; then let all the chief men belonging to the burh ride to him, and take all that he has, and put him in bohr. But if any one will not ride with his fellows, let him pay the king's oferhyrnes. And let it be announced at the gemot, that the frith be kept toward all that the king wills to be within the frith, and theft be foregone by his life and by all that he has. And he who for the wites not desist, then let all the chief men belonging to the burh ride to him, and take all that he has; and let the king take possession of half, of half the men who may be in the riding; and place him in borh. If he knows not who will be his borh, let them imprison him. If he will not suffer it, let him be killed, unless he escape. If any one will avenge him, or be at feud with any of them, then be he foe of the king, and to all his friends. If he escape, and any one harbour him, let him be liable to his wer; unless he shall dare to clear himself by the flyma's-wer, that he knew he was a flyma.

Of him who compounds for an ordeal.

22. If any one compound for an ordeal, let him compound for the ceapgeld, as he can, and not for the wite; unless he is willing to grant it to whom it may belong.

Of him who receives another man's man.

23. And let no man receive another man's man, without his leave whom he before followed. If any one so do; let him give up the man, and make bot the king's oferhynes. And let no one dismiss his accused man from him before he has done what is right.

Of him who gives wed for an ordeal.

24. If any one gives wed for an ordeal, then let him come three days before to the mass-priest who is to hallow it; and let him feed himself with bread and with water, and salt, and herbs, before he shall go to it; and let him attend mass each of the three days, and make an oblation, and go to the house on the day that he shall go to the ordeal: and then swear the oath that he is, according to the folkright, guiltless of the charge, before he goes to the ordeal. And if it be water, that he dive an ell and a half by the rope; if it be iron ordeal, let it be three days before the hand be undone. And let every man begin his charge with a fore-oath, as we before ordained: and be each of those fasting on either hand, who may be there together, by God's command and the archbishop's: and let there be on either side not more than twelve. If the accused man be with a larger company than some twelve, then be the ordeal void, unless they will go from him.

Of him who buys property.

25. And he who buys property with witnesses, and if after obliged to vouch it to warranty, then let him receive it from whom he before had bought it, whether he be free or bond, whichsoever he be. And let no marketing be on Sundays; but if any one do so, let him forfeit the goods, and pay thirty shillings as wite.

Of perjurers.

26. And he who shall swear a false oath, and it be made clear against him; that he never after be oath-worthy, nor let him lie within a hallowed burial-place, though he die, unless he have the testimony of the bishop in whose shrift-shire he may be, that he has made such bot as his confessor prescribed to him. And let his confessor announce to the bishop, within thirty days, whether he would turn to the bot. If he do not so, let him make bot in such wise as the bishop shall prescribe to him.

27. But if any one of my reeves will not do this, and care less about it than we have commanded; then let him pay my oferhynes, and I will find another who will. And let the bishop exact the oferhynes of the reeve for the first time five pounds; for the second time, his wer; for the third time, let him forfeit all that he has, and the friendship of us all. All this was established in the great synod at Greatanlea: in which was the archbishop Wulfhelm, with all the noblemen and witan whom King Aethelstan gather. . .

Doom concerning hot iron and water.

28. And concerning the ordeal we enjoin by command of God, and of the archbishop, and of all the bishops: that no man come within the church after the fire is borne in with which the ordeal shall be heated, except the mass-priest, and him who shall go thereto: and let there be measured nine feet from the stake to the mark, by the man's feet who goes thereto. But if it be water, let it be heated till it low to boiling. And be the kettle of iron or of brass, of lead or of clay. And if it be a single accusation, let the hand dive after the stone up to the wrist, and if it be threefold, up to the elbow. And when the ordeal is ready, then let two men go in of either side; and be they agreed that it is so hot as we before have said. And let go an equal number of men of either side, and stand on both sides of the ordeal, along the church; and let these all be fasting, and abstinent from their wives on that night; and let the mass-priest sprinkle holy water over them all, and let each of them taste of the holy water, and give them all the book and the image of Christ's rood to kiss: and let no man mend the fire any longer when the hallowing is begun; but let the iron lie upon the hot embers till the last collect: after that let it be laid upon the stapela; and let there be no other speaking within, except that they earnestly pray to Almighty God that he make manifest what is truest. And let him go thereto; and let his hand be enveloped, and be it postponed till after the third day, whether it be foul or clean within the envelope. And he who shall break this law, be the ordeal with respect to him void, and let him pay to the king 120 shillings as wite. Walreaf is the nithing's deed: if any one desire to deny it, let him do so with eight and forty full-born thanes.

The Laws of King Edmund I, 939-946 A.D.

King Edmund assembled a great synod at London, during the holy Easter tide, as well of ecclesiastical as of secular degree. There was Oda archbishop, and Wulfstan archbishop, and many other bishops, meditating concerning the condition of their souls, and of those who were subject to them.

Of the chastity of ecclesiastics.

1. This is the first: that those holy orders who have to teach God's people by their life's example, hold their chastity according to their degree, whichsoever it may be. If they do not so, then are they worthy of that which in the canon is ordained; that is, that they forfeit their worldly possessions and a consecrated burial-place, unless they make bot.

Of tithes and churchscots.

2. A tithe we enjoin to every Christian man by his Christendom and churchscot, and Rome-feoh, and plough-alms. And if any one will not do so, let him be excommunicated.

Of homicide.

3. If any one shed a Christian man's blood, let him not come into the king's presence, ere he go to penance, as the bishop may teach him, and his confessor direct him.

Of nun's fornication and of adultery.

4. He who commits fornication with a nun, let him not be worthy of a consecrated burial place (unless he make bot), any more than a manslayer. We have ordained the same respecting adultery.

Of the repairing of churches.

5. We have also ordained: that every bishop repair the house of God in his own [district], and also remind the king that all God's churches be well conditioned as is very needful for us.

Of perjurers and lyblacs.

6. Those who swear falsely and work lyblac, let them be forever cast out of all communion with God, unless they turn to right repentance.

The Laws of King Edgar, 959-975 A.D.

This is the Ordinance how the Hundred shall be held.

1. That they meet always within four weeks: and that every man do justice to another.

2. That a thief shall be pursued..... If there be present need, let it be known to the hundred-man, and let him [make it known] to the tithing-men; and let all go forth to where God may direct them to go: let them do justice on the thief, as it was formerly the enactment of Edmund. And let the ceapgeld be paid to him who owns the cattle, and the rest be divided into two; half to the hundred, half to the lord, excepting men; and let the lord take possession of the men.

3. And the man who neglects this, and denies the doom of the hundred, and the same be afterwards proved against him; let him pay to the hundred thirty pence, and for the second time sixty pence; half to the hundred, half to the lord. If he do so a third time, let him pay half a pound: for the fourth time, let him forfeit all that he owns, and be an outlaw, unless the king allow him to remain in the country.

4. And we have ordained concerning unknown cattle; that no one should possess it without the testimonies of the men of the hundred, or of the tithing-man; and that he be a well trusty man: and, unless he have either of these, let no vouching to warranty be allowed him.

5. We have also ordained: if the hundred pursue a track into another hundred, that notice be given to the hundred-man, and that he then go with them. If he neglect this, let him pay thirty shillings to the king.

6. If any one flinch from justice and escape, let him who held him to answer for the offense pay the anylde. And if any one accuse him of having sent him away, let him clear himself, as it is established in the country.

7. In the hundred, as in any other gemot, we ordain: that folkright be pronounced in every suit, and that a term be fixed when it shall be fulfilled. And he who shall break that term, unless it be by his lord's decree, let him make bot with thirty shillings, and, on the day fixed, fulfil that which he ought to have done before.

8. An ox's bell, and a dog's collar, and a blast-horn, either of these three shall be worth a shilling, and each is reckoned an informer.

9. Let the iron that is for the threefold ordeal weigh three pounds; and for the single, one pound.

Glossary I

The texts above contain a large number of unfamiliar Anglo-Saxon legal terms. Greg Rose [greg@bronze.lcs.mit.edu] provided further information on both the the manuscript history of the texts, and a glossary of the terms.

This glossary should be prefaced by noting that not all the definitions provided are uncontroversial, since a number of the issues underlying some of these terms are still very much a matter of scholarly debate (also, a number of the terms are combinations of modern English and Old English).

Also see the more general list of [Medieval Terms [At ORB] prepared by Prof. Arkenberg.]

| | |
|--------------------|--|
| aetheling | a king-worthy man of the extended royal family |
| aewdas | witness, usually by compurgation |
| aldor | elder, senior, lord (often in the form ealdor) |
| ambihtsmith | court smith, court carpenter, court handyman |
| angylde | compensation payment |
| bell-house | belfry |

| | |
|-----------------------|---|
| birele | cupbearer, steward |
| boc-lands | lands for which charters were held |
| borh | pledge, security, debt |
| borhbryce | breach of surety |
| bot | remedy, relief, compensation |
| burh | dwelling |
| burh-bryce | breach of a dwelling (i.e., "breaking and entering") |
| burhgate-seat | town or fortification gate |
| canne | cup |
| ceapgeld | market price, purchase price |
| cear-wund | badly (perhaps "mortally") wounded |
| ceorl | freeman (of the lowest class) |
| ceorlish | ceorl-like (note that "churlish" in modern English has a much more pejorative tone than ceorlisc) |
| churchealdor | Church-elder |
| church-frith | sanctuary, a special protection under ecclesiastical auspices |
| church-grith | sanctuary |
| church-hlaford | lord of a church |
| churchscots | church tax or payment |
| churchsocns | ecclesiastical jurisdiction, sanctuary |
| cynebot | royal compensation |
| cynedom | royal law, kingdom |

| | |
|---------------------|---|
| cyreath | oath of compurgation undertaken by accused and compurgators |
| drihtinbeah | payment to a lord in compensation for killing his freeman |
| ealdorman | noble ruler of a county (and that sweeps under the rug one of the most bitterly contested questions in AS history -- relative power of king and ealdorman.) |
| edorbryce | house-breaking |
| eorl | borrow-word from Old Norse jarl, often used in place of ealdorman in documents from Cnut's reign forward. |
| eorl-right | earl's right, right of an ealdorman |
| esne | slave, servant, retainer |
| esne-workmen | hirelings, mercenaries, day-laborers |
| fahman | foeman, usually the object of a blood-feud |
| feahfang | bribery (especially the act of taking a bribe) |
| fedesl | shouldn't this be "fedels" = feed, upkeep, fatted food animals? |
| feorm | provisions, foodstuffs, a grant of land in exchange for partial usufruct |
| fioh | cattle, chattel, money, riches, fee |
| flet | dwelling, hall |
| flyma | fugitive, outlaw, exile |
| flyma's-wer | legal value (wergeld) of an outlaw |
| folc-land | Eric John's work tries to clarify the meaning of this term, but I don't think anyone really knows precisely what it means |
| folk-leasing | shouldn't this be "folcleasung" = slander? |

| | |
|-----------------------|--|
| folkmete | folkmeet, meeting of a district (usually a hundred) for legal actions and to hear royal writs |
| folkright | common law, folk law |
| forlongen | ancient, long ago |
| frith-gewritu | peace agreement |
| frum-gyld | first installment of a payment |
| fryth | peace, restoration of rights, amnesty |
| fyrð | military expedition, royal levy (this is another complicated issue) |
| gaengang | return |
| gafol | tribute, tax, debt |
| gemot | meeting |
| gemot-terms | shouldn't this be "gemottermen" = term of the sitting of a district assembly or royal council meeting? |
| gesithcund | retainer-like, fit to be a thegn |
| hand-grith | security, surety given by the king's hand |
| hand-haebbende | a thief caught in the act (e.g., "red-handed"). |
| heals-fang | a fine, a preferential share of a wergeld |
| hearm | damage, injury, tort |
| hloth | troop, band, gang (e.g., of thieves or robbers) |
| hloth-bot | penalty for being a member of a band or gang |
| hold | faithful, loyal; holder of an allod |
| hordere | treasurer, steward, hoarder |
| laadrinc | shouldn't this be "ladrinc" = escort? |

| | |
|---------------------|---|
| laeth | landed property, a subdivision of the county |
| lah-slit | fine for breach of the law (used in Danelaw) |
| leod | man, people; wergeld for manslaughter |
| leodgeld | wergeld for manslaughter |
| leud-gelds | variant of leodgeld |
| light-scot | light tax (usually in support of lighting for a church or monastery) |
| lybacs | shouldn't this be "lyblac" = witchcraft, magic, sorcery or "lyblaeca" = sorcerer? |
| lyswe | corrupt, pustulent |
| maeg-burg | family, kinship group |
| maegship | kinship |
| maerra | is this "maerac" = boundary-oak, or "maere" = pure, sterling, well-known? |
| manwyrth | value or price of a man |
| morgengyftt | morning-gift |
| morthdaed | murder, mortal sin |
| morth-worker | shouldn't this be "morthweorc" = an act which causes death? |
| mund | protection, brideprice |
| mundbyrd | protection, patronage |
| mynsterham | monastery |
| nithing | coward, outlaw (severe term of opprobrium, often with overtones of sexual deviance) |
| oferhynes | disobedience (particularly disobedience of royal laws) |

| | |
|----------------------|--|
| orwige | corwardly, unwarlike, free of liability for homicide |
| portreeve | shouldn't this be "portgerefa" = port-reeve, mayor? |
| riht hamscyld | legal means of protecting one's home |
| rimath | oath of compurgation |
| Rome-feoh | Peter's pence |
| Rom-feoh | Peter's pence |
| sac | dispute, jurisdiction, right to empanel a court |
| scaetts | shouldn't this be "sceatt" = coin, money, twentieth part of a shilling |
| sithcund | fit to be a thegn |
| six-hynde | pertaining to the class the wergeld of which was 600 shillings |
| socn | inquiry, right to collect fines |
| soulscots | shouldn't this be "sawolscot" = soulscot, payment to the church for burial |
| stapela | stake, post |
| stermelda | complainant, informer |
| thegn | retainer, minister |
| theoden | chief, king, God |
| theow-men | servants |
| theow-work | slave-work, servant-work |
| thrymsas | tremise (equal to three denarii) |
| tun | farm, manor, dwelling, village |
| twy-hynde | having a wergeld of 200 shillings |

| | |
|----------------------|--|
| ut-ware | foreign defense, defense against outsiders |
| walreaf | the taking of spoils from the slain |
| wed | pledge, security, dowry |
| wedbryce | treachery |
| wegreaf | highway robbery |
| wer | man, money value of a man's life |
| wer-borh | pledge for the payment of wergeld |
| wergeld | money value of a man's life |
| wic-reeve | reeve of a wic (village, town), bailiff, tax-collector |
| witan | royal council |
| wite | punishment, penalty, contribution to the king |
| wither-tihhle | counter-charge |

Manuscript History of the Texts

[The following note is by Greg Rose. It begins by address the relationship of the "North People's Law", the "Mercian Law", and the "Laws of Alfred, Guthrum and Edward the Elder", a relationship not entirely clear in the printed edition used for this etext.]

The manuscript history of these legal texts about which is complicated, and I am not entirely certain whether you mean the Northhymbra preosta lagu or the Northleoda laga.

The Laws of Alfred and Ine (ff. 9-32), the Mirca laga (ff. 38v-39v), and the Northleoda laga (ff. 93v-94) are found in the Textus Roffensis (s.xii1). Alfred-Ine is also found in Cambridge, CCC 173, ff. 33-52v (the Parker Chronicle, s.x - s.xi), Cambridge, CCC 383, pp. 13-42 (s. xi/xii -- which also contains Alfred & Guthrum, Edward and Guthrum, and many other legal texts), and BL, Cotton Nero A.i, ff. 45-48 and 51-57v (s. xi med. -- contains many other legal texts as well), BL, Add. 43703, ff. 236v-255 (copied by Nowell -- original ms. BL, Cotton Otho B.xi was severely damaged in the 1731 fire).

The Mirca laga is extant in Cambridge, CCC 190, pp. 418-420 (s. xi1) and Cambridge, CCCC 201, pp. 102-103 (s. xi med.), and the Textus Roffensis. The Northhymbra preosta lagu is found in Cambridge, CCC 201, pp. 43-46 and Brussels, Bibliotheque Royale 8558-63 (2498), f. 140r (s. xii in.) The Northleoda laga is extant in Cambridge, CCC 201, p. 102.

The collection of the Laws of Alfred and Ine (which is itself a composite text), the Mirca laga, and the Northleoda laga in the Textus Roffensis is an editorial decision by a twelfth-century compiler. There are good reasons for believing that these law codes were originally separate texts (as was the Northhymbra preosta laga).

Glossary II: Anglo-Saxon Laws and Customs: Vocabulary From Thatcher edition

(Oliver J. Thatcher, ed., The Library of Original Sources (Milwaukee: University Research Extension Co., 1907), Vol. IV: The Early Medieval World, pp. 209-211)

After-geld: after-payment.

Aewda: oath-giver, compurgator.

Aldor: cf. ealdor.

Ambiht-smith: smith or carpenter.

Angylde: price fixed by law.

Ath: oath;

Fore-ath., preliminary oath;

Rim-ath: oath by accused and compurgators together.

Birele: cup-bearer.

Blot: sacrifice or offering to idols.

Boc-land: land held by charter.

Bold-gaetal: lord's estate (?).

Borh: surety;

Borhbryce: breach of surety.

Bot: compensation.

Bryce: breach, violation.

Brygc, bryc, bric: bridge.

Burh: castle or dwelling.

Bythfytling: fillings of the butts (meaning uncertain).

Can, canne: clearance, averment.

Ceap: bargain.

Ceapgeld: sale's price.

Ceorl: churl, simple freeman.

Cyne: kin.

Cynebot, cynegeld: part of the fine for killing the king which went to the folk as compensation.

Drihtinbeah: lord-ring, lord's compensation.

Drinclean: payment due from tenant to lord for ale.

Ealdor, ealdorman: chief, governor of a province.

Edor: homestead, farmhouse.

Eorl: noble, nobleman.

Esne: serf. cf. theow.

Faethth: feud.

Fah: foe.

Fare: go.

Feaxfang: seizing by the hair.

Feoh, fioh: money, payment.

Feorm, firma, farm: rent in kind paid by tenants.

Flet: house, home.

Flyma: runaway, fugitive.

Flymanfyrnth: harboring a fugitive.

Folcland: common land, held by the folk or nation.

Foresteal: an assault.

Forespeca, forspreca: advocate.

Fosterlean: remuneration for rearing a child.

Frith: peace.

Frumgeld: first payment of wer.

Frumtyhtle: first accusation.

Ful: unconsecrated ground.

Fyrd: army, general levy.

Gaenggang: pregnant (?)

Gafol: rent.

Gafolland: rent-land.

Gemot: meeting, court.

Geneat: a servile tenant.

Gild, guild: club.

Grith: peace, protection.

Hadbot: compensation for injury, to a person in holy orders.

Hamscyld: shoulder-blade (?).

Healsfang: pillory.

Hearm: hue and cry

Heorthfaest: having a fixed dwelling.

Hion: membrane, covering.

Hlafaeta: loaf-eater, servant.

Hlaford: loaf-giver, lord.

Hlafordesgifu: gift to lord, a form of rent.

Hloth: a following, any number of men from eight to thirty-five.

Hold: lord, noble.

Homola: one whose head has been shaved (?) Hordere: treasurer.

Hynden: an association of ten men (?).

Inborh: security, pledge.

Inland: demesne land, lord's land.
Laadring: guide, avant-courier.
Lad: purgation, exculpation; also, a form of service consisting in supplying the lord with beasts of burden.
Laet: half-free, a class between slaves and freemen.
Lahslit: fine for offences committed by Danes, corresponding to Anglo-Saxon wite.
Landrica, Landhlaford: lord of the soil, landlord.
Landceap, landcop: purchase of land.
Leod: man, people.
Leodgeld, leudgeld, wergeld: fine paid for killing a man.
Liblac, lyblac: witchcraft.
Lyswe, leaswe: injury of some kin (uncertain).
Maegburh: kindred, kin.
Maegbot: compensation paid to family.
Maerra, maere peningas: (money of some kind).
Mancus: thirty pennies.
Manung: district over which reeve has jurisdiction.
Manwyrth, wergeld: cf. Leodgeld.
Methel: council, meeting.
Morgengifu: morning-gift, gift from husband to wife on the morning after marriage.
Morth: murder.
Mund, mundbyrd: protection, guardianship. Mynster, minster: monastery.
Mynsterham: dwelling house of monastery (?).
Oferhynes: contempt; disobedience; also, penalty attached thereto.
Ora: sixteen pennies.
Orwige: outlawed.
Reaflac: robbery.
Reeve, gerefa: official, especially sheriff.
Romfeoh: Peter's Pence.
Sac: right of a lord to private jurisdiction.
Sceat, scaet: four sceats equal one penny
Scip: ship.
Sithcund, gesithcund: belonging to king's followers.
Socn: sanctuary, right of protection.
Stauela: settle, bench.
Stermelda: court officer (uncertain).
Syxhyndeman: one whose wergeld is 600 shillings.
Thegn: knight, nobleman.
Theow: slave.
Thrymsas: three pennies of Mercian money.
Tihtbysig: of bad repute.
Tihtle: accusation.
Furmtihtle: first accusation.
Withertihtle: cross-action.
Tun: villa, dwelling, town.
Twelfhyndeman: one whose wergeld is 1200 shillings.
Twyhyndeman: one whose wergeld is 200 shillings (lowest class of freeman).

Utware: (uncertain, perhaps a form of tenure)

Walreaf: despoiling the dead.

Wealh, wylisc: British, Welsh.

Wed: pledge, security.

Wer, wergild: cf. leodgeld.

Wic: town.

Wita: member of supreme council.

Wite: fine.

Source:

From: Oliver J. Thatcher, ed., The Library of Original Sources (Milwaukee: University Research Extension Co., 1901), Vol. IV: The Early Medieval World, pp. 211-239.

Scanned by Jerome S. Arkenberg, Cal. State Fullerton. The text has been modernized by Prof. Arkenberg.

This text is part of the Internet Medieval Source Book. The Sourcebook is a collection of public domain and copy-permitted texts related to medieval and Byzantine history.

Unless otherwise indicated the specific electronic form of the document is copyright. Permission is granted for electronic copying, distribution in print form for educational purposes and personal use. If you do reduplicate the document, indicate the source. No permission is granted for commercial use.

© Paul Halsall June 1998

halsall@murray.fordham.edu

[\[contents\]](#)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Secondary Sources

- Abbott, I.R., and R.E. Latham. "Caterpillars of the commonwealth." Speculum, XXX (1955), 229-32.
- Alsford, Stephen. Influences upon the Development of Urban Administration in Medieval Norwich. Hon. B.A. thesis: Carleton University, 1977.
- Alsford, Stephen. "Thomas le Rente: a medieval town ruler." Proc. S.I.A., XXXV (1982), 105-115.
- Bacon, Nathaniel. The Annalls of Ipswche. The Lawes, Customes, and Governmt of the Same 1654. Ed. W.H. Richardson. Ipswich, 1884.
- Beloe, Edward M. "Freebridge marshland hundred and the making of Lynn." N.A., XII (1895), 311-34.
- Benham, W.G. "The town charters and other borough records of Colchester." Archaeological Journal, LXIV (1907), 203-09.
- Benham, W.G. "Roger Chamberlayn of Colchester Castle." Trans. E.A.S., XVI (1921-23), 42-47.
- Benham, W.G. "Colchester merchants' sea adventure in 1388." Essex Review, XLIII (1934), 78-81.
- Benham, W.G. "A Colchester town clerk's litigation over an 'indulgence'." Essex Review, XLIV (1935), 113-14.
- Benham, W.G. "The chapel of the Holy Cross in Crouch Street, Colchester. A deed of 1 August 1392." Essex Review, XLV (1936), 33-35.
- Beresford, M.W. Lay Subsidies and Poll Taxes. London, 1963.
- Beresford, M.W. New Towns of the Middle Ages. London, 1967.

Blake, W.J. "Thomas Wetherby." N.A., XXXII (1961), 60-72.

Bradfer-Lawrence, H.L. "The merchants of Lynn." Pp.145-203 in A Supplement to Blomefield's Norfolk, ed. Clement Ingleby. London, 1929.

Breslow, Boyd. "The social status and economic interests of Richer de Refham, Lord Mayor of London." Journal of Medieval History, III (1977), 135-45.

Bridbury, A.R. Economic Growth: England in the Later Middle Ages. London, 1962.

Britnell, R.H. Colchester and the Countryside in the 14th Century: a Search for Interdependence between Urban and Rural Economy. PhD thesis: Cambridge University, 1970.

Cam, Helen. Liberties and Communities in Medieval England. 2nd ed. London, 1963.

Carus-Wilson, Eleanora. "The Iceland trade." In Studies in English Trade in the Fifteenth Century. Ed. E. Power and M.M. Postan. 1933.

Clanchy, M.T. From Memory to Written Record: England 1066-1307. London, 1979.

Clark, Andrew. "Maldon civil courts, 1402." Essex Review, XVI (1907), 126-33.

Clark, Cecily, and Dorothy Owen. "Lexicographical notes from King's Lynn." N.A., XXXVII (1978), 56-69.

Clarke, Helen, and Alan Carter. Excavations in King's Lynn 1963-1970. Society for Medieval Archaeology, 1977.

Clarke, Maude Violet. The Medieval City-State: an Essay on Tyranny and Federation in the Later Middle Ages. 2nd ed. Cambridge, 1966.

Clarke, Maude Violet. Medieval Representation and Consent: a Study of Early Parliaments in England and Ireland, with Special Reference to the 'Modus Tenendi Parliamentum'. London, 1936.

Clegg, Muriel. "The chapel of St. Edmund Pountenay in Ipswich." Proc. S.I.A., XXXIV (1977-79), 171-79.

Colby, Charles W. "The growth of oligarchy in English towns." E.H.R., V (1890), 633-53.

Colchester Archaeological Trust. Newsletter, no.3 (1978).

Compton, C.H. "Notes on ancient Yarmouth." Journal of the British Archaeological

Association, XXXVI (1880), 6-14.

Cozens-Hardy, Basil, and Ernest A. Kent. The Mayors of Norwich, 1403 to 1835. Norwich, 1938.

Cutts, Edward L. Colchester. 2nd ed. Historic Towns series, ed. E.A. Freeman and W. Hunt. London, 1889.

Darroch, Elizabeth, and Barry Taylor, eds. A Bibliography of Norfolk History. University of East Anglia, 1975.

Davies, James Conway. "An assembly of wool merchants in 1322." E.H.R., XXXI (1916), 596-606.

Denholm-Young, N. The Country Gentry in the Fourteenth Century. Oxford, 1969.

Dictionary of National Biography, vol.18, pp.235-38, "Sir John Fastolf."

Dobson, R.B. "Urban decline in late medieval England." Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 5th series, XXVII (1977), 1-22.

Dunmore, S. et al. "The origin and development of Ipswich: an interim report." East Anglian Archaeology, report no.1 (1975), 57-67.

Ecclestone, J.P., and J.L. Ecclestone. The Rise of Great Yarmouth: the Story of a Sandbank. Norwich, 1959.

Edwards, J.G. "The personnel of the Commons in Parliament under Edward I and Edward II." Pp.197-214 in Essays in Medieval History Presented to Thomas Frederick Tout. Ed. A.G. Little and F.M. Powicke. Manchester, 1925.

Edwards, J.G. "'Re-election' and the medieval Parliament." History, II (1926), 204-10.

Ekwall, Eilert. The Concise Oxford Dictionary of English Place-Names. Oxford, 1936.

Emmison, F.G., and K.C. Newton. "Colchester gaol delivery, 1392 and 1457." Trans. E.A.S., 3rd series, II (1970), 280-88.

Foxe, John. Acts and Monuments of Matters ... Happening in the Church Vol.I. London, 1641.

Fullbrook-Leggatt, L.E.W.O. "Medieval Gloucester." Transactions of the Bristol and Gloucestershire Archaeological Society, LXVII (1946-48), 217-306.

Fuller, Thomas. The History of the Worthies of England. Vol.II. Ed. P. Austus Nuttall. London, 1840.

Girling, F.A. "Merchants' marks in Suffolk." Proc. S.I.A., XXIX (1964), 103-26.

Given, James Buchanan. Society and Homicide in Thirteenth Century England. Stanford, 1977.

Glover, Edward C. King's Lynn, 1400-1600: Developments in Civil Government. M.Phil thesis: London University, 1970.

Gomme, George Laurence. Index of Municipal Offices: Compiled from the Appendixes to the First Report of the Commissioners Appointed to Inquire into the Municipal Corporations in England and Wales, 1835. London, 1879.

Goodman, Anthony. "The piety of John Brunham's daughter of Lynn." Pp.347-58 in Medieval Women. Ed. Derek Baker. Oxford, 1978.

Gottfried, Robert S. "Bury St. Edmunds and the populations of late medieval English towns, 1270-1530." Journal of British Studies, XX (1980), 1-31.

Grace, Mary. "The chamberlains and treasurers of the city of Norwich, 1293-1835." N.A., XXV (1935), 181-201.

Gras, N.S.B. The Evolution of the English Corn Market, from the Twelfth to the Eighteenth Century. Cambridge (Mass.), 1915.

Gras, N.S.B. The Early English Customs System. Cambridge (Mass.), 1918.

Gray, I.E., and W.E. Potter. Ipswich School 1400-1950. Ipswich, 1950.

Green, Alice Stopford. Town Life in the Fifteenth Century. 2 vols. London, 1894.

Gross, Charles. The Guild Merchant: a Contribution to British Municipal History. 2 vols. Oxford, 1890.

Hammer, jnr., Carl I. "Anatomy of an oligarchy: the Oxford town council in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries." Journal of British Studies, XVIII (1978), 1-27.

Hannah, Ian C. The Heart of East Anglia: the Story of Norwich from Earliest to Latest Times. London, ca. 1913.

Harrod, Henry. "Notes on the records of the Corporation of Great Yarmouth." N.A., IV (1855), 239-66.

Haward, Winifred I. "Economic aspects of the Wars of the Roses in East Anglia." E.H.R., XLI (1926), 170-89.

Haward, Winifred I. "Gilbert Debenham: a medieval rascal in real life." History, XIII (1929), 300-14.

Hibbert, A.B. "The origins of the medieval town patriciate." Past and Present, III (1953), no.3, 15-27.

Hillen, H.J. History of the borough of King's Lynn. 2 vols. Norwich, 1907.

History of Parliament: Biographies of the Members of the Commons House, 1439-1509. Ed. Josiah C. Wedgwood and Anne A. Holt. London, 1936.

History of Parliament: Register of the Ministers and of the Members of Both Houses, 1439-1509. London, 1938.

Houghton, K.N. "Theory and practice in borough elections to Parliament during the later fifteenth century." Bulletin of the Institute of Historical Research, XXXIX (1966), 130-40.

Hudson, William. History of the Parish of St. Peter Permouthergate, Norwich. Part I: a Walk Round the District Six Hundred Years Ago. Norwich, 1889.

Hudson, William. "A revised list of the bailiffs of the city of Norwich." N.A., XI (1892), 228-56.

Hudson, William. "The growth of an English city: being an account of the early topographical development of the city of Norwich." Transactions of the Eastbourne Natural History, Photographic and Literary Society, III (1895).

Hudson, William. "Norwich militia in the fourteenth century." N.A., XIV (1901), 263-320.

Hudson, William. "Norwich and Yarmouth in 1332: their comparative prosperities." N.A., XVI (1907), 177-96.

Hunnisett, Roy F. The Medieval Coroner. Cambridge, 1961.

Ingleby, Holcombe. The Heart of Lynn. London, 1925.

Jennings, John M. "The distribution of landed wealth in the wills of London merchants, 1400-1450." Medieval Studies, XXXIX (1977), 261-80.

Jones, W.R. "Rex et ministri: English local government and the crisis of 1341." Journal of British Studies, XIII (1973), 1-20.

Kerling, Nelly Johanna Martina. Commercial Relations of Holland and Zeeland with England from the Late 13th Century to the Close of the Middle Ages. Leiden, 1954.

Laver, Henry. "Common seal of the borough of Colchester." Trans. E.A.S., III (1888), 197-200.

Lawson, J.A. A Study of the Parliamentary Burgesses during the First Half of the Fifteenth Century, Based on the Returns of London, York, Norwich, Bristol and Southampton, between 1413 and 1437. M.A. thesis: Manchester University, 1936.

Le Strange, Hamon. Norfolk Official Lists, from the Earliest Period to the Present Day, Compiled from Original Sources. Norwich, 1890.

Le Strange, Hamon. "Early mayors of Lynn." N.A., XII (1895), 229-33.

L'Estrange, John. Calendar of the Freemen of Great Yarmouth, 1429-1800. Norwich, 1910.

L'Estrange, John. A Calendar of the Freemen of Lynn, 1298-1836. Norwich, 1913.

Lewis, Norman Bache. "Re-election to Parliament in the reign of Richard II." E.H.R., XLVIII (1933), 364-94.

Lloyd, T.H. The English Wool Trade in the Middle Ages. Cambridge, 1977.

Lopez, Robert S. "An aristocracy of money in the Early Middle Ages." Speculum, XXVIII (1953), 1-43.

Mander, R.P. "Walter Coney of Lynn." East Anglian Magazine, VII (1947-48), 599-603.

Manning, C.R. "Wickhampton Church." N.A., VII (1872), 1-8.

Martin, G.H. The Early Court Rolls of the Borough of Ipswich. University College of Leicester, Department of English Local History, Occasional Papers, no.5. Leicester, 1954.

Martin, G.H. The Borough and Merchant Community of Ipswich, 1317-1422. PhD thesis: Oxford University, 1955.

Martin, G.H. "The records of the borough of Ipswich, to 1422." Journal of the Society of Archivists, I, no.4 (1956), 87-93.

Martin, G.H. The Story of Colchester: from Roman Times to the Present Day. Colchester, 1959.

- Martin, G.H. "The English borough in the thirteenth century." Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 5th series, XIII (1963), 123-44.
- Martin, G.H. Colchester: Official Guide. 4th ed. Colchester, 1973.
- McKinley, Richard. Norfolk and Suffolk Surnames in the Middle Ages. English Surnames Series, vol.II. Chichester, 1975.
- McKisack, May. "Parliamentary representation of King's Lynn before 1500." E.H.R., XLII (1927), 583-89.
- McKisack, May. The Parliamentary Representation of the English Boroughs during the Middle Ages. Oxford, 1932.
- Meyer, Erwin F. "English craft guilds and borough governments of the later Middle Ages." University of Colorado Studies, XVI (1928-29), 323-78, XVII (1929-30), 350-426.
- Morant, Philip. The History and Antiquities of Colchester. London, 1768.
- Morant, Philip. History and Antiquities of the County of Essex. Chelmsford, 1816.
- Morey, G.E. East Anglian Society in the Fifteenth Century: an Historico-regional Survey. PhD thesis: London University, 1951.
- Muir, Janet Winifred. The Personnel of Parliament under Henry IV. M.A. thesis: London University, c.1924.
- Origo, Iris. The Merchant of Prato. Rev. ed. Harmondsworth, 1963.
- Palmer, Charles John, ed. A Booke of the Foundacion and Antiquitye of the Towne of Greate Yermouthe, from the Original Manuscript Written in the Time of Queen Elizabeth. Great Yarmouth, 1847.
- Palmer, Charles John, ed. The History of Great Yarmouth by Henry Manship, Town Clerk, temp. Queen Elizabeth. Great Yarmouth, 1854.
- Palmer, Charles John. The History of Great Yarmouth, Designed as a Continuation of Manship's History of that Town. Great Yarmouth, 1856.
- Palmer, Charles John. The Perlustration of Great Yarmouth, with Gorleston and South-town. 3 vols. Great Yarmouth, 1872-75.
- Parker, Vanessa. The Making of King's Lynn: Secular Buildings from the 11th to the 17th Century. Chichester, 1971.

Parkin, Charles. A Topographical History of Freebridge Hundred and Half, in the County of Norfolk. Containing the History and Antiquities of the Borough of King's Lynn. King's Lynn, 1772.

Petchey, William John. The Borough of Maldon, Essex, 1500-1688. PhD thesis: Leicester University, 1972.

Phythian-Adams, Charles. "Ceremony and the citizen: the communal year at Coventry 1450-1550." Pp.57-85 in Crisis and Order in English Towns 1500-1700. Ed. Peter Clark and Paul Slack. Toronto, 1972.

Phythian-Adams, Charles. Desolation of a City: Coventry and the Urban Crisis of the Late Middle Ages. Cambridge, 1979.

Pirenne, Henri. Medieval Cities: Their Origins and the Revival of Trade. Trans. Frank Halsey. Princeton, 1952.

Platt, Colin. Medieval Southampton: the Port and Trading Community, A.D. 1000-1600. London, 1973.

Platt, Colin. The English Medieval Town. London, 1976.

Powell, W.R., ed. A History of the County of Essex: Bibliographical Volume. Victoria History of the Counties of England. London, 1959.

Power, Eileen. The Wool Trade in English Medieval History. Oxford, 1941.

Quamme, Borre. "King's Lynn." Norseman, VII (1949), 89-94.

Ramsay, James H. The Genesis of Lancaster, 1307-1399. Vol.II. Oxford, 1913.

Reaney, P.H. A Dictionary of British Surnames. London, 1958.

Reaney, P.H. The Origin of English Surnames. London, 1967.

Redstone, Vincent B. "The Carmelites of Ipswich." Proc. S.I.A., X (1900), 185-95.

Redstone, Vincent B. "The Chaucer-Malyn family, Ipswich." Proc. S.I.A., XII (1906), 184-99.

Redstone, Vincent B. The Ancient House or Sparrowe House, Ipswich. Ipswich, 1912.

Redstone, Vincent B. Summaries of the Extracts from Ipswich Borough Records. Reprints from the East Anglian Daily Times, 1926-38.

Reed, Michael. Ipswich in the Seventeenth Century. PhD thesis: Leicester University, 1973.

Reid, Eleanor. "Lollards at Colchester in 1414." E.H.R., XXIX (1914), 101-04.

Return of the Names of Every Member Returned to Serve in Each Parliament Part i, Parliaments of England 1213-1702. House of Commons Sessional Papers, no.69 (1878), vol. LXII, pt.i.

Reynolds, Susan. "The rulers of London in the twelfth century." History, LVII (1972), 337-57.

Reynolds, Susan. An Introduction to the History of English Medieval Towns. Oxford, 1977.

Rich, E.E. "The mayors of the Staples." Cambridge Historical Journal, IV (1932-34), 120-42.

Richards, William. The History of Lynn, Civil, Ecclesiastical, Political, Commercial, Biographical, Municipal, and Military, from the Earliest Accounts to the Present Time. 2 vols. King's Lynn, 1812.

Rickword, George. "Colchester in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries." Trans. E.A.S., VII (1900), 115-35.

Rickword, George. A Fuller List than ever before Published of the Colchester and Essex Members of Parliament, Edward I to Edward VIII. Together with Notable 'Parliament Men' in Essex. 1902. Pamphlet in Colchester Library, compiled from two articles from an unknown local magazine.

Rickword, George. "Taxations of Colchester, A.D. 1296 and 1301." Trans. E.A.S., IX (1903-05), 126-55.

Rickword, George. "'Haymesokne' in Colchester." Trans. E.A.S., XIV (1915-17), 142-45.

Rogers, Alan. "Late medieval Stamford: a study of the town council, 1465-1492." Pp.16-38 in Perspectives in English Urban History. Ed. Alan Everitt. London, 1973.

Roover, Raymond de. "The concept of the just price: theory and economic policy." Journal of Economic History, XVIII (1958), 418-34.

Rose, Miriam A. Petitions to Parliament under the Lancastrians from, or Relating to, Towns. M.A. thesis: London University, 1926.

Roskell, John Smith. The Commons of the Parliament of 1422: English Society and Parliamentary Representation under the Lancastrians. International Commission for the History of Representative and Parliamentary Institutions, Studies Series, vol.14. Manchester, 1954.

Round, J.H. "The Domesday of Colchester." The Antiquary, V (1878), 244-49, VI (1879), 5-9, 95-100, 251-56.

Round, J.H. "Municipal offices: Colchester." The Antiquary, XII (1885), 188-92, 240-45, XIII (1886), 28-30.

Round, J.H. "The portreeve of Colchester." Trans. E.A.S., VI (1896-98), 349.

Round, J.H. "Lionel de Bradenham and Colchester." Trans. E.A.S., XIII (1913-14), 86-91.

Round, J.H. "The 'haymesocne' in Colchester." Trans. E.A.S., XV (1918-20), 77-81.

Rutledge, Paul. The Court Rolls at Great Yarmouth. 1963. Unpublished paper (copies in Norwich Library and London Guildhall Library).

Rutledge, Paul, and Elizabeth Rutledge. "King's Lynn and Great Yarmouth, two thirteenth-century surveys." N.A., XXXVII (1978), 92-114.

Rye, Walter. "The riot between the monks and citizens of Norwich in 1272." Norfolk Antiquarian Miscellany, 1st series, II (1883), 17-42.

Rye, Walter. "Chaucer's grandfather, Robert le Chaucer." Life Records of Chaucer, III (1886), appendix I, 125-31.

Rye, Walter. "Chaucer's connection with Lynn and Norfolk." Life Records of Chaucer, III (1886), appendix II, 131-35.

Rye, Walter. "Chaucer a Norfolk man." Norfolk Antiquarian Miscellany, 2nd series, part 2 (1907), 142-46.

Rye, Walter. Chaucer: a Norfolk Man. Norwich, 1915.

Saul, A.R. Great Yarmouth in the 14th Century: a Study of Trade, Politics and Society. PhD thesis: Oxford University, 1975.

Sayles, G.O. "Representation of cities and boroughs in 1268." E.H.R., XL (1925), 580-85.

Sayles, G.O. "Parliamentary representation in 1294, 1295, and 1307." Bulletin of the Institute of Historical Research, III (1925-26), 110-15.

Sayles, G.O. "The 'English Company' of 1343 and a merchant's oath." Speculum, VI (1931), 177-205.

Scarfe, Norman. The Suffolk Landscape. London, 1972.

Smith, J.R., and M.C. Wadhams. "Robert D'Arcy's chantry priests' house, Maldon, Essex." Medieval Archaeology, XIX (1975), 213-19.

Swinden, Henry. The History and Antiquities of the Ancient Burgh of Great Yarmouth, in the County of Norfolk. Collected from the Corporation Charters, and Other the Most Authentic Materials. Norwich, 1772.

Tait, James. The Medieval English Borough: Studies on its Origins and Constitutional History. Manchester, 1936.

Tanner, N.P. Popular Religion in Norwich with Special Reference to the Evidence of Wills, 1370-1532. PhD thesis: Oxford University, 1973.

Teniswood, C.G.H. "Charters relating to the government of Great Yarmouth." Journal of the British Archaeological Association, XXXVI (1880), 273-90.

Thrupp, Sylvia. "Social control in the medieval town." Journal of Economic History, I (1941), supplement, 39-52.

Thrupp, Sylvia. The Merchant Class of Medieval London, 1300-1500. Chicago, 1948.

Tingey, John Cottingham. "The grants of murage to Norwich, Yarmouth and Lynn." N.A., XVIII (1914), 129-48.

Weinbaum, Martin. The Incorporation of Boroughs. Manchester, 1937.

Westlake, H.F. The Parish Gilds of Medieval England. London, 1919.

White, Albert Beebe. Self-government at the King's Command: a Study in the Beginnings of English Democracy. Minneapolis, 1933.

White, C.H.E. "The Ipswich 'Domesday' books, and especially concerning Percyvale's 'Great Domesday Book', with that part of 'Liber Sextus' containing the taxes paid to the king's grace by every town in Suffolk." Proc. S.I.A., VI (1888), 195-219.

Wilkinson, B. The Medieval Council of Exeter. Manchester, 1931.

Williams, Charles. The Barber-surgeons of Norwich, also ... Extracts Relating to Medical Matters ... from the Court Rolls of the City. Norwich, 1896.

Williams, Charles. The Masters, Wardens, and Assistants of the Guild of Barber-surgeons of Norwich, from the Year 1439 to 1723. Norwich, 1900.

Wodderspoon, John. Memorials of the Ancient Town of Ipswich, in the County of Suffolk. Ipswich, 1850.

Wright, J. English Dialect Dictionary. London, 1902.

Principal abbreviations used
Primary sources: manuscripts
Primary sources: printed
Secondary sources

NOTES for:

Introduction | Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders
Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration
Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics | Conclusion

Thieves arrested (upon the complaint of a party) in the city in possession of stolen goods may be judged in city court, before coroners and bailiffs. The same applies even if the theft was committed outside the city, so long as a complainant subsequently comes forward. If there is no complainant, the city is not to try the thieves, but is to hold them in prison until the justices of gaol delivery come to try these cases in the city court. The bailiffs are not to instigate a false complaint in such a case. If the harbourer of such a thief can be found in the city, and the thief is convicted and it is determined that the harbourer was aware of the thief's crime, the harbourer can also be judged by the city court.

Hudson speculated that the concern with ensuring there was a complainant prepared to prosecute a suit against a felon may have been prompted by a case in 1285, when the leet jury accused Walter Eghe of being a thief, and he was subsequently brought into city court and convicted through an [inquest, although there was no individual prosecuting a complaint against him. He was then hung but, still alive when taken off the gallows, fled to sanctuary and successfully petitioned the king for a pardon. The king demanded to know by what authority the city court had tried the case without a complainant or without Walter having been arrested in possession of stolen goods. A satisfactory answer apparently not being forthcoming, the king withdrew the city liberties, obliging the citizens to buy them back through a new royal charter. Hudson further notes that the king's Justices were, in 1326, required to hold their sessions only in the county court, suggesting that this chapter was drafted before that date.]

History of medieval Ipswich

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth | DEVELOPMENT OF LOCAL GOVERNMENT

Buildings and fortifications | Economy | Information sources

Map of Ipswich at the close of the Middle Ages

Ipswich bailiffs, coroners, chamberlains, and treasurers

Appendix 1: Account of the setting up of self-government in A.D. 1200

Appendix 2: Calendar of usages and customs of Ipswich

Appendix 3: Oaths of officers and burgesses

Appendix 4: Account of revenues and expenditures, 1446/47

Development of local government

Although not a town of the first rank in terms of size, population and wealth, it was the chief town of Suffolk and the seat of the shire court; a county gaol was built there in 1220. It also had a role (if not so important as that of Yarmouth) in providing ships and sailors for royal service and for defense of the east coast, on one occasion describing itself, as Yarmouth did, as a "frontier town". At the time of Domesday, the borough was being farmed by the sheriff of Suffolk, Roger Bigod, and Ipswich was later used as a base for Hugh Bigod when he supported the sons of Henry II in their rebellion. By 1194 the townsmen had taken responsibility for the farm and a couple of years later were negotiating with Richard I for a charter of self-government; but this was not to be obtained until the beginning of the reign of his successor.

Unlike Lynn or Maldon, Ipswich had no powerful overlords with whom the townsmen had to struggle to win freedoms, except for the king, who was usually persuadable when it was to his financial advantage. Nor, unlike Yarmouth or Norwich, did it have commercial rivals who seriously jeopardized its local control of trade. The Priory of neighbouring Woodbridge held a weekly market there, but the townsmen opposed this in 1233, and legal action led to a compromise whereby the town was allowed half of the trading tolls collected at the market, and burgesses were allowed to trade in the Woodbridge market without paying tolls themselves; by the fifteenth century Ipswich had farmed its half of the tolls to the Prior.

More intractable was the threat to Ipswich's commerce from Harwich, situated at the very mouth of the Orwell. In the 1270s Harwich was receiving assistance from the earl of Norfolk (its lord), who had blocked the river with a weir, in order to divert to Harwich ships bound for Ipswich. In 1340 an inquisition concluded that the port of Orwell and the estuary leading to Ipswich were within the (admiralty) jurisdiction of Ipswich, and that it was the Ipswich authorities – not those of Harwich – who could collect tolls at Orwell port. In 1378-79, Ipswich and Harwich were again in contest, over a location in Orwell Haven called Polles Head, which an inquisition decided should be considered part of the port of Ipswich. There were other clashes with rival jurisdictions – notably in regard to the hamlets within the half-hundred, whose right to leet jurisdiction in particular was challenged by Ipswich – but they were relatively few and minor.

Ipswich is best known for the detailed account which has survived of the setting up of local self-government in 1200. In this we see the delegation of power from the community, through a meeting which appears like the ancient folk moot, to its elected representatives; the location where the community gathered was at St. Mary Tower, an important church and possibly a traditional meeting-place of the folk moot.

The king was the sole lord of Ipswich and self-government was premised on his charter dated May 25, 1200, which gave the townsmen control over collection and payment to the Exchequer of Ipswich's fee farm of £40, along with the broad grant of all liberties and customs that the king's "free boroughs" in England had (excepting only those particular to London). A number of specific rights were spelled out, including:

- the right of a town court to hear most cases to which townsmen were party, including pleas of related to debts, mortgages and real estate;
- quittance from having to pay tolls on merchandise taken anywhere in the realm (with the heavy fine of £10 on anyone exacting tolls from Ipswich men);
- the right to have a Merchant Guild;
- the right to "elect, by decision of the community of the town, two of those townsmen who are law-abiding and of sound judgement" as bailiffs; those elected were to be presented to the Chief Justice at Westminster, for royal approval, and could not be removed from office if they performed their duties well, except by a common decision of the burgesses;
- the right to elect four coroners to deal with crown pleas outside the jurisdiction of the borough court, as well as to ensure that the bailiffs dealt impartial justice to poor and rich alike.

Just over a month later, on June 29, an assembly of the whole community was held in the churchyard of St. Mary Tower to elect the bailiffs and coroners, according the terms of the charter; elected by unanimous agreement of the community (or so it was claimed), the new officers took oaths of office which included the reference to equal justice to all. At the same meeting, it was decided also to elect a town council, justifying this (by implicit reference to the charter terms) on the grounds that such was the case in other free boroughs. So on July 2 the community reconvened and by a method of indirect election – the bailiffs and coroners, with community agreement, choosing 4 reputable men from each parish to make the election – a council of 12 "Capital Portmen" (a title which is again heard of in 1255), meaning head townsmen, was chosen from the more capable townsmen. The portmen were sworn to guard and govern the borough well, protect its liberties, and render judgements in court with equal justice to rich and poor. The community then took oath to obey and support the town's officers, and to respect and maintain the town liberties. The royal charter was then delivered to the custody of two of the portmen.

The first meeting of the new town government took place on July 13, when bailiffs, coroners and portmen made a series of decisions on the fundamentals of administration:

- that the customary dues which went towards paying the fee farm should be collected, and accounted for at the Exchequer, by the bailiffs and 4 assistants;
- that two beadles be appointed to carry out commands of the bailiffs, and to make attachments and distrains, with one of them also serving as gaoler;
- that a seal be made for application to official documents drawn up in community business and given to the safekeeping of 3 or 4 trustworthy burgesses;
- that the community should elect a suitable person as alderman of the Merchant Guild, who would have 4 other burgesses as his assistants;
- that the grant of freedom from tolls (i.e. membership in the privileged community) would apply only to those residents who were at "lot and scot"; and
- that the royal charter would be sent to the shire courts of Norfolk and Suffolk, to be read in public.

These ordinances were read out before the community at a further churchyard meeting in September and received community assent. At the same meeting new ballival elections were held (September being a common month for towns to hold elections) and the incumbents were re-elected; beadles and the collectors of tolls were also elected.

At the next community assembly in October, the bailiffs displayed the newly-made common seal; 3 men were elected as custodians of the seal and the king's charter, and sworn to ensure the seal was used only for the benefit of the community. Officials of the Merchant Guild were also chosen and sworn to be responsible for the gild and its possessions, and to treat all gild brothers fairly; they in turn instructed all burgesses to become members of the gild { which involved a membership fee). A discussion followed on how the operations of the gild were to be financed, and it was decided that the alderman would have a monopoly on the sale of certain types of stone and marble, with bailiffs and coroners auditing the annual accounts of such sales, and that no townsman should buy the specified stone from any other source. Similar provision was made for compensating the portmen for their labour on behalf of the town: they were given exclusive rights of grazing their horses in Oldenholm meadow; at some later point in the century, provision was made for tolls on certain produce to be put towards financial compensation for the bailiffs. Finally, it was decided at the meeting that all of the local customs by which legal matters were ruled should be set down in a roll to be called "le Domesday" (hearking back to an Anglo-Saxon term – dooms – meaning "judgements"); the bailiffs were to have custody of this roll, as a reference tool, just as the gild alderman would have keeping of a record of the ordinances governing the gild.

Later that month, an inquisition was held to determine what status, within the free borough, should be held by certain religious dignitaries who had lands and tenants in the town. It was decided that the tenants should be subject to tolls on goods, except for those grown on their own lands or bought for their own use. Beginning in November the status of foreign burgess was granted to various lords who wished to acquire exemption from toll, for themselves and their villeins, on products grown on their estates and on goods bought for personal use. Appropriately, the earl of Norfolk, Roger Bigod, was the first. In return the lords made an in-kind contribution to the Merchant Guild, guaranteed a yearly payment towards the fee farm, and promised to respect and uphold the liberties of the town. In later years we find cases of lords desiring only exemption from toll on their grain, and paying a few pence and one or two bushels of corn; this was more of a licensing situation, and it was specifically stated in 1256 that such men were not to be at scot and lot with the burgesses. In the same year the Priors of Holy Trinity and of St. Peter's, Ipswich, acquired the wider exemption privileges by larger money contributions towards the farm, in-kind contributions to the Guild, and a promise to be at scot and lot "as if an intrinsic burgess" (we find later Priors still doing the same in 1446).

These variations in status seem to have caused confusion and descendants of some foreign burgesses claimed to continue the exemption without obligation towards the fee farm. Consequently, the borough authorities ordained in 1274 that foreign burgess status could only be held for life and for a donation towards the fee farm; the two different levels were reiterated: exemption from all tolls, which required the party to be at scot and lot, or exemption only on produce grown on the party's lands and on goods bought for personal use. The borough continued this system throughout the medieval period: Sir Roger Chamberleyn, a holder of local manors, acquired exemption on the latter terms in 1454; although he took an oath to be at scot and lot and maintain all franchises of the town, this appears to be prompted by the fact that rents were due the borough from some of his properties (presumably within the liberties).

As indicated, the basic qualification for an intrinsic burgess, or freeman, was to be at scot and lot. In 1328 it was added that entrants to the franchise should, within a year and a day of being made a burgess, have a house within the town or else be disfranchised. The reason for this further specification (which may simply have been taken for granted earlier) was so that the freeman was clearly a resident and had a location at which he could be summoned, or by which he could be distrained, to answer to justice.

As was often the case with royal charters, some of what was granted was merely an official recognition of the status quo. This was the case with the Ipswich community having responsibility for its own fee farm and may have been the case with it having elected officers to deal with the duties involved in collecting the various dues that went towards paying the farm. Nor is it implausible that the council of portmen was foreshadowed by a less formal association of leading townsmen (perhaps a Merchant Guild), who were behind the movement to acquire self-government – certainly there were representatives of the town negotiating with the king prior to 1200 for the acquisition of liberties. The men chosen to office in 1200 were undoubtedly from the upper ranks of town society – none more so than the first bailiffs, two brothers. Nonetheless, the charter made it desirable to have some standardized method of dealing with governmental matters.

We see in the narrative of the events of 1200 not only the logical stages for creating the mechanisms of urban self-government, but also some of the political theory underlying the same: the emphasis on unity within the community and loyalty to the borough, the need to define just who had a share in the rights and privileges granted by the king, delegation of power to representatives, and the reciprocal obligations between rulers and ruled, guaranteed through the swearing of oaths. At the same time we see the reality of borough government, which is the dominance of decision-making by the most prominent townsmen.

Although historians are inclined to skepticism about the degree of public unanimity claimed by the chronicle, the euphoria surrounding the first steps towards self-determination give this a certain plausibility. That matters may not have been to everyone's liking, however, is suggested by the case of Elias de Gippewyc, who had served as a reeve of the town at some time before 1200 and yet is absent from that group who took the reins of the new administration. In 1212 Elias complained to the king that the borough authorities had relocated the fish-market from its traditional site (the quayside?), resulting in a loss of revenue from it; this forced the authorities to justify their action. In 1206 another complaint (source unknown) had prompted the king to investigate the authorities' building of a dam. A conspiracy was hatched among some of the townsmen in 1213 to murder Elias; after his death the bailiffs claimed the right to deal with the case in the town court, but Elias' widow did not find there the justice she wanted and had to complain to the king. There is some evidence that the first bailiffs were young blood. Perhaps there were conservative and progressive elements active in town politics.

Although the chronicle of 1200 suggests that a popular assembly was the key vehicle for local government, this reflects the ancient institution of the folkmoot; although St. Mary's churchyard may have been the usual meeting-place of the community at that time, references to a part of the town called Thingstead ("place of the folk") may indicate an even older location of the folkmoot, possibly even before Ipswich ranked as a town. After 1200, however, it was instead the borough court that was the focal point of community administration. The Portmanmoot, as it was known, held major sessions (Great Courts) every second Thursday to hear pleas of the crown, pleas initiated by royal writ, and pleas relating to burgage tenements. Other pleas – personal actions – were heard twice a week by sessions known (eventually) as Petty Courts; during the course of the thirteenth century, the volume of court cases increased to the point where the two types of courts had separate records kept for them. By mid-fourteenth century, another specialized court emerged to hear, and record, public acknowledgements of property transfers, known as recognizances, including those made through testaments. From the 1430s we hear of the General Court, a facet of the portmanmoot that dealt with business we today would consider administrative rather than judicial.

The authenticity of the unique account of 1200 is not beyond question, since it is known only from a copy drawn up in circumstances from which it could be hypothesised that the narrative was reshaped to justify the constitutional situation of that later time rather than ninety years earlier. In 1272 the town clerk, avoiding imminent charges for dereliction of duty, made off with the original Domesday and other borough records. In 1285 the king punished the town for some (unknown) communal crime by suspending its chartered liberties and subjecting it to the government of a warden; this lasted until June 1291. Following restitution of self-government, it was decided necessary to reconstitute a definitive – i.e. written – version of the borough customs. At the same period we see a clique of leading townsmen starting to try to monopolize government for self-gain. Despite these factors, which could have influenced the wording of the custumal and the account of the proceedings in 1200, the broad terms of the account seem plausible and the names of the officers elected were certainly genuine leading townsmen of the early thirteenth century.

It is likely that the original account was written as an introduction or appendix to the custumal in the Domesday and also to the list of gild ordinances (probably untouched by the town clerk's theft). Six medieval editions and one Tudor copy of the custumal have survived and they incorporate not only the reconstruction from memory of the original list of borough customs, but also later information, copied from various borough records, of concern to the integrity and protection of the borough liberties. This included lists of tolls leviable on different types of merchandise, definition of the boundaries of the leets into which Ipswich was divided, lists of outsiders given burgess status, and later additions to the local by-laws (of which the customs were the foundation).

A little over a century after the weeks, full of enthusiastic vigour and common purpose, during which mechanisms of self-government were first set in motion at Ipswich, we are given our next detailed look into the halls of government and the scene is a less happy one. Most of the families who had led Ipswich into that degree of independence it might acquire in a country where power was relatively centralized had been eclipsed by newcomers with a different agenda. An attempt – for some years successful – by a group of prominent townsmen to monopolize key offices and, possibly, to use those offices for personal gain, resulted in popular revolt whose leaders managed to gain enough control in the town to issue, on 12 December 1320, a set of reforming ordinances which reflect the complaints against the ruling clique. Although the 1200 proceedings have received far more attention, the 1320 reforms – by showing how the initial provisions for local government had run into problems – are almost equally important.

The document began by emphasizing one of the terms of the royal charter acquired in 1317, prohibiting the all too common offence of forestalling or any trading outside of the public marketplace; the same charter had, perhaps ominously, eliminated the obligation to seek royal approval of newly-elected bailiffs and had reduced the number of coroners to two. The document went on to observe that it was a common right, by reason of the franchise, that every burgess paying scot and lot and contributing to aids of the town had equal entitlement to a share in any merchandise being sold in the town (a principle that forestalling undermined). However, certain burgesses had contravened this, particularly by becoming hosts of outsider merchants and selling their goods for them in private places, sometimes even without consent of the visiting merchants, and claiming a quarter of the merchandise as their hostage fee – which happened to be a custom of the town (unless an introduction into the custumal by the ruling clique, whose leading members had three decades earlier been involved in the reconstruction of the custumal). Consequently, the following ordinances (which went far beyond correction of the problem identified in the preamble) were enacted:

- Goods brought by outsider merchants were to be sold only in official marketplaces, without any interference from hosts or forestallers. Taking a quarter of the merchandise as hostage was prohibited. Every lot-and-scot burgess present, in person or by servant, at a sale could claim a share therein, on condition he had the means to pay (or find sureties for payment). Anyone subverting this principle was to be disfranchised.
- In order to protect outsider merchants, contracts of sales were to be confirmed by buyer and seller in front of the bailiffs, if the seller so desired, with the terms of the contract, due date of payment, and names of the buyer's sureties being registered in town records. If a buyer failed to pay, the bailiffs were to seize some of his, or his sureties', possessions and from those promptly satisfy the merchant for the sale price. Anyone delaying this process (the finger here perhaps pointing at the bailiffs) was to be disfranchised.
- Anyone convicted of forestalling was to lose the merchandise he had forestalled and be disfranchised.
- Hosts were forbidden from trying to exert pressure on visiting merchants (by, for example, acting as their sureties), just before their departure, so that the merchants would feel obliged to buy provisions or hire carts for the next stage of their journey from the hosts or their associates.
- There was no fixed date for the annual election of bailiffs, with the result that on several occasions certain burgesses had by "lordly usurpation and private coven" elected bailiffs at will, without community consent, and that the "usurping" bailiffs had then caused grief to the community through taxations and amercements, retaining these levies to their personal use, to the impoverishment of the community. To prevent such usurpation, or the maintenance of usurpers in power by others, and to impose controls over the powers and perks of ballival office, it was ordained that bailiffs could be elected only by common assent and that elections would take place each September 8th, so that everyone would know when to be present. The exception being if the community chose to remove bailiffs from office prior to that date. Bailiffs were to have an annual salary of £5 each, a fee of 6d. for each application of the common seal, and the proceeds from local tolls collected on herring, other fish, onions, oil and broom. They were not to assess any court fine except in the presence of the chamberlains and two other townsmen sworn to that task, nor to impose any financial charges on anyone without view of the chamberlains.

- Two chamberlains were to be elected, by common assent, each September 8th (this apparently being the first introduction of these officers into Ipswich's government). Their duties were to receive all town revenues, and to manage these monies so that the fee farm, salaries of town officers, perquisites of the bailiffs (due from estreats), and other borough expenses could be paid, without resorting to tallage or extortion. The chamberlains were to present their annual accounts at the end of their term of office, before the community in full session of tolhouse (another name for the moot hall).
- The chamberlains were also to keep a duplicate record, or counter-roll (from which the modern term "control"), of all pleas relating to burgage tenements, acknowledgements of debt, and probate of testaments (the reference probably being to the recognizance rolls).
- The chamberlains were to receive 20s. annual salary. The incumbents of the office were to be changed, by election, each year.
- Because the common seal had previously been improperly guarded, and used without community consent, four clavigers were to be elected annually to have keeping of the four keys of the common chest, in which the seal and the town treasury were stored. On election day, these keys were to be surrendered to the community, who would deliver them back to the same men or to others chosen to the office, according to the pleasure of the community. No document was to have the common seal affixed to it without common assent, and any sealings were to take place in open session of the tolhouse.
- On election day one man was to be chosen by common assent to be the town clerk and was to have an annual salary of 40s. (to be paid by the chamberlains) as well as customary fees (for individual clerical services to burgesses).
- Two men were to be elected as sub-bailiffs, with each receiving annually a robe (i.e. livery) and 6s.8d for shoes.
- One of the sub-bailiffs was to be selected by the community as gaoler, with an annual salary of 13s.4d plus customary fees; the gaoler was to find manucaptors against mishaps relating to his responsibilities. (The similarity of this clause to that in the account of 1200 is notable, but is probably no more than a reaffirmation of the provision made at that time).

- The chamberlains were to have custody of all goods found in the possession of thieves when arrested, until their guilt or innocence was determined. If they were holding such goods at the end of their year of office, they were to turn them over to their replacements.
- Because bailiffs had previously allowed whomsoever they wished to become burgesses, without common assent, and had divided the entrance fees among themselves and others, instead of putting it towards town revenues, the making of burgesses was henceforth restricted to Great Court sessions next following Michaelmas, Christmas, Easter and the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, and even then was subject to community approval. Entrance fees were to be put towards the common profit and accounted for by the chamberlains.
- Application of the common seal, which ought to be the right of every burgess, rich or poor, had been denied in the past to those not willing to pay dearly for it. It was henceforth to be available to all, without the payment of any "gift".

In the short term the reform initiative led to further power struggles and the deposition of the bailiffs of that year; the repercussions of political hostilities lasted for years and culminated in another seizure of the borough liberties back into the king's hand in 1344. The reforms themselves had relatively little long-term effect, however. The office of chamberlain, upon which so much rested, does not seem to have survived for more than a few years (a counter-roll exists from 1324/25), although it had been revived by the 1380s as evidenced by the contra-rotation function specified in the ordinances of 1320. It was perhaps enough to have displaced one apparently corrupt set of politicians, even at the risk of introducing a new set hardly any better. There is little sign of further political conflict in Ipswich during the remainder of the Middle Ages, except for minor matters, although a further set of ordinances in 1361 again had to forbid that new burgesses be made without the consent of the greater part of the community and to prohibit the bailiffs from taking the entrance fees, the preference being to apply the money to repairs to the "hall of pleas" called the Tolhouse.

The financial difficulties – particularly the burdensome fee farm – in which the borough found itself in the fifteenth century (apparent in 1446/47) were used as the rationale to secure from Henry VI additional powers for the borough in 1446. This charter granted incorporation, with the right to a seal (which, as we have seen, had been used since 1200) and to acquire lands and rents (similarly well evidenced before 1446). The bailiffs and four capital burgesses (i.e. portmen) were to have powers of Justices of the Peace and hear cases that would earlier have been dealt with by external Justices; the fines levied in such cases were to be put towards the fee farm. This was followed up with a local ordinance in 1447 stating that members of the community could use force to intervene in any violent assault and that anyone breaking the peace with such violence was to be disfranchised. The charter also granted one bailiff the powers of king's escheator, with any fines or revenues from escheated goods going towards the farm. It was around this time that Ipswich's government was expanded by the creation of a Common Council. Edward IV confirmed the 1446 charter in 1463, again referring to the borough's "impoverishment", and redefined the borough's incorporation in more definite terms. By this point local government had the basic shape which was to characterize it for the next few centuries.

previous

main menu

next

[\[MAIN MENU\]](#)

Norwich customs

CAP. 1
Pleas of the Crown

CAP. 2
Exemption from murder fine

CAP. 3
Accusations of felony

CAP. 4
Trying thieves

CAP. 5
Hue-and-cry

CAP. 6
Fugitives from justice

CAP. 7
Outlaws

CAP. 8
Strangers behaving suspiciously

CAP. 9
Drownings

CAP. 10
Assault

CAP. 11
Plea by writ of right

CAP. 12
Plea by dower right

CAP. 13
Plea by writ of entry or trespass

"Laws and Customs used and upheld in the city of Norwich since ancient times"

From the Book of Pleas folios 89 to 97v.

Note that only the titles of chapters 52-54 were entered into the book and certainly represent later additions – otherwise two of them would have been among the early section of the customal, dealing with legal procedures. Quite probably a greater number of the later chapters also represent additions subsequent to the original compilation.

CAP. 14
Plea by writ of replevin

CAP. 15
Essoins

CAP. 16
Plea by writ of nuisance

CAP. 17
Abatement and hamsoken

CAP. 18
Probate of testaments

CAP. 19
Property bequeathed by women

CAP. 20
Property bequeathed with wife's consent

CAP. 21
Delivery of deeds of bequeathed property

CAP. 22
Pre-emptive rights of kin over bequeathed property

CAP. 23
Bequests of jointly owned property

CAP. 24
Intrusive claims on bequeathed property

CAP. 25
Registration of deeds

CAP. 26
Plea of debt between citizens

CAP. 27
Plea of debt between citizen and foreigner

CAP. 28
Private distrains on debtors

CAP. 29
Recovery of a debt from the husband of the borrower

CAP. 30
Pledges to answer for distrained items

CAP. 31
Trespass or contract made in the market

CAP. 32
Transfers of rents of assize

CAP. 33
Assizes of bread, wine and ale and of measures

CAP. 34
Ells and weights

CAP. 35
Beam and balances

CAP. 36
Entrances to the franchise

CAP. 37
Regrators and forestallers

CAP. 38
Use of servants as purchasing agents

CAP. 39
Use of partners as purchasing agents

CAP. 40
Butchers, brokers, and tipplers

CAP. 41

Avoidance of customs

CAP. 42

Hosting outsiders

CAP. 43

Labourers who commit crimes

CAP. 44

Maintenance of city ditches

CAP. 45

Failure to attend assembly

CAP. 46

Searches of the crafts

CAP. 47

Financial accountability

CAP. 48

Distraints for execution of judgements

CAP. 49

Behaviour of sergeants as advocates

CAP. 50

Refusing the office of bailiff

CAP. 51

Bailiffs' oath of office

CAP. 52

Plea by writ of rendering account

CAP. 53

No-one to be elected bailiff twice within a four-year interval

CAP. 54

Plea by writ of having ceased for two years

CUSTOMAL: CAPITULUM 1

In cases of homicide, housebreaking, or other felony within the boundaries of the city, if the criminal can be found within those boundaries he is to be kept in prison without bail until he can be brought to judgement.

CUSTOMAL: CAPITULUM 2

If a murder is committed in the city, its suburbs or on its river, "englishry" cannot be claimed because the king's charter has exempted the city from "murdrum".

The royal charter of 1194, in a single clause, exempted the citizens from murdrum and trial by combat. The Norman Conquest had introduced into England new judicial procedures different from, if not at odds with, Anglo-Saxon customs; trial by combat was one such, and not appropriate to non-militarized borough society – towns preferred to resolve cases [through the taking of oaths. Similarly, murdrum was a Norman introduction prompted by reprisal killings of Normans by English in the years following the Conquest; this law required that if the killer could not be identified, the hundred in which the corpse was found had to pay a substantial murder-fine. Hundreds sought to evade the fine by proving "englishry", i.e. that the murdered person was English, not Norman. By the close of the twelfth century, Normans and English were intermarrying and a once bicultural society was beginning to find it hard to demonstrate "englishry" and murdrum was becoming increasingly applied to any unsolved homicide (whether murder or accidental death). Consequently, this was one of the onerous burdens of which boroughs might seek to rid themselves via their charters of liberties. Not until 1340 were englishry and murdrum abolished throughout the country.]

CUSTOMAL: CAPITULUM 3

Accusations of felony are to be made in the county court.

Hudson notes that this referred to an accusation brought by a private individual. It presumably did not apply in cases such as where an individual was caught in a felonious deed red-handed, or following hue-and-cry, or later in possession of stolen goods (see Cap.4), or was accused by a public entity such as the [leet jury. The county court was held in the Shirehouse, which was within Norwich castle fee.]

CUSTOMAL: CAPITULUM 5

When hue-and-cry is raised in the city (day or night) for any felony, a complaint about the crime is to be lodged immediately by men who are subjects of the king, until the person pursued is captured or offers an attachment for answering the charge in court.

[The purpose here seems to be to close a loophole in relation to the problem addressed in Cap.4. Hue-and-cry was the act of an individual in alerting the neighbourhood to the very recent commission of a crime, sometimes also entailing raising public support for pursuit or arrest of a criminal.]

CUSTOMAL: CAPITULUM 6

In the case of felons who flee to a city church, to remain there until they abjure the realm, any chattels they have at the time of abjuration are to be appraised to the use of the king, and delivered by the coroner to citizens who shall be answerable for them to the itinerant Justices. If the abjuring fugitive has real estate in the city, held of a citizen to whom the property will escheat, its value for a year is to be appraised to the use of the king, and it is to be delivered to the citizen of whom the felon held it, to be answerable for it to the itinerant Justices. The same is to be done regarding property, goods and chattels of fugitives [who do not take sanctuary?] and those who are justly outlawed.

[Someone accused of a crime, whether guilty and wishing to evade punishment or innocent and wishing to escape a lynch mob, might receive temporary sanctuary in a church. This fugitive, if he did not try to escape from the church, around which the community was obliged to place a guard, could either surrender to justice or take an oath to leave the country. In the latter case, all his moveable goods were forfeit to the king; the king also had the use of the felon's real estate for a year and a day (with the right to commit waste there – i.e. run it down as much as he wished) after which possession reverted to its "lord".]

CUSTOMAL: CAPITULUM 7

If an outlaw or someone who has abjured the realm returns to the city without the king's permission, and does not surrender himself, he is to be pursued with hue-and-cry and can be subject to immediate judgement, without the need to detain him [until gaol delivery]. If such a one is arrested and imprisoned, without it being realized at first that he is a fugitive, the gaoler is to ensure he is kept securely under guard until the delivery of the gaol.

[The local gaols were periodically "delivered" of their prisoners to itinerant royal justices who tried cases outside the jurisdiction of borough authorities. Outlaws (or abjurers, after the period assigned them to quit the kingdom) could be killed by anyone who captured them, because they were outside the protection of the law until they obtained the king's pardon for their crimes.]

CUSTOMAL: CAPITULUM 8

Outsiders who come to the city and act in an odd or suspicious manner (according to trustworthy men) are to be arrested by bailiffs or constables and held until they find security that they will uphold the king's peace and the city customs and behave within the law.

CUSTOMAL: CAPITULUM 9

When someone is drowned within the city, in its waterways, wells or pits (within the four crosses of the city), or in the river as far as Breydon Water, the coroner is to view the location of the drowning and to hold an inquest. If there is no evidence of foul play in the death, the body may be delivered for burial without delay.

[The city claimed jurisdiction over the River Wensum/Yare as far as Breydon Water, which probably stretched further inland at that time than it does today. Yarmouth, which lay immediately to the east of Breydon Water, contested this jurisdiction. Eventually it was settled that Norwich's jurisdiction extended to a point about mid-way between it and Yarmouth. The crosses mentioned doubtless were boundary markers.]

If anyone, with malice aforethought, gravely wounds another, he is to be held in prison until there is good prospect of the wounded party recovering. The attacker is to forfeit to the bailiffs the weapon he used, and is to compensate the wounded party, if he recovers. In addition he is to be heavily amerced and punished for breaking the peace. Similarly, if anyone, with malicious intent, commits violence on another so that blood is drawn, he is to be held under arrest in case the victim wishes to sue him, until he is able to give guarantees for answering to justice and making amends to the wounded party and for breaking the peace (if he is convicted). If the victim lacks the will or courage to sue his attacker, even though the assault is notorious [i.e. can be proven by witnesses], he must still answer to the bailiffs for breaking the peace and, if convicted, is to be amerced heavily and lose the weapon with which he committed the assault. In cases of minor assaults not involving weapons, a party may sue by gage and pledge, according to custom, to ensure aggressions do not go unpunished.

This chapter illustrates that, notwithstanding the concern expressed in [cap.4, the bailiffs could ex officio (since they were the king's officers) take the role of plaintiff in cases involving breaking the king's peace. Compare this chapter with Yarmouth by-laws on drawing blood and assault.]

Cases begun by writ of right [concerning a dispute over ownership of a borough tenement] proceed with 3 summonses and 3 distrains made at fortnightly intervals on the tenant. If the tenant still defaults in answering the suit, the tenement may be taken into the king's hand, but recovered if the tenant appears in court to initiate a defence and wage his law. After which he is allowed 3 essoins (at fortnightly intervals) and a day, after which he may have the disputed property inspected by a jury. After this view of the land, he shall again have 3 essoins. He may then present the argument that a third party will warrant his ownership, or he may proceed by a grand assize, whose jurors shall be selected by four trustworthy men acceptable to the parties. In the case of an inquest, the tenement shall be awarded to whomever this inquest decides has the better claim to it. In the case of a warrantor (if a foreigner with nothing in the city by which he may be [distrained]), a writ must be obtained for summoning the warrantor to appear in the court of the itinerant Justices. The claimant may counterplead that he can prove the warrantor never had possession of the property; if the tenant dares not challenge this, then he must pursue another defence (i.e. the inquest). If the warrantor comes of his own accord and makes warrant of the tenant's right, but the claimant presents stronger evidence, then he may recover against both the warrantor and the tenant. If the tenant (through failure to defend or by inquest) loses the property to the claimant, he may seek to recover the value of the property from the warrantor. If the warrantor has property in the city, then he may be summoned by virtue of the original writ of right. To prevent delaying the claimant's recovery when an inquest is called, the inquest is not to be postponed except for allowing the tenant one essoin after his initial appearance.

Compare this chapter with the [Ipswich custom on the same subject. The warrantor referred to might be a landlord of whom the tenant held the property, or the previous owner who had given or sold the property to the tenant. As Hudson noted, the numerous steps in this judicial process, along with the essoins, could make a case drag on for some time. The clause "the tenement may be taken into the king's hand" does not appear in the Liber Consuetudinum and may be a later specification of something that was earlier taken for granted.]

CUSTOMAL: CAPITULUM 12

The same delays in defence made in pleas by writ of right may also be applied to writ of right by dower. The tenant may argue that the woman who sues was never married to the deceased; in which case the tenant must present his evidence and the Bishop shall be requested to have enquiry made through the court of Christianity. Alternatively, the tenant may argue that the late husband of the woman suing did not own the property at the time they married, nor later; in which case supporting witnesses must be produced. Or the tenant may defend that dower right was waived by the woman consenting, in the city court, to her husband transferring the tenement to the tenant, his ancestors, or his landlord; in which case he must produce the deed to this effect and a copy must be found enrolled in the city court rolls (according to custom). Widows may not sue for right in tenements where a legitimate deed of transfer can be produced showing they waived dower rights.

See the similar provision on [waiving dower at Ipswich. The court of Christianity had jurisdiction over marriages and testaments.]

CUSTOMAL: CAPITULUM 13

Whenever a plea by writ of entry or writ of trespass is filed in the king's courts, jurisdiction over it should always be claimed for the city courts. Justice should be done in the city courts in such pleas so that no-one feels compelled to seek justice in external courts. Pleas held in the king's courts [at Westminster] result in citizens being burdened with labour and expenses through being summoned to serve on inquests and juries, hence the need to deal with those cases in the city courts. Costs involved in claiming the cases for the city courts are to be recouped from the parties to the plea, if they have the means; if not, the chamberlain will pay them from the community treasury.

[The royal charter of 1194 to Norwich exempted the citizens from the jurisdiction of external courts in pleas of tenure, except where the tenement involved was outside the city; pleas relating to real estate within the city were to be governed by city custom (which itself reflected Common Law). The charter of 1256 expanded this by granting that the citizens could not be obliged to answer in courts outside the city for any trespass committed inside the city, while that of Edward I (1305) was even more explicit in confirming that citizens not sue or be sued in any court outside the city for matters concerning internal tenure, trespass, or matters of contract, nor be summoned to sit on any assize, inquest or jury in an external court if the case concerned an internal tenure. The city's lawyers (or other representatives) were frequently travelling to Westminster to show one or other of these charters to the king's judges, in order to have cases transferred to the city court.]

History of medieval Lynn

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth | DEVELOPMENT OF LOCAL GOVERNMENT

Buildings and fortifications | Economy | Information sources

Map of Lynn in the fifteenth century

Lynn mayors and chamberlains

Biographies of Lynn townsmen

Appendix 1: Lynn by-laws

Appendix 2: Oaths of officers and burgesses

Appendix 3: Rental of community property, 1391

Development of local government

At the beginning of the thirteenth century, having just established his principal residence at Gaywood, the Bishop proceeded to strengthen the privileged commercial status of Lynn and reacquired his original foundation (by giving the Norwich monks something else in exchange), thus uniting central Lynn and Newland under his jurisdiction. South Lynn, however, remaining administratively separate throughout the medieval period; it lacked a market, or other advantages of the enfranchised borough, and remained largely agricultural in character.

The strengthening took place through charter grants from both the king and the Bishop 1204 and 1205 respectively, preceded by an enlargement of fair rights, to the fortnights surrounding St. Margaret's and St. Nicholas' feast-days. The king's grant, at the Bishop's request, came first with the upgrading of Lynn's status from vill to liber burgus (free borough) and a general statement that Lynn should have such liberties and customs as were typical of free boroughs. The Bishop's charter then identified Oxford as the town on which Lynn's liberties should be modelled; Oxford's liberties were themselves modelled on those of London. The king followed this up with a second charter, granting specific liberties, most known from charters and customs of Oxford or London. This detailed procedure assured the townsmen authority for their privileges from both their immediate and their ultimate overlords, but later became a basis for them to seek more independence from the Bishop, by appealing to the king as a higher authority – even though the charters specified that no grants were to be prejudicial to traditional rights of the lords of the borough: the Bishop and, of slightly lesser importance, the Earl of Arundel through the lordship of Rising (stemming from a grant of estates and rights by William II to his butler, William d'Albini).

Although the charters granted judicial self-administration in many matters, this administration really lay in the hands of officers appointed by the lords of the town. Their courts were held in buildings adjacent to the two marketplaces. The charter grants included a Merchant Gild and, according to local tradition, the alderman of the Gild served as the leader of the borough initially. Even towards the close of the thirteenth century, the gild is still seen acting as a quasi-governmental institution; it had its own statutes, its own finances, and its own system for resolving disputes between members – the aim being to try to prevent them resorting to the seigneurial courts. But within a few years of the first charters the ambitions of the citizens for control over their internal affairs had acquired another rallying-point: they had elected a mayor as the chief officer of a government representing the whole community. The first mayor was Robert fitz Sunolf, a name that reflects the connections Lynn had with Scandinavia; his father's prominence in Lynn society is suggested by the fact that Millfleet was earlier known as Sunolf's Fleet. The mayoralty became the first bone of contention between the townsmen and the Bishop, probably because it reflects an effort by the citizens (or at least a faction thereof) towards self-determination and was associated with attempts to obtain greater independence from the Bishop's officers in the areas of finance and legal administration.

There were in fact numerous points of conflict between the town authorities and the town's lords and their officers as the borough government tried persistently to broaden its powers. View of frankpledge (to ensure all were part of the tithing system), control of courts administering local custom (perhaps particularly the husting mentioned in the 1204 charter), erection of private quays without episcopal license, local self-taxation (both Bishop and town authorities competing in these impositions), and right to collect tolls on trade goods, were among the matters over which the town government battled with its seigneurs, the Bishop and the heirs of the Earl of Arundel, during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. This struggle also divided the local populace, some supporting tradition and the Bishop, others supporting the efforts for greater self-government. Lynn's medieval history is punctuated by a series of "compositions" between the two sides, trying to settle matters. The first, in 1234, found the Bishop agreeing to recognize the mayoralty, in return for a guarantee that each mayor after election would take oath before him to respect episcopal rights in the town. A charter of 1305 recognized the right of the town government to impose local taxes on the townspeople, which in fact it had already been doing for some years. But the 1309 composition with the Bishop tried to impose limitations on this; this composition, which reflects division within the community, obliged the borough authorities to rein back on their usurpations of episcopal rights, although only temporarily. The fourteenth century saw frustration and tempers build to the point of outright assaults on both lords – specifically, Robert de Monthalt (1313) and Bishop Despenser (1377). Despite some temporary successes through appeals to the king and some minor concessions from the Bishop, usually involving the citizens leasing jurisdictions, medieval Lynn never entirely gained independence from episcopal lordship – although by mid-15th century it was had taken almost all of the Bishop's jurisdictions in the town at a fee farm of £140. Complete freedom from its founder and overlord had to wait for the borough's incorporation (1525) and the Reformation.

Despite this, Lynn's self-government exercised a variety of functions related, among other things, to the regulation of trade and industry, measures for public health, safety and defence, the management of community property, and aspects of legal administration, as well as the raising of revenues to finance public activities and the associated management of the town's budget. These things occupied the time of a mayor, a town council, four chamberlains, and a number of lesser bureaucratic officers, as well as constables (chosen from among the leading citizens) responsible for the nightwatch in each ward. As was not unusual in English boroughs, there were periodic adjustments to the constitution, often the result of political conflict within the community.

previous

main menu

next

History of medieval Lynn

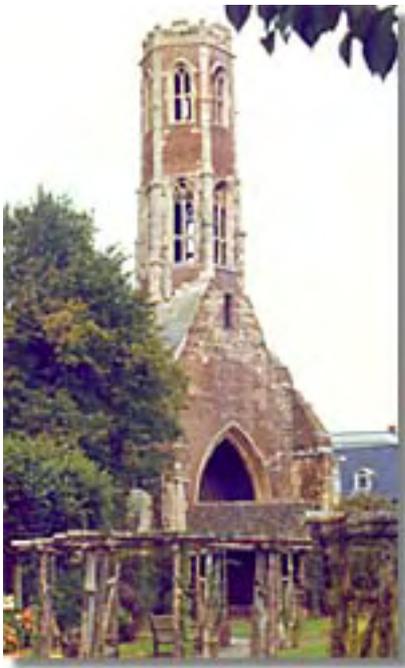

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth | Development of local government
BUILDINGS AND FORTIFICATIONS | Economy | Information sources
Map of Lynn in the fifteenth century
Lynn mayors and chamberlains
Biographies of Lynn townsmen
Appendix 1: Lynn by-laws
Appendix 2: Oaths of officers and burgesses
Appendix 3: Rental of community property, 1391

Buildings and fortifications

When fortifications were created around the town it was initially along the line of the existing sea bank, by this time well east of the actual line of the riverbank. Since the built-up area of the town was in the eastern half of the territory between the river and the sea bank (i. e. concentrated closest to the river), there was land available in the western half for pastures, orchards, mills, or for the monastic complexes of the various orders of friars which established themselves in Lynn in the thirteenth century. In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, progressive reclamation of land from the river (by silting, dumping of refuse, and building over the river edge) allowed wealthy merchants to establish their complexes along the westward-shifting river's edge or along the banks of the Millfleet or Purfleet, which gave access to and from the river. A few of the later examples survive today and are among the architectural treasures which give parts of modern King's Lynn a sense of the town at the close of the Middle Ages.

Some surviving ecclesiastical architecture

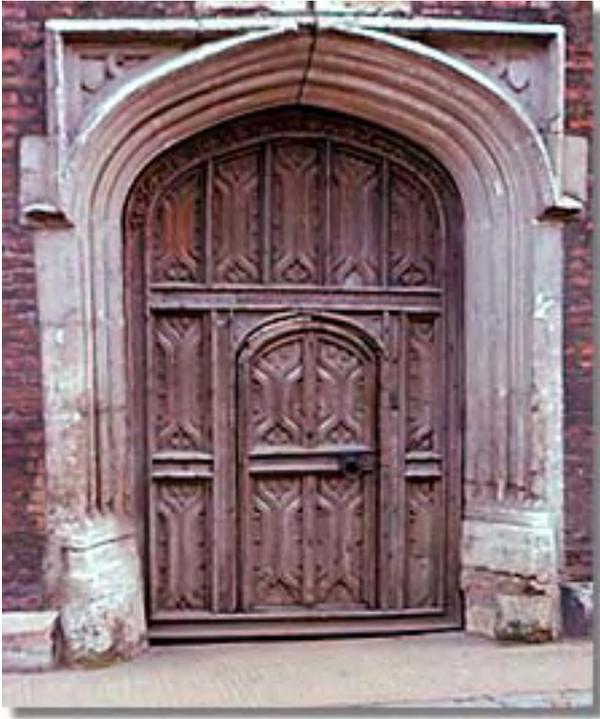

[left] A 15th century tower of the Franciscan friary; the Franciscans established themselves in Lynn in the 1260s, occupying a site between St. Margaret's and St. James'.

[right] The Chapel of Our Lady at the Mount (commonly known as Red Mount), built 1483, lay just outside the eastern defensive perimeter.

photos © S. Alsford

For many townsmen a single property served as the owner's home and place of business. A merchant complex was typically a long and narrow plot of land on which was built a combination of residence, shop, warehouse and private quay; sometimes the property was divided by a street, so that the quay and associated buildings were adjacent to the water while the residence was on the opposite side of the street, but in most cases all the buildings lay between street and waterway. Plots usually had their narrower side facing the street; this side might be up to 50 feet wide in the thirteenth century, but by the fifteenth when there was greater demand for frontage (at least in certain parts of the town) 30 feet was a more normal width. However, despite some measure of planned creation of the town, there is no evidence of an attempt at any time to standardize the size of building plots. The largest holdings might take the following layout:

- one or more shops would front the street, while above them and often extending out over the street would be living/sleeping chambers (known as solars, because likelier to take in sunlight through the windows);
- the merchant's hall (the focus for cooking and dining), parlour, and other residential rooms, would lie behind these;
- further back, in the centre part of the property, surrounding a narrow courtyard (which both provided access to the various parts of the building and acted as a light-well), were storerooms and other buildings serving purposes such as brewhouse, bakehouse and stable;
- finally, at water's edge were warehouse and quay.

Thoresby College doorway

The college was built ca.1510, a testamentary foundation of Thomas Thoresby, sometime mayor and member of a leading burgess family. The style of the doorway is very similar to those of the 15th century.
photo © S. Alsford

More moderately sized properties – particularly those elsewhere than the waterfront, and particularly as street frontage was reduced in width towards the end of the Middle Ages – owned by lesser merchants or well-to-do craftsmen might comprise one or more retail shops and/or industrial workshops facing the street, with living quarters above; often as a later addition, halls were built behind the shop/solar and more utilitarian structures further back, with a narrow passageway leading off the street, under the front range of buildings, and down one side of the plot to give access to the structures further back. Lesser craftsmen or retailers would probably have made do with just a shop/solar structure. Since dwellings of the poorer townspeople were the most likely to be of flimsy construction, subject to deterioration and later replacement, we know little of the living conditions of that group, although documents refer to cottages which were probably small, single-room residences of the lower strata of borough society.

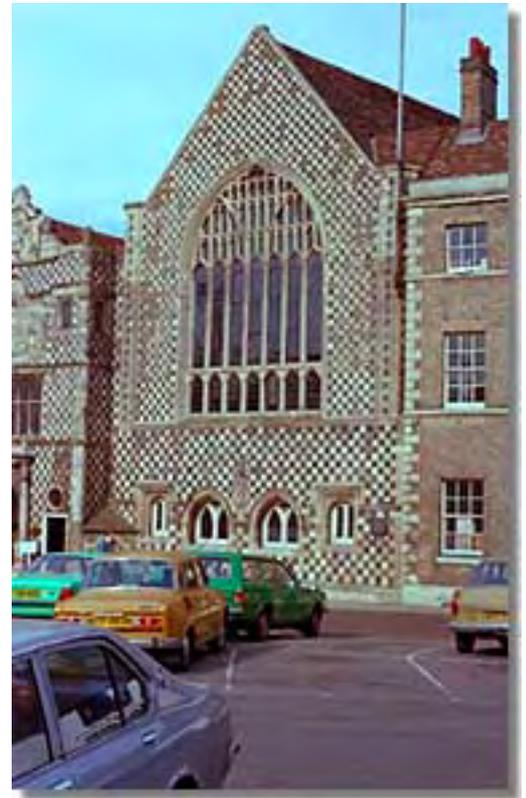

Another part of King's Lynn's architectural heritage are two of the halls built by medieval gilds of the town, along with the buildings serving as the base for the Hanse merchants in Lynn, known as the steelyard. The gilds, as organized instruments of interest groups within the community, played an important part in building and/or maintaining public facilities. Most striking is the hall of Holy Trinity Gild, which was apparently the successor to the Merchant Gild authorized by the 1204 charter. By the late thirteenth century it had a meeting hall in the Saturday Market, naturally enough, near St. Margaret's. This was gutted by fire in 1421 and a new hall was constructed (using brick) at a different location, in the northwestern corner of the market; the Gild spent over £200 on this project during the following two years. The side facing out into the market was decorated with a chequered pattern of black and white squares of flint and a large arched window. The hall was used not only by Trinity Gild but rented for meetings by other gilds and by the borough corporation (which by the 1360s was employing a caretaker of the gildhall, who also served as bedeman, an office involving public announcement of the death of Gild members – this being an indicator of the close link of Gild and borough). Trinity Gild had a significant role in the life of the community, not only by representing the interests of most leading members of that community (the merchants), nor only by its traditional association with town government, but also by its management of the Common Staith, its provision of charitable services, its contributions to maintenance of public facilities (e.g. water conduits) and churches, and the availability of its treasury for commercial or public loans.

Holy Trinity Guildhall

(facade on the northwest corner of the Saturday market),
the seat of medieval borough government.
photo © S. Alsford

For an artist's impression of how the Guildhall might have looked when first built, see here

Both Trinity Gild and the Bishop contributed to the construction of Lynn's defences, which were as much to control the access-points of traders into the town and to define the area of borough jurisdiction as to protect from attack. The sea bank pre-existing the town provided a natural line of defence and was made more effective by digging a ditch on its outward-facing (east) side; the ditch later became part of the canal system. There is evidence for a lesser ditch on the townward side of the bank, although this may have been only to furnish soil to raise the bank. This activity is suspected to have taken place in the context of the civil war at the close of the reign of King John, when Lynn appears to have experienced a direct threat. There were also four wooden towers: two stood at the southern and northern ends of the Newland river bank (thus also guarding the entrances to the Purfleet and the Gay, respectively), and the other two likely at the northern and southern ends of the ditch/bank guarding the east-west road into Newland and the south-north road into South Lynn respectively; their date of creation is uncertain, although the Bishop's Bretask (the tower by the Gay) is heard of by 1270.

Royal grants of murage were obtained by Lynn in 1266, 1294, 1300 and 1339, the baronial wars doubtless providing the first impetus for upgrading defences to a stone wall. Wall construction began on the eastern boundary of Newland, with a stone gate built where the east-west road and the wall intersected. The question of boundary definition was another point on which town authorities and the Bishop – through his tenants of the adjacent manor of Gaywood – came into dispute. The townsmen had used the wall to extend their boundary eastwards beyond the earlier line of the sea bank, in order to encompass a suburb which had arisen east of the bank. The southern entrance to Lynn, through South Lynn, was likewise strengthened with a stone gate before 1319. The South Gate and East Gate, possibly successors to bretasks on those sites (certainly in the late 1360s a connection is made in the borough records between the south gates and a South Bretask), had gatekeepers in the Late Middle Ages and were seen as the main entrances to the town; other gates lying between these two, probably built in the same period, were secondary points of access into the town, and were kept locked at night. The stone wall was not extended south from Newland, to protect central and South Lynn, until the post-medieval period. Various of the watercourses already mentioned were part of the town's defensive system. The River Gay was the town's northern boundary and defence; a gatekeeper was less regularly employed by the borough for a gate guarding the bridge across the Gay, at Dowshill.

previous

main menu

next

History of medieval Lynn

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth | Development of local government
Buildings and fortifications | ECONOMY | Information sources
Map of Lynn in the fifteenth century
Lynn mayors and chamberlains
Biographies of Lynn townsmen
Appendix 1: Lynn by-laws
Appendix 2: Oaths of officers and burgesses
Appendix 3: Rental of community property, 1391

Economy

The foundation of a new town was not a guarantee of its success, but the east coast was a prosperous location and Lynn rapidly became one of the most thriving of England's new towns. Its access to the hinterland, improved by diversion of the Great Ouse towards Lynn, as well as its coastal trade (e.g. fish, pottery, coal) made it one of the most prosperous ports in England during the thirteenth century. At this time the long list of exported goods was dominated by agricultural produce – notably wool, grain and salt. Fish, furs, cloth, iron, timber, and especially wine were among its imports; spices reached it from Spain, hawks from Norway. Its trading range covered principally Scandinavia, the Baltic, the Low Countries, the Rhineland, Flanders, and northern France, and some of its own leading families were immigrants from those parts. In the following two centuries its imports increasingly diversified, although the wine trade became focused more on London in the fifteenth century, and during the Scottish and French wars of the fourteenth century Lynn was an important market for provisioning royal armies.

The Merchant Guild must have had a good deal of influence over the borough's economic policy (insofar as there was any), since the personnel of government and guild overlapped a great deal. Occasionally, in the fifteenth century, the borough assembly held special sessions to discuss mercantile matters and the deliberations were restricted to merchants of the town (although this was not the Merchant Guild per se). Full membership in the guild gave the right to trading with outsider merchants on non-market days as well as wholesaling privileges. It was also possible to buy membership only for the spiritual and socio-religious benefits, which was also open to mothers, wives or widows (Margery Kempe being an example) of members, and even deceased persons. The sons of members were able to join for a much reduced fee.

To support its activities, the Guild had (like that at Ipswich) a monopoly of trade in millstones and possibly on some other types of stone and marble – certainly it was active in trade in stones – as well as control of the Common Staith, or quay, (rented from the Bishop); the latter brought it modest annual revenues from quaying and craning. It also acquired numerous properties, from which an annual income in rents was obtained. Further revenue came from entrance fees, the membership including not only local merchants, but also non-resident gentry and merchants from the region who through their membership apparently acquired certain trading rights in Lynn; this was in some regards comparable to the admission of foreign burgesses" at Ipswich. By 1421 the Guild had accumulated a wealth of £1,403, although 86% of this was in the form of debts due it, from loans to its members or the borough. The types of activities or services into which some of this income was fed included:

- public announcements of the deaths of members;
- divine celebrations for the souls of deceased members and for the "founders" of the town – King John and his contemporary, Bishop John Grey;
- charitable works in the form of alms – sometimes as annuities that make them similar to pensions – not only to members who had fallen on bad times but also to widows of members, the aged, paupers, hermits and anchorites;
- maintenance of a public privy on the Common Staith, and (by the late 1430s) a customs house and common warehouse there.

The borough government's own fiscal resources were well below those of the Merchant Guild's. Its budget during the thirteenth century, when courts and their profits were not in borough hands, was founded upon local taxations mentioned above; they were assessed only on moveables – perhaps only on commercial goods owned – and typically at the rate of between 3d. and 12d. per £. By the end of the century, from which time taxation records have survived (without any hint that they were an innovation) the tallages were being levied annually and the tallage rolls were being elaborated to the point where they have the appearance of draft financial accounts for the borough: other incomes were being recorded, such as freeman entrance fines, trade licences, and fines for market offences; some assessments due were being assigned to payment of particular borough expenses; and numerous outgoings were recorded as deductions from the assessments of individuals who were owed money by the borough. The tallages might bring in between £70-£90 each, but still do not seem to have sufficed to avoid borough deficits at a time when many expenses were being incurred to assert, defend or expand borough jurisdictions and liberties. This messy approach to book-keeping contributed to popular discontent with the taxation system, which in turn led to the clause of the 1309 composition that tried to limit the frequency and suspected abuses of tallage. Only a couple of examples of tallage rolls are found post-1309, and they are more straightforward lists of assessments only.

Ten years after the composition a very good series of Lynn chamberlains' accounts appears, although an earlier such account (1297/98) appears only like a more organized version of the tallage roll (leading to its possible misclassification in that archival series). Although borough financial management may have been reorganized, local tallages remained the mainstay of the budget; by at least the 1330s they were again being levied annually, and sometimes two in a year – amounts raised ranged roughly between £100 to £300 annually, with a single "great tax" in 1346/47 yielding £330. Other sources of income were insignificant by comparison, although mention of rents bringing in £73 in 1338/39 is inexplicable for its uniqueness unless that income was normally separately accounted for. As the century wore on, sources of borough income diversified to include profits from the leet court (beyond the farm paid the Bishop) resulting partly from a "new" leet, gifts and legacies, sale of surplus or confiscated materials or of unredeemed pledges, fines for transgressions against the community (e.g. wandering pigs, failure to answer summonses to attend assembly meetings), leases of lands and butchers stalls, revenues from the half of the Tolbooth (tronage, mensurage and lovecup) farmed from the Black Prince after 1373, and a share from hostage after 1378.

Lynn also faced some very heavy costs in the 1360s and '70s, largely due to the war with France; there were huge expenditures on the building of a ship and a barge for royal expeditions, the town had to contribute towards war aids, and money had to be pumped into upgrading the town defences. This placed an onerous tax burden on townsmen (taxation had been extended beyond burgesses to resident non-burgesses). Perhaps in part because of this, and inspired by the example of the Merchant Guild, from about 1380 onwards fiscal strategy focused on the acquisition of real estate and/or rents as a foundation for a relatively reliable annual income; a large bequest of rents from properties once owned by prominent townsman John Burghard helped set the ball rolling. Community taxation continued to the turn of the century, but was abandoned during a period of popular unrest when borough finances were in disarray. After this, rents and leases of lands, tenements, shops, market stalls, and the town mills were the backbone of borough revenues, which fluctuated around the £100 mark annually; and there were renewed efforts in the 1420s to oblige aliens living in Lynn to buy licences to trade.

In the fourteenth century the limits of agricultural expansion had been reached in East Anglia and there were now a much larger number of market towns and ports competing for trade. Even so, at mid-century Lynn remained among the top dozen towns and among its merchants were some of the leading capitalists of England. In 1373 its advantageous location for waterborne trade between the Midlands and the continent led to its selection as one of the official staple ports through which foreign commerce had to be channelled.

However, its export trade was already being adversely affected by several factors:

- agricultural production, especially after the Black Death, went into decline;
- raw wool (whose export was highly taxed) was diverted into domestic cloth production;
- cheaper salt became available from Portugal and France;
- the German Hanse towns were coming to dominate trade in the North Sea.

Despite decline in its key trade in wool and wine (the latter due to the effects of the Hundred Years War), Lynn was able to weather the economic recession in late fourteenth century, thanks largely to trade with the Baltic through Hanseatic ports (notably cloth exports), which established their own warehouses in Lynn in the early fifteenth century. Wine imports recovered somewhat in the first half of the fifteenth century, during which period Lynn's involvement in the export of cloth exports also peaked, compensating for the negligible wool trade, although London was dominating the cloth trade and grain export remained at least as important to Lynn. None of the exported cloth was produced in Lynn itself; there does not seem to have been any real effort to introduce manufacturing industries into the town, other than to serve local needs. There is no evidence of any residential clusterings of particular crafts that might suggest areas of significant industrial activity, with the possible exception of Damgate in the latter half of the fourteenth century, where we find a number of individuals active in the cloth-making industry, with a fulling mill built in the 1390s near the north-eastern end, while the western end of Damgate connected with Webster Row and Listergate, names both indicative of activities associated with cloth-making. Nor do craft guilds have a very conspicuous role in the medieval history of the town, although we know of a number of socio-religious guilds, some of which appear to have had a craft basis.

In the early fifteenth century, Lynn was trading as far afield as Iceland, although not all the trade was in legitimate goods. Commerce with Scandinavian countries was evidently of much importance to Lynn, and the efforts to capture a share in trade with Iceland jeopardised this. For one thing, it antagonized the Hanse merchants trying to monopolize that trade; in 1415 they complained to the king of Denmark, Sweden and Norway, who persuaded Henry V to prohibit English ventures to Iceland. A prohibition was also in effect when voyages to Iceland are evidenced again in 1429; the borough council feared that breaking this prohibition would lead the Danish king to arrest the merchandize of Lynn merchants trading (only) with the Baltic countries. This in fact occurred, and Lynn responded both by a retaliation against Danes in the town and by sending ambassadors to treat with the king of Denmark. The situation was exacerbated by a complaint of the Bishop of Iceland to the king that Lynn merchants were involved in trading Icelandic children into slavery.

Lynn had long outgrown its expansion phase, but was able to maintain itself. This is reflected in the continued rebuilding of houses, enlargement of churches, and repairs to town wall and gates during the Late Middle Ages, and the building of new halls for the two leading merchant guilds, begun in 1406 and 1424. However, the reduction of the number of constabularies at some point around the late fourteenth or early fifteenth century may reflect depopulation in some part of the town (perhaps around St. James). Despite another economic slump in the latter half of the fifteenth century, Lynn was able to adapt to changing circumstances better than nearby Boston, and it was not until the post-medieval period that Lynn's important role in commerce really declined.

previous

main menu

next

Created: August 29, 1998. Last update: November 11, 2002

© Stephen Alsford, 1998-2003

History of medieval Lynn

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth | Development of local government
Buildings and fortifications | Economy | INFORMATION SOURCES
Map of Lynn in the fifteenth century
Lynn mayors and chamberlains
Biographies of Lynn townsmen
Appendix 1: Lynn by-laws
Appendix 2: Oaths of officers and burgesses
Appendix 3: Rental of community property, 1391

Information sources

The following is a small selection of published sources of information about medieval King's Lynn. For additional secondary sources as well as primary sources, see the bibliography to The Men Behind the Masque.

Clarke, Helen, and Alan Carter. Excavations in King's Lynn 1963-1970. Society for Medieval Archaeology, 1977.

Hillen, H.J. History of the borough of King's Lynn. 2 vols. Norwich, 1907.

Ingleby, Holcombe. The Heart of Lynn. London, 1925.

Owen, Dorothy. The Making of King's Lynn: A Documentary Survey. British Academy Records of Social and Economic History, new series, vol.9 (1984).

Parker, Vanessa. The Making of King's Lynn: Secular Buildings from the 11th to the 17th Century. Chichester, 1971.

Rutledge, Elizabeth and Paul Rutledge. "King's Lynn and Great Yarmouth, two thirteenth-century surveys." Norfolk Archaeology, vol.37 (1978), 92-114.

previous

main menu

Appendix 1

Created: February 21, 2000. Last update: November 11, 2002

© Stephen Alsford, 2000-2003

History of medieval Lynn

Lynn in the fifteenth century

This is a clickable imagemap.

To slide out the sidelined image, press "x"; to withdraw it, press "z".

NOTES:

River Ouse

The Great Ouse flowed into the Wash from several inland counties and was thus an important trade transportation route for the region. It was, however, the Little Ouse that passed by the site of Lynn; the Great Ouse joined with the Nene and together they reached the Wash at Wisbech. In the late 13th century, however, silting up of the Wisbech estuary, combined with a scheme of the Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, involving a dam and the reopening of an artificial channel (originally cut by the Romans, but later silted up), served to divert the Great Ouse into the Little Ouse some distance south of Lynn. The Bishop intended this scheme to profit his tenants at Littleport, but it also worked to the benefit of Lynn and the damage of Wisbech, in terms of the re-routing of trade. Over the lifetime of medieval Lynn, silting, dumping of refuse, and deliberate reclamation combined to push the east bank of the Ouse westwards about 100 yards, with the townsmen first establishing private wharfs (which themselves helped trap silt) on that bank across the road from their residences, then setting up small buildings, and finally expanding these into larger residences with warehouses.

A Fisherfleet

Actually the River Gay (later Gaywood), which led from the Little Ouse to the Bishop's manor and village of Gaywood. As the name suggests, this part of town, particularly the mouth of the Fisherfleet, tended to attract fishermen, who established residences there.

B Purfleet

The first reference we have to this, in 1101, names it Possfled. From there it transforms over time to Pusflet, then to Pursflet.

C Millfleet

The first reference we have to this, in 1101, names it Sewoldsfled. It is not clear whether the later name (c.1250) Sunolf's Fleet is a corruption of this or associated with the family of Robert fitz Sunolf, first mayor of Lynn; curiously, the fleet was known as Mayorsfleet around the turn of the century, while the bridge crossing it was called both Mayor's bridge and Sunolf's bridge. Later it was known as Swaggessfleet (after the mill owner) and later still just as Millfleet.

E River Nar

In the High Middle Ages, the course of the Nar may have flowed closer to All Saints church, only to be diverted as either silting up or deliberate filling in (due to growth of habitation in South Lynn) occurred; this presumably happened before the Carmelites established their friary in South Lynn.

F Le Balle

Although the first explicit references to an area dedicated to washing and drying fish are in the 16th century, it is likely that one or more such areas existed in medieval times. Running water (such as provided by the estuary tides) was required for washing, and shingle for drying. These areas were called "fish balls"; there is reference in 1439 to a location called Le Balle, in the southern part of town and by the river. This location is probably reflected in the post-medieval area known as Boal Wharf, a peninsula that was part of South Lynn on the north bank of the Nar. The area opposite on the south bank may also have been used for the same purpose, although it was more marshy and not as immediately accessible. Le Balle was also one of the places where fullers set up tents used to stretch out cloth to dry.

G Dowshill

H Rondeshill

It is hard to imagine what these were, if not salterns in origin, created in the Early and High Middle Ages. Although not within borough boundaries, the hills were recognized as belonging to the community. Outside of the main area of settlement, there would have been no reason to adapt them as the foundation of buildings. The bridge across the Fisherfleet, to the southwest of Dowshill was protected by a gate in 1339, later called the North Gate.

J Stone Bridge

This was probably the first bridge established across the Purfleet, soon after (if not before) the foundation of Lynn St. Margaret's.

K Baxter Bridge

Earlier known as Belvaco's Bridge, named after James de Belvaco, perhaps because his numerous properties in town included a house adjoining the bridge; a member of a prominent urban dynasty originally from Beauvais, France, James held the mayoralty at least twice in the third quarter of the 13th century. If South Lynn had, from early times, required a north-south route to connect it to Damgate, that would argue for an early existence of this bridge, or at least a ford at the site (however, see the entry under Gannock Gate). The later name of Baxter Bridge was presumably associated with Baxter Row, the street immediately north and south of the bridge, suggesting the presence of bakers there. By mid-16th century a third marketplace had begun to develop in the large space immediately north of the bridge, due to the increase of river traffic along the Purfleet, where many merchants had been establishing private quays and warehouses since at least the mid-15th century.

L Purfleet Bridge

This was likely built in the late 14th or early 15th century, consequent to 14th-century reclamation of land on the edge of the Ouse having encouraged the creation of streets (Wingate to the south and the Chequer to the north) along which merchants established homes, warehouses and quays. The decision to put in a bridge here (a potential blockage for ships) probably also reflects that silting of the fleets had made them less accessible to larger ships, although low-draught vessels such as barges could still navigate these watercourses.

M Bishop's Bridge

This crossed a lesser fleet running off Fisherfleet and may in fact represent the original point of entry into Newland. There are indications that the north-south bank, which also acted as a defensive line, originally ran past the western end of this bridge (later part of that bank became a road), and that the line of the stone wall was placed further to the east in order to protect a suburb that had grown up along the part of Damgate east of Bishop's Bridge. That bridge was later known as Littleport Bridge, a name suggesting that a lesser settlement (port) had existed there. The fleet the bridge crosses may have been dug as part of the original defensive line. That a second bridge of the same name, crossing Millfleet by the Gannock Gate, marked the boundary between one area of jurisdiction (Lynn) and another (South Lynn), also suggests that the Newland Bishop's Bridge might at one time been the boundary between Newland and the manor of Gaywood.

N Saturday Market

The first official (i.e. privileged) market was created in conjunction with the foundation of Lynn and St. Margaret's in 1101. However, the Saturday Market likely lay on the site of the "sand-market" whose informal existence encouraged the Bishop to found Lynn in the first place. It is uncertain whether it was this market, or the Tuesday Market, in which William d'Albini was, tempore William Rufus, granted a half-share, along with the "port" where ships anchored, and various tolls and customs associated with the activities at those locations. The market was served by a privy built in 1309 and a freshwater conduit in place by the mid-14th century. Adjacent land was added to the market in the 1360s to bring butchers' stalls together into one spot as a shambles (viz. Butcher Row later known as Bulwer Row, after an inn The Bull). There were numerous shops and several inns along the north side of the market.

(photo of the marketplace)

O Tuesday Market

The new town established by Bishop Turbe in mid-12th century would have required its own market, since it was initially under a separate lordship (the Bishop's) to that of the original borough foundation at Lynn (then under the lordship of the monastic priory of Norwich). However, it is possible a market existed here before that foundation, and was the reason for the foundation, particularly if the "port" referred to in the grant to William d'Albini means the mouth of the Gaywood, which in turn would have to mean the market referred to was closer than the distant Saturday Market. At its creation, the western side fronted the river, and the same may have been true of the northern side, originally, although buildings were encroaching on this area by at least the late 13th century. The eastern and southern sides of the Tuesday market were dotted with inns, to accommodate traders from out of town. A shelter for some of the booths was set up there in the latter part of the 15th century; topped by a cross (a reflection of an ancient custom of making business deals in the shadow of a church, to solemnize the contract), it was a precursor of the later market halls which were not a common feature in medieval England.

P Bishop's Staith

This quay was so named because it, and fees and tolls associated with its use, were part of the lordship rights of the Bishop of Norwich, as founder of Lynn. By the close of the Middle Ages, there were likely public warehouses here. To the south of it lay the King's Staith, a name extended to cover the Bishop's Staith too in post-medieval times.

Q Common Staith

This appears to have belonged to the Merchant Guild. Here there were warehouses for foreign merchants to store their goods pending sale or movement out of town by water or road. Some buildings were dedicated to storing fish, which had particular needs and problems, or grain. On the north side of the quay was a building housing weighing equipment and, by the 1460s, a customs house. The Guild also maintained at the quay a public privy and a public crane.

T Hanse Steelyard

Warehouses were to protect goods from the weather and from theft. Usually, local merchants had their own private warehouses associated with their residences, while foreign merchants had warehousing provided for their use on the Common Staith. The Hanse merchants were a special case, and could have their own base in Lynn. The timber-framed warehouse opposite St. Margaret's and the Saturday market was built to serve the merchants of the Hanseatic League in 1474, when the special privileges of the Hanse were re-granted (by the Treaty of Utrecht), and licence to build a steelyard was obtained from borough authorities; the Hanse had, however, had a warehouse in Lynn for at least fifty years previous – perhaps on the same site, although an older, stone warehouse on the public quay may have been associated with the Hanse. A second parallel range, on the north side, was added a little later in brick, creating a central courtyard. The residential part of the complex that likely faced the street has been replaced by a later structure.

U Mill (Millfleet)

There are so many references to different names and owners, that I am inclined to suspect there was more than one mill here. Be that as it may, here was the town's public corn mill. It perhaps began life as the mill built by the monks, mentioned in the Bishop's foundation charter of ca.1096. However, the first mill known with certainty to be associated with the site was built by the lord of South Lynn, Lord Scales and was known as Scales Mill. It was later known as Swagges Mill, but this was ruinous by the late 14th century. The borough acquired the site in 1392 and built a new mill there, but had difficulty making it a commercial success. Perhaps it was this reason that prompted the Merchant Guild to take it over in 1448. In 1425 a channel connecting Fisherfleet and Purfleet, just outside the town wall/ditch (and itself partly defensive in purpose), was extended to Millfleet in order to bring more water from the Gay with the hope of increasing the flow necessary to power the mill.

V Mills (Fisherfleet)

The Bishop built a corn mill to serve his Newland tenants on a branch off the River Gay, not far from St. Nicholas' church; this had disappeared by the end of the 15th century. A second mill, horsepowered, in the northeast corner of the town directly on the Gay was in operation by the beginning of the 15th century. Known as a kettlemill, its purpose was to draw from the river (in kettle-like containers) water that would feed the town's freshwater conduits, one of the earliest of which ran from the kettlemill down Damgate to Gresemarket, with a connection south to the Saturday marketplace. It was possibly in this vicinity that a fulling mill was built in 1393-94.

W Trinity Gildhall

The Guild of Holy Trinity was the socio-religious face of Lynn's Merchant Guild. It naturally built its meeting-hall facing what was originally the town centre and hub of the economic activity that was central to its interests and concerns: the Saturday marketplace. Although the present hall was not the original market location of the guild's home, the earlier gildhall was in place in the vicinity before the close of the 13th century. As mercantile activity gradually refocused around the Tuesday Market adjacent to the public quay, later gildhalls (like St. George's) were built further north. Long and narrow, the gildhall was basically a large hall raised over an undercroft, with a passageway down the west side, fronted by an exterior staircase which led up to the hall's entrance; it was built of brick, with the street-front decorated. Brick provided better protection from fire, which was a major concern in closely built-up towns – many of which experienced devastating fires at one or more times in their history – and the cause of the previous hall's demise. The undercroft would have been used as a warehouse for guild-owned merchandize, such as the millstones in which they had a trade monopoly. It also housed the guild treasury. The borough authorities used the hall for council meetings and later part of the undercroft was used as town gaol. The Merchant Guild of South Lynn (far more modest in size and resources than that of Lynn) leased the Trinity Hall for its annual feast-day.

X St. George's Gildhall

St. George's Gild was a socio-religious association of some of the wealthier townsmen. It received royal recognition (Letters Patent) in 1406; at that time its property was on the opposite side of the Chequer from the present gildhall, so the latter must have been constructed after that date. This long and narrow hall, not quite as large as the Trinity Gildhall, was probably begun in the early 15th century, and building continued over the course of several decades. It was essentially a large hall, with an undercroft, and an entrance passageway running down the length of one side. Brick was the material used (as opposed to timber framing), as for Trinity Gildhall, but there was no comparable decoration of the street front. Some lesser gilds, not wealthy enough to own a hall, leased St. George's Hall for their annual feast-day.

Y Steward's Hall

The location of the court and tollbooth of the Bishop was facing the Tuesday market, on the north side of Jews Lane, although no proven traces remain of this building. The location suggests an original association with the Newland foundation.

Z Almshouse

An almshouse was set up at the east end of Fuller Row by the Gild of St. Giles and St. Julian to provide living quarters for impoverished citizens. It was in existence by 1488, when it had private rooms for seven men and six women.

DEFENCES

D1 East Gate

Although it may have been preceded by one of the wooden towers (bretasks) that the Bishop helped build, in conjunction with a drawbridge across the subsidiary fleet running off Fisherfleet, the East Gate itself was probably the outcome of the first murage grant to Lynn in 1266 and the walls referred to in 1277 were likely those adjacent to the East Gate. The position of gate and wall, which seem to have gone beyond borough boundaries to encroach on the manor of Gaywood, may have been to protect suburban settlement, although even then some houses still eastwards of the gate were burned down to prevent them serving as protection for any besiegers. The fleet was widened, and sluices built to keep water in it, so that it could better serve as part of the defences. The gate was one of the two main land-route entrances into the town, on the road from Norwich, manned by a permanent gatekeeper. Tolls were collected here on merchandize coming in and going out of town. It was equipped with drawbridge, portcullis and lockable wooden gates (as was the South Gate). It may be that the site of this gate had, even before the foundation of Newland, been on the route of a road from the manor of Gaywood to Lynn, turning south soon thereafter and then following the northern bank of the Purfleet until reaching the Stone Bridge into Lynn. However, this is just a hypothesis proposed by Beloe, writing in 1895 – five years after the gate had been demolished.

D2 Gannock Gate

This was in fact the northern of two Gannock gates (the other lying about halfway down the stretch of ditch that protected South Lynn. The gate seems to have taken its name from the bank (one of the ancient raised causeways) through which it gave entrance. I have found no evidence on the derivation of the name; it can hardly be anything to do with gannoker (ale-wife), but perhaps is associated with gannagium (land under cultivation) in reference to the location being surrounded by fields. Hillen offered the less likely, but not dismissable, theory that the term derived from a mix of Anglo-Saxon and Celtic terms meaning "route along a hill". Prior to the foundation of Newland, it is conceivable that the site of Gannock Gate and the road running therefrom towards the town centre represented the principal approach from the east; certainly the road between the Saturday market and St. James' lies on what was probably one of the early raised causeways existing at the time of Lynn's foundation, and this road might have continued on to the location of Gannock Gate before St. James' was built. This hypothesis would also obviate the need to identify a north-south route (with bridge across the Purfleet) connecting South Lynn with Damgate. Once Newland had developed and the East Gate/Damgate approach into the town had risen in importance, Gannock Gate and the road leading to it fell into disuse, and the gate was mostly kept closed.

D3 South Gate

One of the two main land-route entrances into the town, on the road from Ely and Cambridge, manned by a permanent gatekeeper. It may have previously been the location of one of the bishop's bretasks. The king assigned the borough of Lynn the task of maintaining the defences of South Lynn, in addition to its own, although the cost was to be borne by the county. Tolls were collected here on merchandize coming in and going out of town. The gate was in existence by the beginning of the 13th century, but underwent substantial rebuilding in 1437 and in the post-medieval period; it still stands today. A drawbridge was part of the defences, although this was placed after the regular bridge crossing the Nar.

(illustration of the gate in the 19th century; photo of the gate in the late 19th century; photo of the gate in the late 20th century)

D4 Bishop's bretask

Early features of the town's defences were wooden towers positioned at main entry points into the town: the roads and the fleets. The Bishop contributed to the defence of his tenants of Newland by building and maintaining a bretask at the northwest corner of the town, by Fisherfleet (which, as the River Gay, also happened to lead to his manor at Gaywood). This tower is mentioned as early as 1270. In post-medieval times St. Ann's Fort was built here, again reflecting the strategic importance of this site.

RELIGIOUS PRECINCTS

R1 St. Margaret's church/priory

The church was part of the Bishop's original foundation of Lynn and must have been begun by 1101. Rebuilding occurred during 13th and 14th centuries, with costs supported by the borough, while in the late 15th century renovation and beautification was carried out thanks to private benefactors among the townspeople. The church's twin towers were built in the 13th century and must have been a prominent feature of the medieval skyline. The church was evidently situated on the most westerly part of the land reclaimed from the marsh at that point – i.e. at that time the river would have lain immediately west of the church; saltern mounds provided sufficiently solid foundations for the structure. Together with the priory on its south side, which was occupied only by a prior and a handful of monks, this site may have initially occupied all the land southwards to Millfleet; although in the 14th century, as more land was reclaimed westwards from the river, merchants' houses spread southwards and eventually (perhaps in the 15th century) swung eastwards along the bank of the Millfleet). After the Dissolution, the priory buildings were pulled down and the site redeveloped for residential use. A charnel, to hold the bones of those removed from the cemetery to make room for the newly deceased, had been added by the end of the 13th century; but the extension of burial rights to St. Nicholas' and St. James' in mid-14th century, together with competition from the friaries as burial sites, resulted in the charnel falling into disrepair and in 1509 it was converted into Lynn's first grammar school.
(floor plan ; further information and numerous pictures)

R2 St. James' chapel

The existence of this chapel by 1146 is a reflection of the fact that, in the early decades after the foundation of Lynn, population growth had to spread mainly eastwards from St. Margaret's. It is just possible that the chapel had some jurisdiction over what little settlement there may have been north of the Purfleet, along Damgate, prior to the creation of Newland. The gradual reclamation of land from the river on the westward side of St. Margaret's, together with the foundation of Newland to the north, diverted population spread away from the area of St. James. The chapel had fallen into disuse by mid-16th century; in the 1580s, part of its ruins were restored to serve as a workhouse.

R3 St. Nicholas' chapel

The grant of a chapel to the residents who had spread northwards beyond the original bounds of the episcopal foundation of Lynn was necessary, given the initial separation of the two settlements. However, there is no indication that St. Nicholas' was ever given parochial status, and the amalgamation of the settlements at the beginning of the 13th century inhibited that prospect – the resistance of the prior and priest of St. Margaret's (which would lose revenue to a rival parish church), backed by its parishioners, was able to suppress "separatist" movements in 1379 and 1427, although the right to a burial ground had been conceded to St. Nicholas' in 1361. The apparently out-of-the-way location of the chapel (as opposed to St. Margaret's which was adjacent to the marketplace) may be explained by the pre-existence of the Tuesday market and adjacent settlement, or perhaps by the desire to place the chapel near both Tuesday market and port on the River Gay. Rebuilding occurred in the 13th and, more thoroughly, in the 15th century.

(further information and numerous pictures; photo of south porch)

R4 All Saints church

This was the parish church of South Lynn, located by the main (and almost only) road running through South Lynn, following the line of an ancient raised bank. The small population of South Lynn stretched along that road, in the vicinity of the church. The church was probably built between the time of Domesday, which does not mention it, and the founding of Lynn.

(interior view)

R5 Augustinian friary

Only they, of all the orders, were able to secure a site close within the built-up section of the town. Their convent is not mentioned in the Newland survey of ca.1267/83, however, and it seems the friary was not established until the last years of that century. The site incorporated a church, chapter house, and residence. An inclination of townspeople to be buried here, to the detriment of St. Margaret's, led to an agreement in 1361 that a quarter of all offerings made at funerals in the friary church would be turned over to St. Margaret's; similar agreements with the Dominicans and Franciscans had already been put in place. In 1386 the borough authorities granted the Augustinians licence to use a large bequest from a townsman to build a conduit into their precinct, on condition that for half of each year the townspeople could have access to the conduit where it passed through a holding tank at the Listergate/Damgate corner.

R6 Dominican friary

The Blackfriars precinct, established before 1256, had formerly been the site of nine pieces of property. This friary became a popular choice among wealthy townsmen for their burial.

R7 Franciscan friary

This friary was in existence by mid-13th century.

R8 Carmelite friary

The Whitefriars had established a friary in South Lynn before 1260. The 14th-century cartulary mentions two stretches of cloister, an infirmary, refectory, and residence with garden. Church and cemetery were on the northern part of the site. There were two gateways into the precinct.

R9 Hospital of St. John

Dedicated to St. John Baptist, this institution was founded ca.1100/1135. It included in its enclosure – besides the hospital – a church, hall and other houses.

R10 Red Mount chapel

A private foundation on public land, whose construction was licensed by the borough in 1483, and partly under jurisdiction of the priory. Little is known of it. It contained two chapels, one on the lower floor, and a more elaborately decorated one on the upper floor.

STREETS AND ROADS

S1 Damgate

This road was placed atop a raised causeway that was either a product of the saltery activities, which involved the creation of lagoons, or a natural bank leading through the marshes (or perhaps a combination of these elements, with a natural bank being artificially raised even higher). The street's name itself suggests this function. After leaving the borough, the road led eastwards to Gaywood and beyond that to Norwich. Regardless of whether a road along this line pre-existed Newland, it was with the foundation of Newland that this road would have taken on a key importance in the borough, providing the direct route from the countryside east of Lynn to a marketplace and quayside. Damgate likely originally ran as far as the Tuesday market, but its western stretch was later renamed after the Gresemarket held there. As the Middle Ages drew to a close, Damgate was increasingly populated by craftsmen, as merchants relocated to streets adjacent to waterways.

S2 Briggate

Briggate (at least the section south of the Purfleet) seems to have lain along a raised bank, or causeway, perhaps the result of salting operations prior to the foundation of Lynn. As such, it would have been a natural site for one of the earliest streets and focal points of the settlement. If the first crossing point of the Purfleet was at the Stone Bridge – and the name Briggate (bridge street – now, perhaps significantly, the town's High Street) is supportive of such a hypothesis – then it is likely that Briggate would have been a relatively early focus for population spread in the century following the foundation of Lynn. The creation of Newland would have provided even more impetus for this. Briggate connected the two marketplaces; the name was originally applied to the road on both sides of the bridge, although in the late 14th century the northern section became known as Mercer Row. The street tended to be occupied predominantly by retailers – shopkeepers, innkeepers, etc. – and its northernmost section, just off the Tuesday market, was renamed Cook Row because of the food services provided there to market vendors and customers.

S3 St. James Street

This was likely an early route along which settlement spread following the foundation of Lynn, and would help explain the location of St. James church. For additional information, see the entry on Gannock Gate. The western stretch (leading from St. Margaret's) was also known as Skinner Row.

(photo of the street, late 19th/early 20th century)

S4 Purfleet Lane and Fincham Street

These streets came into being during the first half of the 14th century, as merchants sought properties with access to a waterway (perhaps itself a reflection of the growing importance of water transportation, as the Great Ouse was diverted to go by Lynn, and as road routes diminished in importance). At first, the typical pattern was probably for divided properties with the residence on the north side of the street and an associated quay on the south side (there is an example of this in the 1391 rental). However, as land was reclaimed from Purfleet, there was space on the southern side of the road for building. Fincham Street (on the east side of Briggate) was formerly known as Burghard Lane.

S5 Webster Row

Presumably named for the one-time presence of weavers there, just as the road south of Purfleet, running eastwards from Baxter's Bridge, was named Fuller Row due to settlement there of fullers, who needed the flowing water of the Purfleet for their work. Earlier (in the latter half of the 13th century) it was known as Collewilefleet – a reference to a minor fleet that ran down the centre of the road to Purfleet and was used as a gutter, as well as serving the town's cucking-stool. The area immediately north and south of the bridge across the Purfleet was known towards the end of the Middle Ages as Baxter Row. Further south of Purfleet, this route was known as Finnes Lane and possibly Skinner Row (although there is some confusion as to whether Skinner Row was not an alternate name for part of St. James' Street).

S6 Ratton Row

Probably represents in-filling of population between Baxter Row and the Dominican friary. The predominance of cottages here suggests it one of the poorer residential areas; several towns, including Norwich and Ipswich, are found with lanes of similar name (sometimes Rotten Row, although this is possibly a corruption), which may perhaps have been generally applied to such areas. The term may have originated from a reference to an infestation of rats there. The proximity to Spinner Lane may indicate that some of the cottages could have housed spinsters.

S7 The Chequer

At the time of the foundation of Newland, this street would have represented the bank of the Ouse, before land reclamation permitted building on the west side of the street. As reclamation pushed the river's edge further away, access to the quayside from the Chequer (or from its counterparts, Wingate and Lath Street, south of the Purfleet), was via a series of narrow lanes. The northern stretch of The Chequer was called Stockfish Row, presumably so named because stalls selling fish congregated around this offshoot from the market. Remains of a residence dating from ca.1180 was found there.

S8 Gresemarket

This street, just off the Tuesday market, seems to have had a high concentration of inns, perhaps to serve merchants bringing wares into town by road (via Damgate). Possibly a "grassmarket".

S9 Jews Lane

Jews Lane and Pillory Lane (the parallel lane further north) may have been an element in the original layout of streets in Newland, or later extensions. The presence of a Jewish community is indicative of the thriving economy of Lynn in the late 12th century; that it does not seem to have lasted long is perhaps more a consequence of the burning down of their houses in 1190, after which many survivors moved to better protection at Rising, where a castle had been built.

[MAIN MENU]

[\[contents\]](#)

APPENDIX I

The Officers of Borough Government

Lynn: mayors and chamberlains

| | |
|---------|---|
| 1272-73 | m. Robert de London |
| 1273-78 | unknown |
| 1278-79 | m. Adam de St. Edmund [12] |
| 1279-80 | m. John de Hispania |
| 1280-81 | m. William de Lindesey |
| 1281-82 | unknown |
| 1282-83 | m. John de Hispania |
| 1283-84 | m. Adam de St. Edmund |
| 1284-85 | unknown |
| 1285-86 | m. John de St. Omer |
| 1286-87 | m. Adam de St. Edmund |
| 1287-88 | unknown [13] |
| 1288-89 | m. Peter de Thurendine |
| 1289-90 | unknown |
| 1290-91 | m. John de Hispania |
| 1291-92 | m. John de Hispania |
| 1292-93 | m. Hugh de Massingham |
| 1293-94 | m. Thomas de Waynflete |
| 1294-95 | m. John de Merlowe |
| 1295-96 | m. John de Merlowe ch. William Schilling, Geoffrey Drewe, Henry de Heynore, -- |
| 1296-97 | m. Hugh de Massingham ch. – de Welle, Ralph le Palmer, Peter le Palmer, John de Almannia |
| 1297-98 | m. Hugh de Massingham ch. Geoffrey Drewe, Ralph de Fuldene, Thomas de Sechford, Geoffrey le Palmer |

- 1298-99 m. Thomas de Waynflete
ch. Richard de Mumby (Thomas de Aldeburgh), Alan de Walpole, Richard Hopman, William de Rigges
- 1299-1300 m. John de Merlowe
ch. Richard de Docking, William Schilling, Simon de Chestrefeld, Richard le Keu
- 1300-1301 m. John de Merlowe
ch. John de Acre, William de Cranewyc, Walter de Acre, Robert de Walton
- 1301-02 m. Richard de Gervestone
ch. Richard de Docking, John de Thurendine, Thomas de Sechford, Roger de Flicham
- 1302-03 m. John de Leycestre
ch. Richard Hopman, Lambert de St. Omer, Thomas de Bauseye, Adam Hurtlement
- 1303-04 m. John de Thurendine
ch. Peter Lomb, Thomas de Sechford, Simon de Chestrefeld, Richard de Toftes
- 1304-05 m. Thomas de Waynflete
ch. Peter de Elmham, John Braunch, Thomas de Spalding, Peter de Folsham
- 1305-06 m. Geoffrey Drewe
ch. Alan de Swerdestone, Richard de Swanton, Thomas de Walsingham, William de Eboraco
- 1306-07 m. Thomas de Sechford
ch. unknown
- 1307-08 m. Lambert de St. Omer [\[12\]](#)
ch. unknown
- 1308-09 m. Thomas de Sechford
ch. unknown
- 1309-10 m. Peter de Thurendine [\[12\]](#)
ch. unknown
- 1310-11 m. Richard Hopman
ch. unknown
- 1311-12 m. John de Merlowe
ch. unknown
- 1312-13 m. Lambert de St. Omer
ch. unknown
- 1313-14 m. John de Thornegge [\[12\]](#)
ch. unknown
- 1314-15 m. Lambert de St. Omer [\[12\]](#)
ch. unknown

- 1315-16 m. John de Thornegge
ch. unknown
- 1316-17 m. John de Thornegge
ch. unknown
- 1317-18 m. Peter de Elmham
ch. unknown
- 1318-19 m. Robert de Walsingham
ch. unknown
- 1319-20 m. Robert de Walsingham
ch. William de Benecroft, John Sefoul, John de Cokesford, William de Blakeney
- 1320-21 m. Peter de Elmham
ch. unknown
- 1321-22 m. John de Thornegge
ch. unknown
- 1322-23 m. William Fraunceys
ch. unknown
- 1323-24 m. John de Swerdestone
ch. unknown
- 1324-25 m. John de Swerdestone
ch. unknown
- 1325-26 m. John de Thornegge
ch. unknown
- 1326-27 m. John Burghard
ch. unknown
- 1327-28 m. John de Swerdestone
ch. Roger de Buttele, Thomas de Melcheburn, William de Hautboys, Richard de Jakesham
- 1328-29 m. John de Swerdestone
ch. unknown
- 1329-30 m. John de Walsingham
ch. unknown
- 1330-31 m. John de Thornegge
ch. unknown
- 1331-32 m. John de Swerdestone
ch. Robert Erl, Thomas Ryghtwys, Thomas Bamme, Richard de Wotton
- 1332-33 m. John Burghard
ch. unknown
- 1333-34 m. William de Sechford
ch. Robert Braunch, Hamon de Cokesford, Robert de Docking, John de Manegrene

- 1334-35 m. William de Sechford
ch. Laurence de Fordham, Reginald de Systemer, John de Couteshale, William de Hoo
- 1335-36 m. Adam de Walsoken
ch. Hugh de Betele, Walter de Ixworth, William de Grantham, Roger Folcard
- 1336-37 m. William de Sechford (John de Swerdestone)
ch. Simon de Bitering, Robert Robot, John de Wesenham, Simon de Snoring
- 1337-38 m. John Burghard
ch. Robert de Wotton, Simon de Roughton, William de Swanton, Stephen de Kent
- 1338-39 m. Thomas de Melcheburn
ch. John Ryghtwys, Thomas Belleyetere, William de Santone, Henry de Gunton
- 1339-40 m. John de Cokesford
ch. Thomas de Swerdestone, William de Bitering, William de Snoring, William Erl
- 1340-41 m. John de Cokesford
ch. John de Newlond, Adam de Refham, Simon Toly, Walter de Dunham
- 1341-42 m. William de Brynton
ch. Thomas le Cook, Thomas de Swerdestone, Henry de Betele?, John de Massingham? [14]
- 1342-43 m. Hugh de Betele
ch. Robert Braunch, ---
- 1343-44 m. Adam de Walsoken
ch. Philip Wyth, John de Couteshale, Thomas de Fransham, William de Swanton
- 1344-45 m. John de Massingham
ch. Richard de Docking, John Ryghtwys, Reyner de Wynch, John de Manegrene
- 1345-46 m. Thomas Drewe
ch. William de Ellingham, Laurence de Reppes, Alexander de Lonewade, John Lomb
- 1346-47 m. John de Cokesford
ch. William Erl, Thomas le Cook, Adam de Refham, John de Denby
- 1347-48 m. John de Swerdestone
ch. Henry de Betele, Thomas Ryghtwys, Thomas de Fransham, Dominic Baude
- 1348-49 m. John de Massingham (John de Couteshale)
ch. John Ryghtwys, John de Caundish (John de Manegrene), John Elys, William Erl

- 1349-50 m. John de Couteshale
ch. Edmund de Beeston, Thomas Baret, John de Swerdestone junior, John de Wormegay
- 1350-51 m. Robert Braunch
ch. Richard de Benecroft, Simon de Gunton, John de Sustede, Robert de Derham
- 1351-52 m. Thomas Ryghtwys
ch. John de Thirsford, Stephen Fot, John de Fyncham, Nicholas Toke
- 1352-53 m. William de Bitering
ch. Thomas de Botkesham, Nicholas de Somersham, John de Bekeswell, John de Rudham
- 1353-54 m. William de Bitering
ch. Ancelm Braunch, Thomas de Bukworth, Robert de Brysele, Roger Wyth
- 1354-55 m. John de Couteshale
ch. Simon de Gunton, William de Ellingham, Henry Elys, John de Bukenham
- 1355-56 m. William de Swanton
ch. Edmund de Beeston, John de Brunham, Nicholas de Swerdestone, Andrew Taverner
- 1356-57 m. John de Couteshale
ch. Geoffrey de Tolbooth, Thomas Curson, Hanekin Lister, William de Wesenham
- 1357-58 m. Thomas de Botkesham
ch. Laurence de Reppes, Thomas Ryghtwys junior, John de Faldyate, Matthew de Tilney
- 1358-59 m. John Urry
ch. Simon de Gunton, Thomas atte Bek, Richard de Botkesham, Geoffrey de Fransham
- 1359-60 m. William de Bitering
ch. Roger Wyth, Philip Wyth junior, John de Grantham, John Derewent
- 1360-61 m. Robert Braunch
ch. Henry Elys, Richard de Houton, Roger de Byntree, Ralph de Colkirke
- 1361-62 m. Simon de Gunton
ch. Robert Ryghtwys, John de Titleshale, Nicholas de Swerdestone, John de Brunham
- 1362-63 m. Thomas Drewe
ch. Thomas Ryghtwys junior, Reginald de Brynton, John de Rudham, William Galapyn
- 1363-64 m. Thomas de Botkesham
ch. John de Docking, Thomas Curson, John Blower, Matthew de Tilney

- 1364-65 m. Simon de Gunton
ch. John de Faldyate, Hugh de Ellingham, Nicholas de Somersham, Henry de Cove
- 1365-66 m. John de Couteshale
ch. Richard de Houton, Geoffrey de Fransham, John de Penteney, Walter de Dunton
- 1366-67 m. William de Bitering
ch. John de Docking, Thomas de Kenynghale, Richard Faukes, John de Bukenham
- 1367-68 m. John de Fyncham
ch. John de Brunham, John Blower, Thomas de Balsham, Ralph de Colkirke
- 1368-69 m. Thomas Drewe
ch. Thomas Curson, John de Faldyate, Edmund de Beeston, Robert atte Lathe
- 1369-70 m. Thomas de Botkesham
ch. Edmund Ferrers, Edmund de Fransham, John Lok, John de Rudham
- 1370-71 m. John de Brunham
ch. Thomas de Couteshale, Edmund Belleyetere, Roger Paxman, Henry de Cove
- 1371-72 m. Henry de Cove
ch. Henry de Betele, John Stalworthe, William Ingreth, Alan Hunte
- 1372-73 m. Geoffrey de Tolbooth
ch. Hugh de Ellingham, William de Holmeton, Adam le Clerk, John Kempe
- 1373-74 m. John de Docking
ch. Thomas Drewe junior, John Blower, Robert de Kent, John de Titleshale
- 1374-75 m. Edmund de Fransham
ch. John Waryn, Roger Paxman, Walter de Dunton, Ralph de Colkirke
- 1375-76 m. Robert atte Lathe
ch. Alan Hunte, Robert de Waterden, Thomas Bubbe, John Rede
- 1376-77 m. Richard de Houton
ch. John de Penteney, Thomas Curson, John de Brandon, William Erl
- 1377-78 m. John de Brunham
ch. Henry de Betele, John de Titleshale, John de Dunham, Philip Wyth
- 1378-79 m. John de Brunham
ch. John atte Lathe, Geoffrey de Gaysele, Robert Wake, Richard de Botkesham
- 1379-80 m. Geoffrey de Tolbooth
ch. John Keep, Robert Pulter, Thomas Faukes, Robert de Kent
- 1380-81 m. John Waryn
ch. Roger Paxman, William de Bilney, Thomas de Waterden, Richard Denby

- 1381-82 m. Roger Paxman
ch. Thomas de Couteshale, John Kempe, John Wace, Philip de Staunford
- 1382-83 m. Henry de Betele
ch. William Wyth, John de Lakinghithe, Hugh Sad, Adam Waryn
- 1383-84 m. Thomas Curson
ch. John Drewe, John de Botkesham, John White, Peter Mafey
- 1384-85 m. John Waryn
ch. John Lok, Edmund Belleyetere, John de Dunham, William de Silesden
- 1385-86 m. John de Brunham
ch. Thomas de Couteshale, William de Bilney, William Rising, William de Oxneye
- 1386-87 m. John Waryn
ch. Walter de Dunton, Robert Pulter, John atte Lathe, Andrew de Swanton
- 1387-88 m. Thomas de Couteshale
ch. Thomas Drewe, Robert de Botkesham, William Erl, William Spicer
- 1388-89 m. Roger Paxman
ch. William de Brycham, John de Wentworth, Alan de Wormegay, John Bolt
- 1389-90 m. Thomas de Couteshale
ch. Edmund Belleyetere, John de Bitering, Ralph de Bedingham, John de Dunham
- 1390-91 m. Edmund Belleyetere
ch. Robert de Botkesham, Thomas de Waterden, John de Botkesham, Thomas Faukes
- 1391-92 m. John de Brunham
ch. John Drewe, John Wace, Adam Waryn, Richard de Thorpe
- 1392-93 m. Thomas Drewe
ch. John de Bitering, John atte Style, Robert de Salisbury, Robert de Walpole
- 1393-94 m. Thomas de Couteshale
ch. Thomas atte Brigge, Richard Denby, John de Lakinghithe, John Wace
- 1394-95 m. Edmund Belleyetere
ch. Robert de Botkesham, Ralph de Bedingham, Richard de Thorpe, John Kempe junior
- 1395-96 m. Robert de Botkesham
ch. Thomas de Waterden, Thomas Trussebut, Robert de Brunham, Simon Kempe
- 1396-97 m. John Wace
ch. unknown
- 1397-98 m. Thomas de Waterden
ch. Thomas atte Style, John Home, John de Botkesham, ---

- 1398-99 m. Thomas Drewe
ch. John de Wentworth, Thomas atte Brigge, Thomas Faukes, Thomas Ploket
- 1399-1400 m. Edmund Belleyetere
ch. James atte Brigge, John Mafey, Robert Cokerell, William Rising
- 1400-01 m. John de Wentworth
ch. Ralph de Bedingham, Adam White, William Lok, Geoffrey Bradele
- 1401-02 m. John de Wentworth
ch. Robert de Brunham, Richard Denby, John Marche, John de Botkesham
- 1402-03 m. Thomas Brigge
ch. John Wesenham, Simon Feltwell, James Nicholasson, William Erl
- 1403-04 m. Robert Botkesham
ch. Thomas Ploket, James Brigge, ---
- 1404-05 m. Thomas Waterden
ch. Richard Thorp, Ralph Bedingham, Thomas Faukes, William Hunderpound
- 1405-06 m. John Wentworth
ch. unknown
- 1406-07 m. Robert Brunham
ch. unknown
- 1407-08 m. Thomas Brigge
ch. Robert Burgeys, William Hunderpound, William Blakeney, Thomas de Worsted
- 1408-09 m. Robert Brunham
ch. unknown
- 1409-10 m. John Brandon
ch. John Wesenham, Adam White, Richard Lechour, Philip Frank
- 1410-11 m. Robert Botkesham
ch. William Brycham, William Baret, John Home, ---
- 1411-12 m. Roger Galyon
ch. John Home, Richard Thewyt, Walter de Todenham, Richard Denby
- 1412-13 m. Roger Galyon
ch. William Walden, John Bukworth, John Mafey, Thomas Ploket
- 1413-14 m. Bartholomew Petypas
ch. William Spyr, John Alger, Nicholas Martyn, John Bryghtzeve
- 1414-15 m. John Lakinghithe (Robert Brunham)
ch. John Broun, William Herford, James Nicholasson, Adam White
- 1415-16 m. John Bilney/Robert Brunham (Thomas Hunte)
ch. Ralph Topcrofte, Thomas Worsted, Richard Lechour, John Brekerop
- 1416-17 m. John Wesenham
ch. Walter de Todenham, Hugh Cook, William Waterden, William Style

- 1417-18 m. William Hunderpound
ch. Philip Frank, John Filipp, William Blakeney, Robert Barleye
- 1418-19 m. Thomas Hunte
ch. Thomas de Burgh, William Spyr, John Copnote, John Warner
- 1419-20 m. John Wesenham
ch. Robert Sprot, John Frost, Adam Elsy, John Muriell
- 1420-21 m. John Spicer
ch. John Kelle, John Ashenden, Adam Marcaunt, William Kyrton
- 1421-22 m. John Spicer
ch. John Saluz, Thomas Wilkinson, William Norfolk, Thomas Langton
- 1422-23 m. John Spicer
ch. John Wyth, Thomas Gryme, William Richeman, ---
- 1423-24 m. John Permonter
ch. John Springwell, Alexander Brixwirth, John Staunton, Nicholas Frank
- 1424-25 m. John Permonter
ch. John Mafey, John Benycle, John Syff, Edward Mayn
- 1425-26 m. John Thorisby
ch. Thomas Spicer, Roger Ingram, William Bedingham, John Andrew
- 1426-27 m. Philip Frank
ch. William Palmer, John Maryot, John Boston, William Style junior
- 1427-28 m. John Permonter
ch. John Pygot, John Dun, John Hunderpound, Thomas Leighton
- 1428-29 m. John Permonter
ch. John Karle, Robert Hardy, William Kellowe, Robert Walsingham
- 1429-30 m. Richard Waterden (John Wesenham)
ch. John Nicholasson, Simon Scotland, John Gedneye, John Adams
- 1430-31 m. Thomas Worsted
ch. John Wesenham junior, Henry Thorisby, Richard Frank, Simon Greve
- 1431-32 m. John Permonter
ch. John Bocher, Richard Lent, Hugh Crosse, Ralph Brycham
- 1432-33 m. John Brekerop
ch. George Laurence, John Colchester, William Costyn, Nicholas Wyth
- 1433-34 m. Thomas Botkesham
ch. William Wyth, John Muriell, Thomas Lok, William Crosse
- 1434-35 m. Thomas Burgh
ch. Amery Trewe, Robert Sad, William Mollisworthe, Bartholomew Collys
- 1435-36 m. John Waryn
ch. Amery Trewe, Walter Curson, Thomas Calbot, John Hayward
- 1436-37 m. William Palmer (John Permonter)
ch. John Boys, John atte Gates, Henry Bermyngham, Richard Stalker (Amery Trewe)

- 1437-38 m. Thomas Salisbury
ch. Richard Gigges, John Botyld, John Boston, John Silesden
- 1438-39 m. Thomas Salisbury
ch. John Robynson, William Wareles, Adam Dersingham, John Trunche
- 1439-40 m. Henry Thorisby
ch. Simon Pygot, Edmund Springwell, Bartholomew Collys, Stephen Aleyn
- 1440-41 m. John Ashenden
ch. Thomas Bene, John Duddy, Thomas Tolyot, William Pilton
- 1441-42 m. Simon Scotland
ch. John Petyclerk, Thomas Abbot, Richard Cosyn, Robert Lexham
- 1442-43 m. Henry Thorisby
ch. William Hardy, John Sutton, William Lenn, Martin Wright
- 1443-44 m. Henry Thorisby
ch. Thomas Baker, John Taillour, Thomas Asheburn, John Smyth
- 1444-45 m. William Kyrton (John Waryn)
ch. John Pye, Richard Abell, John Bagot, Alan Hoberd
- 1445-46 m. Thomas Salisbury
ch. Walter Dalham, Thomas Muriell, William atte Wode, William Lumbard
- 1446-47 m. John Pygot
ch. William Alkas, William Goodman, Thomas Thornham, John Houton
- 1447-48 m. Simon Scotland
ch. Walter Cony, John Wikilwode, John Taverner, Richard Halman
- 1448-49 m. Thomas Calbot
ch. Thomas Ormylle, William Philpot, William Ashill, William Gilbert
- 1449-50 m. Richard Frank
ch. William Ashill, William Gilbert [15]
- 1450-51 m. William Lewes
ch. John Melcheburn, Simon Park, Geoffrey Patryk, John Bek
- 1451-52 m. William Lewes
ch. Simon Baxter, William Bole, Adam Oky, Gilbert Watson
- 1452-53 m. John Gedneye
ch. John Enmeth, Henry Bek, John Marys, William Ivot
- 1453-54 m. Walter Cony
ch. William Caus, William Bolt, Nicholas Ivy, Richard Dyke
- 1454-55 m. Simon Pygot
ch. Edmund Westhorp, Richard Selwode, Robert Chapman, Lambert Sherwyn
- 1455-56 m. Simon Scotland
ch. Robert Marys, Richard Goodwyn, John Braybroke, Simon Oldmedewe
- 1456-57 m. Henry Thorisby
ch. Thomas Barker, John Welle, William Raulyn, John Kilfray

- 1457-58 m. Thomas Calbot
ch. William Walys, John Pecoock, John Candeler, John Stone
- 1458-59 m. John Nicholasson
ch. John Basse, Roger Bedon, William Danyell, Richard Jangill
- 1459-60 m. John Nicholasson
ch. Thomas Leighton, Simon Shropham, Richard Smert, William Marche
- 1460-61 m. Walter Cony
ch. John Gaunce, John Soome, Thomas Wright, William Burmond

APPENDIX I: Lists of Office-holders

Introduction | Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration
Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics | Conclusion

Biographies

Lynn:

Baldeswell | Bedingham | Belleyetere | Bermyingham | Berry | Betele | Bitering | Blakeney | Blaunche | Bolt | Botkesham | Brandon | Braunch | Brigge | Brunham | Brycham | Brynton | Bukenham | Bukworth | Burghard | Cokerell | Cokesford | Cooke | Copnote | Couteshale | Creyk | Crosse | Crowmer | Denby | Draper | Drewe | Ellingham | Elys | Engelond | Erl | Falyate | Faukes | Feltwell | Fouler | Frank | Fransham | Frere | Fyncham | Galt | Gaysele | Goldsmith | Gunton | Halleyate | Herte | Houton | Hunderpound | Hunte | Keep | Kempe | Kenynghale | Lakinghithe | Lathe | Leche | Lok | Loveday | Mafey | Martyn | Melcheburn | Muriell | Neell | Nicholasson | Oxneye | Paxman | Paynot | Permonter | Pulter | Reppes | Ryghtwys | Salisbury | Silesden | Snailwell | Sparham | Spicer | Style | Sustede | Sutton | Swanton | Swerdestone | Systerne | Thewyt | Thirsford | Thorpe | Tidde | Tilney | Trussebut | Urry | Wace | Walden | Walpole | Walsingham | Walsoken | Waryn | Waterden | Wentworth | Wesenham | White | Wormegay | Yorke

Thomas de Baldeswell purchased entrance to the Lynn franchise in 1383. Over the decade that followed he played the usual minor role in public affairs (tax assessor, elector) but never rose beyond the middle rank of burgess society. The name of William de Baldeswell is not found in Lynn records; the reference to that name in the 1392-93 customs account may be a transcription error (although this is unlikely from the context), or he may have been a junior member of the Lynn family, or not a Lynn resident at all.

Ralph de Bedingham entered the franchise at Lynn in 1372, having completed his apprenticeship to Walter de Dunton, a probable merchant. Ralph certainly was being described as a merchant by the early fifteenth century. His international trading activities are documented between 1391 and 1412: he was exporting cloth, victuals and lumber and importing dried fish and a wide range of lumber. He served four terms as borough chamberlain and sat among the jurats for most of the period from 1390 to 1413. In 1412 he suffered a series of financial setbacks, losing one cargo of imports to a storm and two others to pirates, and in 1413 he was deposed as jurat by the reform party then in political ascendancy. However, he appears to have overcome these adversities and been restored to jurat ranks 1418-26, after which he is heard of no more – the last reference being a summons to the Exchequer to answer a house-breaking charge.

The individual identified in the 1392-93 customs account as Edward Belleyett' was properly Edmund Belleyetere, the most prominent member of a local family of bell-founders. Edmund, however, had expanded beyond family tradition to become a merchant and vintner, having been apprenticed to John de Brunham, father of the famous Margery Kempe, although Edmund was a generation older and had entered the franchise in his mid-twenties, in 1364, ten years before Margery was born. Edmund had a long (died ca.1414) and distinguished career in both local government – serving as jurat for most of the period between 1370 and 1413, three times as mayor during the 1390s, and alderman of the merchant guild for a good part of the subsequent decade – and in the customs service (1382-1404) most notably as Deputy Butler.

His mercantile activities are first documented in 1364, when he took £50 and woollen cloth to Gascony, with a view to buying wine for import. By the 1390s, he had refocused his attentions northward and was importing herring, dried fish, iron, beaver pelts, wax, tar, lumber, and ashes, although he remained involved in the wine trade. He continued to be active in commerce until the end of his life – pirates captured one of his cargoes, Norway-bound, in 1412. Some of his wealth he invested in buying estates in the vicinity of Lynn, and he had a manor-house on the opposite side of the Ouse from the borough.

Thomas de Bermyngham was probably a member of a Lynn family that became more prominent in the fifteenth century. He may perhaps have been the same as the fuller who served as a councillor several times in the 1420s and '30s (although this was more likely a member of a later generation).

William Berry of Holme-next-the-sea (15 miles north of Lynn) was a franchise entrant of 1385, but receives few mentions in Lynn borough records thereafter.

Henry de Betele was a member of one of the leading Lynn families of the fourteenth century. His father Hugh, a merchant who dealt in victuals (sometimes on behalf of the king), had been mayor in 1342/43 and co-owned a ship with his brother Henry, a slightly less prominent townsman; both succumbed to the first outbreak of plague. The Henry whose trading is evidenced in the 1392-93 customs account was born in 1339, entered the franchise at age 21 and followed his father's footsteps into commerce and politics. He first became a jurat in 1369 and, apart from a faux pas which led to his disgrace and disfranchisement for a year (1375/76), remained so for most of the period up to 1393. He was mayor in 1382/83 and alderman of the merchant gild 1390-93. His disappearance from the records in 1393 probably marks retirement or death. In 1374 he was exporting oats and beer to Zeeland, but only the 1392-93 account reflects his diversification into cloth, for surviving customs records from 1390-92 show no activity from him.

Although described as a vintner in August 1364, at the time he obtained a licence from the king to take to Gascony £50 in cash and the same in cloth in order to buy wine, William de Bitering is more often seen trading in victuals. However, this is because it is his exports that are most in evidence, not his imports.

We first hear of him in 1336/37 when he travelled to Stamford on community business (perhaps nothing more than message-bearing), and his earliest known mercantile activity is in 1337 – three years before he became a member of Lynn's merchant gild – when he partnered with Simon de Bitering to export 200 weys of white English salt to Germany; Lynn's early development owed much to its saltworks. Simon was a merchant of the previous generation but perhaps not a close relative, for his will (1349) left nothing to William, nor was the latter an executor, only coadjutor of the executors; the surname was present in Lynn from the beginning of that century, and the family's roots can apparently be traced to Cambridgeshire. The following year William and Simon exported the same amount of salt to Germany, this time in partnership with Hugh Betele, all three described as "king's merchants". In 1347 he is seen shipping two large cargoes of wheat and beans, again through partnerships; the same year finds him selling 6 tuns of wine to the King's Butler, who happened to be fellow-townsmen John Wesenham. In 1353 he was licenced to send wheat to Holland or Zealand, in 1355 wheat and ale, and in 1357 wheat to Gascony. In 1364 a more diversified cargo of wheat, barley, beans, peas and ale was sent to Holland. William was wealthy enough to own a ship by 1346, when he was reimbursed by the community for the expenses of making it available for royal service; his local tax assessment in 1357/58 was triple the average paid by townsmen. In 1356 he had been one of the merchants of the realm summoned by the king to attend a special assembly.

His first known role in local government was as chamberlain in 1339/40, and he was one of the jurats for most of the period from 1346-69. His first term as mayor began in 1352, he was re-elected the following year, and then for an unprecedented third consecutive term – on that occasion he begged off, but again served in 1359/60 and 1366/67. His prominence in the community is also evidenced by his role as alderman of the merchant gild 1361-69. He also held posts in the royal customs administration, as a collector of the customs on wool in the mid-1340s (Simon de Bitering having held the post immediately before him) and early 1350s, and as Deputy Butler 1350-

59, as well as holding the odd royal commission.

At his death in 1369, he left a widow, Juliana, a probably underage son John (who followed in William's footsteps as a merchant and jurat, but never quite achieved his father's prominence), and two daughters of whom one had become a nun at Carrow Abbey, near Norwich. A late eighteenth century antiquarian reported seeing his tomb and its brass, depicting him and Juliana, in St. Nicholas' church.

William Blakeney entered the franchise at Lynn in 1388, when referred to as a mariner. He was evidently of age (probably barely) in 1376 when he disposed of a piece of property from his inheritance. It was perhaps as a factor of a Lynn merchant (just possibly Henry de Betele or John Waryn, who were his guarantors for paying his entrance fine), that he was in Prussia when he received a beating. But more likely he was there as a ship's master, for in 1387 the king permitted his ship to be freed from arrest (for use in the navy), in order that it could carry a shipment of wool to Middelburg. He was in 1391 using the same ship to import herring – 7 last for re-sale and 4 last for his household use – and export cloth. In 1396, in a different ship which he owned, he exported a small amount of cloth. In 1398 he was in trouble for having captured a Scottish ship at a time of truce with Scotland. He was elected chamberlain in 1407/08 but then opted to side with the reform party in the years that followed; however, his mercantile associations made him acceptable to the ruling elite when they regained control of government and he served as a constable 1416-19 and again chamberlain in 1417/18, dying shortly after.

John Blaunche entered the franchise at Lynn in 1370, as a cooper. It would be tempting to assume that the name of John White, which also appears in the 1392-93 customs account, was an alternate version of his name. However, in a customs record of 1391 both Blaunche and White had cargoes in the same ship on one occasion, and both were mentioned in the same witness list of 1375, making it clear they were separate individuals. Neither man had much role in local government. In 1391, Blaunche was importing herring, sturgeon, lumber, iron, wax, beer, tar, and ashes, while White was involved in only one shipment, importing lumber, tar, iron, and ashes. However, White was more active in exporting cloth that year than in 1392, while Blaunche does not appear to have been active at all. Both were inactive by the end of the decade. White may have been the shipwright of that name who, in 1377/78 was constructing vessels for the town.

John Bolt purchased entrance to the franchise at Lynn in 1382 and became a member of the merchant gild three years later, having already been given modest community responsibility, as tax assessor and as a member of a committee to search out lepers and have them removed from the town. In the early 1390s we find him exporting cloth and being fined on more than one occasion for breaking the assizes of ale and wine; he was evidently doing business in the Baltic, for the ship he owned had been built in Gdansk and he appears to have married a woman from the same location (his son Robert later being described as the heir of a Gdansk man, Edmund Faukes).

It was at the same period that he entered the ranks of the jurats, having already served his 'apprenticeship' as chamberlain in 1388/89. He was a jurat throughout the period of political strife, during the reign of Henry V, and up until 1424, around which time he died. He was thus associated with the potentiores opposed by the Petypas faction, and as such was one of that group attacked in August 1415 while holding meeting in a tavern. His wife Margaret predeceased him, for in 1416/17 he purchased for her soul the spiritual benefits of membership in the merchant gild. His son was active in the customs service in the 1430s, but was not otherwise prominent.

Robert de Botkesham acquired freeman's status at Lynn in 1372, by right of his father Thomas de Botkesham, one of Lynn's leading merchants. Since John de Botkesham acquired the same status immediately afterwards, without fine, it is probable that he was a younger brother of Robert. Both men followed their father into jurat ranks, Robert remaining there for most of the period 1378 to 1403 (and probably to 1410) and John from 1391 to at least 1403; Robert alone followed his father into the mayoralty – also for three terms. Both likewise had brief stints of office in the customs administration, while Robert was appointed mayor of the Lynn staple in 1406. There is, however, no indication they partnered in commercial ventures, although both were all-purpose merchants dealing in similar goods: exporting cloth, grain, and victuals, and importing herring, dried fish, beaver pelts, iron, ashes, lumber, tar, flax, canvas, yarn, and probably wine.

Robert was evidently the more prosperous of the pair, and as such had that much more of a vested interest in the status quo, which helps explain why he was the most prominent among the leaders of the potentiores (anti-reform) party during the political strife which began in earnest during Robert's mayoralty of 1410/11; although there may have been some personal grudge involved too, for the reformers' leader was a former apprentice of John de Botkesham. Robert died during the course of the conflict (although there is no intimation of foul play), while John had already faded from the scene (and probably died) years earlier.

Thomas de Botkesham was to become one of the leading townsmen and merchants of the generation following that of William de Bitering. He entered the franchise in 1346 through apprenticeship; his master Humphrey de Wyken had died before Thomas could complete the final 6 months of his term, but the borough authorities waived that technicality. He had evidently already made something of a mark, and in 1350/51, as an elector, entered jurat ranks for the first time. In 1352/53 he served as chamberlain. Thereafter he was a jurat for almost the entire period up to 1390. During that period he served three mayoral terms (1357/58, 1363/64, and 1369/70).

In 1354 he was exporting malt, flour, salt and cloth to Norway and Germany, to trade for fish, and the following year was exporting wheat, ale and cloth. The mid-1360s have left evidence of more of his mercantile activities, again exporting victuals to Flanders, Zeeland, Holland, Gascony and Norway. In 1372 he was shipping hides from northern England to Lynn, and was in the same year (as well as later in the decade) supplying the borough with iron, tar, timber and other materials for building barges. He was alderman of the merchant guild from 1370 to 1389, and became mayor of the staple at Lynn in 1373. He died ca.1389/90. The Thomas Botkesham who was mayor of Lynn in 1433/34 may have been a grandson, although I have not found evidence of any direct link.

John de Brandon, one of the exporters most frequently mentioned in the customs account of 1392-93, appears already to have been engaged in commerce, improperly, in 1372 when he was obliged to become a freeman in consequence. In 1383 he was exporting grain to Norway, and his mercantile involvements with that country, Prussia and the Low Countries are well-documented between 1388 and 1406: he was heavily involved in exporting cloth, hides and grain, while importing soap, garlic, herring, eels, sturgeon, and probably wine and tiles. By 1400 he had his own ship which was used not only for legitimate commerce, but also for fighting the Scots, and for piracy. He served in several posts in the customs service between 1389 and 1408 and was mayor of the Lynn staple 1390-91. In urban administration, he was a jurat for most of the period between 1380-1413, and mayor of Lynn in 1409/10.

Ancelm Braunch was probably some relation of Robert Braunch, but the proximity is unknown. He purchased entrance to the franchise in 1350, at the beginning of Robert's first mayoralty. Despite having married the widow of former mayor John de Massingham, his career was less distinguished than that of Robert. He served as chamberlain in 1353/54, and was elected a jurat the following year, continuing in that role up to 1362. Perhaps his life exemption from offices and assizes obtained in 1352 reflects a low interest in politics. From 1346 he was also one of the king's searchers of ships. In 1354 he was involved with the Cokesfords and John de Sustede in a partnership to export ale and wheat to the Low Countries, and in 1359 received licence in his own right to export the same kind of goods to John Braunch became a member of the merchant gild in 1293. He was already well-to-do, for the previous year his goods had been valued (for purposes of a local tax assessment) at £12. Further valuations have survived for 1298, 1299, 1302, 1303, and 1305 when varying between £8 (below the average) and £20 in the 1300s. In a national tax levied in 1332 his goods were valued at £6.16s.8d, but the basis for the valuation was different from that for local taxes, and John's assessment on this occasion was well above the average of £2.19s.1d. Mercantile activities may do much to explain the fluctuations in local tax assessments. In 1308 and 1313 he is seen exporting wool. In 1309 he was fined for blocking the marketplace with his merchandize; during the same session, his wife was fined for breaking the ale assize. John was again fined for a similar offence in 1328, when his timber occupied excessive space in the Tuesday Market. He appears to have lived in Damgate, probably near the market end. That timber had long been an item in which he dealt is suggested by the fact that in 1303 he and Richard de Swanton had sold planks to the king's commissioners, for purposes of constructing pontoons.

John did his duty to the community, but no more: his roles in local government began with that of tax assessor (1301 and again in 1305); he served as chamberlain in 1304/05, as jurat the following year, being seen again in the latter role in 1322/23, and as an auditor of the town financial accounts in 1320. He likewise served the merchant gild, as a scabin, in 1306/07 and 1316/17.

The Thomas Attelburgh mentioned in the 1392-93 customs account may perhaps have been a Lynn man, for there is a fleeting reference, among a list of leading townsmen, in February 1392 to one with the name of Thomas Attlebrigge. This would have been the merchant more usually referred to as Thomas atte Brigge, a jurat for most of the period from 1393 to his death in 1422 (except for interruption during the governmental tenure of the reform party), and mayor in 1402/03 and 1407/08. After purchasing the franchise in October 1390, his mercantile activities are almost immediately evidenced: in 1391 he was exporting cloth and importing herring; probably he was trading before entering the franchise, as he was unable to claim free entrance by patrimony, even though his father Peter had become a freeman in 1349. He is again seen exporting cloth in 1394, but wool and woolfells between 1399 and 1403, and importing string in 1402 and (in partnerships, including with his brother James) herring, eels, sturgeon, iron and wine in 1406. Like John Wentworth, he ran afoul of the Bishop's officers in Lynn during one of his mayoralties, and became one of the chief opponents of the reform party.

The Brunham family was one of the most powerful in Lynn at this period, and two generations are represented in the 1392-93 customs account. John de Brunham's father Ralph had been of above-average means and had served as jurat in the 1340s. John entered the franchise in 1353 and, after a term as chamberlain in 1355/56, the jurat ranks only four years later, remaining therein until at least 1403 and probably to 1412, except for when he served again as chamberlain and during 5 mayoralties – the first in 1370/71 and the last in 1391/92. By 1398 he had become alderman of the merchant gild, in which post he remained until about 1406.

His longevity was exceptional and the depth of experience he had helps explain why he was kept among the jurats until shortly before his death in 1413. As early as 1383 he was obtaining an exemption from jury-duty or any unwanted offices on the excuse of being "too old to labour"; far more credible was his excuse for non-attendance at a council meeting of December 1412 that he was bed-ridden. One of the targets of the complaints of the reform party in 1411/12, he was probably semi-retired at that point and played little active part in the opposition to the reformers.

His wide-ranging commercial activities are evidenced between 1352, when he was fined for regrating bread and 1397, when he was making money from the operation of a ferry-boat (leased from the merchant gild). His property included a quay and several shops. By 1357/58 his local tax assessment was already twice the average. In 1377/78 he sold herring to the community; in 1385/86 he bought a millstone from the merchant gild; in 1392/93 he sold iron to the Corpus Christi gild. Although in 1392 he exported only a shipment of corn, in 1391 he was exporting cloth and lumber, and cloth again in 1395. Despite all this, John de Brunham is best known today as the father of Margery Kempe.

John's son Robert de Brunham might have equalled the prominence of his father, had he lived as long. Unaccountably, there is no record of Robert's franchise entrance at Lynn, but he was one of several men fined in February 1388 for selling by retail – possibly a pressure tactic to persuade them to become freemen; Robert, who was on that occasion described as a vintner, was by far the most heavily fined. Vintner was evidently what he remained, for in 1400 he was fined for selling red and white wine contrary to terms of the assize, and he was heavily fined in 1403 for regrating 16 tuns of wine, and again in 1404 with regard to a further 6 tuns. In 1405-06 he imported several shipments of red wine. In 1408 the community was 100s. in debt to him for wine he supplied for official functions, and in 1412 we finally have a reference to his tavern. However, like all good merchants, he diversified: in 1391 he was exporting cloth, furniture, and lumber, and in 1405 and 1406 was partnering with others in the export of grain. That he was a ship-owner is suggested by his complaint of theft of an anchor in 1405.

His career in public administration was similar to his father's, but took place mostly in the 1400s and included constable of the Lynn staple (a role his father had also held), jurat from at least 1411 to at least 1420, two elections as mayor, and the aldermanship of the merchant gild from 1414-1419. He was one of the members of the ruling class most active in the opposition to the reform party and, as a result, was roughly treated when he (constitutionally, as alderman) tried to assume the mayoralty in 1415 after the death in office of John Lakinghithe; the reform party had forced him to surrender the mayoral seal and key to the borough treasury and, despite royal writs in support of him, refused to return them or let him exercise mayoral authority. Die-hard reformers remained bitter towards him for years. He died at some point between 1420 and 1422, still a jurat.

William de Brycham was about 40 years old when found engaged in commerce, in the 1392-93 customs account. He had already served one term as chamberlain of Lynn, and was at this time (1391-92) constable of the staple at Lynn. The most prominent part of his career was ahead of him, however, when he rose into the ranks of the jurats, but supported the losing cause of the reform party. His early career was perhaps as a fishmonger or even a fisherman, and he remained active in the fish trade – being in trouble in 1413 for forestalling fish. But, having joined the merchant gild by 1385, from 1390 to 1413 he is seen active in more wide-ranging commerce, exporting cloth and grain and importing soap, lumber, herring, woad, madder, millstones (some of which he sold to the merchant gild), pitch and tar, and by 1413 owned his own ship.

At his earliest appearance, in 1319, William de Brynton (or Bruntone) was already prospering, if we may judge from the fact that his local tax assessment was well above the average; in the 1332 national subsidy his assessment was the third highest of all Lynn residents, over four times the average. He purchased membership in the merchant gild in 1324 and is seen exporting wool to Middelburg in 1336 and in 1348 suing Rodeland Tiler for 5s. remaining from a debt due for herring sold him. In 1356 he was summoned by name to attend a national assembly of merchants; he had already, between 1331 and 1352, been returned by his community to four parliaments and a special council summoned by the king (1351/52).

William's name is found among the constables on several occasions between 1326 and 1355, he being replaced in June of that year. He served as mayor in 1341/42, and is found as a jurat for much of the period between 1342 and 1362. He held for some years the post of borough coroner, being in that office by ca.1335 and retiring from it in June 1355, on the grounds of old age and ill health. In 1357 he obtained a royal grant of life exemption from office and jury-duty, and in 1357/58 his local tax assessment was only half the average.

Possibly these facts reflect a genuine retirement, except for him remaining in an advisory status through the town council. The entrance into the franchise of Thomas de Brynton in 1362 might mark William's death, but we cannot be sure whether Thomas was William's heir, as he entered by right of apprenticeship.

John de Bukenham obtained the franchise at Lynn in 1344 by graduating from his apprenticeship and is afterwards variously described as taverner, vintner and merchant. An earlier John de Bukenham, a barker, had entered the franchise in 1300 and was in 1349 described as "senior", but this does not necessarily mean he was related to the John of the next generation. Aside from being an elector in 1351, his election as chamberlain in 1354 was the first known role of responsibility he held in the borough; he served another term as chamberlain in 1366/67.

By the time of his first election, he was clearly prospering, for in 1354 he acquired three shops and a garden in Pillory Lane, next to property he already owned; at unknown date he also held property a little further south on Jews Lane. In 1368 he acquired a shop with a cellar at the corner of Mercer Row and Purfleet Lane. In December of that year he was exporting (through a partnership) 100 tuns of ale and 200 qt. of malt. In 1364 he received exactly the same permission as Gunton and Bitering, to take cash and cloth to Gascony to buy wine. On several occasions between 1349 and 1375 he was fined for breaking the assize of wine, and his wife Agnes for infringing the ale assize. He was a jurat in 1363/64 and from 1371-74, and one of the constables (an office reflecting his importance in the community) from 1370 on; the appointment of someone else to his constabulary in 1382 probably marks his death.

A series of men named John de Bukworth were in evidence in Lynn throughout the fourteenth century. One was a jurat in the 1320s, another was one of the keepers of the town gates in the 1340s. The best-known carrier of the name was from the middle rank of urban society and mainly active in the second decade of the fifteenth century. Affiliated with the reform party, he served in one of its administrations as chamberlain (and in the same year played a similar financial administration role in the merchant gild). He was – during the years of compromise following the defeat of the reformers – brought into the lower ranks of the jurats and had a post in the customs service, and in 1419 was nominated by the die-hards of the reform party as mayor, but was not elected. No record of his entrance to the franchise has survived, which might place it in the early 1400s, from which we are missing records. It is likely he who, with partners, exported a large cloth shipment in 1405. Whether he was the corn exporter of 1392 is more difficult to say; his partner on that occasion, Adam Borde, does not appear in Lynn records.

When John Burghard purchased the franchise at Lynn in 1305 he was described as "of Stoke"; the place-name is common and widespread, but may refer to Stoke-on-Trent, since his lengthy will included bequests of 100s. to be distributed among his poor relations and widows in Stoke and 40s. among the same in Burton. However, it is equally likely that his roots lie closer to home, in a cluster of villages some fifteen miles south of Lynn. He was probably already prospering as a wool merchant – in 1322 he was to be one of four Lynn men summoned by the king to attend a council of the country's greatest wool merchants – and found citizenship at Lynn convenient because it was an important export centre. Whether he moved permanently there at first is less certain. He did not bother to join its merchant gild until 1312/13, and it was in the years that followed that he is seen acquiring properties there, including a number of rents – which would provide him with a certain guaranteed income, as a buttress against the larger but less certain revenues from international commerce.

Most of the records we have of his activities relate to his real estate transactions, and his will shows that he had acquired, by his death in August 1339, numerous properties throughout the town, including a large number of selds (some at least larger than stalls, for they had courtyards associated), and two quays on the Purfleet. Despite this, it is not certain where his personal residence was, but probably in the lane running east off Briggate on the north side of the Purfleet, for this was known for a while as Burghard's Lane. In the 1332 lay subsidy, he had the third highest assessment of any Lynn townsman and, although his commercial activities are little documented, evidently remained an important player in the wool trade up to his death, for in that same year the king acknowledged a debt of over £34 to John, for wool purveyed from him, and he is seen to have sheep-farms at several villages within a few miles of Lynn.

Not surprisingly, he numbered among the ranks of the jurats by 1322 (lists of the council being scarce at that period), and served as mayor in 1326/27, 1332/33, and less certainly 1337/38. He was survived by his widow, Alice, three sons – none of whom appears to have amounted to much (one possibly became a cleric and studied at Cambridge), and two daughters. One of the latter, Margaret Kenynghale, gave an important boost to the borough coffers by bequeathing the community and merchant gild the properties her father had left her, in return for them holding an annual obit for his soul; this was still being celebrated in 1424/25, when it was ordered that mayor, jurats, councillors and chamberlains attend the obit or pay a 12d. fine.

Robert Cokerell is another of the middle-ranking traders of Lynn. Although he imported a large quantity of dried fish and a small quantity of oil in 1391 (exporting cloth in the same year), he did not even bother to become a member of the town's merchant gild until 1396. After that date we have glimpses of his commercial activity: in 1400 he was renting two cellars by the quayside and was fined for breaking the assize of wine, and in 1402 he was importing garlic. Apart from one term as chamberlain, he played no part in borough administration.

Hamon de Cokesford entered the merchant gild in 1320 and served as one of its scabins 1339-41. He was a jurat in 1349/50 and the following year, because the electors (of whom he was one) were joined with others to form the full council. John de Cokesford and Robert de Cokesford were more prominent members of the family (if indeed all were related), and Hamon does not seem to have been as well-to-do, nor is there evidence of any significant mercantile activities.

Although the entrance of John de Cokesford into the gild merchant in 1317, by purchase, might appear to mark the beginning of his career, he had been briefly seen four years earlier, among those accused by Robert de Monthalt of a mob assault upon him, and that his local tax assessment in 1319 was over three times the average suggests his business affairs were prospering. That business was probably the usual trade in victuals that was the backbone of many mercantile operations; in 1328 he was fined for forestalling herring, in 1330 was capitalizing on the butchery of a beached whale, and in 1335, 1354 and 1355 is seen exporting grain and ale to the Low Countries. The 1354 venture was a partnership with Robert de Cokesford, Ancelm Braunch and John de Sustede. There are hints he made have had a side-business as an attorney. Chamberlain in 1319/20, he was frequently constable during the first half of Edward III's reign. He held three terms as mayor between 1339 and 1346 and also served the merchant gild as a scabin 1337-39. He was first jurat in 1325/26, again in 1342/43, and for most of the period from 1347.

Robert de Cokesford entered the merchant gild by patrimony in 1329; this may indicate him as a son of John de Cokesford, with whom he was a partner in an export venture in 1354. Possibly like John, he seems to have mixed commerce and legal business as the way to earn a livelihood; at least he appears to have acted as the borough attorney on several occasions, and fees paid him in 1348/49 and 1356/57 have the look of retainers. It was perhaps in this role that he was returned to the parliament of 1346, during which he attended the funeral of fellow-burgess Thomas de Folsham in London – this later proving to be a fraud, Thomas having faked his death to try to escape his debtors, but there is no indication Robert was aware of the deceit. He was jurat for most of the period from 1350 to 1368, and served the king as Deputy Butler at Lynn from 1347 to 1350, with a brief overlapping stint as collector of tunnage and poundage (1350-51). In 1355 and 1363 we see him exporting ale. He died in 1369, leaving sons Thomas, who had entered the franchise in 1361, and Robert; neither figures prominently in town affairs, and Robert is last heard of going off to serve in the king's army in 1372.

A Thomas Cooke was active in Lynn in the 1320s, and may have been the clerk of the name who was an executor of John le Frenge in 1339. But it is doubtful this was the same man as the elector of 1354. That Thomas le Cooke purchased membership in the merchant guild in 1340 and served as borough chamberlain in 1341/42 and again in 1346/47. He is found as one of the king's bailiffs in Lynn in 1349/50; it may be more than coincidence that the office of borough bailiff was held by Stephen Cooke de Tylneye from 1351-61. Thomas was a jurat in 1347/48 (through electorship) and in 1349/50-1350/51, but not thereafter despite being chosen an elector on 6 other occasions during the 1350s. He appears to have been a man of modest means and perhaps indeed a cook, as his surname suggests (he was suing a cook for debt in 1350).

The John Copnote who received a beating in Prussia in 1385 was probably a member of a mercantile family visible in Lynn in the late fourteenth and early fifteenth family. A Robert Copnote was a ship-owner in 1391, while a later John Copnote, who entered the lower council at Lynn in 1418 and the upper council in 1423, had already served the community (1414/15, the same year in which he entered Lynn's franchise) in the role of its representative in negotiations with the king of Denmark regarding disputes between Lynn merchants and Hanse merchants.

John de Couteshale was possibly a descendant of Andrew de Couteshale, who was a scabin of the merchant gild ca.1262 and probably the mayor of ca.1270 simply referred to as "Andrew". Although John did not enter the merchant gild until 1340, his career was already well underway:

- he had been fined for infringing the assize of ale in 1328 (in 1359 he received the extraordinarily heavy fine of 50s. for the same offence, suggesting him to have been an incorrigible offender);
- his assessment in the national subsidy of 1332 was a little below the average; he had served his first of two terms as chamberlain in 1334/35;
- he was one of the collectors of a royal tax in 1336;
- and in the same year he and his wife Cecily are seen acquiring property.

By 1340 he was in fact wealthy enough to own a ship, the participation of which in a piratical attack on a Flemish vessel had obliged Edward III to pay heavy compensation; John, to allay the king's wrath, had to take his ship into royal service for a time in 1342. In 1354 he was exporting, in partnership with others not of Lynn, ale and wheat to the Low Countries, and his status as a leading merchant is indicated by him being summoned to attend a national assembly of merchants in 1356.

He was first jurat (as far as we know) in 1342/43 and held that position for most of the period between 1350 and 1371; during the same period he was mayor five times, the first beginning July 1349 to replace John de Massingham, felled by plague. He was one of Lynn's constables during the late 1340s and '50s, a territorial authority which is also evidenced by the lengthy will of his widow who died in 1389; this shows that John had built up a substantial block of property in the Gresmarket/Jews Lane/Pillory Lane sector of town, of which ward he was constable. One of John's sons, Thomas de Couteshale, was prominent in the next generation, as jurat for most of 1369-96 and three times mayor, but otherwise the family slipped into obscurity.

John de Creyk purchased entrance to the Lynn franchise in 1383, on the same day as Thomas Baldeswell. Like Baldeswell, his status in the middle rank of urban society is defined by his minor public roles during the late '80s and early '90s as tax assessor, capital pledge, and elector.

John Crosse was probably an early member of the family that became established in the lower ranks of the merchant class at Lynn in the first half of the fifteenth century. Unlike later members of the family, John features little in borough records, and may perhaps not even have settled in Lynn by 1392; a skinner of that name entered the franchise in 1401, but this is not necessarily the cloth exporter.

Thomas de Crowmer entered the franchise at Lynn, as a cordwainer (leather-worker) in 1385, but was not an especially prominent member of the community.

Richard de Denby entered the franchise at Lynn in 1377. Besides exporting cloth, he imported nails, lumber, iron, glass, and sackcloth; he also dealt in wine (but was not necessarily importing it himself). He was a jurat for much of the period between 1388 and 1419.

John Draper was probably the franchise entrant of 1381, a graduated apprentice of merchant Geoffrey de Fransham. Apart from acting as member of tax assessment committees on a couple of occasions during the '80s, he features little in Lynn records.

Merchant and shipowner Geoffrey Drewe senior had been one of the leading townsmen during the reign of Edward II and was probably frequently a jurat (although our sparse records from that period only document a couple of terms, in the 1320s). He may have been the mayor of that name in 1305/06; or perhaps this was an earlier generation of the family, since that Geoffrey had entered the merchant gild by patrimony in 1286, while the Geoffrey known as senior was still active in travelling on community business into the late 1330s.

Whether Geoffrey senior was the father of Geoffrey Drewe junior is not known, but some relationship is probable in what was a large family prominent in the town throughout the fourteenth century. Geoffrey junior had purchased membership in the merchant gild in 1317, but his fraternal oath was not administered at that time because he was underage. He served as gild scabin from 1333 to 1335, and as its alderman from 1349 to at least 1358 and probably until his death in 1361, when he was succeeded by William de Bitering.

He had been a one-time business partner of Bitering in 1355 and on his deathbed named William as one of his executors; William refused administration of the will, but nonetheless took on Geoffrey's son Thomas Drewe as an apprentice not long afterwards. Despite (or just perhaps because of) his aldermannic role and his frequent election as a jurat during the 1340s and '50s, he never held the mayoralty. His mercantile activities were likely extensive, but almost our only window onto them is during the period 1354-55, when on three occasions he was exporting large quantities of ale, wheat, and peas.

His participation in the royal customs service – as searcher for coin 1335-42, as collector of the wool custom 1342-46 and in the early 1350s, and briefly in 1350 as collector of tannage and poundage – would also be a typical indicator of involvement in long-distance commerce. The borough sent him as its representative to five parliaments between 1341 and 1358, and he is frequently seen travelling on community business, usually to London. At his death, he left a widow, Golditha, sons William and Thomas, and a daughter Katharine.

One of the customs collectors of 1392-93, John Drewe, was also one of the exporters listed, involved in 6 shipments during the year, while other customs documents also show him very active in international commerce between 1391 and 1393. A member of a prominent and prolific family of the town (his father, Thomas Drewe senior, had been mayor), he was frequently a jurat during the 1380s and early '90s, and was probably at the peak of his career – at about age 45 – at the time of the customs account of 1392-93. I suspect he was the franchise entrant of April 1368 who had served out an apprenticeship to merchant Thomas de Botkesham. He served as a customs collector at Boston and Lynn from 1388-93, and died ca.1398.

The Thomas Drewe who was one of the town councillors elected in 1354 was probably a cousin, or even brother, of Geoffrey Drewe junior (despite not being mentioned in Geoffrey's will). Thomas himself became known as "senior" from 1371, after Geoffrey's son Thomas had entered the franchise. Thomas' own son Geoffrey (to add to the confusion) obtained the franchise by patrimony in 1358, and another son John in 1372. Thomas first figures in the records in 1328, when fined for forestalling fish, and his first role in officialdom was as scabin of the merchant gild (1337-39). He appears to have been a jurat for the entire period from 1342 to 1376, with the exception of the years when he served as king's bailiff (1348/49) or mayor (1345/46, 1362/63, 1368/69) and possibly 1343-45 and 1351/52 (for which years we have no record of who was jurat). His commercial activities are almost undocumented, except for one export venture involving grain and ale in 1355 in which he was partner to Geoffrey Drewe junior, but it is reasonably safe to assume that he was a merchant.

The Thomas Drewe who made a single shipment in 1392 was at closest a cousin to John Drewe, his father being Geoffrey Drewe junior. Thomas Drewe junior was a jurat for most of the period from 1375 to at least 1403, and mayor twice in the 1390s; he also held several posts in the customs service between 1378 and 1392, both at Lynn and Yarmouth. He obtained the franchise in 1370 as a former apprentice of vintner William de Bitering (probably graduated, although Bitering had died in 1369). He is seen exporting cloth in 1391 and 1395 as well – although not huge amounts in either case. He probably died ca.1408.

Entering the merchant gild in 1341, a few years later William de Ellingham was described as a mercer and the following year (1349) is seen exporting wool; at an unknown date he was renting from the borough a stall in Mercer Row. In 1348 he is found in possession of a row of four shops between St. James' cemetery and other property he owned, and in 1359 he held a house in Skinner's Row, which led towards St. James'. Like many, if not most, of Lynn's leading merchants, he also had riverside property which included a quay. He served as chamberlain in 1345/46 and again in 1354/55. He was also jurat for three terms during the 1350s. It is not clear whether he had any children; there is some indication that he made his apprentice, Hugh de Dudlyngton, his heir, but Hugh may have been a relative.

Henry Elys purchased the franchise at Lynn in 1350. His commercial activities are little evidenced, although he sold the borough 40s. worth of fish in 1358/59 to provision a community ship. He was elected to the chamberlain's office in 1354 and again in 1360, and served a few terms as jurat (1357/58, 1362-66). He does not appear to have risen into the upper ranks of Lynn townsmen. Perhaps this was due to an early death: he is not seen after 1366 and we hear of his widow, Matilda, in 1379, while his son William entered the franchise by right of patrimony not until 1378 – either Henry had spent some years in retirement, or William had been a child when Henry died.

The Edmund Engelond who entered the Lynn franchise in 1371 is most likely the same person as the Edward Yngelond listed in the 1392-93 customs account. He played only minor roles in the public affairs of the community, and was briefly (1389/90) in the lower ranks of the jurats. His involvement in international commerce seems similarly slight.

William Erl was described as a vintner when he obtained royal licence, in 1364, to take cash and cloth to Gascony to buy £100 worth of wine. In 1377/78 he sold quantities of herring and wine to the community, and more wine in 1401/02. He was fined in 1375 for breaking the assizes of ale and wine, and again in 1400, 1403 and 1404 for regrating on each occasion up to 10 tuns of wine. The cellar he was leasing at the quayside in 1391 from the merchant gild may have been for storing wine. In 1387, however, he was exporting cloth, lumber and beds through the port of Ipswich. In local administration, he served three terms as chamberlain, was jurat for most of the period between 1378 and 1403, as well as acting as coroner (there being some evidence that he was literate) and constable of the Lynn staple in the 1390s.

John de Falyate entered the franchise at Lynn in 1345. He is not much in evidence in the early years of his adult life, although was fined for breaking the ale assize in 1349 and 1352, and his local tax assessment in 1357/58 was only a little above the average. Perhaps he represents an example of a retailer who expanded gradually into wholesaling. In 1366 he was exporting large quantities of grain, barley, malt, and ale, and in 1382 a large number of woolfells. He was certainly a member of the merchant gild by 1385, when he was also renting from the gild a room on the common quay. With success in business came acceptance into the ranks of the urban ruling class: his first term as chamberlain (1357/58) was followed in 1361 by election into jurat ranks and he spent much of the period until 1388 therein, punctuated notably by two further terms as chamberlain.

Thomas Faukes entered the franchise at Lynn in 1375. During the 1390s he was exporting cloth and importing herring. He had his own quay and probably ran a tavern too. It may have been financial acumen that resulted in him being chosen as scabin (financial officer) of the merchant gild in the 1380s, repeatedly as tax assessor in the same decade, and the unusually high number of four times chamberlain of the borough. He rose to the lower ranks of the jurats and remained there for most of the 1390s.

Simon de Feltwell was one of the middle rank of burgesses. He was resident in Lynn by the time of the 1379 poll tax, but did not take up the franchise until 1385. His term as chamberlain (1402/03) was the highest role he assumed in local government, as well as his last appearance in the records. His shipment mentioned in the customs account of 1392-93 is the only evidence of any mercantile activity. Two years later he was fined for regrating ale.

The Thomas Fouler who was captain of one of the ships mentioned in the 1392-93 customs account was likely a Lynn resident, as he was still captaining a ship based at Lynn in 1406. In his chosen occupation, however, it is not surprising that he does not feature in Lynn records. The single cargo on which he paid customs was too minor to represent serious mercantile activity.

Although the Frank family was prominent in Lynn in the first half of the fifteenth century, the scarcity of the surname earlier (other than bowyer Richard Frank who became a freeman in 1377 and was exporting wool in 1387) suggests relatively recent immigration or a previous low status. That Philip Frank had to purchase the franchise in 1402 would support either hypothesis. In the latter part of his life he was referred to as a merchant; we know he was involved in the Norwegian trade, like many fellow townsmen, but his commercial activities are little documented, although he was several times fined for infringing the assizes of ale and wine.

His political affiliation at this time was at first with the Petypas faction, for in April 1411 he was a mainpernor for the future peaceable behaviour of Petypas et al.; later that year he was one of its parliamentary representatives, and in 1413 served as one of the community prolocutors. During 1411/12 bowyer John Frank was admitted to the franchise as part of the attempt by Petypas to pack the electorate with his supporters. However, although in 1412 appointed to the auditing committee to review financial accounts of past administrations, Philip was not part of the solid core of that committee which continued its task after the potentiores members walked out. His association with the reforming party would have been to its advantage, for he had already served as chamberlain (1409/10) and so would have had some inside knowledge of the operations of the potentiores. But perhaps he was a more moderate member of that party, for after its collapse he was quickly 'rehabilitated', and went on to serve as a constable (1418-26), scabin of the merchant gild (1417/18, 1421-24), councillor (1418-22), jurat (1422-32), and mayor (1426/27). He died in 1432.

It is not clear whether merchant Richard Frank who, soon after a term as chamberlain, became a councillor (1433-35), thereafter promoted to the jurats (1435-63, except for 1457/58, when in disgrace due to arrears of his mayoral account), and mayor in 1449/50, was Philip's son; he was, however, nephew of a London grocer of the same name. Richard was involved in the trade with Prussia and Denmark, and is found in the 1440s exporting cloth, oats, barley, and dried fish, and importing wine, and at a slightly earlier date involved in the grindstones trade. His ship was accused of involvement in a piratic act in 1436, and he was personally accused of conspiring to hijack another ship, of which he later became the owner.

Richard de Fransham entered the franchise by patrimony at Lynn in 1384, and was still alive in 1404. Richard achieved no comparable prominence, either in commerce or in local administration, to his father Geoffrey de Fransham. Geoffrey was a merchant in the northern trade and, following immediately after his first of two terms as chamberlain (1358/59), served as jurat for most of the 1360s, '70s, and '80s; he also spent a few years as collector of the wool custom at Lynn in the '80s. He had become a freeman of Lynn in 1350, through apprenticeship to merchant Thomas de Fransham, himself briefly a jurat before his career was terminated by the plague. In 1391 Geoffrey was importing herring and may have died around this time (assuming later references in 1399 and 1407 to be to one of his sons).

The Richard Frere who served as mayor's (i.e. town) clerk from 1349 to 1369 was probably the Clenchwarton man who, in 1335, witnessed a deed to property in Lynn. A Robert Frere is seen in 1337 as master of a ship whose home port was Lynn. Richard disappears from local records after 1369. Given that his duties often called for him to travel across East Anglia or down to London, it may be that he was the Richard Frere whose murder prompted an order in January 1369 to arrest Adam Baumford of Ospringe (Kent); Baumford evidently eluded the authorities for he was outlawed in July, but bought a pardon the following year. Such an unexpected turn of events may explain why Lynn went without a clerk at the elections in September 1369, qualified men not always being readily at hand.

When John de Fyncham purchased the franchise in 1349, he was described as "of Lavenham". Precisely when he moved to Lynn is unknown. He had already been active in Norfolk in the king's service: in 1341 as a purveyor of victuals and in 1347 as collector of a wool-loan and shortly after collector of a tax; these roles were likely to have brought him into contact with Lynn. Perhaps the depletion of leading townsmen as a result of the Black Death encouraged him to advance his prospects by entering Lynn society. In 1351/52 he cut his teeth in local administration as chamberlain, was returned in 1352 to the first of four parliaments he attended on behalf of the borough, served his first term as jurat in 1354/55 and this role was repeated for most of the period up to 1366. In 1367/68 he was mayor. He had also acted as the bishop's steward in the town 1354-58, and was the king's Deputy Butler 1361-63.

His career shows an administrative, perhaps even legal, bent. But this was combined with mercantile activities: in 1360, 1364 and 1366 he is seen exporting grain and/or ale; it may be that some of this was the product of agricultural lands held outside the town. He is last heard of in 1367, as one of the commissioners of array in Lynn. His son Adam entered the franchise in 1375, but himself left no direct heir. The son's name may suggest a link between John and an earlier Adam de Fincham, who was a legal advisor to Lynn 1327-32, and Deputy Butler there 1327-28.

Henry Galt entered the Lynn franchise in 1363, on the same day – and (unusually) apparently in the same transaction – as Roger Goldsmith. In 1392, Henry acted as a pledge when Roger took Thomas Davy as his apprentice. Henry's roles in public affairs between 1363 and 1392 were frequent but minor (elector, tax-assessor, capital pledge), indicating that he was not in the top rank of urban society. The possible association with the Goldsmith family may give a hint to his own occupation.

Geoffrey de Gaysele was apprenticed to merchant Thomas de Botkesham and, after completing his term, entered the franchise at Lynn in 1362. His commercial activities are only slightly evidenced; his single venture in 1392 was paralleled by a single export cargo of cloth, of comparable value, the previous year. He is also found trading locally in millstones. Although a jurat for most of the 1380s and '90s, he never distinguished himself to the point where he was selected for the mayoralty. He disappears after 1401.

Roger Goldsmith of Dereham purchased entrance to Lynn's franchise in 1363, in a transaction which (atypically) saw two other men doing the same thing side-by-side with him: Adam Goldsmith of Dereham and Henry Galt. Like Galt his public roles did not extend beyond tax-assessor and capital pledge. When he took on an apprentice in 1392, his business was described as mercantile.

Simon de Gunton purchased membership in the merchant gild in 1340. A few years later he is found in possession of a tavern, but it is not until 1364 that he is explicitly identified as a vintner. In July of that year he was exporting woad to Zeeland and using the proceeds to buy wine for import, and in August (exactly as William de Bitering) was licenced to take £50 in cash and the same in cloth to Gascony to buy wine, while in December he planned to export ale and peas to Flanders; in 1366 he again exported wheat and ale to the Low Countries. In 1353 he had imported a quantity of rye from Germany but, finding himself unable to make a profit on it in England, obtained clearance to try to sell it in Holland or Zealand; the same region was later that year the target of a cargo of wheat, exported in partnership with Robert Braunch.

He served the unusually high number of three terms as chamberlain during the 1350s, which may be taken as an indicator of acument, was a jurat for most of the period between 1355 and 1376, and was mayor in 1361/62 and 1364/65, as well as borough coroner from 1355 until his death. In addition he took on the role as the king's Deputy Butler in the port from 1363 to 1369. The life exemption from offices and jury-duty he obtained in 1366 may indicate a reluctance to hold mayoral office again. He was dead by February 1376, leaving a widow Felicia but no trace of any children.

William Halleyate seems almost out of place among the exporters listed in the customs account of 1392-93, for his modest venture in 1392 is the only direct evidence of mercantile activities. He was fined in 1400 for breaking the assize of ale, but by itself this is hardly evidence of wholesale trading. His claim to fame is as one of the leaders of the reform movement of 1411-15. Yet, in the royal pardon he obtained in 1416 after the collapse of that movement, he is described as "merchant". In 1392 he may not even have been a resident of Lynn borough, and he only took up the franchise as part of the reform party's attempt to consolidate its hold on local government. However, during the 1390s he was serving as a bailiff of one of the Lynn's overlords; and for a few years from 1408 he held posts in the customs service. It is not out of the question that his mercantile venture in 1392 may have been as factor for some other party, such as the Bishop of Norwich. On the other hand, perhaps he was engaged in small-scale international trading throughout his career.

John Herte, the son of Alan Herte of Snettisham, entered the franchise at Lynn in 1375 after completing an apprenticeship with John Drewe. He does not appear to have been highly active either in commercial or political life of the town.

The John de Howton mentioned in the customs account of 1392-93 may have been a Lynn man. Although no record of a John de Houton entering the franchise has survived, entrances of others bearing that surname, of moderate prominence in Lynn during the second half of the fourteenth century, are recorded. Most notable was shopkeeper/farmer Richard de Houton, who was a jurat for most of the 1360s and '70s and mayor 1376/77. It is, however, possible that the 1392 exporter may have been the John son of William Mey of Houghton (Cambs.), who was apprenticed to Richard de Houton and entered the franchise in 1369. A John de Houton skinner served as constable during several years between 1389 and 1400, and was briefly in the lower ranks of the jurats in 1390/91.

William Hunderpound was in the early phase of his merchant's career in 1392. He entered the franchise at Lynn in 1379 after an apprenticeship to the middle-ranking Nicholas de Narford. Apart from an infringement of the assize of ale in 1391, the shipment mentioned in the customs account of 1392-93 is the first evidence of his commercial activities. In 1395 he is again seen exporting cloth and beds. In the early 1400s he was importing herring, lumber, and iron. And in 1412 he lost a cargo to pirates. He was frequently a jurat in the decade and a half following 1399, and permanently following his term as mayor in 1417/18, up to December 1427; he died at some point between 1428 and 1430.

Thomas Hunte was a merchant with interests in both Lynn and London, although it is not evident which came first. That the surname is in little evidence at Lynn earlier (other than for a Thomas Hunte found in the role of executor in 1364) and that he purchased the franchise in April 1402 may be indicative of an immigrant; but not necessarily a recent one, for he was already in arrears of his taxes due in Lynn, from 1401/02 and 1398/99. However, it is not until 1418 that he was referred to as "citizen of London, burgess and merchant of Lynn".

His mercantile activities are evidenced by shipments in 1405 and 1406, when exporting oats and cloth and importing (with partners) dried fish and otter skins – the evident northern connection being confirmed by his loss to pirates in 1412 of a cargo coming from Norway; in 1416/17 he sold half a barrel of sturgeon to the community. He served as one of the merchant gild scabins in 1407/08 and 1411/12.

In the political conflict of that period he was squarely aligned with the potentiores, but not one of the most active participants until, in October 1415 after factional politics had resulted in the election of two rival mayors, the king stepped in and appointed him, as "one zealous for peace and no disturber", to take the mayoralty. He had been one of the jurats since at least 1411. Peacemaker or not, he showed no sympathies for the reformers' aims and continued to meet opposition from them. Elected mayor again in 1418, towards the close of that term of office the reform die-hards accused him of persuading the Bishop of Norwich to a new constitutional composition favouring the potentiores, including restoring the power of the alderman of the merchant gild to choose the first four electors. Hunte himself succeeded Robert Brunham as alderman not long after (1420), remaining in that office until 1423.

He is still mentioned as jurat in June 1424, but may already have been dead. A later generation of Hunte is seen in Lynn, and one member was a jurat from 1438-71 (becoming so immediately after entering the franchise, suggesting respected antecedents).

John Keep entered the franchise at Lynn in 1374, and became a jurat the following year, a role in which he continued until 1393 (with exception of one year in which he served as chamberlain). He had probably already established himself somewhat by 1374, for he had at least one, probably teenaged, son by that date, had served as scabin of one of the local socio-religious guilds in 1370/71; and a few months before becoming a freeman he had been appointed the king's tronager and pesager at Lynn, an office he held up to his death in 1406. On several occasions between 1375 and 1400 he was fined for breaking the assizes of ale and wine and by the mid-'80s was becoming more involved in international commerce. He is found both importing and exporting lumber, which may provide some hint as to one facet of his occupation, but like most merchants the goods in which he dealt were fairly diversified.

The John Kempe listed among the exporters in the customs account of 1392-93 was most probably the father-in-law of the famous Margery Kempe daughter of leading citizen John de Brunham. Although Kempe's son of the same name was by 1392 an adult and probably already engaging in trade, he would likely have been distinguished by the epithet "junior". A John Kempe was in the skinner's trade when he entered the franchise in 1351, but presumably was just starting out; in a local tax of 1357/58 his assessment was well below the average, although he had been able to raise the 40s. entrance fee. This may have been the future father-in-law of Margery Kempe, or just possibly an even earlier generation of the family; he is known to have been married by 1352, which would allow time for an intermediary generation between him and Margery's husband, but nor is it implausible that his first (or a second) marriage produced sons in the 1360s. The John Kempe who served a term of chamberlain (1372/73) may represent an intervening generation, or the 1351 entrant finally prospering and gaining social standing; he became a jurat in 1375 and – apart from a second term as chamberlain – remained such until 1390, but never progressed beyond the lower ranks.

In the group demand for compensation for the arrest of English merchandize in Prussia in 1385, John made the largest claim of any Lynn merchant (£300) and a second claim (£100) for goods, including copper, seized at a second location. In 1391 he was exporting cloth and flax and importing herring, lumber, iron, copper, and ashes. His involvement in supplying the construction trade had already been evidenced in 1372/73, when he was a major supplier of lumber, pitch and tar to the community for the building of a barge.

He died in 1393 (which, if the 1351 franchise entrant, would have made him about 65-70 years old), his death most likely being what prompted his sons John and Simon to take up the franchise themselves, perhaps under pressure, on 28 May of that year, and John's marriage to Margery Brunham about this time is also unlikely to be coincidental. As men who had already embarked on mercantile careers (and were very soon thereafter, as the mature heirs of a man who had given long service to his community, to be thrust into positions of responsibility in local government) they were unable to benefit from right of patrimony, and were instead each charged the regular 40s. entrance fee.

Margery's husband failed to live up to his father's attainments, and Margery's expectations; there is little evidence of either commercial or political activities in the later part of his life, nor did Simon, although seen active in international trade, distinguish himself in the political life of the community; at least this meant that neither became embroiled in the violent political conflicts of the second decade of the fifteenth century. Whether the lack of prominence was due to failings in character, bad luck, or inability to compete in a changing economic environment is difficult to say. Margery later deplored her husband's failure to maintain the socio-political status that she considered her birthright, hinting at a lack of ambition on his part; she had to pay off some of his debts out of her own money. However, she having returned impoverished from her famous pilgrimage – itself undertaken as her own family's fortunes appeared to be foundering, with the death of her father and political embarrassment of her brother in the face of a populist revolt – there was a kind of reconciliation and she later helped tend him after a serious accident and into what Margery described as his years of "great age" when he became senile (another hint of an age difference between them).

John de Kenynghale may perhaps have been the son of merchant Thomas de Kenynghale and Margaret, daughter of John Burghard (the latter possibly the wealthiest wool-merchant of Lynn in the 1320s and '30s). More likely John was only a distant relative, if at all, and may be the John Kenynghale of Kenninghall (a village in south Norfolk) who entered the franchise in January 1392 by right of completing his apprenticeship to merchant Roger Paxman; in that case, his shipment of April 1392 could represent his first solo investment, or perhaps a venture as a factor of Paxman. However, there is no indication John prospered or rose in Lynn society; whether it was he, or the John de Kenynghale junior who became a freeman in 1405, who served as bailiff of Lynn's Tolbooth in 1409/10 cannot be said.

John de Lakinghithe was probably born ca.1336 and did not become a freeman of Lynn until his mid-30s, when he did so reluctantly, under pressure. At that time his occupation may have focused more on a craft – perhaps that of cutler – than on commerce. However, by the 1380s he was beginning to engage in mercantile activities, which are known in some detail from 1391 to 1405: he exported mainly cloth, but occasionally other goods, and imported herring, dried fish, eels, earrings, ashes, canvas, flax, yarn, oil, linen, handmill stones, soap, and iron. He was among the ranks of the jurats for most of the period from 1386 to 1413, and in the context of political conflict of the later period, by which time he was in old age (but still actively engaging in commerce) and apparently politically neutral, he was elected mayor as an unsuccessful effort at compromise by one of the parties, only to die during his term of office – possibly of old age, but perhaps his death was hastened by a beating and trampling underfoot he suffered when the reform faction broke into the guildhall.

John atte Lathe was the son of the vintner Robert atte Lathe who was mayor of Lynn in 1375/76. John entered the franchise in 1377; he was not allowed to do so by patrimony but had to pay an entrance fine, because he had already been engaging in mercantile activities. After his first term as chamberlain (1378/79) he became a jurat and remained one for most of the 1380s. Although he had joined the merchant guild before 1386, his commercial activities are less well documented than those of his father. It may have been he who was fined for regrating ale and keeping a common hostelry in 1404, if he lived that long. However, lack of other references to him after his inclusion among the merchants complaining in 1388 of seizure of their goods overseas (unless one counts the apprenticing of his son, Robert, to Robert de Waterden in 1391) suggests that his losses in Prussia may have had a seriously adverse effect on his career.

Although William Leche was living in Lynn by the early 1370s, he does not feature much in the borough records and was only from the middle rank of the burgesses; the only other official role in which he is found is that of king's bailiff in the town. He may perhaps have pursued a career in administration; he seems to have had no personal activity in commerce.

John Lok was coming to the close of his career by the time of his shipments listed in the customs account for 1392-93. He died in 1393. He had served as jurat for much of the 1370s and '80s. All his exports for which we still have record were cloth; he imported herring and dried fish, ashes, iron, lumber, oil, pitch and tar. He sold lumber to the community in 1388/89. His cloth export business was carried on by his widow Margery immediately following his death, and later by his son William.

Godfrey Loveday entered the franchise at Lynn in 1377, the son of Walter Loveday of Burnham Thorpe (15 miles north-east of Lynn), courtesy of his completed apprenticeship to Henry Betele. He is, however, barely evidenced in Lynn records.

Peter Mafey (a surname probably derived from the French malfait) had entered the franchise at Lynn in 1372, under pressure, perhaps because he was already trading. Apart from being one of the merchants to complain in 1388 about Prussian arrest of English merchandize in 1385, his shipment listed in the 1392-93 customs account is the only direct evidence of his involvement in international commerce. However, in 1373/74 he sold canvas to the community and in 1385/86 lead tiles to the merchant gild, while in 1378 he was fined for forestalling a tun of oil before it could be landed from a ship anchored off Lynn's harbour. His involvement in local administration did not exceed the roles of capital pledge and chamberlain.

Nicholas Martyn was one of the middle-ranking townsmen who supported the cause of the reform party, serving as chamberlain during one of the reform administrations. In that context he was explicitly described as a merchant. It was probably the same man who served on the lower council – itself the main legacy of the reforms – in 1420/21 and 1429/30, on the former occasion being described as a brewster. Although in the customs account of 1392-93 he is recorded as exporting beer, in January 1392 he had exported cloth, and in 1398-99 exported wool and woolfells (some in partnership with James Nicholasson); in 1405 he was exporting oats and calf hides. In 1416/17 he sold 8 millstones to the merchant gild, a man with the same surname happening to be the gild's clerk at that time. He probably died in the early 1430s.

Thomas de Melcheburn was one of the most active Lynn merchants of his generation; the commercial activities of few townsmen of that period are so well documented. He has been described as "among the great merchant capitalists of 14th century England" [V. Parker, The Making of Kings Lynn, London: Phillimore, 1971, 10], ranking alongside men such as John Lovekyn of London, the de la Poles of Hull, and the Canynges of Bristol [N.S.B. Gras, The Evolution of the English Corn Market, Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1926, 173].

Thomas was already becoming established when he first comes to our attention – partly a facet of poorer survival of local records tempore Edward II than from the reign of his successor. The earliest references to him are in fact in 1318, when in the Spring he was prosecuting pleas of transgression and detention of rent in the steward's court at Lynn, and in September accused Thomas Leef of breaking and entering his house in St. James Street, breaking open his pyx (strongbox) and stealing a belt and purse. More significantly it was in that year, on 16 June, that he purchased membership in Lynn's merchant gild. In the following year, we first see him active in commerce. In June he obtained a royal safe-conduct for business trips, by sea or land, as a "king's merchant". The vicissitudes of international commerce quickly became apparent to him, for in December he and partner John Thornegge, a man already prominent in Lynn's commercial and political affairs, complained to the king that their ship the Godyer, taking wheat, worsted, other cloth, and other unspecified merchandize, to Gascony had been captured by Flemish pirates. Yet another significant mention of Thomas is as one of Lynn's representatives to the parliament of May 1319, likely an indication of the trust he had already won in the town; he may also have acted as a replacement for the representative chosen to go to parliament the previous year.

For Thomas and his family were newcomers to the borough. There is no sign of the surname – which probably derives from Melchbourne in Bedfordshire – in Lynn at an earlier period. It is probable that an ambitious and already prospering Thomas migrated there from some hinterland location – perhaps somewhere like St. Ives – in order to have more immediate access to shipping. His brother William either came with him, or more likely followed him, since he did not take up membership in the merchant gild until 1331.

Despite the early indications of Thomas' career, his mercantile activities are only glimpsed in the 1320s. In 1327 he obtained a safeconduct for the ship Peter carrying victuals to Newcastle-upon-Tyne for the army – the Scottish war provided enriching opportunities for a number of enterprising merchants. It also presented risk, and this may be why Thomas borrowed from his community, ca. 1328, a springald (a weapon like a huge crossbow, used to project large bolts or even stones) for his ship the Magdaleyn. During the '20s he was also active in administrative roles. He attended one or two further parliaments for his borough (possibly July 1328, certainly February 1329). He was chosen as one of the scabins of the merchant gild in 1323 and continued in that role, which had responsibilities for financial administration, until 1327; he held the post again between 1330 and 1333. He served the borough itself in a similar role, as chamberlain, in 1327/28, having already been elected as one of the jurats in 1325/26, although at that period the office was not held continuously after an initial election. More important, he embarked on a side-career in the royal customs service, with an initial brief stint as a collector of wool custom from August to December 1328. All these things were indicators of the way his career would develop.

It was in the early years of Edward III's reign that Thomas came into his stride, and the (assumed) arrival of his brother William may have helped. The pair, referred to as "king's merchants", obtained a one-year protection in December 1332 to go to Norway to trade for corn and victuals. Norway, which was dependent on Britain as a source of grain, was the principal foreign market with which the Melcheburns did business. Thomas had already, in May 1332, obtained a protection to assist him in taking 500 quarters of wheat to Norway to trade for stockfish, and he obtained similar export licences in March 1333 and January 1335. In 1336 he freighted a ship of fellow Lynn merchant John Bamme (who also frequented the Norwegian market) to fetch stockfish and victuals from Norway; his own ships may have already been absent on voyages. By 1337 this type of venture had expanded in scope, for the licence granted him in October was to export 500 qt. of malt, 500 qt. of wheat, and 300 tuns of ale to Norway, Holland and Zealand, and bring back stockfish and victuals, and that of March 1338 authorized him to export 1000 qt. of wheat to Norway and Zealand, doubtless for similar purpose.

But Thomas also gave attention to other markets. A second licence obtained in January 1335 was to export 100 tuns of ale; we do not know the destination, but it would appear not to have been Norway. In September 1332 he had obtained a protection to take wool to sell in Flanders, undeterred by his earlier problem with pirates (who, however, did not restrict themselves to Flemish waters). In December 1336 the destinations stated in his export licence, for 200 tuns of ale and 200 qt. of wheat, were Holland and Zealand. He was also dealing in wine, for the community bought £4 worth from him ca.1333, and in 1347 he sold 5 tuns for £22.13.4½d to the then deputy butler of Lynn, John Wesenham; this suggests continued involvement with the Gascon market.

The frequency with which he was able to obtain permissions and protections to trade abroad, at a time when there was some nervousness about English merchants supplying "the king's enemies" (whoever that might be at any given time) may have owed something to the services he was performing for the royal government. In 1335 Thomas' ship the Magdaleyn was carrying victuals to Berwick-on-Tweed to supply the army, and in June 1337 he and brother William employed that vessel, along with a second, the St. Mary Cog of Wygenhale, to transport wheat to supply the king's envoys on a voyage abroad. During 1336 those two ships, along with apparently a new addition to his fleet, the Philip and Galya, were all used to transport the king's messengers; about 3 years earlier the Lynn authorities had paid him for use of one of his ships to transport arms for the king. In December 1336 the brothers had been commissioned to build a 60-oar barge at Lynn for the king, and in July 1337 and July 1339 Thomas was commissioned to purvey Norfolk wool for the king. In August 1341 he and William were purveying victuals for the king, while earlier that year in April the commission to the pair had been to arrest ships planning to trade with the king's enemies.

Thomas' activity in the customs service had continued: he was a collector of wool customs from May 1329 to January 1340, and for much of the subsequent period up to December 1344. He also took on the role of deputy butler at Lynn (dealing with the wine trade) in February 1338, continuing therein for most of the period until mid-1343.

An involvement in royal service to this degree was almost inevitably going to lead to accusations of maladministration, whether prompted by real abuses or jealousy of rivals. In March 1333 it was claimed that Thomas had tried to evade the wool-tax. New accusations several years later about the performance of customs officers in general resulted in a sweeping investigation that led to his dismissal as customer in January 1340 and a fine of £19.15s for unspecified "oppressions" committed as customer, deputy butler, purveyor of victuals, buyer of the king's wool, purveyor of materials for building a barge and making anchors and cables for the king, arrayer of mariners and soldiers for that barge and other ships in the king's service, purveyor of supplies for the same ships, commissioner to arrest ships carrying victuals to Scotland or Norway, and deputy admiral. However, by the same token of his great usefulness to the king, he was able to appeal the decision and persuade the king his conviction was unwarranted. Edward III's concern appears less with whether the customs service was run honestly than whether it was furnishing him with the money he needed to finance his wars; the two were perceived as going hand in hand. Thomas was restored to the customs post in March 1340, holding it for most of the period up to December 1344, and was pardoned the fine in February 1342. In July 1341 he was, however, still seeking an indemnity from the king for his actions when purveyor of wool (1337), various Norfolk men having accused him before the courts of taking more wool than his instructions permitted.

In 1347 the king acknowledged he owed Thomas £203.7s.2³/₄d for expenses Thomas had incurred in the duties listed above, as well as in transporting bows and arrows from Lynn to London in 1341. In 1344 the size of the king's debt to Thomas and William together had been £617.11s.6d, and they had been granted 6s.8d out of the subsidy collectable on each sack of wool exported from Southampton, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Lynn and Yarmouth, until the debt was paid; however, the king was always using and abusing this device to repay his debts, and it was no sure guarantee of repayment. Another indication of the financial risks involved in royal service is seen in November 1337, when Thomas was petitioning for payment of £114.16s. for 180 qt. of wheat and 238 qt. of oats lost in a shipwreck, and part of a larger shipment that the king had ordered Thomas to transport to Berwick.

That usefulness to the king went beyond personal services, for the Melcheburns were prepared to use their business profits to keep royal favour. In September 1337 the king authorized them to export 5 lasts of hide, 10 cartloads of lead, 300 qt. of wheat, and 200 tuns of ale to Zealand, in return for providing a loan to the king (via payment of extra customs duties). They could afford to curry favour with loans: the assessment of Thomas' goods for purposes of a local tax in 1332 was over twice the average assessment.

It seems to have been in this period that Thomas moved to a riverside property near the quay at Purfleet. He may have been casting around for a suitable site in 1331, when he bought up a quitclaim to a tenement on the north bank of Millfleet. In April 1336 he took out a 13-year lease of a property owned in Edward I's time by Richard de Almannia, also a "king's merchant" trading with Norway, and then briefly leased from Richard's widow by yet another prominent merchant, John de Walsingham, co-owner with John Bamme and John de Thornegge of a ship. It was from Walsingham's executor that Thomas leased the property. This riverside location, with warehouses, must have been more convenient for business than one in St. James' Street, within Lynn.

The Melchburne star rose yet higher in the 1340s. Thomas had been elected to the mayoralty in Lynn in 1338, and this assured him a place among Lynn's jurats during the 1340s (as far as our lists of members, incomplete for that decade, show). He had been chosen as a borough representative to five more parliaments between 1330 and 1340, as well as sitting as a merchant representing Norfolk at the session of July 1338; but thereafter he left this duty to younger men. In March 1340 he travelled to London on community business, to show proof to the city authorities that Lynn burgesses were exempt from murage exactions there. His responsibilities in the local branch of royal administration diversified: in addition to his roles as customer and deputy butler, he took on the post of searcher for coin from November 1342 to April 1346, and searcher of ships (throughout England and Flanders) for smuggled wool from October 1345 to January 1346. William de Melcheburn meanwhile secured posts as customs collector and searcher of ships at Boston at various times during the 1340s, and replaced Thomas as deputy butler at Lynn in 1343; he also had London interests, holding a post responsible for the weighing of wool prior to export in the early 1340s.

Other commissions continued to come Thomas' way. In January 1340 it was to hold an inquisition at Lynn into a dispute between a Zealander and some Flemings; a similar type of commission was issued in June 1347, to look into the complaint by Robert Howel that Thomas de Folsham of Lynn had faked death to try to avoid paying money owed Robert. In February 1342 he and William were instructed to sell all victuals purveyed by them, and hang on to the money for future purveying when the king instructed; they were also to supervise the sale of victuals by other Lynn purveyors. The following month Thomas was ordered (presumably as deputy butler) to conduct an investigation into the gauging of wines at Lynn. In January of the same year, Thomas is identified as receiver of the king's wool in Norfolk, and in April the king had to order the Exchequer to give Thomas extra time to account for what he had received, since Thomas was busy arresting ships for naval service. Two of his own ships, the Magdaleyn and the St. Mary Cog were in royal service ca.1346, apparently on behalf of the borough of Lynn, which paid the ships' expenses. The year 1342 was evidently a busy one for Thomas, for in June he was once more commissioned to levy a wool-tax in Norfolk, and it was probably in the same year he and William delivered 20 tuns of flour to Berwick, for which they accounted at the Exchequer in March 1343.

In April 1343, his commission was to ship the king's wool from Norfolk to Flanders and sell it there; this appears connected with a task taken on the following year. For March 1344 saw Thomas and his brother commissioned to redeem the king's great crown from Germans who held it as security for a loan, and bring the crown secretly and safely back to England. The bailiffs of Boston had to be ordered in May 1344 to dearrest the Magdaleyn, as the brothers needed to use it to export wool to Flanders in order to raise money to repay the loan for which the crown had been security. This mission was evidently a success, for in October William received an annuity of £20 for his part in the mission. Further sign of the confidence in which the king held Thomas was his commission, in September 1345, to treat with the governments of Flemish towns concerning the standardization of Flemish and English coinages; the following month his mandate was expanded to include negotiations for Flanders' recognition of Edward III as king of France and lord of Flanders. That Thomas and William continued to be employed on sensitive missions is suggested by the royal protection they were issued in February 1347, on the grounds they were afraid to appear before the king's Council (as summoned in January) to discuss secret business, because unnamed persons planned to have them arrested for debt. In October 1347 a further reward came the way of the brothers, under the name of "spoils of war", being three inns in Calais.

The Melchburnes continued to conduct private business during the '40s, although it is increasingly hard to know what was on their own behalf and what on the king's. In May 1342 the brothers handed over £220 at St. Ives to a third party, to trade with to their profit. At the close of that year Thomas received clearance to export ale and wheat to Flanders, on condition he not use any ships which had been designated for naval service. In May 1347 he was licensed to export 500 qt. of wheat, and in May 1349 he and William were authorized to export 1,000 qt. to Norway (other events may have overtaken this venture, however).

An indicator of the importance he had attained within the national mercantile community was his election as mayor of the staple at Bruges in 1343, a post he held until at least September 1345, and possibly to 1348. It was in this capacity that he acted (September 1343) as ambassador to treat with the Flemish town authorities regarding grievances of English merchants. It was also in this capacity that we find him in June of that year as leader of a syndicate of 34 merchants granted the farm of national customs (except the wine prise) for 4 years, at the staggering annual payment of Ɱ50,000; the syndicate had the power to appoint one of the customers in each port and controlled part of the cocket seal used to authorize exports, such controls being intended to help the syndicate combat loss of revenues through corruption. This was not Thomas' first experience of such an arrangement, for in 1337 he had participated in a mercantile syndicate looking to make a profit from dealing in wool purveyed for the king. Thomas was the nominal leader of the 1343 company but, although he was one of the most important members, William de la Pole was the real driving force; another member was Walter Chiriton. However, the inherent problems with the customs system and the adverse effect of war on commerce put the company in serious difficulties by March 1345, when the contract was re-negotiated – it being ominously stated that several members of the syndicate had died or disappeared; and the company gave up the farm in August, after informing the king it could not pay the next instalment. A new syndicate, of which John de Wesenham of Lynn was the leader, took over the farm, at the same rate. The old company, in compensation for its losses, was given permission to export 2,000 sacks of the king's wool to recoup £7,000 of the money it claimed was due it; but what the king gave with one hand he took back with the other, for his concession was in return for the assurance that the company would raise £6,666.13s.4d for the war treasury. It was also in August 1345 that the Melcheburns and Walter Chiriton acknowledged a debt of £640.2s.8d to the Archbishop of Canterbury, although only half this was really owed.

Walter Chiriton headed the company responsible for the farm by November 1346, but it was no more successful. The Melcheburns were still involved, and were guarantors for Chiriton's ability to pay the farm. By mid-1349 it was evident he couldn't. The arrest for debt that the Melcheburns feared in 1347 may have been connected with the company's failure. The financial discomfiture resulting from Chiriton's default might have proved a severe embarrassment to Thomas, had he not already been carried off by the Black Death.

His testament was drawn up on 26 May 1349 and received probate on 8 June. At the time of its drafting he was still active and he specified he should be buried "wherever God arranges", indicating that he continued to travel around a great deal. The testament of such an important merchant is relatively brief and businesslike. Although he makes provision for his soul, it is only in general terms and he is not preoccupied with the matter. Nor is he interested in rewards or remembrances to friends, colleagues, servants, or even relatives (although it is possible he had a separate will for personalty, which has not survived). Of wealth there is far less indication than one might expect; perhaps most of it was liquid. Almost his sole concern is to pass on his real estate to his closest kin. His tenement between Stockfish Row and the river went to his wife Joan for life, and afterwards to his brother William, again for life, and then to be sold to pay for masses and charitable works. A second tenement, location unknown, went to his son Peter (who already held property in Briggate) without restrictions. Joan also inherited the household effects of their residence, but these too are identified only in general terms – there is no indication of any items to which he had a particular attachment. One wonders whether the will was drawn up in haste, or whether Thomas' mind was not really elsewhere – perhaps on his financial troubles. His executors were his wife, son, and brother. There is no hint of any attachment to any other person.

The lands of Thomas, William and Peter were seized by the king in connection with the failure of Chiriton's company, and there is some hint of suspicion of smuggling (a common enough offence with people who held the type of posts the Melcheburns did). William was imprisoned at London by 1352. Peter, who had followed his father's footsteps into the customs service in the 1340s, and entered jurat ranks at Lynn briefly (1350/51), was himself dead by May 1352, when his widow Alice, a member of the moderately important Walton family, made William her attorney to sue for debts due Peter. H.L. Bradfer-Lawrence ["The Merchants of Lynn," A Supplement to Blomefield's Norfolk, London, 1929, 147] claimed to have seen Peter's will, made in 1350. According to him a Richard de Melcheburn was a further son of Thomas, despite being absent from Thomas' will. Perhaps Thomas had patrimonial property elsewhere that Richard inherited. In 1350 this Richard was in the post of supervisor of wool-weighing at Lynn and other east coast ports; however, when he stood as guarantor for William, upon the latter's release from the Fleet in March 1352, he was described as "of London".

No more is heard of the Melcheburn family in Lynn. There is nothing to connect merchant John Melcheburn, of moderate prominence in Lynn in the mid-fifteenth century, with the earlier Melcheburns. The family's flame had shone brightly in Lynn, but briefly.

John Muriell was described as "of London" when he first appears in connection with Lynn, in March 1405, exporting 600 qt. of wheat through the port to Holland and Zealand. A further, smaller shipment, of wheat and oats, followed in June. It appears he decided his interests would be best served by moving to Lynn, for at some point during the 1405/06 mayoral year he purchased the franchise there; in 1412 we have another glimpse of his mercantile activities, when his cargo coming from Norway was captured by pirates. An Alan Meriell had obtained the franchise through apprenticeship in 1403, but whether this was any relation, I cannot say.

Despite John's mercantile interests, he does not seem to have been accepted into the ruling class within the town, but instead (or perhaps because of) associated himself with the reformers and became a trusted member: in October 1411 and again in October 1412 he was one of those the faction selected to go to London to defend its position against accusations of the potentiores, and in June 1414 was one of five men given power of attorney to represent the community (by which was meant the reform party) in all pleas. Furthermore he was one of the die-hard supporters of the party after its fortunes had waned and its original leader, Bartholomew Petypas had given up the struggle in return for a place among the ruling elite: in August 1419 he was one of those who objected to the election of John Wesenham as mayor, proposing fellow reformer John Bukworth instead; when this was rejected, he walked out of the guildhall, with his supporters following.

Ironically, he had himself been elected chamberlain on the same occasion. At that time he was also serving as one of the common councillors, continuing in that office until 1421, and then serving again from 1424-33. He also held a constabulary 1425-33 and was again elected as chamberlain in 1433/34, but his political sentiments probably prevented him from being adopted into the ranks of the jurats. Despite that, he had a respectable position in the community. He served as alderman of St. George's Gild in 1419/20 and 1423/24, and in January 1431 was chosen to go to Denmark as the community's ambassador (but, after a haggles over wages, excused himself from the task). We last hear of him in May 1434.

Richard Neell was granted freeman's status at Lynn, apparently gratis, in 1377, because of his service as constable of the community barge, which suggests he was a seaman. The lack of other mentions of him in borough records may also reflect that he spent most of his time away from the town, at sea.

James Nicholasson was a patenmaker (maker of wooden shoes) by trade, and may be represented in the customs account of 1392-93 not only under his patronymic surname but also as James Patynmaker – note that both men were trading in calf skins. He had not yet become a freeman of Lynn, doing so in 1395, yet had been active in international commerce since 1387, when he was exporting woolfells. His mercantile activities continue to be well documented up to 1405, and there is reference to loss of his merchandize to pirates in 1412. The goods he exported were predominantly sheep, lamb, and calf skins, as well as wool, but occasionally he dealt in cloth; his imports were also atypical and included materials for his craft (paten wood, nails, and clogs), along with linen, painted cloths, haberdashery, dyes (madder and woad), glass, and crockery.

He was a supporter of the reform movement active 1411-15 and it was probably in this context that he came under attack because of his birth: his father was a foreigner (as the spelling of his surname suggests), either dead or departed, and it is not clear whether he was married to James' mother, who was a Lynn woman. James had to obtain denization papers in 1413, although his property was still subject to attack during a riot a few months later. By the end of the decade he had apparently overcome his problems of birth and political sympathies and was appointed to Lynn's council from 1418 until his death in 1420.

William de Oxneye entered the franchise at Lynn in 1370 and between 1373 and 1387 was several times in the role of tax assessor or collector, as well as one term as chamberlain, but is otherwise little in evidence in Lynn records. The 1392-93 customs account provides the only evidence for his commercial activity. It may be significant that the ship he selected to transport his cargo was the sole case of a Yarmouth ship using Lynn's port in this period, for there was an Oxneye family prominent in Yarmouth in the latter half of the fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries; in fact, merchant William de Oxneye was one of Yarmouth's leading townsmen from the 1370s to early fifteenth century (13 times bailiff). Kinship of the two Williams is a possibility. Note also that the master of the ship to which Lynn's William assigned his cargo may have been a member of Yarmouth's Beneyt family of ship-owners and town rulers.

John Paxman acquired the franchise at Lynn by purchase, in 1378. John was of the middle rank of burgesses, not holding any public role of greater responsibility than capital pledge. He also exported cloth in 1391, and imported lumber, iron, and stones in the same year. It is not clear what, if any, his relationship was to mercer Roger Paxman, a more prominent figure in the town. Roger had purchased the franchise in 1363, already an adult – having been taxed in Lynn, as a non-burgess, in 1357/58, when his assessment was below the average. However, his affairs were prospering enough by 1370 that he was elected both a chamberlain and a jurat; he spent much of the '70s and '80s in jurat ranks, interrupted notably by two more terms as chamberlain and two as mayor. Besides the large investments he was making in international commerce in the 1380s (if his claims against the Prussian authorities in 1388 are credible), in 1391 he is seen exporting three shipments of cloth, and importing shipments of timber, tar, ashes, iron, and dried fish. He was dead by the beginning of the following year.

The Thomas Paynot mentioned in the 1392-93 customs account was a Lynn man, although whether the father or son, in the case of the Thomas son of Thomas Paynot who entered the franchise in April 1393, is not easy to say. There is no surviving record of the father having entered the franchise, although his minor activities in borough affairs during the 1370s suggests he must have; he is less in evidence in the '80s although apparently still alive in 1393. The fact that Thomas junior had to pay for his entrance may suggest he was an adult who had been trading prior to entering; his father was already being described as Thomas senior in 1375.

The early career of John Permonter (or Parmenter), alias Causton, is little documented. His affiliation with the potentiores during the political conflict tempore Henry V is suggested by his summons to Chancery in 1415 along with select other members of the contesting factions, and by the fact that he was partner to vintner Robert Brunham (a leader of the potentiores) in importing wine in 1406, the earliest reference to him. Perhaps he had recently been one of Brunham's apprentices.

In 1416 he was described as a taverner, and later in life as a vintner and a merchant, and was on several occasions fined for infringements of the assize of wine. Apart from the fact that he was scabin of the merchant gild in 1411/12, however, there is nothing to indicate why precisely he was on the list of men summoned to Chancery, for he did not enter the ranks of jurats until 1418, after the political conflict was over. Perhaps this was a reward for his support of the potentiores' cause, for is not known to have previously served as chamberlain or councillor, although our lists of those officers are not complete; but it may simply be a recognition of his abilities, since he thereafter became one of the most prominent townsmen.

He continued as a jurat until 1438, probably the year of his death, and was elected to the mayoralty 5 times between 1423 and 1431, and served as alderman of the merchant gild from 1435-37. He was sufficiently capable that, through a possibly feigned reluctance to serve, he was able to negotiate bonuses for his performance as mayor. During the 1430s he was also one of the leading officers of the Corpus Christi gild.

Robert Pulter purchased the franchise at Lynn in 1363. It appears to have been he who was fined in 1349 for forestalling poultry (his surname meaning "poulterer"); certainly he was the Robert Pulter fined for forestalling fish in 1375. The 1392-93 customs account is the only document evidencing any involvement in international commerce. His participation in local administration was not great, although he served two terms as chamberlain. He died between at some point between 1395 and 1398.

Laurence de Reppes is seen in the records as early as 1339, when acquiring rents from some Lynn shops, but is not much in evidence until the mid-1340s. He twice served as chamberlain (1345/46 and 1357/58) and was jurat in 1346/47, 1350/51 (as elector), and for most of the period between 1358 and 1368. As Laurence Bon of [South] Repps, he and his children were in 1353 released by Alan Reyner of nearby Roughton from any claim of being Alan's villeins. His trade was as a tanner, but he was also involved in wholesale commerce, and in 1356 was summoned to attend a national merchant assembly. His commercial activities involved not only hides – he shipping 8 lasts from Newcastle-on-Tyne to Lynn in 1368, when described as a merchant – but also other goods, for in 1346 he was accused of forestalling 2 lasts of herring, and on more than one occasion of breaking the assize of ale.

Thomas Ryghtwys senior was mayor of Lynn in 1351/52 and served among the jurats for much of the period between 1342 to 1362 – the last specific mention of him was at Michaelmas 1361, and he probably died during the year that followed. His name appears in the local tax list of 1319, but his assessment was only a third of the average; by contrast, in 1357/58 his assessment was five times the average, and in the national subsidy of 1332 it had been double the average. Not only was he a merchant, he owned his own ship: in 1336 he was in possession of the St. Mary Cog, and in 1344 co-owned the ship Elyne which however had just been sunk by the Scots while in royal service. In 1333 he was fined for forestalling fish, and the same as regards timber in 1359. In 1336 he was importing wine from Bordeaux, and in 1347 he sold 3 tuns of wine to the King's Butler; while in 1349 he exported cloth.

His brother John, who seems to have been involved in the fishing trade along with another brother Robert, had been a jurat for most of the 1340s and died in the summer of 1361 (possibly he and Thomas senior were victims of the second major outbreak of plague). John's son Thomas Ryghtwys junior in that year succeeded William de Swanton as the borough coroner, having already entered jurat ranks in 1359, remaining therein until his premature death in 1365. Thomas senior's son Robert (junior) appeared set to succeed to his father's interests, taking up the franchise in 1359 and entering jurat ranks in 1363, but he too died leaving underage children, in 1371.

Robert de Salisbury's modest shipment registered in the 1392-93 customs account was preceded by another cargo of cloth a little larger and more valuable in 1391, but he shows no signs of having been among the top rank of Lynn's merchants. He purchased the franchise in 1378 and first appears among the jurats ten years later, but only became established there in the early 1400s. He married a daughter or the widow of vintner Robert atte Lathe (mayor 1375/76), acquired through that connection a house equipped as a brewery (a tavern?), which became Salisbury's residence, and was himself in 1391 and 1425 fined for breaking the assize of ale. Perhaps he also traded in furs, as his merchant's mark was an animal (possibly a squirrel) ringed by a motto. He retired from the jurats in 1424, due to age and infirmity, and died five years later. His son Thomas, who had looked after him in old age, became one of the most prominent of Lynn's merchants and local administrators during the reign of Henry VI.

William de Silesden was a 1377 franchise entrant at Lynn and was referred to on different occasions as "merchant" and "brasier". He was not within the leading ranks of borough society and performed his citizen's duty only through one stint as chamberlain. Evidence of activity in the import/export trade is almost non-existent beyond the 1392-93 customs account, although in 1398 he is seen selling a large quantity of tiles (his will of 1410 mentions a tile-kiln of which he was part-owner) and he was occasionally fined for breaking the assizes of ale and wine.

John de Snailwell purchased entrance to the Lynn franchise in 1388, but left little mark on local records, despite having been resident in Lynn at the time of the 1379 poll tax.

Thomas de Sparham entered the franchise at Lynn in 1364, after completing his apprenticeship with merchant John de Fyncham. Unlike his master, he never rose into the upper ranks of urban society, though it is difficult to say whether one reason for this was the injuries he suffered during violent confrontations between townsmen and Bishop Despenser's retinue in 1377, which led the borough government to negotiate a settlement with the Bishop and subsequently to assign Thomas a 5-year annuity in compensation (most of which he reassigned during the next two years to merchants of Yarmouth and Norwich, his creditors).

John Spicer had been one of John de Brandon's apprentices, completing his term in 1384, when he entered the franchise at Lynn. Shortly afterwards he married a daughter of merchant Geoffrey de Tolbooth, a two-times mayor and former Deputy Butler. John was very active in the customs service, initially partnering Brandon as the collectors of wool custom (1398/99), although his most notable role was as Deputy Butler in Lynn for most of the period between 1399 and 1419. He had joined jurat ranks by 1411, becoming one of the leading opponents of the reform party, and remained there until 1423, serving as mayor for three consecutive terms (1420-23) – dying within the few months following. To his various exports recorded in the 1392-93 customs account, the 1391 account add flax; his imports are not evidenced. The prominence of agricultural produce among his exports may receive added significance from the fact that he was farming the town mill in 1407/08, and the previous year had purchased a millstone from the merchant gild.

The two Attestyles whose trading is evidenced in the 1392-93 customs account were members of a moderately prominent Lynn family that flourished at the end of the fourteenth and in the early fifteenth centuries. John atte Style appears to have been the elder, standing as guarantor for Thomas atte Style when he entered the franchise in February 1392. Perhaps both were sons of a John atte Style who entered the franchise in 1369 and had some association with the Wesenham family. That freeman's status was no pre-requisite for mercantile activity is indicated by the fact that Thomas was importing (herring, iron, canvas) in 1391, and his commercial activities continued to be documented up to 1395. John's activities are documented from 1388 only to 1392 – he importing herring, lumber, iron, tar, and ashes – despite the fact that he lived to 1407, whereas Thomas was dead before the close of 1401. Neither man played much of a role in local government.

John de Sustede obtained the franchise in 1346 through apprenticeship to William de Bitering, and may have been descended from the John de Suthstede junior taxed at Lynn in 1319. In 1354 he was a partner with members of the Cokesford and Braunch families in the export of ale and grain; the following year he was licensed to export further large quantities of the same. In 1349, after acknowledging an offence against a fellow burgess, he gave 3 tuns of wine as a peace offering. Involvement in the wine trade may also be suggested by his role as Deputy Butler at Lynn 1359-61. He put in his time as chamberlain 1350/51 and was jurat for most of the period between 1353 and 1361, as well as serving as bailiff of the tolbooth in 1360/61. This despite having obtained in 1354 a life exemption from offices and juries. He is not heard of after 1361, and likely fell victim to the renewed plague.

John de Sutton was probably the John son of Walter de Sutton of Sutton (a few miles west of Ely) who entered the franchise at Lynn in 1378, after completing his apprenticeship with merchant Thomas Curson. In the early 1390s he held some very minor posts of responsibility within the community, but never rose into the upper ranks of borough society.

William de Swanton entered the merchant gild in 1340 and was important enough to be summoned by the king to attend a Merchant Assembly in 1356. The following year his local tax assessment of 15s. was well above the average of 6s.1d. His earliest known position of responsibility was as collector of a royal tax in 1337 – a thankless role he was required to repeat the following two years. Financial acumen may also be reflected in the fact that he was called on twice to serve as borough chamberlain (1337/38 and 1343/44). He was in jurat ranks for most of the period from 1342/43 to 1360/61, and served as mayor in 1355/56 – when his official duties included having built a barge commissioned by the king – and as borough coroner thereafter until his death in 1361. He was probably a victim of plague. He left behind daughters (apparently underage) and a pregnant wife, Alice, who was still alive at the time of the poll tax in 1379. It was to Alice that all his property was left, which included a tenement on opposite sides of Webster Row, on the banks of the Purfleet, where he had a quay, and four shops in Pillory Lane. His posthumous child was probably Andrew de Swanton, who was jurat during much of the period 1389-1434, and borough coroner ca.1400-21.

The Swerdestone family, its name derived from Swardeston in Norfolk, was prominent in Lynn for much of the fourteenth century. Alan de Swerdestone appears in the records as early as 1292 and was already prosperous, for his possessions were valued for taxation purposes at £80; although the valuations were lower in 1297 and 1298, his tax assessment remained well above the average, and subsequent valuations (1299-1303) were £100 or more. We know nothing of his business, however, other than that in 1303 he sold a large amount of timber (probably imported from northern Europe) to royal commissioners charged with making pontoons, and in 1309 he was exporting wool. Alan had served as a scabin of the merchant gild from 1299 to 1303, and as borough chamberlain in 1305/06. He had died by February 1315, leaving a widow Theophany (d.1316), and bequests to sons John, Richard and William.

Theophany's will mentions another of her sons, Thomas, perhaps by an earlier marriage. However, he may be the Thomas de Swerdestone who entered the merchant gild in 1324 and served as its scabin in 1341/42. He was chamberlain in 1339/40 and 1341/42, jurat the following year and again from 1346 to 1348. He briefly (1341-43) held a post in the royal customs service. We know nothing significant about his commercial activities. It seems likely he was a victim of the plague.

Alan's son John de Swerdestone was far more prominent in the borough, but likewise succumbed to the Black Death. He was one of four Lynn men to count as the greater wool-merchants of numerous towns summoned by the king in 1322 to counsel him on reform of the staple organization. Surviving records mainly show him involved in the victualling trade, however: in 1333 he and Hugh Betele, as "king's merchants" took grain to Norway to trade for fish, and the following year they similarly (in their own ships) exported ale and grain; in 1336 he and Betele, together with Simon de Bitering obtained from the king a 3-year safeconduct while trading in England and abroad. Hugh was married to John's daughter Margery, and John lived just long enough to act as Hugh's executor at the beginning of 1349.

John had some involvement in the royal customs service, first in 1315 as the sheriff's deputy supervising the export of victuals from Lynn, with particular view to ensuring none were shipped to enemy countries, but from 1320 to 1322 and again 1332-33 and 1340-41 as a collector of wool custom. He gave more service to his town: although he appears among the jurats only on three occasions (the earliest being in 1322/23), he was elected mayor for six terms between 1323 and 1347, and for part of a seventh when William de Sechford died in office in 1336. The borough returned him to seven parliaments between 1324 and 1341. He also served the merchant gild: as scabin from 1317 to 1321 and as alderman 1340-49.

He was survived by his wife Muriel and sons Nicholas and John.

John de Swerdestone junior appears to have been the elder, having entered the merchant gild in 1337 and being the inheritor of his father's principal residence. He perhaps also took the lead in the family business; in 1358 he was given licence to export grain to the Low Countries or Gascony. He served the borough as chamberlain in 1349/50, and jurat in 1350/51 and 1352-54, but was clearly not as important in town affairs as his father and is last heard of in 1360.

Nicholas de Swerdestone is more in evidence, but neither could he equal his father's accomplishments. He became a freeman at Lynn upon the death of his father and he served two terms as chamberlain and was a jurat from 1359-70 and in 1378/79. He was returned to five parliaments between 1361 and 1379, but in the event did not sit in one (1372). He was also the borough coroner for an unknown period in the 1370s. This career ended in disgrace: in 1379 he was accused of conspiring with the chaplain of St. Nicholas' to have the chapel given the status of a parish church, an initiative which led to discord among the townspeople; the chaplain had obtained papal letters to this effect which were subsequently annulled by papal judges, the borough authorities evidently going to some effort to quash the separatist movement. For his part in this trouble, Nicholas was removed from the coronership in December 1379, and the following August was disfranchised and the burgesses were prohibited from trading, socializing or even speaking with him. The last heard of him is on two occasions in 1381 and 1382 when he and the chaplain failed to appear before a court of the bishop of Norwich to defend themselves in a charge of having pursued the matter. The family name disappeared from Lynn.

Bartholomew Systeme's earliest appearance in borough records is in 1398/99, when he travelled to Boston and London on community business; he performed a similar duty for Lynn in 1401/02, although only as far as Norwich on this occasion. A merchant, he is seen in 1405 and 1406 exporting shipments of cloth, as well as malt and peas, either solo or in partnership with Ralph Bedingham and John Lakinghithe, and in 1412 lost to pirates a cargo being brought from Norway. He may have been the son of the William Systeme who was exporting cloth and importing herring in 1391. And John Systeme, for whose entrance to the franchise in 1403 Bartholomew acted as pledge, was likely a younger brother; if so, John's entrance by patrimony would suggest Bartholomew himself was likely born in Lynn.

His earliest roles in the administrative system were as leet affeelor (1400), searcher of ships (1402-05), and scabin of the merchant gild (1406/07); during the last decade of his life he was the borough's coroner. He is also found as a churchwarden of St. Margaret's in 1419, when he requested to be released from the post, because the church coffers had been drained by belfry repairs and he did not wish to have to finance further work from his own pocket; however, he probably remained in office, for the corporation heard his plea and took steps to raise alms to support the church. He had entered the ranks of the jurats by 1411 – his position in the listings showing that he was one of the most junior members. Although he was appointed later that year to the special committee to re-audit financial accounts of past administrations, he was clearly identified with the potentiores and boycotted that committee along with fellow jurats once it was clear which way the wind was blowing.

Since his elder son had only taken up the franchise in 1426, by patrimony (indicative of recent adulthood), Bartholomew may only have been around 50 when he died in 1429; this premature death robbed him of a shot at the mayoralty, he having just reached the upper-middle ranks of the jurats from which mayors tended to be elected.

Reginald de Systeme's surname appears in Lynn in the 1290s (as de Sidesterne, perhaps suggesting a connection with Sidestrand in Norfolk, rather than one with the Systons further afield), and holders came to prominence at various times in Lynn – such as Bartholomew Systeme. Reginald purchased membership in the merchant gild in 1328 and later in the year was fined for using non-standard weights and for breaking the assize of ale. In 1354 he was exporting malt, flour, salt, and cloth to Norway and Germany, with the intent of bringing back a cargo of fish; a few years later his local tax assessment was well above the average. Whatever his business was, it also brought him in contact with London, for in 1364 he was being sued by a London hatter for an alleged debt of –200; the charge may be suspect, since two jurors in the case complained to the London authorities of an attempt by a goldsmith first to bribe them, then intimidate them, into bringing a false verdict in favour of the hatter. Reginald served as chamberlain in 1334/35 and as jurat in 1347/48, 1350/51, and during most of the period 1356-62.

Richard Thewyt acquired the franchise at Lynn (1385) through apprenticeship. His mercantile activities between 1391-96 show him exporting cloth and importing herring, wax, flax, iron, and canvas. He was of the middle rank in burgess society and his only office in local government came during the reform administration of 1411/12, after whose collapse he is rarely mentioned again.

Although he entered the merchant gild in 1328, little evidence remains of John de Thirsford's commercial activities. He served as bailiff 1349/50, was sent as one of the borough representatives to parliament in 1350, and held the office of chamberlain 1351/52, but is not known to have been a jurat. In 1351 he was a pledge for William, the son of Roger de Thirsford, when he became a burgess; William (a merchant) may have been John's brother.

That Richard de Thorpe was already active in commerce before he entered the franchise at Lynn in 1378 is suggested by the fact that he paid his entrance fee in the form of 800 herring. Herring were among the goods he was importing in 1391, along with linen, canvas, iron, and lumber; his exports recorded between 1387 and 1394 were cloth and woolfells. By 1385 he was renting from the merchant gild a tenement with a quay on the Ouse and a small property, probably for business use, at the common quay; from at least 1398 he was also leasing from the borough several shops at the market end of Damgate. He was a jurat for most of the period 1393-1416 and a constable of the Lynn staple during parts of the '90s.

Towards the end of his life he may have suffered financial reverses – additional to his loss of merchandize to pirates in 1412 – for by the end of that decade he was in arrears for the lease of the Damgate shops and continued so until his son took over responsibility for the property in 1424; by which time, Richard was, if not already dead, aged and incapable. He may have left debts, for ca.1431 his widow was receiving alms from the merchant gild. Ship's master William de Thorpe may have been a member of the same family.

John de Tidde entered the franchise at Lynn in 1387, probably at a relatively late stage in life, since he was already being differentiated by "senior" from another of the same name. He is not much in evidence in local records.

The John de Tilney mentioned in the 1392-93 customs account is difficult to pin down as there were several men of this name living in Lynn around this period. The John Tilney junior who supported the efforts of the reform party through his legal training and ties to the Bishop of Norwich would likely have been too young to be trading in 1392, and shows no evidence of commercial activity. Another townsman of this name was described as a brewer in the 1379 lay subsidy. The most likely candidate, however, is the draper who entered the franchise in 1377, just possibly a descendant of an earlier John de Tilney who was exporting cloth from Lynn in 1349. The cloth exporter of 1392 also imported herring in 1391.

Thomas Trussebut was only a few years into his merchant's career at the time his various export shipments were documented in the customs account of 1392-93; he having entered the franchise at Lynn in 1385, after apprenticeship to merchant John Lok. Customs records of 1391-95 show him heavily involved in the cloth export trade, while importing herring, garlic, canvas and flax. By 1400 he had his own ship. Much of the wealth he accumulated was invested in real estate in numerous rural areas in the vicinity of Lynn. He did not play a large role in local administration, except for the position of coroner from which he was removed in 1441 on grounds of old age and infirmity.

Although there appears to be no surviving record of Walter Urry's entrance to the Lynn franchise, his term as scabin of the merchant gild 1386-88 (and again 1396/97) and his brief presence among the jurats in 1388/89 and 1391/92, suggests a moderate importance in the town – possibly partly through family reputation (merchant John Urry having been mayor in 1358/59, and Ralph Urry the Bishop's steward at Lynn in the 1360s). Walter was commercially active by at least 1385, when his merchandize was arrested in Prussia.

John Wace came from East Rudham (a few miles north-east of Lynn), and was apprenticed to Lynn mercer Ralph de Colkirke. He paved the way to setting himself up in business by entering the franchise in 1371. Possibly some of his relatives had already preceded his migration to Lynn, since one of the citizens guaranteeing John would pay his freeman's entrance fee was mercer John de Rudham, and Wace later took on kinsman Thomas Rudham as his apprentice; furthermore he had relations in the mercantile Dunton family in Lynn (although perhaps by marriage). His mercantile activities in the 1390s are well-documented: he exported cloth, grain, herring, and salt, and imported dried fish, canvas, iron, lumber, paper, wax, ashes, and flax. He was a jurat during much of the 1380s and '90s, culminating in his mayoralty of 1396/97, after which he retired from local government, although in 1398 was a royal commissioner to organize a naval expedition against pirates plaguing the east coast. He died in 1399.

William Walden was described as a cordwainer in 1391, when the leet court fined him for breaking the ale assize. This aspect of his commercial activities was in evidence at his earliest appearance in the records, in 1375, when he was fined for regrating ale. Whatever the makeup of his business activities, he was doing well enough to have two servants, living with him, at the time of the poll tax in 1379. It was not until 1388, however, that he decided it advisable to purchase the benefits of freeman status. He continued to expand his horizons: in 1405 he was exporting large quantities of barley, oats, and wheat; and in 1412 he was trading with the Hanse and Norway.

Politically, he was an outsider until the reform movement led by Bartholomew Petypas; he served as chamberlain under one of its administrations (1412/13) and was closely enough tied to the reformers to be twice summoned to Chancery as one of the faction's spokespersons, in 1412 and 1415. After the failure of the reform movement, he was excluded from positions of authority, but appears to have continued to cling to his convictions. For at an assembly on March 5, 1421 when the levying of a new tax was on the agenda, he spoke up to urge that nothing be assessed on the poor, except for those able to contribute; the clerk made the point of describing him as "friend of the poor", suggesting he was already known for his championship of their interests. Possibly this was what led to him being elected as a common councillor for the following year, but his stint in office went no further.

The only further mentions of him during the 1420s are in the leet court, when fined for breaking the ale assize (described as a brewer), and later for blocking the road with dung on several occasions. The last reference to him is in 1430, when fined for failing to appear at the leet.

Robert de Walpole entered the franchise at Lynn in 1372, having completed an apprenticeship under his father, mercer Thomas de Walpole. In 1389 he was described as a draper. Later in the same month when he made his single export shipment of 1392 he was elected as chamberlain, never playing any more prominent role in borough government. Despite his specialization as draper/mercator, this was the only occasion he is seen dealing in cloth. In 1399 and 1400 he was exporting wool and woollens. In 1390 and 1391 he was importing wool, herring, and wax.

Although the surname Walsingham was well-represented in Lynn during the thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries (in the latter period providing 2 mayors), although not necessarily being a single family, and a Robert Walsingham vintner flourished 1415/1448, I find no other mention at Lynn of the Roger de Walsingham mentioned in the 1392-93 customs account.

Since an Adam de Walsoken was one of the more prominent of Lynn's merchants, twice mayor, before 1349, and a Walter Walsoken who entered the franchise in 1357 after completing his apprenticeship became a jurat in the 1370s, it is not impossible that the Adam who was mentioned in the customs account of 1392-93 was a descendant (although the earlier Adam's will mentions no sons); but since there are no references in borough records of late fourteenth century to an Adam de Walsoken, it is unlikely he was a resident of Lynn.

John Waryn was an established member of the merchant community of Lynn, having entered the franchise in 1365, served as jurat for most of the period 1376 to 1395 (when he died), and as mayor three times during the 1380s. He was already engaged in international commerce before he entered the franchise in 1365, having in 1364 imported salt from Brittany and exported ale, beans and peas to Flanders; he was taxed in Lynn, as a non-freeman, in 1357. This could explain why he had to pay for his entrance, but an equally likely reason is that he was an immigrant. He had become involved in the cloth trade by the 1390s and probably earlier – the lay subsidy of 1379 describing him as a mercer; but he was still quite diversified – as his several shipments recorded in the 1392-93 customs account shows. His imports included dried fish, wine (he holding a tavern near St. Margaret's and shops or taverns on the quayside) and probably iron. In 1384 he, Adam Waryn and others had lost a jointly-owned cargo of wine from Bordeaux to shipwreck.

He and Adam – who came from Aylsham (a few miles north of Norwich) – were probably related, although how closely is unknown. Adam was evidently the younger, having entered the franchise in 1377 (John acting as one of his guarantors), and serving as jurat frequently between 1386 and 1403. Beside his involvement in exporting cloth, Adam imported herring and was several times fined for breaking the assizes of ale and wine. He and John jointly leased from the community, two years after Adam entered the franchise, a property opposite St. Margaret's: possibly a business establishment, although perhaps a joint residence, for the two men were listed adjacently in the lay subsidy of 1379.

Thomas de Waterden was a merchant by apprenticeship and perhaps the most prominent member of an important local family, being already established in the ranks of the jurats and later to serve as mayor of the borough twice and as mayor of the Lynn staple. He would have been in his early 40s at the time of his export activity evidenced in the 1392-93 customs account. As this and other customs documents of the 1390s and early 1400s show, he was heavily involved in the cloth export trade, importing in return herring, tar, oil, lumber, iron and other goods from northern Europe. He lost two shipments to pirates in 1412.

He was one of Lynn's jurats for most of the period from 1383 to 1424, except for the period of the reform administration, of which he was one of the leading opponents. Although his exit from the jurats was a case of retirement, due to old age, there is no indication he lived much longer.

Thomas' master had been mercer Robert de Waterden, Thomas apparently being the first of a series of apprentices we know Robert took on, probably in January 1364 (since Thomas completed the apprenticeship and entered Lynn's franchise in January 1371). The two were probably kin, but the nature of their relationship is unknown. Robert may have been the Robert son of William Hard – Hard being an alternate surname associated with some members of the family in the fifteenth century – who entered the franchise in January 1364, having completed his apprenticeship to mercer Ralph de Colkirke. Robert was a jurat for much of the period between 1377 and 1399, when he died. He was also Thomas' predecessor in the office of mayor of the Lynn staple (1391-92, 1397-99). In 1375 he was exporting grain to Norway. His exports during the '90s were cloth, wool and woollens, but we know nothing of his imports.

John de Wentworth is another example of the rising young stars of the 1390s. He entered Lynn's franchise in 1382 and during the 1390s is seen exporting cloth (his 1391 exports far outstripped those listed in the 1392-93 customs account, being valued at £238.13s.4d) and importing salt; in 1406 he was importing wine. In 1403 he was sued by a London haberdasher. He entered jurat ranks in 1390 and remained there for most, if not all, of the period until 1413; during much of the 1390s he was also the town's coroner, and during the following decade served thrice as mayor. This both brought him into head-to-head conflict with the Bishop, over jurisdictional issues, and made him one of the chief targets of corruption charges levelled by the reform party. He it was who, in 1412, complained to the Bishop about the reform party expanding their own power base by giving the franchise to lesser members of the community, some mere shoemakers or tailors "worth only 1d." He probably died ca.1417.

John de Wesenham was apparently a member of a large, prominent and long-standing family of Lynn. A man of the same name had been one of the richest merchants of Lynn in the 1340s and served as King's Butler. Yet, if the John mentioned in the customs account of 1392/93 was the man who entered the franchise in 1387, the ancestry may not have been direct, since both John and his father, William de Wesenham, had purchased freeman's status, rather than earning it by birth. Yet evidently he was already wealthy, judging from the level of investment in the import/export trade, witnessed by several customs accounts between 1391-96: he was importing herring, iron, and wax, and exporting cloth. This is further evidenced in accounts of 1405-06, when he is seen partnering with William Lok, William Style, John Brandon and others), in the export of cloth and import of lumber, iron, eels, and herring. In 1407 and 1431 (and perhaps the intervening period) he was renting from the merchant gild land near the public quay for storage of lumber. He lost two shipments of imports from Norway and Dacia to pirates and shipwreck, respectively, in 1412. In 1428 one of his apprentices was trading for him in Prussia. Having entered jurat ranks by 1411, he later served twice as mayor and as alderman of the merchant gild 1424-33, probably dying in the mid-1430s.

John de Wormegay was probably a Lynn man, a member of a moderately prominent local family that also went by the surname Wyth. A man of this name who had been jurat frequently between 1357 and 1376 was still alive in 1391, but retired and therefore unlikely to have been the John mentioned in the 1392-93 customs account.

John de Yorke mercer purchased entrance to the Lynn franchise in 1387 and was another of the middle-ranking freemen in the same mold – so far as the sparse references to him allow us to say – as Creyk and Baldeswell, for example.

main menu

Created: August 18, 2001. Last update: October 31, 2003.

© Stephen Alford, 2001-2003

Herbert Losinga

Herbert Losinga or Losing, died 1119. Prior of the monastery of Fiscamp, in Normandy, and as some say, Prior of Bec in that dukedom, was in great favour with William Rufus, who brought him from Normandy, made him his chamberlain, and kept him in his court. Bale says, "First was he here in England by friendship made of Ramseye, and afterwards by-shop of Thetforde by flattery, and fat payment, in the year of our Lord 1091, for which he is named in the chronicles to this day, the kynelying match of Symony, and that noteth him no small doer in that feate:" for he gave on less then £1900 (a very large sum at that time) for the see, and had, during his friendship with the King, amassed such a sum, that he brought for Robert de Losing, his father, the abbacy of Winchester for £1000. He repented on that symony and decided to go to the pope to obtain absolution for it. He was stopped in the process of traveling and deprived of his pastoral staff, when in 1093 he was given the Kings consent he resigned his ring and staff to the Pope and was told to build certain churches and monasteries as penance, this he did in lavish style as the Norwich Cathedral, St Nichols's in Yarmouth, St Margaret's in Lyne, the Church of St Mary at North Elmham and that of St Leornards on the Hill and St Mary in the Marsh will testify. While there he obtained the Popes consent to remove his see from Thetford to Norwich, and on his return on April 9th 1094 did so with Thomas, Archbishop of York consecrating the ground on the same day as his return, this was most likely the Church of St. Michael on Tombland, which was the head church of the city.

Bartholomew Cotton, a monk of Norwich, gives him an excellent character, affirming him to have been a man learned in all parts of secular and divine learning, incomparably eloquent, and so very beautiful and grave that those who knew him not might discover him to be a bishop, the graces in his mind shining in his countenance, wise in all he did and said, faithful, charitable and honest, this brilliant character could not altogether said be true of a person who was branded as buying his title. Cotton had as much on his side for excuse as he could have, he being on in his order in Norwich, he excuses him from the symony by saying that the Scripture allows us " to redeem the time, because the days are evil," Eph. v. 16, and by the decretal which allows a clergyman to buy a right to a church of a layman, if he cannot otherwise obtain it.

From the memoir of William Herbert de Losinga, by the Rev.W.Spurdens, and published by the Norwich Archaeological Society in 1850, we gather many interesting particulars in respect of him. Mr. Spurdens says " The accounts transmitted to us respecting this Prelate by the ecclesiastical writers and chronicles of his age are so contradictory, so improbable, and some of them on which we cannot satisfactory rely. Still it is quite evident that Herbert was one of the remarkable men of the twelfth century: and hence we are led to desire a knowledge of all that can yet be recovered concerning him, his real character, and conduct. On investigation, we are surprised to find that his name has been misrepresented, Losinga, certainly formed no part of it, and was probably not applied to him till after his death, another add on was Galfaus.

Weever says: " Upon the death of Arfastus (the first Bishop of Thetford) one William Herbert, surnamed Galfagus, for the sum of nineteen hundred pounds, obtained from King William Rufus the Bishopric for himself, and the Abbey of Winchester for his father." His true name seems to have been William Herbert, son of Robert Herbert. The place of his birth also is not certain as Rev.W.Spurdens believes him to be born at his fathers manor at Syleham, in the Hundred of Hoxne, in the county of Suffolk, about the year 1045 and therefore an Englishman. He was then taken to Normandy for his education as before the conquest there were no schools, so the persons of wealth and station sent their sons to Abbeys in France and Normandy. Herbert therefore seems to have been sent to Fechamp with his education in mind and profited by the great promise shown by himself to such a degree that he was shown as a permanent figure to that institution. At what age he made religion his profession is not stated. He may have, possibly, have been occupied for a time, after the completion of his education, in wordily affairs; for a cloistered monk does not appear the best school for acquiring such an acquaintance with the court and with the world, as would qualify him for the office of Sewer to one monarch and of Chancellor to another. He does seem to have had a office under Duke Robert, as he certainly did under Rufus, who was so pleased with his service that he bought him over to England with him. In about the same year, 1087, Herbert was made Abbot of Ramsey and while he held that office he bought off Rufus the See of Thetford and the Abbey of Winchester. Having then gone to Rome and laid at the feet of the Pope and being reestablished in his See needs some explanation. Henry I was left with a dispute that had arisen with Rufus and Anselm, the Archbishop of Canterbury, about investitures, so was not on good terms with the Pontiff. So although Herbert had obtained his See, he had little in the way of spiritual rights from the Pope, a visit to Rome could secure both these rights he wanted. The journey was undertaken without the Kings consent and before Herbert could leave our shores he was arrested. The King took away his ring and pastoral staff but when he saw what he could gain from Herbert's visit to the Pope he reinstated him and let him go on his journey as a minister for peace.

Herbert seems to have been a good scholar and a good writer who was ahead of his time in all he did especially as an early diplomat. The monks of Norwich tried to have him canonized as a Saint this never came about but his work in the region is still there to be seen in all its reverence.

Goto Menu

East Anglia Network

editor@ean.co.uk

Best Viewed with:

Copyright © East Anglia Network 1997

37. King's Lynn, All Saints' Church, exterior, 15th century rebuilding on earlier site.
After William Taylor, The Antiquities of King's Lynn (London, 1844).

41. King's Lynn, St. James, Founded early 12th century, expansion in 14th century. Dismantling begun 1559. Engraving by Henry Bell, architect and alderman of Lynn. before 1682, showing remaining transept after the destruction of the nave. Now completely destroyed. After E.M. Beloe, F.S.A., Our Borough: Our Churches: King's Lynn, Norfolk (Cambridge, 1899).

Plate No. 36.]

ST. JAMES', LYNN.

[To face page 205.

ST. JAMES'—THE TRANSEPTS AND CENTRAL TOWER AFTER DESTRUCTION OF NAVE AND PINNACLE.

FROM ENGRAVING BY H. BELL.

ST. NICHOLAS CHURCH © Stanbury/Raguin/MMK

A chapel, in existence since the mid 12th century, was dependent on the parish church of St. Margaret's. An early Gothic chapel was built shortly after 1200. In 1379 and again in 1432, coinciding, it seems, with new building campaigns, the parishioners of St. Nicholas sued to have a christening font, to conduct marriages, and to perform the rite of purification after childbirth. Authority to perform these rites would have made "the chapel equal to the parish church" [Book of Margery Kempe, ch. 25: 1340-1381]. Margery's father John Brunham, as mayor, opposed the petition the first time it was brought, and Margery opposed the second. Margery has a revelation, an understanding in her soul, that though the parishioners behind this scheme would give a bushel of money, "thei schuld not have it" and because of her foreknowledge, "sche was the more bold top pteyn owyr lord to wythstonde her intent and to slakyn her bost" [1370]. (She was the more the more bold to pray our Lord to withstand their intention and to deflate their boasting.) The Book of Margery Kempe, trans. B. A. Windeatt (London: Penguin Books, 1985), based on The Book of Margery Kempe, British Library Additional Ms 61823, ed. Sanford Brown Meech and Hope Emily Allen (Early English Text Society, O.S. 212, 1940) Citations from The Book of Margery Kempe are from Lynn Staley, ed. TEAMS (Kalamazoo, MI, Medieval Institute Publications, 1996).

27. King's Lynn, St. Nicholas, south side. After William Taylor, The Antiquities of King's Lynn \(London, 1844\). Early work, 13th century, rebuilding ca. 1370. Most of the church's construction dates from 1421-3, chancel/choir, through the late 15th century, the south porch.
28. King's Lynn, St. Nicholas, west facade and tower.
29. King's Lynn, St. Nicholas, plan in 1425. After E.M. Beloe, F.S.A., Our Borough: Our Churches: King's Lynn, Norfolk (Cambridge, 1899).
30. King's Lynn, St. Nicholas, south aisle 1425-50.
31. King's Lynn, St. Nicholas, west window, now devoid of its glass, 1450s. Photograph from E.M. Beloe, F.S.A., Our Borough: Our Churches: King's Lynn, Norfolk (Cambridge, 1899).
32. King's Lynn, St. Nicholas, detail of angel roof in nave, ca. 1450s. Angle with lute.
33. King's Lynn, St. Nicholas, detail of angel roof in nave, ca. 1450s. Angle with flowered girdle.
34. King's Lynn, St. Nicholas, choir stall, 1418, now Victoria and Albert Museum, London. (Tracy 1990, pl. 87). After William Taylor, The Antiquities of King's Lynn (London, 1844).
35. Charter of John of Oxon, 1175-1200, Grant of St. Nicholas's Church to St. Margaret's (archives of the Dean and Chapter, Norwich Cathedral). After E.M. Beloe, F.S.A., Our Borough: Our Churches: King's Lynn, Norfolk (Cambridge, 1899).

36. Minutes of Council of the Borough of Lynn, 1 January 1432, text of letter sent to the Prior of Norwich requesting that St. Nicholas be granted authority to perform baptisms, marriages, and the “churching” of women (a ritual of purification after childbirth). After E.M. Beloe, F.S.A., Our Borough: Our Churches: King’s Lynn, Norfolk (Cambridge, 1899).

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 7

Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

The Petypas Affair (Lynn)

The catalyst for a new round of internal disputes in Lynn at the turn of the century was the legal battle between corporation and Bishop at the opening of the reign of Henry IV. A large element in the community considered this too costly and a threat to future good relations with the Bishop. Popular discontent was brought to a head by several factors:

- £864 of community money had found its way into the king's treasury, much of it never to be recovered, in the shape of goodwill loans;
- the increasing burden of petty expenses - many not strictly necessary, but an expression of civic pride and the dignity of borough government;
- bread shortages, blamed on trade abuses by the merchant class; and
- the move by the jurats, in the reign of Henry IV, to free themselves of the formality of annual election.

Taken together, all these served to provoke a hardened and organised resistance from the rank-and-file townsmen.^[73] In October 1403 the capital pledges refused to take their oath of office, and the mayor had to be summoned to persuade them. In 1404 the community refused to consent to the levying of a local tax, and disputes between "les grauntz Gentz" and the "poor commons" resulted in the imprisonment of 7 of the latter (one a freeman and most of the others identifiable as inferiores), who then petitioned the king for an enquiry into misgovernment. When a commission was appointed in 1406, however, it was to investigate the insurrections that had been erupting over the previous two years.^[74] The power of the community is suggested in a letter of about this time in which the mayor, instructing John Crosse to pursue certain business for the town only if he expected to be successful, complained that "The comones wil make no cost but if it myght availe."^[75]

Under the leadership of Bartholomew Petypas, the popular party won control of the administration in August 1411 by having its nominee, Roger Galyon, elected mayor. It is highly probable that this was managed by, as the potentiores later charged, Petypas and his multitude of supporters (predominantly non-freemen) taking over the electoral proceedings and abandoning the established method of election. Already in the first half of that year Petypas and his followers - especially William Halleyate, John Bilney, John Tilney, William Brycham, Philip Franke, and William Baret - had been causing trouble.^[76] The king heard the charges concerning the election, but let off Petypas with a warning. Encouraged, the reform administration began negotiating for a new charter, probably to embody desired constitutional changes - already Tilney had been sent to Oxford to learn of the method of mayoral election used there. In addition, it obtained royal approval of the traditional practice that the jurats should be elected annually.[77] By December 1411 there had been set up a special committee of 18 persons, comprising 7 jurats (one of them Brycham), 5 non-jurat freemen (including Petypas, Bilney, Baret, and Franke), and 6 inferiores (including Halleyate and Tilney). Partly deriving its authority from the 1309 composition, this committee was to re-audit the chamberlains' accounts of the last twelve years and draw up a settlement between parties. But in April 1412 five of the jurats, realising they could not control the committee, dissociated themselves, leaving the "greater part of the 18", on the principle of majority rule, to draw up the terms of the settlement. These terms were that:

- various past expenditures of the potentiores' administration,[78] particularly those of 1401/2 on the suit against the Bishop, were disallowed;
 - also disallowed were debts claimed from the community by five ex-mayors, from their terms of office;
 - the mayoral salary was to be limited to £10;
 - the mayor was to be held accountable in future for borough revenues;
 - a committee of three persons per class was to handle community rents; and
 - the protection accorded to the inferiores by the 1309 composition was re-confirmed.
- [79]

The potentiores, although at first promising to accept the award, spoke out against it in assembly in July, unsuccessfully sought the Bishop's help in August, and then took their case before the king. In preparation for the coming battle, the reform administration made 112 of the inferiores freemen two days before the elections of 1412. This ensured the re-election of Galyon by a more constitutional method than had been used in 1411, and with a minimum of resistance from the supporters of the potentiores (most of whom boycotted the election). Keeping closely in touch with Bishop Tottington, who evidently approved of the reformers' actions, Petypas and co. defended their case before the Chancellor, who referred the disputants back to the Bishop. This inevitably resulted in the potentiores complainants being obliged to agree to accept the award of the "greater part of the 18". Other potentiores followed suit, and further resistance was cowed by an assault on the Merchant Gild members at a June 1413 meeting. In secret, however, the original complainants began plotting against the reform administration.[80]

Their hopes were aroused by the accession of a new Bishop of Norwich in September 1413. By now Petypas himself had been elected to succeed Galyon as mayor, and he sent Bilney, Halleyate, and Tilney to London to determine the wishes of the Bishop. The potentiores used their influence to have Tilney arrested. Violence in Lynn was on the increase, some of it organised assaults on the potentiores, some seemingly mob action perhaps aimed at Fleming residents. Rumours circulated that the potentiores would interfere with the elections of August 1414. Petypas therefore held that election early, but this did not deter the potentiores from proceeding, in the presence of the county sheriff, with their own election - although the reformers did their best to disrupt this. Now the king intervened and both parties sent representatives before him. The result of his arbitration was a constitutional compromise known as the "New Ordinances". This settlement aimed at adopting features of London's constitution and electoral methods; the object was to guarantee the rights of all freemen to participate, to divide electoral power between the two estates of mediocres and potentiores, and to acknowledge the jurats as a life-membership body. This was put into effect immediately and fresh elections were held. A compromise candidate was elected mayor: John Lakinghithe, one of the oldest and most venerable townsmen; a jurat, but one who had acquiesced in the reform administration. It gradually became apparent, however, that Lakinghithe was only a front for a return to power of the potentiores. In January 1415 Petypas led his supporters in an armed attack on the potentiores in the town hall, and maintained the intimidation sufficiently to inhibit the holding of further corporation sessions for a while; although by March the jurats had recovered to the point where they were able to annul all the franchise entrances of inferiores between 1412-14, and go on to obtain an investigation which convicted Petypas and his lieutenants of various acts of violence, forcing them to go into temporary exile at Titchfield Abbey. A new committee was chosen to settle party differences, but was heavily overweighted with potentiores. Again appeal was made to the king, and it was decided that the Bishop and the Earl of Dorset should arbitrate.[81]

Meanwhile, it was time to elect a new mayor. The reformers managed to engineer the election of John Bilney; but the jurats, taking advantage of the episcopal interregnum consequent to the death of Bishop Courtenay, obtained from the king a writ ordering Robert Brunham (who, as gild alderman, had replaced John Lakinghithe when he died in office) to remain in the mayoralty. A furious populace forced Brunham to acquiesce in the swearing-in of mayor-elect Bilney, but Bilney was now himself unwilling to go against the king's wishes. The impasse was settled by further royal intervention, appointing as mayor Thomas Hunte (October 1415), "one zealous for peace and no disturber", whom the king hoped would be suitable to both parties.[82] In fact, Hunte subsequently requested the Bishop-elect to exile Petypas and his supporters from the town until the potentiores had argued their case against the reformers. He may have had some justification, in that a number of inferiores were still acting together, trying to disrupt Hunte's administration. The jurats, having already sent an agent to Norwich "to learn in what fashion they are governed in those parts", [83] persuaded the king to approve the revocation of the New Ordinances in June 1416. Petypas and Halleyate, seeing which way the wind was blowing, had already bought pardons for all treasons, rebellions, felonies, conspiracies, etc., in April.[84]

Still Petypas hoped to regain lost ground. In July 1416 he was regathering around him his old supporters, some of whom were still actively resisting Hunte's government; and he was seeking a customs post at Lynn, as a first foothold in a return to power. On August 12 he pleaded his case before the Bishop's Council, but could not prevent the election of John Wesenham as mayor by the pre-reform method. Nonetheless, the Bishop intervened and in 1418 a new settlement was drawn up. There is some suggestion that this restored the New Ordinances, with slight amendments favourable to the potentiores, but the overall effect was much as the Norwich composition of 1415 (with which the jurats were doubtless now familiar): recognising the jurats as a life-membership body, therefore independent of direct popular control; and counter-balancing this with the creation of a Common Council, but leaving the jurats with some measure of control over the membership of this lower council. [85] Petypas was still not happy, although his appeals to the Bishop in 1419 were largely a defence against the retributive measures brought by his old enemies. A few of his followers made an ineffective attempt to object to electoral procedure in that same year, but these were the die-hards, and Petypas' support had so dwindled that he gave up the fight, and was rewarded with a place in jurat ranks (1420).[86]

Previous interpretations of this affair have suffered from two things: lack of sufficient information[87] and a failure (due to want of space and time) to make a detailed examination of the membership of the contesting factions. We shall now try to redress the second, to some extent. Jeaffreson believed that the political crisis resolved essentially into conflict between the Merchant Guild and non-gildsmen. Harrod blamed the Bishop for exploiting hostilities between groups of townsmen, so as to consolidate his own lordship over the borough. Richards saw only an inexplicable personal rivalry between Petypas and John Wentworth, complicated by the ideas for political reform in Wycliffism. Hillen concurred with the former notion and, consistent at least with his interpretation of Lynn's political history generally, entirely blamed "the aggressive plutocrats and their turbulent partisans" for the disturbance of peaceful government. Green was largely responsible for Hillen adopting this interpretation, and she also maintained that, whilst the Common Council of Norwich was the product of a popular victory, that of Lynn was quite the opposite. Morey felt that this interpretation of a democracy vs. oligarchy battle was an over-simplification and that, although the economic distress of the urban lower classes (partly due to the corrupt and monopolistic practices of the potentiores) was a causal factor, hostility towards the Bishop complicated matters, so that the memberships of the opposing factions do not fit neatly into the tripartite class divisions.[88] It is here believed that some clarification can result from an investigation of the personnel involved in the Lynn affair, just as similar investigation throws light on the Ipswich crisis of 1320/1.

The names of a large number of the participants are known from the charter recording the agreement of the three classes (December 1411) to submit to the impending award of "the 18"[89]: 23 potentiores, 83 mediocres, and 66 inferiores were signatories to this agreement. Of these inferiores, 75% subsequently entered the franchise between 1412 and 1414, and 101 other inferiores were also made freemen in the same period.[90] Most of the 112 freemen created in August 1412 paid no fine, for it was claimed that they were entering as apprentices; the few fines that were paid ranged from 3s.4d to 20s. (6s.8d being the most common) - much lower than the customary 40s.[91] Previously, artisans' apprentices had not been permitted the free entrance granted to merchants' apprentices, and perhaps this was one of the grievances of the lower classes - as indeed it was in 1424/5, when artisans' apprentices were granted equal rights to those of merchants. In support of this we may note that in 1415 the corporation was advised, with regard to the inferiores entrants, that it was ancient custom for apprentices to pay 40s. entrance fine, although practice shows this to have been far from true. The 1424/5 ordinance shows that the reform party had achieved something, if only in reviving democratic consciousness in the community: Robert Brod, an inferior entrant of 1412, argued on behalf of the artisan apprentices "quod est una libertas in villa, unum iuramentum et unum finem

(sic)."[92]

The signatories of 1411 evidently represent only a minority, if a large one, of the total population. Not included in their number are 39 of the men who entered the franchise between 1399 and 1410 and whom we might reasonably expect to be alive c.1412. Nor are 23 of the burgess entrants of 1414/5 listed earlier among the inferiores, although the prominence of merchants among these entrants suggests that some at least were supporters of the potentiores brought in to redress the imbalance in the electorate.[93] A few important names, such as Roger Galyon and Robert Botkesham (possibly on his death-bed), are also not among the signatories. However, since it was obviously to the advantage of peace in the town to have as many as possible of the active participants in the dispute agree to the settlement, the names that we possess are likely to be a good indicator of the character of the hostilities. Not that we should assume that the three classes, as separately listed in 1411, necessarily represent the lines of division of opinion, and that this was a demarcation between Merchant Guild and craft guilds. True, the potentiores were all merchants, with the apparent exception of one of unknown occupation,[94] yet the majority of the mediocres of known occupation also were merchants, whilst even among the inferiores were a handful of merchants, although most of this last group - mercers and spicers - may have been little more than shopkeepers.[95]

The potentiores were in fact 23 of the jurats; this suggests a political rather than an economic struggle. Even though the missing 24th jurat, Roger Galyon, was the mayor of the reform administration, and jurats William Brycham and Richard Thorpe were among the supporters of Petypas,[96] whilst a few other jurats were not overly hostile to the reform administration, the majority more or less stood together in passive resistance.[97] The potentiores did have a little support from other burgesses, but it is difficult to establish identities, or what proportion of the mediocres gave this support. Of the mediocres, 2 were from jurat families, but 26 either held office under the reform administration or were associated with the reformers in other ways. The evidence suggests that it was not mere propaganda when Petypas claimed to have the support of the majority of the burgesses.[98] It may be that the inferiores, being the most aggrieved and the most removed from the interests of the jurats, supported the reformers almost to a man, particularly given the pro-episcopal stance of both groups; certainly, of the 38 men ordered arrested for opposing mayor Hunte in 1415, 26 were former inferiores. [99]

In fact, the source of active opposition to the reform party came principally from the elite clique of ex-mayors within jurat ranks - precisely the group blamed by the reformers for the financial maladministration of the previous decade or so. These men stood to lose a good deal of money, should the reformers triumph. Since financial matters sit at the hub of the grievances of, and the resistance to, the reformers, we must not entirely ignore occupational divisions. The potentiores do represent, not merely merchants, but the interests of the large-scale, international commercants, whilst the inferiores are clearly overwhelmingly artisan in composition.[100] It is again a question of scale - that is, the degree of combination of political power and wealth - rather than strict occupational divisions on an institutional (i.e. gild) basis. Yet the resentment against the growth of political privilege for the wealthier segment of the community would have lacked effective expression were it not for the small group spearheading reform. Their identities are as much a clue to the nature of the affair as are the aggregate identities of the three classes.

Bartholomew Petypas, the driving force behind the reform party, appears to have been of the same social and economic status as the potentiores, although the only local office he is known to have held before the democratic 'coup' is that of scabin of the Merchant Guild, a role that may have given him privileged access to knowledge of the behind-the-scenes workings of borough finances. He entered the franchise in 1392 as merchant-apprentice of jurat John de Botkesham, kinsman of the Robert de Botkesham who was one target of the reformers' complaints. In 1405 Petypas was exporting cloth, and importing iron, timber, stone, and oil. Like Ipswich's John de Halteby, he seems to have preferred to exercise power from behind the throne, and probably only took the mayoralty in 1413 for want of any other strong helmsman at a time when the reformers' hold on government was increasingly precarious. When, after the failure of his efforts to hold together his supporters as funds dwindled, royal intervention broke his grip on Lynn's government, and the institution of the Common Council undermined his position, he bowed to the inevitable re-establishment of potentiores dominance. He was then allowed to take his proper place in their ranks and to serve as M.P. several times before his death c.1432, causing no further trouble for his former opponents.[\[101\]](#)

Petypas' right-hand man was William Halleyate, also a merchant, but not apparently on the scale of the potentiores. Halleyate was a customs collector in Lynn from 1408. He was one of the bailiffs from c.1393 to c.1401 and, as such, possibly an agent of the Bishop, although it is more likely that he was one of the king's bailiffs; with regard to his possible ties to the Bishop, we may note that the inquisitions of 1415 described him as "of Gaywood", the Bishop's manor, and he was an inferior before August 1412. He twice acted as M.P. on behalf of the reform administration, and frequently travelled on its errands to the Bishop and to London, where he may have owned a residence. After the disintegration of the reform party, he was given no office in Lynn and in fact rarely appears in the records, although still alive in 1420.[\[102\]](#)

John Tilney junior too may be suspected of being an agent of outside interests. An inferior in 1411, he was identified in 1414 as dom. John Tilney, clerk of the Bishop of Norwich, and was also a servant of the admiral Duke of Exeter, representing his (property) interests in Lynn and acting as his deputy in the Court of Admiralty. Tilney was principally a lawyer, although variously described as magister, clerk, bachelor-of-law, esquire, gentleman, and husbandman. As such, he served the reform party as legal advisor, scribe of documents too important to be entrusted to the town clerk (who appears sympathetic to the potentiores - or, at least, of the established order), and representative of the party's interests in parliament at four sittings. He had some mercantile interests, his father probably being the wool-merchant who entered the franchise as a draper in 1377, whilst John junior's own son was apprenticed to tailor/merchant Adam White at about the time that White was chamberlain for the reform administration. Thanks probably to his high-level contacts, the failure of the reformers was no serious blow to his career, and he subsequently became involved in the royal administrative network, notably as customs officer at Lynn and Yarmouth 1425-35.[\[103\]](#)

John de Bilney, the last of Petypas' lieutenants, was another merchant, dealing in cloth and fish, and just possibly another servant of Exeter. Bilney had become a freeman, and thereby a mediocre, in 1403, a move not inhibited by the fact that he was a resident of South Lynn. His political fortunes rose and fell with the reform party: selected to represent it in parliament c.24 October 1411, he was replaced a few days later; he was elected one of the community prolocutors in 1413, but the post did not outlast the reform administration; he was returned to the parliament of 1414, but suffered a further disappointment when the king quashed his election as mayor in 1415; nor did his stint as jurat outlive the reform administration. He is not heard of after 1415, although it may have been a son, Geoffrey, who was councillor 1418-20 and spokesman for the reform die-hards in 1419.[104]

Finally, mention should be made of Roger Galyon, although more a figurehead than the active participants that the above four were. Cloth-merchant, several times royal commissioner, and customs officer in Lynn 1395-1406, he may have been selected as the reform party's first mayor simply because he was a jurat, and one who either supported, or at least did not oppose, their aims. His motives in this are made suspect by certain aspects of his behaviour. That he courted power is hinted at by his (unsuccessful) competition with John Brandon to secure a customs posts at Lynn in the 1390s, and by his arrest of the horses of one Hans Leche without due legal process or the authority of the mayor (1404). Yet he was unreliable, twice failing to act on the king's commission, and twice charged with embezzling customs money. He was also convicted of forestalling wool in 1400. One of the most junior members of the jurats when he threw in his hand with the reformers, it may be that he therefore felt no great loyalty to the potentiores, although it would be unjust to discount the alternate possibility of genuine sympathy with the reformers' grievances. We may note, however, that when he was summoned, as mayor, to answer before Chancery for the troubles in Lynn, the reformers were unwilling to let him go as their spokesman, preferring to send others. He also seems to have played little role in affairs once his mayoralty had ended, and remained a jurat after the potentiores' restoration, until his death in 1418.[105]

The Lynn conflict thus contrasts with that at Ipswich in 1320/1, in that the ringleaders of reform in Lynn do not seem to have sought to displace the objectionable town rulers in order to clear the way for their own exercise of power; although their failure, contrasted with the success of Halteby, Preston, and Costyn, could disguise such motives. Yet, although the reform movement may be said to have failed in terms of the careers of Petypas and co., arguably it had more effect on the total personnel of government than the affair at Ipswich. This we may see from study of the political careers of the groups involved in the Lynn disputes. Of the 23 potentiores: four died during the course of the affair, from natural causes as far as may be determined, although the rough treatment that the elderly mayor Lakinghithe received under the feet of the insurgents in January 1415 may have hastened his death a few months later; three others held no further office after the local re-adeption.[106] This replacement rate conforms to the normal rate we have already calculated;[107] therefore, we cannot infer any political disgracings, like those of Stace and le Rente at Ipswich. Fifteen of the potentiores remained jurats, several proceeding to the mayoralty; whilst a sixteenth (Ralph Bedingham), who had been deposed in 1413, was restored to office. Of the 86 mediocres, 15 had held office prior to the affair (most as chamberlains); 12 of these 15 continued to be active in borough government, and 39 others also held office. This is partly explicable by the fact that most of the subsequent office-holders were from the younger mediocres, who entered the franchise in the early 1400s. Yet several were older, and William Walden, a chamberlain of the reform administration, had been a freeman since 1388.[108] The evidence is more striking when we turn to the 167 inferiores. Bearing in mind that the important offices were restricted to freemen, and that many of the inferiores later entered the franchise,[109] we may note that only 2 of them held office prior to 1412 (one being Halleyate), whereas 32 held office during the reigns of Henry V and Henry VI. The increased political involvement of mediocres and ex-inferiores owed much to the creation of the Common Council, itself a by-product of the reform movement,[110] for it employed 55 of them at one time or other. Yet 19 mediocres and 2 ex-inferiores also became jurats, and 4 mediocres and 1 ex-inferior rose to the mayoralty. This strengthens the impression that men of capability and ambition could rise from the lower to the upper ranks of urban society, although circumstances dictated that this was not (nor should we expect it to be) a common occurrence. More importantly, it seems that, in terms of the number of burgesses participating in Lynn's administration from c.1418 onwards, the borough government cannot easily be categorised as an oligarchy.

The effects of the reform movement were not great, but neither were they negligible, in providing for a new avenue of political promotion and in giving new expression to the traditional and democratic sentiments of community authority, seemingly quiescent for a century. Yet if those sentiments seem to have been dormant it is partly the fault of comparison with the revitalisation of politics in Lynn in the time of Henry VI. Critics may suggest that the Common Council was an impotent organ of government, its membership under the censorial control of the ruling elite, and therefore not truly representative but designed as a sop to the mediocres to break their alliance with the inferiores. Yet in fact it seems quite as powerful as the more nebulous 'institution' of the community had been previously - a limited power, admittedly - although its sphere of influence was primarily restricted to financial affairs.[111] The censorship powers of the mayoralty, regarding membership of the Council, do not seem to have been used, let alone abused. The Council was elected by non-freemen as well as freemen, and was thus more representational than any previous institution;[112] and it served to involve in some measure of decision-making a larger proportion of the population than would otherwise have been inclined to participate. Nor was the existence of the lower council used as an excuse to exclude others of the community from assemblies, for we occasionally find large attendances, as on 21 March 1457, when there was only one, but an important, piece of business: the reading out of the borough constitution.[113] We need not pretend that the community had emerged from the affair of the early fifteenth century unscathed; its position was compromised in that authority was now divided between two separate political estates. But this was essentially an adjustment of the political theory to a pre-existent political reality, and the only alternative to this solution was continued and irreconcilable hostilities, punctuated only by interludes of exhaustion or royal custodianship.

← previous

next →

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

[\[MAIN MENU\]](#)

Lynn by-laws

1309

View of frankpledge

Farm of the leet

Attachments by bailiffs

Weights and measures

The husting

Testaments

Waste land

Quays

Freedom to buy and sell

Town statutes

Aliens

Liberty of inhabitants

Immoderate tallages

1315

Assessment of taxes

1331

Wandering pigs

1340

Most titles (in the left-hand frame) have been supplied by me. A few are based on titles given in original documents (e.g. the compilation of the 1420s), which I include following the date of approval of the ordinance.

- Items marked * are from the composition between Bishop and burgesses in 1309; I have used a copy written about a century after the original.
- Items marked  are from a single but certainly incomplete list of market ordinances copied from other sources in the early 15th century. That they are written in English also argues for a relatively late date; however, the issues they address are so common that the ordinances could have been made at any time during the 14th century.
- Items marked  were part of the aforementioned compilation begun in the 1423/24 mayoral year [KL/C9/1 ff.15-18b], and seem to have been mostly gathered from Hall Books (from where I have sought the dates of the individual ordinances) for inclusion in a register of oaths, ordinances and freemen's entrances.

Where to sell grain

1342

Chamberlains

1345

Imported timber

1358

Mayoral government

1361

Carrying of holy water

1363

Hosting

Date of elections

1368

Payment of taxes

Forestalling

1372

Pilotage fee

Late appearance at assembly

Payment of taxes

1374

Resistance to taxation

1377

Late appearance at assembly

1378

Expenses of tax assessors

Expenses of the leet

Hosts' shares

1379

Community business

Seating in assembly

1381

Silence in assemblies

Brokerage

Community share in merchandize

Creation of a special fund

1382

Hosts' shares

1385

Franchise by patrimony

1386

Apprenticeship

Officers' shares in merchandize

1390

Repairs to pavement

Use of conduits

Ignoring a summons

Ringling of bells

1391

Community ladders

Accounting for taxes

1393

Tax assessment

early 15th century

Hoarding grain

Forestalling

Spoiled meat

Ale sellers

Sale of fish by fishermen

Sale of fish by hostelers

Sale of dairy products

Wandering pigs

Street cleaning

Nightwatch

1420

Disclosure of town secrets

Constitutional matters

1423

Sale of meat

Giving holy bread

Late appearance at assembly

Manucaptors

Sale of meat

Absence of chamberlains

1424

Recording of judgements

Slaughtering animals

Impleading without licence

1425

Enfranchisement of apprentices

Participation in Burghard's obit

Discipline in assemblies

Opposing the liberties

Chamberlains defaulting in duties

1426

Fishing without licence

Charge for refuse disposal

1430

Cleaning of fleets

1431

Cleaning of ditches

1432

Use of the common mill

1439

Disposal of entrails

1443

Place for buying victuals and coal

1444

Transport of offal

1445

Confiscation of grain ground outside town

1446

Coopers

Churchwardens

1448

Mayor's reward

1449

Regulation of tailors' trade

Engaging servants

Using shod carts

1455

Frequency of being mayor

1456

Concealment of leet offences

1457

Nightwatch

1459

Gaol delivery

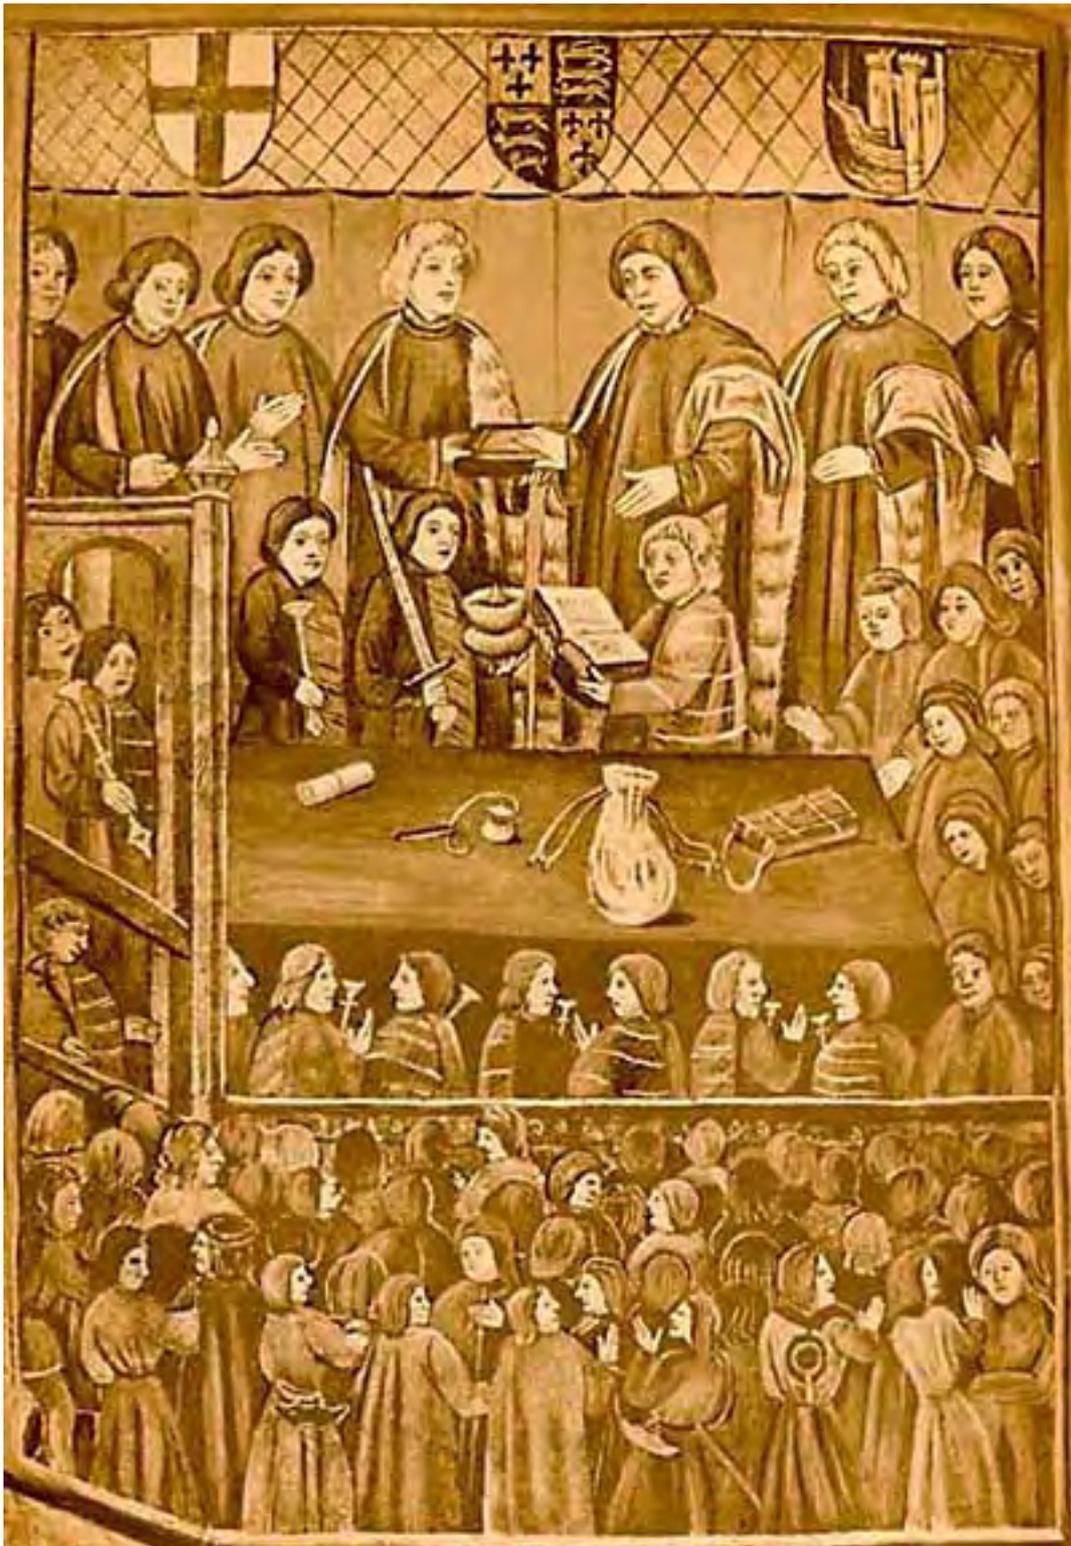

1461

Defence of the town

[\[contents\]](#)

About the title illustration

The title was created using an illustration from 15th century Bristol and images of two leading townsmen of 14th century Lynn, reconstructed (i.e. images inverted and colourized) from their memorial brasses.

Swearing in the mayor of Bristol

This is one of the illustrations from "The Maire of Bristowe Is Kalendar" a leather-bound paper volume among the Bristol archives, begun in 1479 by town clerk Robert Ricart, at the instructions of mayor William Spencer and the town council, and was intended to serve as a custumal and register of important "remembrances", although it is more commonly known for the chronicle it includes, covering events in national and local history throughout the Middle Ages.

The illustration above precedes the "Fourth Principalle" [part] of the volume, intended to describe the borough government and its duties, including electoral procedures and the oaths of officers. It shows the administration of the oath of office to mayor William Spencer at Michaelmas, 15 days after his election; it was at this point that the ceremony of transition of power took place. The illustration is a rare example of a contemporary depiction of borough government; the original is coloured.

With the Guildhall windows behind them decorated with the emblems of England, the Crown, and the borough behind – reminders of loyalties – the leading members of the corporation are gathered on the dais in the Guildhall. The five figures most prominent in the picture, and are shown by their dress – scarlet gowns trimmed with fur, and cloaks – to be former mayors (Spencer having served in the office twice previously). Spencer has his hand on the Bible while taking his oath of office. Technically the oath is administered by the man holding the Bible, outgoing mayor John Shipward, who had immediately before this given the traditional farewell speech which included an introduction of the new mayor. However, it was the town clerk (immediately in front of Spencer) who read out the text of the oath from one of the borough registers; whether the mayor repeated this or merely assented to it is unknown, but at its close he kissed the Bible to show that he took the oath seriously. Since Ricart was first elected town clerk in 1479, probably at the same time as Spencer's election, he may be the individual here depicted holding the open book; however, as officers other than the mayor did not take their oaths of office until the day following Michaelmas, this might be Ricart's predecessor Thomas Osney.

This scene and ceremony was probably being repeated in many English towns around this time. For example, on Michaelmas day 1420, at Lynn, a congregation in the Guildhall witnessed outgoing mayor John Wesenham make a farewell speech in which, while declaring his unworthiness for the high position to which he had been appointed, he stated that he had done his best during his year in office and thanked his colleagues and the burgesses in general for their support. Mayor-elect John Spicer was then administered his oath of office by the town clerk, after which the jurats and chamberlains took their oaths.

The other ex-mayors of Bristol shown on the dais probably include John Bagod and Robert Strange. Flanking them, at either extreme of the picture, are unknown officers who might, however, be the outgoing and newly-elected sheriffs of the city, or perhaps they are the Steward and the Recorder, whose presence (as the city's chief legal adviser) at this ceremony would likely have been considered desirable. Two lesser officers are also in evidence, standing in front of Shipward; these are the sergeant-at-mace and the sword-bearer. At the conclusion of the oath-taking, the outgoing mayor handed over to the new mayor the sword (representing the dignity and power of the mayor as a lieutenant of the king), the hat of office (also seen here held by the sword-bearer), and a casket bearing the common seal and other official seals. The parchment scroll, pen and ink-pot, and bag of money on the table seem to symbolise the legal records of the city and its treasury, while the remaining (right-most) item is probably the case in which the Bible was kept.

The arrangement of the crowd in the hall reflects socio-political status. The group equivalent to Lynn's nobiles de banco have the place of honour on the dais, with the bureaucratic servants of the borough immediately at hand but not apparently on the dais. Surrounding the table or chest in the centre of the room are the aldermen (town councillors) at right and town sergeants (judging from their liveries and the staffs of office), some possibly seated on benches. Further back from events, and apparently separated from them by a wooden barrier as well as the row of sergeants, are the members of the community who have come to witness the proceedings of this key ceremony in communal life.

Adam de Walsoken

Walsoken was a village on the Norfolk border, near Wisbech, ten miles to the southwest of Lynn. Whether it was Adam or a descendant who emigrated to Lynn is unknown; the family name is not much in evidence in Lynn and the Geoffrey de Walsoken who held a tenement in Briggegate in the late thirteenth century need not have been an ancestor, although Adam is found with property in the same street.

If we may trust the evidence of the national taxation of 1332, Adam was the wealthiest man in Lynn at that time; the assessment of his goods – £20 – was the highest in the town (the average being £2.19s.1d). He was a merchant who dealt in wool and who served as collector of a royal tax in wool in 1338 and collector of national wool customs for a brief stint in 1340; like most other merchants he also dealt in other goods and in 1333/34 the community bought two barrels of sturgeon from him.

His beginnings may have been more humble, if he was the cobbler who became a freeman of Lynn in 1302, although the valuation of his goods for purposes of a local tax in 1305 (£13.6s8d) indicates he was already fairly prosperous. In 1309 he was amerced by the leet court for using non-standard measures to sell goods.

By the end of his life he had acquired substantial property in Lynn. His residence was in Damgate, probably at the northwest corner; 5 adjacent shops were part of this property. He also held other property in the same street, in Finneslane (later Tower Street) with a quay on the Purfleet, on both corners of Wingate where it ran into Briggegate, shops on the Stone Bridge (where Briggegate crossed the Purfleet), and a concentration of property at the north end of Briggegate where it entered the Tuesday Market – including 11 shops and tenements in Cook Row, Jews Lane and Gresmarket. Possibly he was also the Adam de Walsoken who acquired a messuage in Norwich (St. Mary Coslany parish) in 1333.

Adam served on the town council of jurats in 1325/26 and frequently as one of the ward constables between then and 1341 – Jewslane ward was where he lived. By that time he had already been elected as mayor of Lynn (1335/36) and was so again in 1343/44; during the 1340s he was one of the leading jurats.

The Black Death brought an end to his life at the beginning of the summer of 1349, survived by his second wife Margaret and daughter Joan. No sons are mentioned in his testament (although this is not unusual); a Walter Walsoken who was jurat in the 1370s might perhaps have been an underage son, although this is unlikely given Adam's advanced age at his death (at least 60). Thomas atte Bek of Cley-next-sea, another recipient of property in the testament and one of Adam's executors, may have been a son-in-law; he moved to Lynn in the 1350s. The brass over Adam's tomb in St. Margaret's church shows him with his first wife, also named Margaret, who may have been a daughter of John de Merlowe (several times mayor between 1294 and 1311).

Robert Braunch

Robert Braunch represents the next generation along from Adam de Walsoken, although their lives overlapped and they certainly knew each other. Robert joined Adam on the town council during the 1340s. As a survivor of that initial, most devastating strike of the plague, Robert's existing experience in borough administration – he having also twice served as chamberlain and, very soon after his initial terms as chamberlain, was called on to serve a couple of years as the equivalent officer (scabin) of the Merchant Gild – was doubtless a factor in his election to the mayoralty in 1350/51. He was again mayor in 1360/61; between those two terms, and thereafter until his death, he had a permanent seat among the jurats.

Unlike the case of Adam, Robert's family name is well represented in Lynn, from late thirteenth to late fifteenth century (although we cannot of course be certain that all with this surname were related). John Braunch, a wool merchant of the generation preceding that of Adam de Walsoken, was already prosperous before he became a member of the Merchant Gild in 1293; he too served as chamberlain, gild scabin and jurat in several of the years during the period 1304-1323. His son William was manucaptor for (brother?) Thomas Braunch, when the latter and John were among a large number of townsmen charged in connection with the attack on Robert de Monthalt. Possibly one of these, or the Hugh Braunch who was jurat in 1325/26 and scabin 1327-30, might have been Robert's father. Robert's nephew, of the same name, entered the franchise in 1348 under his sponsorship, and an Ancelm Braunch entered the franchise two years later (and later in the decade served as chamberlain and jurat). Although this entrance took place only days after Robert had begun his first mayoralty (a suspicious sign), since Ancelm, a merchant trading in grain and ale, paid for his entrance – rather than receiving it by patrimony – and has no mention in Robert's testament (although Ancelm's own last appearance in the records was three years previous – he may have been a victim of the first revisitation of the plague in 1361), we cannot be certain of a relationship. The family name reappears in the fifteenth century, when we hear of a William Braunch, son of another Robert Braunch, selling off Lynn property in 1428; by 1446 he had moved into the ranks of country gentry, with the epithet "esq." and lands in Lynn, Wiggshall, Islington and Terrington. Tempore Edward IV, a Thomas Braunch was settled in South Lynn.

The Robert Braunch depicted here is first seen in 1328, when he purchased a membership in the Merchant Gild. As a merchant, he is found trading in cloth, iron, leather, cotton, wax and silver ca. 1337 (when he and others complained to the king that their merchandise, to the value of £360, had been arrested in Bruges); and in the 1350s was exporting large quantities of wheat to the Low Countries. In 1333 he and associate John de Massingham (whose widow Ancelm Braunch later married) were described as "king's merchants" when licensed to take corn to Norway to trade for stockfish.

Robert was twice married; his second wife, Margaret, died after he had drawn up his will (April 1361) at the time of the second outbreak of plague. Surviving this too, he adjusted for his wife's death by making a codicil a few days before his own death on 15 or 16 October 1364. His executors were his apprentices, his only visible heir was his daughter Joan. A tenement on the river bank was to be sold to cover the costs of his funeral, obit and charitable works, while another (acquired by him ca. 1356) situated on Wingate near St. Margaret's church was to go to Joan; associated with this property was a ferry-boat right, which she arranged in 1378 would, after her death, pass to the Lynn community, in return for the borough celebrating the anniversary of Robert, his wives, sons and daughters. Robert was buried in the choir of St. Margaret's, where his brass shows him flanked by his wives Leticia and Margaret.

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 1

The Structure of Borough Government

The Executive Office

To turn now to a closer look at the administrative structure suggested by the archival structure, we must first note that, despite the diversity in titles of office from town to town, [\[20\]](#) medieval borough government may be reduced to the essentials of executive, financial department, conciliar devices, and bureaucracy. The first of these levels to become apparent is the executive, but our knowledge of it is very sketchy before the first royal charter grants. It has already been suggested that the Merchant Guild had a relatively important role during the nascent period of borough self-government. We may suspect that its role was no less in earlier times, for there was no other institution that was both representative of the interests of at least an important part of the community and sufficiently organised to speak for those interests, as in negotiation with the king for taking their towns to fee farm.[\[21\]](#) Ipswich and Yarmouth seem to have had such a guild at the time when they received their first charters, and there is reason to believe this the case with Lynn and Norwich too.[\[22\]](#)

Before these charters the towns were governed by royally-appointed reeves, whose basic duties were: to arrange the collection of revenues with which they were to pay the firma burgi; to preside in the court; and to execute royal commands. Although local men, they were required to put the interests of the king before those of the community. Some of Colchester's reeves are known from the Pipe Rolls and the earliest (1137) from a charter's witness list. There is evidence that a moothall stood on the site of the modern Town Hall since at least the time of the first charter in 1189.[\[23\]](#) Although Swinden claimed evidence of a reeve in Yarmouth by 1108, the first we can be sure of is the Abraham who ran into trouble with the king, in 1198, for overstepping his authority.[\[24\]](#) And the Ipswich reeve Elias probably held office prior to the 1200 charter; we cannot be sure, but he may have been the Elias who complained to the king, in 1212, of the innovations of the now-independent borough government and who was shortly thereafter murdered by a group of burgesses. It may also be that the Thingstead, just outside Ipswich's walls, recalls an early site of the community's folkmoot; but by 1200 the churchyard of St. Mary Tower was the site of that meeting, whilst the moothall was built adjacent to the site of St. Mildred's, itself an ancient dedication with governmental associations.[\[25\]](#)

The effect of royal charters granting self-government was not to alter radically the existing executive structure but to place the executive more under control of the borough community. [26] Whether the size of the executive remained unchanged is less certain. The careful recording of administrative arrangements made in Ipswich, immediately after the grant of the 1200 charter, leave us in no doubt that Ipswich was governed by two bailiffs.[27] In the absence of contradictory evidence we are safe to assume that Yarmouth had, from at least the time of its charter (1208), four bailiffs to correspond to the four leets, themselves administrative divisions rather than a memory of separate original settlements (unlike in Norwich).[28] The evidence for pre-charter reeves in Colchester, already mentioned, suggests that the town was always governed by two bailiffs,[29] whilst the only evidence we have to doubt that Norwich's four bailiffs existed since the 1194 charter is the unsubstantiated statement of Blomefield that the four replaced a single officer in 1223.[30] Where doubt arises is in the terminology of royal documents. That Yarmouth's 1208 charter granted that a prepositus (singular) be elected, and Norwich's of 1194, while granting the election of prepositi, allowed for the execution of withernam by the prepositus, has led scholars to speculate that some or all of the four bailiffs of each of these towns originated as subordinates of the pre-charter reeve, and that even in the post-charter period one of the bailiffs sometimes appears to possess a seniority.[31] Some later royal documents also refer to the provost of Yarmouth or even the 'provost and bailiffs', and a similar division was occasionally made by the locals, as late as 1456 when a royal writ was replied to by Edmund Wydewell prepositus and Alexander Brygate ballivus. [32]

Despite the lack of evidence for a qualitative division of labour between individual members of the executive, and the notorious inconsistency of royal clerks in their use of titles when addressing communications to local officials - they do not appear to have known, or perhaps cared, much about local constitutional arrangements - it is hard to avoid this notion of seniority. Ipswich's 1200 charter specified that two men be elected to govern the town, yet it included the standard phrase granting that the town answer for the fee farm by the hand of its prepositus. In 1349 we find reference to John de Preston as capitalis ballivus. [33] Clerical practice of consistently listing bailiffs (of all those four towns currently considered) in the same name order fuels our suspicions. However, we must not ignore another possibility. When Ipswich elected its first bailiffs in 1200, it was not as prepositi but "ad custodiendum preposituram", a phrase that received royal approval in the charter of 1317. [34] It is just possible that the use of prepositus by royal clerks was, at least on occasion, intended as a generic reference to the executive office, rather than to a specific number of officers.

Discussion of Lynn and Maldon has been left until last since, as already suggested by the architecture of archival evidence, their courses of development are somewhat different, complicated by a division of dominion; whereas our other four towns knew no lord but the king. A further difference - although the significance of it, as regards the executive, is not apparent - is that Maldon and Lynn lack the quadrapartite division of the other towns. The origin of these divisions varies: at Yarmouth it may have been the outcome of leet administration; at Ipswich and Colchester it relates to the town gates and perhaps to watch and ward; at Norwich there was a topographical rationale. Maldon comprised three parishes: All Saints' and St. Peter's being in the diocese of London, and St. Mary's a peculiar jurisdiction of St. Martin-le-Grand (London); within these were scattered four concentrations of settlement. [35] The size of Maldon's population probably did not warrant administrative sub-division. Lynn was made up of four main units: South Lynn and West Lynn, in existence by 1086, but not part of the medieval borough in terms of jurisdiction and administration; Bishop's Lynn, founded in 1101 when the Bishop of Norwich built St. Margaret's at the request (and probably the expense) of the men already settled there; and Newland, a planned town set out by Bishop Turbe at uncertain date in the early part of his episcopacy (1146-74) to accommodate a growing population. [36] Although united about the time of the grant of the first charter of liberties (1204), previously Bishop's Lynn and Newland each had its own church, market, quay, and hall of administration. The chapel of St. James, to the east of St. Margaret's, probably represents population growth before the setting up of Newland. At some time after 1204 Lynn was divided into ten constabularies, [37] reduced in the fourteenth century to nine, perhaps a consequence of reduced settlement in the area of St. James.

The two bailiffs who headed Maldon's government in the fifteenth century, Petchey suggested, represented the dual lordship of the borough, although he later backtracked and proposed that one bailiff represented the king and the other the Bishop. [38] His initial hypothesis appears more consonant with the evidence. Maldon had only one bailiff until 1403, when we are naturally led to associate the institution of the second with the taking of episcopal jurisdiction at fee farm, and to suspect that the original bailiff indicates a similar pre-evidential arrangement with the Fitz Walter lords. Contrary to our expectations, no bailiff is listed among the witnesses to a grant of common soil in 1361. In our search for pre-ballival government we may look to the two constables, who were the king's executives in the town in 1359; once local records appear, the constables are ranked second to the bailiffs, with duties including collection of pre-fee farm sources of revenue. [39]

Lynn's executive development is even more intricate. Arundel and those who preceded and followed him in the lordship of Rising had their own bailiff - an officer sometimes called upon by the king, before 1204, to carry out his commands - and port officials. [40] Episcopal jurisdiction was administered by a steward and his bailiffs, from a hall by the Newland's Tuesday market. Communal interests were presumably represented by the Merchant Guild from its hall located in the Saturday market (originally, adjacent to the parish church), the site in itself suggesting an early gild role. [41] This was certainly the opinion of the gild itself, as represented in the 1389 returns and a document of unknown origin and purpose of which we have only a copy made tempore Henry V. [42] These claim the gild to have been the first form of organisation established by the traders who settled at early Lynn, its hall built on unoccupied land, and its alderman elected by the community (as opposed to the gildsmen alone). Subsequently the alderman shared government of the town with a mayor, though the two documents disagree as to whether this was instituted by king John or by Henry III. Historians can be no more certain. The 1204 charter granted a prepositus, [43] though whether an officer of that title was ever elected or local arrangements substituted a mayor from the beginning is difficult to say. For the former alternative we have only the untrustworthy evidence of addresses by royal clerks, while for the latter we have Howlett's arguments (from bede roll evidence) which do not stand up to criticism. [44] Possibly this executive referred to was simply the officer(s) appointed by the Bishop.

The best our evidence can allow us to say is that, by the opening years of Henry III's reign, the townsmen had decided to commit internal affairs to the rule of an officer representative of community interests in a way the gild alderman or royal prepositus could not be. It is not necessarily the case that this mayor replaced the prepositus, for royal bailiffs are found in Lynn's administrative complex on numerous occasions in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Probably the mayoralty developed slowly, gradually usurping the powers of the prepositus.^[45] Thus we have the curious order, in 1217, of the king to the men of Lynn to be intendant on Robert fitz Sunolf "as if (tanquam) their mayor."^[46] And in the 1230s there was conflict between burgesses and Bishop, ostensibly on the latter's complaint of innovations by the former in creating a mayor and imposing internal tallages; in fact the real issue was that the mayor was assuming unauthorised judicial powers which ought to belong to the prepositus. The agreement of 1234, by which the Bishop formally recognised the mayoralty he could not suppress, was embodied in an episcopal charter (c.1257-66) which the king confirmed in 1268, transferring the powers of the prepositus to the mayor so that, if royal bailiffs remained in the town, their function was little more than to carry out royal orders; at the same time the Bishop preserved his dominion by requiring each mayor to take oath before him or his deputy.^[47] The 1268 confirmation may have played a part in the contemporary power-struggle between interests gathered around mayor and alderman, which seems to have resulted in a victory for the mayoralty.^[48]

We should not exaggerate the implications of the transfer of power from prepositus to mayoralty. The dogmatic Richards, who declared the medieval mayors to be "the Bishops' head-men, chief bailiffs or slave drivers", may, oddly enough, be closest to the truth in insisting the difference between the two offices to be little more than a gesture to the corporation's pride.^[49] The mayoralty may not have much increased the actual independence of the borough - although there is some hint that the Bishop had more control over the election of the prepositus than the townsmen liked - but it was at least a symbol of greater autonomy and self-determination, with its origins in the continental commune.^[50] In contrast to Tait's opinion that the mayor was less a royal officer than the prepositus, Hudson had earlier proposed that the mayoralty Norwich was granted in 1404 derived its authority from the king, whereas the previous ballivalty it had partly replaced was based on community authority.^[51] Tait is the more correct, but we should see the mayoralty, like other executives, as a Janus acting for and responsible to both king and community, as the practical functions and the oaths of officers show.

← previous

next →

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

Created: July 30, 1998

© Stephen Alford, 1998-2003

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 1

The Structure of Borough Government

The Town Council

The most difficult institution to trace in the borough hierarchy is the town council for, even more than the executive and financial offices, it has a history of gradual, almost imperceptible evolution; ordinances seeming to create such councils more often merely mark a stage in a process already underway. It is convenient to begin with the case of Ipswich, since the proceedings there in 1200 include the earliest establishment of an upper council[71] of any of the towns under consideration here. Unlike the bailiffs and coroners, Ipswich's council was not provided for explicitly by its charter, nor indeed do the first charters of our other towns mention such institutions; the royal government was not concerned with the internal arrangements of borough government[72] and the terms of charters were sufficiently vague to give plenty of scope for local nuances. Significantly, the setting up of an administration, which took place in a series of stages between 29 June and 12 October 1200, began with the election of the officers granted by the charter and the decision to elect:

duodecim Capitales Portmenni iurati, sicut in aliis liberis Burgis Anglie sunt, et quod habeant plenam potestatem pro se et tota villata ad gubernandum et manutendum predictum Burgum et omnes libertates eiusdem Burgi, et ad iudicia ville reddenda, Ac eciam ad omnia ordinanda et facienda in eodem Burgo, que fieri debeant pro statu et honore ville memorate.[73]

There were two features of this passage that bothered Tait. First the title Capital Portmen, which he believed was not used until a later date and thus threw doubt on the passage's authenticity. The title means the leading members of the burgesses(alias portmen); 'capital jurat' or simply 'jurat' was a more common term for the councillors before 1325. But, as we may notice, they are referred to as jurats in the passage too, and portmen is an old term; the personal names in this document can be confirmed from other sources and there now seems no good cause to doubt the events themselves.[74] Secondly, Tait was suspicious of the suggestion that bodies such as the portmen[75] were common to English boroughs; although he himself is the principal proponent of the notion that town councils are foreshadowed in a number of cases, including that of Ipswich, by bodies of 'wise men' acting in official capacities. Having noted that the troublesome phrase may be no more than a justificatory repetition of the terminology of the charter clause granting that Ipswich might assume the liberties and customs of other free boroughs, we can nonetheless appreciate the rationale in Tait's suggestion that pre-chartered boroughs were likely to have leading townsmen consulted by the reeve and bargaining for the fee farm- perhaps as Merchant Gilds, perhaps as informal associations. The men of Ipswich, like modern scholars, perhaps assumed that any self-governing town would have some consultative mechanism.[\[76\]](#)

Possibly Tait's underlying worry was with the broad powers accorded the portmen, though this may have related to the fact that bailiffs and coroners were members of that body. Tait would not have agreed here, since his evaluation of the nature of ballival office led him to conclude that governmental power lay with the portmen whilst the bailiffs' powers related only to fulfillment of their duties towards the king.[\[77\]](#) If so, then it is strange that the portmen do not figure more prominently in later records. We see them again in 1256, present in court to hear a recognisance of right, but this is an exceptional mention. They are dealt with in the custumal, which elaborates on the 1200 account only to the extent of indicating that the office of portman was held for life and election of replacements was by co-optation; we may note that the custumal was a reconstruction (the original having been stolen) by a committee composed partly of men who, a few years later, are revealed as portmen themselves.[\[78\]](#) That revelation comes in the surprising circumstance of the election of all twelve portmen in 1309, by the same method of parish representatives as in 1200. On this occasion we again hear of the principle of co-optation and it may be, if the earliest recension of the custumal dates from 1309 as Martin hypothesises, that this year marks the change in electoral practice.[\[79\]](#)

There is little evidence by which to assess whether the role of the portmen at this period went beyond counselling, to the active exercise of power. Ipswich's custumal refers to the setting of fines on certain offenders and the disfranchisement of others by the bailiffs, coroners and bones gentz of the community; these may be the portmen, as thought Twiss and the fifteenth century clerk who translated the customs into English and gave the rendering "goodemen", a single word as if an institution.[\[80\]](#) It is not the intention of this study to become embroiled in an argument concerning terms such as bones hommes or probi homines, which are vague and used without any apparent consistency of application. However, we may notice that the complainants (whom we shall later see to be the town council) against the reform movement of 1411-14 in Lynn identify themselves as "the good burgesses"; whilst, at about the same period, Margery Kempe provided the mayor of Leicester with character references by describing herself as the daughter of a "good man" of Lynn, formerly mayor, and wife of another "good man", a former chamberlain.[\[81\]](#)

During the fourteenth century we have no certain indication of the portmen membership; they receive no attention in the 1320 ordinances. It has been suggested that the portmen were named directly after bailiffs and coroners in lists of witnesses to court recognisances.[\[82\]](#) This is likely, but hard to prove. Sample analysis of all such witnesses appearing between January 1338 and December 1340 identifies 53 individuals of whom only 4, besides bailiffs and coroners, were present at more than 50% of the recognisances; one of the four was a professional attorney. The portmen are named more often in the fifteenth century, seeming to have consolidated their position: offenders against the franchise threw themselves on the mercy of the community in 1323 but on that of the portmen in 1394, and the ordinances of 1361 were passed by bailiffs and community whilst those of 1429 by bailiffs and portmen.[83] The records begin to relate the practice rather than the theory of government.

Yarmouth's council is first seen in what appears to be the act of its creation, in 1272. Another institution arising from reform ordinances consequent to internal conflict, the council comprised 24 jurats who were elected to support the bailiffs and administer the ordinances. Tait at first suspected that this was merely an ad hoc body, but later decided that not only was it a permanent council, it was perhaps preceded by a more informal body.[84] On neither point do we have any evidence other than the examples of conciliar development in other towns. Yarmouth's council does not appear again for more than a century - as in Ipswich, there was perhaps no occasion for its behind-the-scenes role to receive credit in routine records; then it makes a flurry of appearances. In 1386 24 jurats were elected pursuant to the prescription of the 1272 ordinances, to strengthen the bailiffs, uphold the ordinances and make new ones; as with the portmen, life office and co-optation were now features. Earlier in that same year, the bailiffs and a group of 24 burgesses - almost the same personnel subsequently elected jurats - issued ordinances for the running of St. Mary's Hospital. Bailiffs and 24 issued orders for constructing a new haven in 1392 and disfranchised a burgess in 1395. The 24, who remind us in more than one way of Ipswich's portmen, had added positive powers to what seem in 1272 only negative powers, although their fifteenth century oath of office still stresses only the latter duties of supporting bailiffs and maintaining town ordinances.[85]

In the case of Colchester we are yet again led to associate the establishment of a council with a wider scheme of reforms, but a century after those of Yarmouth, in 1372. Here eight auditors were to be elected by community representatives and they, together with the bailiffs, would choose sixteen councillors; the bailiffs and their 24 counsellors would serve as the legislative organ. This is a curious division to which the clue lies in the title auditores. Round claimed that this was no more than the Latin version of the title 'aldermen' by which they were later known, but the reforms clearly indicate that the auditors had special functions: to authorize expenditures, to audit the receivers' accounts, and other duties relating to supervision of borough revenues. Their alderman's oath of office too stressed financial supervision and implied that the office was originally intended as a check on ballival mis-spending. We may infer from the reforms that the auditors were to deal with day-to-day business, whilst the councillors were to be present at the four major annual assemblies (lawhundreds and election), and at other times if circumstances warranted.[86]

The election of auditors is recorded from this time forward, but that of councillors not until 1381; this is probably a clerical rather than constitutional quirk. The ward of residence of each of the 24 was often recorded, but there was no consistent division and no evident representational significance. The change in the auditors' title, c.1404, may indicate an enhancement of status, the receivers being known from the same time by the more dignified title of chamberlains; but we cannot say for sure. Tait was of the opinion that the name-change amplified the distinction between aldermen and councillors, but this was partly because he thought the change occurred closer to 1443.[87] Analysis indicates that there was no qualitative difference between the personnel of the two groups. Augustine Bonefaunt, for example, first became councillor in 1392 and was re-elected in 1395; he was auditor 1398-1400, councillor 1404-07, alderman several times again between 1411 and 1426, and ended his career with terms as councillor in 1428/9, 1432/3, and 1434/5. At least two dozen other cases of similar alternation, or of men serving as councillors after serving as aldermen, could be given; most occur before the 1440s, but a handful afterwards. On the other hand, the summoning, in 1417/8, of "discretioribus concilii ville predictae tam majoribus quam minoribus"[88] may indicate some perceived distinction in rank. On the whole, however, it will be less misleading to view aldermen and councillors as a single body, certain members of which made a greater commitment of time and had special duties, rather than as two separate conciliar levels.

Neither Tait nor Round were willing to believe that Colchester had no town council until 1372. Tait hypothesised an earlier council, on the grounds that the reform ordinances were made "by all the commonalty and by the more worthy sworn men of the town." [89] This is slim proof of a permanent council, especially given the sparsity of earlier evidence for groups that might be candidates for a conciliar body. What we have to work with are six groups of burgesses, of varying numbers, listed between 1311 and 1318 in important contexts: as pledges for the farmers of town customs; leet jurors; inquisition jurors laying charges against the abbot of St. John's and other local dignitaries; and persons attending town assemblies (meetings rarely recorded).[90] If we think of each name listed as a 'position', then 57 individuals occupied 102 positions; 21 of these individuals are known to have held office in the borough and several more were from families of which other members were office-holders. Twelve individuals, most of them past or future officers, were involved in 3 or more of these affairs, occupying approximately 40% of the positions. This evidence is not strong enough to indicate the existence of a permanent council, but does suggest that the group most frequently in attendance at court was much the same group as that which aspired to borough office. Perhaps there was a less formal council at this time, for in December 1310 a man was tried "before the Bailiffs and other Burgesses associated with them" for selling corrupt meat, whilst even in 1373 the bailiffs consulted with selected auditors, rather than the group as an institution, regarding the raising of a tax.[91]

Hudson has carefully traced the development of the upper council in Norwich and no new evidence will be presented here. In the same year that Yarmouth's council appears, a papal letter complaining of an attack by Norwich's citizenry on the cathedral-priory blamed the bailiffs, town clerk and 15 citizens "quorum consilio eadem universitas tunc temporis regebatur." [92] Chapter 47 of the city customal, apparently a response to complaints of taxation abuses c.1326, required that tax-collectors and chamberlains render account before the "24", a group also referred to in chapter 46 as acting in conjunction with the bailiffs. The earliest assembly records (1344-47) show the election of the 24, whose function was to make decisions regarding the performance of city business. When these records re-emerge after 1365 we find a group of 24 electing the bailiffs and, a little later, 24 citizens elected to attend every assembly. Whether these three groups were different, as Hudson thought, or the same body in different roles, as I have elsewhere argued, is largely speculation. By 1417, when the 24 were transformed into aldermen, in imitation of London, they had established a firm and powerful position in the constitutional hierarchy.[93]

Two institutions performing different roles, yet essentially the same body, is what we again discover if we examine the council of Lynn. Tait, obliged to rely on the published transcript of Lynn's Red Register, noted the references to 24 men sworn to come to the gildhall whenever summoned "ad consulendum cum maiore quociens opus et necesse fuerit pro communitate" (1322), their functions elaborated upon in 1326 as "pro custodia ville de Lenne facienda per preceptum domini regis et pro omnibus aliis necessariis communitatem tangentibus ordinandis et perficiendis". In fact, in 1324 the mayor refused to give a decision on a certain problematical issue because not all his consules were present to advise him.[94] The editor of the Register automatically associated the 24 jurats with the Magna Jurata, a 24-man jury serving in pleas of land, although there is no explicit connection made in the Register, the only evidence being a close correspondence of memberships. It is not until the fifteenth century that the records clearly indicate that the jurats and Magna Jurata were a single set of personnel acting in two distinct roles - the distinction upheld by the fact that each jurat was administered two oaths, one as mayoral counsellor, the other as juror for the view of land.[95]

Whether one of these roles developed out of the other, or whether they were once performed by separate groups, we cannot tell from surviving evidence. However, there are earlier references to a council than those in the Red Register. The membership of a group whose role was described much as in 1326 is listed in the 1305 tallage roll; and in 1301 tax due from Ralph le Keu from that and two previous years was pardoned him "per considerationem xxiii^{or} burgensium", on the grounds of his expenses incurred on behalf of the community.[96] In contrast to our other towns, there is sufficient evidence to indicate that Lynn's jurats were elected annually throughout the fourteenth century. In a pattern of development similar to that at Norwich, the jurats consolidated their position in the later fourteenth century. Annual election did not produce a very high turnover of personnel and the apparent re-election in August 1365 of jurat Robert Braunch, who had died almost a year before, must make us suspicious.[97] In the early fifteenth century the process reached its conclusion: the jurats officially became a council characterised by life membership and co-optation; popular election was remembered only in the annual renewal of oaths of office. This move was quickly opposed by the reform party in Lynn, who sought to dupe the king and overthrow the jurats by obtaining (1411) royal confirmation of the ancient custom of annual election of the Magna Jurata, mentioning to the king only the judicial, not the political, aspects of this body. The reformers' efforts were ultimately frustrated and a settlement (1420) formalised what the jurats had won.[98]

So far our efforts to trace the roots of town councils have been inhibited by the paucity of documents. In Maldon we encounter a town whose constitutional development was retarded until a period when record-keeping had become an established practice. What we are shown, in consequence, is most interesting. The first folio of Maldon's earliest Court Book includes, among the list of officers elected in 1384, the wardemen - not individually named but said to be the same personnel as in the previous year. Thenceforward, however, 18 names are given annually and the group frequently appears in the records: described as "auxiliiatores et coadiutores" of the bailiffs; summoned to consult with the bailiffs whenever town business required it; ordaining that the bailiffs must account for all borough revenues; making other ordinances; granting leases of common soil; and appraising distrained goods.[99] In none of our other towns is the balance of power between executive and council more nicely expressed: in 1427 the bailiffs rented out a community tenement to Thomas Judde by consent of the wardemen; in 1430 the wardemen, with ballival consent, permitted Richard Lyon to extend his property onto common soil; the wardemen passed an ordinance in 1463 with the consent of the bailiffs; in 1423 they ordained that no bailiff might remit any court amercement without their consent.[100]

The name 'wardemen' does not seem to have any connection with territorial divisions; although on one occasion they were elected 6 per parish, there is otherwise no hint of this and it may simply have been a transitory experiment. The name would be better interpreted in the light of the later alternative 'guardians'; for they were the custodians of borough custom and the presenters of offences against that custom in the leet court. This was not, as apparently the case with Lynn's jurats, one head wearing two masks; in Maldon the roles of capital tithingmen, or headboroughs, and of councillors were integrated. Their ordinances were often framed as leet presentments; thus, for example, they present (charge) that one of their members has defaulted in his duties (1434), they petition (ordain) that butchers slaughtering in the market must clear up the blood and entrails (1414), they present (order) that it is the will of the community that the bailiffs proclaim in town that butter be sold only in the market (1416), they present (ordain) that every resident over 12 years of age must swear allegiance to the king (1420), they present (instruct the bailiffs) that they wish to have their royal charter of 1171 renewed (c.1416).[101] In other words, the by-laws that they made were disguised as proposals for the bailiffs to take action on, a method illustrating immature development of the legislative organ. Although, by the time of the chapter in the 1444 custumal dealing with their election, the wardemen were transforming into a life-membership (but not co-optative) body, the group never did become a fully-fledged council in its own right. In the 1554 charter of incorporation it was subordinated to the six aldermen, a group that had developed informally out of ex-ballival ranks, and the 24 men formed a Common Council.[102]

The notion of a town council arising out of the leet court has been proposed before. Leach speculated, without any direct evidence it seems, that Beverley's council evolved from the leet jury. Easterling notes that the first use of the term 'the 24' in Exeter appears in the thirteenth century applied to a jury which interpreted and amended borough custom. Bacon suspected (probably unjustifiably) that Ipswich's portmen were originally headboroughs. Gross believed that select councils superseded popular-based leet administration as a general principle. Tait, although rejecting Maitland's theory of a council developing out of the borough court via a process of differentiation of functions, conceded that leet juries might sometimes have set the tone for conciliar development.[103] The essential purpose of councils was to formulate and interpret borough custom and to advise the executive on its application in particular cases; they were thus a check on the executive to prevent abuse of power via misapplication, neglect or ignorance of borough law. In this we see the inquisition jury, the witnesses to recognisances in court, Lynn's Magna Jurata giving judgements in pleas of land (a duty of Maldon's wardemen too), the reference to Lynn's leet court being held by the 24 (1309), the Colchester auditors advising the bailiffs on legal procedure, and the election in 1291 in Ipswich of 24 men (most of them former or subsequent office-holders) "des plus sages et meuz avisez de meime la vylle qe meuz se conussent en les leys e en les usages" to reconstruct from memory the lost custumal.[104] Perhaps Maitland was not so far wrong. The formation of councils seems to have been a gradual process: from semi-formal counselling by those members of urban society most familiar with borough custom and consequently called upon to act in a variety of judicial or semi-judicial contexts; to a more crystalline institution specialising in legislative work in a governmental system where the difference between the judicial and the administrative had become more clearly defined. If we seek the training ground of men who would assume this leadership of their communities, we must look not only to the guilds but to the courts.

The lower council is another matter entirely. Where it appears it is as a deliberate act of creation, although occasionally foreshadowed by earlier selective representation devices. This was so at Norwich, where a Common Council of 60 persons was written into the constitution in 1417 - perhaps preceded by an earlier version 80-large in 1414 - to represent the interests of a community which had lost its electoral control of the upper council, now aldermen. The lower council shows no sign of positive powers but it had the right to block legislation proposals (which it was permitted time to debate) by withholding assent. The assembly roll of 1372 and the custumal both show that specific persons, besides the 24, were summoned to attend assemblies in the reign of Edward III on pain of fine for refusal.[105] However, there is a fundamental difference between this form of representation, enforced from above to ensure that decisions made would receive popular consent, and the Common Council, representation enforced from below to ensure some measure of control over a government that was becoming independent of the will of the governed.

As at Norwich, Lynn's Common Council was a counter-balancing feature of a settlement after a period of constitutional strife. Although its inception is generally accredited to the tripartite indenture of 1420 theoretically dictated by the Bishop, in fact the council had been in existence since at least the 1418 elections, probably the result of a less formal accord of c.1417. Again as in Norwich, representation and voting was on a ward system (3 councillors from each of 9 wards); the names of the jurats are conspicuously absent from the lists of voters participating in elections. The role of Lynn's lower council was more limited than that of Norwich, in that it was expected to attend assemblies only when business touching upon community finances was on the agenda. Furthermore the mayor and jurats could exercise some control over the choice of personnel for the lower council, although it is never seen to be invoked. It is curious that, during the period in which the reform party held power, they arranged that the will of their supporters be expressed in assembly by a prolocutor rather than a second council; perhaps a council was not the inevitable resort of a populace trying to maintain some position in the constitution.[106]

Yarmouth presents much the same picture. A lower council of 48 to represent the community-at-large in the wake of a diminution of control over the original council; this was part of the constitutional readjustment in 1426, already mentioned. There is no reason to believe, with Palmer, that the 24 wise men "to have syght of merchandizes" chosen by the upper council, dealt with in the 1386 ordinances, was a prototype Common Council. This second 24 was the descendant of a specialised, long-established office provided for in the 1272 ordinances. Fresh ordinances in 1413 make reference only to the upper council.[\[107\]](#)

Colchester's lower council of 16 became a formal part of the constitution as a result of the royal charter of 1462, granting incorporation in the form of the bailiffs, aldermen (now more clearly the superior branch of the upper council) and their 16 colleagues, and the new council. Election of each of the groups of 16 was in the hands of the higher levels of the corporation, but bailiffs and aldermen continued to be elected by the traditional representative committees. [\[108\]](#) The lower council shows no sign of having existed before the 1462 charter; but since its election was not recorded (at least, not in the court rolls) for some time thereafter, we cannot be sure of this.

The inception of a Common Council in Ipswich is harder to pinpoint. The first explicit references are in 1473, when the preamble to a set of ordinances states that it has been the custom in the past for the bailiffs, 12 portmen, and 24 burgesses to govern the town through the General Court; taxes were to be assessed in Ipswich by the bailiffs, 2 portmen, and 2 of the 24 (a type of arrangement also found in Lynn), suggesting that portmen and 24 represented different interests.[\[109\]](#) The register and rolls of the General Court occasionally list the names of burgesses, besides portmen, present at those assemblies; although rarely higher than 24, the number of names does vary and we do not know that the men listed were specifically summoned or obliged to attend. More interesting is a list in the White Domesday of bailiffs, portmen and burgesses "pro communi concilio"; undated, this list was probably copied in c.1453 from an earlier document made before 1445, when the person at the top of the list died. The list is divided into two groups: the first of 17 names, most identifiable as portmen; the second of 23 names. Ordinances in 1447 and 1451 were passed by bailiffs, portmen, burgesses, and the whole community; we might interpret 'burgesses' in the sense of a representative council, but this need not necessarily be so. Ordinances of 1429, on the other hand, were made only by bailiffs and portmen, an arrangement justified by reference to the 1200 proceedings.[\[110\]](#) It therefore seems that a Common Council came into being in Ipswich at some point in the 1430s or '40s, though whether as a specific act of creation perhaps recorded in a now-lost volume, or as a process of evolution from less formal attendance procedures, we cannot say. Nor is there any evidence from that period to show whether twelve of the 24 were the headboroughs who served in the leet court and in property disputes (like Lynn's Magna Jurata), as was the case in the seventeenth century.[\[111\]](#)

← previous

next →

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

Created: July 30, 1998. Last update: December 1, 1998

© Stephen Alford, 1998-2003

- Henceforth there are to be elected from each of the 9 constabularies, in the presence of the mayor (if he wishes to be present, to prevent discord or argument), 3 of the more capable, wise and peaceable burgesses holding a suitable residence in the town, to be present when business touching the town is dealt with; viz. all taxes, tallages, tithes, fifteenths, loans, repairs of houses, walls, bridges, fleets or ditches, and rendering of accounts, as often as necessary. [i.e. the Common Council]
- If 3 qualified persons cannot be found in any constabulary, candidates may be elected from other constabularies. If anyone elected is not qualified, then another may be elected in his place by the mayor, alderman, majority of the 24, and majority of the 27. The mayor has the power to remove dissenters from office.
- The common seal of the town is to be securely kept in the chest intended for that purpose, under three different locks. The mayor is to hold the key to one lock, another is to be held by a member chosen from the 24, and the third by one of the 27 elected by all who are merchants.
- All members of the council who are summoned by the sergeant to attend [congregations] shall faithfully do so, upon pain of removal from office and disbarment from future office-holding.
- The last exemplification of certain ordinances and articles, concerning the government of the town, to be sealed by the king shall be held valid. With the addition that, in regard to election of the mayor, the alderman of the Merchant Gild shall nominate the first 4 electors; he shall first take oath before the mayor and others present that he will, without favour or fraud, choose those 4 from persons who are impartial and not suspect.
- If any burgess, of whatever status, infringes or acts contrary to these ordinances, unless he swiftly makes amends and promises to adhere to them in future, he shall pay £10 to the use of the community (and not to any other use) each time he is so convicted by the council.

These articles are embodied in a tripartite indenture whereby the Bishop of Norwich endorsed and confirmed a constitutional settlement of 1417/18. The Bishop kept one part of the agreement and the other two went to the two opposing parties in the [constitutional conflict.]

History of medieval Maldon

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth | DEVELOPMENT OF LOCAL GOVERNMENT

Buildings and fortifications | Economy | Summary/Recap | Information sources

Map of Maldon at the close of the Middle Ages

Maldon bailiffs and chamberlains

Appendix: borough customal

Development of local government

Henry II granted the burgesses their first charter in 1171, which gave "free borough" status, specified the lands included within the town boundaries, and identified the various customs, jurisdictions and obligations to which the townsmen were subject or from which they were exempted (including tolls on merchandise throughout the country). The charter made no reference to any mechanism of local government; Henry II was wary about encouraging too much independence in his burgesses.

A jury investigating the lordship of Maldon in 1274/75 reached the conclusion that Henry II had turned over a share of his lordship of the borough to a Norman supporter, Ivo Patryk, as a reward for service, and another share to the Bishop of London; but they knew not how it had come, in their time, into the hands of William de la Launde and Roger Baynard. However, earlier evidence suggests Henry II had kept Maldon in the family, allowing his brother William to hold it (for a fee farm) for a while, and then leasing or giving the lordship to his illegitimate son, William Longspee, who passed it on to Oliver fitz Ernisius, whose son Eudo gave half to Eudo Patric and half to the friars of Bosco Herebaldi; these last gave their half to the Bishop of London.

We hear relatively little of Maldon in the thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries, when most medieval boroughs were in their heyday. The rights of the lords of Maldon – which would not have overridden the 1171 charter – were likely upheld by bailiffs they appointed, while the king appears to have had two local constables to do his bidding there. In 1287 the bishop and the king (as guardian of the underage heir of the other lordship of the town) were suing the townsmen for infringing various traditional lordly rights. It seems likely that this was part of a deliberate challenge to or evasion of those rights, during the course of which the townsmen had set afire some of the bishop's parkland. The disputed matters were: dues owed from each stall in the town market (4d.), from all salt cargoes arriving by river (2 bushels of salt), and for the pasturage of livestock in Portman Marsh on the far side of the river (small amounts varying according to the type of animal); and the building of extensions onto houses or the expansion of property limits, which represented potential income, either through licence fees before the fact, or court fines after the fact. A jury decided for the lords, except in the case of stallage from which Henry II's charter exempted the burgesses.

Some measure of release from overlordship came to Maldon at the beginning of the fifteenth century, when the Bishop of London granted various jurisdictional rights to the townsmen in return for payment of an annual farm, reserving to himself only a few relatively minor local sources of revenue. This grant of 1403, which the king subsequently endorsed, gave to the community of Maldon, in exchange for a fee farm of £6.13s.4d, the following properties, jurisdictions, and revenues:

- the Moothall;
- all vacant plots of land in the town;
- rents from market stalls;
- Portman Marsh and the fees for pasturage there;
- hawgable rents;
- holding of four General Courts each year, of which one included view of frankpledge;
- toltray, a toll on ships carrying cargoes of salt;
- landchepe, a tax on the sale of any property within the borough.

Frequently, grants such as this tended to happen after the jurisdictions involved had already been usurped by towns.

The above concessions appear to have been prompted by the townsmen using force to express their wish for greater independence, for in 1401 we see 55 of them named in a charge of trespass brought by the Bishop of London and Sir Walter FitzWalter (whose family had held the other half of the lordship since 1315). The townsmen were represented in the dispute by Robert Darcy, a Northumberland-based lawyer both of whose parents had landed interests in Essex. The list of grantees of the episcopal charter of 1403 is headed by Darcy's name, followed by John Welles (probably the bishop's bailiff in the town), John Burgeys the townsmen's bailiff, 19 other named leading townsmen, and "all inhabitants of Maldon". In the years that followed, Darcy acquired numerous properties in the town and took up residence there; he built up a legal practice in Essex which resulted in him being appointed a Justice of the Peace in the county for most of the period from 1410 to his death (1448). He became a legal advisor to Lord FitzWalter and later to his son, as well as a feoffee of the FitzWalter estates; he similarly served the Earl of Oxford, who had landed and commercial interests in Maldon. In 1446, Maldon's fee farm was being paid to the Bishop of London and to Robert Darcy esq., who had apparently taken over the FitzWalter lordship, although the FitzWalters continued to own property there. His son followed in his footsteps and was similarly recipient of one part of the fee farm in 1469.

The desire of the townsmen to force the issue of independence was nothing new; in 1386 the king had ordered the arrest of one of the constables and several other named townsmen who, with others unnamed, had besieged the servants of FitzWalter inside a house in the town, until they paid a ransom for their freedom. And deeds of 1331 and 1361 leasing parcels of common soil to individuals are said to be made by "burgesses and community". Although we should not read too much into this apparent dichotomy, the deeds at least suggest some kind of communal decision-making organization existed independent of the lords' officers in the town; the same may be suggested by the group actions mentioned above.

In fact, the townsmen already had a well-shaped local government in place by at least 1383 (the earliest date from which copies of its political records survive). A meeting, described as a "court" was being held each January, its business including elections, view of frankpledge, admission of men into the franchise (see below), and in later years auditing of financial accounts. Borough officialdom in the 1380s comprised:

- a bailiff (suggesting some rights, along with control of the officer administering those rights, had already been won from the non-episcopal lord of the town; this is supported by reference, in 1406, to the town's fee farm being £12, almost twice as much as the amount due the bishop – in the 1446 borough accounts it was exactly twice the amount);
- a council of 18 "wardemen" which had evolved out of the leet jury; in 1401 they were chosen 6 per parish, but it is not known if this was typical procedure;
- two constables (more when there was a national tax to collect);
- and a series of lesser officials:
 - affeerors of the court (who assessed fines on the guilty),
 - supervisors of the fairs, in the 1390s described as supervisors of the market and adding to their duties in the 1430s supervision of the port,
 - supervisors of the causeways,
 - supervisors of the leather trades,
 - "coroners" of bread (not coroners in the modern sense, but in that of men policing the crown's assize of bread), renamed "bread-weighers" in the 1390s, and
 - ale-tasters (who supervised the quality of the local brewing industry).

We also hear of a beadle in 1389 (this may have been when the office was created), a nightwatchman in 1406, and a clerk may be inferred from the recording of the electoral courts; however, these officers were appointed, not elected.

That there is no sign of community-elected officers in the deeds of 1331 and 1361 may indicate that local self-government did not take shape before the 1370s. It is not impossible that the townsmen took advantage of the national unrest in 1381, which found expression in Essex, to assume powers of self-government; certainly the first written compilation of the borough custumal – which might itself be a reflection of acquisition of some independence – appears to have been made at that time. This had been prefaced by obtaining in 1378 a confirmation of the 1171 charter; although it was for most boroughs normal procedure to obtain confirmations upon a new king coming to the throne, Maldon had not bothered much with this, to its detriment. The 1378 confirmation may therefore be a sign of reviving ambitions.

By 1389 the borough administration had some kind of financial accounting system in place and was enacting local ordinances (by-laws), including that the community should hold a court each Monday in its own hall. At the election in January 1404 we see the result of the Bishop of London's grant the previous year, for two bailiffs were elected – the second superseding the Bishop's administrative officer in the town. We also first hear of chamberlains during this year, although they may not have become a permanent element of borough officialdom until 1413; they were responsible for supervising borough expenditures and revenues (the latter being deposited in the community chest known as the "pyx"), although it was the bailiffs who were held accountable for the budget. Annual income through most of the fifteenth century ranged between £20 and £25; sources of income indicated in the accounts for 1446 were:

- the farming out (i.e. leasing) of Portman marsh, the Maldon bridge, the causeways, various shops, taverns and other properties;
- estreats and amercements received from court sessions, including the leet courts;
- fines from foreigners (probably for the right to trade in the town);
- various tolls related to commerce (e.g. stallage, mensurage), some of which were farmed out;
- landchepe (see above);
- rents from community-owned tenements;
- freeman admission fees;
- licences to have coal-heaps at the Hythe.

Special levies might be made on townsmen to cover certain expenses, such as the wages of town representatives to parliament or repairs to the causeways.

The Moothall was a two-storey building located in the marketplace; the upper part was used for administrative business while at least part of the lower level held shops leased to townsmen. The town gaol was also located there.

In the Moothall the bailiffs held the Monday court, which had jurisdiction over pleas involving debt (the most common type of case brought before it), detention of goods, broken contracts, and minor transgressions. If one burgess had a complaint against another, he was expected to bring it before the town court, not to resort to any external legal authority. A piepowder court, to render swift justice to travelling merchants from outside town, was being held by at least 1407.

Once each quarter, the General Court session was dedicated to the presentment of offences against the community, the peace, or the assizes of bread and ale. All householders were required to attend the General Courts or face a fine. Presentments were made by the appointed ale-tasters and bread-weighers, and by a jury of townsmen specially elected each year for this role, under the title of "headburgesses". The headburgesses were in fact the wardemen wearing another hat, with the result that the General Courts combined both judicial and legislative functions. The range of offences presented is exemplified by Simon Gylberd who, during the General Courts held during 1448, was accused of: failing to perform satisfactorily his duties as ale-taster the previous year (this being a not uncommon charge against the ale-tasters); breaking the assize of bread; regrating ale; and hosting gambling in his residence at unreasonable hours. Simon, whom we may guess to have been a taverner, was not happy with these charges and cursed the wardemen to their faces.

The town's acquisition of special privileges, through grants from its lords, necessitated a definition of who had the right to benefit from these advantages. This was achieved by giving the status of freeman to those residents who agreed to share the communal obligations and responsibilities of the town in return for a share in its privileges and benefits. Entrance to the franchise required the taking of an oath and the payment of a "fine" (i.e. a fee) which varied, probably according to personal means; in the late fourteenth century it was generally between 3s.4d and 6s.8d, although during the reign of Henry VI 20s. was the common fee. An entrant who was born in the town was exempted from payment; ca. 1403/04 this exemption seems to have been restricted to sons or daughters of a freeman (if born after he had entered the franchise), or a man who married the daughter or widow of one. All entrances were subject to approval by the community and its officers. As part of his oath (see the custumal, cap.44), the freeman guaranteed that he would uphold the liberties and customs of the town, obey the bailiffs, not discuss with outsiders decisions made by the local government, contribute towards communal financial obligations (such as taxes), and attend the January court meeting at which local elections were held. These features are fairly typical of the freeman's oath in other medieval towns. In their public behaviour, freemen were expected to have uppermost in their minds "the profit of the commonwealth". Failure to place the community's interest above personal interest could result in fines or, in extreme cases, forfeiture of the franchise. This included showing proper respect to the town's elected officials. A fine was imposed on anyone insulting an officer (see custumal cap.40); a much higher fine resulted if a man assaulted or drew a weapon on a bailiff.

A separate status was accorded to "aliens"; that is residents of the town who had not been born in England. They were allowed to enter the franchise with that status and took a different oath; they could not gain the franchise by marrying a freeman's daughter. The community distrusted them. They were not allowed to carry any weapon other than a knife for meals, unless they were going outside the town, where more protection was needed. They were subject to a curfew, which varied from summer to winter, and could be arrested if found abroad later. Residents sometimes tried to hide a foreign birth.

The 1460s saw some minor reforms in local administration that reflect growing professionalism in government. We begin to hear of a town seal and see greater attention to provisions to keep it – along with the borough treasury, archives, and official seals for marking measures (see the custumal cap.6) – secure by dividing among several officers the keys to the chests in which they were contained (such clavigers first being mentioned in 1416); pain was taken to record who had custody of the keys. In 1464 we first hear of a salaried sergeant-at-mace, whose principal duties were to oblige accused parties to attend court sessions (by distraining their personal possessions) and to collect amercements imposed by the town court, if not paid to the chamberlains immediately after judgement was handed down; a similar office had been farmed out in previous years and may itself have been successor to the beadle. The chamberlains took over accounting responsibilities from the bailiffs in 1465 and in the same year Reynold Rokes was appointed town clerk. Rokes, a lawyer, proceeded to draft a new compilation of the borough custumal, augmenting the existing edition with ordinances extracted from court records; to which he added a list of the tolls leviabie by the waterbailiff (apparently the officer stationed on the town bridge) on boats, horses, carts, chapmen and particular merchandize. In the same period the conditions for admission to the franchise were tightened to include possession of a tenement within the town.

Although it possessed several of the characteristics of a corporate entity in the fifteenth century, Maldon was not incorporated until 1554.

previous

main menu

next

Medieval Sourcebook: Statute of Mortmain, 1279

This statute, by King Edward I, was aimed at preventing land passing to the hands of immortal institutions, and thus out of the control and taxation system operated by the state. The Church was the main target.

(Stubbs' "Charters," p. 457.)

The king to his Justices of the Bench, greeting. Where as of late it was provided that religious men should not enter into the fees of any without the will and licence of the lords in chief of whom these fees are held immediately; and such religious men have, notwithstanding, later entered as well into their own fees as into those of others, appropriated, them to themselves, and buying them, and sometimes receiving them from the gift of others, whereby the services which are due of such fees, and which at the beginning, were provided for the defence of the realm, are unduly withdrawn, and the lords in chief do lose their escheats of the same; we, therefore, to the profit of our realm, wishing to provide a fit remedy in this matter, by advice of our prelates, counts and other subjects of our realm who are of our council, have provided, established, and ordained, that no person, religious or other, whatsoever presume to buy or sell any lands or tenements, , or under colour of gift or lease, or of any other term or title whatever to receive them from any one, or in any other craft or by wile to appropriate them to himself, whereby such lands and tenements may come into mortmain under pain of forfeiture of the same. We have provided also that if any person, religious or other, do presume either by craft or wile to offend against this statute it shall be lawful for us and for other immediate lords in chief of the fee so alienated, to enter it within a year from the time of such alienation and to hold it in fee as an inheritance. And if the immediate lord in chief shall -be negligent and be not willing to enter into such fee within the year, then it shall be lawful for the next mediate lord in chief, within the half year following, to enter that fee and to hold it, as has been said; and thus each mediate lord may do if the next lord be negligent in entering such fee as as been said. And if all such chief lords of such fee, who shall be of full age, and within the four seas and out of prison, shall be for one year negligent or remiss in this matter, we, straightway after the year is completed from the time when such purchases, gifts, or appropriations of another kind happen to have been made, shall take such lands and tenements into our hand, and shall enfief others therein by certain services to be rendered thence to us for the defence of our kingdom ; saving to the lords in chief of the same fees their wards, escheats and other things which pertain to them, and the services therefrom due and accustomed. And therefore we command you to cause the aforesaid statute to be read before you, and from henceforth firmly kept and observed. Witness myself at Westminster, the 15th day of November, the 7h year of our reign.

From Ernest F. Henderson, Select Historical Documents of the Middle Ages, (London: George Bell

This text is part of the Internet Medieval Source Book. The Sourcebook is a collection of public domain and copy-permitted texts related to medieval and Byzantine history.

Unless otherwise indicated the specific electronic form of the document is copyright. Permission is granted for electronic copying, distribution in print form for educational purposes and personal use. If you do reduplicate the document, indicate the source. No permission is granted for commercial use.

© Paul Halsall June 1997
halsall@murray.fordham.edu

History of medieval Yarmouth

Yarmouth at the close of the Middle Ages

This is a clickable imagemap.

NOTES:

This is in fact part of a larger plan showing Yarmouth and its surrounds in the time of Queen Elizabeth I. In most of its details it well reflects how Yarmouth must have looked at the close of the fifteenth century, although there are of course post-medieval features. This plan is presented to give a general sense of the appearance of the town, but should not be trusted for accuracy.

THE WALLS

Construction began in the 1280s and continued throughout the 13th and 14th centuries. It is generally thought that work began on the north-east portion (adjacent to St. Nicholas') and proceeded southwards. In 1337 work was underway in the vicinity of the Dominican friary. The northern stretch was perhaps the last part to be undertaken.

1 South Gate

2 Blackfriars Tower

3 South-east Tower

4 This appears to represent a fortification added in the post-medieval period, in response to the threat from Spain; if so, the artist has greatly truncated the stretch of wall between it and the South-east Tower.

5 Market Gate

6 Pudding Gate

7 King Henry's Tower

Thought to have been named after Henry III who first licenced the borough to construct walls.

8 North Gate

Two leper-houses stood a short distance north of the gate.

9 North-west Tower

THE DENES

The Denes were an extensive beachy area on the east side of the walled town. As can be seen from the depiction, townsmen let their animals roam here. Also visible in the complete depiction (but not in this cropped version) are the windmills that had been built on the Denes since the time of Edward I, and were a source of complaint by the Cinque Ports men, who charged that they interfered with the drying of fishing-nets (of which an example is also shown in the complete depiction); in 1277 Edward ordered a limitation on the number of windmills there. This right to dry their nets there was part of the rights of "den and strond" granted the Cinque Ports men by Henry II; the nets were hung from ships' masts. The beach was also used as an area for building ships, while old, derelict ships abandoned there was another source of annoyance to the Portsmen.

WITHIN THE WALLS

A Dominican friary

The Black Friars were said to have arrived in Yarmouth in 1267. They obtained licence from the king in 1271 to acquire a plot of land (referred to as being part of "La Straunde", i.e. the beach) 500' x 500' to expand a narrow strip of property already possessed at the south end of the town; on this land they had built a convent by 1273. This was subsequently extended, thanks to burgess benefactors, into a large precinct.

B Dene side

C St. Mary's Hospital

D Marketplace

The two features on either side of the "D" appear to represent the market cross (left), which sat atop an open-sided roofed building, and the pillory (right) that were set up there in 1395, when the market was also partially paved, as a result of a pavage licence obtained from the king.

E Community wells

F St. Nicholas' Church

Antiquarians are divided on whether this was founded on the site of the St. Benedict's mentioned in Domesday, or superseded a chapel built two decades earlier which became a source of dispute between the Bishop of Norwich and the Cinque Ports fishermen as to who would appoint the priest. It has been suggested that the Bishop of Norwich built the church with some of the Caen stone he was importing for the construction of Norwich cathedral. It was enlarged in the mid-13th century and again in the 1330s.

G Charnel house

The "Carnary" was built in the churchyard ca. 1308 through the benefaction of Sybil, widow of William Flathe. This was no easy task, since it required permission from the Bishop of Norwich, the King, and the Pope. Its purpose was to house the bones of those whose graves were dug up to make room for new inhabitants. Sybil endowed this chapel with various rents (for whose collection and application the borough government was made responsible) in order to support two priests to perform divine services for the dead. She herself died in 1311. The charnel was pulled down after the Reformation.

H Benedictine Priory

This was a cell of Norwich Priory

I Tolhouse

Built of flint in the 14th century

J Great Middlegate (street)

The southerly portion was sometimes known as South Middlegate or even Southgate

K Little Middlegate (street)

Known from the 1330s as Blind Middlegate

L Northgate (street)

M Franciscan friary

Established at some time in the 13th century, perhaps as early as 1226; the Gerberge family was said to have been the Grey Friars' patron.

N Carmelite friary

The White Friars convent was said to have been founded ca. 1278. The various orders consumed so much of the limited space in the town that when the Augustians arrived, latecomers, they established themselves in Little Yarmouth instead and had to be satisfied with a cell in Great Yarmouth.

O Bridge to West Yarmouth

The king gave the town permission in 1417 to build a bridge to replace a ferry service; it is not clear whether this was accomplished immediately or until a few years later.

P

Probably represents a mechanism for weighing merchandize (trone), given its central location on the quayside and near the bridge into town.

Q Quayside

Since it stretched along the length of the Yare bank, sections of the quayside were distinguished from each other by their own names.

1. The Lord's (i.e. king's) Quay, probably the earliest port area.
2. As its name indicates the Crane Key was where the borough crane was located; the borough had the right (although this was challenged by Norwich) to charge a fee for use of the crane for loading and unloading of cargos.
3. As the port silted up, harbour facilities had to be moved further south along the east bank of the Yare, and population followed it. Consequently, in the 15th century the South Quay was an area in which many of the town's wealthier merchants lived.

R The Conge

This was an area of the Lord's Quay. The name is possibly associated with a French term used in relation to the clearances to depart that ships' masters had to obtain from the authorities. It was perhaps here that there was a house for collection of customs (unless the Tolhouse served that function) – without payment of which, ships would not be allowed to depart.

S The Foreland

An open plain for much of the Middle Ages, residences were built upon part of it during the 15th century.

T

Possibly represents a building called the "Castle", a keep-like structure, origins unknown, but mentioned as early as the 13th century and just possibly associated with the Earl of East Anglia. During the Late Middle Ages it was in private hands; by the time it came into the hands of the corporation, in the 16th century, it was in decay.

[MAIN MENU]

[\[contents\]](#)

APPENDIX I

The Officers of Borough Government

Yarmouth: bailiffs and chamberlains [\[16\]](#)

| | |
|---------|---|
| 1272-73 | b. William Gerberge, John de Goseford, Henry Aleyn, John Beneyt |
| 1273-74 | b. John Beneyt, John Brumnan, Richard Randolf, William de Acle |
| 1274-75 | b. John Beneyt, John Brumnan, Richard Randolf, --- |
| 1275-76 | b. William de la Mawe, William Aleyn, John Beneyt, John Goseford |
| 1276-77 | b. Robert Wyth, William Gerberge, Richard de Beverle, Nicholas de Monesle |
| 1277-78 | b. William de la Mawe, John Beneyt, John de Goseford, --- |
| 1278-79 | b. William de la Mawe, John Beneyt, John de Goseford, --- |
| 1279-80 | b. William de la Mawe, John Beneyt, John de Goseford, --- |
| 1280-81 | b. John Beneyt, Nicholas de Monesle, William de Acle, Alexander Fastolf |
| 1281-82 | b. William de la Mawe, John Beneyt, William Gerberge, William Fastolf |
| 1282-83 | b. William de la Mawe, Henry Randolf, John Fastolf, William Gerberge |
| 1283-84 | b. William de la Mawe, William Gerberge, John Fastolf, John Gerberge |
| 1284-85 | b. Nicholas de Monesle, William de Drayton, John Wyth, Richard de Drayton |
| 1285-86 | b. Alexander Fastolf, John Wyth, Henry Randolf, Stephen de Hoo |
| 1286-87 | unknown |
| 1287-88 | unknown |
| 1288-89 | b. William Gerberge, John Wyth, Alexander Fastolf, Henry de la Mawe |
| 1289-90 | b. Alexander Fastolf, Richard de Beverle, John de Fordele, Henry de Drayton |
| 1290-91 | b. William de Drayton, John Wyth, John Fastolf, Richard Randolf |
| 1291-92 | b. Nicholas de Monesle, Alexander Fastolf, John de Fordele, Thomas Fastolf |
| 1292-93 | b. John Wyth, John Fastolf, John Gerberge, William de la Mawe |
| 1293-94 | b. Alexander Fastolf, Henry de Drayton, John de Fordele, Henry de la Mawe |
| 1294-95 | b. John Wyth, Thomas Clericus, Nicholas le Potter, William de Goseford |
| 1295-96 | b. Thomas Fastolf, Eustace Bataille, William de Carleton, Laurence de Monesle |
| 1296-97 | b. Alexander Fastolf, John de Fordele, William de la Mawe, William Science |
| 1297-98 | b. Robert Wyth, John Fastolf, Henry Rose, Henry de Drayton |
| 1298-99 | b. John Wyth, Thomas Fastolf, John Aleyn, John de Fordele |

- 1299-1300 b. Henry Rose, Henry de Somerleton, Stephen de Goseford, Nicholas Ashman
- 1300-01 b. John Wyth, Henry de Drayton, Oliver de la Mawe, Robert de Fordele
- 1301-02 b. Henry Rose, John de Fordele, Richard Randolph, Eustace Bataille
- 1302-03 b. Henry Rose, William Fastolf, John Fastolf senior, Robert de Beverle
- 1303-04 b. William de la Mawe, Eustace Bataille, Nicholas le Potter, Richard Fastolf
- 1304-05 b. John Fastolf senior, Richard Randolph, John de Fordele, William Science
- 1305-06 b. Henry Rose, William Fastolf, Thomas Fastolf, Roger Gavel
- 1306-07 b. Henry Rose, Henry de Drayton, William de Goseford, Robert de Fordele
- 1307-08 b. Henry Rose, Richard Randolph junior, Robert de Fordele, Nicholas Ashman
- 1308-09 b. John Fastolf junior, John de Fordele, Eustace Bataille, Thomas Fastolf
- 1309-10 b. Henry Rose, Henry de Drayton, Robert de Drayton, Roger Gavel
- 1310-11 b. Richard Randolph, Richard Fastolf, Roger de Thurnton, William le Potter
- 1311-12 b. Eustace Bataille, Oliver de la Mawe, William de Monesle, Simon atte Sond
- 1312-13 b. Robert de Fordele, Richard Randolph, Roger de Thurnton, John Perbroun
- 1313-14 b. Robert de Fordele, Oliver de la Mawe, John Perbroun, Simon de Dighton
- 1314-15 b. William de la Mawe, Roger de Thurnton, Geoffrey de Drayton, Matthew de Redeham
- 1315-16 b. Robert de Fordele, Richard Randolph, Robert de Drayton, Simon atte Sond
- 1316-17 b. Robert de Fordele, William Thurkild, Farman Alberd, Robert Ashman
- 1317-18 b. Robert de Fordele, Roger de Thurnton, John Perbroun, Alexander Fastolf
- 1318-19 b. Henry Rose, William de la Mawe, Roger Gavel, John de Acle
- 1319-20 b. Roger Gavel, John Perbroun, Bartholomew de Thorp, Anselm de Fordele
- 1320-21 b. Roger Gavel, John Perbroun, Bartholomew de Thorp, Anselm de Fordele
- 1321-22 b. Robert de Drayton, John Perbroun, Stephen de Catefeld, William de Lincoln
- 1322-23 b. Robert de Fordele, Geoffrey de Drayton, Robert Ashman, Robert de Gimingham
- 1323-24 b. Henry Rose, Roger Gavel, Roger de Drayton, Anselm de Fordele
- 1324-25 b. John Perbroun, Bartholomew de Thorp, Alexander Fastolf, Robert Ashman
- 1325-26 b. John Perbroun, Edmund Gerberge, John de Acle, Farman Alberd
- 1326-27 b. Robert de Drayton, John Perbroun, Anselm de Fordele, Walter atte Sond
- 1327-28 b. Bartholomew de Thorp, John de Acle, Walter atte Sond, Robert Ashman [\[17\]](#)
- 1328-29 b. John Perbroun, Robert de Drayton, Stephen de Catefeld, Bartholomew de Thorp
- 1329-30 b. Geoffrey de Drayton, Stephen de Catefeld, Bartholomew de Thorp, Walter atte Sond
- 1330-31 b. Robert de Drayton, John Perbroun, Alexander Fastolf, Robert de Fordele
- 1331-32 b. John Perbroun, Richard Fastolf, Walter atte Sond, John Chyld
- 1332-33 b. John Perbroun, Alexander Fastolf, Robert Elys, Thomas de Drayton

- 1333-34 b. Bartholomew de Thorp, Anselm de Fordele, William de Monesle, Henry Randolph
- 1334-35 b. John Perbroun, Richard Fastolf, Thomas de Drayton, Robert Elys
- 1335-36 b. Alexander Fastolf, Thomas de Drayton, Walter atte Sond, John Elys
- 1336-37 b. Geoffrey de Stalham, Nicholas Fastolf, Thomas de Drayton, Bartholomew de Thorp
- 1337-38 b. Walter atte Sond, Anselm de Fordele, Robert de St. Botolph, Richard de Wymondham
- 1338-39 b. Bartholomew de Thorp, Walter atte Sond, Richard de Beketon, William de Motte
- 1339-40 b. John Perbroun, Alexander Fastolf, Thomas de Drayton, Stephen de Catefeld
- 1340-41 b. Thomas de Drayton, Bartholomew de Thorp, Geoffrey de Stalham, Geoffrey Trote
- 1341-42 b. Bartholomew de Thorp, Edmund Gerberge, Richard le Latoner, Peter de Cressy
- 1342-43 b. Bartholomew de Thorp, Edmund Gerberge, Richard le Latoner, Peter de Cressy
- 1343-44 b. Thomas de Drayton, Peter de Cressy, Richard le Latoner, Geoffrey de Stalham [18]
- 1344-45 b. Richard de Beketon, Edmund Gerberge, Richard le Latoner, Roger de Broxton
- 1345-46 b. Geoffrey de Stalham, William de Motte, Geoffrey Elys, Richard de Walsham
- 1346-47 b. Richard de Beketon, Roger de Broxton, Richard le Latoner, Richer de Gimingham [19]
- 1347-48 b. Geoffrey Elys, Geoffrey de Stalham, Richard de Wramplyngham, John le Neve
- 1348-49 b. Richard de Beketon, Robert Ashman, Simon de Halle, Geoffrey de Fordele
- 1349-50 b. Richard de Beketon, Roger de Broxton, Geoffrey de Fordele, Thomas Cobald
- 1350-51 b. Richard de Beketon, Geoffrey Elys, William de Oxneye, John Lawes
- 1351-52 b. Peter de Cressy, Alexander de Beverle, William de Fordele, John de Kilham
- 1352-53 b. Geoffrey Elys, Peter de Cressy, Geoffrey de Drayton, Geoffrey de Fordele
- 1353-54 b. Alexander de Beverle, Thomas Cobald, Stephen de Stalham, John de Thorp
- 1354-55 b. Hugh Fastolf, William atte Mawe, John de Wytton, John Cook
- 1355-56 b. Thomas de Drayton, Peter de Cressy, William atte Mawe, Stephen de Stalham
- 1356-57 b. Thomas de Drayton, Peter de Cressy, William atte Mawe, Stephen de Stalham
- 1357-58 b. Peter de Cressy, Geoffrey de Fordele, Stephen de Stalham, Robert Elys
- 1358-59 b. Alexander de Beverle, John de Drayton, John de Thorp, John de Kilham
- 1359-60 b. Peter de Cressy, Geoffrey de Fordele, William Elys, John de Halle
- 1360-61 b. Hugh Fastolf, Stephen de Stalham, Robert Elys, Peter atte Fen
- 1361-62 b. Hugh Fastolf, Stephen de Stalham, Robert Elys, William de Halle

- 1362-63 b. Alexander de Beverle, John de Halle, John de Beverle, John de Riston
- 1363-64 b. Hugh Fastolf, John de Belaugh, Simon atte Gappe, Reginald Lawes
- 1364-65 b. Alexander de Beverle, Hugh Fastolf, John de Wykes, John de Halle [20]
- 1365-66 b. William Elys, John de Beverle, William Faderman, John de Reppes
- 1366-67 b. Hugh Fastolf, Robert Elys, William de Halle, Edmund Oudolf
- 1367-68 b. Hugh Fastolf, Alexander de Beverle, John de Wykes, John de Stalham
- 1368-69 b. John de Beverle, William atte Gappe, John de Riston, John atte Fen
- 1369-70 b. Simon atte Gappe, John de Reppes, Edmund Sylke, Warin Lucas
- 1370-71 b. Alexander de Beverle, John de Halle, John de Stalham, Richard Spicer
- 1371-72 b. John de Beverle, Bartholomew Noggan, Reginald Lawes, Simon de Wroxham
- 1372-73 b. John de Beverle, William Elys, John de Drayton, John de Reppes
- 1373-74 b. Hugh Fastolf, Simon atte Gappe, John de Stalham, John atte Fen
- 1374-75 b. Hugh Fastolf, William Elys, John de Reppes, Edmund Oudolf
- 1375-76 b. Hugh Fastolf, William Elys, John de Beverle, John de Reppes
- 1376-77 b. William atte Gappe, Roger de Drayton, William de Oxneye, John de Halle
- 1377-78 b. Simon atte Gappe, John atte Fen, John Elys, Nicholas de Drayton
- 1378-79 b. William Elys, William de Oxneye, Robert atte Gappe, William de Stalham
- 1379-80 b. William Elys, Bartholomew Noggan, Roger de Drayton, Edmund Oudolf
- 1380-81 b. Bartholomew Noggan, John de Reppes, Nicholas de Drayton, Peter Beneyt
- 1381-82 b. John de Beverle, John Elys, William de Oxneye, Robert atte Gappe
- 1382-83 b. William atte Gappe, Edmund Oudolf, William de Stalham, John de Rollesby
- 1383-84 b. John Elys, William de Oxneye, Nicholas Wildgoose, Hugh atte Fen
- 1384-85 b. John de Beverle, Roger de Drayton, Alexander Fastolf, John Hakon
- 1385-86 b. Ralph Ramseye, Nicholas de Drayton, Warin Lucas, Adam Heyron
- 1386-87 b. William atte Gappe, Edmund Oudolf, Richard Elys, Edmund Bie
- 1387-88 b. John Elys, William de Oxneye, Robert Howlyn, John de Martham
- 1388-89 b. John de Beverle, Robert atte Gappe, Bartholomew de Drayton, John de Beketon
- 1389-90 b. Ralph Ramseye, Roger de Drayton, Hugh atte Fen, Thomas Marche
- 1390-91 b. William atte Gappe, Alexander Fastolf, Nicholas de Drayton, John Hakon
- 1391-92 b. John Elys, William de Oxneye, Bartholomew Elys, Robert Howlyn
- 1392-93 b. John de Beverle, John Elys junior, John Hughesson, William Ekles
- 1393-94 b. Ralph Ramseye, John de Beketon, Hugh atte Fen, Bartholomew de Drayton
- 1394-95 b. Thomas Marche, John atte Gappe, William Savage, Edmund Wyth
- 1395-96 b. John Elys senior, William de Oxneye, John Hakon, Richard Cleye
- 1396-97 b. Ralph Ramseye, Hugh atte Fen, Bartholomew Elys, Bartholomew de Drayton
- 1397-98 b. John Beketon, William de Oxneye, Thomas Marche, Thomas Halle

- 1398-99 b. Ralph Ramseye, Hugh atte Fen, John atte Gappe, Richard Cleye
- 1399-1400 b. John Elys, William de Oxneye, Bartholomew de Drayton, Robert atte Fen
- 1400-01 b. Hugh atte Fen, John Hughesson, Edmund Wyth, Thomas Carter
- 1401-02 b. William de Oxneye, John de Beketon, Richard Cleye, Roger Adams
- 1402-03 b. Hugh atte Fen, John atte Gappe, Bartholomew Elys, William Savage
- 1403-04 b. John de Beketon, William de Oxneye, Richard Cleye, Alexander atte Gappe
- 1404-05 b. John atte Gappe, John Hughesson, William Savage, Thomas White
- 1405-06 b. William de Oxneye, Hugh atte Fen, Bartholomew de Drayton, Bartholomew Elys
- 1406-07 b. John atte Gappe, Richard Cleye, Geoffrey Pampyng, Henry Rafman
- 1407-08 b. Hugh atte Fen, John Hughesson, Thomas Redberd, John Spitlyng
- 1408-09 b. William de Oxneye, Bartholomew Elys, Robert Elys, Thomas Clabeyn
- 1409-10 b. Henry Rafman, Edmund Wyth, Alexander atte Gappe, Ralph Leffyng
- 1410-11 b. John Hughesson, Geoffrey Pampyng, James Freeman, Thomas Conehithe
- 1411-12 b. Richard Cleye, Thomas White, Nicholas Cates, John Cranelee
- 1412-13 b. William Oxneye junior, Robert Elys senior, Thomas Clabeyn, John Soterton
- 1413-14 b. Geoffrey Pampyng, Robert Elys junior, Thomas Conehithe, William Colkirke
- 1414-15 b. Bartholomew Elys, Richard Cleye, Peter Savage, John Fen
- 1415-16 b. Edmund Wyth, Thomas White, Ralph Leffyng, Henry Spitlyng
- 1416-17 b. Robert Elys junior, John Spitlyng, Thomas Conehithe, Bartholomew Oxneye
- 1417-18 b. Bartholomew Elys, John Fen, John Hastyng, John Soterton
- 1418-19 b. Thomas Dengayne, Geoffrey Pampyng, Thomas White, Richard Elys
- 1419-20 b. Alexander atte Gappe, John Spitlyng, Thomas Conehithe, Robert Cupper
- 1420-21 b. John Leverych, John Hastyng, John Snellyng, Thomas Eyr
- 1421-22 b. Bartholomew Elys, John Cranelee, Roger Hoddes, Ralph Wevan
- 1422-23 b. Robert Elys, William Oxneye, Robert Cupper, William atte Fen
- 1423-24 b. Richard Elys, Thomas Conehithe, Thomas White, William atte Gappe
- 1424-25 b. Thomas Dengayne, John Hastyng, John Spitlyng, John Pynne
- 1425-26 b. Robert Cupper, Roger Hoddes, Thomas Eyr, Richard Flicke
- 1426-27 b. Robert Elys, William Oxneye
ch. unknown
- 1427-28 b. Richard Elys, John Manning
ch. Peter Fen, John Brackenham
- 1428-29 b. Thomas Dengayne, Thomas White
ch. Thomas Hillys, Thomas Chaunceux
- 1429-30 b. Robert Elys, Thomas Eyr
ch. Simon Folsham, Robert Persoun

- 1430-31 Richard Elys, John Pynne
ch. Thomas Adams, Robert Osbern
- 1431-32 b. Richard Elys, John Pynne
ch. Thomas Adams, Robert Osbern
- 1432-33 b. Robert Elys, Thomas Fen
ch. John Auncell, John Crowmer
- 1433-34 b. Robert Elys, John Hastyng
ch. John Westgate, Peter Dowe
- 1434-35 b. Roger Hoddes, John Philip
ch. Thomas Martyn, John Gedgebalt
- 1435-36 b. John Wydewell, John Chapman
ch. Robert Horrowe, John Wellys
- 1436-37 b. John Pynne, Robert Phelysson
ch. John Davy, Richard Tommesson
- 1437-38 b. Robert Elys, Thomas Humfrey
ch. John Brounyng, Alexander Brygate
- 1438-39 b. William atte Gappe, Thomas Martyn
ch. John Arnald, Nicholas Borell
- 1439-40 b. Robert Pynne, John Auncell
ch. John Everton, John Andrews
- 1440-41 b. Thomas Fen, Simon Folsham
ch. John Swolle, John Burdon
- 1441-42 b. Roger Hoddes, Thomas Hillys [\[21\]](#)
ch. unknown
- 1442-43 b. Robert Elys, John Chapman
ch. unknown
- 1443-44 b. John Pynne, Peter Dowe
ch. John Cecely, Thomas Lincoln
- 1444-45 b. Ralph Lampet, William atte Gappe
ch. Thomas Kysse, Thomas Wevyng
- 1445-46 b. Hamon Pulham, John Auncell
ch. John Swetman, Richard Groome
- 1446-47 b. Thomas Martyn, Simon Folsham
ch. William Jullys, John Codlyng
- 1447-48 b. Thomas Fen, Robert Pynne
ch. Geoffrey Hemmyng, Thomas Thorp
- 1448-49 b. Thomas Hillys, John Swolle
ch. Peter Levesson, John Buxston
- 1449-50 b. John Chapman, Peter Dowe
ch. Thomas Warner, William Holme

- 1450-51 b. Ralph Lampet, Hamon Pulham
 ch. John Alman, Thomas Belle
- 1451-52 b. Robert Pynne, Edmund Wydewell
 ch. John Wacy, John Tolke
- 1452-53 b. Thomas Martyn, John Westgate
 ch. John Pynne junior, Thomas Ponde
- 1453-54 b. Thomas Fen, John Alman
 ch. Robert Ingram, John Moine
- 1454-55 b. Ralph Lampet, Hamon Pulham
 ch. John Maynard, Roger Redehode
- 1455-56 b. Peter Dowe, Thomas Kysse
 ch. William Snellyng, John Merston
- 1456-57 b. Edmund Wydewell, Alexander Brygate
 ch. unknown
- 1457-58 b. Thomas Fen, John Pynne
 ch. Richard Bunne, Robert Candeler
- 1458-59 b. Robert Pynne, John Alman
 ch. unknown
- 1459-60 b. Hamon Pulham, John Codlyng
 ch. Robert Joye, William Bedingham
- 1460-61 b. William Julles, Thomas Thorpe
 ch. Walter Ingram, Edmund Ponde

APPENDIX I: Lists of Office-holders

Introduction | Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders
Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration
Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics | Conclusion

Yarmouth - St. Nicholas's church

St. Nicholas' reflects the essence of medieval Yarmouth as a town reliant on the sea and its harvest. Dedicated to the patron saint of sailors and others who earn their livelihood from the sea, it was built by the Bishop of Norwich in the early twelfth century to supersede an earlier church believed to have been created to serve the local and visiting (Cinque Ports) fishermen.

As the sole parish church serving Yarmouth, St. Nicholas' was over time expanded into a relatively large building capable of holding a sizeable congregation. It was the beneficiary of many bequests from townspeople, who also contributed to extensions of the building, while social gilds also contributed to its improvement (notably the creation of chapels with which they then became associated). The creation of a "Bachelor's aisle" in the 1330s was halted by the Black Death. As was the case with many urban parish churches, its fabric was renovated and improved in the fifteenth century. Destroyed by bombing in the Second World War, the church was rebuilt on its medieval plan and re-consecrated in 1960.

The parish system developed at about the same time that towns were proliferating, in the Anglo-Saxon period. In the beginning, a town was often served by a single mother church, typically founded by the lord of the land, unless it emerged from the amalgamation of several settlements or estates of different landlords, each served by its own church (e.g. Norwich). As urban populations grew and boundaries expanded, new churches and parishes appeared, some quite small; Yarmouth and Bishop's Lynn represent exceptions to this process, perhaps because of the pre-eminent role of the Bishop in each and because of limited scope for geographical expansion. In the twelfth century the Church asserted control over many of the privately-owned parish churches.

These churches provided a key element of medieval urban society and culture. Spiritual comfort and security in life and in death is one of the most evident contributions. But among the roles that prominent churches and their churchyards played in medieval times was that of meeting-place for the community at large, or (inside) for smaller assemblies, to debate borough business; as well as sanctuary for criminals, who might hope for protection there from the mob or the agents of authority, for long enough for them to abjure the realm (i.e. admit to their crimes and take an oath to leave the country). Another role was as a solemn location for the conduct of private business, such as the making of a commercial contract (for which a deposit sometimes known as "God's penny" was a further guarantee of good faith), the payment of debt instalments, or the taking of oaths.

Not all of the multiple urban parish churches had, or could maintain over time, large enough congregations to earn the income (e.g. from tithes) to survive. However, in the Late Middle Ages, the foundation by townspeople of socio-religious guilds (and chapels, within parish churches, to serve them), the endowment of chantries to pray for the souls of the deceased, and the combination of pride and bad conscience that encouraged prospering merchants to channel some of their profits into renovation projects, all helped keep many churches vigorous institutions in the life of the town.

For further information on St. Nicholas' see Palmer's Perustration of Great Yarmouth.

main menu

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 7

Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

Discords and Disputes: Yarmouth and Norwich

It was suggested in chapters 2, 3 and 5 that there was no lack of mobility in urban society and politics. Transfer of power was normally a gradual and peaceful process; but on occasion, where a group of townsmen clung to power, it was sometimes necessary for the excluded and frustrated nouveaux riches to resort to more forceful means to obtain a share in power. This may have been the case at Ipswich in 1320/1, and less clearly at Colchester in 1372. We seem to perceive the same process at Yarmouth, where a good deal of the visible conflict was centered around family rivalries, perhaps intensified by the decline in the town's prosperity in the second half of the fourteenth century. The reign of Edward I saw a struggle between factions, with the one led by the Draytons succeeding in ousting the longer-established Gerberges from their position of prominence in the borough. Further violent outbursts occurred 1357-59, following swiftly on the heels of a royal investigation into monopolisation of hostage by the town's leading families (1357). The violence featured the Draytons and Fastolfs ranged against the relatively newly-established families of Elys and Stalham. The former families were apparently backed by a London faction whose interests at the herring fair were obstructed by the latter families, prominent in the 1357/8 administration.[\[47\]](#)

On top of these family rivalries were the troubles between rulers and ruled. Events surrounding the promulgation of Yarmouth's 1272 ordinances are rather obscure, but there is some evidence that tempers were rising dangerously in the preceding period, so that the king ordered arrests to be made. The establishment of a formal town council may have been intended as a check upon ballival government, but the principal concern of the ordinances seems more with market abuses and establishment of law and order. The rich and poor burgesses of Yarmouth were again in contention regarding fair market practices in 1281. In 1297 we hear of fresh disturbances of the peace. And a complaint by the poor men of the community, of forestalling by the rich men, was partly responsible for a royal prohibition of forestalling and brokerage at Yarmouth in 1306.[\[48\]](#) The constitutional reforms of 1426 and 1491 also appear the consequences of disputes and complaints of misgovernment, with typical solutions of counterbalancing ballival power, ensuring fair elections, and restricting the bailiffs' access to community revenues.[\[49\]](#) The best-documented outburst of popular discontent, however, does not seem to have produced any reforms. In 1375 the commonalty was employing organised force to express its resentment of financial maladministration, and of the market abuses (particularly regarding the purchase of herring) of the leading families, to the derogation of the equal rights principle of the borough liberties. The town rulers in turn were responding to violence with violence. The "poveres Communes" petitioned parliament for relief from oppression and injustice in 1376, and the king intervened to prohibit unlawful popular assemblies and to order the offending "rich men" to appear before him to explain themselves; but there is no sign of a satisfactory settlement to the dispute. Again, there is some indication of a London interest involved on the side of the rich, and we may note that Hugh Fastolf, who later moved permanently to London, was prominent in both the 1358/9 and 1375/6 affairs.[50]

If at Yarmouth the grievances of the townsmen focused on monopolisation of trade by a few of their number, at Norwich constitutional problems are more to the fore. The first grievances we encounter relate again to financial malpractices of the city rulers. The complaint about forestalling in 1304 was joined, in the following year, by one concerning misappropriation of the proceeds of excessive taxations. Whether the clause in the 1305 charter granting that the city government might levy tallages on the community, so long as they were reasonable and approved by common consent, was the outcome of this complaint (and whether the clause should be construed as authorizing or restricting taxation) is not quite clear, since the investigations were still going on in 1308. It is also difficult to say whether the petitions, undated but probably from the reign of Edward II, embodying the grievances of the poor and middle people of Norwich, were connected with the 1305 affair or later disputes. These petitions speak of tallages levied without common consent, and of a royal commission that had been appointed to investigate earlier complaints, but which had been deceived by an inquisition manipulated by the bailiffs and by promises from the upper class of future good behaviour. The consequence of these repeated complaints was chapter 47 of the city customal. A compromise solution, it provided for public accounting by tax officials and chamberlains, so that the community should know how taxes were spent by the city rulers, and for the "more discreet" of the crafts guildsmen to be the assessors; but no reference was made to the principle of common consent.[51]

That omission seems more significant in the light of what was to come. Although we have no explicit indication of further class-based political conflict until the early fifteenth century, the disputes of that period stem partly from an earlier event. In 1371 there were violent disturbances in the city, seemingly popular protests against its government. At this period Norwich's council was crystallising into a formal institution and the city rulers were experimenting with restricted participation at assemblies, notably the representation of the community by selected craft guildsmen who would take over the role as electors.[52] Whatever the reasoning behind this - be it consolidation of the ruling class' hold on power, the elimination of unruly behaviour at assemblies, or the desire to guarantee some community participation - the petition of 1378, whereby the rulers sought from the king the power to make by-laws without consulting the community, appears somewhat sinister, particularly since the reason given for seeking this power was that the rulers wished to combat the contrarious behaviour of the commons.[53] Yet if the grant of this petition, in 1380, was the triumph for the oligarchy as which it could be interpreted, strange that it was not the subject of popular criticism until the complaints issued by the "greater part of the citizens and community" against the "more venerable citizens" (viz. the ruling class) in 1414. It is difficult to believe that, having obtained so potent a weapon, the city rulers would leave its use to the next generation.

The divergent ambitions of rulers and ruled resurfaced only with the substitution of mayoralty for ballivalty in 1403. Almost instantly the populace asserted its right to elect the executive, by keeping William Appleyard, the architect of the constitutional change, in office for three consecutive terms - a move of dubious legality, and against which the ruling class reacted by superseding Appleyard's election to a fourth term and appointing their own candidate. That Appleyard acquiesced in this suggests he was no more than a figurehead for the democratic faction. The charges laid, after several more years of contention, indicate that the community objected to its gradual exclusion from such little control of government as it had - that is, electoral rights and the right of consent - and that it feared it was losing authority over the government personnel, a fear sharpened by the continuing (it was claimed) financial abuses and market crimes of those personnel. The counter-charges of the ruling class confirm their goal of gaining a stronger grip on power, for the sake of efficient government, at the expense of what they considered to be the less capable section of the population. The Composition of 1415, given royal blessing two years later, confirmed the principle of common consent. But it was really a victory for the ruling class, in that it allowed only a controlled popular access to decision-making, via the Common Council, and it guaranteed their independence by making the upper council a life-membership body. This division of authority, best reflected in the system of divided control over elections, was contrary to the original constitutional principle, but was the only settlement acceptable to both sides.[\[54\]](#)

Indeed, the new system seems to have satisfied. A subsequent outbreak of political conflict was not class-based, but the result of factions within the ruling class - something the Tripartite Indenture of 1424 fearfully anticipated but failed to prevent. The affair, named after its central figure, Thomas Wetherby, has been discussed by many historians and we will not unravel its intricate details here. Suffice to say that Wetherby tried to dominate city affairs by having his protégés elected to the mayoralty, when not himself therein, or to other offices. Thwarted in this, he stirred up old quarrels between the city and the Prior of Norwich and other local ecclesiastics, promising to assist the cause of the churchmen; he also stirred up factionalism at city elections. The resultant disturbances of the peace were sufficiently serious for the king to set up investigations, appoint arbitrators from magnates whose favour Wetherby had obtained, and eventually (1442) to seize city government into his own hand after the citizenry vented their frustration in an insurrectionary protest. The suspension of the powers of the local rulers gave Wetherby a free hand to pursue his will in the city. Evaluation of this lengthy and complex conflict, which did not fully end until some years after Wetherby's death (1445), is complicated by the fact that our knowledge of it is primarily from records drawn up by Wetherby's opponents, the city government. Precisely as a consequence of this, he has been severely criticised by Hudson and equally ardently defended by Blake. Here we may suggest a slightly different perspective. It is not important to us whether Wetherby was an unscrupulous, self-seeking troublemaker, or an upholder of the cause of right in the face of the city's unjust claims against local religious institutions. What aggrieved the city government was that Wetherby, as a freeman and as an alderman bound by the Tripartite Indenture, owed unswerving loyalty to the city, right or wrong. Instead, he chose to promote dissent and division in aldermannic ranks, support the city's enemies, and compound his errors by obtaining the maintenance and intervention of the Earl of Suffolk and the Duke of Norfolk. We cannot entirely blame Wetherby for this. He was one of a new breed of townsman, whose roots came from the gentry and who retained strong gentry links even while pursuing an urban career in commerce. Whether he actually represented the county wool-growers in their desire to obtain influence in Norwich, which controlled wool-marketing, must remain a matter for argument; but there can be no doubt that his interests and his loyalties were divided, with disastrous results for the city.[55]

👈 previous

next 👉

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 1

The Structure of Borough Government

Checks and Balances

A word must be said about the office of coroner, which too had something of a dual aspect. Since a franchise independent of the county was being created by town charters, we find coroners - under that title or the more formal title of justiciar or custodian of pleas of the crown - granted by the king at the same time as grant of an executive. Two or four were the common numbers; Ipswich was granted four in 1200, but persuaded the king to reduce this to two in 1317.[\[52\]](#) The coroners were primarily royal officers, appointed (via approval of borough elections) by the king and removed by him, if not first removed by death; an unfortunate consequence of this orientation being the scarcity of coroners' rolls in borough archives. Recent historians of Yarmouth, where coroners are rarely mentioned, have concluded that those officers were no challenge to ballival power.[\[53\]](#) But the intention was probably otherwise, for borough coroners - like their county counterparts - had supervisory functions, to ensure the impartiality of ballival justice, to serve as contrarotulatores, and perhaps to keep an eye on the administration of court revenues. At Ipswich the 1200 proceedings took care to specify the counterbalancing role of the coroners, and bailiffs and coroners were listed side by side in court roll headings and witness lists of thirteenth and fourteenth centuries; the cooperation of bailiffs and coroners in Norwich's court is also evidenced.[\[54\]](#) As a check on ballival power we may doubt the effectiveness of coroners, since the two offices were manned by much the same personnel. At Ipswich some of the coroners' duties were subsequently given to the chamberlains, and the slipping of position of coroners' names in fifteenth century witness lists (to behind the names of councillors) is also indicative of their decreasing importance.[\[55\]](#) By the seventeenth century their supervisory role was remembered only in their symbolic act of holding the oath-book from which the bailiffs were sworn annually.

It is not the intention of this study to analyse the minor officialdom of borough bureaucracies that backed up the executive. Suffice to say that they were founded on the town clerks and sergeants, the latter often known as sub-bailiffs or even bailiffs - Yarmouth, at least, provides some hint of seniorities within their ranks. As borough jurisdictions grew and financial affairs complicated, lesser officials proliferated under a variety of titles. Some were appointed, some elected, others farmed their offices. The predominant concerns of borough administrations are sometimes reflected by their ranks: Yarmouth had its murage staff, its herring warders, its water-bailiff; Colchester its farmers of customs and mensurage at the port and in town; Maldon its custodians of market, river and causeway, its bread-weighers and ale-tasters; Lynn its janitors of the town gates and its bedeman; Ipswich its porters and clavigers.^[56]

The financial office was too important in the medieval borough to be simply part of the bureaucracy.^[57] Borough revenue was the lifeline by which the fee farm was paid annually and the town's liberties were thus preserved; and by which the inevitable and rising expenses of a developing administration were defrayed. Presumably some accounting system was part of the administrative arrangement from the first, but there does not seem to have been a specialised financial officer at that point. To suggest, as Wodderspoon does, that the collectors of local custom instituted in Ipswich in 1200 were actually chamberlains is to stretch the evidence too far; not they, but the bailiffs, were primarily responsible for this income reaching the Exchequer in the shape of the fee farm - as indeed the instituting ordinance implies.^[58] Most probably the executive was initially the accounting officer in our other towns too. The earliest borough account known from Lynn (1271/2) is that of the mayor; chamberlains are first mentioned in 1295.^[59] Norwich's first financial officer appears in 1293, without official title, handling revenues other than those which went towards the fee farm, for which the bailiffs accounted; this system was maintained throughout the fourteenth century and was reflected in the establishment of sheriffs in 1404 to deal with the fee farm. At just the same period as in Lynn and Norwich, financial officers made their first appearance (1291) in Yarmouth, in the form of keepers of the pyx (the chest containing the town treasury); their importance is suggested by the fact that the few whose names are known were former bailiffs. Again it seems that they handled only a portion of the revenues, the bailiffs and muragers dealing with others; reorganisation of finances seems to have eliminated the keepers before the end of the reign of Edward II.^[60] In Maldon too bailiffs were the accounting officers up until the mid-fifteenth century. Chamberlains were introduced in 1404, consequent to the increase in administrative activity brought about by the 1403 charter; they were created to relieve the bailiffs of some of their more routine duties.^[61]

Financial officers had no formal or visible influence over the borough's financial policies. They were required to make payments at the executive's command; they were forbidden to deny such command or to pay out any monies on their own initiative, unsupervised.^[62] Yet they were not mere functionaries, but watchdogs over the executive in its receipt and spending of community funds; the coroner does not seem to have been considered a sufficient check on misuse of executive power.^[63] Financial officers were often instituted in connection with administrative reforms. They were a key feature of the Ipswich reforms of 1320, directed largely against ballival greed and embezzlement. Chamberlains were to be elected annually to have receipt of all town revenues and payment of expenses (salaries were especially mentioned), to be present when the bailiffs performed any duty involving a financial transaction, and to draw up counter-rolls in the town court to prevent tampering with that record of fines and amercements. Ipswich's chamberlains seems to be an entirely new office; although the town's undated, but ancient, custumal refers to untitled persons performing camerarian duties, the reference has the appearance of an addition to the main capitula and the tenor reminds us of the circumstances of 1320.^[64] The receivers of Colchester, later known as chamberlains, arose out of that town's 1372 reforms, again the result of complaints of financial maladministration by the bailiffs. And the substitution of two chamberlains for two of Yarmouth's four bailiffs, in 1426, was also part of a reorganisation consequent to popular discontent.[\[65\]](#) Even in Norwich and Lynn there are indications of the watchdog role of the chamberlains. In the former the earliest reference to officers of this title is in a chapter of the city customal, perhaps the product of complaints c.1326 of unjust taxation; the chapter assigns them a role in tax collection henceforth. At Lynn, ordinances insisted that only the chamberlains receive borough revenues, which they were immediately to put under lock and key in the treasury (1342), and prohibited the mayor from having possession of any community funds unless received from the chamberlains (1448).[\[66\]](#)

The relative importance of the financial officer increased over the course of time. Maldon's chamberlains replaced the bailiffs as accounting officers sometime between 1447 and 1468; from 1465 they were ranked second in the borough hierarchy, displacing the constables.[\[67\]](#) By the end of the fourteenth century Ipswich's sergeants had been assigned to act under the chamberlains in their collection of monies. During the reign of Henry VI we come across both chamberlains and treasurers in that town. Whether these were the same officers by different titles is difficult to say. Norwich too had officers of both titles and, at least in 1414, the treasurers were portrayed as subordinates of the chamberlains. Yet in seventeenth century (and possibly medieval) Ipswich the division was rather one of areas of jurisdiction.[\[68\]](#) There are other indications of the importance of the office. Colchester's fifteenth century ordinances made provision for the foregoing of annual elections of chamberlains in the event (it is implied) that the competence of any of the officers in tenure warranted their continuation therein. We see the same in the Yarmouth reforms of 1491, doubling the number of chamberlains and advising that any found to do a good job should be kept in office for at least one further term.[\[69\]](#) The concern for producing a budget surplus probably was what prompted the farming of the Ipswich office to John Felawe, in 1439, for 12 years; but perhaps someone had second thoughts, as the arrangement did not last its full term if, indeed, ever implemented. In 1447 chamberlains were elected there for a two-year term with a special programme, and henceforth re-election in this office became more common. Similarly, in Lynn, where an ordinance of 1423 required that there always be at least two chamberlains present at every congregation, it was decided in 1449 (perhaps to cut back on salaries) that William Ashill and William Gilbert alone hold the office for 5 years; problems with non-attendance prompted the abandonment of this experiment after the first year.[\[70\]](#)

🔍 previous

next 🔍

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

Created: July 30, 1998. Last update: December 1, 1998

© Stephen Alford, 1998-2003

August 1491

The gaoler and other sergeants shall be chosen and appointed through the advice of the bailiffs; they are to choose such men as they are prepared to answer for. The gaoler is to find sufficient surety for the keeping of the gaol, according to ancient custom, to discharge the bailiffs and the town [of their responsibilities for the same]. The gaoler and the sergeants are to take oath upon a book to perform honestly their duties; they are to find sureties for their honest collection and levying of estreats, and for honest delivery to the chamberlains of all money therefrom. [They are] not craftily to conceal or cover up any complaints or grievances brought before them, or any other profits from the court or market, arranging a settlement between parties privately for their own financial gain, to the loss and damage of the town through concealment of amercements and court profits. Each of these officers, if honest and diligent, shall have for his yearly wage 20s., and a gown according to ancient custom. These officers are, when not occupied on town business, attend and wait on the bailiffs. If one fails to attend, without reasonable excuse, then he is to lose from his wages 2d. the first time, 4d. the second, and so on doubling as often as he defaults (except on the grace [i.e. forgiveness of the bailiffs]). If any sergeant is found to behave dishonestly in office and acts falsely, contrary to these ordinances, and this is proven, he is to forfeit 10s. of his wages and lose his office forever.

August 1491

The chamberlains, in consultation with the bailiffs, shall choose as water-bailiff someone considered honest, diligent and profitable to the town; he shall be sworn before the bailiffs and chamberlains that he shall duly and honestly perform his duties in all matters that the chamberlains shall assigned him to undertake to the profit of the town. The water-bailiff shall in no regard collect customs from merchandize of denizens or outsiders coming [by ship or boat] into the haven or streams, but shall bring the owner or master of [the vessel] to the assigned house to pay custom to the chamberlains. Accurate lists of all such customs are to be brought into the court each week, to be enrolled according to ancient custom. The wages of a water-bailiff who performs his duties well and diligently shall henceforth be 33s.4d annually, plus a gown [i.e. livery] to be paid for by the chamberlains.

Early Town Planning in Great Yarmouth

Page 4 of 4

Once the town walls had been constructed, these huge masses of stone dictated the layout that the ancient planners could adhere to, as nobody wanted to build outside them. The style adopted by the planners was to build the houses in parallel lines so that more could be accommodated. The houses were so close together that in one row (being only 27 inches wide), one could shake the hand of the neighbour opposite whilst leaning out of the window.

These rows were built so that the pavements ran East to West, and as the street layout followed the natural fall of the land, the sewerage and rain dispersed quickly. It also ensured that there was always a flow of strong air blowing through the streets which helped clean out the stale air and smoke.

Great Yarmouth in 1751

At one time there were 145 of these rows each named after some notable person living in or after some peculiar character that it possessed, however, in 1804 in the interests of efficiency every row received a number, after several rows had had more than one name.

The rows were much too narrow for normal vehicular traffic and in consequence a special cart, known as a “troll” was constructed to carry herring and other merchandise from one end of the town to the other. These trolls, which were quite common as far back as the reign of Henry VIII, were about 12 feet long and just over 3 feet wide. They had a very short, low back axle with wheels running under the body of the carriage. They were extremely easy to load and when not in use could be tipped on end with the shafts in the air and then occupied very little space. In the eighteenth century it became quite fashionable for visitors to have rides on the troll carts, and for anyone visiting Great Yarmouth it was not considered a visit unless you had had a ride on one of these contraptions.

Unfortunately many of the rows were destroyed during the Second World War, and others have been pulled down to make way for new developments.

← Back Section Index

The Walls of Great Yarmouth

Page 3 of 4

The townsfolk of Great Yarmouth were in a very exposed location, being within easy reach of the sea, and in 1261 Henry III gave orders for the town to be enclosed by a wall and moat to defend the town of possible invasion, but work was not to start on the project until 24 years later.

The materials for these walls came from pebbles found lying on the beaches and local flint, due to the shortage of building stone in the area. The construction of square towers was out of the question, (except for one tower built for King Henry), as this would have involved using stone for the corners, and so the rest of the towers were built round.

Great Yarmouth's Walls

The walls were 23 feet high and 2200 yards long and enclosed an area of 133 acres. It seems likely that King Henry's Tower in St. Nicholas Churchyard was the first tower built and that wall, broken by no fewer than eight gates, was continued in a southerly direction as far as Black Friars Tower, and at this point it turned through a right angle to the river bank. Between Blackfriars Tower and the river the principal entrance to the town, the South Gate, was erected.

The South Gate

The coming of the Black death in 1349, caused work on the wall to be stopped, but its effect had passed off, and work began again. This time the walls were extended from King Henry's Tower across the northern boundary of the churchyard and across the road leading to Caister. Here another main entrance to the town, the imposing North Gate, was erected, and there is reason for believing that its two lofty square towers and central portal were built at the expense of those who had become rich bury the dead during the plague.

The North Gate

The walls then extended to the River Bure and terminated with the Northwest Tower. When the wall was finished a moat was dug all around it and Yarmouth was as strongly a fortified town as one would expect to meet in the Middle Ages.

As the town was developing quite rapidly, some townsfolk decided to build up against the town wall, due to the shelter that they provided, and in 1545 the Duke of Norfolk, instructed by Henry VIII, ordered the immediate destruction of these dwellings, as they compromised the defences of the town and looked an eyesore.

The rumour of a Spanish Armada spread, and Elizabeth (the current monarch) was so convinced of the importance of a fortified Yarmouth that she compelled Norfolk, Suffolk, and Norfolk to pay large sums of money towards the repair of the walls, whilst she herself despatched supplies of gunpowder and arms. Several cannon were strategically placed on a mound of earth higher than the wall itself, which was raised to the West of the South Gate, from this position the river could be commanded.

Once peace was declared, Charles I ordered an inspection to be made of the defences in 1625, and to his astonishment found that the walls were in a very bad state. He then asked for the walls to be strengthened once again, with an additional thirty cannon.

When the civil war began the town declared for parliament and those suspected of royalist activities were locked in the towers. The town gates were kept locked, drawbridges were raised, the moats deepened and a watch kept from the walls.

The defences were being manned, however, for the last time, and when the war was over they were allowed to fall into decay - this time forever.

Great Yarmouth Web Publishers / Revised April 2002

Copyright ©2002 GYWP. All Rights Reserved

January 1413

- Concerning all herring brought to town by fishermen who are strangers, the host may have [i.e. buy] two parts and the community the third part (for the same price that the host buys each of his parts).
- The host may have half of all herring brought by English fishermen not of the town, and the community the other half at the same price.
- Fishermen of the town must sell half their herring to the community.
- No-one is to buy herring and take it to his house before the town wardens have seen it and obtained the community's half.
- The committee selects as wardens [of the herring trade]: Henry Spitlyng, John Ellingham, Thomas Eye, John Norton, William Oudolf, Thomas Adams, Thomas Halle, and Richard Roberd. They are to be replaced annually [through election?] by the community. They are to have 4d. per last for their fee.
- The bailiffs, 24, and the wardens shall be sworn each year to uphold these statutes.

[These articles were copied from a document issued by bailiffs and community on 25 January 1413, in which they agreed to accept a set of ordinances made by a 10-burgess committee they had appointed for that purpose – apparently a settlement of concerns over local merchants having too much control over the herring trade. By this period, the fishery was much less productive than it had been a century earlier; the scarcity and price of herring had increased, making it more important to the lesser townsmen that they had access to this high-protein food without the interference of middlemen.]

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 5

Professionalism in Administration

Career Administrators

Precisely how much expertise we can distinguish in the upper levels of urban government, when most of its members remained at best part-time administrators, is questionable. Yet there were a few men who, either by inclination or by training, devoted a greater part of their time than most to a broad range of administrative activities, so that we might be warranted to conclude that they built careers from administrative work. The employment of estate administrators, the use of attornies, the development of credit, and the formation of syndicates, all contributed to allowing the wealthier townsmen to diversify their interests, which they could control from a central point without the need for constant travelling. If Pirenne's itinerant-chapman-as-proto-burgess was ever a prominent feature of medieval society, by the later Middle Ages he was an anachronism. The same developments drew townsmen into new relationships, and new lines of work open to the capable amateur. We have already made mention of townsmen who engaged in estate administration or legal work in their local courts, as a sideline.^[55] Careers in administration or high finance may not have developed in England as quickly and to the same degree of specialisation as on the continent, but we are not bound to follow Thrupp in thinking that "young men of ambition who did not care for trade" had little alternative other than a life on the land.^[56]

In fact, there were various alternatives. Of legal work, a role in the Church, and service to magnates, we have already given some indication. But certainly the largest lodestone around which the interest of townsmen polarized was royal service. Some of this was relatively informal, like the ad hoc commissions appointing taxation officials, purveyors, or "king's merchants"; these were essentially only extensions of the mercantile activity normally engaged in.^[57] Yet the royal administration network was a hydra, the numerous more permanent officials the heads on tentacular necks stretching back to the central organs of government. Omniverous, almost cancerous, its infiltration of borough administration is not immediately obvious. Only as an after-thought do we realise that the coroners and constables who appear, at first glance, integral parts of the urban administrative hierarchy were employed by the king; or that the town bailiffs were, strictly speaking, royal officers, required to take an oath of allegiance to the king, a technicality not diminished by the fact that the burgesses leased the right to choose the holders of those offices. Thus, on top of their local duties presiding over court and assembly, the bailiffs (and indeed any executive) were required to perform a variety of less regular but not infrequent tasks for the king.^[58]

One branch of the royal service was the military, although burgesses - who were on the whole no lovers of war - were rarely active therein, except when they needed to earn pardons for their crimes. However, John Perbroun's best-known role is as admiral of the northern fleet in 1322, 1323, 1327, and 1333, and he captained the Yarmouth contingent at Sluys. Besides being bailiff of Yarmouth 14 times between 1312 and 1340, Perbroun was in the customs service from 1330 to 1341, and on several judicial commissions. His services earned him the rewards of the grant of a royal ship in 1325 and £100 in 1333, yet his story ends on a sour note, with the posthumous seizure of his lands (1343) consequent to debts owed the Exchequer from his accounts as customer.[59] Another Yarmouth man, John Hakon, spent most of the period 1369-77 as master of a royal ship, and afterwards became involved in borough administration (3 times bailiff and 6 times M.P. 1382-96), although he continued to perform mariner's services: transporting pilgrims abroad in 1394 and organising naval expeditions for east coast defence in 1386 and 1398. In 1391 he had been rewarded, at the request of the Duke of Lancaster, with the grant of 6d. a day from Yarmouth customs. It comes as no surprise to find that his residence was adjacent to Yarmouth's harbour.[60] Like Hakon, Ralph Ramsey was a Yarmouth servant of the Lancastrians: esquire to Henry Bolingbroke, he was co-feoffee with Sir Simon Burley in a Herefordshire manor in 1388. After the termination of his esquire's duties he became involved in Yarmouth administration (5 times bailiff, 8 times M.P., and several customs posts between 1384 and 1399), but played an active role in the usurpation of Bolingbroke and was well-rewarded in 1399/1400 with a £40 annuity, a life-grant of St. Olave's ferry (near Yarmouth), and 2 tuns of wine annually. The accession of Henry IV was a boost to his career. Even before 1399 he had occasionally served as commissioner and in 1388 was farming the priory of Toftes (Norfolk) from the crown; after 1399 he was commissioner far more frequently, was appointed in 1406 to supervise expenditure on the crossing of princess Philippa to Denmark, sat in parliament for Suffolk in 1402, was county sheriff in 1403/4 and 1408/9, and in 1415 led his own retinue to fight in France.[61]

Saul has distinguished among the Yarmouth burgesses "a small group of men on whom the king relied heavily and who served him in several capacities over many years,"[62] and similar groups may be discovered in Lynn, Ipswich, and Colchester. Just over 50 of our men from these four towns performed services for the king, or for other magnates and prelates, over and above the occasional commission or standard posts in the customs network. We shall not review here the careers of Thomas de Melcheburn and John de Wesenham, some of whose services to the king have already been listed, although a whole chapter could be devoted to their great services to Edward III.[63] Some of the stewards of Lynn were chosen by the Bishop from Lynn men, whilst others appear to have settled in Lynn as a consequence of holding the stewardship. Richard de Rougham was steward 1358-61, and in 1361/2 a John Reed, son of Richard Reed de Rougham, was clerk to the steward. This John was subsequently steward himself (1370/1), by which time he had married the daughter of alderman William de Bitering; he entered the franchise 1371, was chamberlain and jurat later in the decade, and possibly the Norfolk escheator of that name c.1380.[64] Thomas Derham, legal advisor to Lynn 1400-19 and its M.P. in 1406, served as steward in 1406/7 and was on dozens of commissions in Lynn, Norfolk, and Suffolk in and after the same period; a William de Derham, alias Cailly, had been bailiff to the steward 1367-76 and also served as jurat (1376-82), coroner (1380/1), and custodian of the Lynn Tolbooth (1377-80), whilst a Robert Cailly was appointed steward of Lynn in 1384, having held the stewardship of other of the Bishop's manors since 1380, and may conceivably be the Robert de Derham who was chamberlain for Lynn in 1350/1.[65] William de Whetacre, M.P. and jurat of Lynn in 1325, was the Bishop's steward 1326-28 and 1329-31, was in the customs service 1309-35 (in one or other of the posts of collector of wool custom, collector of prisage, and searcher for coin), and was keeper of the king's part of the Tolbooth 1333-40.[66] In the fifteenth century we find members of the Yelverton and Paston families in the steward's office.

A few men followed a legal career into royal service. The Nicholas Fastolf who was M.P. for Yarmouth in 1309, 1313, and 1316 is likely - although the large size of the family makes it difficult to be certain - the man who was commissioned in 1320 to investigate offences against the statutes of the wool trade in Norfolk and Suffolk, and who was subsequently Chief Justice of Ireland (1324-29) and justice/commissioner in several counties 1329-30.[67] The John Arnold who was frequently bailiff, M.P., and coroner of Ipswich between 1388-99, as well as customer 1396-99 and farmer of the subsidy and alnage of cloth in Suffolk for 10 years from 1398 (his mainpernors being James Andrew of Ipswich and Thomas Godestone of Colchester), may tentatively be identified with the sergeant-at-arms/commissioner active in Ipswich, Yarmouth, East Anglia, and Ireland 1400-04.[68] James Andrew, several times M.P. for Ipswich 1410-21 and portman by 1429, also served sporadically in the customs service (1404-05, 1416-17) and held several commissions. But he was principally an attorney, employed on various occasions by Lynn, Yarmouth, and Colchester to represent their interests at the Exchequer; James was well-qualified to do so, having been a clerk of the King's Remembrancer c.1398.[69] Attorney Hugh Fen, member of a Yarmouth family with something of a tradition of service, played a small part of that tradition in Yarmouth, where found as capital pledge in 1448/9 and M.P. in 1450; he also held the post of escheator in Norfolk/Suffolk 1456-57 and several commissions in Norfolk and Yarmouth 1457-71. But his main interests were in London, for he was a clerk of the Exchequer by 1444, and rose through a variety of posts to become Under-Treasurer of England by 1463, his influence at court being much relied on by the Pastons and their friends in the 1450s and '60s.[70]

A legal background was not, however, a pre-requisite to employment by the king, nor was it necessary to specialise in work in the royal administration. With a few select examples we may illustrate the broad range of administrative duties with which it was possible to occupy the time of men so inclined. John de Brunham has already been described in this study as one of the most powerful Lynn rulers: jurat from 1357-1412, he also, in roughly the same period, held the office of chamberlain 3 times, that of mayor 5 times, and represented his borough at 6 parliaments and the Council of 1385. In addition, he served in the Merchant Guild as alderman from 1398-c.1406, was appointed constable of the Lynn staple in 1373, held the office of coroner 1376-79, and was on a dozen occasions commissioner of the peace, of array, or of enquiry.[71] His contemporary Edmund Belleyeter presents a similar case. The former apprentice of Brunham, Edmund succeeded his master as alderman in 1406, holding that office until at least 1411; he had served as scabin of the gild in 1373/4. Jurat between 1370 and 1413, he was also chamberlain 3 times, mayor 3 times, M.P. twice, and coroner briefly in 1390 (a role cut short by his election as mayor). He held a series of customs posts: deputy butler 1382-96, mayor of the Lynn staple 1396-97, collector of customs and tannage and poundage 1401, and collector of the wool subsidy in 1404. He too was several times a commissioner.[72] Much the same involvement is exemplified, in the next generation, by Thomas de Burgh, jurat 1424-68, chamberlain and mayor once each only, but M.P. 6 times and alderman 1448-57. In addition he was treasurer of Corpus Christi gild in 1427/8 and master of that gild in 1441/2. He served as controller of customs from 1445 to 1447, held various commissions, and was selected by the king to act as his ambassador to Bruges in 1435. [73]

John de Preston of Ipswich has already been described by one eminent historian as a career politician.[74] Rising to power as one of the leaders of the movement which overthrew the Stace/Le Rente clique, he held the (at that time) key office of chamberlain in 1322/3, was coroner the next year, bailiff the year after that, and continued on to 11 more ballivalties and 14 more years as coroner between 1336 and 1356. In the same period he represented Ipswich in parliament some 9 times and was a merchant representative for Suffolk in July 1338; in 1340 he was even appointed to a parliamentary committee to draw up a statute based on petitions of the clergy. He held three different customs posts, at various times between 1323 and 1351, a handful of commissions, and in 1327/8 is found in the unlikely post of constable of Norwich castle.[75]

Particularly notable at Colchester are the Godestone brothers. Thomas, whose commercial activities we have already seen to be slight,[76] entered into the mainstream of borough administration within a year of taking up his franchise (1397), a migrant from Surrey. He gave long service to his adoptive borough, being 13 times bailiff, 13 times M.P., and frequently an alderman between 1398 and 1430. He is also found as master of St. Helen's gild, which he had helped to found (1407), in 1429. His service to his king was no less arduous. The beginnings of this are obscure, for we first see him as customs collector at Ipswich in 1396 (a post held until 1399 and again in 1401), yet in the same year he and John Bernard, the Ipswich bailiff, were granted the farm of the alien priory of Greenwich and Lewisham, as a reward for long service to the king; possibly his service is recorded under some alternate surname to Godestone. In 1399 Thomas was granted, with William Godeman, three years farm of the alnage of cloth in Essex and Hertfordshire. But his service was not restricted to the local area, for in 1397 he was granted for life the offices of high bailiff of Guiennes (Picardy) and victualler of its castle, being superseded in the latter c.1413, however; he also served as commissioner of inquisition in that province in 1397 and 1399. Although his work in the customs service was cut short by an investigation (1402) that convicted him of concealing £249 in customs - largely on the exports of his brother John - and he was implicated, in 1404, in the uprising of the Countess of Oxford aimed at restoring Richard II (believed alive in Scotland), this did not prevent the king from granting Thomas the farm of escheated land in Colchester and of its derelict Middle Mill, which Thomas renovated. He is found again as commissioner, in 1417, 1419, 1423, and 1430.[77] Landed interests may have been the most stable source of Thomas' income, but in the first half of his life administrative work supplemented his income, and in the latter half commerce. His brother John Godestone entered the franchise in 1432 as a consequence of the deaths of Thomas and his son John (probably the M.P. of 1425), making John senior the heir to Thomas' property. Although John senior served as an alderman at Colchester 1434-36, his career lay mainly in the customs service at Ipswich, where he held posts between 1410 and 1437; he was also escheator of Essex and Hertfordshire 1415-16.[78]

From Yarmouth we will take two examples: Thomas de Drayton and Hugh Fastolf. Saul was unwilling to categorize Drayton as a full-time administrator, preferring to see him primarily as a ship-owner involved in foreign trade and the herring industry.[79] His considerable commercial activities are undeniable, but he nonetheless exhibits the same degree of commitment to administration as the men whose careers have been summarized above; this involvement was, for the most part, a natural extension of his mercantile activities. Eight times bailiff and 4 times M.P. 1332-57, he also attended the Merchant Assemblies of 1340 and 1347, and the Council of 1353; he was murager in 1338/9 and possibly until 1341. Thomas was in the customs service for almost the whole period between 1334 and 1359 as collector, controller, or searcher, is described as a "king's merchant" in 1338, was purveying fish for the king in 1348 and for the Black Prince in Gascony in 1356, and is found on several commissions of enquiry. In addition he was part of the Melcheburn syndicate farming national customs in the 1340s, but had the fortune or good sense to extricate himself before its collapse. From 1335 he and John Perbroun had farmed the Yarmouth wool custom for £390 annually and, like Perbroun, he was occasionally appointed admiral or vice-admiral of the northern fleet (1338, 1343, 1352).[80]

Hugh Fastolf's administrative work began in 1351 - and this is the earliest reference we have to him - in the office of controller of customs, held until 1354; Hugh returned to the customs service as collector, 1361-67, and became mayor of the Yarmouth staple in 1369. He too served in the navy, as vice-admiral of the northern fleet in 1362, 1370, and 1381, and he formed his own retinue to serve at sea in the war against France. Naval appointments such as those of Fastolf, Drayton, and Perbroun need not surprise us, given the largely amateur status of the navy and the role of shipping in Yarmouth's history. Hugh's numerous commissions were supplemented by a more permanent appointment as bailiff of the hundreds of Blythe and Waynford, an office in which he is found between 1363 and 1377, and by his deputising for Simon Burley in 1385-86 as constable of Dover castle and warden of the Cinque Ports - an ironical role, given the traditional hostility between the Ports and Yarmouth. His commissions, in Yarmouth, East Anglia, London, and Kent, involved him in such duties as:

- investigation of smuggling and other commercial offences;
- enquiry into disturbances at Lynn (a borough which courted his favour with periodic gifts of wine);
- examination of the Earl of Suffolk's property transactions;
- the imprisonment of mariners; and
- arranging construction, at Colchester, of a barge for the king;

These were all tasks to which Hugh's knowledge and experience were well-suited. His services were rewarded with grants of the farm of the alien priory of Panfield and Welles in 1373, and the lordship of Lowestoft manor and the hundred of Lothingland (again, traditional rivals of Yarmouth) in 1386. On top of this he had responsibilities in his borough: 10 times bailiff and 6 times M.P. 1354-77. Subsequently sheriff of Norfolk in 1389/90 and knight of that shire in the parliament of November 1390, by this time he had switched his base of operations from Yarmouth to London, where he also became involved in civic administration, in the 1380s, as sheriff and alderman. Not surprisingly, with such heavy involvement in public affairs he made a few enemies. Internal rivalries in Yarmouth resulted in his having to be pardoned for a homicide in 1355, fleeing town in 1359 to avoid arrest for assaulting Stephen de Stalham (bailiff in the previous and subsequent years), and being summoned before the Council to answer accusations touching his conduct in the borough political struggles of 1376. His deputy bailiff of Blythe was attacked in 1373, and in the same year his property at Caister was broken into and 280 sheep carried off, whilst in the turmoil of the Peasants' Revolt his property in East Anglia was invaded and his own life threatened when a mob broke into his London residence.[81]

It will be apparent even from these few examples that the branch of the royal service which attracted the greatest burgess participation, perhaps for no other reason than that it was most easily within their reach, was the customs service and its adjunct, the staple organisation. In fact 26% of our Yarmouth office-holders were active in one of these two areas. So too 16% of our Lynn office-holders and 29% of those at Ipswich; compare this to only 4% of the office-holders at Colchester, which was not a customs centre, whilst only one of our Maldon men was involved, and that briefly.[82] Length of involvement varied considerably; of the 218 of our men from Lynn, Ipswich, Colchester, and Yarmouth who held one or more posts in either of the aforementioned areas:

- 18% were involved for only a year or less,
- 42% for 1-5 years,
- 22% for 5-10 years,
- 10% for 10-15 years,
- 6% for 15-20 years,
- and 2% for more than 20 years.

Two of the members of this last group we have already presented as examples of men with broad administrative involvements: William de Whetacre and Thomas de Drayton. The others are: John Keepe of Lynn, briefly wool customer (1388-89) but principally tronager and pesager from 1374 until his death in 1406, a man otherwise with only average commitments in borough government; John de Acle of Yarmouth, also not heavily committed in borough government, but holding a series of customs posts beginning with that of controller, 1310-31; and Colchester's John Kymberley, who (1401-32) was deputy butler at Yarmouth and held several other customs posts at Ipswich, besides being one of the more prominent participants in Colchester's government in the same period.[83] Most of our burgesses in the customs service held the standard posts of collectors, controllers, and searchers, but a few were more eminent, such as "king's sergeant" Nicholas Shirlok of Ipswich who was granted the office of alnager of cloth throughout England for life in 1327,[84] and the already-mentioned John de Wesenham (King's Butler) and Thomas de Melcheburn (mayor of the Bruges staple, and national searcher of ships).

There is a marked slackening in the participation of burgesses in the customs service in the fifteenth century, which is not easy to explain. The royal prohibition of merchants being customers cannot be accredited with any serious influence. Nor is there any clear sign that the illicit profits from customs work were any less or that Exchequer vigilance for frauds was any more potent. Perhaps it is a case of other elements, notably the gentry, growing increasingly aware of the career potential of the customs service, or adopting that service into the network of patronage as was the case with parliamentary representation. They might have out-competed burgesses in a bid for customs offices. But we do not know a great deal about how customs officials were actually selected. What we usually see is their appointment by royal writ, but this can have been only the final step of the procedure; we can hardly believe that the Treasurer picked names out of a hat (although stranger things have happened, such as in the selection of sheriffs). It is reasonable to assume that, when the farming of customs became fashionable, the would-be farmers approached the king with a proposition. Otherwise we might expect the king to seek at least nominations from the local communities; this was the case in 1341, when the king required each customs centre to send to Westminster a group of nominees from whom he would select officers.^[85] Since such evidence of a local role in selection was rare in Yarmouth, Saul concluded that use of this role was only occasional experimentation and that royal initiative was predominant in the choice of customs officers.^[86]

Evidence of local involvement is not common anywhere, but the cumulative evidence from our several towns nonetheless outweighs the unambiguous evidence for direct royal appointment. In 1282 the king instructed the sheriff of Norfolk and Suffolk to go to Yarmouth, Ipswich, and Dunwich and arrange the local election of collectors of New Custom. In 1339 the bailiffs and men of Yarmouth were ordered to elect a controller to replace the deceased Thomas Stace. At Lynn in 1340 John de Swerdestone and Adam de Walsoken were elected collectors of the wool custom by the mayor and burgesses, as specified by the king. When Ipswich customer Roger le Mayster died in 1284 his family, in the presence of the other collector Vivian fitz Silvester, surrendered Roger's part of the coket seal to the bailiffs, who elected a replacement. And again, in 1339, it is specifically stated that the appointment of John Irp as Ipswich controller was subsequent to his election by the bailiffs and townsmen. Even the Colchester authorities thought it worthwhile recording, in one of their volumes of memoranda (manuals of administration), that part of the statute of Cambridge (1388) ordering that any who were given the responsibility of electing J.P.s, sheriffs, escheators, customers, controllers, or other royal officers, were to swear not to be influenced by gift or favouritism to pursue office for themselves or others.^[87] This same system is seen in other branches of royal service: Thomas de Melcheburn was appointed as mayor of the Bruges staple, pursuant to his election by the merchant staplers, and borough coroners too were elected by their communities.^[88] The role of the king in appointments of customers (or coroners) was threefold:

- to decide when a customs post had to be filled, as for example when Thomas le Rente resigned from the post of collector of the New Custom in 1319 on the grounds that he was too busy to fulfill his duties, and to instruct the appropriate borough accordingly;^[89]

- to confirm (or veto) the appointment; and
- to take the oath of office of the elected man, by attorney (viz. the Exchequer, the Chief Justice, or the escheators), as in the case of Peter de Clippesby when elected tronier at Yarmouth.[90]

The use of local elections was not a matter of democratic principles, it was a question of efficiency and of having suitable persons chosen. Local election need not always have been the selection method, nor is there any need to assume the king pursued a consistent selection policy. The mid-fourteenth century farming syndicates were empowered to choose their own collectors and, being men from local communities themselves, appear to have made direct appointments in many cases, or sometimes retained existing holders of office. Outsiders may have by-passed local communities to seek posts directly from the king; this may have been the prevalent practice in the fifteenth century - but this is hypothesis, we do not honestly know.

🔍 previous

next 🔍

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders
Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration
Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics
CONCLUSION

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 6

The Quality of Government

The Practice: Crimes of Violence

The unlawful behaviour of men whose principal concern in life was the pursuit of profit is not restricted to crimes of cupidity, however. Quick to anger - and perhaps quick to forget (if not forgive) - medieval townsmen inhabited environments that bred violence, both on private and public levels. The relative instability of social and political relationships in the town has been put forward to explain the high incidence of homicides perpetrated by the urban upper class, [\[92\]](#) and crowd psychology partly explains the eruptibility of the burgesses en masse against rival forces. Many of the latter type of incident occur in the first half of the fourteenth century, when East Anglian boroughs were, on the whole, at the peak of their prosperity and local patriotism was most keenly felt. Some were clearly organised excursions against local landlords with whom there was a jurisdictional rivalry.[\[93\]](#) Others were not so obviously under conscious control. The seizure of Robert de Monthalt by the Lynn burgesses in 1313 has some appearance of mob proceedings, but the concessions he was coerced into agreeing to were carefully drawn up, and the list of those guilty is headed by the mayor and town clerk. The attack by citizens on Norwich's cathedral-priory in 1272 may have degenerated into uncontrolled plundering and violence, resulting later in a number of citizens being hung; but, in its early stages, it was likely directed by the city rulers who appear among the accused. Regarding the attack on Bishop Despenser in 1377, the leading burgesses of Lynn, fully aware of what was liable to happen, made a point of excusing themselves beforehand from any complicity.[\[94\]](#)

It is the Yarmouth burgesses, markedly more than those of our other towns, who provide examples of group aggression. In their pleas for financial relief from the crown, they described Yarmouth as a frontier town,[\[95\]](#) and certainly frontier lawlessness prevailed there at times. Periodically, small armies of burgesses would sally out into the surrounding countryside with some malicious intent. In 1314 pardons were issued to 314 townsmen accused of having: ridden "with banner displayed" in Suffolk; taken and imprisoned men until they made ransome; perpetrated homicides, arsons, and other breaches of the peace; and sold weapons and victuals to the king's enemies.[\[96\]](#) The king refused to include in the pardons piracy or smuggling. At the former the seafaring men of Yarmouth were, naturally, rather adept. The king was prepared to overlook piracy when conducted against enemies of the realm - although the sailors of Yarmouth discriminated against no nationality - or when raids produced Scottish hostages. But it could prove politically embarrassing to him to have his subjects attack those of his allies.[97] Yarmouth is of course well-known for its rivalry with the Cinque Ports; a rivalry that at times, particularly when the king's attention was elsewhere engaged, erupted into virtual civil war, with battles at sea or raids on the town of the rival side.[98] And during the interludes in this hostility, Yarmouth could always direct its aggression against the closer rivals of Gorleston, Lowestoft, and Norwich. Piracy, we may note, was a two-way affair, with Yarmouth mariners being on the receiving as well as the giving end. In 1307 William de Goseford was among the townsmen charged with abducting ships that had tried to unload merchandise at Little Yarmouth and Gorleston (to the prejudice of Great Yarmouth's tolls); in 1317, 1328, and 1340 his ships were involved in piratic acts, and in 1337 he was permitted to keep a Flemish ship he had captured. But in 1333 we find him complaining of the seizure of one of his ships at Bremerhaven. Robert de Gimingham is also found complaining of the loss of his ship to Flemish pirates in 1317, just a few months before he was charged with attacking a ship off the Sussex coast and carrying off its wine cargo.[99]

The more serious cases of personal violence often appear to be connected with political rivalries or inter-family disputes. In all, 23 of our office-holders participated in homicides, and 9 themselves met death by foul play, whilst 2 died in prison accused of manslaughter. Lynn jurat John atte Lathe's complicity in the murder of John Toth, at the instigation of the latter's wife, daughter of Geoffrey Tolbooth, seems a calculated act. We may read vendetta into the murder of Lynn's Robert de Waltone in 1316, by several members of the Lomb family, some of whom had already been imprisoned and subsequently pardoned (1316) for the death of William de Waltone (father of Robert).[100] Yarmouth in particular was a hotbed of family rivalries, probably with a political foundation - we have already noted the unusual prominence of a limited number of long-lasting families there. A bitter feud in the late thirteenth century produced, among other crimes, the death of John de Drayton at the hands of William Gerberge junior, who took refuge in a Cambridge friary and obtained a pardon in January 1302, only to meet his own end later in the year at the hands of members of the Drayton, Goseford, and Fastolf families; in 1303 we hear of the killing of another Drayton, by persons unknown. In a fresh outbreak of family hostility in 1359, the Draytons and Fastolfs led an attack on Stephen de Stalham.[101]

At Ipswich we see a not dissimilar situation: violence in the context of power-struggles between established cliques and the nouveaux riches. The families in control of the borough government at the end of the thirteenth century provided a legacy of violence for their up-and-coming rivals. John Clement, Hugh Leu, and Philip Harneys had taken part in a mob killing in 1263; Nicholas le Clerk and Thomas le Rente in another in 1283. John Leu had found his way into the Tower, crime unknown, in 1285. Thomas le Rente and Thomas Stace, during their period of power tempore Edward II, led groups of burgesses in violent excursions against local estates; prominent in these groups were their allies: the Roberts, le Fevres, Maisters, Malyns, and Goldings. In 1289 Gilbert Robert was imprisoned for assaulting John Costyn armed with daggers.[102] The reformers were no more restrained when they fought for power in 1321: one of Thomas Stace's sons was killed and Thomas le Rente's house was plundered and his wife and servants assaulted.[103] But the men who came to power after the fall of Stace and le Rente soon developed new alignments and fell out among themselves. Geoffrey Costyn, one of the reform leaders, sued reformer John Baude in 1331 for building a windmill to the damage of his neighbouring tenement, and forced the demolition of the mill. In 1338 John's son Roger murdered Costyn in what was claimed to have been a drunken brawl. In the previous year Roger had mortally wounded the wife of William Malyn senior, who is found prosecuting Roger for an unspecified transgression in 1336.[104]

John de Halteby, the principal leader of the Ipswich reform movement, was also one of our worst offenders. Despite occasional forays into the realm of crime, none of our men seem to deserve the title 'villain' so much as Halteby. He and his father were participants in the raids led by his subsequent enemies in 1312 and 1315. In 1317 he, with Geoffrey Stace and others, assaulted Thomas de Veer's miller at Bramford and intimidated de Veer's tenants so that they dared not grind their corn there. Again he led an attack, in 1318, on the estate of minor Thomas de Shaldeford at Rivenhall (Essex), probably at the instigation of a relative of Shaldeford, and carried off young Thomas and much of his property.[105] In the events which led to the supplanting of bailiffs Stace and le Rente, John de Halteby seems to have been the prime mover; his name consistently heads the lists of those accused of rebellious activity, and of plundering le Rente's residence. Indeed, so prominent was he in affairs at this time that he was known in the local countryside as "the King of Ipswich". There is strong suspicion that he was acting in this as agent provocateur of Hugh Despenser junior and that the despoliation of le Rente's messuage was, under guise of political hostilities, really related to the large debt (£200+) in which le Rente was held to Despenser.[106] This connection would help explain why he was, in 1330, accused by the Archbishop of York of having tried to procure the latter's involvement in the misguided conspiracy of the Earl of Kent to rescue Edward II. It probably also explains how he came to be in the office of undersheriff of Suffolk, and his lieutenant John de Preston in that of constable of Norwich castle, posts from which they were removed in March 1328 when accused of the death of the parson of Bramford. And again it makes sense of the general pardon Halteby took out in April 1327.[107] The pardon was, of course, a political safeguard, not a prelude to behavioural reform. In 1336 he was accused of breaking into the estate of the archdeacon of Suffolk at Debenham, and carrying off goods therefrom. In the 1340s he is found fraternising again with Geoffrey Stace, son of his former enemy, who by now had married the widow of Geoffrey Costyn and had already spent a bout in Marshalsea for failing to pay the £250 damages awarded against him when convicted of kidnapping (c.1328-30). In March 1343 Halteby and Stace were summoned to Chancery to receive the king's instructions (i.e. a royal reprimand). In February 1344 they took out general pardons, covering the reigns of Edwards II and III, and in July they were accorded a royal protection against enemies who threatened them for prosecuting certain business before the Suffolk justices; this probably related to the Malyn smuggling ring, since Halteby and Stace had acted as king's commissioners in arresting Malyn's lands and chattels in that year.[108] Halteby had made himself so obnoxious to his fellow townsmen by his thuggery that, when he was murdered in the summer of 1344 by Malyn and associates, a large proportion of the burgesses "quam de maioribus quam de mediocribus et minoribus" rejoicingly condoned the crime, provided supplies for the conspirators who had taken sanctuary, and so disrupted the royal investigation that the guilty parties could not be brought to justice, with the result that the king was obliged to seize town government into his own hands.[109]

👉 previous

next 👈

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 3

The Monopolisation of Office

Power and Dynasty

Although it can therefore be argued that a genuine elite existed at the top of the borough political hierarchy - certainly by the close, and perhaps throughout, the later Middle Ages - it must be remembered that this elite was not entirely independent of the lower ranks of government, since it was recruited from those lower ranks. It can also be demonstrated that there was some degree of mobility within the lower ranks. Furthermore, we cannot describe the elite as a patriciate in the sense of power being monopolised by families and passed down from one generation to the next.[\[34\]](#) The majority of office-holders were not followed into office by sons, grandsons, or other heirs, and there was certainly no impairment of electoral rights by sons replacing fathers who died in office; Lynn's Merchant Guild legislated against such an occurrence,[\[35\]](#) but the possibility does not even seem to have been considered elsewhere. When John de Cavendish died in the office of Lynn chamberlain in 1348/9, his place was taken by John de Manegrene, who happened to be Cavendish's executor;[\[36\]](#) but this was an exceptional circumstance and, besides, we do not know that Manegrene was not duly elected as replacement. The co-optation of John Wesenham junior into the ranks of Lynn's jurats in 1435 was probably strongly influenced by the fact that his father, who had just died, had previously been jurat, alderman, and mayor, and the unwarrantedly swift promotions of John Style and John Waryn into that upper council may also owe something to heredity; but such moves were not popular and Wesenham at least did not remain a jurat for more than a few months.[\[37\]](#) Individual character and capability were more important considerations than family when men were elected to office; yet it is likely that one whose progenitors were of known and respectable reputation would be accredited with the same respectability, in the absence of proof to the contrary. General family prosperity also was a boon to its younger members, in their political aspirations; yet the other side of this coin is that family prosperity relied on the establishment and maintenance of wealth by individual members, and so could not substitute indefinitely for ability.[\[38\]](#)

It is not difficult to find examples of families which were active in borough government over a lengthy period; but these are nonetheless a small minority. In Norwich the Butt family provided officials between 1260 and 1475, but few others could come close to rivalling this longevity, and one would be hard-pressed to argue for family monopolisation of office in Norwich. At Colchester there were several atte Fordes in office 1312-1467, but the surname is not an uncommon one and we cannot be sure that all these men were related. Very few other families there extend beyond two generations in office, although the Bosse family ran to at least four generations covering the fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries. At Ipswich we can point to the prominence of the Starlyngs from the mid-fourteenth to the early fifteenth century, but most examples are from an earlier period. The fitz Norman/Beaumes we have already documented. So too the Leu family, which produced office-holders up until the end of the fourteenth century; but they are more notable for their wealth in lands and merchandise than for political prominence - only Richard Leu was much involved in local government (1292-1322). The Golding/Mayden family is also much in evidence in the second half of the thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries, when quite wealthy;^[39] but members showed little interest in politics, although William Golding was a portman in 1309 and John Golding coroner 1381-87 (however, by this time the surname appears little in borough records). The Maister family could trace its ancestry back to a portman of 1200, John le Maister; Roger le Maister, the third richest burgess in 1283, was bailiff 1279/80 and evidently a ship-owning merchant dealing in grain, malt, wine, and stone; his sons Thomas (who likewise had a part-share in a ship) and John were also bailiffs at the end of the thirteenth century. It was probably a different John le Maister, a nephew of Roger, who was coroner 1324-28 and who held lands in Great and Little Wenham, Halstead, Sprouton, and Stoke. The Thomas le Maister who was several times bailiff 1356-65 was a grandson of the earlier Thomas, and also a ship-owner, grain-merchant, and local land-owner. The next generation was represented by cloth-merchant William le Maister (several offices 1372-99).^[40] Although members of the family are found in Ipswich in the fifteenth century, none aspired to office.

At Lynn we find a large number of families remaining in government for three or more generations. However, one must normally beware of assuming family relationships from surname evidence alone. The several Massinghams in office 1292-1349 may belong to two or three unrelated families, and there is no evidence to link the Wesenhams of the early fifteenth century with the financier of the mid-fourteenth; nor can we prove that the Thomas de Botkesham who was mayor in 1433/4 was descended from the family that supplied several mayors and jurats in the second half of the fourteenth century. Braunch, on the other hand, is a sufficiently uncommon surname in Lynn to imply relationship between the three merchants who held office at times between 1304 and 1364. The Drewe family appears in Lynn at the end of the reign of Henry III and perhaps finds its roots in a servant of John Chaucer, one Dreu, who was nonetheless a member of the Merchant Guild. Geoffrey Drewe was mayor in 1305/6, and his (probable) sons Geoffrey junior and Thomas were, respectively, alderman (c.1349-56) and mayor (on three occasions between 1345 and 1368); each in turn produced a son who entered borough government. All five were among the wealthiest merchants of the town.^[41] Five members of the Ryghtwys family were jurats 1342-71, but only one occupied the mayoralty. The Swerdestone family was more powerful. It first appears in the person of wealthy wool-merchant Alan de Swerdestone, who held only the post of chamberlain. His sons Thomas and John were both jurats and the latter 7 times mayor and 7 times M.P. 1323-47, as well as alderman 1340-49; John was one of the great wool-merchants of the town and also exported large quantities of grain and ale. His sons John junior and Nicholas became jurats a few years after John senior's death, but never acquired as much power as their father. John senior married a daughter to his trading partner Hugh de Betele, mayor 1342/3, whose brother was a jurat and whose son also rose to the mayoralty (1382/3).[42] The fifteenth century saw far fewer families of longevity, although the Nicholassons and Thoresbys each ran to at least three generations in power; the same is the case in our other towns.

Of the six towns studied, only Yarmouth shows clear evidence of a small number of families dominating borough government, in terms of the provision of personnel.[43] Between 1270 and 1460 44% of the bailiffs belonged to one or other of 18 of Yarmouth's wealthiest dynasties. About half of the ballivalties of the period before 1350 fell to members of a dozen or so of these families. In the second half of the century a slightly different group of families of the same size held two-thirds of the ballivalties. Only in the fifteenth century did this situation change, both in terms of the number of families and the proportion of offices they held (one-third); and in this period the substitution of two chamberlains for two of the bailiffs also served to increase the variety amongst the names of office-holders. A few families were particularly long-lasting: the Draytons, Elys', and Fastolfs each produced a dozen officials spanning all three of these periods. The Elys family was in fact an offshoot of the Fordele family, deriving from Elias de Fordele, whose son Robert Elys de Fordele has already been mentioned;[44] taken together, the Elys/Fordeles provided 12% of Yarmouth's bailiffs between 1270 and 1460.

The evidence from our towns seems sufficient to permit the general conclusion that the families prominent in borough administration in the fourteenth century had mostly disappeared by the time of Henry VI, which reign is marked by an influx of new surnames. It is difficult to find clear-cut causes for this; there seems no reason, for example, to explain it at Lynn as the outcome of internal power-struggles in the reign of Henry V. It may be sufficient to put it down to natural attrition and migration, for the process was gradual, not a sudden, cataclysmic disappearance. What then of the other basis for periodization, the Black Death? One might expect that here would be a case of cataclysm. But again it is not easy to demonstrate such a proposition. The huge increases in will registrations 1348-50 that the student encounters in Lynn's Red Register, Colchester's Red Parchment Book, or the court rolls of Yarmouth and Ipswich, are grounds enough for suspicion; after all, wills were drawn up primarily by the wealthier townsmen. Among the list of the dead there are names already mentioned in this study: Thomas le Coteler, Thomas de Dedham, Anselm de Fordele, Laurence de Fordham, Thomas Leu, Thomas de Melcheburn, John de Ratlesden, John de Swerdestone, Adam de Walsoken. Lynn's Betele family suffered the loss of Hugh de Betele, his wife Margery de Swerdestone, Hugh's brothers Henry and Richard, and Henry's son Robert. Between them, the epidemics of 1349 and 1361 are known to have carried off 53 of the office-holders who fall under the scope of this study from Yarmouth, Colchester, Ipswich, and Lynn; more than two dozen others, who leave no wills or other documentation of death-date, disappear from the records after these times. Of personnel actually in office 1348/9, Colchester lost only its town clerk, Yarmouth lost one bailiff and possibly two, Ipswich a bailiff and the town clerk, Lynn its mayor, its alderman, its town clerk, and two or possibly three of the chamberlains. Obviously such a quantity of deaths - the plague particularly felling the elder members of the community, from whom upper administrative ranks were largely formed - provided openings, but not a wholesale change of ruling personnel. Plague survivors remained in government, junior members of established families filled some of the gaps, while others were filled by new men - both immigrants and members of local families not prominent previously (e.g. the Ipswich Starlyngs). Not even in Yarmouth did the plague break the grip on government - insofar as there was any firm grip - of the leading families, but it certainly gave an artificial boost to the natural process of attrition.[45]

By this 'process' is meant a series of factors that influenced the survival of urban families. That they rarely lasted for more than two or three generations has been attributed largely to the failure of male heirs,[46] from the accidents of fertility and mortality; but this is neither a completely adequate nor a completely accurate explanation for the fact that established families could not by themselves maintain the size of the ruling class, so that immigration was essential. The spectre of infant mortality in the Middle Ages is undeniable. Margery Kempe claimed to have had 14 children, although only one appears to have been alive in her old age, and he had moved out of Lynn.[47] She, at least, had the fortune to be of a compatible age with her husband; that many husbands or wives lost their spouses and subsequently remarried suggests that often there may have been an age difference between marriage partners that limited the period of fertility.[48] Thrupp's analysis of Londoners has indicated that the average number of male heirs who survived their fathers' deaths and their own attainment of majority was rarely better than 1; to which Platt has added that the fourteenth century epidemics may have played a particular role here, with children prominent among its victims. [49] However, the practice in fifteenth century Ipswich of recording the names of the children of freeman entrants notwithstanding,[50] children do not feature very much in medieval records, with the exception of wills, and it is disputed whether wills are an accurate indicator of male heirs. The automatic inheritance of patrimony by the chief heir may mean that one (sometimes the only) son is not mentioned in his parent's will; for it was not always the case that even adult sons were among the executors. Furthermore, wills survive for only a minority of the men studied here. It is therefore impossible to ascertain with any precision the ratio of adult sons to fathers.[51] Of the 843 office-holders from Lynn, Ipswich, and Colchester, only 295 are known to have had one or more adult male heirs of direct descent. On the other hand, only 31 are definitely known not to have had any.

What is important for our purposes is that, of the 295, only 91 had sons who followed them into borough government in any capacity. This is evidently not just a case of survival, and it is notable that, in each of the three towns, the proportion of men who had sons in government to the total of men known to have sons is about the same (roughly 30%). We have already dealt with the tendency for a few families, particularly sons of borough officials, to desert urban in favour of gentry society. Yarmouth bailiff Henry Rose had 5 sons, none of whom followed him into office, for they seem to have moved out to their father's country estates.[52] Others may have moved abroad, like Margery Kempe's son,[53] or to other English towns. A few sons became clerics; Tanner's analysis of Norwich wills showed that about half mentioned children and that 10% of the sons mentioned were clerics.[54] Of the office-holders from Lynn, Ipswich, Colchester, and Yarmouth, 22 are known to have had sons who were clerics; this group had 44 (known) sons in total, 23 of whom joined the clergy, while only 5 entered borough government. It will be noted that in the majority of cases these clerics were not the only sons of the family; Margery Kempe's attempt to persuade her apparently sole surviving son to become a monk is not likely to have been typical, especially given her own extreme religiosity.[55] The number of clerical sons is surely underrated, for we rarely hear of them outside the context of wills; we would not, for example, have known that Joseph Elianore had a son, had he not founded a chantry and appointed his son its chaplain.[56] Omitted from the list of 22 office-holders with clerical sons is the Fastolf family of Yarmouth. Here is one family that was prolific in its production of male heirs and that maintained its influence in the borough throughout the fourteenth century, despite the departure of several branches to country estates or other towns. We know of several members who had only female heirs, or no heirs at all, and several others who entered the clergy: two were monks at St. Benet of Holme, another had a living at Gaymerston; two were Cambridge graduates, one (the brother of a Chief Justice of Ireland) becoming a king's clerk and holding several notable positions; one became Bishop of St. David's.[57]

It seems likely that there would have been enough male heirs to maintain the size of the ruling class from established families, had all those heirs been inclined so to follow in their fathers' footsteps. But we are unreasonable to expect them to, for there was no compulsion upon them, and they were faced with a variety of choices of careers: legal or administrative work for the king, a life in the church, the role as country squire, or concentration on trade activities in their home town or elsewhere. Indeed, compared to these options, service in borough administration should hardly be considered a career (in terms of its direct rewards) at all - it was more of a sideline. The competing attractions, together with the deaths of sons before their time or the failure of some men to produce sons at all, combine to explain why there was plenty of room for new men in the ranks of government. We need not emphasise any one of these factors to the exclusion of the others.

Yet there is a further factor, not so readily apparent. The 'failure of male heirs' theory is partly founded on an inability to trace dynasties beyond more than a few generations. In some cases, however, it is possible to discover that dynasties do continue, but are simply not as conspicuous as once they were. We have noted that fortunes, political and financial, were founded on individual abilities rather than family traits; it does not follow that all sons should surpass or even equal the achievements of their fathers. For example, of three generations of Henry le Rotouns in Ipswich, the father and grandson both held the ballivalty, but the son does not figure in local government, nor do son or grandson evidence the ship-owning and mercantile activity of the first Henry.[58] Gilbert Robert served Ipswich in various official capacities between 1291 and 1328 in addition to occupying several posts in the customs service (1323-27); he was one of Ipswich's three great wool-merchants of 1322 and according to the 1327 subsidy the second richest burgess, holding lands in Bentley, Gosbeck, Whitton, Thurleston, and Stoke. He married a daughter of John Harneys senior - possibly his second wife - and left three, or perhaps four, sons (probably all adults). Yet no subsequent member of the family held office in the borough. Possibly some of the sons left town. One, Richard, son-in-law of Thomas le Rente, was disfranchised in the course of the political conflicts of 1323; his line remained in Ipswich but its decline is seen in that his son Gilbert was merely a clerk to Henry Brikoun (bailiff 1340/1), a later member of the family was a sailor, and not until the early fifteenth century do we find again a merchant in the family.[59]

There are a various reasons why the fortunes of individual families fluctuated. Wealth built up by successful men of business was not always passed on to the principal heir, who sometimes was left only with patrimony while property and goods acquired during the testator's life were divided amongst other heirs, or became entangled in disputes often the consequence of the widow re-marrying; bequests to religious and charitable purposes could occasionally be very large too. Simon Mate, the third generation of a line of Colchester bailiffs, died c.1439 leaving as his heir a daughter; but her inheritance of real estate was mortgaged by the widow to pay Simon's debts and bequests, and the mortgagee forged deeds to defraud and disinherit the daughter, who died penniless in prison.[60] Even when the heir inherited a firm foundation of wealth on which to build, it did not follow that he was inclined to or capable of building. Of the two known sons of Colchester bailiff Roger le Belch, one engaged in piracy but later settled down to legitimate commercial pursuits, although he and his own son predeceased Roger, victims of the plague; Roger's second son sold quitclaims to his late father's property to finance his gambling.[61] In a legal battle over custody of a propertied but lunatic relative (the widow of Edmund de Beeston), former Lynn chamberlain Philip Wyth[62] was described in 1382 by his opponents as an evil man and needy, having foolishly wasted the goods which were his, so that he is become overwhelmed in poverty and debts to many men and goes about any means of gaining goods, caring not how or from whom so long as he gets them.[63]

The historian must of course be wary of such statements, yet this one seems to have some foundation, judging from other evidence as to Philip's financial difficulties. He had, at the time of the legal battle, a heavy financial commitment in the £112 he had contracted to pay the king annually for the farm of Lynn petty customs; and in 1391 he persuaded his father, who was retired, to reduce the rent that Philip paid him for various properties. Philip was allowed no role in local government after losing the custody case, and in 1385 was imprisoned for unspecified trespasses and disobediences, resisting arrest, and bending the town sergent's mace. His sole surviving son became a cleric, and his daughter married a London man and was subsequently defrauded of her inheritance by Philip's widow.[64]

As in the case of Philip Wyth and Richard Robert, political or other misdemeanours could end the careers of prominent families in their towns. Lynn's powerful Swerdestone dynasty ended with the disappearance of John junior about the time of the recurrence of the plague in 1361, and the disfranchisement and social excommunication of his brother Nicholas "sine aliqua gracia reconciliacionis imposterum" in 1380 for intriguing to obtain sacramental rites for St. Nicholas' chapel; the family is not heard of again. Jurat Walter de Dunton was similarly punished as an accomplice of Swerdestone; although reconciled in 1386, he was not permitted back into the council and his son never held more than a minor bureaucratic post.[65] John James and John Sudbury, former Ipswich office-holders, were disfranchised together in 1459, for breaking town ordinances and their freeman's oaths; we have no further specification, although both had been in various troubles in recent years, including James having been accused of minor embezzlement when chamberlain (1447/8) and Sudbury being ordered arrested and brought before the King's Council in 1453 (although he became coroner at Ipswich later that year).[66] The former appeared no more in the records, the latter only in death; neither's descendants had any role in borough government. Adam de Brandeston, once M.P. and deputy butler in Ipswich, was outlawed for felony about the time of his death (c.1362) and his lands escheated,[67] after which the surname is not seen in the town records.

More often, however, personal fortunes were subject to the dangers of commerce: loss of merchandise through storms at sea, piracy, or confiscation by foreign governments, unprofitable ventures, or simply bad management. Ipswich bailiff Thomas Andrew mercer left no long will; it was necessary only to state that all his goods and chattels should be sold to pay his debts.[68] At Lynn the Merchant Gild allotted £30 annually to alms for members who had fallen into poverty, and even ran a crude insurance scheme. Edmund de Fransham, mayor 1374/5, was one recipient of such alms in 1386, his career possibly damaged by his participation in the violent attack on Bishop Despenser in 1377. Merchant and jurat William de Snoryng was another; he survived the Black Death only to be ruined by £100 damages awarded against him in a suit brought by Sir John de Gannok. A third was draper Philip de Staunford, chamberlain and jurat in the 1380s, who in 1396 was pardoned for failing to appear in suits of debt, totalling £43.6.8d, brought by various parties; he is not seen again until 1411, when receiving alms.[69] Grain-merchant Thomas Bubbe (jurat 1372-80) lost goods worth £73.6.8d in the general seizure of English merchandise in Prussia in 1385; in the following year the Merchant Gild paid out £20 to aid his release from debtor's prison, but too late to save his life.[70] James atte Brigge, twice chamberlain, does not appear in borough government after 1412 (despite his election as jurat in 1411) in which year he lost one shipment of merchandise to pirates and another to the raging sea.[71]

The above were all individual misfortunes. At Yarmouth we see how the general economic environment damaged the ranks of the ruling families. At various times in the fifteenth century the king granted aid to the townsmen, in the shape of reduction of the fee farm and grants of money towards building a new, navigable port. This was the consequence of repeated complaints (1378, 1397, 1409, 1442, 1463, 1471, 1502) that the town's commerce had declined considerably from its level in the early fourteenth century, so that the financial obligations of the community could not be met, and some of the more substantial burgesses had left or were threatening to leave - even going so far as to pull down their houses to rebuild elsewhere - with the result that Yarmouth was considerably weakened as a coastal defence. [72] In the post-medieval period the decline was said to have begun with the Black Death, but in fact the plague had only worsened the situation, for the first plea for assistance was made in 1347. This petition blamed the French war - long periods of arrest and impressment of the ships of local merchants in peak trading seasons, and the losses of ships in royal service - and inclement weather for the depletion of its mercantile fleet.[73] Only a small portion of the once-proud fleet that proved itself at Sluys remained seaworthy, while other ships lay damaged on the beach, their owners too poor to repair them, it was claimed. Several named merchants, impoverished, had left town, including former bailiff Richard de Walsham, who had lost his ship and £200 in merchandise. Others of the the formerly leading townsmen were now much reduced in means, including members of the office-holding families of Child, Rose, and Catfield. John Perbroun, arguably the major figure in Yarmouth history in the first half of the fourteenth century, lost one of his ships in royal service; of his three sons, one entered the church, one was among those listed in 1347 as impoverished, and the third is seen only in the act of selling his father's property.[74]

At Lynn the commercial opportunities of purveying and victualling royal forces were a factor in the rise of financiers John de Wesenham and Thomas de Melcheburn, but at Yarmouth these 'benefits' of the war were outweighed by the loss of shipping on which that town was more dependent. Yet even great wealth was no guarantee of the establishment of a powerful urban dynasty. Melcheburn's son Peter inherited his father's wealth but lived only three years longer than his father. Wesenham's son Hugh married into a Midlands gentry family and was himself knighted.[75] Neither family is found in borough government in the second half of the fourteenth century. Lynn merchant-mayors John de Burghard (d.1339) and Adam de Walsoken (d.1349) both left substantial property in Lynn, but the latter had only a daughter to inherit, whilst of the former's three sons one became a cleric, one had died by 1352, and of the third we hear nothing.[76] Available evidence suggests it to hold true for all towns studied here, with the possible exception of Yarmouth, that, as Martin concluded regarding Ipswich, "it seems to have been rare for a son to succeed his father in his interests in the town." [77]

On the other hand, whilst Power's declaration that, in mid-fourteenth century conditions, "great men rose like meteors and, like meteors, disappeared into the night" [78] may hold true for men like Melcheburn and Wesenham, for most leading townsmen such a conclusion could only be the result of inadequate records or insufficient research. Old soldiers never die, they only fade away. Lynn jurat William Brycham left four adult sons, but they show no signs of their father's administrative and mercantile activities and, indeed, are barely visible in the records at all.[79] John de Couteshale was five times mayor of Lynn, frequently jurat 1342-71, grain-merchant and ship-owner, and personally owned much of the Jews Lane ward of which he was constable. His son Thomas inherited some of this property and also rose to the mayoralty, although he shows no signs of commercial activities; of Thomas' sons, one disappears entirely and another was a skinner who played no role in Lynn's administration. [80] John Pod, sometime bailiff, son of bailiff Alexander Pod, and veteran of Colchester's council (1398-1437) was one of the more prominent merchants of the town, dealing in a variety of goods. His son John junior, although tolerably wealthy, held no borough office and described himself in his will as a weaver; there is no sign that he added at all to the property left him by his father.[81] Thomas Stace, one of the most powerful of Ipswich's rulers,[82] was the son of a humble tailor and is known to have had 5 sons of his own. Of these: John was murdered in 1321 in the course of the political struggles focusing around his father; Thomas junior moved to Yarmouth (sitting as M.P. for that town in 1332) and his branch of the family gradually severed its ties with Ipswich and sank into relative obscurity in its new home; Henry disappears from the records; Nicholas remained in Ipswich and himself produced sons, but this branch was only of moderate means; Geoffrey served as bailiff and M.P. (but on nowhere near the scale of his father), spent more of his time getting into mischief and debt than trying to restore the family's fortunes, and left no known heirs.[83]

← previous

next →

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

CHAPTER 6

The Quality of Government

The Practice: Sins of Avarice

The most common source of illegal profits was the customs system. Of our men who served as customs officials, 18 were caught embezzling customs money or taking bribes to ignore smuggling, whilst 26 of our office-holders (again, many customs personnel) were involved in smuggling. It is highly likely that smuggling was far more widespread than our records show, due to the inefficiency of the detection system, given the large amount of coast-line it had to cover, and that the crimes of customs officials were mostly disguised by falsified accounts and collaboration between the various departments of the local headquarters. Bribery was undetectable except when an informer came forward: in 1408 Yarmouth collector Geoffrey Pampyng was accused by Peter Savage of smuggling out 5000 woolpells, embezzling £15 in customs paid by two Dutchmen, and taking bribes from members of the Spitlyng family to turn a blind eye to their smuggling activities; Geoffrey had been trading partner of John Spitlyng in 1404, when John was a customer, and in which year John was caught smuggling wool. That Savage's motives in informing may not have been public-spirited is suggested by the fact that he took over the customs post from which Pampyng was dismissed.^[67] In 1396 Yarmouth customers Hugh atte Fen and Thomas Grimesby complained to the Exchequer that their controller had been: countenancing smuggling; embezzling customs money; absenting himself from office, so that merchants had been able to bring goods through the port without paying custom; and extorting additional imposts. All this had been done in their absence and without their consent, they added. The complainants seem unaware that the scandalous affair is an indictment of their own negligence, for it was their job - not the controller's - to be present to collect customs money.^[68] Again, William Elys, another Yarmouth collector, and his clerk William Savage were accused by two Lowestoft enemies of extorting money, under the guise of customs, on separate occasions from Prussian and Scottish merchants whose ships had been forced by storms to harbour at Yarmouth. The accusers laid their charges from prison, where sent (to prevent them testifying, they claimed) by Elys' partner George Felbrigge on a questionable charge of having tried to ambush Elys en route to London. Despite Elys' defence, some of which was proved true by later investigation, he was impeached before the Good Parliament of 1376 and spent a few months in the Tower. It is hard to determine where truth lay in this case. His conviction owes something to the political attack of that parliament on customs farmer Richard Lyons, whose deputy Elys was; whilst his release and pardon similarly were largely the result of John of Gaunt's cancellation of the acts of the Good Parliament. On the other hand, Morey at least believed that the major attention given to relatively minor crimes may have been because Elys was suspected of graver, but unprovable, offences.[69] In 1382 Elys complained that an East Anglian contingent of the Peasants' Revolt had broken into his houses and carried off the money he had collected as customer, as well as private possessions; this may have been true, but it could also have been a very convenient excuse for embezzlement. It did not, however, prevent the posthumous seizure of his goods in the following year, on the grounds that he had not rendered account as customer.[70]

Money collected as customs was potentially useful capital that might be invested in private commercial ventures and repaid from the profits; delays in accounting may well be explained by such practices.[71] The often large amounts of money passing through customers' hands must have been a great temptation, and the competition for the farm of national or local customs indicates that collecting was considered a very profitable activity. Farms offered sometimes exceeded the annual yield of customs, suggesting that amounts answered for to the Exchequer were only a portion of the true yield; the advantage of farming was that one had a relatively free hand to extort what one could from merchants.[72] For all who operated the customs system, farmers or not, it seems likely that the opportunities for illicit profit were one of the major attractions of the service. General investigations into customs collection, nationwide in the 1340s, 1365, and 1402, and at Yarmouth in 1357, as well as the parliamentary complaint of 1449, suggest that popular opinion held the customs service to be rotten to the core, and that "avarice was widely viewed as the worst defect of local government." [73] Even if local appointees were, due to conflict of interests, responsible for more of the graft and corruption in the customs collection than were officials selected from outsiders, as Morey thought, the latter raised the spectre of absenteeism. Caught between devil and deep blue sea, the king chose (at least during the fourteenth century) to forgive corruption and re-appoint offending ministers to the same or different posts in his service.[74]

The somewhat belated insistence on personal attendance, and the prohibition of ship-owners from holding customs posts (1390), had an effect as yet uncharted but not obviously great.[75] Conflict of interests was inevitably endemic in the customs service: wool merchants or growers sought posts as collectors of the wool custom, vintners as deputy butlers; borough officials could not be relied upon to keep a check on the honesty of the customers, since the personnel of both groups was much the same, or the former were merchants who profited from the corruption and inefficiency in the customs network, or were themselves profiting from confiscated goods, which the king sometimes had trouble retrieving from them.[76] Obstructionism and bureaucratic red tape conspired to confound judicial investigations. Robert Pynne, searcher of ships at Yarmouth in 1440, was accused by the controller there of failing to record most of the forfeits of one arrested cargo, since he intended to keep the goods for his own profit. In 1447/8 he and kinsman John Pynne were charged with complicity in a wool-smuggling operation, and Robert was also said to have used his position as bailiff to obstruct the commission of enquiry.[77]

The Godestones of Colchester were also tied up in various activities of dubious legality. John Godestone and John Rous, collectors of customs and subsidies in 1410/11, were also partners in the wine trade in the same year, and were otherwise heavily involved in wool export. John Godestone had taken advantage of his brother Thomas holding the customer's post at Ipswich, in 1397/8, to export 5 shipments of wool through the port, the customs on which went, not into the record, but into Thomas' pocket. In 1421, John was again subject to investigations regarding customs frauds, over a period of years. Thomas' concealments, not only on his brother's wool, but on that of others, were discovered in 1402 and he was convicted of having profited to the sum of £249. His controller, John Bernard, who had business associations with both Godestones, was convicted of complicity, and of having received £120 in customs money. John Arnold, co-customer of Thomas Godestone (who also mainperned for Arnold's farm of the Suffolk cloth subsidy in 1398) was convicted in the amount of £155. Arnold was fined less heavily than the other two, however, in consideration of his having informed on them; in fact, it was he, as king's serjeant-at-arms, who was ordered to arrest Bernard in 1401, who loaned Bernard the money to repay the Exchequer, and then had to sue him for the debt in 1403.[78] Rous, Arnold, and Bernard were among the more prominent Ipswich rulers in the reigns of Richard II and Henry IV, and Thomas Godestone was heavily involved in Colchester's administration.

At Yarmouth John Perbroun and William Elys were among the foremost of the burgesses, both in terms of political position and of wealth, and both died owing large amounts of customs money to the king from their terms as collectors.[79] Those two great financiers from Lynn, Thomas de Melcheburn and John de Wesenham, inevitably made the odd faux pas in their lengthy service careers. In 1333 Melcheburn was charged with trying to evade the wool-tax. Purveyor of wool himself in 1337, he was accused four years later, by various Norfolk men, of having taken more wool than his instructions had permitted. In 1342 he was pardoned a fine for "oppressions" committed in various roles of purveyor, customer, commissioner, and vice-admiral. Shortly after his death, all his lands were seized by the king for debts of farmer of customs Walter Chiriton, for whom Thomas had stood pledge.[80] Wesenham was convicted of smuggling victuals to the Scottish foe in 1337, only shortly after his release from the Tower for unspecified felonies. In 1340 he was charged with piracy, in 1342 with contempt of the king's court. And in 1352, a year after his appointment as changer of the king's moneys in London, he was pardoned his impeachment for importing false coin, using false wool-weights, and smuggling wool; in 1364 he was ordered arrested as mainpernor for the king's minters, who had got into hot water.[81]

From Ipswich we may select the example of a smuggling ring that apparently encompassed several leading families. In 1347 John Cobat cleared the way towards a lengthy career in borough administration by purchasing his release from Marshalsea, where he had been imprisoned from uncertain date for: smuggling wool out of Ipswich, bribing the king's officers not to search a ship departing from Orwell, and being involved in a smuggling plot hatched at the house of William Malyn.[82] This last charge refers to a case of 1344, whereby William Malyn junior, probably the wealthiest Ipswich man of his generation, was convicted of detention of the king's wool and money, wool-smuggling, and trading with the king's enemies. [83] Also apparently associated was William Kenebroke, town clerk (in the 1320s) turned bailiff (1341/2), whose abrupt disappearance from the office of coroner in October 1344 signals his commitment to prison on the charge of embezzling wool he had been commissioned (with Malyn?) to receive for the king; within two years he was dead, as far as we know still imprisoned.[84] Malyn was more fortunate, taking his ship into royal service to win a pardon which, despite his desertion, he achieved in 1346 by paying a fine of 300 marks. By this time he could add to his crimes the murder of John de Halteby (1344), leader of the reformers in the 1320s and very probably the man who informed on Malyn's smuggling ring. Several other members of the Malyn family, as well as Kenebroke's wife and quite likely Kenebroke himself, were involved in the killing.[85]

Embezzlement of borough revenue was far less common. The complaint of financial maladministration was the foundation of the Colchester reforms of 1372, but it is not clear whether the bailiffs were accused of dipping into community funds for private purposes, or simply of authorizing borough expenditure without common consent.[86] The Ipswich reformers of 1320 were more explicit in charges laid against Thomas Stace and Thomas le Rente (not named but obviously intended) and their clique: market abuses of forestalling, hostage, and brokerage; receiving fines and amercelements privately, in order to keep the money out of the communal treasury; and charging exorbitantly for application of the ballival/ community seal. Le Rente's not inconsiderable wealth was built up not only by commercial enterprise, but by the disinclination to repay debts already noted above, and by embezzlement of customs money - he was convicted of £333 in 1322. In 1316 a German merchant complained to parliament that le Rente, Stace, and others had bought a cargo of fish from him, value £156, in the previous year but, to avoid payment, had him imprisoned on a trumped-up charge.[87] Another example of embezzlement charges comes from Yarmouth. It received its first grant of murage in 1261, yet foreign merchants complained in the following year that although murage was being collected they could see no wall-building. Again in 1279 there was complaint that the Yarmouth officials were applying murage to private ends rather than construction on the walls, with the result that the king appointed external auditors of the murage accounts; a record of 1285, however, suggests that the officials had been cleared of the charge.[88] At Colchester in 1357 a sub-collector of borough tolls was convicted of pocketing a percentage of his weekly collections.[89] At Lynn we find examples of abuse of tax-collection: in 1412 the collectors were accused of embezzling tax revenues over a four-year period, and in the 1357/8 tax the assessors are almost all markedly under-assessed. No wonder that it became common practice for a separate committee to be appointed to assess the principal assessors.[90] However, no great attempts to reform the system, to eliminate embezzlement, were made, beyond the introduction of chamberlains to handle revenues (or at least supervise the executives' handling of them) and, at Ipswich, the warning that any chamberlain caught embezzling would be fined 4d. for every 1d. concealed (1429).[91]

 previous

next

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

Created: July 30, 1998

© Stephen Alford, 1998-2003

[MAIN MENU]

Yarmouth by-laws

1272

Resisting justice

Breaking the peace

Night wanderers

Drawing blood

Assault

Honouring bargains

Reparations

Town council

1300

Burgess' share in merchandize

Host's share

Host to sell merchandize

Sale of host's part

Advance payment for shares

Penalty for infringement

Ships passing through to unload

Sale of fish

Payment for merchandize

Capitula listed under the year 1272 were extracted from a royal charter of 1285, which itself was an exemplification of a charter of Henry III giving his approval to ordinances drawn up in October 1272. Although the 18th century antiquarian Swinden described this document as the town's custumal, it is really only a set of provisions made, in response to a period of internal troubles, by "burgesses and community" in order to re-establish peace within the town. The character of the ordinances is suggestive of the types of problems that had been occurring.

Capitula listed under the year 1300 were copied from the "Golden Book" copy of a document issued by bailiffs and community on 4 July of that year. Their purpose seems to have been to exert greater control over hosting, a system liable to abuse, and the herring trade in the context of the ongoing contest with the Cinque Ports in that regard.

In addition to the ordinances already mentioned, a series of customs from an older volume, written in French, was in 1491 copied into the Book of Oaths and Ordinances in an English translation made by the Steward of Yarmouth (an officer who provided legal counsel to the borough, much like the Recorder in other boroughs). The customs were of two types: generalized legal procedures based on national statutes, with examples from local court cases; customs that appear to have originated locally. This appears to have been a preface to the updating of local by-laws, embodied in a fresh set passed in that same year. All these appear here under the year 1491, subdivided as "customs" and "ordinances". Note the degree of detailed specification in the 1491 ordinances, as compared to those of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries.

In all cases, I have supplied the capitula titles.

Fish-houses

1386

Town council

1413

Regulation of the herring trade

1491 - customs (TO COME)

Preamble

1491 - ordinances

Preamble

Presence at elections

Electoral procedures

Frequency of holding ballival office

Duties of the bailiffs

Chamberlains

Murage collection

Chamberlains' reward

Bailiffs' reward

Payment of customs duties

Refusal to pay customs

Deceit to avoid paying customs

Water-bailiff

Gaoler and sergeants

Audit of accounts

Admission fee for new burgesses

Admission by patrimony

No actions in external courts

Writ of error

Absence from an inquest

Aliens not to be hosts

Failure to attend council meetings

Shares in herring

Forestalling herring at sea

Duties of herring wardens

Renting of fish-houses to strangers

Replacement of members of the 24

Investigation of illegal fishing

Shares in merchandize

Shares in coal and salt

Weights and measures

Inquest into offenses against the ordinances

Bailiffs deficient in upholding the ordinances

Publication of the ordinances

*According to the copy of a document (letters patent) that is undated, but can with some confidence be dated to August or September of 1386, the burgesses and community, pursuant to the [ordinances of 1272, chose to hold office from Michaelmas 1386 to Michaelmas 1387 24 men to support the bailiffs: Ralph Ramseye, Nicholas Drayton, John Hakon, John Elys, William Oxneye, Hugh atte Fen, Robert atte Gappe, John Rollesby, John Halle, Peter Beneyt, John de Beketon, Roger Adam, Robert Howlyn, Simon Geryng, Oliver Spicer, Thomas Bateman, Bartholomew Drayton, Laurence Stevens, Thomas Marche, Warin Lucas, Adam Heyron, John Beverle, Alexander Fastolf and Roger de Drayton] Who are sworn to uphold and perform the said ordinances and to make other ordinances (the which the burgesses and community pledge to respect) for the profit or improvement of the community and the protection of the liberties. If any of the 24 shall die within the year of office, or be removed for any cause, the remainder of the 24 shall choose a replacement. The 24 shall also choose the town officers and also 24 other wise men to view merchandize according to the terms of the ordinances.

The purpose of this document seems not to record the election of the 24 jurats of the town council – for a list of the [jurats of 1385/86 is so similar as to throw question on the idea of an annually elected council – so much as to introduce (or confirm) life membership, co-optation, the power of the council to elect other officers, and perhaps the increase in numbers of the supervisors of sales of arrested merchandize.]

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 2

The Social and Economic Background of Office-holders

Gentrification

There were clearly many avenues to advancement and it is difficult to view the urban upper class as a closed caste. A further socio-economic trend to be considered is the defection of leading burgesses into the ranks of the gentry. In fact this was a two-way movement, with junior members of knightly or armigerous county families taking an interest in towns and trade. George (later Sir George) Felbrigg, of a junior branch of the Norfolk family, farmed Yarmouth and Ipswich petty customs 1362-99. At Yarmouth he was the friend and trading partner of William Elys, his fellow farmer; at Ipswich he had associations with Richard de Martlesham, deputy customer there and his father-in-law, as well as with probable relative John Felbrigg mercer, later coroner and M.P.[153] Lynn mayor Thomas Curson was a member of the Norfolk family that provided a county sheriff in the reign of Richard II; as such, he had interests in manors in Norfolk and Hertfordshire. The Arnulph de Mounteney who was bailiff of Colchester(1319/20) was probably a son of the knight of the same name who held lands in Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex and Hertfordshire, and who granted some in Gyng Mountnessing, to Arnulph junior in 1321; after which time the latter appears no more in Colchester. Veteran Colchester M.P. John de Ratlesden, possibly a member of the family holding estates on the Suffolk and Essex borders, was married to Margery de Mounteney. Thomas Astley esq., the Ipswich bailiff, inherited several Norfolk manors from his father, the knight of the same name, and acquired property interests in Colchester by his marriage to the widow of Andrew Beche.[154] Thomas Wetherby, the central figure in the party conflicts that brought Norwich to its knees in the 1430s and '40s, was probably another of these men.[155] He became a freeman there in 1416 but was already using the city as a base for mercantile activities in 1413 when he bought property at Cringleford. In the same year he is seen as the holder of Hellesdon manor and was a participant in the election of county M.P.s. His brother was established as squire of Wicklewood, but also later became a freeman of Norwich. By 1440 Thomas was lord of the manors of Welborne, Brondale, and Intwood and held land at Swerdestone. He had associations with Sir Thomas Tuddenham, John Heydon, and John Jenney (whose father-in-law he was), won the patronage of the Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Suffolk, and was an executor of Bishop Wakeryng of Norwich. At the end of his life he retired into quarters in Carrow priory, and was buried in Norwich's Augustinian friary - a choice more typical of gentry than burgesses. [156]

More numerous than the gentry-become-townsmen were the burgesses who fraternised with the gentry. In some cases it was a question of the mercantile skills of townsmen being put to use by gentry. Ipswich's Richard Felawe, who himself held lands in both Norfolk and Suffolk at the time of his death (1483) and whose daughter married into the Fastolf family, was the agent in this respect for Sir John Howard the future Duke of Norfolk. Simon Pygot, one of Lynn's foremost merchants c.1440-60, similarly acted as the exporting agent of the Earl of Suffolk. Lynn mayor Henry Thorisby merchant, holder of lands at Ashwicken and feoffee to use for Norfolk esquires, produced as his offspring: Robert Thorisby, who entered the franchise as "gentleman" (1457) and who was trading partner of Simon Pygot; and Thomas Thorisby, who entered the franchise as merchant (1474), kept several sheep-farms in the vicinity of Lynn, held lands in Northamptonshire (possibly once of Henry Thorisby) and was creditor and executor of Lord Rivers.[157] In other cases the links arose out of marriage arrangements. Yarmouth bailiff Roger Gavel married the daughter of Walter de Cain and in 1321 purchased from him the lordship of Kirby-Cane; his heirs put aside their Yarmouth interests, which can be traced back through several generations, to concentrate on building up their county holdings. John Perbroun, merchant, fisherman, admiral, and bailiff of Yarmouth, married his daughter to Sir John le Gros of Sloley. The marriages of Elias fitz John and Thomas de Dedham of Colchester to the widows, respectively, of Henry de Merk and John de Daniswelle brought them county lands and a passport into county society, whilst Thomas Godestone's wife brought to her marriage the manors of Ramsey and East Newland. Robert Toppes, mayor of Norwich, acquired a manor at Great Melton, of which his son subsequently became the lord; his daughter was married first to merchant William Fen of Yarmouth, who held lands at Worstead, and later to Thomas Lovell esq. of Barton Bendish.[158]

But most commonly gentry associations were the consequences of the acquisition of land in the county, although it might be misleading to claim that achievement of the former was the purpose of the latter. We should interpret the building-up of estates, both within and without the towns, as a sensible investment by men who sought a steady source of income to guard against the vicissitudes of mercantile ventures. Investment of trade-acquired wealth in land was a practice stretching back as far as surviving records will show us. The dual interests of the fitz Norman/Beaumes family of Ipswich has already been mentioned. Richard Leu, of a family equally ancient there, was an executor of Bishop Salmon of Norwich in 1325, married one of his daughters to Sir John de Castone, and held ¼ knight's fee in Rushmere, ¼ knight's fee in Parva Bresete, and lands near a dozen other local vills, some once of his father Hugh. Richard's lands were sufficient to qualify him for knighthood, a burden he resisted initially but unsuccessfully. Philip Harneys, the second wealthiest man in Ipswich in 1283, also held several ½ knight's fees and other lands, both in Suffolk and Essex, at a slightly later period. [159] At Yarmouth particularly, the limited real estate available within the borough and the instabilities of trade encouraged investment in external estates.[160] Ralph Ramsey, frequently bailiff and M.P. of Yarmouth, where he had mercantile interests, built his career on his role as esquire to Henry Bolingbroke and other services to him when Henry IV. He held lands in Suffolk and Norfolk and was sheriff of the same in 1403 and 1408. He has more of the gentleman than the townsman about him. The same could be said of Hugh Fastolf who, besides his considerable trading activities, held lands at some twenty locations in Norfolk and Suffolk totalling over 1000 acres.[161] Indeed, the Fastolf family as a whole, whose earliest manifestations are in Yarmouth at the beginning of the reign of Edward I, by the mid-fifteenth century had undergone a quite prodigious expansion, with branches urban and rural throughout East Anglia, at Caister, Oulton, Gapton, Nacton, Okewell, Ipswich, and London. The family had produced numerous esquires, several knights including the famous Sir John Fastolf, and a few high-ranking churchmen; its marriage alliances had brought contacts with gentry families such as the Parks, Tibetots, Felbrigges, and Holebrokes.

Since the men who occupied the highest rank in borough government shared the attribute of being among the wealthiest of the burgesses, it is not surprising that many are found to have sunk capital into property. Of the 1142 office-holders investigated in Lynn, Ipswich, Colchester and Yarmouth, 204 are known to have made substantial investments, 54 of them in real estate within their towns, 124 in lands within the local neighbourhood of the town, 71 in lands further afield.[162] Five of them were knighted, 20 were esquires, 13 were known as gentlemen, 6 as yeomen, most of these titles being found in the late fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Few of these men came from Lynn, where trade remained a more dominant interest than in our other towns. Although in 1434, when all the Norfolk notables were required to take a special oath to uphold the peace, listed together with the knights and esquires of the county are a large proportion of the Lynn and Yarmouth ruling classes.[163] The effect of investment in land, intentional or no, was to draw away leading townsmen - or, more often, their heirs - from the towns into the countryside. John de Preston and his son Robert were among the most prominent Ipswich leaders from 1324 to 1375; but Robert's son John, inheriting lands acquired by his father in Barking, Bramford, Tattingstone, Darmsden, Needham Market, Codenham, and Willisham, abandoned the town to become a country squire and died fighting on the losing side at Shrewsbury (1403). Having inherited his father's manors of Whatefield and Ramsholt, Thomas Denys junior showed no inclination to follow Thomas senior into service in Ipswich's government.[164] This movement was simply part of the upwards trend of migration and, as such, contributed to creating openings for new men in the ranks of the urban upper class. On the other hand, the intermixing of interests of gentry and wealthy townsmen acted as a further wedge driven into the increasing gap between the urban rulers and ruled.

[!\[\]\(dd6507121580d428a7de9d7152e418f6_img.jpg\) previous](#)

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 2

The Social and Economic Background of Office-holders

Origins of the Ruling Class

Perhaps it is an invalid issue to try and distinguish mercantile and landed interests in the ranks of borough rulers. What we are searching for is the source of political authority and this seems to be, at least in part, wealth - whether that wealth came from land or from trade. Yet the question of burgess land-holding takes on added significance when we look further back in time. The origins of the urban ruling class - whether from Pirenne's itinerant chapmen, Lopez's moneymen, or Hibbert's enterprising landowners and feudal officials - is one of the key unresolved issues of urban historiography.^[49] Unfortunately the earliest period of borough independence is poorly represented in the records, whilst before the twelfth century glimpses are rare indeed and historians must rely on Domesday more than they might wish. This problem is not simply one of survival of records, but of the only gradual growth of medieval awareness of the value of a formal archive.^[50] Professor Lopez's theory need not detain us, since it is applicable primarily to the continent; the last vestiges of the local minting network in England disappeared in the course of the thirteenth century.^[51] But we must address ourselves to the opposing theories of a landed patriciate and a ruling class of traders, remembering that the thegn-worthy sea-crosser of Anglo-Saxon times suggests a merchant class (using that term loosely) to have been present then.

The case of Colchester has been one of the principal battlegrounds of those contesting whether the character of the borough was originally mercantile or agricultural (as though it had to be exclusively one or the other). Arguments have focused partly on Domesday evidence: Round suggested that Colchester at that period had not evolved into a trading community like other boroughs but remained dependent on farming activities; the relatively small population of 276 burgesses shared 1,297 acres of arable or pasture between them, whereas at Ipswich 538 burgesses held only 40 acres. He also pointed to features of charters granted by the king, such as the absence of reference to a Merchant Guild, but instead the grant of hunting and fishing rights. To this Rickword added his interpretation of the evidence of taxation lists of 1296 and 1301, that 80% of the population were involved in growing crops or raising livestock to some extent, and 50% of the population exclusively so.^[52] Both sources have since received different interpretations. Tait replied to Round that in fact almost half of the Colchester burgesses of Domesday held houses but no private land, while most of the remainder held small plots of land adequate only for subsidiary income; it was therefore likely that a majority of the burgesses relied on trade for their livelihood. And Britnell has pointed out that the taxation evidence is misleading since it ignores commercial possessions of residents in the hamlets, while the goods of residents in the walled centre of the borough are distinctly more commercial in nature.[53] To this we may add that the Ipswich comparison may also be misleading since, as already noted, the burgesses there customarily had strong landed interests in the villis surrounding, but not technically within the liberties of, the borough. Besides which, the most recent definition of a town holds that occupations of its inhabitants will be variegated, but that a significant proportion - although not necessarily a majority - will live off non-agricultural occupations.[54]

The evidence from the towns here studied cannot hope to solve the question of the origins of the ruling classes of those towns, but we may review it for the little light it sheds. The evidence of the Colchester taxations, referred to above, as well as Ipswich's lay subsidy of 1283, is inadequate due to the bias of those assessments towards agricultural and domestic goods, and other problems traditionally associated with taxation evidence.[55] But there are no other sources for analysing the whole populations; we shall therefore turn to the evidence of individuals. Four prominent Colchester men of the late thirteenth and early fourteenth century appear to have been particularly reliant on land as a source of income. Three of them - Warin fitz William, Hubert Bosse, and Elias fitz John - are listed in one or both of the subsidies mentioned above, assessed only on grain and livestock (except for the gown that Elias was fortunate enough to own!). All four not only served as bailiff but also sat in parliament; in fact Elias (16 times M.P.) and Warin (10 times) were among the foremost of the borough's parliamentarians. Part of the landed interests of Elias fitz John Elys derived from his wife's dower rights in manors at Marks Tey and Latton, interests subsequently expanded into Elms Tey and Belchamp St. Paul - his tax assessments there in 1327 being much higher than his Colchester assessment. Britnell has even suggested that Elias may have been only a part-time resident of the borough.[56] Warin fitz William fitz Warin held, in 1306 222½ acres of fields, woods and meadow in Colchester, Lexden, and Milend (most of it held by his father before him), in addition to the land he leased in the borough fields. His listing in the 1307 subsidy strengthens the impression of that of 1301, in accrediting him only with agricultural goods.[57] In 1310 Hubert Bosse was renting a field from Elias fitz John and may have held pasture in Bromfield too. In 1315 he gave up his legal battle with St. John's Abbey for control of land in West Donyland. Family interests remained rooted in the land over the next century, although they broadened into the victualling trades via baking and mill-owning.[58] Our fourth Colecestrian, Joseph Elianore, lived slightly later than the other three and is perhaps the best-known, thanks to his foundation of a chantry in St. Mary-at-Wall church (1341), which he endowed with 100 acres of arable land and woods within the liberties and 100 sheep; granting to the bailiffs, for maintenance of the chantry, further substantial property in town. On various other occasions we encounter references to his property (not inconsiderable) in Greenstead, Ardleigh, Great Wigborough, Salcott, and Layer Breton, and to his orchard in the suburbs.[59]

None of these men exhibit much sign of commercial activity, although Elianore's tilekiln was evidently put to use, and fitz William had a shop in Colchester market.[60] We must expect that land-holding burgesses would at least market part of their own produce. On the other hand, the four share an involvement in administrative or legal work beyond borough office-holding. Fitz William, whose father was a clerk, acted as attorney for his community in a plea brought against it by the abbot of St. John's. Fitz John also appears in the contexts of clerk and attorney. Elianore, yet another clerk, often acted as pledge and attorney and was bailiff of the Colchester properties of the rector of Tendring, John de Colcestre, in December 1312 when he (Joseph) and Hubert Bosse acted together as pledges for dom. John. Bosse was retained as a counsellor to the Abbey of St John's.[61] Nor do the coincidences end here. Elianore held lands of fitz John and fitz William, whilst Bosse held land of fitz John.[62] Even more curious, all were at one time or other referred to by the surname 'de Colcestre', and it is not impossible that all were distantly related members of a single family of long-standing importance not merely in the borough, where their common surname would have been meaningless, but also in the local countryside. It is interesting that their usual surnames are all patronymics or matronymics, rather than the locatives that would be more likely were any of the four from immigrant families. Support for this theory also comes from a tantalising piece of evidence in the document recording the foundation of Elianore's chantry, whereby he required the chantry priest to celebrate for the souls of himself, his parents, (his wife?) Philippa, John (de Colcestre?), Hubert (Bosse?), and Elias (fitz John?).[63]

In Ipswich too, many leading townsmen supplemented their shares in the large areas of intramural and suburban arable and pasture with land-holding further afield. In the case of Thomas le Rente this may have been a way of increasing trade stock, for Thomas was already involved in the victualling trade (notably fishing) when he first appears in the 1280s. He acquired, principally during the reign of Edward II when his political career was at its peak, 142 acres in Stoke-by-Ipswich, 80 acres in Wherstead, 220 acres in Little Wenham, and 142 acres lying around several villages to the north of Ipswich. In 1324 an extent of his property, taken posthumously, revealed that 54 acres of his land in Stoke was sown with crops of barley and rye worth £37, whilst the pasture there doubtless hosted his 80 sheep. The extent paints a fine picture of his business activities: he had in storage quantities of wheat, barley, malt, pork, and beef worth £11.5.3d, and his business equipment included the articles that we would expect to find in the brewery and bakery which are mentioned, as well as several fish-traps, containers for salting meat, and numerous seats, tables and plates, suggesting that one or more of his shops may have been taverns.[64] What the document cannot tell us is whether local farming and retailing activities drew le Rente into the wider sphere of commerce (as Thrupp has noted was a natural progression), or whether originally mercantile interests prompted him to self-supply of merchandise. There is no evidence that any of le Rente's lands were inherited, although his father was also in the victualling trade.[65] A similar, if less well documented, case is that of Robert de Orford, several times bailiff of Ipswich during the last decade of the reign of Henry III and the first of that of Edward I. Like the Colchester cases already looked at, his tax assessment (1283) was on little more than grain and livestock; he is known to have held lands in Caldwell, Tudenham and Rushmere. Referred to as a clerk, there is no evidence of any mercantile activity, although he was overseas in 1271 on business unknown; but, like le Rente, he owned a bakery and brewery along with several rented properties. His daughters received, when Robert died, bulls, sheep and malt as their inheritance.[66]

More interesting is Robert's contemporary Vivian fitz Silvester, since his family was of long-standing prominence in the borough. As bailiff (10 times 1270-95) he was following not only in the footsteps of his father Silvester fitz Wakelin fitz Norman (bailiff at least 3 times around the middle of the century), but also of Wakelin's brothers John fitz Norman and William de Beaumes, Ipswich's first two bailiffs in 1200, and of other members of the family John de Beaumes and Geoffrey fitz William de Beaumes (bailiffs during the second quarter of the thirteenth century).[67] Although the evidence for the pre-Edwardian period is scant, a little is discoverable of this family, which we may suspect played a helmsman's role in directing the course of Ipswich's constitutional development at a crucial point. Wakelin fitz Norman was also known as Wakelin de Bramford and a Sir Hubert de Bramford, justice of assize in Suffolk and Ipswich in 1200 and 1223-24, witnessed (together with Wakelin's afore-mentioned brothers and his sons Nicholas and Silvester) a land transaction of Wakelin; Hubert and the sons of Norman appear together as witnesses on other occasions too. Peter Norman held land in Bramford c.1255.[68] The sons of Norman had a joint interest in 30 acres in Sprouton in 1206, whilst it seems that their mother had held three-quarters of a knight's fee in Leicestershire. The fact that Geoffrey de Beaumes was knighted suggests land-holding in the county, yet he also held a tavern in Ipswich. John de Beaumes was an attorney on behalf of county land-owners in 1229 and 1230; both men were benefactors of Ipswich's Priory of SS. Peter and Paul. William de Beaumes, on the other hand, was a ship-owner active in the coastal trade of grain and herring (1226). Another member of this most interesting family, a further son of Wakelin fitz Norman, was known as Ianusius Mercator[69], although whether he was in fact involved in commerce as his name suggests, is unknown. There is no direct evidence of land-holding for Vivian fitz Silvester, although his father held land in Thurston and Surneston, and a family with the surname Vivian was settled in Bramford in the first half of the fourteenth century; on the other hand, he was taxed in 1283 only on clothing, domestic utensils, a horse and malt, and his only known association with commerce was the butcher's stall he held.[70] The evidence is inconclusive, but at least suggests that the prosperity and authority of one of the earliest traceable families prominent in Ipswich were founded on land-holding.

It is far more difficult to trace the lineage of Colchester families back through the thirteenth century. A large number of deeds are preserved in the cartulary of St. John's Abbey but, due to the prevalence of patronymics in a period when surnames still tended to change from one generation to the next, it is rarely possible to determine whether the bailiffs of Edward I's time came from families long-established in the borough.[71] Elias fitz John appears to have been the son of the John fitz Elias who, with his brother Oliver, were prominent townsmen in the 1250s. Whether this line can be traced back to the beginning of the century in the persons of a Thurstan and his son Elias, as Benham claimed, is less certain; whilst to suggest that the Oliver family (which provided Colchester with officials in the early fourteenth century in the persons of Robert Oliver and his brother's son John Jordan) might be a branch of the same tree would be pure speculation.[72]

At Yarmouth we may reasonably suspect (but no more) that William Thurkild, bailiff in 1316, was one of the later members of a family that provided the town with at least three other bailiffs in 1221, 1269, and 1270, and lasted there until mid-fourteenth century. We may similarly suspect that the Drayton family, very prominent from the time of Edward I to that of Henry IV, may have a forebear in shipowner Robert de Drayton, seen in 1230. A William Rose captained, with Robert Turkil, the Yarmouth fleet in 1242 and may be the shipowner of Little Yarmouth mentioned in 1230.[73] We may have more confidence in associating the Yarmouth family of Gerberge - a name not derived from 'Yare bridge' or 'Yarmouth burgh' as some have hypothesised - with Gerberga, a townswoman[74] of sufficient prominence that the king awarded her custody of rebels' lands in 1216. From her descended two notable lines: the Charles family, founded by her son Charles fitz William, alias de Jernemuth, whose interests lay as much in the county as in the town; and the Gerberge family, which provided several bailiffs (the first being William fitz Gerburg' c.1208) during the course of the thirteenth century, but gradually moved into the ranks of the Norfolk gentry.[75]

Ipswich's Leu family is traceable through its earliest visible member, Roger fitz Lyu. Coroner and portman in 1200 and subsequently bailiff (date unknown), Roger was one of the wealthiest townsmen in 1228 thanks to his trading activities in his two ships. His son Hugh was bailiff in 1255 and 1269 and had one of the highest tax assessments in 1283, principally on a large trading stock of agricultural produce, some of which he may have raised on his lands in the vicinity of Ipswich. The several members of the family who appear in borough office during the fourteenth century were Hugh's descendants.[76]

There is less indication of long-standing families in Lynn. The Belvaco family produced a number of officials. The earliest, Michael de Belvaco, appears to have been alderman of the Merchant Guild in 1223. Another, Stephen, was scabin of the same in 1249 and c.1265. Two others were mayors: Bartholomew in 1257, James in 1268 and c.1271.[77] The family of Alexander Kellock, mayor c.1266 and alderman 1268, may be traced back through gildsman Ralph Kelloc, who lived in the reign of John, to Richard Chelloc, resident of Lynn in 1165. [78] However, there is nothing to connect it with the chamberlain of 1428, William Kellowe. The family of John Lamberd (M.P. 1312) may be traced back to the early thirteenth century; Richard Lambert, probably John's father, was alderman c.1271 and earlier family members were also associated with the Merchant Guild. It is curious therefore that in 1302 John was exempted from paying local tax (assessed only on trade goods) when he took oath that "nullis catallos habuit in mercandisa".[79]

In chapter 1 it was suggested that the men who took the reins of borough self-government at its initiation were those who had already acquired influence and administrative experience. Their influence doubtless derived from a social status dependent on wealth, but whence this wealth we cannot say. Land-holding and commerce both seem to have played roles from the time of our earliest evidence. In Ipswich and Colchester land may have been a more important foundation of wealth and social prestige at first, whereas in Yarmouth and Lynn trade was more probably the prominent factor; even Lynn's first mayor, Robert fitz Sunolf, appears as a merchant, exporting grain as an agent of the Bishop of Norwich.[80] Lynn's case may owe something to the strong foreign immigrant element in its upper class. But it would be dangerous to assume that a cohesive merchant class existed in thirteenth century Lynn, just as it would a yeoman or rentier class in Colchester or Ipswich.

← previous

next →

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

History of medieval Yarmouth

[MAIN MENU]

APPENDIX 2: Register of the Hospital of St. Mary: A Calendar

Ordinances

[f.1r]

In the name of the Trinity – Father, Son and Holy Ghost – and the most blessed Virgin Mary, mother of the god and man Jesus Christ, saviour of mankind, we Ralph Ramseye, Nicholas de Drayton, Warin Lucas, and Adam Heyron bailiffs of Great Yarmouth, and John de Beverle, John Elys, William atte Gappe, John Beketon, Richard Elys, John de Rollesby, Robert atte Gappe, Alexander Fastolf, John Hakon, Edmund Sylke, Hugh atte Fen, Roger Adam, William de Oxneye, Robert Howlyn, Thomas Marche, John de Halle, Peter Beneyt, Simon Geryng, Oliver Spicer, Edmund Bie, Laurence Stevens, Thomas Bateman, John Rayl, Adam Alot and certain other burgesses of the town, with the unanimous consent of the whole community, for the well-being of our souls and those of our descendants [establish the hospital].

[ff.1r-3d]

[Ordinances for the operation of the hospital, dated 2 May 1386. These are repeated in a later English translation (summarized below), probably tempore Henry VI, in a subsequent section of the register:]

[f.28v]

Constitutions and ordinances of the hospital:

There are to be a warden, 8 brothers and 8 sisters. The warden is to be chosen by the bailiffs and burgesses; he is not appointed for life but may be replaced whenever necessary, at the will of the bailiffs.

The residents are to be selected by the bailiffs and burgesses and may be evicted if they commit misdeeds.

Each brother or sister chosen is to take oath to be faithful to [the rules of] the hospital and are to make a true declaration to the warden of any assets or liabilities.

[f.29r]

While alive, residents may not freely dispose of their goods; after their death, the goods are to be divided between the other residents, with a share going towards the repair of the hospital.

Within six days of entering the hospital, a resident is to take an oath of obedience to the warden. They are only to wear cloth of the colour of russet or "blekkyed" [black?]. Sisters are not to wear silk veils on their heads.

The warden is to hire a priest to celebrate divine services and to pray for the bailiffs, community, warden, residents and the benefactors of the hospital. He is not, however, to perform any rites which properly belong to the parish church.

[St. Nicholas' being only a short distance north of the hospital.]

[f.29v]

There is to be a "little bell" [rung] to summon residents to divine service.

The warden is to hand over all oblations to the Prior of Norwich.

All residents are to be present at Mass.

[f.30r]

Residents are to remain chaste or forfeit one-quarter of the yearly alms. No married man or woman is to be accepted as a resident.

Residents may practice the crafts that they have learned. They may also dine with friends in town, but must not stay out after the curfew bell is rung at St. Nicholas'. They may go on pilgrimage, or go to stay with friends in country or town, with the permission of the warden.

No-one is to be accepted as a resident unless 30 years old or more, except in special cases. [f.30v] They are to live peaceably without arguing among themselves. They are not to frequent common taverns, nor bring pleas for trespass [in the town court] but are to make complaints only to the warden – only if he cannot lawfully settle the complaints may they bring a plea.

The warden may compel the residents to do the gardening and other domestic work, with a reward for undertaking such chores at his discretion.

The warden is to appoint one brother and one sister of good character to report to him all troubles between residents. He is also to choose a brother to have custody of the keys to the cloisters where residents sleep [f.31r] (they being locked in after curfew).

If any residents are rebellious against these ordinances, the warden may discipline them by withdrawing their alms money; if this fails, they are to be expelled.

When a new hospital priest is engaged he must take oath before the bailiffs and the Prior to obey these ordinances.

[f.31v]

Every warden is to take a similar oath.

[ff.32r-71v]

[Manship's translation of the register contents.]

Yarmouth history

main menu

endowment documents

History of medieval Yarmouth

[MAIN MENU]

APPENDIX 2: Register of the Hospital of St. Mary: A Calendar

Endowment documents

[ff.4r-6r]

[Approvals and confirmations by the Bishop and Prior of Norwich of the agreement made concerning jurisdiction over the hospital and of the ordinances for its governance, 1386.]

[f.6v]

Licence granted by the king (in return for a payment of £26.13s.4d by the bailiffs and community) for the hospital to hold land in mortmain. William Oxneye and Robert Howlyn are licensed to alienate in mortmain 1 messuage, 17 cottages, and 100s. rent in Yarmouth, which they held of the king in burgage; now to be held by bailiffs and community and their successors for the support of poor and infirm townspeople and for other works of devotion and piety specified by William and Robert. Dated: September 2, 1392. [The record of this in the Calendar of Patent Rolls gives the date as September 22.]

[f.7r]

Charter of the bailiffs and community granting to William de Oxneye and Robert Howlyn a messuage with buildings in Yarmouth, lying between common land (S. and N.), the town wall (E.), and the king's highway (W.). They also grant them 17 cottages located between the following:

1. Common ways (S. and N.), Middlegate (W.), land once of Thomas de Drayton (E.).

2. Common way (N.), land once of John de Ocle and John de Wykampton (S.), land once of Hamon de Berton (W.), land once of John Holdeye (E.).
3. Common way (S.), land of the chaplains of the Carnary (N.), the Dene (E.), land of the aforesaid chaplains and that once of Hugh Paunflot (W.).
[A charnel-house was built in St. Nicholas' churchyard in 1308, funded by Sybil Flathe, to house the bones of those whose graves were dug up to make room for new burials.]
4. Common way (S.), land of Thomas Bateman (N. and E.), land once of Clement Bevre (W.). [Clement's surname is variously spelled in the Register as "Bere", "Bure" and "Bever"; my rendering is a compromise.]
5. Common ways (S. and N.), the Dene (E.), land of William de Oxneye (W.).
6. Common ways (S. and N.), land of Andrew Bowyer (E.), land once of Clement Bere (W.).
7. Common way (S.), land once of John de Reppes (N. and W.), land of John Brangill (E.).
 [f.7v]
8. Common ways (S. and N.), the Dene (E.), land of Thomas Westgate tailor (W.).
9. Common way (N.), land once of John de Halle (S.), the Dene (E.), land once of William de Ludham pelter (W.).
10. Common way (N.), entrance to the land of Peter Baxter (S.), the Dene (E.), land once of John de Stalham named "Goddeshmehous" (W.).
11. Common way (N.), land once of Edmund Bie (S. and W.), land of John de Byrlyngham (E.).
12. Common way (N.), land of Simon Catte and land once of Robert de Merton (S.), land of William Buskyn (W.), land once of John de Hunyngham (E.).
13. Land of John Wither, William Potter and William de Eccles (S.), common way (N.), the Dene (E.), land of Robert atte Cross (W.).
14. Common ways (N. and E.), land of John Dodge (S. and W.).
15. Common way (S.), land of Nicholas de Fordele (N.), Middlegate (W.), land of John de Halle (E.).
16. Common ways (S. and N.), land once of Edmund de Burgh (W.), Middlegate (W.).
 [f.8r]
17. Common way (N.), land of William de Worsted (S.), land of Robert Belle (W.), Middlegate (E.).

Also granted is a rent of 6s. from the capital messuage once of Thomas Cobald, now held by his nephew Robert Cobald (which 6s. was recently given to the bailiffs and community by Walter atte Sond, to the use of the hospital, as appears in his testament).

Witnesses: John Elys, Ralph Ramseye, John atte Gappe, Edmund Wyth,

William Savage, Alexander atte Gappe, Thomas Redberd et al.; dated: October 1, 1397, in the time of William Oxneye, John Beketon, Thomas Marche and Thomas de Halle, bailiffs.

[It is reasonable to interpret the "common ways" as the Yarmouth rows, at least in most cases. This could not be the case with those properties backing onto the Denes, unless the open area within (to the west of) the walls was also considered as part of the Denes – a concept inherited from pre-wall times; this would explain why there are almost no references to the wall itself. Plans (post-medieval) of the town do not show any dwellings backing onto the Denes outside the walls – the closest structure to the Denes (apart from the walls) being the hospital complex; the appearance of that complex suggests it could have been formed from a row of cottages. Do the large number of references to former holders of abutting properties suggest that this document may have been partially copied from one or more older deeds or other sources?]

[f.8v]

Charter of Oxneye and Howlyn, pursuant to the king's licence, granting to bailiffs and community a messuage, 17 cottages and 100s. in rents. [ff.9r-9v]

[The messuage and cottages are granted in the terms above, with marginalia in a later hand, updating the ownership of abutting properties. The rents were due as follows:]

1. 6s. from the capital messuage once of Thomas Cobald [as above, the first mentioned property in the 1397 deed].
[f.10r]
2. 2s.6d from a tenement now held by John son of John Elys, between common ways (N. and S.), Middlegate (E.), land of the said John Elys (W.).
3. 2s. from a tenement held by John de Beketon, between the land of Nicholas Kirkhawe (N.), land of William de Runham (S.), Middlegate (E.), land once of Bartholomew Noggan (W.).
4. 2s. from a tenement held by William de Runham, between a common way (S.), land of John de Beketon (N. and W.), Middlegate (E.).
5. 12d. from a tenement held by John son of William atte Gappe, between a common way (N.), land of Bartholomew Elys (S.), Middlegate (E.), land of Simon Auncell (W.).
6. 2s.10d from a tenement held by Simon Thurkild, between a common way (N.), land of Thomas atte Chirche (S.), the Dene (E.), land of the said Simon (W.).
7. 3d. from a tenement held by Thomas atte Chirche, between a common way (S.), land of Simon Thurkild (N. and W.), the Dene (E.).
[f.10v]
8. 2s. from a tenement of Roger de Drayton (once of Laurence de Drayton), between common ways (S. and N.), the Dene (E.), land of the said Roger (W.).
9. 12d. from a tenement of Alice de Drayton, between a common way

- (S.), land of Roger Kithode and land of John de Ocle (N.), land of John de Wykampton (W.), the Dene (E.).
10. 12d. from a tenement of Peter de Selby, between a common way (N.), land once of Geoffrey de Drayton (S.), land once of Simon Tailliard (E.), the port (W.).
 11. 12d. from a tenement of John de Beverle, between a common way (S.), land of John son of William Elys (N.), land of William Goddesfeld (W.), land of John Elys (E.).
 12. 2s.6d from a tenement of Thomas Martyn, between a common way (N.), land once of Simon de Hastyng (S.), Middlegate (E.), land of John Hacun (W.).
 13. 12d. from a fish-house called "Gavelfishhus" now held by John Hughesson, between a common way (S.), land of Henry Colman (N.), land of Thomas White (E.), land of the said John (W.).
 14. 12d. from a tenement of Simon Auncell,
[f.11r]
between a common way (N.), land of Bartholomew Elys (S.), land of John atte Gappe (E.), land once of Richard atte Gappe (W.).
 15. 12d. from a tenement of Robert Gare, between a common way (N.), land of Richard Midward (S.), land of the priory of Silton and land once of Peter Beneyt (E.), Middlegate (W.).
 16. 12d. from a tenement of Nicholas Frere, between a common way (S.), land of Margery Bange (N.), the Dene (E.), land of Thomas Stace (W.).
 17. 4s. from a tenement of Bartholomew Sprotholf, between common ways (S. and N.), the Dene (E.), land once of Hugh de Norwich (W.).
 18. 5s. from a tenement of Roger Fuller, between a common way (N.), land of the said Roger (S.), the Dene (E.), land once of Hugh Paunflot (W.).
 19. 12d. from a tenement of Beatrix de Blofeld, between common ways (N. and S.), land once of Robert Davy (W.), land once of Thomas White (E.).
 20. 12d. from a tenement of Robert de Cantele barber, between a common way (N.), land of the said Robert and Thomas Bateman (S.), land of John Lawes mariner (W.), land of Thomas Bateman (E.).
 21. 3s. from a tenement of Alice widow of John de Filby,
[f.11v]
between common ways (S. and N.), the Dene (E.), land once of Clement Bevre (W.).
 22. 6d. from a tenement of Richard Ivy, between common ways (S. and N.), land of John de Halle and land once of William de Ludham (E.), land once of the said William (W.).
 23. 5s. from a tenement of Adam Heyron spicer, between a common way (N.), land once of Geoffrey de Fordele (S.), the Dene (E.), land once of Hugh de Baggele (W.).
 24. 20d. from a tenement of William Stalon, between a common way (N.), land once of Geoffrey de Fordele (S.), Middlegate (E.), the port (W.).

25. 12d. from a tenement of William de Brisele, between a common way (S.), land of Robert Belle (N.), land of Geoffrey Wymark (E.), the port (W.).
26. 18d. from a tenement of William de Worsted, between land once of Benedict de Rokhawe (S.), a common way and land once of John de Ocle (N.), the port (W.), land once of John de Ocle and
[f.12r]
Middlegate (E.).
27. 6s.8d from a tenement of John Halman, between a common way (N.), land of Thomas de Aylesham (S. and E.), the port (W.).
28. 6s.8d from a tenement (60' long) of Thomas son of John de Halle, between a common way called Dameavelynsrowe (S.), land once of Adam de Claxton (N.), the Dene (E.), land of the said Thomas (W.).
29. 7d. from a tenement of Leticia Pette wortwoman, between a common way (S.), land of William de Barsham (N. and W.), Middlegate (E.).
[I suspect wortwoman was another term for alewife, i.e. a retailer of ale.]
30. 10d. from a tenement of William de Barsham wright, between a tenement of John de Hales shipwright (N.), land of Leticia Pette and a common way (S.), land once of Richard Tiler (W.), Middlegate (E.).
31. 12d. from a tenement of John Hales shipwright, between land of William de Barsham and a common way (N.), land of the said William and land once of Richard Tiler and land of John Belewe (S.), land of Hervey Cook (W.), Middlegate (S.).
[f.12v]
32. 5s. from a tenement of Thomas Bateman with shop annexed, between the capital messuage of the said Thomas (formerly of Ralph Marshale) (N. and W.), a common way (S.), the Dene (E.).
33. 3s.4d from a tenement of Ralph de Gunton, between the land of Thomas Wright baxter (N. and E.), a common way and land of the said Thomas (S.), Middlegate (W.).
34. 12d. from a tenement of Thomas de Barsham, between the land once of John Latoner (S.), land of William Waryn fletcher (N. and W.), the Dene (E.).
35. 2s. from a tenement of William Waryn fletcher, between a common way (N.), land once of John Latoner and Thomas de Barsham (S.), land of the said John (W.), the Dene (E.).
36. 6d. from a tenement (25' long at its north end) of John atte Chirche de Ormesby, between a common way (S.), a common way and land of Thomas Erfeld (N.), land of the said Thomas and land of John Yon (W.), land of Thomas Hunte and vacant land once of Thomas Baa (E.).
37. 9d. from a tenement of John de Riston smith, between a common way (S.), land once of
[f.13r]
Richard Broun barker (N. and E.), Gropecuntlane (W.).
38. 5s. from a tenement of Margaret de Kilham, between a common way

- (S.), land of John de Lessingham skinner (N.), the Dene (E.), land once of Bartholomew de Holderness (W.).
39. 3s. from a tenement of Henry Crane Chandler, between the land of Richard Belleman (N.), land of Oliver Spicer (S.), a road (W.), land of John de Buttele (E.).
40. 6d. from a tenement of Henry Crane Chandler, between a common way (N.), land of Geoffrey Twynne (S.), land of John de Lessingham (E.), land once of Richard Tryuman (W.).
41. 12d. from a tenement of William Benale, between a common way (S.), land once of Robert Barker (N. and W.), Middlegate (E.).
42. 18d. from a tenement of John White tailor, between a common way (S.), land of Robert Robell and John de Halle (N.), land of William de Hedynham smith (E.), land of John de Halle (W.).
43. 6d. from a tenement of John Lawes butcher, between a common way (N.), land of John Harpour (S. and E.),
[f.13v]
land of John Harpour and land of John Clerk butcher (W.).
44. 6d. from a tenement of Nicholas Kates and his wife Beatrice (widow of Peter Beneyt), between a common way (S.), land once of Edward Ambrose (N.), land of Henry de Barsham wright (E.), Middlegate (W.).
45. 18d. from a tenement of William Peper, between a common way (N.), land of Thomas de Halle draper and land of Thomas Grigges wright (S.), Middlegate (W.), land of John de Ingham "fisshebier" (E.).
46. 12d. from a tenement of Robert Godfrey, between the land of William atte Dam (N.), a common way called Gurnardkonge (S.), Middlegate (E.), land of Nicholas Kates (W.).
47. 4d. from a tenement of Thomas Hunte, between a common way (N.), land of the said Thomas once of Stephen Davy (S.), land once of Geoffrey Wymark (W.), land of William Waryn Fletcher (E.).
48. 6d. from a garden of William de Oxneye, between common ways (S. and N.), land of Hugh atte Fenne and land of the said William (E.), Middlegate (W.).
49. 7d. from a tenement of William Ive,
[f.14r]
between a common way (N.), land of Walter Davy and land once of Robert Skinner (S.), land of John Hanworth chaplain (E.), Middlegate (W.).
50. 18d. from the capitual messuage of William Ive, between a common way (N.), land of William Oxneye (S.), land of William Ive (W.), the Dene (E.).
51. 2s.6d from a tenement of John Hakon, between a common way (N.), land of the said John (once of Rose Thurkild) (S.), land of Thomas Martyn (E.), the port (W.).

Witnesses: John Elys, Ralph Ramseye, Hugh atte Fenne, John atte Gappe, Roger de Drayton, Bartholomew Elys, Bartholomew de Drayton, Edmund Wyth, Alexander atte Gappe, Thomas Bateman et al.; dated: January 5, 1398, in the time of William Oxneye, John de Beketon, Thomas Marche and Thomas de Halle, bailiffs.

Yarmouth history

main menu

rental

History of medieval Yarmouth

[MAIN MENU]

APPENDIX 2: Register of the Hospital of St. Mary: A Calendar

Rental

The initial, principal section of the rental is dated at 23 April 1398; it was updated by later clerks. The properties itemized in the core list are essentially the same as those listed in the grant of January 1398, and the information given is the same, but is presented in the following sequence: tenant, type of property, abutting properties/features, rent; I will list here only the tenants in 1398, the corresponding item number (in red text) in the January document (from which readers may discover the rents and abutments), any significant differences or variations between the entry here and that in the January document, and a few examples of the later tenants (my notes on these are incomplete). As will be seen, the rental was not simply a recopying of the list in the charter, but represents some form of reorganization of the data. Note that the tenants of some properties had changed between January and April.

[f.14v – marked in a contemporary hand as f.1]

1. John Elys; (# 2); later: a) Sir John Fastolf, b) John Paston.
2. William de Runham; (# 4); abuts on land of John de Beketon near the priory tenement on Middlegate.
3. John de Beketon; (# 3); abuts on land of said John (S.); later:
[illegible].
[f.15r]
4. John atte Gappe; (# 5); later: a) William atte Gappe, b) Robert Gegch, c) Edmund Couper.
5. Simon Auncell; (# 14); later: a) William atte Gappe, b) Robert Gegch,

- c) Edmund Couper.
6. Alexander atte Gappe (previously John de Beverle); (# 11).
 7. Robert de Plumstede (previously Nicholas Frere and before him Thomas Tiler); (# 16).
[f.15v]
 8. Thomas atte Chirche, smith; (# 7).
 9. Simon Thurkild; (# 6).
 10. Roger Fuller; (# 18).
[f.16r]
 11. John Hughesson; (# 13); a fish-house called "Gavelleshous".
 12. Alice de Drayton; (# 9).
 13. Roger de Drayton; (# 8); once held by Laurence de Drayton; later: John Pynne.
[f.16v]
 14. Peter de Selby; (# 10).
 15. Thomas Martyn; (# 12); later: a) Robert Pynne and once of John Cromer, b) Robert Tasburgh, c) John Alman, d) Robert Tasborowe.
 16. John Hakon; (# 51).
[f.17r]
 17. Bartholomew Sprotholf; (# 17); later: Richard Grom spicer.
 18. Nicholas de Blofeld; (# 19); abuts on land once of Thomas White clerk (E.).
 19. Thomas Bateman; (# 32); a shop and a cottage.
[f.17v]
 20. Ralph de Gunton; (# 33); later: Alexander Brygate.
 21. Margaret, widow of Robert de Cantele (who previously held); (# 20); lands of Robert and Margaret and of Thomas Bateman (S.); later: Roger Redhoyd.
 22. William Oxneye; (# 48); Robert Howlyn was an associate with William in renting this garden; later: a) Christian [or Christina] Felysson, b) Thomas Elys.
[f.18r]
 23. William de Oxneye; (# 21); later: Hugh Fenne.
 24. William Ive; (# 50); later: Robert Candeler.
 25. Thomas Halle; (# 28).
[f.18v]
 26. Richard Ivy baxter; (# 22); abuts on land of Thomas de Hall and land once of William de Ludham (E.); later: a) Simon Baxter, b) John Ingram, c) Robert Barrett carpenter.
 27. William Stalon and William Hedman smith (jointly); (# 24); later: a) Geoffrey Hemmyng, b) John Brere, c) Henry Leman, d) John Palmer, e) Edmund Woode alderman of Norwich [c.1536].
 28. Thomas Belle meysmaker (previously held by John Halman); (# 27); later: a) Thomas Belle, b) Stephen Katson, c) Henry Payn, d) Thomas King.
[f.19r]

29. William de Brisele; (# 25); later: a) John Muslyng, b) John ---nt steynour, c) Henry Smyth, d) his wife.
30. Robert Cobald; (# 1); later: a) John Cobald, b) William Albon, c) John Pydgon, d) William Ilberd, e) Ralph Woode.
31. William de Worsted; (# 26); later: a) Robert Glover, b) William Felawe, c) his wife.
[f.19v]
32. William Benale mason; (# 41); later: a) John Bulle shipman, b) John Gyspon, c) William Ilberd, d) Henry Watson.
33. William Ive; (# 49); later: Nicholas atte Mere.
34. Richard Dokeling de Runham and John Hanworth chaplain [possibly as executors of Robert Godfrey?]; (# 46); abuts on a common way called Gurneyskonge (S.); later: a) Nicholas -----, b) Robert Kent, c) Robert Samson.
[f.20r]
35. Nicholas Kates and his wife Beatrice (jointly); (# 44); later: a) Nicholas [? atte M]ere, b) John Cook reeder, c) John Bonde chaplain, d) William Ilberd, e) John Pratt.
36. Robert Gare; (# 15); later: a) Simon Pecok meysmaker, b) Thomas Pecok and William Buk, c) William Aldryche, d) John Clerk, e) John Browerd mason.
37. Margaret widow of William Peper; (# 45).
[f.20v]
38. Leticia Pette wortwoman; (# 29); later: a) Alice Tulys[our], b) William Seman, c) John Ilberd.
39. William Barsham wright; (# 30); later: Thomas Amyel tulys[our].
40. John de Hales shipwright; (# 31); abuts on land of the said William and land once of Richard Tiler and land of John Belewe lister (S.), land of Hervey Cook de Southgate (W.); later: a) Thomas Amyel tuly [sour], b) William Cokefeld.
[f.21r]
41. Sybil wife of Adam Heyron (who held previously); (# 23).
42. Robert Bauchon fisher (previously held by John White tailor); (# 42); abutting lands of John Halle now referred to as once of John Halle; later: John Coddelyng, b) Thomas Joly, c) his wife.
43. Henry Crane (previously held by Margaret de Kilham); (# 38); later: a) Thomas Ellyngham, b) John Ingram, c) John Godfrey.
[f.21v]
44. Thomas Hunte; (# 47); later: a) John Goodknav, b) Alexander Manthorp miller, c) Walter Ingram, d) Geoffrey Atkins.
45. Geoffrey Twynne (previously held by Henry Crane chandler); (# 40); later: a) Thomas Ingham, b) John Pydgon, c) James Sterlyng.
46. Thomas de Barsham mason; (# 34); later: a) John Ingram, b) William Billing, c) Henry Ilberd.
[f.22r]
47. William Waryn fletcher; (# 35); later: a) Nicholas Cabe barber, b)

[blank] Sporle.

48. Oliver Spicer (previously held by Henry Crane chandler); (# 39); abuts on a common way (W.); later: John Schurloc, b) John Davy, c) Thomas Grene.
49. John Harper (previously held jointly by John Lawes and his wife Joan); (# 43); one plot of land with buildings; later: a) Walter Holyconte, b) Alice Heche.
[f.22v]
50. Robert Clerk wright (previously held by John atte Chirche de Ormesby); (# 36); abuts on common way and land of Thomas Erfeld butcher (N.); later: John Torald.
51. John de Riston smith; (# 37); later: a) John Davy barker, b) Robert May.
52. John Herling, for a garden, between land once of Walter Roke (S.), land of John Dannard of Norwich (N.), land of the said Matthew [sic] (E.), the port (W.), for 4d rent; later: John Tolke; (not in the January document).

[f.23r]

Undated entry, ca.1398 but reliant upon the [charter of 1304]

These are the rents in mortmain from the charter of William Gerberge supporting the service of a priest; viz.:

- From Thomas Martyn and John Hakon for a tenement with appurtenances, once of Michael Hardman, lying between a common way (N.) and land of Rose Thurkild (S.), abutting on Middlegate (E. and W.); 5s.; as appears in William's charter.
[This must have been located in the central portion of town, where Middlegate is disjointed, producing two streets – sometimes known as Great and Little (or "Blind") Middlegate streets – which ran parallel to each other for a short stretch.]
- Thomas Bateman for a plot of land, once of John Smith, between the land of Geoffrey de Somerton smith (N.), a common way (S.), land of Thomas Bellard (W.), the Dene (E.); 5s., which formerly yielded 11s.6d; as appears [etc.]
- Robert Bauchon "fishbiere" for a tenement, once of Henry de Stoke, between the land once of Nicholas Rake (N.), a common way (S.), land of John Austyn (E.), land of Geoffrey Sylke (W.); 18d., which formerly yielded 3s.6d; as appears [etc.]
- William de Worsted for a plot of land, [once] of Henry Basset, between the land of William Stannard (S.), land of the said Henry (N.), land of Henry son of William called Clerk (W.), Middlegate (E.); 9d, which formerly yielded 12d.; as appears [etc.]

[f.23v]

[f.24r]

Copy of a charter of 1304, whose original took the form of an indented chirograph between the Gerberges and the community of Yarmouth.

In the name of God, Amen. To all the sons of Holy Mother Church seeing or hearing this document, for its perpetual remembrance, William and John, sons of William Gerberge senior, a former burgess of Great Yarmouth recently deceased, and executors of his testament, give greetings. We wish to bring to your attention by this document that when our late father William was at the point of death, more than 26 years ago, he made a testament which by his last will he instructed to be firmly respected and fulfilled. In this testament the testator bequeathed the below-written rents, of an estimated value of 9 marks [£6], to be levied annually for all future time from the tenements indicated here, for the support of two priests in the hospital of St. Mary to pray for his soul and the souls of his wife Isabelle, their children and all the faithful. To this end he assigned the following rents:

- 16d. for a tenement once of Hugh de Waxtenesham, between a common way (S.), land once of Richard Fastolf (N. and E.), the quay (W.).
- 5s. from a tenement once of Michael Hardman, between the land of Rose Thurkild (S.), a common way (N.), Middlegate (E.), the quay (W.).
- 16s. from Oliver de la Mawe and Nicholas Cook and their heirs for a strip of land with buildings, between the land of Richard de Lincoln (N.), a common way (S.), land of John Gerberge (W.), the Dene (E.).

[The "rengiate" of land, here translated as "strip", would typically refer to a whole range of property, originating as a basic unit of burgage tenement (but later subdivided), flanked by the main north-south streets or lying between one of those streets and the Denes or the port, as with the next item; since that is not the case here, it may be that the term is applied to a subdivision of the original burgage division.]

- 4s. from Oliver de la Mawe and heirs for a strip of land with buildings, once of William de la Crane, between land of Godfrey Pilgrim (N.), a common way (S.), Middlegate (E.), the port (W.).

[f.24v]

- 5s. from the heirs and assigns of John de Fischele for a plot of land with buildings, between the land once of John de Fischele (S.), a common way (N.), land of John Gerberge (W.), the Dene (E.).
- 11s.6d from John Smith and heirs for a plot of land with buildings, between the land of Geoffrey de Somerton smith (N.), a common way (S.), land of Thomas Bellard (W.), the Dene (E.).

- 20s. from Margaret de Scrouteby and heirs for a plot of land with buildings, between common ways (S. and N.), land of William de Antingham (W.), the Dene (E.).
- 38s.4d from Adam de Stratton and heirs for a plot of land with buildings, between lands of Clement de Trunch and Robert le Corder (S.), a common way (N.), land of Thomas Aysheaman (W.), the Dene (E.).
- 30s.6d from Henry de Stoke and heirs for a plot of land with buildings, between the land once of Nicholas Rake (N.), a common way (S.), land of John Austyn (E.), land of Geoffrey Sylke (W.).
- 8s. from Ralph le Tanner and heirs for a plot of land with buildings, between the land of Agnes Gobot (S.), a common way (N.), land of Henry Rose (W.), the king's highway (E.).
- 12d. from Henry Basset and heirs for a plot of land with buildings, between the land of William Stannard (S.)
[f.25r]
land of the said Henry (N.), land of Henry son of William called Clerk (W.), Middlegate (E.).
- 16d. from Geoffrey de Knapeton and heirs for a strip of land with buildings, between the land once of William de Monesle junior (N.), the Dene (S. and E.), the king's highway (W.).
- 2s. from Elvered Potekyn and heirs for a plot of land with buildings, between lands of the said Elvered (N., E. and W.), a common way (S.).

Whereas these rents may previously have been withdrawn by us and not paid to the hospital for the benefit of those souls, we wish that henceforth the last will of the testator not be obstructed and, with the assent of the whole community of Yarmouth and by the authority and order of the Archbishop of Canterbury (made during a visitation of the diocese of Norwich), to make amends for the withdrawal for ourselves, our heirs and executors, we (as executors [of the testator]) grant by this document that [the rents] be delivered and handed over to the bailiffs who are [in office] at the time of making this document and who shall be in the future. The bailiffs and community have the power to distrain for the rents and to replace priests unsuitable for conducting the services specified in the testament. Dated at Yarmouth, September 5, 1304.

[f.25v]

Endorsement of the above grant by the official of the archdeacon of Norwich, October 8, 1304.

[f.26r]

This indenture witnesses an agreement between Geoffrey de Somerton, Robert Howlyn, and John Seford, executors of the testament of William de Stalham of Yarmouth, on one part, and on the other part, William Ive, executor of the same and warden of the hospital of St. Mary, and its brethren. In return for the great benevolence shown to the hospital by William de Stalham while he was alive, and by his executors, Ive and the brethren agree to support 7 cottages once of John de Stalham and now called "Goddeshmenhous", located between a common way (N.), land of Peter Baxter and land once of Thomas Cobald (S. and W.), land once of John de Stalham (E.). The purpose being to support 7 poor townsmen who shall celebrate day and night for the souls of John de Stalham and his brother William. The rents from the cottages are to be kept in a pyx chest.

[f.26v]

The executors give 100s. from the goods of the late William. Dated at Yarmouth, August 10, 1392.

[f.27r]

Later additions by diverse hands:

- 12d. from Edmund Hungate for a tenement, once of Thomas Kant and afterwards of John Medylton, between a common way (S.), land of William Bettys (N.), land of John Medylton (W.), the Dene (E.); (# 9 or 16 ?);
- 2s. from William Shawe for a tenement, once of Laurence Drayton and afterwards of Robert Pynne, recently of John Shawe, between common ways (N. and S.), the Dene (E.), land recently of Roger Drayton (W.); (# 8).
- 12d. from John Fox for a tenement, previously of Peter Selby, between a common way (N.), land once of Geoffrey Drayton now John Lamle (S.), land once of Simon Talliard (E.), the port (W.); (# 10).
- 2s.6d from Robert Tasburgh for a tenement recently of Thomas Martyn and afterwards of Robert Pynne, between a common way (N.), land of Robert Osteler (S.), land once of John James now of William Bishop (W.), Middlegate (E.); (# 12).

[f.27v]

- 2s.6d from William Bishop for a tenement, previously of John Hakon and afterwards of John James, between a common way (N.), land once of Rose Thurkild now of William Bishop (S.), land of Robert Tasburgh (E.), the port (W.); (# 51).

Yarmouth history

main menu

introduction

Created: November 11, 1998

© Stephen Alsford, 1998-2003

History of medieval Ipswich

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth | Development of local government

BUILDINGS AND FORTIFICATIONS | Economy | Information sources

Map of Ipswich at the close of the Middle Ages

Ipswich bailiffs, coroners, chamberlains, and treasurers

Appendix 1: Account of the setting up of self-government in A.D. 1200

Appendix 2: Calendar of usages and customs of Ipswich

Appendix 3: Oaths of officers and burgesses

Appendix 4: Account of revenues and expenditures, 1446/47

Buildings and fortifications

There was said to have been some kind of castle built in Ipswich after the Conquest, perhaps in the early year's of William I's reign as part of his programme to subdue the country. Matilda's son Henry besieged it in 1152, in the latter stages of the civil war. It was later again held against him when Hugh Bigot supported the rebellion of Henry II's sons. That latest in a series of problems with the incorrigibly rebellious Bigot earls of Norfolk led to Ipswich castle's demolition (along with other Bigot castles in the region) by Henry II in 1176. Construction of rampart and ditch defences was begun ca.1204 – although this may only have been an overhaul and/or expansion of an earlier fortification; that it was the king who took the initiative here, using labour from Suffolk and Cambridge, hints at a defensive imperative at that time rather than local ambitions. There were plans for a wall, but it is not clear how far they were carried out, and we find none of the applications to the king for murage that could be expected if a major wall-building project had been initiated. There are references between early fourteenth and late fifteenth centuries to properties adjacent to town walls, but a larger number to those abutting onto the "great ditches" or "wall-ditches", some of which must have connected to the river, since we hear of fish-traps in them. One grant of part of the ditches, in 1302, was revocable if walls were ever built there. Possibly walls were erected only around parts of the town and reliance elsewhere was placed on the earthworks; the northwestern sector of the town was a part protected by a wall, and near that corner were one or more "barred gates", while other gates were on the northern and eastern sides. The rivers provided a natural barrier in the south and south-east.

During the Late Middle Ages most towns tried to stay neutral in national political struggles, and their interest in fortifications was as much a matter of controlling trade (to channel it through supervised town entrances/exits) as of protection. Only once do we find some militaristic alarm in Ipswich when, in October 1452, it was ordained that all burgesses be in possession of a bow and arrows, sword and shield, and other weapons, and ensure that their adult employees or servants have a cudgel handy, and that all be prepared to respond day or night to a summons from the bailiffs. Since active hostilities between Yorkists and Lancastrians were then in hiatus, the concern may have been with a more local dispute – perhaps that between the town and the Prior of Ely (landlord of local property) which had prompted forceful action by the borough against the Prior's enclosure of common pasture in 1451, and was before the king's court throughout the 1450s. Although Ipswich has been described as Yorkist in its sympathies, and certainly Sir John Howard had some influence there (as elsewhere in East Anglia) it was rather that a few prominent townsmen and rural gentry of the neighbourhood had Yorkist affiliations. The corporation itself shows no signs of taking sides, while the ordinance of 1474 suggests that the borough was tired of being used as a pawn for individuals to assert exercise political influence through parliament.

Although St. Mary Tower, as we have seen from the events of 1200, may have been the site of the folkmoot around that time (and its significance is further suggested by the fact that curfew was rung there), when a moothall was built it was on the south side of Cornhill. This was a more important location, in terms of administration of commerce, since the large corn market was there; the commercial role of the borough authorities is reflected in the alternate name by which the moothall was sometimes known: the Tolhouse. The building may have been in existence by 1212, for the bailiffs' defence against the complaint of Elias de Gippewyc about the relocation of the fish market (to the vicinity of Cornhill) was in part that it was to make collection of tolls easier. Adjacent to the moothall site was St. Mildred's which, previously a parish church, appears to have been absorbed into the moothall property in the 14th century. In 1391 the borough authorities were acquiring another adjacent piece of land, presumably for further expansion of the administrative facilities.

As for most boroughs, the cost of maintenance and repairs to the moothall and other public properties became an increasing burden. In 1361 the borough authorities assigned certain sources of income to repairing the moothall and one of the town bridges; at the same time we hear that the authorities had recently built a new set of butchers' stalls in the meat market, which it then leased to two townsmen. Renovations to a house at one end of the moothall were initiated in 1435; and we hear of new construction at the end of the "plea-hall" in 1448, the costs to be covered from escheats, estreats from Sessions of the Peace, and freemen's entrance fines. In 1446 there is reference to the borough leasing to butchers stalls in the "Flesh-house", although whether the stalls in 1361 were within a permanent superstructure is unknown. In 1391 the borough had two water-mills built on common land between the town bridge and Stoke bridge – one was used for grinding corn, the other for fulling cloth. The construction work was accomplished by granting the land to a small committee of burgesses who financed the construction and recouped their costs from the profits of the mill, after which they regranted the land and mills to the community; this brought legal problems, obliging the borough authorities to obtain a royal licence to hold the property in mortmain. In 1435 Stoke Bridge itself was in need of rebuilding, and one of the town's wealthiest merchants, John Caldwell, offered to finance this, if the borough would make a contribution; at some point before 1477 a gate was built to control access over the bridge. The town conduit required work in 1451 as did houses associated with it, while repairs to the town quay were the reason for a levy on the community in 1473; two years later it was the town mill and fishmarket that demanded attention, and in 1477 a new crane was needed for the quay.

previous

main menu

next

History of medieval Ipswich

[MAIN MENU]

- Origins and early growth | Development of local government
- Buildings and fortifications | ECONOMY | Information sources
- Map of Ipswich at the close of the Middle Ages
- Ipswich bailiffs, coroners, chamberlains, and treasurers
- Appendix 1: Account of the setting up of self-government in A.D. 1200
- Appendix 2: Calendar of usages and customs of Ipswich
- Appendix 3: Oaths of officers and burgesses
- Appendix 4: Account of revenues and expenditures, 1446/47

Economy

Ipswich shared the same advantages as other East Anglian towns on or near the coast, in terms of convenient location for trade with the Baltic, Scandinavia, the Rhineland and the Low Countries, and in terms of access to the river system penetrating into the fertile agricultural lands of inner East Anglia. During the Late Anglo-Saxon period East Anglia was becoming one of the most heavily populated and prosperous parts of England, despite the disruptions of the Danish invasions. In fact, the influx of Danish settlers contributed to the process, since they brought new blood into the towns and new hands to turn forests into fields – the production of surplus food being necessary to the growth of urban populations focusing more on commerce and industry. Ipswich was a prime beneficiary of this.

From the seventh to ninth centuries Ipswich was the main production centre for Ipswich ware, a sturdy type of pottery that is found throughout East Anglia during that period and as far afield as Yorkshire and Kent. Other industries – weaving, leatherwork, ironwork – have been revealed by archaeology, but not on the same scale or apparent organization as the pottery industry, which was concentrated in a particular part of the town. The ruling Wuffing family likely was a factor in directing trade northwards, to the land from which they had migrated.

In the post-Conquest period at least, Cornhill was the 'town centre' and there were several taverns nearby. Market stalls lined the surrounding streets, with the meat and dairy markets to the south of Cornhill. The quayside was another focus for occupation and commerce; trading here was probably of a wholesale nature, as opposed to the retail markets in the centre of the town. According to a complaint made by the bailiffs in 1230, about a rival market in Woodbridge, Tuesday was the principal market day in Ipswich.

In contrast to Lynn where the location of markets was dictated primarily by proximity to the quayside, the location of Ipswich markets away from the quay, along the ridge running through the centre of town, suggests that goods brought by land were at one time as important to the town's economy as water-carried trade. There were various specialized markets and, from a list of tolls levied on different merchandise, we see that there were separate locations associated with particular categories of product (although not rigidly):

corn market (extending eastwards from Cornhill)

corn

cloth market

striped cloths ("rays"); dyed cloths of Beverley and Lincoln; cloths of Coggeshale, Colchester, Maldon and Sudbury ("doubles"); long-weave cloth ("singles"); linen; canvas; tailored clothes, including surcoats, tabards, mantles, capes; hemp (which is sometimes referred to as having its own market)

fish market (south of St. Lawrence's church) herring, porpoise, salmon, sturgeon, whale

wool market

wool-pells; cow and horse hides

cheese market

cheese; flax and hemp seed timber market (south of Cornhill)

bowls, dishes, plates, cups, and other wooden wares; baskets, vessels, spades; timber, boards, slats, yardsticks; hurdles, splints; cords; cartwheels; broom.

bread market (south of Cornhill)

bread

meat market (it and the vintry stretched along Tavern Street, east of the corn market)

beef, pork, mutton, veal

livestock market

horses, oxen, cows, bullocks, heffers, swine, sheep, calves quay (i.e. goods arriving or leaving by river and therefore featuring foreign imports/exports; these goods were not necessarily sold at the quay, but could be)

wine, vinegar, liquors; honey, oil, ointment; pitch, tar; ale; woad; cinders (used in fulling); archil, copper sulphate (both dyes); teazel; cloth; canvas; wool; millstones and other types of stone; marble ware (e.g. coffins, crosses, fonts); mortars; plaster; alum; almonds; figs, raisins; grain; Cordovan leather (used in shoemaking); Spanish iron, Normandy iron, wrought iron, old iron, lead, tin, brass, copper, osmond; squirrel furs; wool-pells; skins of lamb, badger, rabbit, fox, cat; cow and horse hides; herring (smoked, salt, and fresh), salmon, whale; wax; cheese, butter, lard; swords, bucklers, targets, coats of mail; wainscot and other boards, barrel staves, shingles; wooden bowls, dishes and plates; caps; wood; corn, onions, garlic, walnuts; salt; sturgeon;

The street still known as Buttermarket reflects another area of specialization, while Tower Street (north of Tavern Street) was the place for buying poultry, and streets to east and west of St. Lawrence's church were the place to buy cloth or to have a bite to eat in Cook's Row.

Tolls were charged by the volume of merchandise (e.g. cartload, wheel-barrow, barrel), or for individual items in cases such as the presumably luxury items of porpoise and salmon. In addition, those selling their goods from stalls had to pay an annual fee called stallage. Bakers who had stalls paid 3d a year for them (6d for non-residents); instead of tolls on their bread, however, they paid a farthing a day to sell in the market, while those selling from their homes negotiated an annual (licence) fee with the town authorities.

The various market tolls were an important source of revenue for Ipswich throughout the Late Middle Ages. Other principal sources of income by mid-fifteenth century were rentals and leases of property owned by the community – houses, lands, mills, and market stalls – entrance fees paid by new burgesses, and fines imposed by the courts; the licenses for exemption of outsiders from certain tolls were not very lucrative by this period. However, these sources were outbalanced by the outgoings, chief among which was the fee farm, although the costs of maintaining community properties and general costs of government (officers' salaries and business expenses) were also not inconsiderable. Despite an income of £88, in 1446/47 the borough ran up a deficit of £20. There were problems at this period with collecting all the revenues expected and chamberlains were often considered to be in arrears from their account (probably through no fault of their own); there are several references to debts owed by the borough for the fees of officers or its representatives to parliament. In 1451, in order to cover the expenses of obtaining a new charter (presumably that of 1446, unless there was then a new initiative which proved unsuccessful), a general levy had to be made on the community: 3s.4d from each portman, 20d from each burgess, 12d from each foreigner.

By contrast, in 1286 (during the period of wardenship) the sheriff accounted for over £93 in revenues for a year and a half and could boast of a surplus of almost £17 over the expenses of administering the borough, in part because of a savings on salaries of town officers (only a serjeant of the court and a couple of toll-collectors being needed by the sheriff).

During the reign of Edward III, we may suspect that borough revenues were managing to cover expenditures (if barely) since the farming out of several sources of revenue produced income by itself sufficient to meet most or all of the fee farm. Although the town mills are seen being leased out in 1285 and 1308 (and this is likely to have been standard practice), the systematic leasing of a range of revenue sources seems to have begun as an experiment in 1334, when the meat market was farmed to two new burgesses for £9.6s.8d a year, for a seven-year period. In 1339 the experiment was much expanded to include the corn market (£20), fish market (£8.13s.4d, with a slight discount if war with France jeopardized the seas), the petty goods market (£4.3s.4d), and the borough's half of the Woodbridge market (£1.4s.); the quay, the community-owned mills (the New Mill and Horswade Mill, with Odenholm meadow subsequently attached to the latter), hawgable, and "forwardesolver" (possibly estreats) were also available for farm, although there does not seem to have been any immediate takers. The mills later brought in £5 to £8 annually. Tronage and the carriage of bulk merchandise from the quay to merchants' warehouses and cellars were later added to the farm of the quay, to make it more attractive, but the initial amount of £20 likely proved unprofitable and in some years it was difficult to find a farmer, until the cost of the lease was halved. The tolls on broom were also added – a small item bringing only 5s. into the borough coffers. By 1347 the total revenue to the borough was amounting to over £58. A century later, in 1451, one man was prepared to pay £48 as one year's farm for a parcel of revenue sources: the Great Custom, customs collected at the quay and the Wool-house, the crane, the "petybeam" at the quay (probably for tronage), administration of weights and measures, the Flesh-house together with tolls on meat and wool-pells, tolls collected at St. George's fair (April) and St. James' fair (July), and foreign fines. In 1469 the tolls from St. James fair were to be applied to the care of lepers.

The Black Death only briefly disrupted this situation, but loss of key records prevents us from knowing how far into the second half of the century this practice was continued. A general decline in court business (and therefore borough income from it) in the third quarter of the century hints at a more general economic decline in the town, but efforts were made towards the end of the century to systematize revenue collection better, through chamberlains and sergeants. By 1415 the revenue from court business was at about the same level as in the 1446/47 accounts: £6.3s.2d from court estreats and £10.3s.4d from leet estreats.

In mid-fifteenth century, the borough authorities were making fresh efforts to regulate trade and commerce in the town. Mercers were forbidden, in 1434, to store wool in any private house unless the community warehouse was full. In 1446 there are references to stalls for the sale of fulled cloth in the moothall, as well as a draper's stall and a tavern under the moothall. In 1448 it was ordained that the fuller's market take place only in a room above the moothall, and the draper's market only under the moothall – any cloth sold elsewhere would be confiscated; a similar stipulation was made for wool and mercery markets, to be held only in the Wool-house, which was situated above the butchery. A regulation of 1454 required all outsiders bringing merchandise into town to have it weighed by the Common Crane (at the quay), and not elsewhere without prior arrangement with the chamberlains, entailing payment of a cranage fee (3d). 1473 saw the prohibition of residents of the town having their grain ground at any mill other than the town mill (Horswade?), while at the same time the miller was instructed not to charge excessive fees, and the following year put in place (among a set of ordinances) the requirement that all merchandise be measured and weighed before being shipped out, while two months later a committee was appointed to reassess local tolls and customs on different types of merchandise. All these initiatives were aimed not merely at regulating commerce but at ensuring the borough had its cut of the profits therefrom.

The Merchant Guild doubtless had some role in the regulation, or at least the fostering, of local trade and commerce; probably more so in the early thirteenth century than in later periods. We do not know precisely what, since it is rarely mentioned in the surviving borough records, and its own records have not survived. It was essentially the commercial face of the borough, which must have become redundant in some regards as the borough increasingly took control (as reflected in the custumal) of commercial matters. In 1325 it resurfaced in its aspect of a socio-religious association – the Corpus Christi Guild – whose alderman had to account before bailiffs and portmen for the property and debts of the fraternity, and which retained a connection with St. Mary Tower. Occasionally there is mention of the gildhall which, since identified in the fifteenth century with court sessions, must have been another alias of the moot hall/tolhouse. In 1446 we still hear of the election of alderman and associates (now reduced to 2) by "bailiffs, portmen and the entire community", and the alderman's monopoly on commerce in stones is reiterated. By this period one of the functions of the guild was to present an annual pageant on Corpus Christi day, financed by the borough; groups of craft guilds were each assigned a specific tableau to represent, while the different orders of friars, as well as the Priors of the two local priories and the bailiffs and portmen all had particular role to play. In fact, judging from the financial account of the Guild for 1478/79, the celebrations on Corpus Christi day – including a large feast – may have been the sole significant function of the Merchant Guild; all burgesses, both intrinsic and foreign, were expected to contribute 4d a quarter towards it and all could attend the feast with their wives – and bring a guest for an extra 4d. The income from the monopoly on sale of certain stones was now assigned to hiring a chaplain to pray for gild brethren. In 1482 it was reaffirmed that foreign burgesses must pay a quarterly fee to the Guild or lose their burgess rights.

The early importance of Ipswich as a market for regional agricultural produce is indicated by the number of manors that purchased exemptions from tolls on grain and other produce. Even in the late fourteenth century, grain featured prominently among exports of local merchants. Wool and cloth exports and wine imports became more important in trade as the fourteenth century progressed, although even in the earliest surviving court roll (from 1255/56) we find recognizances of debts for the purchase of cloths, which appear both to be Suffolk product and imports from Ypres. Customs accounts show that a wide-ranging trade was carried on with Flanders and the Low Countries. Ipswich was probably also a convenient port from which to ship wool to the staple towns of Calais and Middelburg. It was used quite a bit as a port by Colchester merchants; the national customs system had Colchester, Harwich and Maldon as subsidiary ports to Ipswich.

Suffolk had a smaller role in the wool trade than Norfolk; of the four East Anglian towns designated in the fourteenth century as Staple towns (i.e. the sole authorized centres for the sale of wool), three were in Norfolk – Norwich, Lynn and Yarmouth – and the fourth was Ipswich. East Anglian wool was not of the highest quality, and its economic importance was gradually supplanted by the cloth-making industry. There are indications of cloth-making at Ipswich in the twelfth century; by the thirteenth century, the town was known locally for its cloth, linen, and hemp. But this was on a minor scale; commerce was of more importance to the town's prosperity than was industry. Wool continued to play a prominent role in exports from Ipswich throughout the Late Middle Ages, although it never rivalled Boston or Lynn in the wool trade (nor Yarmouth in the fish trade). Cloth began to appear among exports from the thirteenth century and became an increasingly important commodity in the fifteenth, but its trade was dominated not by local merchants but rather by the Merchant Adventurers (founded in London, with branches in Ipswich and other towns) and, by the end of the Middle Ages, the merchants of the German Hanse. A cloth-finishing industry tried to establish itself in fifteenth-century Ipswich, but discord between wool-producers, merchants and clothiers made the industry susceptible to the influence of London and Hanse merchants.

Petitions from "the poor burgesses" of Ipswich to the king in 1399 and again in 1402 complain of a decline in prosperity as a result of the burdensome fee farm and royal tallages, losses in shipping, and emigration of some of the wealthier burgesses. While such complaints are not entirely to be taken at face value, being devices to seek lower taxation or additional privileges (such as being made a staple town), evidence presented above suggests that the borough may not have been keeping its head above water, financially. Nonetheless, it does not appear to have been in dire straits; its diversified economy allowed it to weather the medieval fluctuations in the fortunes of commerce fairly well.

previous

main menu

next

History of medieval Ipswich

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth | Development of local government
Buildings and fortifications | Economy | INFORMATION SOURCES

Map of Ipswich at the close of the Middle Ages

Ipswich bailiffs, coroners, chamberlains, and treasurers

Appendix 1: Account of the setting up of self-government in A.D. 1200

Appendix 2: Calendar of usages and customs of Ipswich

Appendix 3: Oaths of officers and burgesses

Appendix 4: Account of revenues and expenditures, 1446/47

Information sources

The following is a small selection of published sources of information about medieval Ipswich. For additional secondary sources as well as primary sources, see the bibliography to The Men Behind the Masque.

Alsford, Stephen. "Thomas le Rente: A Medieval Town Ruler." Proceedings of the Suffolk Institute of Archaeology and History, vol.35 (1982), 105-115.

Bacon, Nathaniel. The Annalls of Ipswche. The Lawes, Customes, and Governmt of the Same 1654. Ed. W.H. Richardson. Ipswich, 1884.

Martin, G.H. The Early Court Rolls of the Borough of Ipswich. University College of Leicester, Department of English Local History, Occasional Papers, no.5. Leicester, 1954.

Martin, G.H. "The records of the borough of Ipswich, to 1422." Journal of the Society of Archivists, vol.1, no.4 (1956), 87-93.

Warner, Peter. The Origins of Suffolk. Manchester, 1996.

Wodderspoon, John. Memorials of the Ancient Town of Ipswich, in the County of Suffolk. Ipswich, 1850.

previous

main menu

appendix 1

Created: August 29, 1998. Last update: November 11, 2002

© Stephen Alsford, 1998-2003

History of medieval Ipswich

Ipswich and suburbs at the close of the Middle Ages

This is a clickable imagemap.

NOTES:

This map is the work of antiquary John Speed (working with the Dutch engraver Hondius) and was created as an inset for a map of Suffolk published in 1610 as part of a series of county maps. (The additions in colour are of course my own).

DEFENCES

Line of the ditch/wall

The line (which I have indicated by a brown overlay on Speed's map) was clearly suggested in the topography of the streets into the 19th century (although less so with late 20th-century redevelopment), including street names like Tower Ditches and St. Margaret Ditches. According to a note in one of the Ipswich Domesday Books, the ditches were dug in 1203; but this does not rule out the effort simply being an enlargement or extension of an earlier line of defence. There are fairly frequent references to grants of parcels of the town ditch, particular along the northern boundary, where they are sometimes referred to as the "great ditches of the town". Walls are far less commonly mentioned and their extent is uncertain. In 1302 a burgess was granted a lease of part of the ditches, for 6d. a year, to be voided if the town were ever enclosed by a wall. We hear of town wall in St. Margaret's parish in a grant of 1315, and in St. Mary Elms parish in 1323. A change had occurred between the compilation of a custumal in 1291 and its translation into English in the fifteenth century, since the former refers to a watercourse called "Botflood" (the flooded town ditch?) passing along the side of a road, while the latter refers to it running alongside the wall. What wall-building there was may have focused on areas where the ditches were weakest and may never have proceeded to creation of a continuous line; the eastern and western sides of the borough clearly had walls, but it is less certain that the northern perimeter did.

A North Gate

No.4 in Speed's key, where it is named Old Bar Gate. The road from here led towards Norfolk.

B West Gate

No. 3 in Speed's key, where it is named Barre Gate. The same name (portas barratas) is found in a deed of 1343, in which the town authorities rented to Robert le Loyker a plot of land just north-east of the gate, where the town wall north of the gate began to curve eastwards; they reserved right of access to the wall for purposes of repair or defence. The gate's position at one end of the main street running through the town reflects its importance. Part of it was converted into a town gaol in the early 15th century, and was rebuilt to be more suitable for that purpose in 1449 at the expense of burgess John Caldwell. The road from here led deeper into Suffolk.

C Possible site of the castle

The location of the relatively short-lived Norman castle is unknown. Some have argued that it lay outside the town defensive perimeter, to the north of Christ Church (and therefore off Speed's map), or just within the northern perimeter where the ditch could have served as part of the bailey ditch. The basis of these theories seems to be topographical: names (some post-medieval) such as St. Mary Tower, Castle Hill (a feature well north of the town), and the Tower Ramparts on the line of the northern defensive perimeter. However, it seems likely that a castle intended to overawe the citizenry would have been conspicuously placed and reasonably close to the town centre (as at Norwich), or at least on the edge of town – not as far away as Castle Hill. Speed has on his map a feature that is not identified, yet clearly of some significance: immediately east of Cornhill a walled precinct fronted by sturdy wall with gate and towers (later part of a sizable residential complex). Might this have been part of the castle bailey? The curving line of Elm Street is suggestive of a route skirting a bailey, while the presence of St. Mary Elms is not necessarily a problem, since one of the three St. Mary's appears not to have existed at the time of Domesday, and St. Mary Elms is the likeliest candidate. By contrast a location just south of the northern ditch, incorporating the ditch into its defences, could be expected to have left some mark on the line of the ditch, but no anomaly is evident. By Speed's time the grounds here suggested as the possible bailey site were apparently being used for an orchard. The absence of houses from a large stretch there of what was essentially the town's high street is apparent and otherwise difficult to explain. A location atop the slope leading away from the river, and not far from the central market, is plausible enough; the location proposed here would have commanded access to the river crossings at Handford (west) and Stoke (south). A Shirehouse Hill is heard of frequently in the 15th century, when parcels of land there were being leased to private citizens, and as early as 1309 – this is doubtless connected with the site of the county court, for which a new building was constructed in 1397; its location, downslope near the quayside, would not be strategically as desirable for a castle, and it is doubtful the "hill" would have been the old mound for a keep. The relatively early disappearance of the castle, in 1176, may explain why there seems to be no memory of its site in topographical names; although there is reference in 1486 to a plot of land in Ipswich called "Erlebegotes" (Earl Bigot's), the location is not identified and it might have been buildings the earl is said to have owned at the quayside.

D Other gates

The routes of streets strongly suggest the location of gates (or at least routes across the ditch) here, although no trace of their names remains on historical maps; they were probably lesser gates than the those marking the entrance into the town of the crossroads that was the early focus for settlement. The Ipswich Domesday book, in regulating fees for the carriage of merchandize, makes reference to sacks of wool passing through the East Gate, North Gate and West Gate. The topography of the town suggests that the likeliest location of the East Gate would have been at the end of Carr Street. There may also have been a gate further south, midway along the eastern stretch of ditch/wall, although neither the road approaching this point from within the town, nor the road leading directly east out of the town were of major importance, and we would expect any gate there to have been mentioned in the 14th-century description of the four wards of the borough (since the boundary of two of the wards passed through that point). Roads heading eastwards from the town led to the Suffolk coast. A Bull Gate is shown on Speed's map in the northern stretch of the defences, but its proximity to the West Gate and the fact that the gate leads only into fields (there was no road beyond it) show it as of minor significance.

COMMUNITY SPACES, STREETS AND STRUCTURES

E Common meadow and marsh

A large area of somewhat marshy ground west of the Gipping belonged to the burgesses in common; the northern part in particular, being drier, was used for pasturage. The common meadow included Portman Meadow, dedicated in 1200 to pasturing the horses of the town councillors; before 1200 and through the 14th century it was known as Odenholm meadow, although by the 1440s it was being called Portman's Meadow. It was accessed via a ford and later by Friars Bridge.

F Thingstead

This was a roughly triangular area of ground just east of North Gate; in 1315 it was itself referred to as a highway. A meeting-place of roads, even though its centre was built on by Speed's time, this large open area was still described in later times as a "green", a term itself suggesting a meeting-place of people. The name implies it an early location for the folk moot, although we cannot be sure whether this might have been a burhgemoot or a shire-moot serving not just Ipswich but other hundreds of east Suffolk. The fact of it being in the populous parish of Holy Trinity – usually a dedication of some importance – supports the possibility of a folk moot located here; although by 1200 (when, and perhaps because, Holy Trinity had become a priory and was subsequently superseded by St. Margaret's) the community meeting-place had apparently shifted to St. Mary Tower. The parish is occasionally referred to as St. Margaret in Thingstead, which may suggest that the churchyard absorbed some of the land previously used for the folk moot.

G Westgate Street/Tavern Street/Carr Street

This set of streets, essentially one east-west high street through the town, running along the ridge atop the slope leading down to the riverside, appears to have been the basis for the foundation of the settlement, and the focus for initial habitation in the 7th century. Westgate Street, leading from the gate to the town centre at Cornhill, was not often referred to by name in the Middle Ages; but when it was we find the name Burgate Street at first, and later Barregate Street. It is not certain whether the street name derives from "burh" (which would reinforce the early significance of this highway) or from the barred gate at the west end. In the early 14th century Carissstrete was the name for the eastern part of this highway, and perhaps the central part too (there seems to be no medieval foundation for Tavern Street).

H Cornhill

No. 8 in Speed's key. As the name indicates, the focus of the grain market. The town centre, where one of the most ancient town churches stood and also the location of the moothall/tolhouse and later the hall of Corpus Christi gild (successor to the Merchant Gild).

I Friar's Bridge

The name suggests it may have been built contemporary with or shortly after the establishment of the Franciscan friary (although it might have had a different name earlier). The only evident purpose of the bridge was to provide access to the community pasturage on the far side of the Gipping.

J Brook Street

No. 9 in Speed's key, Brook Street was the principal north-south route through the town, connecting the main east-west route with the western end of the quayside. This role would have made it an early feature of the settlement. It has been hypothesised that the name of this street derives from the watercourse that ran down its centre (a feature supportive of early settlement). However, the name is more likely associated with being a route to the neighbouring manor of Brooks to the north; some medieval spellings of the name (Brokesstrete) support this.

K The Quay

S in Speed's key. Archaeological evidence seems to indicate that a quayside revetted in timber existed from the Middle Saxon period. Successive phases of timber and wattle revetting are evidenced, as there took place gradual reclamation of land from what was once river. It may have been the case that, when built, the churches of St. Peter and St. Mary Quay stood close to the riverbank. The quay proper, from where the borough porters transported landed goods to the marketplaces or merchants' warehouses, stood immediately outside the defensive perimeter of the town. In 1306 Roger Bigod, Earl of Norfolk, died seised of the quay and the houses there. By 1398 it seems to have been in the hands of the king. By the 15th century the quay was outfitted with a crane and a public latrine.

L Customs house

Speed shows two structures on the quayside, neither identified in his key. One is clearly a crane. This was in existence by 1454, when borough authorities required that all outsiders bringing merchandise to Ipswich for sale have their goods weighed by the crane; but there were probably a series of cranes on the quayside: repairs to the crane was an item in the 1446/47 chamberlains' accounts, and a replacement had to be built in 1477. The other structure, judging by its location, might well be the precursor to the later Customs House. In 1433 a grant of land referred to the nearby "Houses of Office" on the quay. One of these may have been the Woolhouse which in 1448 was specified by borough authorities as the only place at which wool might be bought and sold, and which in 1451 was farmed out (along with collection of customs at the quay and the fleshhouse, operation of the weighing beam, and other sources of revenue) to John Bole.

M Stoke Bridge

Q in Speed's key. A bridge across the Orwell connecting Ipswich with the suburb (held by the Abbot of Ely) of Stoke, where many burgess held fields and other property, was certainly in existence in the late 13th century: in 1301 the will of Thomas Aylred assigned an annual rent towards the maintenance of the bridge, to be administered by the bridge's custodian – this not so much charity as gratitude, reflecting the fact that Thomas, as a holder of property in both Ipswich and Stoke, must personally have benefited from the existence of the bridge. However, the fact that Saxon Ipswich ware has been found in Stoke and the mention in Domesday of at least one, if not both, of Stoke's parish churches, creates the suspicion that some kind of crossing facility would have existed far earlier. In the 1430s John Caldwell offered to renovate the bridge at his own expense if townsmen would contribute to the maintenance. Access into the town via the bridge was protected by some kind of barrier by the 15th century, for an ordinance of 1477 placed the keys to the bridge in the custody of the bailiffs. Possibly the "Peter's Bridge" towards whose maintenance the borough assigned, in 1378, the rent from a tenement, it was also referred to on occasion as Ipswich Bridge and Port Bridge. By the 15th century, it appears to have been perceived as two separate bridges, the one closest to Ipswich called North Bridge and that closest to Stoke being called Stoke Bridge; the reason for this is not evident from Speed's map but relates to a peninsula (created by a watercourse lying between the Gipping and Orwell) which provided a midway foundation for the linkage between Ipswich and Stoke. In the 19th century the intermediary watercourse was filled in and the northern part of the bridge, landlocked, disappeared.

N Stoke Mill

R in Speed's key. Where ended the narrow peninsula, mentioned above as the dividing point of two bridges providing a route between Ipswich and Stoke, Stoke Mill was built. By 1446 there were two mills at this location, one for grain and one for fulling – one of these perhaps being the "New" Mill.

O Horswade Mill

Speed does not reference this on his map, and the location of the mill is not clearly indicated in any medieval record that I have read. However, it was a water-powered mill and is frequently referred to in conjunction with the common meadow/marsh on the west bank of the Gipping – in the 1340s, when the borough was leasing the mill to private citizens, Odenholm meadow was jointly leased out with it; at that time Horswade Mill was said to be in a ruinous state. A deed of 1388 is concerned with a plot of land lying between a (river?)bank connecting Horswade Mill and Stoke Bridge and the road connecting the Barre Gates and Friars Bridge; based on this, on a feature on Speed's map showing otherwise isolated buildings at the end of a side-road leading to the Gipping, and on the evidence from later maps (which show one of those buildings extending to the river's edge), I am tentatively hypothesising that this may represent the mill location, directly across the river from the common meadow. Horswade served as the official place where burgesses were supposed to have their grain ground, judging from a borough lease in 1308 of the (tolls paid at) the mill. It was distinct from the New Mill, another building that was separately leased out by the borough; the leasing of both mills is referred to as early as 1286.

P Handford Mill

Erroneously indexed on Speed's map as Z. It is referred to under this name in 1323, but may have gone under different names at different times. A little further west was a second bridge (across the Gipping) serving the townspeople and, as the name suggests, replacing an earlier ford at the location; the bridge may have been in place before the Conquest.

Q Grammar school

X in Speed's key. The earliest reference to such a school in Ipswich was in March 1477, although there are references to schoolmasters in the early 15th century. Whether the location was the same as that in the time of Speed, however, is a matter of conjecture. In 1483, prominent townsman Richard Felawe bequeathed a building, adjacent to (which could mean opposite) the gate of the Dominican friary, to serve as a community schoolhouse and as a schoolmaster's house; this might approximately correspond with Speed's placement, if we compare with Pennington's map of 1778, which locates the schoolmaster's house across the (Foundation) street from the friary, although by that time the grammar school itself was immediately north of the friary. Speed seems to have the school a little far north.

RELIGIOUS INSTITUTIONS

R1 St. Mary Tower

E in Speed's key. Two churches dedicated to St. Mary are recorded in Domesday, without further distinguisher, other than that one was held by the burgess Culling and the other by Tumbi – it being common in Anglo-Saxon England for churches to be built and owned by private individuals. The reason for the name is evident enough from Speed's map. Its possession of a sizable tower (from which curfew was rung), the wealth of the parish and the church, the later attendance there of the town bailiffs, and above all the community meetings held there in 1200, all suggest this to have been the chief parish church of late medieval Ipswich. By the same token, its churchyard would have been a likely spot for the borough folkmoot. It was the second most populous parish in 1381, containing about 12% of Ipswich's taxpayers.

R2 St. Lawrence

G in Speed's key. Mentioned in Domesday as being held by Turchil and Edric, but as having been held, in the time of Edward the Confessor, by a freewoman, Lefflet.

R3 St. Stephen

H in Speed's key. Mentioned in Domesday as being held by Godric. Only a small parish, catering primarily to residents of Brook Street.

R4 St. Peter

M in Speed's key. Mentioned in Domesday as being held by Ascar; at that time the river's edge was probably much closer to the church than today. The Augustinian priory of St. Peter and St. Paul was established nearby around the close of the reign of Henry II; the founder is unknown, although the king was claiming its patronage by the time of Henry III. The priory was fairly wealthy by the end of the 13th century, holding the appropriation of the churches of St. Peter, St. Nicholas, and St. Clement. Royal licences to acquire property in mortmain allowed for a period of expansion into adjacent properties in the early 14th century. The Priory was dissolved in 1526 (by which time it was also holding the church of St. Mary Quay) in order to allow for Cardinal Wolsey to construct his short-lived college on the site.

\(image of St. Peter's\)

R5 St. Mary Quay

N in Speed's key. Believed to be in existence by the end of the 11th century, but not necessarily one of the St. Mary's mentioned in Domesday. It was clearly established to serving increased population around the quayside. Yet, despite the importance of the quayside, the Poll Tax of 1381 indicates that this parish was not heavily populated. Much of the fabric of the church now standing dates from the mid-15th century.

R6 St. Mary Elms

F in Speed's key. If the two St. Mary's mentioned in Domesday are, as seems likely, St. Mary Tower and St. Mary Stoke, this suggests St. Mary Elms may not have come into existence until the late 12th century.

\(image of St. Mary Elms\)

R7 St. Mildred

Likely a pre-Conquest foundation, quite possibly dating as far back as the 8th century. The church itself is rarely mentioned, particularly after the early 14th century, although its cemetery is referred to in 1420 and the parish as late as 1465, along with the cemetery. References to St. Mildred's are noticeably fewer than to other of the parishes within the defensive perimeter. It may have been in gradual decline for some time: perhaps part of the population originally served had been displaced by the building of the castle (as at Norwich) and had moved east into St. Mary Tower and St. Margaret parishes; events such as a fire in the fleshmarket ca.1319 (the western part of which would likely have been in St. Mildred's parish) may not have helped matters, and depopulation resulting from the Plague and its recurrences would have reduced the base of tithe-paying parishioners further, to the point where the church may have had difficulty supporting itself. The parish may have been a small one from its origin; a royal tallage of 1228 lumped it in with St. Mary Tower for purposes of listing taxpayers, while in 1309, when men were chosen from each parish to elect a town council, with different numbers of electors according to the size of the parish population, St. Mildred's was not listed at all. The church building was subsequently absorbed into the moothall property; it survived into the 19th century, when pulled down to be replaced by a new town hall. Judging from parish boundaries, it looks as though St. Mary Tower parish was extended to absorb the part of St. Mildred's east and south of Cornhill, while the western portion was added to St. Matthew's.

R8 St. Nicholas

L in Speed's key. Not mentioned in Domesday, it likely came into being in the following century, to serve residents spreading along the road connecting the town centre with Stoke. However, there may have been an earlier church with a different dedication on the site. The parish contained the timber market (perhaps located south of the Franciscan friary?).

R9 St. Edmund's chapel

A chapel dedicated to St. Edmund de Pounteney (Pontigny) was located between Lower Brook Street and Foundation Street (an earlier name for which was St. Edmund Pounteney Lane), with its rectory on the corner of Rosemary Lane. This was an unusual dedication, referring to an Archbishop of Canterbury canonized in 1248. It is first mentioned in Ipswich records in the last decade of that century, when a member of one of Ipswich's most prominent families was its chaplain; burial privileges were evidently associated, since its cemetery is mentioned in 1338. Originally belonging to St. Peter's Priory, in the 15th century it was consolidated with St. Helen's.

S1 St. Mary Stoke

P in Speed's key. It was probably one of the St. Mary's mentioned (without any distinguisher) in Domesday, whose entry for Ipswich clearly includes Stoke.

S2 St. Augustine

Mentioned in Domesday as being held by Lestan the priest. It was located at the southern end of Stoke, but decayed and disappeared during the Middle Ages (it was still in existence tempore Edward II), which is why it is not acknowledged on Speed's map. Nearby was the leper hospital of St. Leonard's, a poor foundation probably reliant on alms.

S3 St. Margaret

C in Speed's key. Probably built in the 12th century, when the church of Holy Trinity was turned into a priory (there would otherwise be no sense to have two parish churches immediately adjacent). The most populous parish judging from the Poll Tax of 1381, containing 19% of those taxed; this was partly because it was a large parish, incorporating Carr Street and its surrounds within the defensive perimeter as well as a suburban area. Again, in a parliamentary aid of 1463, St. Margaret's had the highest assessment of any parish (just edging out St. Mary Tower) and had 3 assessors, compared to 2 for each other parish.

S4 St. Clement

K in Speed's key. The suburb just outside the defensive boundary was established in the late 12th century, probably as a result of growing settlement in the vicinity of the quay. It was one of the more populous parishes in 1381.

S5 St. Helen

I in Speed's key. A suburban church in the hamlet of Caldwell, it is believed to have been in existence by the end of the 11th century. It seems to have been annexed to the combined hospitals of St. Mary Magdalene and St. James (see entry under Hospital of St. James).

S6 St. Matthew

D in Speed's key. Believed to be in existence by the end of the 11th century. The parish included a chapel dedicated to All Saints and St. John's Hospital.

S7 St. George's chapel

B in Speed's key. Mentioned in Domesday, not as part of the Ipswich entry proper but in the same half-hundred, as part of the hamlet of Baylham – where several burgesses were already established. This suburb never developed much and remained one of the borough's smallest parishes in 1381. In 1451 a St. George's fair is heard of, although whether connected with the chapel, I cannot say.

T1 Holy Trinity Priory

A in Speed's key. A church with this dedication is identified in Domesday, as being held by Alnulf the priest. It may have been the precursor of the building that later served as the Augustinian Priory of the Holy Trinity, established tempore Henry II. It was, at the time of Domesday, presumably a parish church, but must have been a priory when St. Margaret's (its replacement) was built on adjacent land. The first priory building was constructed in 1177. At the beginning of the 13th century it held the borough churches of Holy Trinity, St. Lawrence, St. Mary Tower, and St. Mary Elms, along with other churches and lands in the vicinity; by the end of the century, it also held St. Margaret. The Priory was sometimes known, as early as tempore Richard II, as Christ Church. Taken over by the Crown in 1536 and acquired by a London merchant a few years later, the priory ruins were rebuilt into a manor house now called Christchurch Mansion.

T2 Franciscan friary

T in Speed's key. The Greyfriars, or Friars Minor, were established in Ipswich early in the reign of Edward I; in 1284 townsman Robert de Orford bequeathed them a small sum of money. The founder was Sir Robert Tiptot (died 1298) of Nettlestead and wife. Not much is known of the friary, although it covered a fairly large tract of land in what was otherwise a relatively uninhabited section of the town (on land once marshy), and left a memory in several topographic features in the post-medieval period; for example, the street leading along the edge of the precinct became known as Grey Friars Road, an easterly approach to the site is still (at least the surviving part) known as Friars Street, while the bridge leading across to the common marsh was known as Friars Bridge (by at least 1419). The friary was suppressed in 1538.

T3 Carmelite friary

V in Speed's key, but he misidentifies the convent as the Blackfriars. The Whitefriars probably established themselves in Ipswich around 1278; townsman Robert de Orford bequeathed them a small sum of money in 1284. Settlement of Carmelites here was perhaps the result of a decision of the provincial chapter held at Norwich in 1278, and the new community could have drawn its initial members from the Norwich Carmelite house. The friary absorbed a large area of the town just south of the town centre, bordered by Queen Street on the west and St. Stephen's Lane (on the west side of St. Stephen's church) on the east. The fact that provincial chapters were often held at Ipswich in the 14th century indicates the friary must have had the capacity to accommodate a large number of guests and, indeed, the central structure shown on Ogilby's map (1674) confirms this, although the church was rebuilt in the third quarter of the 15th century. It was suppressed in 1538.

T4 Dominican friary

W in Speed's key. A Dominican friary, dedicated to St. Mary, was established at Ipswich by Henry III, who in 1263 purchased a property there for the initial buildings. During the 13th century, there were perhaps over fifty friars in the community. John Ogilby's map of Ipswich in 1674 (the first large, detailed, to-scale plan of the town) shows a "Friery Garden" to the south of an unidentified building, which is called Christ Hospital – apparently some kind of almshouse – on Speed's map (and again so identified on Pennington's map of 1778). This was a surviving reflection of a large precinct built up by the Blackfriars over the course of the Late Middle Ages, stretching from the church of St. Mary Quay to the south, what was later called Foundation Street on the west, the town defensive line on the east and an uncertain distance north – perhaps as far as the north-eastern corner of the defensive line. King and borough permitted considerable expansion of the friary property on condition that the burgesses had access to the adjacent town ditch (and later the walls) for purposes of repair, and the friars' promise to assist with maintenance of the wall and two gates on the north and south sides of their property, through which public access was to be allowed. The line of houses shown by Speed on the east side of this precinct, where once a town wall would have stood, presumably did not come into existence until after the suppression of the friary in 1538. There is a reference in 1462 to a road running between Blackfriars Bridge and the quay; it is not clear where this bridge may have been located, unless it led out of one of the eastern gates, across the town ditch.

T5 Hospital of St. James

Little is known of this except from incidental references. It lay in the suburban part of St. Margaret's parish, probably on the border of St. Helen's parish, and near a lane (itself perceived as running roughly north-south) leading to St. Helen's. Based on this I have hypothesised that Speed may have represented the hospital (without identification) as a building shown set back a little from the road, separate from the main line of residences; these buildings were just barely within the boundaries of St. Margaret's parish and were backed by an area of unoccupied land not clearly associated with any parochial jurisdiction. The hospital housed both men and women and was intended for lepers. Besides St. Leonard's (see entry under St. Augustine), there were two other leper hospitals in Ipswich, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene (in the vicinity of St. Helen's church) and St. James; that of St. Mary Magdalene was first mentioned in 1199, when the king granted it a fair to be held on the day of St. James Apostle, on its own land. In the 14th century the hospital of St. James was united with it, to be administered by a single master. In addition we hear of a hospital which sheltered the poor (1339) in the suburban part of St. Matthew's parish, and a Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem (1414) in St. Margaret's parish.

[MAIN MENU]

[\[contents\]](#)

APPENDIX I

The Officers of Borough Government

Ipswich: bailiffs, coroners, chamberlains, and treasurers

| | |
|---------|---|
| 1272-73 | b. Richard Fader, John Laurens |
| 1273-74 | unknown |
| 1274-75 | b. Vivian fitz Silvester, John Laurens |
| 1275-76 | unknown |
| 1276-77 | unknown |
| 1277-78 | b. Richard Fader, John Clement |
| 1278-79 | unknown |
| 1279-80 | b. Richard Fader, Roger le Maister |
| 1280-81 | b. Robert de Orford, Vivian fitz Silvester |
| 1281-82 | b. Robert de Orford, Vivian fitz Silvester |
| 1282-83 | b. Robert de Orford, Vivian fitz Silvester |
| 1283-84 | b. Thomas Aylred, Laurence Haraud |
| 1284-85 | b. Vivian fitz Silvester, John Clement |
| 1285-91 | Ipswich in custodianship, but ballival government maintained, probably in the persons of fitz Silvester and Clement |
| 1290-91 | |
| or | b. Vivian fitz Silvester, John Clement |
| 1291-92 | |
| 1292-93 | b. Laurence Haraud, Richard Leu |
| 1293-94 | b. John Leu, Thomas dil Stone |
| 1294-95 | b. Vivian fitz Silvester, Laurence Haraud |
| 1295-96 | b. Thomas le Maister, Thomas Stace cr. Philip Harneys, Vivian fitz Silvester, Richard Leu, Arnold le Peleter |
| 1296-97 | b. Thomas le Maister, Thomas Stace cr. Philip Harneys, Vivian fitz Silvester (Thomas Aylred), Richard Leu, Arnold le Peleter |
| 1297-98 | b. Thomas Stace, Thomas le Rente cr. Philip Harneys, Thomas Aylred, Richard Leu, Arnold le Peleter |

- 1298-99 b. John de Whatefeld, Laurence Cobbe
cr. Philip Harneys, Thomas Aylred, Richard Leu, Arnold le Peleter
- 1299-1300 b. Thomas Stace, John le Maister
cr. Philip Harneys, Richard Leu, Arnold le Peleter
- 1300-1301 b. Thomas Stace, John le Maister
cr. Philip Harneys, Richard Leu, Arnold le Peleter
- 1301-02 b. John de Causton, John Leu
cr. Richard Leu, Arnold le Peleter? [5]
- 1302-03 b. Laurence Cobbe, John Leu
cr. Richard Leu, Arnold le Peleter? [5]
- 1303-04 b. Thomas Stace, Thomas le Rente
cr. Richard Leu, Arnold le Peleter
- 1304-05 b. Thomas Stace, Thomas le Rente
cr. Arnold le Peleter? [5], Richard Leu, Thomas dil Stone
- 1305-06 b. Laurence Cobbe, Thomas dil Stone
cr. Arnold le Peleter, Richard Leu? [5]
- 1306-07 b. Laurence Cobbe, Thomas dil Stone
cr. Arnold le Peleter, Richard Leu? [5]
- 1307-08 b. Thomas le Rente, Thomas Stace
cr. Arnold le Peleter, Richard Leu
- 1308-09 b. Thomas le Rente, Thomas Stace
cr. Arnold le Peleter, Richard Leu
- 1309-10 b. Thomas le Rente, Thomas Stace
cr. Arnold le Peleter, Richard Leu, Elias le Keu
- 1310-11 b. Thomas le Rente, Thomas Stace
cr. Arnold le Peleter, Richard Leu, Elias le Keu
- 1311-12 b. Thomas le Rente, Thomas Stace
cr. Arnold le Peleter (Thomas le Rente [5]), Richard Leu, Elias le Keu
- 1312-13 b. Laurence Cobbe, Thomas Stace
cr. Thomas le Rente, Richard Leu, Elias le Keu
- 1313-14 b. Thomas le Rente, Richard Leu
cr. Thomas le Rente, Richard Leu, Elias le Keu? [5]
- 1314-15 b. Alexander Margaret, Thomas Stace
cr. Thomas le Rente, Richard Leu, Elias le Keu
- 1315-16 b. Laurence Cobbe, Gilbert Robert
cr. Thomas Stace, Thomas le Rente, Richard Leu, Elias le Keu
- 1316-17 b. Thomas Stace, John de Whatefeld
cr. Thomas Stace [5], Thomas le Rente, Richard Leu, Elias le Keu
- 1317-18 b. Laurence Cobbe, Alexander Margaret
cr. Thomas Stace, Thomas le Rente, Richard Leu, Elias le Keu

- 1318-19 b. Thomas Stace, Thomas le Rente
cr. Richard Leu, Elias le Keu [6]
- 1319-20 b. Thomas Stace, Thomas le Rente
cr. Richard Leu (Alexander Margaret), Elias le Keu
- 1320-21 b. Thomas Stace, Thomas le Rente (Laurence Cobbe, Henry le Rotoun)
cr. unknown
- 1321-22 b. Richard Leu, Walter de Westhale
cr. unknown
ch. John de Akenham, ---
- 1322-23 b. John Harneys senior, William Malyn
cr. Gilbert de Burgh, Elias le Keu
ch. John de Preston, Miles le Fevre
- 1323-24 b. Gilbert de Burgh, Edmund de Castleacre
cr. John Baude, John de Preston
ch. unknown [7]
- 1324-25 b. John Irp, John de Preston
cr. Gilbert Robert, John le Maister
- 1325-26 b. Gilbert de Burgh, John Harneys junior
cr. Gilbert Robert, John le Maister
- 1326-27 b. Geoffrey Costyn, Geoffrey Stace
cr. Gilbert Robert, John le Maister
- 1327-28 b. John Irp, Richard de Leyham
cr. Gilbert Robert, John le Maister (Thomas Stace, William de Causton)
- 1328-29 b. Geoffrey Costyn, Thomas de Whatefeld
cr. Thomas Stace (John Irp), William de Causton
- 1329-30 b. John Irp, Richard de Leyham
cr. John Irp, William de Causton
- 1330-31 b. Geoffrey Costyn, Thomas de Whatefeld
cr. John Irp, William de Causton
- 1331-32 b. Gilbert de Burgh, William le Fevre
cr. John Irp, William de Causton
- 1332-33 b. Geoffrey Costyn, Miles le Fevre
cr. John Irp, William de Causton
- 1333-34 b. Geoffrey Stace, William Ryngild
cr. John Irp, William de Causton
- 1334-35 b. John Irp, John Heved
cr. John Irp, William de Causton
- 1335-36 b. John Leu, Thomas le Coteler
cr. John Irp, William de Causton
- 1336-37 b. John Irp, John de Preston
cr. John Irp, William de Causton

- 1337-38 b. Gilbert de Burgh, Edmund Petygard
cr. John Irp, William de Causton
- 1338-39 b. John le Rente, William Malyn junior
cr. John Irp, William de Causton
- 1339-40 b. John Irp, John de Leyham
cr. John Irp, William de Causton
- 1340-41 b. John de Preston, Henry Brikoun
cr. John Irp, William de Causton
- 1341-42 b. Geoffrey de Stace, William de Kenebroke
cr. John Irp, John de Preston
- 1342-43 b. John Irp, John de Preston
cr. John Irp, John de Preston
- 1343-44 b. John Irp, John de Preston
cr. William de Kenebroke, William Ryngild
- 1344-45 b. John Irp, John de Preston
cr. William de Kenebroke (John de Preston), William Ryngild
- 1345-46 b. John Leu, Edmund Petygard
cr. John de Preston, William Ryngild
- 1346-47 b. John de Preston, John Irp
cr. John de Preston, William Ryngild
- 1347-48 b. John de Preston, Thomas Leu
cr. John de Preston, William Ryngild
- 1348-49 b. John de Preston, Thomas Leu
cr. John de Preston, William Ryngild
ch. – Baude, Richard le Spicer? [8]
- 1349-50 b. John de Preston, John Cobat
cr. John de Preston, William Ryngild
- 1350-51 b. John de Preston, John Cobat
cr. John de Preston, William Ryngild
- 1351-52 b. John de Preston, Walter Curteys
cr. John de Preston, William Ryngild
- 1352-53 b. John Cobat, Henry le Rotoun
cr. John de Preston, William Ryngild
- 1353-54 b. John Cobat, Richard de Haveringlond
cr. John de Preston, William Ryngild
- 1354-55 b. John Cobat, Thomas dil Stone
cr. John de Preston, William Ryngild
- 1355-56 b. Geoffrey Starling, Robert Thebaud
cr. John de Preston (John Hasting), William Ryngild
- 1356-57 b. Thomas le Maister, Richard de Haveringlond
cr. John Hasting, William Ryngild

- 1357-58 b. Walter Curteys, Henry Starling
cr. John Hasting, William Ryngild
- 1358-59 b. Thomas dil Stone, Thomas de Euston
cr. John Hasting, William Ryngild
- 1359-60 b. Thomas le Maister, Henry Starling
cr. Thomas de Euston, Elias Malyn
- 1360-61 b. Geoffrey Starling, Richard le Spicer
cr. unknown
- 1361-62 b. Henry Starling, Walter Curteys
cr. Baldwin Cobbe, Elias Malyn
- 1362-63 b. Robert Thebaud, Thomas le Maister
cr. Baldwin Cobbe, Elias Malyn
- 1363-64 b. Henry Starling, Walter Curteys
cr. Baldwin Cobbe, Elias Malyn
- 1364-65 b. Thomas le Maister, Robert de Preston
cr. Baldwin Cobbe, Elias Malyn
- 1365-66 b. Robert Thebaud, Robert de Preston
cr. Baldwin Cobbe, Elias Malyn
- 1366-67 b. Henry Starling, Robert Waleys
cr. Baldwin Cobbe, Elias Malyn
- 1367-68 b. Hugh Leu, Robert de Preston
cr. Baldwin Cobbe (Richard Randolph), Elias Malyn (Thomas de Leyham)
- 1368-69 b. Hugh Leu, Robert de Preston
cr. Richard Randolph, Thomas de Leyham
- 1369-70 b. John Cobat, Henry Starling
cr. Richard Randolph, Thomas de Leyham
- 1370-71 b. Geoffrey Starling, Robert de Preston
cr. Richard Randolph, Thomas de Leyham
- 1371-72 unknown
- 1372-73 b. William le Maister, Hugh Walle
cr. Thomas de Leyham, William le Northerne
- 1373-74 b. Henry Starling, Robert Waleys
cr. Thomas de Leyham, William le Northerne
- 1374-75 b. Robert de Preston, Hugh Walle
cr. Thomas de Leyham, William le Northerne
- 1375-76 b. Hugh Leu, Robert Waleys
cr. Thomas de Leyham, William le Northerne
- 1376-77 b. Geoffrey Starling junior, Hugh Walle
cr. Thomas de Leyham, William le Northerne
- 1377-78 b. Geoffrey Starling senior, Robert Waleys
cr. Thomas de Leyham, William le Northerne

- 1378-79 b. Geoffrey Starling senior, Robert Waleys
cr. Thomas de Leyham, William le Northerne
- 1379-80 b. William le Maister, Roger Gosewold
cr. Thomas de Leyham, William le Northerne
- 1380-81 b. Geoffrey Starling junior, Hugh Walle
cr. unknown
- 1381-82 b. Geoffrey Starling junior, Hugh Walle
cr. Thomas de Leyham, John Golding
- 1382-83 b. Geoffrey Starling junior, Hugh Walle
cr. Thomas de Leyham, John Golding
- 1383-84 b. Geoffrey Starling junior, Hugh Walle
cr. Thomas de Leyham, John Golding
- 1384-85 b. Geoffrey Starling,[\[9\]](#) Robert Waleys
cr. Thomas de Leyham, John Golding
- 1385-86 b. Geoffrey Starling, Robert Waleys
cr. Thomas de Leyham, John Golding
- 1386-87 b. John Andrew, William atte Fen
cr. Thomas de Leyham, John Golding
- 1387-88 b. Geoffrey Starling, Robert Waleys
cr. Thomas Clerk, Thomas de Rising
- 1388-89 b. Geoffrey Starling, Robert Waleys
cr. Thomas Clerk, Thomas de Rising
- 1389-90 b. Geoffrey Starling, Robert Waleys (John Andrew)
cr. Thomas Clerk, Thomas de Rising (John Arnold, John Plombe)
- 1390-91 b. Geoffrey Starling, John Andrew
cr. John Arnold, John Plombe
- 1391-92 b. John Arnold, Henry Walle
cr. John Arnold, John Plombe? [\[5\]](#)
- 1392-93 b. John Arnold, Geoffrey Starling
cr. John Arnold, John Plombe
- 1393-94 b. Gilbert de Boulge, William atte Fen
cr. John Arnold, John Plombe
ch. Peter Chaloner, William Debenham, Benedict Eldyve, John Hyll
- 1394-95 b. Gilbert de Boulge, William atte Fen
cr. John Arnold, John Plombe
- 1395-96 b. Geoffrey Starling, Robert Lucas
cr. John Arnold, John Plombe (John Aveline)
- 1396-97 b. John Bernard, John Aveline
cr. unknown
ch. Thomas Cardenal, John Howden

- 1397-98 b. John Arnold, Robert Lucas
cr. John Bernard, William Maister
- 1398-99 b. John Arnold, John Aveline
cr. John Bernard, William Maister
- 1399-1400 b. John Leu, John Parker
cr. John Bernard, Geoffrey Starling
- 1400-01 b. John Leu (John Horkesley), John Aveline
cr. John Bernard, Robert Lucas
- 1401-02 b. Richard atte Cherche, John Bernard
cr. Geoffrey Starling, Robert Lucas
- 1402-03 b. John Horkesley, William Debenham
cr. Thomas Cauntbregg, Robert Lucas
- 1403-04 b. John Horkesley, William Debenham
cr. Thomas Cauntbregg, Robert Lucas
ch. William Sparwe, Henry Heyward
- 1404-05 b. John Starling, John Aveline (Robert Lucas)
cr. John Knepping, John Bernard
ch. William Chamber, John Northerne
- 1405-06 b. Robert Lucas, Thomas Andrew
cr. John Knepping, John Bernard
- 1406-07 b. John Horkesley, Thomas Andrew
cr. John Knepping, John Bernard
- 1407-08 b. John Starling, John Knepping
cr. Robert Lucas, John Bernard
- 1408-09 b. John Rous, Robert Lucas
cr. Hugh Hoo, John Bernard
- 1409-10 b. John Rous, Robert Lucas
cr. Hugh Hoo, John Bernard
- 1410-11 b. John Horkesley, John Knepping
cr. Robert Lucas, John Felbrigge
- 1411-12 b. John Horkesley, John Knepping
cr. Robert Lucas, John Felbrigge
- 1412-13 b. John Starling, Thomas Andrew
cr. William Stonham, John Peyton
- 1413-14 b. John Horkesley, John Knepping
cr. Hugh Hoo, John Bernard
- 1414-15 b. William Debenham, Hugh Hoo
cr. Robert Lucas, William Chamber
- 1415-16 b. John Horkesley (Hugh Hoo), John Knepping
cr. Robert Lucas, William Chamber
tr. Richard Joye, Henry Heyward

- 1416-17 b. John Starling, Hugh Hoo
cr. William Stonham, John Bernard
- 1417-18 b. William Debenham, Robert Lucas
cr. William Stonham, John Bernard
- 1418-19 b. William Debenham, Robert Lucas
cr. William Stonham, John Bernard
tr. John Deken, William Bonde
- 1419-20 b. William Debenham, Robert Lucas
cr. John Joye, John Wode
- 1420-21 b. John Knepping, John Joye
cr. Robert Bikleswade, John Wode
- 1421-22 b. John Knepping, John Joye
cr. William Whethereld, William Bury
- 1422-23 b. Thomas Astley, John Deken
cr. William Whethereld, William Bury
- 1423-24 b. Thomas Astley, John Deken
cr. John Joye, William Bury
- 1424-25 b. Thomas Astley, John Deken
cr. John Joye, William Bury
- 1425-26 b. John Joye, John Caldwell
cr. John Knepping, William Whethereld
- 1426-27 unknown
- 1427-28 b. John Deken, ---
cr. John Knepping, John Wode
- 1428-29 b. John Deken, William Whethereld
cr. unknown
- 1429-30 b. William Debenham, Robert Drye
cr. Robert Wode, Robert Bikleswade
- 1430-31 b. John Joye, Robert Bikleswade
cr. John Deken, William Whethereld
tr. Thomas Chapman, John Drye
- 1431-32 b. John Deken, John Caldwell
cr. unknown
tr. Thomas Denys, Robert Drye
- 1432-33 b. William Whethereld, Robert Drye
cr. William Wallworth, Alexander Fornham
tr. John Blankpain, Robert Parmafey
- 1433-34 b. William Debenham, Thomas Denys
cr. William Wallworth, Alexander Fornham
tr. John French, William Rideout

- 1434-35 b. John Deken, Robert Wode
cr. William Wallworth, Alexander Fornham
tr. John Geet, Thomas Portwey
- 1435-36 b. John Caldwell, William Whethereld
cr. John Whitton, Alexander Fornham
tr. unknown
- 1436-37 b. William Wallworth, Robert Drye
cr. John Whitton, Alexander Fornham
tr. unknown
- 1437-38 b. Robert Wode, William Ketcche senior
cr. John Whitton, Alexander Fornham
tr. unknown
- 1438-39 b. John Deken, William Whethereld
cr. John Whitton, Alexander Fornham
tr. Robert Smyth, John Sudbury
- 1439-40 b. Thomas Denys, John Felawe
cr. John Whitton, Alexander Fornham
ch. John Felawe [10]
tr. Thomas Cowman, William Rideout
- 1440-41 b. Robert Wode, Peter Terry
cr. William Rideout, John Geet
tr. unknown
- 1441-42 b. William Debenham, John Deken
cr. John Wode, John Sudbury
tr. unknown
- 1442-43 b. Thomas Denys, John Caldwell
cr. John Wode, John Sudbury
tr. unknown
- 1443-44 b. Robert Wode, William Whethereld
cr. John Drayll, William Rideout
tr. unknown
- 1444-45 b. William Debenham (William Wallworth), Peter Terry
cr. John Drayll, William Rideout
ch. Robert Parmafey, Roger Stannard
- 1445-46 b. Thomas Denys, John Deken
cr. John Geet, William Rideout
ch. Robert Parmafey, Roger Stannard
- 1446-47 b. Robert Wode, William Whethereld
cr. John Geet, William Rideout
ch. John James, Richard Tough

- 1447-48 b. William Wallworth, Robert Smyth
cr. John Geet, William Rideout
ch. John James, Richard Tough
- 1448-49 b. John Caldwell, Richard Felawe
cr. John Geet, William Rideout
tr. Thomas Fastolf, Roger Stannard
- 1449-50 b. Thomas Denys, John Drayll
cr. Roger Stannard, William Rideout
tr. Robert Hall, Edmund Winter [11]
- 1450-51 b. William Whethereld, John Geet
cr. Roger Stannard, William Rideout
tr. William Winter, William Hall
- 1451-52 b. John Caldwell, Thomas Fastolf
cr. Roger Stannard, William Rideout
tr. Thomas Cowman, William Heede
- 1452-53 b. Richard Felawe, Robert Smyth
cr. Roger Stannard, William Rideout
ch. Robert Hall, Edmund Winter
tr. John Ward, Henry Stannard
- 1453-54 b. John Geet, William Ketcche junior
cr. John Langcroft, John Sudbury
ch. John Rever, Matthew Stabler
- 1454-55 b. Thomas Denys, John Caldwell
cr. John Langcroft, John Wallworth
ch. John Rever, John Goss
- 1455-56 b. Richard Felawe, William Baldry
cr. John Langcroft, John Wallworth
ch. John Ward, John Goss
- 1456-57 b. John Wallworth, Edmund Winter
cr. John Langcroft, Robert Hall
ch. John Blankpain, John Creyk
- 1457-58 b. Thomas Denys, John Drayll
cr. John Langcroft, Robert Hall
ch. John Blankpain, John Creyk
- 1458-59 b. John Caldwell, Richard Felawe
cr. John Langcroft, Robert Hall
ch. John Blankpain, John Creyk
- 1459-60 b. John Wallworth, Edmund Winter
cr. John Langcroft, Robert Hall
ch. William Style, John Campion

1460-61 b. Thomas Denys, William Rideout
 cr. John Creyk, John Rever
 ch. William Style, John Champion

APPENDIX I: Lists of Office-holders

Introduction | Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders
Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration
Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics | Conclusion

Created: July 30, 1998

© Stephen Alford, 1998-2003

Medieval Sourcebook:

Æthelred Unrædy:

The Laws of London, 978

For so long as Ethelred ruled over England the standard for London in the matter of coinage was the standard for all his dominions. His regulations about counterfeiting were applied to all towns under his jurisdiction. The reduction in the number of mints had as its object a better coinage system through more careful supervision. But Ethelred was a weak king and doubtless he did not enforce his laws.

C.5. Also they said that it did not appear to concern them that there was trade between coiners of false money and merchants who take good money to the coiners and buy from them so that they use impure and light coins, and then they furbish their goods and bargain and sell them to those who make coins secretly for money and they cut the name of other money on it and not of the impure. Wherefore it seems to all wise people that there should be three men of upright character. And if any of them be accused, be he English or foreigner, let him be put to the ordeal. And they decreed, that the coiners should lose their hand, and it should be placed above the money-smithy. And the coiners who work in the woods, or who make similar things anywhere, are guilty of their lives, unless the king wishes to have mercy on them.

C.6. And we command, in order that no one shall speak ill of pure money of correct weight, that it shall be struck only in whatever port it may be struck in my kingdom, upon pain of my displeasure.

C.7. And concerning merchants who bring false or chipped money to our port, we have said that they shall defend themselves if they are able; if they cannot, let them incur the penalty of their wer or of their life just as the king wishes; or, as we have said, let them prove themselves innocent in this ordeal that they knew there was nothing wrong with the money itself with which they carried on their business; and afterwards let him suffer the loss due to his carelessness, so that he exchange it with the decreed moneyers for money pure and of correct weight. And let the port-reeves who were cognizant of this offense be guilty of the same blame as the false moneyers, unless the king pardon them or they are able to exculpate themselves by the same cyrsth, or said ordeal.

C.8. And the king advises and commands his bishops, earls, and aldermen and all the reeves that they take care to see to those who make false money and transport it through the country, just as it has been ordered both among the Danes and English.

C.9. And let the moneyers be fewer than they were before; in every important port three, and in every other port let there be one moneyer; and let them have co-workers in their operations; let them make the money pure and of correct weight throughout the same witan as we have said before. And they who guard the ports shall take care upon pain of my displeasure that each coin conform to the standard at which my money is received and let each of these be stamped so that fifteen orae make one pound. And let all guard the money just as I have commanded and as we have chosen all to do.

Source.

From: Benjamin Thorpe, ed., Ancient Laws and Institutes of England, (London: Eyre & Spottiswoode, 1840), pp. 300-303; reprinted in Roy C. Cave & Herbert H. Coulson, eds., A Source Book for Medieval Economic History, (Milwaukee: The Bruce Publishing Co., 1936; reprint ed., New York: Biblo & Tannen, 1965), pp. 137-138.

Scanned by Jerome S. Arkenberg, Cal. State Fullerton. The text has been modernized by Prof. Arkenberg.

This text is part of the Internet Medieval Source Book. The Sourcebook is a collection of public domain and copy-permitted texts related to medieval and Byzantine history.

Unless otherwise indicated the specific electronic form of the document is copyright. Permission is granted for electronic copying, distribution in print form for educational purposes and personal use. If you do reduplicate the document, indicate the source. No permission is granted for commercial use.

© Paul Halsall, October 1998
halsall@murray.fordham.edu

History of medieval Ipswich

[MAIN MENU]

APPENDIX 2: Calendar of usages and customs of Ipswich, capitula 57-83

cap. 57
butchers who bring skinned carcasses

Much evil handiwork has often been done in the countryside through theft of livestock, and the carcasses have been sold in the town by butchers, thus giving the town a bad reputation in the countryside. Therefore it is ordained that no butcher henceforth bring into the town to sell any carcasses of beef, veal, or mutton, unless he bring the skins and hides with the carcasses, so that any man seeking his stolen animals might be able to identify them through the skins and hides. If any butcher does otherwise, the carcasses found without skins or hides shall be confiscated to assist with [the revenues needed for] the king's farm of the town, for it looks very suspicious when butchers will not bring the skins along with the carcasses. This is not to prevent the butchers from selling the skins or hides when they have the opportunity, but they should not be removed from public view in the market before the hour of prime, and then under supervision of the wardens of the market. If any outsider butcher of good repute is found committing this fault, but defends that he was ignorant of this custom of the town and [did not hear] its declaration, the bailiffs may give him the benefit of the doubt the first time. But if he is found committing the fault a second time, he is to be punished as already indicated. The bailiffs shall have this ordinance announced publicly in the meat market each year at Michaelmas, so that it can be obeyed.

cap. 58
butchers who sell spoiled meat

All butchers, both residents and outsiders, should also take care not to display for sale the meat of diseased animals, or that is rotten or smells bad. Any such meat shall be confiscated on the first occasion; on the second occasion the meat shall be confiscated and its seller sent to the pillory. On the third occasion for the offender, the meat shall be confiscated and the seller shall give up his occupation in the town for a year and a day. If anyone insists on selling such bad meat in the town, let him stand under the pillory with a table in front of him from which audaciously to sell the meat, such as it is, to anyone who will buy it, without interference from the bailiffs or punishment.

cap. 59
cooks who keep victuals too long

Let the cooks of the town be warned that none of them keep or store beyond a reasonable time victuals that they intend to sell to the public. Nor is any of them to sell to resident or outsider victuals that are rotten or unsuitable for consumption. Any convicted thereof shall be punished for the first offence by [confiscation of] his chattels, and for the second offence shall be sent to the pillory; on the third offence he shall give up his occupation for a year and a day, so that neither he nor any of his [household] pursue the occupation in the town, on pain of confiscation of all his chattels used to pursue the occupation from his house, or in any other's possession for his profit. If anyone pursuing that occupation has nothing [by way of chattels] by which he can be punished, he is to be punished by the pillory; and after suffering the pillory twice, he shall give up his occupation for a year and a day, without prospect of reprieve. And if he is yet again convicted, he must give up the occupation forever.

Notes: the occupation" here referred to was the retailing of cooked foods; cooks were the medieval equivalent of today's fast-food vendors, usually operating from their houses or booths in the marketplace. In this and other chapters I substitute "occupation" for "craft" (English version) and "mester" (French version), the latter (also known as "mystery") from the term for trade or craft.

cap. 60
hosting of outsider merchants

It is ordained by common counsel of the town that no resident, except one who is a burgess, denizen, peer and member of the community, act as host of outsider merchants who come to the town by water to sell merchandise there. Hosts are to provide advice to these merchants on when and to whom they can sell their goods; each host may have a quarter of this merchandise – and no more – at the market price of the goods; the other three-quarters may be sold to other good townsmen. If the hosts sell the merchants' goods by their own hand, they are to be answerable to the merchants for the full amount of the selling price. Even if the merchants sell their own goods, without taking advice from their hosts, the latter may still have a quarter of the merchandise. However, in the case of vintners (no matter what country they are from) who sell their wines out of the cellar, or woad-merchants who stay in town and sell their woad in taverns or outside a storehouse, their hosts may not claim any part of their merchandise on grounds of hosting.

cap. 61

*burgess suing burgess
contrary to the franchise*

Royal charters have given the town of Ipswich the freedom from any burgess of the town being impleaded outside of the town in any plea, assize, or suit related to any land or tenure within the borough or its suburbs, nor [related to] trespass or contracts made within the town or its franchise. Since each burgess is bound by his oath to uphold the charters and freedoms of the town, in all locations and in all points to the best of his ability, it is ordained by common counsel and unanimous agreement of the town that no burgess of the town, whether resident or outsider, shall from this time forth implead another in any place outside the town, whether by writ or without writ, contrary to the terms of the charters or prejudicial against the franchise – that is, concerning matters than can legally be dealt with in the town [court]. If anyone does so, he is to be warned by the bailiffs and two burgesses that, at risk of being disfranchised, he must not pursue the plea to the damage or prejudice of the franchise, but should seek his rights in Ipswich according to its laws and customs. If, after the warning, he [continues to] pursue his plea, contrary to the town franchise, then he is to be summoned by the bailiffs and two burgesses to appear before the portmensmoot on a specified day, to receive judgement for having proceeded contrary to the franchise, the warning, the prohibition of the bailiffs, and his own oath. On which day, whether he come or not (if witness is given to the fact that he was summonsed), then the bailiffs and good men [i.e. the portmen] of the town in full court shall strip him of his franchise, so that he be considered an outsider [henceforth]. Let the franchise not be restored to him unless he pays a new fine to the community to have it, for the costs and expenses that the community shall have incurred to challenge [the external court's jurisdiction in] the plea.

cap. 62

challenging allowance of the franchise

In the same way, a burgess shall be disfranchised if he counterplead or has another plead against allowance of the franchise in any place, contrary to the terms of the charter and his oath. He shall not be restored to the franchise except under the conditions mentioned above. However, if any burgess of the town, resident or foreign, can clearly prove that the town court has previously failed to give him justice or that his adversary cannot be brought to answer in the town court, in such cases may he sue an action elsewhere than in Ipswich without risk of disfranchisement.

cap. 63
*no foreign merchant
to be a burgess*

It is ordained by the whole community that no foreign merchant may be accorded the status of a burgess of the town unless he has inherited a tenement there, by which he can be distrainable and made to answer to justice, if necessary. If anyone who is made a burgess disposes of his real estate in the town and moves his chattels out of town, and is no longer at lot and scot, nor contributing to taxes on the town as a burgess ought, then the bailiffs, coroners and good men of the town are to revoke his franchise. If someone who has thus withdrawn from the town is discovered selling merchandise in the town afterwards, toll is to be charged on the merchandise as with any outsider. This ordinance does not mean that there may not be accepted as burgesses knights and country gentlemen, whose association may benefit the town; but these men shall only have the franchise granted them for life.

Notes: that is, the sons of non-resident gentry could not become freemen of Ipswich by heredity; these foreign burgesses purchased freeman's status to obtain the rights to buy and sell in town without paying toll, but were not expected to be at scot and lot.

cap. 64
selling a pledge

If someone of the town borrows money or goods from someone else of the town, handing over personal property as pledge for repayment on a certain day, but the debtor allows the due date to pass without repaying the debt, the creditor may bring the pledged items before the bailiffs in court and, informing them of the circumstances of the failure to acquit the debt, may request the court's decision as to what he should do with the pledge. The bailiffs shall then warn the debtor to appear at a specified date to redeem his pledge [by repaying the debt]; if he comes and does so, then he shall have the pledge delivered to him without damages judged against him. If he fails to come, or comes and does not repay the debt although unable to deny the due date for repayment is passed, then the pledged items may be given to the debtor to do with what he will. This is to be as valid for items of gold, silver vessels or jewellery, armour, or brass, as for any other type of chattel.

cap. 65
disclosure of private counsel of the town

If any burgess discloses the counsel of the town, or with malicious intent impleads the liberties and status of the town, so that the town is damaged and its liberties impaired, that burgess is to be summoned to come before the bailiffs, coroners and community on a specified day to answer. When he comes and is, through due process of law, convicted of the trespass, he is to be disfranchised, in the manner previously mentioned.

cap. 66
*burgess
pretending to another's chattels*

If a burgess has any chattels of an outsider merchant among his own chattels and falsely claims the outsider's chattels to be his own, so as to avoid [paying] the king's customs, to the loss [of the town] and the profit of the outsider, the burgess convicted before the bailiffs of that falsehood shall be disfranchised. Thereafter he shall be considered as if an outsider and, if he conducts commerce, he shall pay customs (like any outsider), until he may be restored to the good graces of the community and pay a new fine [to regain the franchise].

cap. 67
taking merchandise away by water

It is the custom in Ipswich concerning goods and merchandise brought to the town by water that, from the time they are unloaded and laid out on dry land for sale, or [the time that] the merchants have sold any part of their goods – as men say in English, "broken bulk" – that these goods may not be removed towards the sea without permission of the bailiffs and good men of the town. The merchants should not be forced by the bailiffs or anyone else of the town to sell their goods in the town, against their wishes; however, if their wish is to take their goods elsewhere in the region to sell, that does not exempt them from paying customs to the town. If they do not intend to send their goods upriver into the region, but remain in the town for 8 days and yet are unable to sell their merchandise within that time [at a] suitable [profit], in that case the merchants may seek permission from the bailiffs and good men to take their goods elsewhere by water, where they can hope to make a better profit; permission is to be granted, but they must pay to the town the correct export customs just as they did for importing [the goods].

Notes: this seems somewhat punitive, and was perhaps intended to encourage merchants to lower their prices, if they were unable to get enough sales at the prices initially sought; Twiss notes that the king's regulations were that customs duty was payable only on those goods actually sold.

cap. 68
time for selling merchandise at the quay

Merchandise that is brought by water to the town is not to be bought or sold between sunset and sunrise, except fresh herring in the herring season, viz. between Michaelmas [29 September] and St. Clement's day [23 November] – and then only by burgesses, not by outsiders. If anyone is convicted of selling outside this time, his merchandise is to be confiscated and he is to be amerced 40d. for the first offence, half a mark [80d.] for the second offence, and the penalty doubled for each successive offence. And when the one committed of this trespass has his merchandise confiscated, it is to be taken to two good men of the town to sell for the common profit of the town.

Notes: the royal charter granted to the town in 1256 included a clause prohibiting middlemen (brokers) in the sale of fish or other merchandise brought by water; commerce was to be conducted by those merchants who brought the goods.

cap. 69
selling shellfish

Concerning oysters and mussels brought by boat to the town quay, for selling, it is ordained for common benefit (of poor men as well of rich men) that such shellfish by sold by the same men who brought them. No one in the town is to meddle with such merchandise contrary to this ordinance, upon pain of its confiscation and 40d. amercement.

Notes: the term "meddle" is used by the custumal in a context that reflects etymological associations: the prohibition of middlemen in the retail of shellfish.

cap. 70
age in the town

All those, male or female, who hold lands or tenements in the town, know how to measure and to count, and have reached the age of 14 years, [are old enough] to give, sell or lease those lands or tenements, or to quitclaim in perpetuity their rights therein, as if they had the age of majority (21 years). If anyone of younger age gives or in any way alienates his property or quitclaims right in it, this is neither bar nor prejudicial to him seeking and recovering right therein (according to legal usage in the town) whenever he chooses after having reached the age of 14, without regard to any legal document he may have made when underage.

Notes: the ability to measure and to count were trials of the age of majority in many towns, being fundamental skills for pursuing any livelihood related to commerce.

cap. 71
menace

If anyone threatens the life or limb of another, or [threatens] to give him a beating or burn down his house, and the individual threatened can prove the threats before bailiffs and coroners, by [witness of] two sworn men, then the menacing party is to be attached by mainprise to come on a specified day before the bailiffs and coroners to assure them he will keep the peace in this matter and to provide sufficient surety through 4 pledges that no harm or damage will come to the complainant by his actions or procurement. If he is unable or unwilling to find mainprise for coming to court or, if he comes but cannot or will not find sureties for keeping the peace, then he is to be committed to prison until he finds such sureties.

cap. 72
drawing weapons in presence of bailiffs

If anyone with malicious intent draws a sword, knife or other weapon, or wounds, strikes a blow to, or assaults another against the peace in the presence of one of the chief bailiffs, for this trespass and contempt [of authority], let him be committed to prison for 40 days, or until he can find mainprise to make amends according to the judgement of the bailiffs, coroners and good men..

cap. 73
procedure in a case of slander

If anyone falsely or maliciously slanders another in the public marketplace or [elsewhere] openly in public, [with accusation] of theft, robbery, treason, deceit, or other wrongdoing, so that [the one accused] suffers anguish or is harmed or dishonoured, the latter may sue for slander by gage and pledge. In such cases of open slander, the slandered is not to be allowed to defend himself by his law; instead an inquest is to enquire whether the slander took place or not. If the slanderer is found guilty, he is to pay damages assessed by the inquest or the court according to the gravity of his slanders and to the identity of the one slandered. If the guilty party is unable to pay the damages or find pledges, then his is to be imprisoned for a period (determined by the bailiffs and good men) according to the gravity of the slanders.

cap. 74
scolds

Women who are notorious scolds making strife among their neighbours, and unable to curb their wicked tongues, are to be punished by the tumbrel called the "thewe" unless they can make compensation (if they have the means).

Notes: Twiss identifies the "thewe" as a species of pillory, or possibly a cucking-stool; however, from the context and a possible etymological association with teuda (a protective cover) it might also be a scold's bridle.

cap. 75
the 12 sworn men of the town

By common agreement of the town it is ordained that there shall always be 12 sworn men, [chosen] from the wisest and most loyal townsmen, to govern and to maintain the laws and correct customs of the town, to render good and honest judgements on behalf of the community, and to do and ordain whatever is needed for the benefit of the town and justice to the community, as much as to poor as to rich. And because these 12 sworn men are tasked with greater responsibility and effort for the welfare and honour of the town than are other townsmen, the community has granted to them and their heirs and successors to hold in common the meadow called Odenholm, for sustenance of their horses. If one of the 12 sworn men should die, or be disobedient or negligent in regard to his oath, then the [remaining] 11 sworn men have full power in their duty to the town to elect someone suitable to replace the deceased, or to remove the disobedient or negligent person from office and choose a suitable replacement.

Notes: care was taken to record in one of the Domesday copies (Add.Ms. 25012) an account of the election of portmen in 1309; the account, parts of whose terminology is somewhat similar to parts of cap.75, refers to the portmen being given Odenholm meadow for life and to the filling of vacancies in portmen ranks through election by the remaining members. It is difficult to say whether this account simply reflects the terms of the custumal (and the account of the 1200 proceedings, or whether those documents were reshaped to reflect a constitutional change in 1309, occurring under atypical political circumstances.

cap. 76
negligence of sub-bailiffs

If the execution of [orders of] the town courts suffer delays because of the sergeants-at-mace, the negligent sergeant shall answer to the party who has suffered from the delay, if he wishes to bring an action. Whether so or not, the sergeant shall have his mace confiscated for 40 days for the first offence. For the second offence, it shall be confiscated for three months and he shall pay the plaintiff any damages awarded by inquest or the court. At the third offence he shall lose the mace and be permanently removed from office.

Notes: the English version talks of "subbailles beryng masys", more commonly known as "sergeants-at-mace"; the French version uses the title "subbaliffs portaunts verges" – a "verge" was a rod or staff of office, perhaps in practice no different from what the town later considered a mace.

cap. 77
sub-bailiffs spreading discord

If any of the sub-bailiffs is convicted of spreading slanders or lies among the good folk of the town, so that discord and bad feelings arise within the community, he is to be suspended from office permanently. He is to be similarly deposed if he discloses the private matters of the coroners or his superiors.

cap. 78
common clerk

If the common clerk of the town creates a false record, to deceive the court or the party [to an action], then he is to be committed to prison and for the first offence suspended from office for half a year. For the second offence he is to be removed from office permanently.

Notes: this is not a common type of provision within a borough custumal; it is tempting to see in it a response to the circumstances which led common clerk John le Blake to abscond with the original Domesday custumal and other records in 1272.

cap. 79
process in plea of debt between burgesses

If a plea of debt of greater than 16½d. and involving two burgesses of the town is brought before the bailiffs and the defendant denies the debt and intends to defend himself by waging his law, he must bring into court on that day 10 men. They shall be separated into two equal groups of five, and a knife with a point shall be thrown between the groups; that group in whose direction the haft of the knife lies is to sent away without doing anything. The group towards which the point of the knife lies shall remain with the defendant, except that one shall be removed and the other four shall make oath with the defendant. If the debt is 16½d. or less, the defendant need only do his law with two others. Let it be known that this custom applies only [to actions] between resident burgesses, who are called peers and commoners, and not [actions] involving a foreign burgess. If a foreign burgess impleads a resident burgess of debt, regardless of the amount of the debt, then either is to be at his law. If the plea is of such a kind to allow the parties to wage their law, then [the defendant] may be allowed to do his law with two supporters. The requirement for bringing 10 men for waging of law, as mentioned, cannot be used in any plea except for that of unpaid debt.

cap. 80

bakers who break the assize

No baker is to make wastel, simnel nor the first cocket except using a bolter from Rennes; nor the second cocket except with a bolter of "beuquer"; nor whole wheat bread except with good clean wheat. Nor is any baker to mix bran into breads made of corn. Any baker making "fynget" bread must make it according to the assize and sell it for what it is. If he uses any other bolter for wastel, simnel or first or second cocket than those specified, at the first offence the bolter is to be burned beside the pillory; for the second offence, the bolter is to be burned and the baker amerced; for the third offence, the bolter is to be burned and the baker put in the pillory; at the fourth offence, the bolter is to be burned and the baker to give up his occupation for a year and a day. If any baker is convicted of mixing bran into corn breads, he is to receive the same punishment as for breaking the assize of bread. When a baker breaks the assize, for the first, second and third offences he is to be amerced according to the enormity of the trespass; at the fourth offence he is to be put in the pillory; at the fifth, he is to give up his occupation for a year and a day. Every baker is to keep to his craft specialization; that is, some make wastel, first cocket and treet only; some simnel and treet; and some whole wheat and corn breads. If any baker use any other craft, he is to be amerced 12d. for the first offence, 2s. for the second, 4s. for the third, or else (if he lacks the means to pay) to give up his occupation for half a year, yet still be punished for breaking the assize of bread (if he is found guilty thereof).

Notes: there were about a dozen varieties of bread made in late medieval England, although the Assize of Bread concerned itself principally with three: simnel, the highest quality, used at Lent; wastel, a good quality white bread; and cocket, the lowest quality of the three, with first or small cocket better quality than second or large cocket. According to the English version of the customal, "fynget" was also a white bread; Alan Ross ("The Assize of Bread", Economic History Review, 2nd ser., vol.9, 1956) speculates it may have been a milk bread called pain fraunceis. Treet bread was a coarse brown bread. This chapter points to some of the persistent abuses made by bakers, focusing on quality of materials, as opposed to fair weights and prices – although the mixing of bran with corn would have been to increase the weight of a bread (prescribed by the Assize) by using cheaper ingredients and thus increasing the profit margin. A bolter was a cloth or sieve used for sifting flour and Rennes was known for its manufacture of good quality linen; I do not know what "beuquer" is (Twiss hypothesised it might refer to Beaucaire, in France).

cap. 81
brewers

Concerning brewsters, it is ordained that in the month of Michaelmas, when men may have good malt from new barley, that the bailiffs have made, throughout the town, announcement of the assize of ale by which the sale of corn shall be [governed?]. If anyone is discovered selling or brewing contrary to the announced terms of the assize, he is to be punished by bailiffs and court for trespass according to the terms of the Statute of Merchants of the king and according to the law and custom of the realm.

Notes: despite the use of the masculine as the subject of the verbs in this chapter, brewing was principally an activity of women (Margery Kempe of Lynn is one of the best-known examples), and the chapter uses "brewer" in its feminine form braceresses. The Statute of Merchants dates to 1285.

cap. 82
condemning bad wine

Each year, in the season between the old wines and the new, the bailiffs shall, accompanied by the best qualified persons of the town, make a search of all taverns and cellars in the town, both of residents and outsiders. Relying on the oath of good and honest men – taverners and others – and on their own judgement, they shall taste-test all the wines that they find in these places. If they discover any wine that has gone bad and would be unfit to drink or to mix in with new wine, without showing favour to any individual they shall take the wine into the high street and in public view condemn it; the tun, pipe or other vessel shall be smashed and be given to the bailiffs for their fee.

cap. 83
testing of the town measures

No one in the town may buy or sell corn, wine, ale, or other liquor by any measure – not by ell nor by weight – unless it is approved according to the town standards and sealed with the town seal; that is, those measures that can and ought to be marked with the seal. If anyone in the town is convicted of using another [non-approved] measure or weight, he is to be heavily amerced. At any time they wish, the bailiffs may take any measures, ells and weights used in the town and test and assess which are good and accurate, so that no fraud can be committed by such measures, to the damage of the town's good name or to the harm of the people.

cap. 22-56

custumal contents

cap. 84-101

History of medieval Ipswich

[MAIN MENU]

APPENDIX 2:

Calendar of usages and customs of Ipswich, capitula 84-101

cap. 84

Recently, viz. on Thursday following the festival of the Nativity of St. John the Baptist in the second year of the reign of King John [29 June 1200], it was ordained by common counsel of the town of Ipswich that from henceforth there might be in the borough of Ipswich 12 sworn Capital Portmen, such as there are in other free boroughs of England. And that they should have full power on behalf of themselves and the whole town to govern and maintain the borough and all its liberties, and to render judgements of the town; and also to take care of, ordain and do in the borough whatever might need to be done to maintain the status and reputation of the town. Now, viz. on Thursday following the festival of St. Luke the Evangelist in the eighth year of the reign of King Henry VI [20 October 1429], it is ordained, established and agreed by William Debenham and Robert Drye, bailiffs and portmen of the town, and by James Andrew, William Whethereld, John Deken, John Joye, John Wode, Robert Bikleswade, John Knepping, John Caldwell, Robert Wode and Thomas Denys the other portmen of the town, that if a foreigner or outsider is arrested in a plea of debt, detention of chattels, charters, writings or other records, transgression, or any other contract, [then] the one arrested must – before being released from custody of the bailiffs or sergeants – find two freemen of the borough of Ipswich as pledges for him answering the plaintiff at the next court in his own person. If he defaults [in appearance] at the next court session, or at any session before which the action is brought forward, he risks conviction and being obliged to satisfy the plaintiff. The bailiffs shall have the power, at the petition or request of the plaintiff, to execute the judgement on the goods and chattels of the convicted party or his pledges at the court session next following the conviction. If the plaintiff demands or seeks execution against the convicted party, it is granted and agreed that he shall have it against the convicted party or his pledges. The pledges will be informed of the date of the next court session, so that they might have the convicted party present to satisfy the plaintiff. If they do not have him at the next court, then execution is to be made on the goods and chattels of the pledges by the valuation of trustworthy men of the town specially sworn to that duty and delivery of the same, or the price obtained for them, to the plaintiff.

cap. 85

Present or future bailiffs of the town shall not again be bailiffs for two years immediately following the end of their year in office.

cap. 86

During his term of office, no bailiff shall sell wine or ale from his house or a tavern, nor regrate victuals personally or by anyone else acting on his behalf, nor lease his tavern (for the sale of wine or ale) to anyone. Neither shall he use his property for a common hostelry or a stable for the horses of outsiders, nor sell horse-bread, hay or oats, during his term of office. If it is determined by six or more portmen, before his successor bailiffs in full court of Portmanmoot, that he has been in any way delinquent in these matters he will incur a fine of £10, levied to the use of the community. With the proviso that if anyone elected bailiff has in his tavern, on the day of the election, a tun or two pipes of wine, he may be allowed to sell them at a profit after Michaelmas.

Notes: Michaelmas was the day when the men who had been, earlier in the month (see cap.91), elected bailiffs for the coming year assumed office. It is not certain whether the concern of this ordinance is the potential for the use of official status for personal profit, or the dignity of office; the suggestion is, however, that most men of means who might be chosen bailiff were likely to operate a tavern as part of their business interests.

cap. 87

If any Portman shall refuse the clothing called "Portman's livery" assigned to him by the bailiffs, he shall be permanently removed from the status of portmanship.

cap. 88

The town chamberlains are to have a review of their account of receipts of all incoming revenues of the town each quarter; at the end of the year, viz. on the eve of Michaelmas, they shall present their final account, without concealing anything, before the bailiffs and others whom the bailiffs assign [to the task]. If it happen that the chamberlains are convicted of concealing anything [of the revenues] then they shall pay to the use of the community 4d. for every penny [concealed].

cap. 89

It is agreed that since there are 4 wards in the town there are henceforth to be 4 sergeants-at-mace and each of them is to be assigned by the bailiffs responsibility for a ward. Each is to levy and collect all fines, rents, farms and ameracements due from his ward and execute, diligently and without fraud or negligence, all [ballival] commands and instructions occurring in relation to his ward. The sergeants are to find sufficient surety for answering faithfully in full court for the payment of ameracements, fines, rents and farms, and for the execution of orders passed on to them month by month, under penalty of being removed from office.

Notes: this is based on an ordinance made in 1435, which was itself associated with a dispute over the election of sergeants.

This set of ordinances concludes with the following paragraph:

The named bailiffs, together with the other portmen and the burgesses of the town whose names follow, took a sacred oath upon the Gospel that each and every one of them whose name is recorded in this book of constitutions (in place of his seal) as testimony to and affirmation of the above matters, shall perpetually keep, preserve, and observe these afore-written constitutions, ordinances and agreements, without any contradiction, revocation or diminution. And thus there follow the names, viz. William Debenham and Robert Drye, bailiffs and portmen [followed by a long list of some 190 names; this list having been edited in later years, through additions and scoring out of some names while others were marked with crosses or dots or "mort", indicating that the individual had died.]

cap. 90

At the General Court held at Ipswich on Friday following the festival of St. David in the thirteenth year of King Edward IV [4 March 1474], before Benedict Caldwell and John Hasting then bailiffs, according to the custom of the town used and approved since time beyond memory and to the liberties and franchises of the burgesses granted by the kings of England and confirmed by the present king. [This was a typical header for a General Court session. The General Court Roll itself, however, gives a date a few days earlier for these ordinances.]

Before the bailiffs and Richard Felawe, Robert Wimbill, Roger Stannard, Edmund Winter, John Gosse, John Rever and other portmen there at the time, and in the presence of William Worsop esq., William Winter, William Wattis, John Champion, Thomas Winter, John Litill, Richard Melis, John Baldwin, Roger Merveyn, William Sewall, Thomas Drayll, Walter Hering, John Broun, Robert Wode, Thomas Skipper, John Kingmason, Nicholas Purchet and other burgesses of the town. In former times within Ipswich it was the custom for the government of the town and its inhabitants that the bailiffs, 12 portmen and 24 burgesses would make decisions through the holding of a Great Court, by which action often a great disturbance would come about through to ensure henceforward good and healthy government, it is ordained by common consent and assent of the bailiffs, portmen and burgesses that the bailiffs and the 12 portmen – or [at least] seven of them – have the power and authority to convene 14 of the 24 burgesses, which bailiffs, portmen and 14 burgesses have the power and authority to undertake and deal with each and every [matter] is perceived necessary to undertake for the benefit of the town; and for the enacting, condoning and making of taxes, laws, statutes, ordinances, provisions and constitutions which they shall consider necessary and proper.

Notes: the key point here seems to be the substitution of the principle of majority rule, or quorum, for the ancient preference for an appearance of unanimity.

cap. 91

All burgesses who are permanently resident, and no-one else, are (by ancient custom) free to participate in the elections of bailiffs and other officers of the town on the day of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin Mary [8 September] and in the elections of burgesses to the king's parliament when such parliaments shall be summoned.

cap. 92

If anyone should procure or bring any letters written or signed by any lord, knight or esquire, for the purpose of being made a burgess to the king's parliament for the town, or for having or exercising the office of common clerk, serjeant-at-mace, or collector of petty customs within the town, that person shall not be elected nor admitted to the office [sought], but shall be banned from those [offices] in perpetuity.

Notes: an ordinance to this effect, but not specifying any particular offices, was passed in 1455.

cap. 93

If a foreigner or outsider is arrested in a plea of debt, detention of chattels, charters, writings or other records, transgression, or any other personal plea, [then] the one arrested must – before being released from custody of the bailiffs or sergeants – find two freemen of the borough of Ipswich as pledges for him answering the plaintiff at the next court in his own person. If he does not appear in person at that court session, or the next one or the one after that, he is to be amerced at the discretion of the bailiffs. And if, at the court next following the third non-appearance, he again defaults in appearance and the plaintiff, after that default, makes (personally or by attorney) in the appropriate form a corporal oath on his accusation, the bailiffs may with reason and good conscience convict the defendant of the charge and [assess on him] the damages and costs of the action. If it is a plea of transgression in which the defendant is convicted, he may not put himself on the country in regard to the damages but must satisfy the plaintiff for the full amount.

Notes: it will be noted that this chapter begins with almost identical wording to that in chapter 84.

cap. 94

In the same way, if the arrested individual appears in person at any court, after the arrest has been made on him, and afterwards shall make his defence, then he shall be convicted and his pledges shall answer for the amercement.

Notes: the point of this chapter seems unclear, since it appears that the defendant was going to be convicted whether or not he appeared to answer the charge; it is also evident that "arrest" did not have the same meaning as it does today, in terms of confinement – perhaps the implication was that the defendant was not to leave town.

cap. 95

After judgement has been rendered in any action or plea, the bailiffs may make execution [of the judgement] by [writ of] fieri facias on the goods and chattels of the convicted party or his pledges, at the request of the plaintiff, whether by [writ of] elegit or [writ of] capias, in order to give satisfaction [to the plaintiff] at the next court session following the conviction.

cap. 96

If the plaintiff demands or seeks execution [of a judgement] against the convicted party or his pledges, this is to be granted. A day shall be assigned to the pledges to have the convicted party at the next court session to satisfy the plaintiff. If the pledges do not produce the convicted party, then execution may be made against them by [writ of] fieri facias, per elegit, or per capias to satisfy the option chosen by the plaintiff. With the proviso that if the pledges are unable to produce the convicted party because he is dead, then they are released from execution of the judgement of the court.

cap. 97

If the arrested party or his pledges, after the arrest but before the sergeants make return [of writ?], provide to the bailiffs or sergeants sufficient distraints, then the sergeant may make return based on those. Thereafter the bailiffs may prosecute the case according to town custom in the way and form as stated above.

cap. 98

If a foreigner or outsider is attached by goods or chattels to answer a plaintiff in one of the aforementioned pleas, but does not appear before the bailiffs at the first, second or third court session immediately following, he may be amerced at any of these courts at the discretion of the bailiffs. If, at the court next following the third non-appearance, he again defaults in appearance and the plaintiff after that default, makes (personally or by attorney) in the appropriate form a corporal oath on his accusation, the bailiffs may with reason and good conscience convict the defendant of the charge for which the said goods and chattels were attached, and [assess on him] the damages and costs of the action. If it is a plea of transgression in which the defendant is convicted, he may not put himself on the country in regard to the damages.

cap. 99

And let there be made execution on the goods or chattels to satisfy the plaintiff, after they are appraised by trustworthy men sworn to the task. The goods or chattels are to remain in the custody of the bailiffs for twenty days. If the attached party comes personally or by attorney within that time, he shall be allowed to answer by the country or by other manner according to the custom of the borough.

cap. 100

If the attached party is convicted by the country or by other manner or if, within the twenty days, he does not appear in person or by attorney to answer the plaintiff, then the appraised goods or chattels are to be delivered from the custody of the bailiffs to the plaintiff in execution of the amount due according to the judgement, in addition to the amount of the aforesaid amercement. And any residue shall be delivered to the attached party. If the plaintiff does not win his case against the attached party, the goods and chattels are to be restored to the attached party and the plaintiff shall be in mercy for false accusation.

cap. 101

If any resident of the town shall instigate or encourage any foreigner or outsider of whatever station, degree or status [in society] in maintaining or persisting in any [legal] dispute or settlement of a matter within the town, then if the instigator is a burgess he is to be deprive of burgess status forever. If he is a foreigner or outsider he is to pay a forfeit of 20s. (or more or less, depending on the circumstances of the case) to the king, levied on his goods, chattels, lands and tenements. If he has no property by which this can be effected, he is to be committed to the king's prison in the town, there to be kept without manucaption freeing him therefrom, until he is freed by the decision of bailiffs and portmen. The aggrieved party may recover damages against the one who made the instigation or encouragement concerning the legal action.

cap. 57-83

custumal contents

appendix 3

Created: August 29, 1998

© Stephen Alsford, 1998-2003

History of medieval Ipswich

[MAIN MENU]

APPENDIX 2:

Calendar of usages and customs of Ipswich, capitula 1-21

cap. 1
pleas

"Great pleas" shall be brought before the bailiffs in the portmensmoot every fortnight, on Thursdays; these include actions begun by writs of right, other actions begun by king's writ, and actions concerning free tenements (which do not require a writ to initiate them), excluding actions of fresh abatement and nuisance which are introduced by gage and pledge and require short adjournments and speedy remedy. Pleas of the crown should also be heard at these sessions, before bailiffs and coroners, except for cases of cutpurses and thieves caught redhanded or arrested upon complaint of a visiting outsider (as in the time of fair or market). Actions begun by gage and pledge, called "little pleas", that involve residents should be heard on two days each week, unless certain causes prevent the bailiffs from doing this, in which case the actions may be adjourned. Cases involving outsiders, called "piepowder", should be heard on a daily basis, unless plaintiff or defendant request an adjournment. Those at fair time should be brought before the bailiffs at any hour or morning or afternoon, and the same applies to cases of law marine (viz. involving outsider mariners and others needing to depart at the next tide) which are to be heard from tide to tide. In these actions, three essoins by reason of illness are allowed to parties. Similarly, in all other pleas, with or without writ, 3 essoins are allowed to either party, except in cases of fresh abatement or pleas of nuisance by gage and pledge.

| | |
|---|---|
| cap. 2 essoins for tenants | In actions where a group of tenants are impleaded together and one of them makes an essoin, this must be taken as an essoin for all; the group shall not be allowed more essoins (i.e. cumulative for the number of persons in the group) than an individual tenant pleading alone. |
| cap. 3 essoins for executors | In actions where multiple executors are impleaded for the debts of a deceased, each of them is allowed only one essoin before appearance and one after. |
| cap. 4 essoins of the king's service | In actions pending before the bailiffs, whether begun by writ or without writ, three essoins by reason of [the essoiner being busy in] service to the king are allowed. Neither plaintiff nor defendant may make such essoins, however, in actions tried by piepowder, in time of the fair, or by maritime law. Nor may such an essoin be allowed to a woman. If the essoin is made at a great pleas session in portmensmoot, the case shall be adjourned to the next session of portmensmoot. If made at a petty pleas session, the adjournment is to be the the next petty pleas session after a fortnight has elapsed. But if the individual on whose behalf the essoin is made fails, on the day to which the case is adjourned, to present proof of the reason for the essoin, it shall instead be considered a default [in appearance] and he shall be amerced 2s. It is advisable for plaintiffs to begin their pleading according to the type of action – whether the common law, the law merchant, or the law marine – since this will determine what essoins will be allowed. |
| cap. 5 writ of right | The process followed in writ of right is that when a man brings into court a writ of right against another concerning a borough tenement, the tenant is to be summoned at his tenement by two freemen to appear at the next portmensmoot to answer the complaint. If the defendant fails to appear, he is to be summoned again in the same way. And if he fails to appear on the second occasion, he is to be summoned a third time. If he fails to appear after three summonses, he is to be distrained [by goods] at the tenement in question, [to pressure him] to answer; and this shall likewise be repeated twice more. After this the tenant shall have [still the right to] 3 essoins, if he requests them. After which distrains and essoins, if the tenant continues to default in appearance, the tenement is to be taken into the king's hand, under view of lawful men living nearest, and the tenant again shall be summoned to answer at the next court session and to explain why he did not answer earlier summonses; and he shall be warned that if he fails to appear after a fortnight, he shall forfeit the tenement. When he comes to court ready to defend his right, and if the plaintiff press the issue of the default, then the tenant must deal with the summonses and distrains by waging his law; after which he may have 3 essoins if he need them. And if, by waging his law with 12 hands according to the custom of the town, he |

can deny [receiving] the summonses or the distrains, or deny that the first set of essoins were made by him or with his assent, then the plaintiff shall obtain nothing through his writ and will be amerced, and the case against the tenant dismissed. But if the defendant defaults after, or fails in, waging his law, the plaintiff shall recover possession of the tenement and the tenant be amerced. If any other comes before judgement is passed and shows that he has some title in the tenement, and that the defendant's default ought not to damage his rights, then he shall be allowed to defend those rights; this holds true for women covered under husbands as much as for anyone else. If the plaintiff waives the default of the defendant and wishes to continue the case, then the action between them is to proceed according to common law, with the tenant taking an oath before God and being supported by the oaths of 12 law-abiding and honest men, in the form of the grand assize, to determine whether he is in possession of the tenement or he who is seeking possession of it has the right to it. Town custom does not allow [trial by] battle in such matters.

The jury should be chosen in the following way. The bailiffs shall choose 4 good townsmen acceptable to both parties (if the parties cannot agree, the bailiffs have power to make the choice unilaterally); these 4 are to select 12 jurors of the most knowledgeable townsmen able to say the truth as to which party has most right to the tenement. The 4 choosers have until the next great court session to provide a list of jurors, whom the bailiffs will summon (by good summoners) to the great court session following that. If the choosers do not appear to name the jurors, they shall be summoned to the next great court session; if they again fail to appear on that day, they shall be amerced and ordered to find mainprise for their appearance at the following session. If they still fail to appear, the mainperners shall be amerced, and each chooser must find six mainperners for his appearance at the session following, and so on with mainperners being amerced until the choosers come. When they appear, the choosers shall be sworn to select jurors, and they shall submit to the court a list of at least 24 names, in case any are challenged by one of the parties to the action. The first four names acceptable to the parties shall serve on the jury.

If the tenant, after the first 3 essoins, comes to court and requests a viewing of the tenement, to obtain a vouch of warranty from someone whose tenements are foreign [i.e. outside the jurisdiction of the bailiffs – this being a foundation for transferring the case to the king's court], then the case will turn upon this.

The rest of this chapter, which is very long and convoluted, deals with procedure in this circumstance of the third party (of whom the tenant holds, or from whom the tenant had acquired, the property in dispute) to warrant the tenant's ownership. See the corresponding [Norwich custom.]

[Again this is a long chapter and I greatly shorten its tenor].

If any man dispossess another of a tenement which is subject to the jurisdiction of the town court, and if the dispossessed bring complaint of this before the court within 40 days, the bailiffs shall take the tenement into the king's hand (delivering it to the safekeeping of two of the neighbours) while the case is tried. The dispossessor shall be required to wage his law, in response to the plaintiff, on an assigned day. An assize shall be held involving 12 neighbours on that day, whether the dispossessor appears in court or not. If the dispossessor continues to hold on to the property, the bailiffs shall take it into the king's hand; if he cannot be removed without risk of violence, the bailiffs in view of one or more of the coroners and of other good townsmen shall nonetheless take it into the king's hand, regardless of whether the dispossessor is able to hold onto the property for more than 40 days. Anyone complaining of being dispossessed shall be advised by the bailiffs to initiate a plea before the court within 40 days of being dispossessed, or lose the right to bring a plea of fresh abatement. If the person dispossessed is, at time of dispossession, in prison, or of unsound mind, or overseas, then he must make a plea of fresh abatement within 40 days of being released, recovering his sanity, or returning to England. No essoins are allowed in this type of action, in order that speedy justice be done.

Cases of nuisance relating to borough tenements are to be conducted by gage and pledge [i.e. without requiring a writ], if the action is initiated within 40 days of the nuisance being done; but if he has not complained of the nuisance within 40 days, he requires the king's writ to bring the case before the court [with the same three exceptions as in cap.6]. The defendant is to be attached by a pledge to answer; if he refuses or goes off so that he cannot be found, a summons is to be made at the place where the nuisance was done that he is to answer the plea on a specified day. The case is to be tried by an inquest jury of 12 good and honest men of the neighbourhood, who shall view the tenement and the nuisance in question. If the jury finds that a nuisance has been committed, the court shall require the nuisance to cease and be redressed so that the neighbours can see it is so, and the plaintiff shall be awarded damages. If the defendant, after finding pledge or after being summonsed, defaults in appearance in court, the inquest shall proceed regardless and judgement rendered. If the parties will agree to resolve their dispute, before their neighbours and the bailiffs, without bringing it to court, so well and good. No essoins are permitted in such actions initiated by gage and pledge, but 3 essoins if initiated by writ.

cap. 6
fresh abatement

cap. 7
fresh nuisance

Notes: a "nuisance" in this context generally referred to an action of the defendant which had resulted in damage to, or trespass into, the property of the plaintiff.

cap. 8
waste

Tenants holding tenements in the town for a term of years, or for life, or women holding by dower right, shall not let the property fall to waste or into disrepair, but shall maintain it in as good a condition as they received it, for the benefit of whomever the tenement shall revert to after the death of the tenant. If this is not done, then the person who has the reversion may bring an action before the bailiffs, either by gage and pledge or by writ. The which action shall proceed thus: when the plaintiff initiates the plea, the accused is to be summoned (at the place wasted) by 2 law-abiding men to appear in court on a specified day to answer the charge; if the defendant fail to appear after three such summonses, then the bailiffs and one or two coroners together with a jury of 12 men shall go to the place wasted and assess the damage. Following this inquest, the accused shall be warned to appear on a specified day before the bailiffs to offer surety for compensating the plaintiff and remedying the waste done to the tenement, and no essoin shall be allowed from the defendant on that day. If he still fails to appear, the plaintiff shall be awarded seisin of the wasted property and damages, and the defendant shall be amerced for his trespass and defaults. If the tenant comes into court after the first three summonses and acknowledges the waste, or comes after the inquest and offers surety for redress, then that is acceptable. But if he cannot or will not offer surety, he shall lose the property and damages be awarded against him. The waste of the property is to be assessed before any surety is given, and the surety will answer for it if the wasted property is not restored to its proper state. If the property is not restored, the defendant is to be warned to appear before the bailiffs to show reason why they should not award damages and seisin of the property to the plaintiff. If the tenant comes to court and deny the waste, an inquest shall be held; if it finds that waste has occurred, the plaintiff shall be awarded damages and seisin. If the defendant restore the property, but then let it go to waste a second time, he shall lose the property. Plaintiff and defendant are allowed 3 essoins in actions of waste, prior to an inquest being held, but no essoins thereafter.

cap. 9
recognizance of free tenement

If a man sells property in the town which he holds in right of his wife, and does this with the consent of his wife, after seisin has been delivered to the purchaser the woman may come into court with her husband and acknowledge her agreement to the transaction. The woman must be examined alone by the bailiffs to determine whether she makes the acknowledgement of her free will. And if it is found that she consented to the sale without coercion or threats from her husband, then her recognizance is to be legally binding forever. The recognizance of husband and wife, together with the charter of sale may be registered in the common roll of the town and be solemnized in full court before the coroners and good people of the town. And the bailiffs shall deposit the [recognizance] roll of their year in office in the common hutch for safekeeping as if a treasure. Following the recognizance, neither the woman (after the death of her husband) nor her heirs may claim any right in alienated tenements. Such recognizances may apply not only to tenements that are the inheritance of a woman or are purchased by a woman, but also tenements purchased jointly by a husband and wife. However, no such recognizance can be taken in the cases of tenements that are given to a husband and wife under condition of entailment to their heirs, or of reversion or remainder to any third party, since this would prejudice the rights of those to whom the tenements should pass after the deaths of the man and his wife. If a recognizance is taken without realization by the court of the entailment or reversion of the tenement, then it shall not stand as an obstacle to legal claims on the property. The heir or party entitled to the reversion may seek from the court the voidance of the recognizance, if an inquest determines that the recognizance had no right to give seisin; therefore any purchaser of property who seeks to strengthen his possession through such a recognizance would be well advised to ensure the recognizance be legally valid.

Notes: the use of the portmanmoot to give official cognizance to land transactions by women is evidenced prior to 1200 (P.R.O. Ancient Deed A3904).

cap. 10
a house that abuts on another

If a house fall against its neighbour or by leaning against it do damage, the owner of the damaged house may recover his losses from the owner of the responsible house, through a plea of trespass; the losses shall be assessed by an inquest.

cap. 11
recognizances in cases of reversion

In cases where a tenement is held for term of the tenant's life, or for a set number of years, he to whom the tenement shall revert after that period shall present to the court the deed stating his right of reversion, and it shall be enrolled with other recognizances of free tenements. The tenant shall be summoned by the court, and shall find mainpernors for his coming, to identify his claim in the tenement, and no essoin shall be allowed for this. If he fails to appear on the appointed day, his mainpernours shall be amerced, and he distrained by his goods and chattels, wherever they may be found within the borough, until he come. And when he comes and acknowledges that his claim in the tenement is only for life or a period of years, then the court shall award judgment that the tenant holds of he who has the reversion. If the tenant refuses to find mainpernours, he shall be distrained by his goods and warned by 2 burgesses to appear before the bailiffs on a specified day, or risk forfeiting the goods that were seized. And the same process of distraint, warning, and forfeiture is to be repeated until he comes. However, no such legal process against a tenant may be initiated if he is in prison, of unsound mind, or overseas. By assent of the community, it is ordained that any forfeitures such as mentioned above be put to the common profit of the town (and delivered to persons who shall answer for them to the community) and not for the individual profit of the bailiffs.

cap. 12
*recognizance
of rent*

If there is a rent due from a tenement which is granted by a recognizance, then the tenant who ought to pay the rent shall be summoned to the great court following the making of the recognizance, to inform the bailiffs on what terms he holds the tenement. If he acknowledges he holds the tenement by a rent due to the maker of the recognizance, then he shall agree to pay the rent henceforth to the one to whom the recognizance was made. If he denies, then an inquest shall determine the matter; and if the tenant refuses to accept a finding that the tenant held the tenement of the maker of the recognizance, then he to whom the recognizance was made may initiate an action of distress to obtain the rent.

cap. 13
*fresh abatement of an enclosed
tenement*

If anyone in the town encloses his tenement, so that the landlord or any other to whom rents are due therefrom cannot make distraint for rents in arrears, the landlord may recover his rights through a plea of abatement, if this is initiated within 40 days of withholding of rent. If refusal to pay rent occurs a second time, the award of damages shall be doubled, and so on with each new complaint from the landlord.

cap. 14
*tenements
lying fresh*

If any tenant allows his tenement to "lie so fresh" that the landlord cannot make a reasonable distrain on the tenement for rent in arrears, and the rent is in arrears for four terms, and if the landlord proves in the town court that he ought to receive the rent and damages for its withholding, but the tenant refuses to comply, then the tenement is to be handed over to the landlord for a year and a day. If the tenant, within this period, comes to terms with the landlord he may have his tenement again; but if he does not come to terms, then the tenement shall remain in the hands of the landlord and his heirs indefinitely.

Notes: I am uncertain of the meaning of "lie fresh", but it may have something to do with a property being in a tumbledown condition such that there is nothing of value there for the landlord to seize.

cap. 15
fresh abatement against a tenant who counterpleads

If a landlord distrains on property whose rent is in arrears, but the tenant liberates the distraint through initiating a counterplea or by rescuing the distrained goods, the landlord may recover by bringing a plea of abatement before the bailiffs, if within 40 days after the distraint was liberated.

cap. 16
*bequeathable
tenements*

Those who own tenements and rents in the town through purchase may freely bequeath them on their death-beds. The last will of the testator, whether written or oral, is to be probated before the bailiffs within 40 days of the death of the testator through the witnessing of at least two men; if this proof is satisfactory, it shall be registered in the town rolls and administration of the will shall be granted to the executors, and seisin of the bequeathed properties delivered to the beneficiaries in front of the bailiffs. If the probate is not satisfactory, with variant evidence giving suspicion of fraud, the testament shall be considered invalid and the tenements shall go to the rightful heir. If the executors, through malice or collusion, refuse to prove the testament within 40 days and do not deliver seisin of the property to the party to whom bequeathed, then the latter may within the first 40 days come to court, lay claim to the property, and request the executors to be summonsed. The executors shall be summonsed (at their dwellings or, if they are not residents of the town, at the bequeathed tenements in their keeping) to submit the testament to probate or show why the claimant should not have the property. If the executors come and the testament is proved, the claimant shall have seisin of the property. If the executors do not appear, but the claimant can prove by inquest that the testator bequeathed him the tenement, it shall be delivered to him. If the executors themselves die before proving the testament, then their own executors shall be responsible for probate, or subject to the claimant's action just as the original executors.

cap. 17
*tenements
bequeathed to children*

If a tenement is bequeathed to any child not of the age of majority and the executors, through malice or collusion, refuse to prove the testament or to deliver seisin of the tenement to the child, then the closest friend of the child may assist the child to bring suit before the bailiffs to oblige the executors to come and prove the testament. If the child is kept out of the way by the executors or the testator's heir, in order to obstruct him from receiving what has been bequeathed him, then his closest friend may alone bring the suit.

cap. 18
tenements not bequeathable

If a tenement that ought not be bequeathed is bequeathed to someone other than the person who has rightful inheritance, reversion or remainder of the property, the rightful claimant may recover possession through plea of fresh abatement if it is within 40 days of probate and delivery of seisin to the legatee. But if the claimant allows the legatee to continue his possession of the tenement for more than 40 days, the claimant may not recover through plea of abatement, notwithstanding that the tenement was not bequeathable. If the claimant is abroad, ignorant of the bequest, in prison, or of unsound mind, he may have 40 days to initiate an action against the tenant, after returning to England, leaving prison or being restored to sound mind. Similarly a child who has not come of age must introduce an action by himself or through his closest friend within 40 days, or lose the right to seek recovery through plea of abatement; however, once he comes of age he may [seek recovery through] purchase [of] a king's writ.

cap. 19
*tenements
bequeathed to someone abroad*

If a tenement is bequeathed to any man while he is out of the country, once the testament is proved seisin may be delivered to some of the closest friends of the legatee, to hold on his behalf (without waste or destruction of the property) until his return; this delivery of seisin may be registered in the town rolls. Upon the legatee's return, seisin should be transferred to him without any obstruction from those who have safekeeping in his name. If the keeper (or his heirs) try to prevent the legatee's entry into the property, the bailiffs can consult the town records for the proof of the testament and may deliver seisin on that basis, unless the keeper can present evidence why the seisin ought not be delivered. If the keeper wastes the tenement, the legatee may sue for damages. If the keeper die and his heir holds the tenement upon the legatee's return, the latter may recover against him just as would have been against the original keeper. If the keeper or his heir disposes of the tenement to some third party, and the returning legatee has his claim to it rejected by the tenant, he may recover through plea of abatement, if initiated within 40 days after rejection of his claim. If the executors collude to refuse to prove the testament or to deliver seisin either to the legatee's closest friend or to the returning legatee, the latter may bring action (within 40 days of return) to have probate; after that period a king's writ is require to obtain seisin. Such actions shall not be prejudiced by the failure to prove the testament in the previous period. If an inquest restores the property to the claimant, he shall have double the amount of damages assessed by the inquest.

cap. 20

*rents
bequeathed*

If there is bequeathed a rent from a tenement, the legatee of the rent is to be put in seisin by the executors, if the tenant will acknowledge he owes the rent. If the tenant will not, the legatee may request the bailiffs to summon the tenant to court, to show under what terms he held the tenement and of what landlord on the day of the testator's death. If he states that he held it of the testator, owing to him the rent from the tenement, then the bailiffs shall award that the tenant now holds of the legatee and must pay the rent to him henceforth; no essoins are allowed the tenant in this action. If the tenant will not find mainpernors for his appearance, or finds them and still fails to appear (so that the mainpernors are amerced), then shall be implemented the same process to oblige him to come as in cap.11. If the tenant, when he comes to court, states that he did not hold the tenement of, nor owe the rent to, the testator, the legatee may disprove this by an inquest. If the tenant then still refuses to acknowledge that the rent is payable to the legatee, the latter may distrain the tenement for arrears. If, in cases of bequest of tenement or rent, a man witnessing the making of the testament refuses to come to court for its probate, then he shall be denied any bequest made him, while the legatee of tenement or rent may prove the bequest through an inquest of the nearest neighbours of the testator. But be it known that no woman who has a husband is allowed to bequeath any tenement in the town to the disinheritance of her heirs, not even though her husband consent to the bequest.

cap. 21

nurture

[Underage] female or male heirs shall be in the care of the closest friend (on the father's side or the mother's side) who is not in line of succession to the inheritance; this guardianship shall last until the heir is of full age according to the usage of the town, viz. 14 years old, and the guardian shall not allow the waste or destruction of the inheritance. When the heir is of age, the guardian (or his heirs) shall let him have the inheritance without obstruction. And account shall be made to the heir for all income from his inheritance during the period of guardianship, and of all moveable goods that may have come to the guardian along with the person of the heir, and any profits from such goods, with the exception of any reasonable allowance of costs that may be shown to have been spent on sustenance of the heir or maintenance of the heir's property. If the guardian allows waste or destruction [to the heir's property], he shall lose his claim to an allowance for costs in nurturing the heir, unless he provides surety that he will make good the damages and will maintain the inheritance, until the heir comes of age, in as good a state as he received it. In this circumstance, one of the closest friends of the heir shall be permitted to take the surety and, if the heir is too young to do so, bring an action for waste before the bailiffs on the heir's behalf. If the guardian loses the costs of nurturing the heir, for the cause mentioned, then guardianship is to be transferred to another of the closest friends of the heir. A guardian has no right to arrange the marriage of his ward, unless the child and his closest friend consent to it.

preface

custumal contents

cap. 22-56

History of medieval Ipswich

[MAIN MENU]

APPENDIX 2:

Calendar of usages and customs of Ipswich, capitula 22-56

cap. 22

processes by writ

In cases begun by what are called "sheriff's writs" – such as writs of debt, writs of wrongful detention, and writs of account – which are to be held before the bailiffs, after the sheriff has returned the writs, the following is the legal process. When the plaintiff initiates the action, the defendant named in the writ shall be summoned to answer at the next court of portmensmoot. If he fail to answer the summons, let this be duly noted and he shall be required to find a pledge for his appearance. If he still defaults, causing his pledge to be amerced, he shall be required to find 4 pledges to answer. If he again defaults, so that his pledges are amerced, he is to find 8 pledges, and so on. If the defendant is so resistant that he refuses to answer the complaint, he is to be distrained by all his goods and chattels, wherever found within the territorial jurisdiction of the bailiffs, until he comes to court. If, to obstruct the suit and delay the legal process, the defendant locks his goods and chattels inside his house or chamber, so that the bailiffs cannot get at them for purposes of distraint, then that house or chamber is to be blockaded so that neither the defendant nor anyone on his behalf can have access thereto, until he come to court. When the defendant comes to court, he and the plaintiff shall present their cases as best they may. The same process, involving distraints and blockade, may be used not only in pleas begun by writ, but also in pleas begun by gage and pledge.

cap. 23
assault and battery

In pleas concerning battery, wounding, breaking and entering, or other trespass against the peace, the legal process is as follows. If the defendant refuses to find pledges for his response to the charge, and if he has no chattels within the town [which may be distrained] to bring him to justice, and these facts are witnessed in court, then he is to be arrested and brought before the bailiffs to respond to the plaintiff. And if he is convicted, the plaintiff shall be awarded damages assessed by the court and the defendant committed to prison for the following terms:

- for malicious assault with sword, knife, staff or other weapon – 15 days;
- for battery committed during breaking and entering, if no blood is drawn – 15 days;
- for battery committed during breaking and entering, if blood is drawn – 20 days;
- for drawing blood through assault with foot or fist, or similar battery, the punishment is to be determined by how serious the beating, and whether the trespass is major or minor.

Imprisonment is the punishment to be applied to frequent offenders or incorrigible troublemakers. But if any trespass is done in the heat of the moment by one not frequently offending, instead of applying imprisonment the offender is to make amends for his crime according to recommendations of the court, beyond the assessed damages he must pay. If anyone is committed to prison by the court, but leaves it without permission of the gaoler, his sentence is to be doubled. If the gaoler, without the consent of his superiors, gives a prisoner permission to leave, in cases where the prisoner owes damages the gaoler will be held responsible for paying them, and he shall be punished for the permission he has unwarrantedly given.

cap. 24
trespass against bailiffs or coroners

It is ordained by common counsel of the community that if any townsman assaults a bailiff of the town with or without weapon, or gives him a blow or a wound, or draws his blood, or maliciously obstructs the performance of his duties, or disturbs the peace in the presence of a coroner or other good men of the town, so that the trespass can be proven by the witness of coroner or two or three honest men, or otherwise by inquest, the guilty man shall be committed to prison. He shall be securely kept there without prospect of bail until he has made full amends to the injured party, according to damages assessed by the coroners and good men of the town. He shall be seriously punished, for the sake of the community, for the harm done to its bailiffs; and before he is allowed out of prison, he must find mainpernors to answer to the king for his crime, when called upon to do so. If any townsman slanders a bailiff in court, or out of court if the bailiff is in performance of official duties, and is convicted of the same, he shall be sent to prison until he can find sufficient surety to make amends according to the determination of the coroners and good men of the town.

Notes: the French terms used for what is here translated as "good men" and "honest men" are "bones gentz" and "prodes hommes" – terms often used to designate the ruling class or even the town council; it may be the case in this chapter, which is concerned with the sacrosanctity of office, that an Ipswich councillor was accorded particular credibility and authority as a witness to a crime.

cap. 25
*trespass against
the sub-bailiffs*

Any man who assaults or gives a blow or wound to a sub-bailiff of the town, or who obstructs his performance of duties (notably arrest), is to be taken and committed to prison. Unless the offender make amends to the injured party, he shall be punished by the court, according to whether his trespass is major or minor.

cap. 26
forestalling

It is ordained that there be wardens assigned to the fish market to ensure that the regulations ordained for that market, for the common profit of the town and the surrounding region, be properly observed. Those regulations being, first that no regrater nor non-burgess make a bargain outside of the market (either in or out of town), nor forestall fish being brought to the town for sale. A first offender shall have his merchandise confiscated (to the use of the community) and shall compensate the individual from whom he bought it; failing this, he shall be punished for his trespass by imprisonment. If he has not the means to compensate the seller from whom he forestalled the merchandise, then the merchandise shall be returned to the seller and the offender shall remain in prison until he has compensated the community for the value of the forestalled items. For a second offense, the offender shall be put in the pillory, the forestalled fish confiscated, and the offender obliged to compensate the seller. For a third offence, the offender shall be obliged to give up his occupation for a year and a day, and the merchandise confiscated. The same ordinance applies to poultry.

Notes: The punishment for the third offence – giving up one's occupation (in the originals "mystery" or "craft" are the terms used) – would have deprived the offender of his regular livelihood. Regraters – or middlemen (whom we might think of today as retailers) – were not prohibited per se, so long as they did not forestall or undertake other business practices intended to push prices up.

| | |
|--|--|
| cap. 27 regraters who sell to other regraters | No regrater in the fish market may buy from another regrater in order to sell the goods in the market, so that the price of fish goes up. The punishments for which may be confiscation of the fish, imprisonment, the pillory, and the offender giving up his occupation for a year and a day. No regrater in the market may remove plaice, sole, flounder, eels or any other fish from the baskets in which they are brought to the market, in order to sell at the same market, against the will of the owner of the fish; since this is a trespass against the peace, offenders will be punished by imprisonment. |
| cap. 28 time ordained for regraters | No regrater of the fish market may buy fish there in order to sell it before the time established by the wardens, viz. half way to prime, upon pain of confiscation of the fish. Merchants from outside the town who are called pedlars may not begin to sell before the hour of prime; if these outsiders load up their fish they should do so in open market, not inside any house, and nowhere else, upon pain of confiscation of their merchandise. |
| cap. 29 fish cut | No porpoise, salmon, conger, or turbot is to be cut in any house nor in any other place except the communal place of the fish market. No such fish is to be stored privately overnight without showing it to the warden of the fish market, upon pain of its confiscation. |
| cap. 30 fish kept too long | The community forbids any regrater in the fish market from selling or displaying any kind of fish, scaled or unscaled, that is spoiled and unfit for human consumption, or that has been stored longer than appropriate. If anyone there is found with such fish, on the first occasion the fish will be confiscated and given to the poor; on the second occasion, the fish will be confiscated and the offender sent to the pillory; on the third occasion, the fish will be confiscated and the offender must give up his occupation for a year and a day. |
| cap. 31 mixing in bad corn | Upon pain of the same punishment, it is forbidden that any storer of corn, miller, or anyone else mix rotten corn in with good corn with the intent of selling it in Ipswich, to deceive townsfolk or outsiders. Notes: I have followed Twiss' hypothesis that cornstorer and miller are possible translations of corlenocher and pokyere respectively. |
| cap. 32 poulterers | Upon pain of the same punishment, it is forbidden that any poulterer sell or display for sale any fowl that is spoiled and unfit for human consumption. |

cap. 33
mercantile contracts

In any contract or covenant relating to merchandise, the legal process is as follows. If one party reneges on a contract or covenant, resulting in a plea being brought before the bailiffs, and the party defends by denying the contract or covenant, he is not to be believed if the plaintiff can prove the contract by the oath and examination of certain men who were present when the contract was made between the parties, or if he can prove the contract by inquest. Similarly, if a merchant sell his merchandise to another merchant with full payment to be made within the day, for which speedy payment of a debt no written record or tally is commonly made, and a plea arise between the two over the merchandise, then the purchaser is not to be allowed to wage his law until he has paid the seller every penny, so long as it can be proved (by inquest under the law merchant) that the goods were sold and delivered. The purchaser must also be given the chance to prove by inquest any claim that he owes nothing to the seller. The proof in either case must be through the examination of at least 2 sworn men. Also, if a man hands over his chattels to another, to hold in trust and return when requested, the keeper of the chattels is not to be allowed to wage his law while he withholds the chattels, so long as the plaintiff can prove the [defendant's] receipt of the chattels, by the witness of good, true and credible men, sworn and examined.

cap. 34
recovery of debts or damages

When the court has awarded recovery of a debt or damages, but he against whom the award is made refuses to make satisfaction, the plaintiff may request that the court authorize daily distrain on his goods and chattels, whether inside house or outside, wherever they can be found within the liberties of the town, until the plaintiff has [goods to] the value of the amount due him. If the individual distrained continues to refuse to pay what has been awarded against him within 40 days after being distrained, the bailiffs shall have the distrained items brought before them in court, and the individual shall be warned by two men to appear at the next court session to reclaim the distrained items and make satisfaction of the award against him. If he still will not come, or comes and refuses to make satisfaction, then the distrained objects are to be appraised in court by sworn men, and the individual is to be warned to appear at the next court session and make satisfaction. If at that session he does not appear, or does not make satisfaction to the plaintiff, then the taker is to give the distrained objects to the plaintiff to do with whatever he wishes. If the items distrained are more valuable than the amount of the award, the surplus is to be returned to the distrained individual. If less valuable, then the remainder is to be levied without delay from the chattels of the debtor, and the sub-bailiff who was ordered to make the original distrain is to be reprimanded by his superiors for not having distrained sufficient goods, unless he has the excuse that he could not find other goods on which to distrain. The appraisers of distrained goods are to be warned not to collude in appraising goods at a higher value than they are worth; if they do so, they shall be obliged to buy the goods at the price they have set. This process applies to residents of the town and the neighbouring countryside. If the plaintiffs are outsiders, such as merchants from foreign lands, or others from distant countries, or mariners coming to the town to sell goods or merchandise, or outsiders passing through at time of fair or market, then more rigorous and speedy efforts must be applied to the debts or damages awarded them (since they do not have 40 days to wait for distraint). If anyone delays rightful execution in the aforesaid situations, by locking up his goods within a house, so that the bailiffs cannot get at the goods for purpose of distraint, then the house or chamber, with all the goods therein, is to be blockaded until satisfaction is made. If anyone is convicted of breaking the blockade and carries off any of the goods, without permission of at least one of the chief bailiffs, he shall be arrested and held in prison until the purloined chattels are returned or he makes satisfaction for the award to the plaintiff – and even then he shall be punished for his trespass. When the chattels are brought back, the bailiffs shall levy from them the debt or award.

cap. 35
increase of damages

In any plea of land where damages are assessed by inquest, if the members of the jury (by favouritism or ignorance) assess the damages too low, then the bailiffs and the court have the discretion to increase them.

cap. 36
*failure to pay
for goods bought from strangers*

Some men without means or of bad faith who make themselves out to be merchants in the town, through envy, covetousnes or lack of good advice, have made bargains and bought merchandise from merchants or other outsiders coming to the town, but illegally and faithlessly (to the loss of the reputations of the town and good men living there) have delayed paying for the merchandise. Consequently, the outsider merchants have often avoided coming to the town again, to the damage of the town and countryside. Conscious of the wickedness and folly or such foolish purchasers and of the desirability for the honour and profit of the town to redress this defect, the good men of the town have unanimously ordained that no one residing in the town be involved in buying goods or merchandise from any foreigner or other outsider coming to the town by land or water, unless he pay the merchant on the date they agree. If anyone delays in payment, the bailiffs, as soon as they hear of it, shall without hesitation and rigorously seize the goods and chattels of the deceiver and satisfy the merchant for payment, without waiting 40 days for the distraint addressed in cap.34. If the foolish purchaser is a burgess and has no chattels from which the bailiffs may raise the money he owes to the merchant, then he is to be disfranchised for a year and a day, so that he have none of the financial or commercial advantages that burgess status gives; and he shall not be restored to the franchise until he has found good and sufficient surety for compensating any townsman who suffers distraint, damage or grief as a consequence of him having falsely withheld what was due to the merchant. The bailiffs shall register the surety in the common roll of the town, so that every townsman damaged by the deceiving purchaser may recover [losses] against him and his surety. If the deceiving purchaser is a non-burgess resident and does not have sufficient [chattels] in the town to enable the merchant to be satisfied, then the purchaser shall be barred from conducting any commercial transaction in the town until he has paid the merchant what he owes him.

Notes: what seems to be referred to indirectly, regarding the ramifications of the deceiver's actions on his fellow burgesses, is a variant of withernam.

cap. 37
an end to wrangling

Regarding fish, herring, onions, garlic and other merchandise brought by water into the town to sell, often when it comes time to pay for a bargain [made earlier], dissension arises between sellers and complaining purchasers who allege that the merchandise is not as good quality as it appeared when first they viewed it or as the sellers assured when the sale was made. As a result, the purchasers too often renege on the contract they have made, and arguments take place. To prevent such arguments, the community ordains that when the owner of such merchandise brought to the town has made a sale, before the goods are removed, the contract of sale is to be declared before a bailiff and set down in writing, if the seller requests it; the agreement, the day when payment is due, and the surety offered for payment (if applicable) is to be entered on the roll of the bailiffs. The bailiff and 4 good and honest townsmen, who are knowledgable about that type of merchandise and are sworn to the duty, are then to view the merchandise. In this way, if the merchandise [at time of delivery] is not as it was first shown to the purchaser, then the payment or the merchandise shall be adjusted as necessary. The bailiffs are to warn [the 4 surveyors] when taking oath that they must not collude to commit fraud in cases where any surveyor has a share in the merchandise. And they shall advise outsider merchants, when they bring goods to the town, to take good and honest hosts; if the hosts become involved in selling the merchant's merchandise, they must turn over all the proceeds to the merchant, failing which the hosts shall be punished in the same way as defaulters in payment [cap.36]. If the merchant sells his own merchandise to an unreliable purchaser, without seeking advice from his host and without making recognizance [of the contract] before the bailiffs or without survey of the goods, then the merchant must suffer for his folly by recovering the money owed him from the unreliable purchaser as best he may.

Notes: the actual chapter title refers to "wolvard", which I have tentatively translated as "wrangling"; I cannot find the meaning of "wolvard" but, based on the context of the chapter, I suspect it is a metaphorical term conjuring images of a pack of foxes or wolves squabbling among themselves.

cap. 38
reasonable division

Tenements in the town can be divided among male heirs as well as among female heirs – excluding property gifted or otherwise bequeathed by the ancestor – whenever one of the parties requests his share. If the division of the inheritance is done by common agreement [among the heirs], then the eldest heir may have first choice of the part he wants; following which, each remaining heir shall choose a part in the order determined by [casting] lot. If any of the heirs through malice argue against and obstruct the division of the inheritance, then the heir who requested a division may recover his part by plea of gage and pledge, if he initiates it within 40 days of being denied his share (if not, he loses the opportunity to recover by that type of plea). Once the plaintiff has entered a plea, the bailiffs shall have the defendant summoned by two freemen to attend the next portmensmoot to answer the suit. If after three summonses he has not come, he may employ three essoins if he wishes. If after the summonses and essoins he comes to court and can offer no reason why the plaintiff should not have his share, or if he fails to come, the plaintiff shall be awarded his share of the inheritance with damages. The assessment of damages is to be delayed until the inheritance is divided, in case the defendant has caused the inheritance to go to waste – in which case, he shall be assigned the portion that has gone to waste. If the plaintiff's share is also wasted, the cost of the waste shall be included in the assessment of damages by 12 sworn men. Once the judgement has been awarded, the 12 sworn men shall make the division and the bailiffs shall deliver to the plaintiff his share. The defendant shall be warned to come to the next portmensmoot to hear the assessment of damages; whether he come or not, let the judgement be executed upon him. If the elder partner [in the inheritance] has countersued, he shall lose the right to choose first, and take his [choice of] share through lot, as the other partners.

cap. 39
denial of quitclaim or other writing

If there is a plea in the Ipswich court concerning tenements subject to the court's jurisdiction, and a charter of feoffment, quitclaim or other document is introduced against the plaintiff to quash the suit, but the plaintiff denies [the authenticity of] the document, the defendant may prove that it is genuine by inquest together with [examination of?] the witnesses named in the document (if they are residents of the town). The bailiffs may require, by the authority of the court, that the witnesses appear along with other good and honest men to test the authenticity of the document. However, if the witnesses are outsiders, so that the bailiffs cannot constrain them to appear before the court, neither the testing of the document nor the suit itself should be delayed, any more than if the witnesses were dead.

cap. 40
proof of tally without a seal

If there is a plea of debt between merchants, by law merchant, concerning a tally without a seal, [recording] a contract about merchandise, and the defendant denies the authenticity of the tally, the plaintiff may prove it by the law merchant. The proof is to be made by two men of good reputation, sworn and examined, who were present when the tally was made between the merchants, or when the debt recorded by the tally was acknowledged [in a recognisance] by the debtor. If the proof is acceptable, the plaintiff may recover the debt and damages. If the evidence given [by different witnesses] in the proof is found to be inconsistent, the tally is to be condemned as false. If however the debt by tally without seal is claimed without [recourse to] the law merchant, the defendant may be allowed to deny the tally be inquest or by his law [i.e. compurgation], whichever he prefers.

Notes: In a relatively illiterate society, the tally was a method of recording the amount of a debt; it was a stick of wood notched in a particular way, and in two parts which fit together: one part being held by the debtor and one by the creditor. Seals were similarly a feature of an illiterate society where many men could not even sign their names. Merchants had their own version of the heraldic crest, in the form of distinctive marks (similar to brands used on animals) that could be impressed into sealing wax; these marks, or a variant, might be handed down in a family from one generation to the next.

cap. 41
render of a sword

The son of a burgess who is his father's heir, after the death of his father, shall come into court within 40 days of the death (if he is in the country), and render to the bailiffs the sword on which his father swore to maintain the freedom of the town and to conceal the secrets of the town. If he does not, he is to be banned from every council of the town until he has complied. If there are several sons, the eldest brother shall render the sword, and the others shall give the same oath that the eldest does. It is not to be allowed that any son of a burgess sit down or remain at a common council of the town if he is not sworn to conceal the counsel and secrets of the town.

Notes: the oath of the father referred to was that required from a townsman when entering the franchise. The ceremony described was that of a freeman's son taking up the franchise by right of patrimony, without fee (other than the sword); a rare recorded case of this in 1314 indicates that the entrant could redeem the sword with a small cash contribution. The "council" refers to assemblies of citizens at which town business was discussed.

cap. 42
distress by one burgess on another

No burgess of the town shall by his own authority distrain on another whom he accuses of debt to him or trespass against him; he must initiate a legal action before the bailiffs.

cap. 43
distress by a burgess on an outsider

If an outsider owes a debt to a burgess and the day of payment passes, and the outsider, passing through the town, will not satisfy the creditor for his debt, the creditor has the right to arrest the debtor's chattels until he can find a bailiff, before whom he can initiate a plea of debt.

cap. 44
a burgess' share

If a burgess of the town buys merchandise within the franchise of the town and there is an outsider there who claims the right to have a share in the merchandise, the outsider shall not have a share. But if an outsider buys merchandise and there is a burgess present who claims a share, the burgess has the right to a share.

cap. 45
view of frankpledge

View of frankpledge is to be held in the town each day during the week of Pentecost; the purprestures presented in the view should be remedied and amended, by view of the bailiffs and chief pledges [who are] presenters within 40 days of the week of Pentecost.

Notes: the English version of the custumal uses a different name for view of frankpledge – the leet [court]. The English version uses as the title of those who made presentments of offences "head boroughs", rather than capital pledges. A purpresture was an encroachment onto public property.

cap. 46
prohibition of waste during a plea

When an action regarding a tenement is brought before the bailiffs by king's writ, the bailiffs shall forbid the tenant, against whom the writ is directed, from committing waste or despoilment on the property which is the subject of the action. If the tenant does so despite the bailiffs' prohibition and the plaintiff recovers the tenement in the action, the amount of damages awarded against the defendant are to be doubled; damages are to be assessed by 12 sworn men. The tenant is also to receive a serious amercement for his trespass in disobeying the bailiffs. The same procedure is to be in effect for pleas of land begun without writ; prohibition of waste should be made at request of the plaintiff.

cap. 47
not taking pledges from poor weavers

The community ordains and prohibits that no-one of the town take from poor wool carders, spinners, poor tailors, seamstresses, poor laundresses, nor other poor people of low status, any fabricated garments, linen, parcels of clothing, carded wool (white or dyed), flax, hemp, thread (woollen or linen), nor any other suspicious goods, as pledge for money, wine, ale or any other kind of victual, in cases where there is cause for suspicion that the goods offered as pledge may not be the property of the poor people who offer them. If anyone takes such goods as pledge from poor people, contrary to this prohibition, then the bailiffs may deliver the items back to their rightful owners, without the latter paying [any compensation to] the person in whose possession they were found, even if the person who put the items up as pledge has not the means to answer for it. The bailiffs should have this ordinance announced each year, along with the other cries, so that no-one infringing the ordinance may defend on the basis of ignorance.

cap.48
missing goods

In the same way, anyone in the town may, through plea begun by gage and pledge, recover missing goods and chattels, no matter in whose possession they are found or by what means the possessor has acquired them; the possessor must recover his loss as best he can from the pledger of the goods.

cap. 49
taking attorney

The chief bailiffs singly or jointly must appoint an attorney for the plaintiff and defendant in every action before them, whether with or without writ, whether the party is absent or present in court, and either in court or outside it. The name of the attorney must be recorded. If any party to the action is in such poor health that he cannot come to court without risking to life or limb, then the bailiffs must send a sub-bailiff or some other appropriate person to take the sick man's attornment in the action.

cap. 50
recognizance outside court in mercantile contracts

Any of the chief bailiffs, wherever he may be within the territory under his jurisdiction, may receive a recognizance of debt, so long as both the creditor and the debtor are present; the recognizance is to be entered into the town roll. Once this is done, the court may not entertain the debtor's denial of the recognizance made, against the witness of the bailiff; but nor are any damages to be awarded to the creditor in recognizances made, whether in court or outside it, without a legal action having been initiated. In cases where mercantile contracts or covenants are declared voluntarily before one of the bailiffs within the territory under his jurisdiction, in the presence of good men of the town, the word of the bailiff is credible enough to warrant registering [in the town records] the agreement. The court may not entertain either of the merchants denying what has been recorded; any who tries shall be condemned according to the law merchant. However, the oral witness of a bailiff to a recognizance cannot be accepted after the end of his term of office, if the recognizance is not found to be enrolled.

cap. 51
widow's free bench

If any burgess who is a peer and member of the community, and not previously married, marries a single woman or a widow and the wife outlives husband, then the widow shall have the deceased's chief messuage for her residence in the name of "free bench" for as long as she remain a widow. She may not waste nor dispose of this property, so that her husband's heir is disinherited. She may also have dower rights in half of [the deceased's] other property in the town (if it is subject to dower). If her husband only held the one messuage in the town, the widow may still hold it by free bench, but her husband's children shall lodge with her in the house.

Notes: it appears from this (and the following chapter) that only a man's first wife had "free bench" rights in his principal residence; the reference to "children" may refer particularly to those who had come of age, rather than underage children (who it is difficult to believe would have been thrown out on the street by their widowed mother!).

cap. 52
dower

In the case of a woman who, after the death of her husband, does not have the right of free bench, she may remain dwelling in the chief messuage for 40 days after the husband's death (doing no waste thereto), within which period the husband's heir is voluntarily to assign her a reasonable dower; which is, half of all the tenements and rents of which her husband died in possession.

Notes: it is implicit that if the heir does not do this of his/her own accord within 40 days, the widow may sue for dower rights.

cap. 53
widow's franchise

If a resident burgess marries a woman from outside the town, and the woman outlives her husband, the woman may continue to enjoy the franchise for as long as she remain a widow.

cap. 54
no homage and fealty for tenements

It has been the practice in Ipswich from antiquity that no tenant of tenements in the town held by free burgage do homage or fealty for them to the property's chief lord. The chief lord may not demand from the tenant any relief, ward, marriage or other service, but only payment of the rent, nor may he have any other profit from the property except escheat when the law allows it. However, this does not exempt the burgesses from taking an oath of allegiance to the new king, their liege-lord, when it is demanded after the death of a king of England. It is also the custom in the town that no outsider may distrain his tenant for arrears of rent, except by the bailiffs of the town, for the reason that the bailiffs should not allow any distrained items to be kept in any place except within the town, so that they can redeliver them after [the distrained party makes] gage and pledge, if process of law necessitates this. However, those who are burgesses of the town, at lot and scot, may distrain their tenants for arrears of rent at any time, without the involvement of the bailiffs; for, if they put the distrained items anywhere other than they ought, then they can be distrained and brought to justice more easily than can be an outsider.

Notes: relief, wardship and marriage were feudal services. If the services were no longer performed for a property (e.g. because a tenant had died without heir, or had been imprisoned), the property reverted – or escheated – to the lord.

cap. 55
treatment of wives in plea of trespass

A woman who is covered [by the law] under her husband may be brought to justice before the bailiffs to answer to a plea of trespass or where the tumbrel may be the punishment, in the same way as she would be subject to justice were she unmarried; this applies to a case of personal trespass, but not trespass related to a tenement.

cap. 56
husband to answer for wife's debt

A husband shall answer in court in pleas concerning debts contracted by his wife before and after their marriage. But if the woman becomes a surety for a debt, the husband cannot be held answerable for that.

cap. 1-21

custumal contents

cap. 57-83

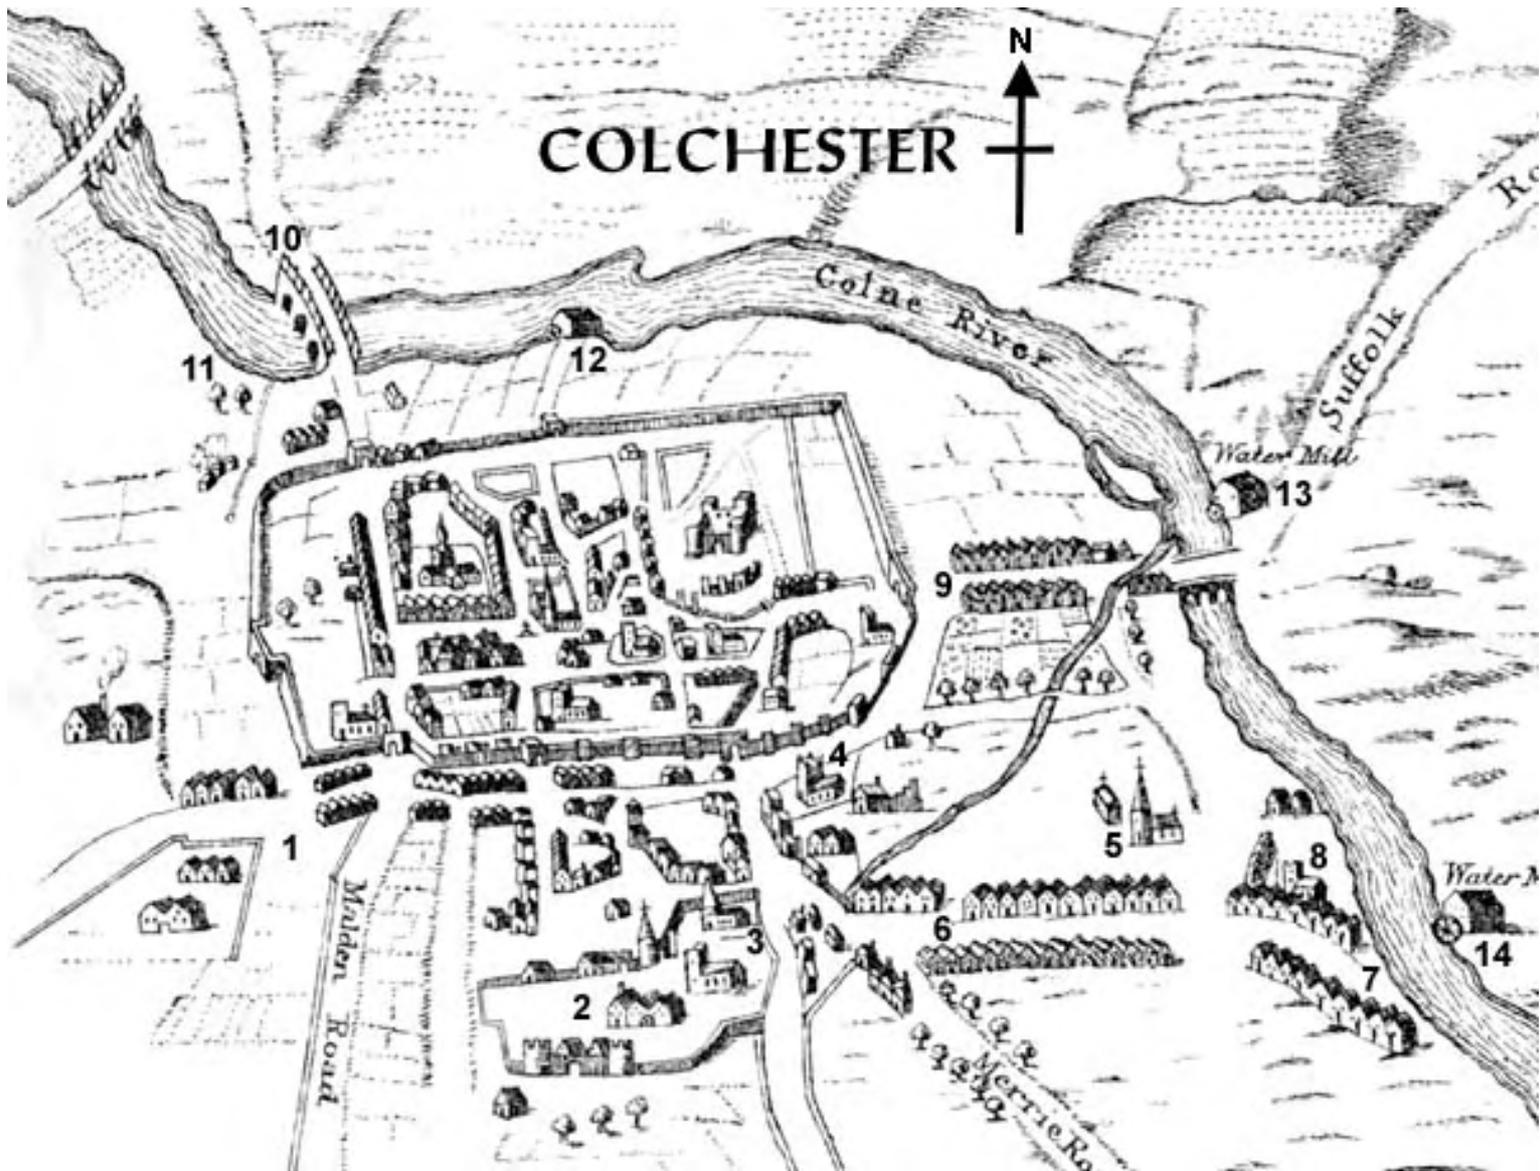

So that the king may have those [fees] deriving from the use of his weigh-beam in the city, no comburgess or anyone else in the city may, in a private place to avoid use of the beam, buy or sell wholesale, nor may anyone other than a comburgess buy retail, any merchandize which ought to be weighed on the king's beam. Nothing is exempt from this – not wool, nor onions, nor any goods sold by weight which ought to be weighed there, under penalty of confiscation of the merchandize. The troner may also use, in addition to the beam, balances and weights conforming to the king's standard.

Most towns of any size seem to have been equipped with a "tron", a weigh-beam, which was intended to provide an honest and reliable device for measuring large volumes of merchandize; an official known as a troner or tronager was in charge of this task. The tolls (tronage) he charged for use of the beam were, in Norwich, one of the revenues that went towards the [fee farm.]

History of medieval Colchester

Colchester and suburbs at the close of the Middle Ages

This is a clickable imagemap.

NOTES:

This map, based heavily on that of John Speed in 1610 (but showing a wider area), was in fact drawn up in 1648 to show the siege works and defensive provisions, when a Royalist force occupied the town and was besieged by a Parliamentary army; the 11-week siege saw a great deal of destruction to houses, churches, walls and gates. Here I have edited out features related to the siege. What remains is a picture of the town that was likely not so different from that ca.1500.

OUTSIDE THE WALLS

1 Crouched Friars

They established a friary here before 1272, perhaps taking over an earlier wayside hospital, to which function it had returned by the end of the Middle Ages (as well as serving as the meeting place for the Gild of Holy Cross).

2 St. John's Abbey

Founded 1096, to the south of the southern suburb of the town. After the Dissolution, the abbey came into the hands of the Lucas family (gentry). It, along with the rest of the Lucas property, was largely destroyed during the siege of 1648, except for the 15th century gatehouse.

3 St. Giles

Probably built in the first half of the 12th century for the use of tenants and servants of the abbey, given its location within the abbey precinct and the fact that the boundaries of the parish lay largely within the abbey demesne. Possibly it succeeded an Anglo-Saxon wooden church, dedicated to St. John, that was on the northern part of the abbey site, just prior to the abbey's foundation. St. Giles was badly damaged during the siege of 1648.

4 St. Botolph's

The earliest ecclesiastical building on the site may have been a church dedicated to this saint, a 7th-century East Anglian abbot, which strongly suggests an Anglo-Saxon origin for the structure. Churches with such dedications are not uncommonly found near the entrances to settlements, for the saint was associated with travellers. The presence of a Roman cemetery around the site has even caused speculation that a church might have stood there in much earlier times. The first St. Botolph's probably functioned as the parish church of the southern suburb; it was then served by a small college of priests. In the last decade of the 11th century it became the Priory of St. Julian and St. Botolph, the first Augustinian priory established in England, and as such granted authority over all subsequent Augustinian foundations in England. Reverting to the role of parish church after the Dissolution (if indeed part of it had not continued in that role throughout the Middle Ages), when its conventual buildings were pulled down, the church itself was badly damaged during the siege of 1648.

- 5 St. Mary Magdalen
Founded as a hospital by Eudo the Steward, to support four leprous residents, its chapel became a parish church and (unlike the hospital per se) was able to survive the Dissolution. However, the medieval church was replaced by a Victorian building in the mid-19th century.
- 6 Magdalen Street
The road leading down to the port has been considerably foreshortened by the map-maker.
- 7 The Hythe
Perhaps the port for the Roman city; in the late Middle Ages it was referred to as New Hythe, a different haven (Old Hythe) having been used in the Saxon period. Building of a footbridge there was licensed in 1407, on condition it not block the passage of ships.
- 8 St. Leonard's
A good-sized church here served the parish around the port during the 12th century, but surviving fabric is no earlier than late medieval.
- 9 East Street
The road passing through the East Gate, down to the East Bridge, led to routes into Suffolk (e.g. to Ipswich and Harwich).
- 10 North Bridge
There was a bridge here from Roman times. In the Middle Ages there was a suburb on the far side of the bridge. The bridge marked the boundary of the borough jurisdiction over the Colne fishery.
- 11 (site of) North Mill
A grain mill until the Black Death; in the second half of that century it was converted to fulling.
- 12 Middle Mill
A grain mill until the Black Death, after which it was converted to fulling, but rebuilt to handle grain at the beginning of the 15th century.
- 13 East Mill
- 14 Hythe Mill
There was a fulling mill somewhere near the Hythe in the late 14th century; a grain mill had been built before 1428 by the bailiffs and community. Both were derelict by the end of the Middle Ages.

WITHIN THE WALLS

This is a clickable imagemap.

A St. Martin's

The tower and some minor elements date from the 12th century, while much of the rest of the fabric is late medieval. There are some reasons to think there may have been a church on the site in late Anglo-Saxon times, perhaps even as far back as the end of the Roman occupation.

B St. Runwald's

Likely of late Saxon origin, judging from the dedication, although its central placement without any surrounding churchyard suggests that it was an intrusion into an already built-up area. Before it lay the main market of the borough, and the medieval shambles were adjacent. Demolished 1878.

C St. Helen's chapel

Local legend – perhaps inspired by the impressive Roman walls – had Helen as a daughter of the mythical King Coel, ruler of Colchester, and as the mother of the Emperor Constantine. Neither has historical foundation; but more significantly St. Helen became viewed as patron saint of the town – her image was featured on the community seal. The same medieval tradition had the chapel being restored in 1076 by Eudo the Steward; if true, this might suggest an Anglo-Saxon origin, and there is some indication the chapel was built atop the remains of a Roman structure. Eudo gave it to the Abbey as part of his foundation endowment. In 1290 the Abbot was convicted of neglecting to provide a chaplain to celebrate in the chapel during part of each week. Perhaps in part because of the resulting impoverishment of the chapel, in 1320 John de Colcestre, the rector of Tendring (apparently a member of a prominent burgess family), endowed a chantry there with numerous rents and land to support a chaplain, and made the bailiffs and community the effective patrons; they subsequently placed the chantry under the administration of the Gild of St. Helen's (a fraternity of which many leading townsmen, as well as some county dignitaries, were members) although retaining control over presentments.

D St. Nicholas

In existence at least by the 12th century, but rebuilt in the 14th, and again in the 1870s, finally to be demolished in 1955. Parts of the church had Roman walls for their foundation, although the Roman structure was probably secular, not ecclesiastical.

E All Saints

There remains minor evidence of Norman work in the church, although it is not impossible that there was an even earlier church, given the location and the incorporation of brickwork from an even earlier Roman structure (this part of town being the forum/basilica). It was expanded in the 14th and 15th century, with a tower and other additions.

F St. Mary's-at-the-Wall

Built on the site of a Roman house, with the original church perhaps of Saxon date (judging from burials in the vicinity), it may have been created as, or come to be, the private church of an estate of the Bishop of London (a soke outside the jurisdiction of borough authorities). Joseph Elianore obtained royal licence in 1338 to found a chantry there which during the 1340s he endowed with numerous lands and rents. The earliest known school in Colchester was located here in the 15th century. The church's proximity to the wall made it a defensive position, and target for the besiegers, in 1648. It was ruinous when rebuilt in the next century, to be demolished (except for its tower) in 1872.

G St. James

A church stood here from at least the 12th century (although that may have been a rebuilding of an earlier structure). There was further and substantial rebuilding in the 15th century.

H St. Peter's

The only Colchester church mentioned by name in Domesday, when evidently already well-endowed with lands. Its key position near the junction of two major streets also indicates its importance in the town. The surviving medieval fabric is, however, 15th century. The depiction in 1648 still reflects the medieval cruciform plan of the church, with a prominent tower (replaced in the 18th century) at the centre.

I Holy Trinity

It still has its Saxon tower, dating to ca.1000, constructed in part from brick and tile from Roman structures; there is evidence that part of the church dates even earlier. Parts were rebuilt in 14th and 15th centuries.

J Grey Friars

This Franciscan priory, whose grounds occupied the north-east corner of the land within the walls, was founded before 1279, and possibly by 1237. Little has been found by way of remains.

K East Gate

Badly damaged during the siege of 1648, the remains were torn down a few decades later.

- L Botolph's Gate
Destroyed in 1823.
- M Schere Gate
A postern.
- N Head Gate
Removed 1756.
- O Balkerne Gate
The western entrance to the walled city during Roman times (remains of the Roman gateway still stand), it fell out of use towards the end of the Roman period and was subsequently blocked; the road leading there from East Gate was thereafter stopped at North Hill, with traffic being diverted to the Head Gate as an exit to roads leading westwards and to London. The Balkerne gate was in later times thought to have been a fort. It was once thought that a postern gate existed further south in the western stretch of wall near St. Mary's, and may have been used as entrance/exit during medieval times; but this was subsequently discovered to have been only an opening for a drain to pass through the wall. We can therefore conclude that the map's creator is depicting the Balkerne.
- P North Gate
- Q North Schere Gate
- R High Street
This east-west route was the main one through the town; it ran along the crest of a ridge. As the centre of the town, it was the site of various markets specializing in particular goods. The point marked by the "R" was the site of the medieval corn market.
- S East Street
- T Botolph Street
Site of the fair held at the opening of oyster season.
- U St. Martin's Lane
The Jewish quarter was primarily focused here, nearby market and castle.
- V Moothall
It is curious that this is not identified on the map. It was destroyed in 1843, when Norman doorway and arches were discovered therein (before being pulled down). Later town halls were built on top of the site.
- W Castle
Medieval tradition held that the castle had been built atop the foundations of King Coel's castle. It has been suggested that this might reflect the former occupation on part of the site by the residence of an ealdorman or even an East Essex king.

[MAIN MENU]

Created: January 16, 1999. Last update: November 4, 2000

© Stephen Alsford, 1999-2003, 2000

[\[contents\]](#)

APPENDIX I

The Officers of Borough Government

Colchester: bailiffs and receivers/chamberlains

| | |
|-----------|---|
| 1272-73 | unknown |
| 1273-74 | b. Walter Goldsmith, John Clerk |
| 1274-75 | b. Roger Clerk, Thomas Lystwine |
| 1275-76 | unknown |
| 1276-77 | unknown |
| 1277-78 | b. Richard de Berholt, Geoffrey Godyear |
| 1278-79 | b. Sayer fitz Ralph, Richard Pruwet |
| 1279-80 | unknown [1] |
| 1280-81 | unknown |
| 1281-82 | unknown [2] |
| 1282-83 | b. Roger Clerk, John Clerk |
| 1283-87 | unknown |
| 1287-88 | b. Richard Tubbe, Richard de Berholt? [3] |
| 1288-89 | unknown |
| 1289-90 | b. Ralph Sefar, Alexander Tovy |
| 1290-1301 | unknown |
| 1301-02 | b. Elias fitz John, Warin fitz William |
| 1302-05 | unknown |
| 1305-06 | b. Sayer le Parmenter, Ralph Sefar |
| 1306-09 | unknown |
| 1309-10 | b. Warin fitz William, Sayer de Donyland |
| 1310-11 | b. Warin fitz William, Sayer de Donyland |
| 1311-12 | b. Joseph Elianore, William de Sartria |
| 1312-13 | unknown |
| 1313-14 | b. Warin fitz William, John le Teynturer |
| 1314-15 | b. Warin fitz William, John de la Forde |
| 1315-16 | b. Elias fitz John, Hubert Bosse |

- 1316-17 b. Warin fitz William, Adam de Castro
- 1317-18 b. Warin fitz William, Joseph Elianore
- 1318-19 b. Ralph Ode, William le Clerk
- 1319-20 b. Arnulph de Mounteney, John de Tendring
- 1320-21 b. Richard de Colne, William le Clerk
- 1321-22 b. Peter de Aston, William Tote [4]
- 1322-23 unknown
- 1323-24 unknown
- 1324-25 b. Peter de Aston, Warin fitz William
- 1325-26 b. John Caperon, John Jordan
- 1326-27 unknown
- 1327-28 b. Ralph le Knyght, Edmund le Chaloner
- 1328-29 b. Alan de la Neylond, Joseph Elianore
- 1329-30 b. Warin fitz William, Joseph Elianore
- 1330-31 b. Warin fitz William, Joseph Elianore
- 1331-32 b. Warin fitz William, Joseph Elianore
- 1332-33 b. Warin fitz William, Matthew fitz Robert
- 1333-34 b. Warin fitz William, Ralph Ode
- 1334-35 b. Warin fitz William, Ralph Ode
- 1335-36 b. John Jordan, Roger Belch
- 1336-37 b. John Fynch, John Caperon
- 1337-38 b. John Fynch, Matthew fitz Robert
- 1338-39 b. Ralph Ode, Joseph Elianore
- 1339-40 b. Warin atte Welle, Robert le Clerk
- 1340-41 b. William de Hadleigh, Robert le Clerk
- 1341-42 b. John de Fordham, William Buk
- 1342-43 b. John de Fordham, Joseph Elianore
- 1343-44 b. Robert le Clerk, Roger Belch
- 1344-45 b. John Waryn (Matthew fitz Robert), William de Hadleigh
- 1345-46 b. Thomas de Dedham, William de Hadleigh
- 1346-47 b. Thomas de Dedham, William de Hadleigh
- 1347-48 b. Thomas de Dedham, William de Hadleigh
- 1348-49 b. Roger Belch, William de Hadleigh
- 1349-50 b. Matthew fitz Robert, William de la Fermery
- 1350-51 b. John atte Forde, Adam de Colne
- 1351-52 b. Matthew fitz Robert, William de la Fermery
- 1352-53 b. Adam de Colne, Robert atte Forde

- 1353-54 b. John le Dyer, Richard de Bradewey
- 1354-55 b. John Boyn, Clement le Dyer
- 1355-56 b. Adam atte Welle, Richard le Dyer
- 1356-57 b. John atte Forde, John Aleyn
- 1357-58 b. John atte Forde, Richard le Dyer
- 1358-59 b. Adam Waryn, Richard le Dyer
- 1359-60 b. John atte Forde, John le Dyer
- 1360-61 b. Richard le Dyer, William Reyne
- 1361-62 b. Robert atte Forde, William Reyne
- 1362-63 b. Robert atte Forde, George de Fordham
- 1363-64 b. Alexander Coggere, William Reyne
- 1364-65 b. John atte Forde, William Reyne
- 1365-66 b. Robert atte Forde, Henry Bosse
- 1366-67 b. John atte Forde, Alexander Coggere
- 1367-68 b. John atte Forde, Alexander Coggere
- 1368-69 b. Richard Drury, John Keek
- 1369-70 b. Robert atte Forde, William Mate
- 1370-71 b. Robert atte Forde, John Lucas
- 1371-72 b. Robert atte Forde, John Lucas
- 1372-73 b. Alexander Coggere, William Cristemasse
r. unknown
- 1373-74 b. William Reyne, John Clerk
r. unknown
- 1374-75 b. John atte Forde, John Pebemarsh
r. John Sextayn, John Curtays
- 1375-76 b. William Reyne, Alexander Pod
r. John Sextayn, John Curtays
- 1376-77 b. Alexander Coggere, Stephen Baron
r. John Sextayn, John Curtays
- 1377-78 b. William Reyne, John Keek
r. William Penne, John Curtays
- 1378-79 b. Alexander Coggere, Geoffrey Dawe
r. unknown
- 1379-80 b. Robert atte Forde, Stephen Baron
r. Simon Clerk, John Curtays
- 1380-81 b. Robert atte Forde, Stephen Baron
r. Simon Clerk, John Curtays? [\[5\]](#)
- 1381-82 b. Thomas Fraunceys, Thomas Clerk
r. Simon Clerk John Curtays

- 1382-83 b. Simon Fordham, John Cristion
r. Simon Clerk, John Curtays
- 1383-84 b. Thomas Fraunceys, Ralph Algar
r. Simon Clerk, John Curtays? [5]
- 1384-85 b. Alexander Coggere, John Cristion
r. Simon Clerk, John Curtays
- 1385-86 b. Ralph Algar, William Penne
r. Simon Clerk, John Curtays
- 1386-87 b. Simon Fordham, John Cristion
r. unknown
- 1387-88 b. Thomas Fraunceys, John Seburgh
r. Simon Clerk, William Mate
- 1388-89 b. Ralph Algar, Stephen Baron
r. unknown
- 1389-90 b. Alexander Coggere, Thomas Fraunceys
r. unknown
- 1390-91 b. Simon Fordham, John Cristion
r. unknown
- 1391-92 b. John Seburgh, William Reyne
r. Simon Clerk, William Mate
- 1392-93 b. Thomas Fraunceys, John Cristion
r. Simon Clerk, William Mate
- 1393-94 b. Simon Fordham, Ralph Algar
r. unknown
- 1394-95 b. John Seburgh, Thomas Clerk
r. unknown
- 1395-96 b. Simon Fordham, John Dyer
r. Simon Clerk, William Mate
- 1396-97 b. John Cristion (Thomas Clerk), John Seburgh
r. unknown
- 1397-98 b. John Dyer, William Mate
r. unknown
- 1398-99 b. Thomas Godestone, Thomas Fraunceys
r. Simon Clerk, Michael Aubre
- 1399-1400 b. John Seburgh, John atte Forde
r. Simon Clerk, Michael Aubre
- 1400-01 b. Thomas Fraunceys, Stephen Flysp
r. William Snook, Andrew Beche
- 1401-02 b. Thomas Godestone, John Seburgh
r. unknown

- 1402-03 b. John atte Forde, Philip Neggmere
r. unknown
- 1403-04 b. Thomas Fraunceys, John Pod
r. Robert Slade, Simon Clerk
- 1404-05 b. Thomas Godestone, John Seburgh
ch. Simon Clerk (Matthew Dyer), William Wykham
- 1405-06 b. John atte Forde, John Dyer
ch. Matthew Dyer, John Mounsy
- 1406-07 b. Thomas Godestone, Henry Bosse
ch. John Plomer, Robert Priour
- 1407-08 b. Thomas Fraunceys, John Pod
ch. unknown
- 1408-09 b. John Dyer, William Mate
ch. unknown
- 1409-10 b. Thomas Fraunceys, John Pod
ch. unknown
- 1410-11 b. John atte Forde, William Mate
ch. unknown
- 1411-12 b. Thomas Godestone, John Dyer
ch. William Wykham, John Wylegh
- 1412-13 b. Thomas Fraunceys, John atte Forde
ch. unknown
- 1413-14 b. Thomas Godestone, William Mate
ch. William Wykham, John Mounsy
- 1414-15 b. Thomas Fraunceys, John atte Forde
ch. unknown
- 1415-16 b. Thomas Godestone, John Kymberle
ch. unknown
- 1416-17 b. John atte Forde, William Mate
ch. unknown
- 1417-18 b. Thomas Godestone, William Notyngam
ch. unknown
- 1418-19 b. John atte Forde, Augustine Bonefaunt
ch. John Mounsy, Thomas Oskyn
- 1419-20 b. Thomas Godestone, William Notyngam
ch. John Saundre, John Trewe
- 1420-21 b. John Kymberle, William Mate
ch. unknown
- 1421-22 b. Thomas Godestone, Henry Bosse
ch. unknown

- 1422-23 b. William Notyngham, John Sumpter
ch. John Saundre, Gilbert Kent
- 1423-24 b. Thomas Godestone, Robert Priour
ch. William Wykham, John Stevene
- 1424-25 b. John Sumpter, Henry Bosse
ch. unknown
- 1425-26 b. Thomas Godestone, John Kymberle
ch. John Saundre, John Cleve
- 1426-27 b. Henry Bosse, William Notyngham
ch. unknown
- 1427-28 b. Simon Mate, Thomas Oskyn
ch. John Saundre, John Bradley
- 1428-29 b. John Beche, Robert Selby
ch. Roger Lylye, John Mounsy
- 1429-30 b. Thomas Godestone, John Beche
ch. John Prymerole, John Odelyshoo
- 1430-31 b. Henry Bosse, John Trewe
ch. unknown
- 1431-32 b. John Beche, Robert Priour
ch. unknown
- 1432-33 b. Henry Bosse, John Stevene
ch. John Prymerole, John Odelyshoo
- 1433-34 b. John Beche, Robert Priour
ch. unknown
- 1434-35 b. Simon Mate, Thomas Oskyn
ch. John Prymerole, Thomas Smyth
- 1435-36 b. Robert Selby, Walter Bonefey
ch. John Cook, William Person
- 1436-37 b. John Trewe, John Rouge
ch. John Cook, John Person
- 1437-38 b. John Beche, Walter Bonefey
ch. William Gant, Roger Wyke
- 1438-39 b. Thomas Oskyn, Robert Selby
ch. William Gant, Roger Wyke
- 1439-40 b. Walter Bonefey, John Odelyshoo
ch. William Person, William Cook
- 1440-41 b. John Beche, Robert Priour
ch. unknown
- 1441-42 b. John Trewe, John Rouge
ch. unknown

- 1442-43 b. John Beche, Nicholas Peek
ch. John Sayer, John Edrych
- 1443-44 b. John Rouge, Thomas Cent
ch. John Sayer, John Edrych
- 1444-45 b. John Beche, Nicholas Peek
ch. unknown
- 1445-46 b. Thomas Oskyn (John Beche), Thomas atte Wode
ch. unknown
- 1446-47 b. Robert Selby, Roger Wyke
ch. unknown
- 1447-48 b. John Beche, John Rouge
ch. William Saxe, John Thomas
- 1448-49 b. Robert Selby, Roger Wyke
ch. Robert Hintelsham, Richard Parker
- 1449-50 b. Nicholas Peek, Thomas atte Wode
ch. unknown
- 1450-51 b. William Leeche, William Saxe
ch. unknown
- 1451-52 b. John Forde, John Baker
ch. John Seman, Richard Wyke
- 1452-53 b. Thomas atte Wode, William Saxe
ch. Roger London, Thomas Feelde
- 1453-54 b. John Forde, William Petteworth
ch. unknown
- 1454-55 b. William Forde, John Sayer
ch. unknown
- 1455-56 b. William Saxe, Simon Youn
ch. Richard Barker, Geoffrey Janyn
- 1456-57 b. John Forde, John Beche (William Saxe)
ch. Richard Barker, Geoffrey Janyn
- 1457-58 b. William Saxe, John Sayer
ch. John Auntrous, James Cook
- 1458-59 b. John Forde, Matthew Drury
ch. John Auntrous, James Cook
- 1459-60 b. William Petteworth, William Forde
ch. Robert Bieste, John Temyot
- 1460-61 b. Matthew Drury, John Baron
ch. Robert Bieste, John Temyot

Introduction | Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders
Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration
Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics | Conclusion

Created: July 30, 1998

© Stephen Alford, 1998-2003

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 7

Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

The Mask of Unanimity

The desirability of presenting a united front to the world outside the borough boundaries - a world of "foreigners" - has already been noted.^[1] The mask of unanimity is not the visage of a mature democracy, confident in its ability to accommodate dissent, nor need we take literally the medieval declarations of it. Yet, even beyond the internal function of encouraging conformity, it performed the very practical purpose of camouflaging local disagreements,^[2] so that they might (hopefully) be settled locally without provoking the intervention of the king or his officers. For independence from external interference is a keynote of constitutional development in the medieval borough. The parochial outlook, with its distrust of outsiders and its various expressions of local identity and patriotism, and the medieval penchant for aggression, contributed towards the production, in an adolescent and competitive socio-economic system, of a network of rivalries between borough and neighbouring challengers to local jurisdictions: judicial, territorial, or mercantile. Whether the borough rulers were conscious of the political value of diverting popular discontent away from internal problems towards common external elements is a matter for speculation, not illustration; but certainly we find them at the head of large bodies of townsmen asserting their claimed - perhaps often usurped - rights against other communities or lordships.

Great Yarmouth was concerned to keep commerce channelled through the area in its own hands, and violently resisted the efforts of Little Yarmouth, Gorleston, and Lowestoft to share in that commerce. Its townsmen also resented the ancient rights of the Cinque Portsmen at Yarmouth's herring fair, as well as the role of Norwich as a port and staple which led to the bypassing of Yarmouth's harbour. In 1272 the Prior of Norwich had no difficulty in procuring mercenaries from Yarmouth for an attack on Norwich, during the dispute between city and priory.^[3] In 1343 the Yarmouth burgesses were quite willing to risk offending the admiral, Sir Robert Morley, a man whose favour they might have done well to court, by plundering his ships when he sought to use the harbour at Lowestoft.^[4] One of the focal features of Norwich's history is its hostility towards the cathedral-priory, rival for judicial and market jurisdictions within part of the city. The warfare between monks and citizens in 1272, culminating in a devastating attack on the cathedral precinct, is merely the most conspicuous event in a lengthy struggle: the conservative Church trying to preserve its rights undiminished, the citizens determined to obtain control over all intra-mural areas. At Colchester too rivalry with an ecclesiastical potentate was a prominent, recurring theme in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. There are interesting similarities between the affairs at Norwich and Colchester, with the summer of 1272 proving a particularly violent time at both locations.[5] At Colchester the enemy was the Abbot of St. John's, and the focus of dispute jurisdiction in the hamlets of the liberties surrounding the borough proper. Despite the accounts of the disputes in both borough and abbey records, it is perhaps the leet presentments, in which the abbot is easily the foremost and most regular offender, that provide the most convincing evidence for borough grievances.[6] In addition, we find large forces of townsmen: attacking a servant of the Earl of Essex, who had arrested cattle within the liberties (1319); attacking the servants of a royal commissioner sent to Colchester to purvey supplies for the army (1319); and breaking into the estate of John fitz Walter at Lexden, hunting, fishing, and felling trees there, as an assertive demonstration of borough jurisdiction in Lexden, and perhaps as retaliation for acts of intimidation by fitz Walter's steward (1343).[7]

The situation at Lynn and Maldon is similar in that the principal rival of each was an ecclesiastic; but in these cases he was the lord of the borough. Too little of Maldon's history is known for us to detect the organised aggression found elsewhere, although there is a hint of it in 1401, when the Bishop of London and Maldon's other lord, Sir Walter fitz Walter, sued fifty-five burgesses for trespass. In addition, there is evidence of burgess objection to the port and market facilities existing at nearby Heybridge manor.[8] The rulers of Lynn made, at regular intervals, an effort to free the borough from the dominion of the Bishop of Norwich, which obstructed the realization of independent government; we shall deal with this in more detail later. Lynn's second lordship, of the heirs of Arundel, was a less recurrent problem, but it climaxed in the disastrous affair whereby the burgesses assaulted and imprisoned one of the heirs, Robert de Monthalt, and his officers of the Tolbooth in 1313. On top of their basic resentment at not controlling port tolls, the burgesses do seem to have been antagonised by the extortionate activities of Monthalt's collectors and by an assault on two Lynn men by Monthalt's servants. However, the resultant seizure of Monthalt, apparently stemming from a hue-and-cry, and the exaction from him of surrender of his Tolbooth rights to the community, was a naive move. It was inevitable that, once released, Monthalt would retract his promises on grounds of duress and complain to the king, with consequent conviction and crippling heavy fining of the borough.[9]

Ipswich, on the other hand, had no great lord below the king, nor serious commercial rival, despite its competition with Harwich for control of Orwell haven. Its history is therefore comparatively quiet, although c.1314 bailiffs Stace and le Rente led a force of burgesses to the Bishop of Norwich's manor at Wykes Bishop, disrupted the holding of a leet court there, and rescued a horse that the Bishop's steward had arrested. Again, at the late date of 1451, we hear that the assembly decided that the bailiffs should lead the townsmen in a circuit of Ipswich's boundaries and demolish a dyke of the Prior of Ely, which had enclosed what the town claimed as common pasture.[10]

Judicial and economic rights claimed by neighbouring manors, vills, or towns, by threatening to deprive the borough of income in amercements or to displace its port or market facilities, and thereby damage the prosperity of the community, provoked a commonly-felt resentment that united almost all elements of the community regardless of internal jealousies and hostilities. Yarmouth declared that no rival (herring) market could legally be held within seven leagues; Maldon made a similar claim. After a legal dispute, Ipswich reached a compromise agreement in 1233 with nearby Woodbridge, whereby the former acquired a large degree of control over the market of the latter.[11] If the external rivalries, for the most part, diminished in intensity after mid-fourteenth century, it was largely because the boroughs had been successful with their claims as much as was possible, and a period of expansionism gave way to one of retrenchment.[12] It may be that this new introspective phase contributed to the growth of discontent amongst the less privileged townsmen. Yet it was still possible to obtain solidarity in internal politics: at a Lynn assembly of 1375, 108 burgesses were present to agree to the disfranchisement of jurat Henry de Betele, rebellious against mayoral authority, under the special conditions of excluding Henry from commercial relations with any member of the community; a year later a smaller group, for themselves and for all who were absent, agreed to stand firmly together in the face of any legal actions taken against the community by a rebellious Thomas de Couteshale. In 1423 at Ipswich it was similarly decided that all burgesses should take a special oath to stand together in the legal dispute then underway between the corporation and burgess James Andrew.[13] The spirit of the commune was not quite dead.

🔍 previous

next 🔍

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 6

The Quality of Government

The Practice: Offences Against Law, Custom, and Morals

A paternalistic attitude to the truly needy - those not as fortunate or capable as the men in power, although not perhaps those whose destitution was the result of their own character defects - evidently was a feature of both corporate and individual outlooks of the urban rulers, but it is often difficult to extricate it from elements of self-interest. Examples of illegal behaviour are less ambiguous; here the problem is rather that we may assess criminal activity only by that portion of it which has been detected. Like the iceberg, much remains beyond direct perception. Yet even that part, of unknown proportion, which is revealed to the historian is not insignificant. Of the total number of office-holders here studied from Lynn, Ipswich, Colchester, and Yarmouth, 16.3% were either accused, convicted, or pardoned of some crime or other, not a few being multiple offenders.^[45] We are not speaking here of petty misdemeanours, the everyday quarrels and brawls to which medieval townsmen were easily provoked, or the common abuses of breach of assize or of borough customs such as hamsoken or forestalling. Rather, a range of more serious offences is meant, from grievous assault to treason, from fraud to grand larceny. In a society where self-help was a more reliable source of protection for one's interests than was royal justice, and where self-interest, closely followed by family interest, usually over-ruled any sense of responsibility to one's fellows or community (local or national), we should not expect other than an attitude towards the law that it was something to be evaded or else manipulated to one's own advantage.

The men we have seen to display public-spiritedness and sympathy for the poor were not immune to the temptations of law-breaking. William Reyne was investigated on a wool-smuggling charge in 1362. And he used the experience of court procedure he had gained as bailiff to his profit: between March 1379 and January 1382 he introduced several dozen pleas of debt, against different persons, mostly for relatively small amounts. It has been suggested that such litigious activities were a form of business speculation, the profits to be gained from favourable verdicts outweighing the risk of amercement for false accusation.^[46] At very least it exerted pressure on one's debtors for swift repayment. John Permonter was accused, along with John Wesenham and Robert Permonter, of waylaying the gauger of Lynn by night with intent to kill, and subsequently so threatening him that he dared not perform his office (c.1427).^[47] Besides one or two examples of William Gerberge's fraudulent business practices, we also know that he sojourned, with a few other leading Yarmouth burgesses, in Norwich castle gaol during part of 1264, a precautionary measure by the king to stem renewed violence at the upcoming herring fair. There is some suspicion of foul play in William's death. [48] Richard de Haveringlond was convicted of wool-smuggling in 1372.[49] John James was disfranchised in 1459 for unspecified offences, whilst John Caldwell was in trouble with Chancery in 1430, although again the nature of the crime is not clear.[50] Caldwell and Richard Felawe were required, in 1442, to put up a £100 bond guaranteeing that they would not hinder a king's commissioner in his naval duties. Felaw was twice accused of fraud, once in relation to his sale of Harwich property that he may not have owned, and again in persuading a partner to sell him a share in a ship under false promises. Circa 1455 a Harwich woman complained that Felawe was suing her for debt in Ipswich's court where he, as bailiff, would judge the case.[51]

At the beginning of this study it was noted that the application of selfish policies is an integral element in the definition of a government as an oligarchy. Some historians have readily - one might say, enthusiastically - perceived such a characteristic. Of the Lynn rulers, for example, Hillen declared that "Their programme, as may be seen, was a disgraceful exhibition of unflinching selfishness", [52] perhaps being led to this conclusion by the more scholarly studies of Gross, who concluded that:

If, in viewing the past, one's vision is not impaired by the rose-hued glasses of sentimentality, one must perceive that the medieval gildsmen were not always animated by lofty motives of brotherly love and self-abnegation in their behaviour towards their fellow-men. Indeed, the desire for gain or self-advantage, which from the outset was the raison d'etre of the Gild Merchant ... degenerated at times into the most reprehensible forms of selfishness.[53] and by Mrs. Green, who was more explicit in her statement that the jurats:

ruled without restraint, and with a high hand assessed taxes, diverted money from the common treasury, profited by illegal trading, used customs contrary to common or merchant law, and bought the king's forgiveness if any complaint was made of their crimes.[54]

Even modern opinion has echoed this belief that, for Lynn's mayors, "high office in the service of the borough ... in effect, meant in the service of their own personal interests." [55]

We, however, must put aside the demanding moral standards of the Victorian era and the more ambiguous values of modern culture, in favour of viewing illegal activity in terms of its contemporary societal environment. Some, at least, of the charges laid out by Green are true enough. But we must appreciate that in the competitive urban conditions - where the instabilities of international relations, the fluctuations of the economy, and the uncertainties in entrepreneurial activity wreaked havoc with men's nervous systems and with the membership of the wealthy families at the apex of borough society - we find a natural breeding-ground for self-interest, self-reliance, aggression, and distrust of one's fellow man.[56] The temptations to corruption were great, the legal prohibitions and personal inhibitions too often inadequate barriers. Enforcement of the law was weak and the royal government overly inclined to forgive crimes in order to add to its revenues through the sale of pardons. This in itself was an encouragement to the wealthy to act as they pleased without fear of incapacitative retribution. Essex gentleman Lionel de Bradenham, in the course of his quarrels with Colchester in 1358, besieged the town with an armed force, plundered the suburbs, laid ambushes for any burgess attempting to travel out of town, and extracted a £20 ransom from the town. He also broke open the town gaol, meddled with local water-courses (resulting in four deaths), and interfered with the duties of the local coroner. When finally arrested by the king's officers, he broke out of Marshalsea and took sanctuary. For all these crimes, which Lionel himself admitted, the king pardoned him.[57] When examples of lawless and corrupt behaviour were set in the highest levels of medieval society, it is difficult to criticize too harshly the townsmen, aping their betters.

It is hard to judge the extent to which morals or laws were breached. The man who becomes rich by fair and honest business, without taking advantage of those from whom he buys or to whom he sells, indeed owes his wealth to good fortune.[58] Occasionally the consciences of merchants are revealed on their death-beds: Walter Daniel, frequently bailiff and mayor of Norwich, requested in his will that masses be celebrated for the souls of carpenters or tradesmen he had knowingly or unknowingly cheated in his business dealings.[59] Indeed, few of the urban rulers whose wills survive did not show considerable concern for lightening the burden on their souls as much as within their power. As in life they had spread their risks by the diversity of their profit-seeking ventures, so too in death: they paid for parish priests, private chaplains, monks, nuns, friars, and paupers, to intercede with Heaven on their behalf. The borough customs setting standards for trade practices, in their attempt to permit equality of participation, may have been appropriate to an early era of urban development, but were not to the late Middle Ages, when free trade was more desirable as the economy (at first) expanded and a greater share of international commerce came into the hands of Englishmen. The constant repetition of custumal prohibitions itself shows how commonly they were ignored. Leet jurisdiction, and the assizes it usually encompassed, had largely been turned into licensing proceedings, amercements generally being accommodated by the profit-margin of the offending activities; even with nuisance offences we find the same charges being presented session after session. Between 1367 and 1382 Henry Bosse of Colchester was repeatedly amerced for anti-social offences such as: obstructing the road at the Hythe with posts; building dungheaps in Eld Lane and Wyre Street, the blockage causing the latter to flood; detaining rent due the community; excavating sand from the highway near the Hythe; enclosing part of a lane near Dedham; and encroaching on common land at Hakeney's Lane and diverting a water-course there. In addition, he was presented on numerous occasions between 1373 and 1392 for charging excessive toll on the corn of townsmen brought to his mill to be ground, and in 1406 his forestalling activities caused a shortage of cheap fish in the town. After his death, one son continued his father's corn-toll offences, and another tried to monopolise the town's fulling industry via 'protection racket' tactics.[60] The millers, as well as the vintners, of the town were regular performers at the leet cabaret; in 1382 the former were amerced en bloc for conspiring to grind their corn before that of others of the community at the times of the fairs. [61]

Forestalling, arguably the worst breach of market ethics, was occasionally punished with severity,[62] but was nonetheless widespread and not to be discouraged. Brokerage and hostage, the one illegal, the other abused, were also recurrent problems that (by their nature) were restricted to the merchant class. The latter practice, of placing each foreign merchant visiting the town under the supervision of a freeman host, who took as his fee a percentage of the foreigner's merchandise, is found at Lynn, Yarmouth, Norwich, and Ipswich. It had been intended originally as a device for guaranteeing local men a role in the trade of foreigners and for controlling the commercial activities of those merchants. It can easily be imagined how this left the visitors and local marketing largely at the mercy of the hosts. Borough governments fluctuated between policies of stricter regulation and abolition of the practice; in the thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries we also find provision for bargains to be made before the town officers or special witnesses.[63] A more exceptional problem was the discovery, in 1429, that several Lynn merchants had engaged in the slave-trade of Icelandic children. The record does not make it clear whether English morals were offended - certainly the affair did not prevent one of those guilty, John Boston, being elected to the Common Council a few days later - but Icelandic authorities were none too happy, and Lynn's trade with that country had been jeopardised.[64] Lack of scruples was not always an asset for the businessman, however. Thomas le Rente, exploiting the cumbersome and lengthy judicial process, managed to delay or even avoid repaying his debts by simply neglecting to make court appearances; but this device worked against him in 1321, when his absences facilitated his removal, by political opponents, from the office of bailiff. In 1316 Robert de Fordele contracted to buy salt and timber from Zeeland merchants for £169, but reneged on the agreement when the market price of salt dropped; subsequently, his own financial arrangements with the Count of Zeeland fell through, to his considerable loss, partly due to the resistance of Dutch merchants to the repayment scheme.[65] And Philip Wyth's eagerness to get his hands on the property of a female relative who had gone mad, perhaps as the result of the death of her husband, which led him (it was claimed) to bribe a jury investigating her state of mind, served only to make him unpopular with his fellow townsmen.[66]

🔍 previous

next 🔍

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 1

The Structure of Borough Government

The Community as Political Entity

The purpose of the borough council was partly to provide a formal mechanism for supplying the executive with the legal advice needed to make decisions, partly to ensure that consultation with at least some members of the community occurred before decisions were finalised. The fact that it became necessary to institute second councils, to represent interests that the original council had been supposed to, is symptomatic of a modification of borough constitutional theory. This theory rested upon the principle of the community as the source of governmental authority. The basic objection to the form of pre-charter borough governments was that the executive was responsible to the king rather than to the community. By communitas is meant more than just the aggregate of individual residents; it implies joint interest, united action - in fact a corporate existence of which charters of incorporation were little more than a belated acknowledgement. Like probi homines, the term is not always used consistently in the sources, but the change in application is more easily perceived. Before towns acquired self-government, 'burgesses' referred to all residents who were at scot and lot - that is, contributing to the financial obligations (e.g. royal taxations) laid on the town as a whole. Following the fee farm grants, the status of burgess, with associated superior privileges related to the chartered liberties, was accorded only to those who elected to support the new local government in special ways: an immediate contribution to the borough treasury in the form of an entrance fine; and the taking of an oath to defend the borough liberties, keep secret matters discussed in assembly, and be obedient to the executive.[\[112\]](#) Henceforth the term 'community' appears sometimes applied only to the freemen, but sometimes used in addition as a more comprehensive reference to all tax-paying residents.[\[113\]](#) At first an inclusive term, it later came to be interpreted, as we shall see, as referring to a lower estate; the higher estate being the personnel of government, who saw themselves as the 'burgesses' of the titles of incorporation.[\[114\]](#)

It can be argued that the borough community had a corporate personality long before the introduction of incorporation grants involving the Five Points: rights of perpetual succession, possession of a common seal, ownership of property, making of by-laws, suing and being sued. We have already seen that legislative power was inherent in the concept of the town council. Communal ownership of property - churches and fields within the liberty - is seen as early as Domesday; in 1200 the Ipswich community granted Odenholm meadow to the perpetual use of the portmen, as a reward for their service. The community as a whole, rather than its individual members, was responsible for paying royal taxes and the borough farm. [115] The medieval town seal of Yarmouth was inscribed "Sigillum Communitatis de Gernemuthae", and that of Colchester "Colecestrensis sui Burgi comune sigillum"; that of Norwich, although inscribed "Sigillum Ballivorum Norwici", was on at least one occasion described as "sigillum Communitatis Norwici". [116] The 1200 proceedings in Ipswich included the making of a common seal, ad serviendum in grossis negociis tangentibus communitatem dicti Burgi, et eciam ad litteras inde consignandas de veritate testificandas pro omnibus et singulis Burgensibus eiusdem Burgi, et ad omnia alia facienda que fieri debeant ad communem honorem et utilitatem ville predictae;[117]

so that the seal could not be used without common consent, clavigers were appointed to have custody of the keys of the chest in which the seal and other communal treasures were kept, a constitutional feature confirmed in the 1320 ordinances. [118]

The community was quite capable of playing the parts of plaintiff or defendant in court. In 1329 the abbot of St. John's successfully sued twenty named men and the whole community of Colchester for disseising him of land in Greenstead. The abbots' periodic legal battles with the community over jurisdiction in the hamlets surrounding the borough are well documented in the Red Paper and Red Parchment Books and in abbey records, whilst the leet records in Colchester's court rolls show, in turn, the many charges which the community brought against the abbot. [119] In fact leet jurisdiction was concerned not so much with offences against individuals but against the community as a whole; for instance: illicit trading by non-freemen who had not purchased a licence from the community; the blocking of common ditches, thoroughfares, or the market-place with refuse; allowing one's livestock to roam freely in the streets. Also that most heinous of crimes, denying the right of every freeman to an equal share in any sale of merchandise, by forestalling the goods before they reached port or market. Thus, in 1406 Henry Bosse, John Kymberle and three other men were amerced for forestalling a cargo of fish bound for Colchester and then refusing to let any burgess have a share unless he paid them a 20d. premium, this action causing a shortage of fish at affordable prices. Again, in 1359 John Pebemarsch and five fellow-bakers were convicted of "oppressing the people" by arranging with the town millers to have their corn ground before that of the community. [120] Forestalling was probably that much more a grievous sin for freemen than non-freemen, for in the former's case it involved breaking one's oath of loyalty to the community; which oath was intended to create a special bond of unity and mutual support between equals (pares). [121]

As evidence that the notion of 'community' is not one imposed by the historian in retrospect, we may note a court battle of 1326 between the men of Great Yarmouth and those of Little Yarmouth and Gorleston, over market jurisdictions. The attornies of Great Yarmouth successfully argued that their opponents ought not to be heard because they formed no community, had no common seal, and so had no communal rights, whereas Great Yarmouth had been a borough possessing such rights since Domesday.[122]

The vehicle of expression of the will of the community was the assembly, which Mrs. Green described as "the most conspicuous, if the most unwieldy, symbol of the authority of the people." [123] Its roots lay in the very ancient institution of the folk moot. A Yarmouth conveyance of c.1168-75 was witnessed by "the elder and younger of the town", presumably meaning such a meeting; and in the twelfth century a communitas acting corporately to receive or make grants (pre-dating any visible city officialdom) indicates the same. But it is rare for a folk moot to leave documentary evidence.[124] The folk moot always lay at the bottom level of the borough constitutional hierarchy. At Ipswich meetings took place in a court context, the Great Court alias portmanmoot, which was transmuted in the fifteenth century (as the Petty Court absorbed the purely judicial functions) into the General Court, a strictly administrative organ. At Colchester meetings were recorded amongst judicial business, but the title of "assembly" was accorded these entries. At Lynn and Norwich separate series of records were the by-product of assembly meetings, known under the title of Congregatio Communitatis, a tautological title since the two terms were effectively synonymous.[125]

Regardless of the actual practice of government, the theory of authority deriving from the community remained in force throughout the medieval period. Although, in effect, the role of the greater part of the populace in Ipswich in 1200 may have been a passive one, the setting up of an administration took place in the context of the folk moot, and the assent of the community - "ordinatum est per commune consilium dicte villate", "concessum est per totam Communitatem", "de communi assensu et una voce" - is clearly indispensable to the proceedings. The communal authority behind legislation is also clearly expressed in the custumal. [126] It is seen not only with regard to legislation, but also in other matters. Particularly in the granting of taxations, and the leasing of plots of common soil and other community properties or sources of profit, always said to be made either by town officers and community or sometimes just the community. Also in the vetting of applicants for the franchise; in 1346 Richard Randolf was turned down on his first application because "communitas ipsum noluit admittere", perhaps because he had a bad reputation.[127] Again, the mayor of Lynn was forbidden to impose taxes or make any financial commitments on behalf of the borough without the advice and consent of his comburgesses and the commons. [128] Perhaps the best statement of the theory of community authority is found in chapter 38 of the Norwich custumal, ordaining that:

quia mercandia in civitate est et esse debet communibus communis omnibus qui sunt pares civitatis (it is the duty of the bailiffs to investigate and punish infringements of this equal shares principle) ne communitas in defectum Ballivorum remedium apponere cogatur. [129]

Ironically, it was in Norwich that the theory was most successfully subverted. A focal point of the constitutional conflict there in the early fifteenth century stemmed from the action of the city rulers in 1380 - a secret action, without community consent, their opponents later claimed - in obtaining a grant from the king of legislative powers on the same lines as those obtained by London in 1341, but omitting the London clause requiring community assent to all legislation. This proviso was restored to Norwich's constitution by the settlement of 1415, but its effect was considerably dampened by the simultaneous introduction of the Common Council to give the assent in place of the open assembly, and by the interim strengthening of the city rulers, particularly by the incorporation charter of 1404.[130]

👈 previous

next 👉

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 7

Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

Discords and Disputes: Maldon and Colchester

First we will briefly mention the conflicts that occurred elsewhere than Lynn. Maldon exhibits no indication of any such problems. Several factors may be proposed to explain this: we know very little of the borough's history before the 1380s; constitutional development there was comparatively retarded, so that community authority, via the leet jury, retained a good deal of say in government prior to the crystallisation of the aldermannic elite (after the period covered by this study); as Maldon was the least prosperous of our towns, there was less opportunity for a wealth gap to divide the members of the community into clear-cut classes with antagonistic interests.[\[25\]](#)

At Colchester there is no direct evidence of organised expressed of discontent except for the 1372 ordinances, whose contents have largely been divulged elsewhere in this study. Even on that occasion of obvious dissatisfaction with ballival government we do not know whether the reforms were passed after some violent upheaval[\[26\]](#) or whether as an in-house measure designed to spread office-holding amongst a larger group. Although there is no sign of any permanent displacement of pre-1372 ruling personnel, the reforms do seem to have been aimed at a few specific erring bailiffs, perhaps particularly the atte Fordes, rather than at a privileged ruling class as a whole. A division in the ranks of the Colchester potentiores may be implied in the reforms' pre-amble, referring to earlier constitutions ordained by "all the community, and the more worthy sworn men of the town", but this is not the only interpretation that could be placed on the phrase. The abuses of government were countered principally by improvements in the accounting system: introduction of financial officers, clavigers (none of whom were to be bailiffs), and an auditing committee selected from a council which itself may or may not have been an innovation in 1372. Additionally, stricter control was placed on ballival salaries and the frequency of holding office. The emphasis on electors and receivers of being chosen from non-bailiffs, and on account-giving being made in public, give a democratic flavour to the reforms. Yet, at the same time, there was an effort to bring discipline to assembly participation by requiring that burgesses present requests or complaints in writing, rather than orally.[\[27\]](#)

This political revitalisation, perhaps a product of economic revitalisation as the cloth industry developed with the influx of Flemish migrants and as commerce correspondingly grew, bringing a number of new men into the ruling class,[28] may have encouraged more popular participation than was desired, for we subsequently find the new rulers digging in their heels. A set of ordinances probably dating from the first quarter of the fifteenth century, reacting against popular agitation at elections, insisted that only freemen householders had a right to vote, and added that at least a quarter of the electoral committee ought to be councillors, whilst the four chief electors should be men of substance, to ensure that capable persons be chosen as officers.[29] There is a slight hint here of popular discontent with the existing ruling class, but it leaves no trace in other records. An earlier dispute, in 1395, over the election of sergeants (particularly whether the bailiffs should have any influence therein) is somewhat confused and ended again with the affirmation of the role of the electoral committee.[30]

← previous

next →

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 1

The Structure of Borough Government

Representation and Election

If the actual practice of consultation and consent did not correspond precisely to the theory that all governmental decisions had to be authorized by the whole membership of the community, this does not mean that statements in the records expressing the theory were insincere. In 1286 a Norwich thief was convicted before "Ballivis et tota Communitate totius civitatis in Tolboth";[\[131\]](#) but we cannot take literally, nor are we expected to believe, that every single townsman in one of England's largest cities could be fitted into the small building that housed local government. The practicality of day-to-day administration necessitated the device of representation, as Miss McKisack points out, "not indeed as a principle, but as an expedient."[\[132\]](#) From this fact alone we might reasonably suspect that some sort of conciliar machinery is likely to have existed from the early days of each borough's independence. The transfer of the focus of government from the open-air folkmoots held in the churchyards of St. Mary Tower in Ipswich and St. Michael de Motestow in Norwich, to the town halls in the market-places of each, reflects the convenience of representation.[\[133\]](#) One feature of this convenience was that it could be assumed that assent to the acts or decisions of government by those actually present at the time was equivalent to the assent of, and binding on, every member of the community. This is the understanding behind phrases such as "the bailiffs and the whole community".

Those present generally meant the town council, for attendance on behalf of the community was their duty. On 29 June 1200 the Ipswich folkmoot gathered, elected bailiffs and coroners (as per the town's new charter), and then decided to elect the portmen, to which body it would delegate "plenam potestatem pro se et tota villata ad gubernandum".[\[134\]](#) With that election the initiative of the community ended, and it left its representatives to sort out the details of administrative structure, reserving however the right to assent to (and therefore, theoretically, reject) any of these details. The record of the 1345 electoral assembly in Norwich states that the 24 were elected to govern on behalf of (pro) the community, and similar references may be found with regard to the councils of Lynn (1322, 1342), Ipswich (1312), and Colchester (c.1401-05).[\[135\]](#) In 1376, when a powerful but rebellious member of Lynn's community was threatening to take legal action against the borough government, the mayor and 33 other burgesses present that day in the gildhall drew up a declaration of hostility and united resistance to the rebel, signing it "pro se ipsis et omnibus absentibus".[\[136\]](#)

M.P.s are another of the more obvious examples of representation. The king insisted that they have full power to treat, speak and agree on behalf of their communities, who accordingly delegated this authority to the M.P.s via letters of attorney sealed with the common seal. It is interesting to note that the issuing of such letters in Lynn was particularly carefully recorded during the administration of the popularly supported reform party (1411-14). Parliaments were of course not the only meetings to which boroughs were enjoined to send representatives with power to act for the community.[137] Delegating authority involves the agreement of the delegator to accept the actions of the delegatee. This is usually implicit, although it was written into the record of the election in Lynn, in 1313, of a committee charged with determining how to further community business in parliament. On the other hand, delegation does not give carte blanche to the delegatee, who is expected to know the limitations of his power. Thus, when Colchester bailiff John atte Forde died in office in 1375, his associate continued in the ballivalty alone (rather than having a replacement elected, as was usually the case) "not of his own prompting, but by the counsel given him by the commonalty". And when an Ipswich man insisted on his right of having enrolled in borough records a deed drawn up by his wife, the bailiffs - although protesting that to enrol a deed that had no legal validity would only discredit borough government - were powerless to refuse him.[138]

The right of consent is one of the basic safeguards of a democracy; the other is control of elections. The device of indirect election has been blamed for contributing to the subversion of the democratic element in the borough constitution. Mrs. Green may be right that it "was admirably suited to the use and convenience of the minority", but there is no positive evidence that town rulers manipulated or influenced the process to ensure that men of their preference were elected.[139] The use of electoral committees was in fact a common and long-established method, whose intent shows no sign of having been to deprive the majority of their influence; it simply appealed to the taste for orderliness. The election of Ipswich's portmen in 1200 was made, apparently with full approval of the populace, by a committee of four men per parish, picked by the bailiffs; essentially the same method was used in 1309, when the electors were said to be acting on behalf of themselves and the rest of the community. Bailiffs and other officers were elected directly by the community, and this was still the case in 1434.[140] The first indication of indirect election that we have from Maldon is in the earliest recorded version of the custumal (1444), which reveals that officers were elected by the wardemen. [141] This must originally have had the same democratic quality as an electoral committee while the wardemen themselves were elected annually, but by 1444 they were becoming a life-membership body, thus removing elections from popular control. At Colchester the method of indirect election was introduced as part of the reform package of 1372 and was evidently thought of, along with the creation of receivers and auditors to supervise finances, as a check on ballival power. The process was as follows: the community was to choose 4 persons who would co-opt twenty others; these 24, none of whom was to have held ballival office, were to elect bailiffs, auditors and receivers; the electors were to take oath that, in the choices they made, they would not be influenced by love nor hatred, procurement, gift nor affinity." [142] In 1406 a second set of electors was introduced to elect town clerk, coroners, clavigers, and sergeants, who were elected on a different day from the more important officers; on this occasion the initial four of each electoral committee were deliberately chosen from the councillors, but this did not become standard practice. The basis of elections before 1372 is unknown, but the constables of the peace at least were elected by the community in 1312.

[143]

In 1344 the town council of Norwich was elected by the community; the method of electing bailiffs is not indicated at this point, but in 1365 election was made by a committee of 24 which may or may not have been the popularly-elected council. The 1415 composition produced a compromise electoral form whereby the freeman assembly might nominate two mayoral candidates, one of whom would be selected by the then-mayor and upper council; as already noted, by this time the community had lost control of election of that council. Only after the disturbances of the 1440s was a move made towards displacing the open assembly, by requiring Common Council and ward constables to select a mayor from two nominees put forward by mayor and aldermen; but this was only a version of the electoral committee, since councillors and constables were still elected democratically.[144] In Lynn too the council of jurats was initially elected by the community (1305, 1322), but by 1346 a 12-man electoral committee was choosing the jurats and all other officers; during the 1370s and '80s the committee elected only 12 of the jurats and then joined them to make up the full 24, but this experiment was subsequently dropped. The electoral committee was no innovation in Lynn in 1346, for it had been used to select the parliamentary committee of 1313; we find the system operating also for the selection of officers of socio-religious guilds.[145] The system itself was not viewed as undemocratic, even by the fifteenth century reformers, who used it during their administration to elect M.P.s. What they objected to, however, was that the first four electors, who co-opted the remainder, were chosen by the Gild Merchant alderman. The reformers gave (or returned, they claimed) this task to the assembly, but the alteration did not outlive their administration. The reformers proposed to amend mayoral elections so that the assembly would nominate two jurats, from whom mayor and jurats would select one for the following year's mayor. Again this did not survive, the electoral committee being restored and the alderman sworn to choose the first four electors without favour or fraud "de indifferentibus et non suspectis." [146]

It has been claimed that Yarmouth had a wider electorate than other East Anglian towns, but the evidence for this rests on a single document the nature of which is by no means clear.[147] Two small membranes contain a list of 89 names, the identities of these townsmen suggesting a date circa the last decade of the thirteenth century, so that "22 E.I" added in a later hand may be correct. We are told that "Isti in istis .ij. cedalis composuerunt cartam de sigillo communitatis sigillatam ad ballivos in villa ista eligendos", but this helps us little. Whether these were merely the witnesses to some document setting out the electoral method, or were those participating in an election, or were a list from whom an electoral committee was chosen (some names having marks beside them), we simply cannot tell. Clear evidence of Yarmouth's electoral system is not forthcoming until 1386, when we see the community electing the council of 24, which in turn was to elect the town officers; there is no indication whether this method was traditional or an innovation. The herring warders instituted in 1413 were to be elected annually by the community, although it is not inconceivable that this might have meant the community as represented by the 24. In 1491 reforms, said to be based on custom and earlier ordinances, produced a complicated system of indirect election, one feature of which was the selection of an electoral committee by an illiterate man pulling names out of hats.[148]

Borough parliamentary elections have received the attention of many historians and we may look briefly at these. Parliamentary returns from Norfolk and Suffolk are fairly detailed, compared to those for most other counties; they provide not only the names of M.P.s but also those of the returning officers of the towns. Many of the local indentures of the fifteenth century survive too; at first glance they seem informative, but can be misleading as to electoral method. As Houghton has pointed out, the purpose of an indenture was not to detail the course of the election, but to satisfy Chancery that it was conducted according to the specifications of the royal government - essentially, open election of suitable delegates who were residents of the locality represented.[149] At Lynn, as far back as the records show (1373), each election of M.P.s was by a 12-man committee usually chosen for that sole purpose and mostly from members of the corporation, although this was a question of convenient practice, not a constitutional principle.[150] Regarding the election of November 1420, the indenture tells us that the steward of Lynn (who had return of writs) and 12 named burgesses unanimously elected the M.P.s, whereas local record indicates that election was made by the usual committee, which has only two names in common with the indenture list.[151] The names found on this, and other indentures, were in actuality persons testifying that the election was conducted properly.

Indentures from Yarmouth usually tell us that the bailiffs "made to be elected" M.P.s in the presence of, or sometimes by, 4 named witnesses; although in 1449 we are told that bailiffs, coroners and community unanimously elected the M.P.s. As regards Ipswich, named witnesses testify that bailiffs, coroners and burgesses, some occasionally named, unanimously elected their representatives. Whilst from Colchester we hear that in 1455 12 men, by the assent of all the burgesses, made the election; whereas in 1472 it was made by the greater part of the more sufficient resident burgesses.[152] From local sources we learn that Norwich M.P.s were to be chosen by common assembly (1415). Those of Maldon, it is stated in the sixteenth century recension of the custumal, were customarily made by bailiffs, burgesses, freemen, and commonalty. Ipswich elections of the fifteenth century are frequently recorded as made by bailiffs, portmen, and the whole community.[153]

How literally we may take these statements is another matter. Wedgwood was willing to take the Yarmouth indentures at their face value, whereas Saul, dealing with the previous century, concluded from the absence of references to popular election that M.P.s were probably appointed by the bailiffs.[154] The Ipswich ordinance of 1474, stressing that resident burgesses were the rightful electors of M.P.s and town officials, was not, as McKisack believed, an assertion of democratic election in the face of monopolisation by the persons named in the indentures, but a measure to prevent participation (i.e. interference) by outsiders. [155] Only in Lynn do we encounter a genuine complaint when, in 1419, several burgesses objected to the use of the electoral committee, arguing that M.P.s should be elected openly by the whole community, which had to pay their expenses. However, this objection, by the die-hards of the defeated reform party, was quickly refuted by reference to the recent constitutional settlement.^[156] If we hear little of electoral practice before the late fourteenth century, it is probably because M.P.s were only functionaries acting under the instructions of their local governments; control of the election of M.P.s at any time in the Middle Ages was of far less importance than control of the election of those governments.

The same problem holds true of elections of other officers: that when we hear that executive or council are elected by "totam communitatem unanimi consensu", or some such phrase, we are reluctant to take this literally. The question of the 'whole community' is accounted for by the theory of representation. As for unanimity, it was evidently considered desirable to project the image that the borough community acted 'one for all, and all for one', as was implied in the taking of an oath of loyalty by every freeman. Perhaps the royal government was a particular target for this myth, to avoid the risk of royal intervention in internal affairs. Susan Reynolds doubts that in borough elections or decision-making generally "the votes of the townspeople were considered equal and counted, or that the process was intended to be democratic."^[157] Yet occasionally we are afforded glimpses that suggest otherwise. Norwich's 1415 composition provided that each of the mayoral candidates be nominated by majority shout, a crude method which contrasts with the choice between candidates made by majority vote of mayor and aldermen, as determined by secret ballot. Similarly in Lynn, a dissenting voice on 29 August 1412 led to a vote as to whether the assembly could proceed with the election scheduled, and those in favour were asked to sit; whether a careful head count would have been taken is unknown, since in this case only half a dozen people remained conspicuously aloft (perhaps the intended effect). In 1419 we hear that, of the two men nominated as Common Councillor for one of the constabularies, the electors of that constabulary chose John Muriell by a vote of 27 to 14; whilst in 1430 John Emneth was elected by 6 votes more than the alternate candidate. Furthermore the vote on a proposed ordinance was recorded in 1427, and shows the names of the 16 councillors who voted against and the 5 who voted in favour; it should be noted, however, that the ordinance was subsequently passed when the jurats cast their votes in support.^[158] The circumstances which led to recording of the votes in the cases mentioned above may have been out of the ordinary, but there is no reason to think that counting votes individually was. The principle of majority vote was sometimes written into the constitution, partly because not all members of the legislature were able to attend every meeting and lack of a quorum could hinder the transaction of business. But more often it was because minorities in opposition were no longer willing to acquiesce in their defeat.^[159]

← previous

next →

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

Created: July 30, 1998. Last update: October 30, 1998

© Stephen Alford, 1998-2003

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 6

The Quality of Government

The Practice: Reconciling Paternalism and Self-interest

Before examining the criminality of the ruling class, let us see what good we may say of it. An examination of corporation policies would be unlikely to help us greatly here, for it does not follow that the rulers were acting disinterestedly when they carried out programmes relating to, say, the provision of sewage or fresh-water facilities, enhancement of the town's liberties, or regulation of its trade and industry. Although we should not over-readily interpret regulation of commerce as selfish protectionism in the face of a troubled economy,^[15] the welfare of the businesses of individuals was dependent to a large extent upon the welfare of the town as a whole. It may therefore be argued that, since the office-holding class held larger shares in the trade of the borough, it was correspondingly more in their interest to foster and to control urban affairs, of all kinds. Perhaps such a hidden ambition made office-holding more palatable to the wealthy townsmen. However, we may briefly examine two terms of government that stand out simply by the fact that the town clerks of the time took the unusual step of summarising their achievements.

The first is the Colchester ballivalty of William Reyne in 1373/4. One ought to say the ballivalty of William Reyne and John Clerk, but the author of the account of the ballivalty was so absorbed in the role of Reyne, possibly the senior bailiff, as the instigator of reform and improvement that he added the name of Clerk only as an afterthought. So lavish was the praise laid by author on bailiff that Harrod, cataloguing the town records, was shocked by the impropriety:

Reyne certainly had been most active and valuable, and a simple record of his services would have been grateful to our feelings, but when we are told the whole country went into fits because he put in stone steps for brick, ridicule is brought on both parties.^[16]

Harrod notwithstanding, the historian may regret that there is not more of this detailed reporting (however biased) of governmental affairs. The identity of the author of the panegyric is not yet known for certain,^[17] but it is a fair guess that it was the town clerk. The enthusiasm of the account strongly suggests it to have been written roughly contemporary with the events, for at a later period some of the 'achievements' of the year might have paled; at that time the clerk was Robert Beche. Benham believed that Michael Aunger, responsible for other chronicular passages, was the author; but Aunger does not appear in Colchester until 1380, when Beche (still town clerk) died - his will being proven, significantly, on the same day that Aunger was made a freeman.[18] It is not impossible that Aunger was earlier an assistant to Beche, but there is no evidence for this. No matter; neither Beche nor Aunger exhibit any relationship with Reyne outside of the corporation context, so we cannot attribute the account to personal favouritism. It has been suggested that Reyne himself dictated the eulogy,[19] but this can neither be proved nor disproved. Yet we have already noted that Reyne was that rarity of a man actively pursuing borough office[20] and he may have been equally rare in his energetic efforts to further, rather than simply maintain, the well-being of his town (not least for his own profit, bearing in mind that he was farming the ballivalty). Furthermore, the self-confidence he demonstrated in proposing, to the corporation, the unorthodox method of access to office is not incompatible with the idea that he would have wished to leave a record of his accomplishments. However, a more acceptable explanation for the account lies in the general environment of the time. 1372 had seen major constitutional reforms, revitalising Colchester's government and giving rise to the borough's books of memoranda.[21] The account of the 1373/4 ballivalty was simply part of this programme and its associated enthusiasm, which did not end with that ballivalty, but in fact continued on throughout the decade, in increasingly less detail as the initial burst of energy used itself up.

Reyne's vigorous administration no doubt contributed to the interest in recording the events of his term of office. He is credited with:

- re-negotiating with the farmer an increase in the farm paid for town tolls, without the farmer raising tolls to recoup;
- renovating the town hall cellar and having the wool-market moved there, from a private site, so that the lease of stalls would profit the community treasury;
- making more equitable the taxation system, by requiring all residents, not merely freemen, to contribute;
- beautifying the town hall by various structural or ornamental additions;
- recovering a parcel of common soil which had been usurped into private hands;
- centralising the cloth fair at a special site in the market by the town hall; and
- improving the lot of town prisoners by allowing them out of gaol to sit (chained to posts) by the town hall, to beg for their necessaries.[22]

Reyne is thus depicted as a man of initiative - but not a dictator, for he is seen consulting with his councillors before rendering decisions - and as a man with pride in his town, with compassion for the oppressed, a sense of equal justice, but also with a policy of increasing community revenues. In other words, displaying the very qualities that the community of Colchester expected in a governor. We may infer too a certain shrewd business sense: having relocated the wool-market to a site where under community control, he promptly farmed it from the community during the following year and made a large profit from the lease of stalls, although he is said to have given this profit to the community.

The extent to which Reyne's policies were truly innovative is partly obscured by the enthusiasm of the records, but he certainly seems to exemplify the medieval ideal of government for the common good. In 1425 a shorter and slightly less florid, but no less unprecedented, record of the accomplishments of the Lynn mayoralty of John Permonter (1423-25) was entered into the Hall Book.[23] Like Reyne, we have met Permonter before in an unusual context: extorting promises of exceptionally high salaries before accepting mayoral office in 1427 and 1431.[24] Here again, therefore, we have a man with confidence in his administrative capabilities, holding executive office more frequently than might reasonably have been required of him. Possibly the account of his mayoralty was prompted by the fact that, during most of the reign of Henry V, Lynn had been in inner turmoil as a bitter struggle for control of government ensued. Despite the formal settlement of 1420, some embers of resentment still burned; it seems that Permonter strove successfully to smooth over the remaining ruffled feelings. The achievements principally specified, however, were repair of town ditches, construction of a reservoir to irrigate the burgesses' extra-mural fields, and acquisition of land along the route of a water-course intended to supply fresh-water conduits. This last was in fact a project begun by mayor John Spicer in 1421; interestingly, the election of Spicer provides further suggestion of long-term policy, in his post-electoral speech (which has the air of a political platform) relating the intention of amending the abuse whereby butchers had gradually deserted the butchers' market in favour of selling from private shops, to the loss of community revenue.[25]

If the official acts of men like William Reyne and John Permonter were, in effect if not so clearly in intention, to the benefit of themselves and their fellows of the ruling class at least as much as to the benefit of the community at large, a more unequivocal paternalism occasionally appears in attitudes towards the poorer members of the community. A Colchester reform of 1447 was said to be passed by the members of the corporation in protection of "our povere comburgeis." [26] This notion of protection is exemplified also in the ordinance of 1411/2 permitting weavers to refuse acceptance of wages in merchandise and victuals, rather than cash, since their masters would try to pawn off on the weavers goods worth less than the claimed cash value; the bailiffs promised any wronged weaver justice with the speed of piepowder proceedings.[27] In the seasonal lists of women breaking the ale assize at Colchester we find that the poorer women were pardoned their fines, which we must remember were not usually intended as punishments of a practice that was widespread and tolerated. And at Lynn in 1421 William Walden, described as amicus pauperum, proposed to the assembly that the poor (viz. those whose assessments were below 6s.8d) be exempted from the latest tax.[28] In 1382, when repairs were being carried out on Colchester's wall, a house built onto the wall, inhabited by pauper John Hampton and his wife, was obstructing the work. It was necessary to tear down the house, but the bailiffs ordered that it be rebuilt at community expense on a plot of land granted to Hampton at a nominal rent.[29]

Borough corporations, however, were not - nor could they afford to be - charitable institutions. Nonetheless they approved of charity and were inclined to take a hand in fostering and administering leper-houses and hospitals for the old or poor. For example, c.1278 the prominent Yarmouth ruler William Gerberge endowed (perhaps founded) the Hospital of St. Mary with a bequest of rents from 13 properties, totalling 9 marks. In 1386 the corporation assumed control of the hospital, laid out a set of regulations for its administration, and acquired (1392) from the king licence in mortmain for the hospital to hold further property: a message, 17 cottages and 100s. in rents, collected by the corporation, and 7 cottages provided by the Stalham family to support paupers.[30] But for the most part charitable activity was left to the socio-religious gilds. It was not uncommon for these gilds, even the poorer of them, to support not only impoverished members with annual or weekly payments, but also non-member paupers.[31] Lynn's Merchant Gild, with its superior resources, was able to expand its sphere of charitable operations correspondingly further. In 1389 the gild declared that it set aside £30 annually for alms. Not only did it support members who had fallen on hard times, but also widows, paupers, the aged, lepers, hermits, and anchorites; it financed the schooling of poor clerics, subsidised the friaries in the borough, maintained the community conduits, repaired and enlarged the town churches, and had its officers visit the sick and poor four times a year.[32]

Charity was also, of course, a private affair; but all too often we must rely on wills for evidence of it. Deathbed repentance, piety and conscience, the stimuli for works of charity, may well have been sincere, but they do not necessarily reveal anything about the charitable attitudes or activities of men earlier in their lives. It was no great hardship to men who worshipped money as much as they worshipped God to make arrangements for the welfare of their souls when their bodies were beyond caring for.[33] When we learn, for example, that William Daniel of Norwich bequeathed £10 to be spent on extinguishing the debts of prisoners in the castle and gildhall, that William Sedman of the same left £20 for distribution to the poor of Norwich and area and £26.13.4d to the poor of other East Anglian towns, or that John Burghard of Lynn provided £50 to be distributed among paupers attending his funeral, £5 among paupers too sick to attend, and £7 among his poor relations and widows in Stoke and Burton,[34] we are unable to assess the extent to which such generosity is guided by sympathy for those less fortunate than the testator, and how much by the doctrine of purgatory. We need not doubt that the poor relied on gifts such as these to alleviate the austerity of their lives, but we are none the wiser to the attitudes of the givers.

Despite the notoriety that medieval towns have acquired as breeding-grounds for heresy, and despite the burgesses' admiration for the communistic life of the friars in contrast to the worldly clergy, it is difficult to discover in the religiosity of the upper classes of East Anglian towns anything other than the Catholic orthodoxy that accepted and even promoted class hierarchy as a natural state of affairs.[35] Tanner's careful study of religious attitudes in medieval Norwich brought him to the conclusion that the city was "remarkably untouched by heresy." [36] Nor is there much trace of it in any of our other towns. It may be that the infrequent public burnings (usually of non-townsmen) were sufficient encouragement to conformity, actual or disguised, in the period of Lollardy. Margery Kempe may have been influenced, unconsciously, by Lollard beliefs - certainly some contemporaries accused her of this - but she is an extreme case, and was viewed with disapproval by her fellow residents of Lynn.[37] At Lynn in 1429 councillor John Springwell, jurat John Wyth, and town clerk Thomas Chevele were arrested by the Bishop's officers on heresy charges, whilst in 1428 William Gant of Colchester was denounced as a heretic and sent before the diocesan court of the Bishop of London. But all these men were able to clear themselves, and all subsequently held borough office. In the case of Gant, at least, there is reason to suspect that the accusation was a machination of the abbot of St. John's, then involved in a territorial dispute with the community.[38]

In addition to being benefactors of the poor, testators might also leave something to the community as a whole, by way of a contribution to its expenses: amounts to repair or maintain town walls, bridges, harbours. For instance: Thomas Pond, bailiff of Yarmouth in the reign of Edward IV, left 6s.8d towards repair of the "great bridge" at Yarmouth; Thomas Aylred, bailiff and coroner of Ipswich, bequeathed in 1301 40s. annual rent, from several properties, to maintain the bridge between Ipswich and Stoke; and John Burghard of Lynn left 20s. to the repair of the road between Lynn and Setchey, 20s. to the repair of the road and bridge of his birthplace Stoke, 40s. to the repair of Lynn bridges, and 100s. to the repair of the road between Lynn and Wootton.[39] While such bequests reveal that the testators were aware of the needs of the community - at Yarmouth the port, so frequently silting up to the great harm of the town's trade, received many bequests - they also reflect the needs of the testator and his peers: the facilities that usually received bequests were those on which the testator had relied in life for the transport of his merchandise or for guaranteeing the security of his investments, just as bequests to extra-urban churches reflect his rural landed interests and the sphere of his local mercantile activities. Furthermore, these civic-minded bequests are one of the more minor features of wills; the testator provided for his soul and his family first, and for his hometown only if there was something left over. It is generally only the wealthiest testators who left bequests of other than nominal sums to civic projects, and then often as secondary bequests to be fulfilled if primary bequests could not be realized. Nor can we entirely exclude the possibility that civic bequests were essentially an extension of charitable bequests, to ease the conscience and provide for the soul.[40]

On the other hand, there are examples of benefaction to the community during the lifetime of the benefactor. To some extent we may include here the rebuilding or embellishment of parish churches in this period, although this phenomenon was a mixture of genuine piety, civic pride, and pride in personal achievements. In fact there is an ambiguity to several of these benefactions. In 1365 Richard de Haveringlond provided Ipswich's government with the money for making of weights and a balance for wool-weighing, Ipswich having been appointed one of the new staples. Ignoring the facts that this was only a loan and that Richard, a former bailiff, had just been elected mayor of the staple, we may note that this was a shrewd move beneficial to no-one more than Richard himself, one of the major merchants of the town who, in 1364, had had to arrange for the Yarmouth weighing equipment to be transported to Ipswich in order to avoid the costs of carriage of his wool to Yarmouth.[41] In 1435 John de Caldwell offered to finance the construction of a new bridge between Ipswich and Stoke, on condition that the community pay for the end posts. In 1449 the same man "inspired by charity took it upon himself to make or have made a town gaol" by the west gates, and on the same occasion offered of his own free will ("spontanee super se assumpsit") to pay the parliamentary wages owing, since 1447, to John Smith - an offer interpreted by the corporation as a loan rather than a gift.[42] Also from Ipswich, Richard Felawe, whom we have already encountered bequeathing property for a schoolhouse there and specifying that children of poorer burgesses not be charged for their education, was earlier benefactor to a previous hometown when, in 1452, he persuaded the king to allow him to apply the customs due from his large export shipment of cloth to the walling of Harwich.[43]

The most conspicuous civic benefaction falling within the scope of this study was the work undertaken by Richard Spynk upon the construction of the walls of his city, Norwich, between 1338 and 1343, an act that won him the gratitude of his fellow-citizens and of local historians since. His case is most interesting. What he in fact seems to have done was to farm from the corporation the murage grant of 1337, or at least that portion of it which was to be levied from the less prosperous freemen, on the promise of completing the wall construction begun at the end of the thirteenth century. In addition, Richard - a man probably of the humblest origins himself - undertook the same responsibility for the contributions of the "mesne people" of the city to a royal subsidy. This work entailed, as Richard doubtless anticipated, no slight expenditure from his own pockets; but he was wealthy enough to bear the cost, although his fellow merchants had previously shied away from a role in the enterprise. For enterprise is what it was: a calculated financial gamble. We need not gainsay Richard's public-spiritedness to recognise that his expenses were amply repaid by community grants to him, and his heirs, of exemption from all office and from local and national taxes or other community expenses, and freedom from murage and pavage for any merchant who chose to trade with the Spynk family.[44] The document setting out the responsibilities of, and rewards due, Richard Spynk was an indenture and gives the impression of a pre-negotiated contract. Men like Spynk, Reyne, and Haveringlond had no difficulty reconciling civic patriotism with profitable business - a characteristic valued in community leaders.

 previous

next

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 1

The Structure of Borough Government

Limits to Participation

The selection of candidates in Norwich by 'loudest voice' procedure was contrary to the general trend in the late fourteenth and fifteenth centuries to sophisticate procedures so that assembly meetings were more orderly and dignified. At Lynn the right of any member of the community to attend at least the more important assemblies was not diminished by the constitutional compromise of 1420. On one occasion it was declared impossible to proceed with co-option of a jurat replacement because the community had not been forewarned to attend that particular meeting. On another, when the crowd in the gildhall was so dense that the clerk was unable to record the names of all present, the mayor replied to complainants that he was not empowered to deny anyone entrance to the hall because the day's business (parliamentary report and grant of expenses) affected every townsman. On the other hand, a penalty was set for anyone present at an assembly who spoke after the mayor had called for silence; and it was recommended that the mayor attend the constabulary elections of Common Councillors, to maintain discipline and prevent argument.[\[160\]](#) At Maldon only the councillors and parties involved were permitted to participate in discussions of private business. A further feature of the 1372 reforms in Colchester was the prohibition of "comune clamour" in assembly - if a burgess wished to put a matter before the council he must do it only in a written petition.[\[161\]](#)

Although the right of the community to attend important assemblies such as elections and the giving of accounts - for the accountability of borough officers was another of the controls exercised by the electorate over its representatives[\[162\]](#) - was acknowledged, some attempt was made to restrict participation by re-defining who was eligible to attend. The rulers of Norwich, replying in 1414 to the charge that they were trying to make governmental decisions without obtaining the assent of the community, objected to their accusers' implicit claim that:

chescun persone de la plus meindre reputation de dite Citee davoit a taunt dauctorite et poair en toutz les eleccions et autres affairs ... come avount les plus sufficientz persones dicell Citee.[\[163\]](#)

It may be that in omitting the phrase concerning community assent in 1380 the Norwich rulers had planned to exclude all but the selected representatives of the community from assemblies, as had been done in Exeter in 1345.[164] Undated electoral reforms in Colchester, whose tenor suggests them to be from the early fifteenth century, were the consequence of parlous discordes and inconveniences ... by cause of the multitude concurrent to such eleccions, and presumyng and usurpyng enteresse in the seid eleccions, wher in dede they owe noon to have.

These reforms insisted that only freemen householders could participate; at the same time the four headmen of the electoral committee, who co-opted the other twenty, were required to be men owning property worth 40s. annually, so that "simple persones" incapable of the responsibilities would not be chosen to that office henceforth.[165] Even Lynn's reform administration, the backbone of whose support was the non-freemen section of Lynn's population, saw the need to restrict voting rights to freemen - although they had largely circumvented this potential problem by enfranchising a large number of their supporters.[166]

For what was desirable to the medieval mind was not democratic government so much as orderly government, free of the influence of the mob, conducted with justice and impartiality towards goals that were for the common good of all townsmen. Not direct popular participation, but controls - such as the electoral committee, financial accounting, and representation in government - were viewed as the means to ensure this end. It is not clear whether the stipulations regarding voting qualifications, just noted, were a narrowing of the electorate or merely a confirmation of the special privileges of the freemen. The fact that only the latter were sworn to conceal town counsels suggests that non-freemen may never have been allowed access to routine assembly meetings, and even at the electoral assemblies the permitted presence of any and every resident did not necessarily mean that non-freemen had a right to participate actively. Disregarding the Ipswich electorate of 1200, at which time the sworn franchise had not been created, only in the case of Lynn's Common Council is there clear evidence that non-freemen had electoral rights. Much revolves around the use of the term 'community' - whether in a technical or a general sense - and we rarely have sufficient evidence to be certain.

Borough records pay homage to the theory of governmental authority deriving from the community throughout the medieval period.[167] It may be that this theory was, in practice, little obstacle to the local governors pursuing their own chosen course of action, but the theory remained. Yet it was undermined. Not by indirect election, for that was merely an expression of the representation principle. More by co-optation and the associated life-membership status of councillors, which removed them from electoral controls. The Common Council was an inadequate substitute for a representative assembly, and eventually provided the excuse for creating closed corporations in which elections were an in-house affair. Initiative and the real power of decision-making remained with the upper council, which had begun to think of itself as a separate estate bound by the controls of the written constitution but not by the intangible authority of the community. This change, running counter to the original concept of the pares, lay at the roots of the development of borough government. It was a human, not an institutional, factor; and towards this, via a study of the men who held office and their attitudes towards office-holding, our attentions shall henceforth be directed.

 previous

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

Colchester: The Balcerne Gate and Roman Wall

Colchester (Camulodunum) was one of the most important towns of Roman Britain, serving as administrative headquarters during the initial Roman advance in the 1st century AD. Camulodunum was one of three Roman centers burned and sacked during the Boudiccan revolt of AD 60-61. It also held a colonia or settlement for legionary veterans. Large sections survive of the town's perimeter wall constructed during the 2nd and 3rd centuries AD, along with portions of the western or Balcerne gate and guardroom, today overlain by a tavern. The wall, maintained through the Medieval period, shows typical Roman construction methods of stone masonry interspersed with layers of red bonding tiles.

[Fig.1: Western or Balcerne Gate at Colchester (photo: Athena Review).]

Athena Review Image Archive™ | Guide to Archaeology on the Internet | Paleoanthropology in the News | Free Issue

Main index of Athena Review | Subject Index | Travel Pages | Galleries and Museums | Ad rates | current issue index

Copyright © 1996-2001 Athena Publications, Inc. (All Rights Reserved).

History of medieval Maldon

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth | Development of local government

BUILDINGS AND FORTIFICATIONS | Economy | Summary/Recap | Information sources

Map of Maldon at the close of the Middle Ages

Maldon bailiffs and chamberlains

Appendix: borough customal

Buildings and fortifications

Mention has already been made of the Moothall which, like All Saints' church, was associated with the marketplace – the town centre, if not geographically then in terms of the essence of a town. Another prominent building on one side of the marketplace was the Saracen's Head, a tavern from which, by the 1440s, the borough was receiving 40s. for its annual lease. By 1413 Robert Darcy had acquired, or was renting from the borough, a tenement said to be in the middle of the market. Later in life, however, he acquired a large piece of property facing onto the High Street just outside the marketplace, immediately to the east of the church, and began building a more impressive residence suitable to his status in the town. It is not certain if this was ever completed, before he died, but a tower from it (an addition later in the fifteenth century) still stands and in the late sixteenth century it superseded the medieval Moothall as the seat of borough government.

No walls were ever built around Maldon. The borough was not wealthy enough to afford them, nor strategically important enough to warrant them. We do hear of the Bishop's Castle Field, in St. Mary's parish west of the Hythe; whether there was indeed any kind of fortification there is unknown, but this was one of the properties the Bishop specifically excluded from his grant of 1403.

Where we find other towns struggling with the costs of wall building and maintenance, Maldon's preoccupation was with the bridges across the Chelmer and Blackwater connecting the town and Heybridge, which were susceptible to damage from tidal flooding. In 1388 the king granted, to assist with the costs of bridge repair, that for three years the town not be required to send representatives to parliament – a potential savings in wages of 2s. per day per person – and that it be allowed to collect a special toll (pontage). The following election day, the townsmen appointed a committee of 14 of their leading members to oversee the project. The parliamentary exemption was renewed in 1392 for seven more years and repeated in 1407 for an equal period; in fact, however, we know that the town sent representatives to most parliaments within those periods – it was not in the best interest of the town to dissociate itself with an institution making decisions that could affect borough economies – but at least they had the option.

Repair and maintenance of the marketplace, causeways, and Moothall, as well as other properties acquired by the borough, were likewise items of expenditure in the budget.

previous

main menu

next

History of medieval Maldon

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth | Development of local government
Buildings and fortifications | ECONOMY | Summary/Recap | Information sources
Map of Maldon at the close of the Middle Ages
Maldon bailiffs and chamberlains
Appendix: borough customal

Economy

Since Maldon's residents owned very little agricultural land at the time of Domesday, it does not seem that most townsmen earned a living from farming. Although by 1412 we find that the town itself held over 180 acres of fields, leased to a dozen individuals, apart from any property owned by townsmen personally, there is little evidence that any townsmen were involved in large-scale farming to supply mercantile ventures; it was the town's butchers who most commonly owned livestock. The apparent increase in lands may have had something to do with the acquisition of wasteland from the borough lords.

It seems likely from Maldon's location that some townsmen would have engaged in fishing for herring off the coast, and a number of residents owned boats. Mussels and (as with Colchester) oysters were available in the estuary, and saltpans extracted salt from the seawater. It was where the Blackwater began to widen into the estuary that Maldon's harbour facilities were established, at a detached suburb called the Hythe; by at least 1365 a crane had been set up there to help with the loading and unloading of cargoes, and by the 1480s a community warehouse had been built by the town quay. Maldon's obligation to provide a ship for service to the king in time of war also reflects maritime occupations; this obligation is mentioned in Domesday, in the royal charter of 1171 to the town, and as late as 1336 we find the townsmen being asked to furnish a ship (although they negotiated to pay a sum of money instead). One or two townsmen are revealed as shipowners over the course of the Late Middle Ages, but much of the commerce passing through Maldon's harbour was carried by ships of other towns (e.g. Colchester, Boston) or other countries.

One use of Maldon's harbour was for exporting wool. We hear of charges of wool-smuggling from there in 1339 and 1359, and in 1339 Italian merchants were shipping wool from Maldon (using Colchester ships) on behalf of the king. The port was being considered in 1351 as a base for transporting goods to Calais, and in 1357 there is reference to a merchant of Zeeland importing salt for sale in Maldon and exporting cheese and butter to his homeland. Cases of debt involving sales of cheese and butter are encountered several times in the town court records; it may be that dairy foods were among the more important local products. In 1439, William Aylewyn, a chandler, obtained royal licence to buy 200 quarts of barley in Norfolk to bring to Maldon. Sea-coal was another import, a few townsmen stockpiling it in the vicinity of the port; only freemen were allowed to sell coal locally. Some other trades, such as brewing or baking, were permitted to non-freemen only if they paid for licences.

One privilege of being a freeman was the right to purchase a share of any cargo brought into the port (see customal, cap.7). Merchants arriving with a cargo had to negotiate with the bailiffs a fair price at which to sell their goods, make public announcement in the Moothall of what goods they had for sale, and allow a certain amount of time for freemen to decide whether or not they wished to buy a share. Only after the grace period had elapsed could the merchant sell to non-freemen. If a freeman made a deal to buy a share and then failed to pay up, the community as a whole had an obligation to make good the default of its member.

Maldon was involved in the growth of the Essex cloth-making industry in the thirteenth century. To Ipswich's customal there was appended a list of goods on which local tolls were payable; these included cloths of Coggeshall, Maldon, Colchester and Sudbury, with others of unspecified origin, which were brought through Ipswich's port for shipping overseas. Evidently Maldon had some reputation for its cloth. It served as one of the subsidiaries of Ipswich for the national customs administration. Records of payments of the subsidy and ulnage on cloth show that Maldon was still a modest cloth market at the close of the fourteenth century – although on nowhere near the scale of Colchester. The same records sixty years later, however, indicate a considerable decline in the amount of cloth sold there, as the larger centres increasingly dominated the trade.

Maldon was not a particularly prosperous centre, nor a populous one – the number of inhabitants probably did not much exceed a thousand at any point in the Middle Ages; the poll tax of 1377 indicates 542 taxpayers in Great Maldon and Little Maldon together.^[1] In 1248, in a list of places in Essex, it is described as a villata as opposed to Colchester which is called a burgus. Around the turn of the century, even though the county sheriffs were including it in the lists of boroughs which were to send representatives to parliaments, the king's taxers did not feel Maldon's level of economic activity warranted it being assessed at the higher rate assigned to boroughs. Archaeology has provided additional, though slight, evidence of some decline in Maldon at this period: a sizable hall with courtyard and ancillary structures, built in the eleventh century in the high street, was superseded in the late thirteenth century by a more flimsy habitation.

Pleas of debt involving Maldon tradesmen and outsiders reveal a little more of the character of commerce in which the townsmen were involved. The outsiders were usually men of Essex, Suffolk or London, indicating the limited regional range of the townsmen's business activities. In 1409 we hear of a large debt of £50 claimed from a Lincolnshire man by (partners?) John Burgeys, a Maldon merchant, and John Younge, a London fishmonger. Burgeys, who served as a town bailiff on at least nine occasions, is found purchasing a large quantity of mussels in 1412, was being sued for debt in the same year by a London tailor, the widow of a London draper, and a Colchester man. By 1429 he had accumulated almost £130 in debts owed to fellow townsmen, other Essex men, and several Londoners; among the creditors were two fishmongers, two drapers and two ironmongers. Sales of herring were frequently the subject of cases of debt tried in the town court, and salmon is also occasionally mentioned.

The surnames or stated occupations of townsmen provide further clues. The presence of a cloth-making industry in all its stages is shown by the number of shermen, fullers, dyers, weavers, drapers, and tailors; while the leather-working industry is indicated by the skinners, tanners, cobblers, and glovers, as well as by the fact that borough officialdom included supervisors of these trades. Butchers were quite often in evidence, not least because their unsanitary practices were a matter of concern to the borough authorities. They were restricted to a certain section of the market, where they did not do a satisfactory job of clearing up the blood and entrails of slaughtered animals – the street outside the entrance to the Moothall was said in 1417 to be slippery from the blood. On non-market days they sold from the shops at front of their homes, but even here we find cases of them leaving piles of dung in the shop, or letting blood go fetid there.

A royal document of 1338 indicates that Wednesday and Saturday were market days in Maldon. Burgesses were forbidden to sell victuals within 5 miles of the town, except in the marketplace. Some merchants however were avoiding the town harbour and the tolls (notably mensurage) collected there, by steering their ships up the Blackwater, where it branched northwards away from Maldon, in order to unload and sell their goods at the manor of Heybridge. The king at first ordered that merchandise be sold only in the borough, but later reversed this after being persuaded by the lord of the manor (the dean and chapter of St. Pauls) of a long-standing right to collect tolls on goods landed at the manor. Heybridge continued to attract away from Maldon some of its commerce; a reflection of this is seen in Adam Mine-Honey, who emigrated from Winchester to Maldon and purchased freeman's status there in 1384, yet in 1413 is found as a resident of Heybridge. The town authorities tried to combat the threat by prohibiting ships from passing by the town port and continuing to Heybridge, or elsewhere, without paying a fine, and presumably the authorities had some means of enforcing this; the town records include several entries from 1460 documenting licences to load or unload goods at Heybridge.

The royal charter to Maldon of 1554 confirmed the right to hold three annual fairs, each of 4 days duration, one in March and two in September. A follow-up document in 1555, expanding the list of rights confirmed or granted, refers only to a Saturday market.

- 1 My thanks to Carolyn Fenwick, author of The Poll Taxes of 1377, 1379 & 1381, for this information; it had previously been my understanding that no poll tax information for Maldon had survived.

previous

main menu

next

History of medieval Maldon

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth | Development of local government
Buildings and fortifications | Economy | SUMMARY/RECAP | Information sources
Map of Maldon at the close of the Middle Ages
Maldon bailiffs and chamberlains
Appendix: borough customal

Summary / Recapitulation

The paucity of evidence about Maldon throughout the medieval period, even in the fifteenth century for which there are some meagre local archival records, make the following conclusions somewhat speculative.

It appears that Maldon was a moderately important settlement in late Saxon East Anglia, but was already beginning to decline by the end of the twelfth century. The distancing of the king from his original lordship of the town, and the subsequent fragmentation of lordship, combined with strong landlordship in the century or so before the Black Death and the Peasants Revolt, made it difficult for the townsmen to move beyond the initial royal charter of 1171 in acquiring additional privileges and freedoms that would have assisted Maldon in competing with other towns of the region for a role as market centre or a conduit for international trade. For two hundred years it was either quiescent or unsuccessful in obtaining from the king any expansion of the jurisdictions obtained in 1171.

Furthermore, Maldon had attached to it relatively little by way of the agricultural property that might have been a source of a profitable volume of surplus produce to supply the increasing demands of a rapidly growing population.

These were probably factors in retarding Maldon's political and economic development along the lines and at the pace of other boroughs. These poor prospects would not have encouraged immigration from rural areas that might have contributed to industrial development. During the thirteenth century uncertainty arose whether it should be accorded the status of a borough or only that of a vill. It was not only overshadowed by London, Ipswich and even Colchester (which itself was overshadowed by the other two), but also outclassed and outdistanced by newer Essex towns of size comparable to its own (e.g. Harwich).

However, it became caught up in the expansion of trade from which East Anglia benefited in the latter half of the fourteenth century, based at first upon the wool trade and subsequently on the growth of the cloth-making industry. There is much greater evidence in the second half of the fourteenth century of Maldon men being involved in mercantile pursuits. As these merchants acquired some measure of wealth, their self-confidence and assertiveness grew and they were inclined to lead the burgesses into negotiating with the town's lords concessions which allowed greater self-determination. The first phase of this seems to have taken place in the 1380s, directed against the FitzWalter lord (the same family with which Colchester had a territorial rivalry), who appears to have turned over his administrative rights within the town, in return for an annual payment. It was followed at the close of the century by similar pressure directed against the Bishop of London, again largely successfully.

This late flowering was doubtless fostered by the sympathetic lordship of the Darcy family in the fifteenth century, but offset by the general decline in international commerce of the fifteenth century and by the loss of its share in the cloth trade to larger towns – none of the chapters of the fifteenth century custumal were directly concerned with regulating the making or sale of cloth. The royal charter of 1554 described Maldon as "ruinous and decayed".

previous

main menu

next

History of medieval Maldon

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth | Development of local government
Buildings and fortifications | Economy | Summary/recap | INFORMATION SOURCES
Map of Maldon at the close of the Middle Ages
Maldon bailiffs and chamberlains
Appendix: borough customal

Information sources

Very little has been published specifically about medieval Maldon (except for the battle of Maldon, which has little to do with the town itself). For additional secondary sources as well as primary sources, see the bibliography to The Men Behind the Masque; see also the bibliography at the Maeldune web site.

Clark, Andrew. "Maldon civil courts, 1402." Essex Review, vol.16 (1907), 126-33.

Morant, Philip. History and Antiquities of the County of Essex. Chelmsford, 1816.

Smith, J.R., and M.C. Wadhams. "Robert D'Arcy's chantry priests' house, Maldon, Essex." Medieval Archaeology, vol.19 (1975), 213-19.

previous

main menu

appendix

History of medieval Maldon

Maldon at the close of the Middle Ages

This is a clickable imagemap.

NOTES:

The starting-point for producing this map were several maps produced by W.J. Petchey in his Ph. D thesis on post-medieval Maldon.

A Ramparts

Recent archaeological evidence has identified a small Roman settlement between the Chelmer and Blackwater. This led to a reinterpretation of what had previously been assumed to be the earthen ramparts of Edward the Elder's burh. The two are not incompatible: if Edward found the remains of Roman defences near the local settlement (by that time relocated from the Roman site, which had succumbed to the spread of marshland), it would have been logical enough to strengthen the perimeter to create a refuge for the community. The road running westwards through the ramparts led to Chelmsford.

B Portman Marsh

This meadow, in the vicinity of the site of the Roman settlement, served as pasturage for horses, cows and other animals of the townspeople. There was also at least one lime-kiln here (the noxious nature of kilns making them unsuitable for location near human habitation).

C Maldon Bridge

Although the surviving borough records refer to this timber bridge by the name of "pontmeldon", the name of the street leading up to it indicates that it was earlier – as far back as Saxon times, judging from the etymology of the name – known as Fullbridge. In the late Middle Ages, there was a toll for crossing the bridge of 1d. per cart or packhorse carrying merchandize.

D Fullbridge Street

This led down the hill from the marketplace to the Maldon Bridge. Possibly also known as Stone Hill at one time.

E Peter's Lane

I am not certain of the location of this, but it connected the high street with Fullbridge Street, passing by St. Peter's church.

F Causeway to Heybridge

This was a raised road, the land on this side of the Chelmer being flat, at sea-level and marshy. Built in Saxon times, it connected the bridge across the Chelmer with another bridge across the Blackwater in the manor of Heybridge. The causeway was maintained by the borough.

G All Saints' church

Its existence is documented in the late 12th century, when the king confirmed Beeleigh Abbey's ownership of it. Although apparently the last of the churches built at Maldon, it became the principal church of the town; Robert Darcy established a chantry there. The original building was probably of modest size, but it was expanded in the early 14th century.

H St. Peter's church

This appears to have been the original church in the settlement at Maldon, serving a small community of traders and craftsmen by at least the end of the 9th century. In 1189 it, along with All Saints, was confirmed as belonging to the abbey. A gild dedicated to the Virgin Mary was founded there in the early 15th century.

J St. Mary's church

Founded in mid-11th century, to serve those who had settled near the quayside, it is later indicated as belonging to St. Martin-le-Grand's, London.

K Carmelite Friary

The Carmelites had established a house in Maldon by 1293, and are seen enlarging their holding in 1314. According to Morant they settled in Maldon in 1292, at the initiative of the Bishop of London.

L The Hythe

It was here that all wholesale deals were made with outsiders bringing goods by water; before they could sell their cargoes, outsiders first had to go to the Moothall to obtain a licence and make it publicly known what goods they had sell. Townsmen could re-sell the goods they bought at the Hythe, but only in the marketplace or from the shops that were part of their residences (i.e. they couldn't resell them at the Hythe itself). Porters offered a service of carrying merchandize to the town centre, or elsewhere to townspeople's houses. In addition to the communal quay, parts of the waterfront were also given over to private quays and warehouses, mostly belonging to local lords. When the earliest surviving borough records mention the town quay in 1386, it clearly was not new. There had been a crane there for twenty years previous. And a warehouse for protecting the goods of the merchants of the town was built in the 15th century. The 16th century recension of the custumal reveals that one of the prominent features at the Hythe was heaps of coal that townsmen bought from merchants bringing that commodity from Newcastle; townsmen were required to buy a licence from the town authorities for their coal-heap (at the cost of 12d. a heap in 1447, when there were 12 heaps). Another feature that must also have been "noticeable" was dunghills.

M Marketplace

The presence of a mint by mid-10th century indicates that Maldon must have had a marketplace at that date, probably on the same location as in the late medieval borough. This was the principal site for retailing victuals and other necessities. Except in the case of meat, goods were to be sold only in the morning and very early afternoon; a bell – perhaps that hung at one end of the Moothall, in 1408, although more probably the bell in All Saints – would be rung to signal the close of trading. A row of stalls in the middle of the street on the east side of the marketplace was the butchery; one duty of the market custodians appointed by the borough was to wash the blood of butchered animals off the street. This was the only authorized place for the sale of meat in the town, making it easier for the authorities to supervise the trade. There is reference in 1407 to a shop in "le draperie", but where this was in relation to the town centre is not clear.

N Communal midden

Dunghills were at this location, referred to on occasion as "town's end".

P Moothall

The assembly room was on the upper level. On the lower level, as was common with many early town halls, were shops – at least 4 – that were rented out to townsmen. The common chest, holding the treasury, was in the vestibule (although in 1467/68 it was being kept in the house of one of the bailiffs of that year, and the contents were inspected by bailiffs, chamberlains and council). A second chest, called "le countour" containing court rolls and the standard measures (for keeping the assizes), along with the seals for stamping approved measures of private citizens, was in the assembly room. The chests were locked, and the authorities were careful to keep track of who had custody of the keys.

Q Saracen's Head tavern

It is not common to find mention by name of many taverns in medieval Maldon. This one, however, was named on several occasions and was one of the properties owned by the community and leased out to taverners.

R Darcy residence

This was the site of the residence Robert Darcy esq. had built in the 1430s, which (after substantial rebuilding) became the town's post-medieval moothall.

S Bishop's Castle Field

The name is intriguing.

T Tenter Field

Tenters were structures on which cloth was stretched, for drying and bleaching, as part of the overall dyeing and finishing process. In the town's 1413 rental "le Teyntourhawe" was being leased to John Sele and, since "hawe" could mean simply an enclosed area, may refer to this field; however, we also hear of other "Teyntourplaces" being leased out.

U Mill Field

In 1413 this was one of the fields that the borough was leasing out to a private citizen; it comprised 18 acres. Another field, of 5 acres, was called the Upper Mill Field.

V Milkwell Field

Another of the fields being leased out by the borough in 1413, it comprised 5 acres.

[MAIN MENU]

[\[contents\]](#)

APPENDIX I

The Officers of Borough Government

Maldon: bailiffs and chamberlains

| | |
|---------|--|
| 1384 | b. John Welles |
| 1385 | b. John Glover |
| 1386 | b. Henry Hales |
| 1387 | b. John Welles |
| 1388 | b. John Reed |
| 1389 | b. Peter Man |
| 1390-93 | unknown |
| 1394 | b. John Glover |
| 1395 | b. John Crakebon |
| 1396 | b. John Joce |
| 1397 | b. John Welles |
| 1398 | unknown |
| 1399 | b. John Page |
| 1400 | b. John Burgeys |
| 1401 | b. John Glover |
| 1402 | b. John Burgeys |
| 1403 | b. John Burgeys |
| 1404 | b. John Welles, John Page ch. John Pere, John Swofham, Richard Serjeant |
| 1405 | b. John Glover, John Page ch. John Pere, John Swofham, Richard Serjeant |
| 1406 | b. John Burgeys, Thomas Paffe ch. unknown |
| 1407 | b. John Glover, John Welles ch. unknown |
| 1408 | b. John Glover, John Page ch. unknown |

- 1409 b. John Welles, John Burgeys
ch. unknown
- 1410 unknown
- 1411 unknown
- 1412 b. John Glover, John Welles
ch. unknown
- 1413 unknown
- 1414 b. John Glover, John Welles
ch. John Page, John Clerk
- 1415 unknown
- 1416 b. John Page, Thomas Skulle
ch. Richard Sampson, Thomas Pye
- 1417 b. John Glover, John Welles
ch. John Clerk, John Godewyn
- 1418 b. Thomas Skulle, Thomas Paffe
ch. John Clerk, John Hocham
- 1419 b. Thomas Skulle, Thomas Paffe
ch. John Pepyr, Richard Baude
- 1420 b. Thomas Paffe, John Couper
ch. John Clerk, William Burgh
- 1421 b. Thomas Paffe, John Couper
ch. John Pepyr, Richard Baude
- 1422 b. Thomas Paffe, William Aylewyn
ch. unknown
- 1423 b. John Couper, William Aylewyn
ch. Richard Kyng, Thomas Lambe
- 1424 b. John Couper, William Aylewyn
ch. John Clerk senior, John Bown
- 1425 b. Thomas Paffe, Thomas Lambe
ch. unknown
- 1426 b. Walter Reeler, William Aylewyn
ch. Richard Kyng, John Bown
- 1427 b. Thomas Paffe, William Aylewyn
ch. Roger Baude, John Bown
- 1428 b. John Burgeys, Thomas Lambe
ch. John Clerk junior, John Bown
- 1429 b. John Burgeys, William Gore
ch. unknown
- 1430 b. Thomas Paffe, William Aylewyn
ch. unknown

- 1431 b. John Burgeys, William Aylewyn
ch. John Hardyng, John Heyward
- 1432 b. William Mayhew, Thomas Lambez
ch. Richard Sampson, Richard Kyng
- 1433 b. John Burgeys, William Aylewyn
ch. Richard Baude, John Clerk
- 1434 b. William Gore, Richard Bemunde
ch. unknown
- 1435 b. Richard Bemunde, William Aylewyn
ch. John Swayne, Richard Baude
- 1436 b. Thomas Lambe, John Swayne
ch. Richard Kyng, John Heyward
- 1437 b. John Swayne, William Aylewyn
ch. unknown
- 1438 b. Thomas Lambe, Richard Bemunde
ch. Thomas Judde, John Heyward
- 1439 b. William Aylewyn, William Gore
ch. John Hardyng, John Heyward
- 1440 b. William Aylewyn, John Pepyr
ch. Richard Sampson, Robert Burgh
- 1441 b. William Aylewyn, John Swayne
ch. Richard Sampson, Robert Burgh
- 1442 b. Richard Bemunde, Robert Burgeys
ch. Richard Sampson, Robert Burgh
- 1443 b. John Swayne, Robert Burgeys
ch. Richard Sampson, Robert Burgh
- 1444 b. John Swayne, William Holcote
ch. Richard Galyot, Robert Burgh
- 1445 b. John Swayne, Robert Burgeys
ch. John Kyng, Robert Burgh
- 1446 b. William Holcote, Robert Burgeys
ch. John Kyng, Robert Burgh
- 1447 b. William Holcote, John Swayne
ch. John Kyng, Robert Burgh
- 1448 b. William Holcote, Robert Burgeys
ch. John Kyng, John Santon
- 1449 b. John Swayne, Robert Burgeys
ch. William Wyxston, John Dale
- 1450 b. John Swayne, Robert Burgeys
ch. unknown
- 1451 unknown

- 1452 b. John Saykyn, William Holcote
ch. unknown
- 1453 b. John Saykyn, John Kyng
ch. unknown
- 1454 unknown
- 1455 b. Robert Burgeys, Thomas Fuller
ch. unknown
- 1456 unknown
- 1457 b. Robert Burgeys, Thomas Fuller
ch. unknown
- 1458 b. John Saykyn, John Kyng
ch. John Santon, John Parle
- 1459 b. Robert Burgeys, John Kyng
ch. William Rason, William Wyxston
- 1460 b. Robert Burgeys, Thomas Fuller
ch. William Rason, John Dale

APPENDIX I: Lists of Office-holders

Introduction | Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders
Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration
Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics | Conclusion

Maldon.co.uk - The River Blackwater

The information portal for Maldon residents, businesses and visitors

"Time was when I agreed with the popular, and the guide book, verdict that the Orwell is the finest estuary in these parts; but now I know better. I unhesitatingly give the palm to the Blackwater. It is a noble stream, a true arm of the sea; its moods are more various, its banks wilder and its atmospheric effects much grander. The season for cruising on The Blackwater is September, when the village regattas take place and the sunrises over leagues of marsh are made wonderful by strange mists."

Arnold Bennett, the novelist and reviewer, wrote these much-quoted words about Maldon's own river. The town has been a yachting centre for many years, smaller and more traditional than many other river- and seaside towns which have the mixed blessing of a marina. The River itself is one of great beauty and provides the small boat owner with excellent sailing and some interesting scenery and wildlife. There are in addition a number of boats available for charter, including the famous and impressive Thames Barges which have their home at the Hythe. Seals, geese and swans are residents for much of the year.

NOTES FOR RIVER USERS

The river at Maldon dries out almost completely at low tide, and there is usually about an hour and a half during which yachts may come and go at the Hythe. The district council has a number of inexpensive fore-and-aft moorings at Maldon which may be hired on a seasonal basis by arrangement with the River Bailiff (telephone: 01621 856487) and a visitors' pontoon, with shower and washing facilities are also available from him for shorter stays. The yard keeps a listening watch on VHF Channel 37.

From the Hythe, the home of the Thames Barges and the Maldon Little Ship Club, the river continues in a south-easterly direction before turning north-east at Herring Point, where it runs up past Heybridge Basin and the entrance to the Chelmer and Blackwater Canal. This was built in 1797 and runs for 14 miles to Chelmsford, although it is navigable by boats with masts only as far as the bridge over the road at Heybridge about three-quarters of a mile upstream. Moorings are available in the canal, and it requires a license to navigate. Generally the lock is worked for an hour before high water, and from then until about an hour after high water a boat drawing six or seven feet of water should have no problem getting in or out. The lock master may be telephoned on 01621 853506.

Coming from the lock and heading down river, the low white building of the Blackwater Sailing Club will be seen on the port bow, with Northey Island to starboard. It was on this island that the vikings gathered before the Battle of Maldon, to be so ruinously invited over to fight by Brihtnoth. Its northern point, Hilly Pool, is marked by a red can.

After Hilly Pool the Channel turns to the south-east once more towards the pair of buoys known as the "Doubles" and the entrance to Southey Creek with its own red can. Osea Island is now to port and the Channel straightens to the green buoy marking the safe water to the South of the sand bank called the Doctor. This is about as far as most boats heading in the opposite direction towards Maldon will be able to get at low water.

Opposite Osea Island, about half a mile across the river, the entrance to Lawling Creek is marked by a red can. The entrance is obstructed by a shallow bar which allows only about a metre of water at LWS, but there are mooring buoys and a yard at Maylandsea. Further down river the Marconi Sailing Club appears on the south bank, followed in half a mile by Stone St. Lawrence, where there are moorings and it is possible to land a dinghy on the shingle beach at any stage of the tide.

Another half mile down-river, and a green cone marks the southern tip of Thirstlet Spit, where many an unwary yachtsman has gone aground. The safest thing to do is to set a course on Bradwell Power Station from just off the Stone, keeping well into the south shore until opposite St. Lawrence Bay.

Bradwell Marina is a popular place with sailors from Maldon wanting a short family sail and somewhere to stay before returning to Maldon the next day. Its entrance from Bradwell Creek can be slightly tricky, for the Creek itself becomes shallow at low water and has an unexpected starboard dog-leg before the withies and marina buoys give out along the line of moorings. Following the line of moored vessels, however brings one to a red can buoy signed "Bradwell Marina" and the rather deeper water of the marina itself. The marina has fuel, good showers and a welcoming yacht club. It may be telephoned on 01621 7762325 and is on VHF Channel 80.

Beyond Bradwell, Tollesbury Creek and West Mersea are popular sailing centres, and moorings may be had at Brightlingsea as well. Going up-river, the entrance to the Blackwater is the Bench Head buoy, which is about 15 miles from Maldon (51.44.53N 01.01.05E)

© 2003 Maldon.co.uk

Site created and managed by Basinsites

Maldon.co.uk - All Saints Church

The information portal for Maldon residents, businesses and visitors

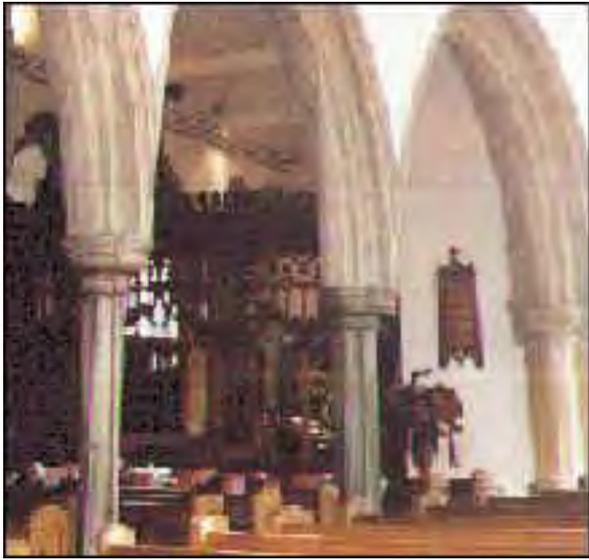

All Saints Church stands at the top of Maldon High Street. It has a handsome and unique triangular tower built in the 12th Century and a well-kept small churchyard containing interesting 18th and 19th century monuments. Carvings from the turn of the present century on the buttresses of the south wall depict figures from the history of Maldon and the surrounding area. These are of St. Cedd, the Celtic bishop who brought Christianity to the Saxon settlers of Essex from Lindisfarne in the seventh century and who founded the Church of St. Peter on the Wall which still stands in nearby Bradwell, and Brihtnoth, the Saxon Christian warrior who later so heroically lost the Battle Of Maldon to the heathen Vikings during the reign of Aethelred the Unready in 991. Archdeacon Thomas Plume, who gave the Plume Library to the Town also gets a statue, as do St. Mellitus, (Pope Gregory's missionary to the East Saxons sent in 601,) Sir Robert D'Arcy, the supposed founder of the Moot Hall and Robert Mantell, the principal benefactor of the nearby 12th-century abbey at Beeleigh.

Both All Saints and the nearby St. Peter's Church were confirmed to the abbot of Beeleigh by a royal charter of Richard I in 1189. After 55 years the two parishes were united: the monks found that it was too expensive to provide a priest for each of them. This marriage of the two parishes remains in place today, which is probably just as well, for in 1655 Archdeacon Plume rebuilt St. Peter's to house the Library he endowed for the town. Maldon thus provides what must surely be the among the earliest examples of a team ministry and redundant churches scheme in the Church of England.

The Reverend Lawrence Washington was the rector of one of the nearby villages, Purleigh, from 1632-'43. He was deprived of his living during the Puritan period and is buried somewhere in the grounds of All Saints - we do not now know where. He was the great, great grandfather of the first President of the U.S.A. This link with American history is commemorated inside the Church with the Washington Window, a gift from the people of Malden, Massachusetts made in 1928. Malden itself was founded by a Joseph Hills of Maldon. The Window combines English and American themes and is well worth looking at.

Inside the Church the visitor can see four distinct periods of building contributing to All Saints as it is today. Of the first only the tower now remains. That early 12th and 13th century church was small: its eastern end probably extended to around where the screen is today, while its south wall was where the arcading to the south aisle now stands. The addition of this aisle between 1290 and 1330 is what remains of a second period of work, which may originally have included a corresponding aisle on the north side.

The fine stonework of the South Aisle, with Purbeck marble pillars and graceful decoration, testifies to the wealth and religious zeal of Maldon's mediaeval patrons and the activities of the Guilds, or religious fraternities, which flourished in the area until the Protestant Reformation. One of these, the Holy Trinity Guild, took over the south aisle in 1380 and this part of the Church remains dedicated to the Trinity. Such mediaeval piety - combined with an eye for stylish self-promotion - was soon to give rise to All Saints' third period of expansion, when the present chancel and eastern chapels were added during the fifteenth century. The north chapel of St. Catherine on the north side now unfortunately houses the organ, but the one still in use at the end of the south aisle was acquired from the Guild of the Holy Trinity in 1445 as a chantry by Robert D'Arcy - a place where masses could be offered for his soul after his death. The Reformation was, of course, to put a stop to chantries everywhere, but one of Sir Robert's more fast-living heirs had already sold off the one in Maldon before they were suppressed. Nonetheless this part of the church is still known as the D'Arcy chapel. While still in the south aisle, one can look for the sedelia where priests would have offered Mass. In the nave the arch over the chancel was constructed out of material taken from the old east wall.

In Maldon as elsewhere, the coming of Protestantism with its suppression of the old theology of the Mass, and then the ending of the tradition of mediaeval tradition of religious plays under the Puritans of the following century gave rise to a much-increased emphasis on preaching as the means of spiritual grace and of the sermon as a form of entertainment. This was to have a profound effect on the structure of All Saints, for in 1728 the old north aisle and nave were demolished and rebuilt to house the large congregations which were by now flocking to the church to hear famous visiting preachers. (Outside you can see where the mediaeval stone gives way to later brick.) This accounts for the enormous size of the nave which is perhaps one of All Saints' most immediately striking features: it is interesting to note that this work was done partly at the borough's expense, whereas in earlier times such patronage would have belonged to an aristocratic patron or guild. During the nineteenth century the seating capacity was once again expanded by the addition of galleries on the north and west sides of the nave: these have since been removed but you can still see the outline of the upper windows in the north wall.

There are a number of interesting individual features in and around All Saints .In St. Catherine's chapel, the Cammock Monument (1602) depicts Thomas Crammock, his two wives and twenty-two children.

Still in St. Catherine's Chapel, the organ has the royal lion and unicorn on it because it was bought second-hand from the Hanover Rooms in 1838, while beneath the Cammock Monument are a fifteenth-century piscina used to cleanse the sacred vessels of the Mass in the old liturgy and a small medieval door, still known as the priest's door which once gave out onto a sacristy.

The Crypt is fourteenth century and reached by a door between the sedelia in the south aisle. It has a fine vaulted roof to the staircase

The Bells of All Saints are still rung in traditional peals, to varying degrees of appreciation by those who live nearby. There were originally three, but these were replaced by a peal of six in 1699. On the spire outside a single sanctus bell is housed in a fifteenth century canopy.

In common with many English parish churches, All Saints still displays the Royal Arms of Charles II which were originally placed in the building at the restoration of the monarchy in 1660 after Britain's brief experiment as a puritan republic in Cromwell's Commonwealth. They are now on the North Wall. Fragments of the arms of Henry VIII and his third wife Jane Seymour may also be seen in the West Window: these were originally in St. Peter's.

Inside and near the Tower can be found the grave of Edward Bright, the famous 'fat man of Maldon' who died in 1756 at the age of 29. He weighed 44 stones (616lbs, or 280 kg)

Outside the Church, a walk round the Eastern end will bring the visitor out near the vicarage, a fine timbered house of the 15th century and still the residence of the vicars of All Saints.

© 2003 Maldon.co.uk

Site created and managed by Basinsites

Maldon.co.uk - St. Mary's Church

The information portal for Maldon residents, businesses and visitors

The tower of St. Mary's Church is a very prominent feature of the Maldon skyline. For hundreds of years it was used by sailors as a mark to guide them to harbour, and from its top a beacon shone to act as a lighthouse. The Church itself is Norman with the nave dating from about 1130. It almost certainly replaced earlier wooden buildings on the site.

After the 12th century later works obscured many of the Norman features inside the Church, but you can still see a small Norman window high in the North Wall and the chancel arch's north pier and north and south responds are equally early. The original Norman chancel fell down in the 14th century and was rebuilt then; the tower was to suffer a similar fate in 1605 -- the present brick one dates from 1636. The north porch, by which one enters the Church, is 15th century and has an attractive timber roof. Its inner door arch contains some re-used Norman stones.

St. Mary's was enlarged and restored during the 19th century, and a handsome octagonal hall was added to its South side very recently. Both of these developments were executed with sensitivity. Apart from one 15th century window, those in the nave date from the Victorian restoration. The glass of the 15th century one is a memorial to the parishioners of St. Mary's who died in the Great War of 1914 to 1918.

During the Church's restoration three Medieval niches were uncovered in its north wall. These would originally have been for statues of saints, and during this century two have been re-filled with modern figures of St. George and the Mother of Christ. The stairs to the rood screen were also discovered by the Victorians. Before the Reformation this wooden screen separating the chancel from the nave would have played a prominent part in the liturgy, particularly during Holy Week (the week before Easter:) on Passion Sunday the story of the suffering of Jesus would have been sung from it, beneath its permanent figures of the crucified Christ with his Mother and St. John.. Such a close association with the most elaborate period in the year of the old church led to the dismantling of rood screens with the coming of Protestantism, and hence its removal from St. Mary's.

maldon mary 2.jpg (12186 bytes)

Today St. Mary's stands firmly within the High-Church or Anglo-Catholic tradition which began the revival of Catholic teaching in the Church of England in the 19th century. The rood figures which you can see above the chancel arch now are modern and originally stood in the Church of St. Andrew in Plaistow. They give a good feeling of what St. Mary's might have been like during the Medieval period and reflect renewed devotion of a Catholic type.

The earliest monument in the building stands near the chancel and dates from 1486. Unfortunately the brass has been lost, but it commemorates John Fenne, a merchant of the English possession of Calais who died in that year.

In the chancel the High Altar draws the eye as the focus of both the fabric and liturgy of the Church. The fine altar rails are of Dutch workmanship and date from 1700. In the Lady Chapel, where the Sacrament (the consecrated bread of Holy Communion) is kept in a modern hanging pyx, the chamber organ is from the town hospital, St. Peter's, and was brought to St. Mary's in 1980.

© 2003 Maldon.co.uk

Site created and managed by Basinsites

Maldon.co.uk - Beeleigh Abbey

The information portal for Maldon residents, businesses and visitors

The Abbey before the Reformation

W.J. Petchey

All that can now be seen of Beeleigh Abbey are the roofs of its surviving range of late-medieval buildings, viewed from a public garden on the west side of Maldon. From a footpath beside the abbey can be glimpsed the picturesque farmhouse which was built about 1570 on to that surviving range of the original abbey. The place is privately owned and not open to visitors but it is possible with a little imagination to reconstruct what the abbey would have been like and, more importantly, how it was used in the years immediately preceding its dissolution in 1536.

How can we tell what Beeleigh Abbey was like before it was dissolved?

i) Evidence from the Inventory of 1536

Late in the afternoon of 6 June, 1536, the last Abbot of Beeleigh, John Copsheath, was left with a duplicate of the official inventory of his abbey's goods and chattels "safely to be kept to the use of our sovereign lord" Henry VIII. Its annual gross income fell below the £300 ceiling set by the Act for the Dissolution of Monasteries; it was to cease being an endowed religious community of canons following the Rule established by St. Norbert in 1119. (The Order was known as Premonstratensian from the place near Laon in N.E. France where St. Norbert's first abbey was established.) The inventory would be needed when the site, the lands, the buildings and their contents, were either leased or sold by the Crown.

ii) Other Evidence

To the Inventory can be added:

- Some scraps of information in the grant of the former abbey to Sir John Gates (1540).
- Bequests made by wills in 1495, 1498 and 1505.
- Comments by the Visitor (a Church official) about the buildings in four reports made between 1482 and 1500.
- Evidence about the architecture and size of the place which the surviving parts of the eastern range supply. In particular, these provide the dimensions -the width, height and breadth- of the bays or units that were presumably common to all the buildings around the central cloistered courtyard.

Looking at the Evidence.

When Henry VIII's Commissioners toured Beeleigh Abbey with their clerk to gather information for their Inventory they would have done so in such a way as would prevent them from missing any part and save them from too much doubling back. So we might think that simply by reading the Inventory we could get a pretty good idea of what the Abbey looked like before 1536. But the Inventory was not compiled for the benefit of historians - it was strictly for the business of valuing saleable items, and empty rooms were omitted. In particular the Inventory does not mention a Common (or Warming) Room or a Chapter House, although every abbey had them. So where were Beeleigh's?

Here the surviving buildings can help us: the Common Room and the Chapter House can be identified as the surviving ground floor components of this eastern range of this abbey. By combining the evidence in this way we can reconstruct a plan of the Abbey (Sorry, I seem to have lost the files for this...will repost as soon as I get round to it.)

A walk round Beeleigh Abbey in 1536

(i) Living arrangements.

The First Floor

We can begin where the Inventory itself does: upstairs on the first floor at the room which has often been called the Canons' Dormitory. This is not a very good name - as we shall see, the last canons did not sleep in a communal dormitory but had individual accommodation. The Inventory calls the room the Great Chamber, as if it were part of a manor house. Its two beds, with bedding and curtains, the fireplace and the "old cloths or pieces of tapestry" on its walls suggest this large room with five windows and a wide timber roof served, by about 1500 as accommodation for members of the Bouchier family, Earls of Essex, who were the abbey's patrons and guardians.

From there we can move with the Commissioners to the next first floor space, the Children's Chamber, a name which is the only indication of the abbey's former role as a place for the tuition of schoolboys. Only one bed is mentioned but even until the mid-19th century children often slept several to one bed.

Next the Commissioners moved into the Dining Parlour or Refectory. As in other Premonstratensian houses it was on the south side of the cloister and on the first floor. It must have been almost as large as the Great Chamber and it was furnished with a long table on trestles with four forms. The Inventory says that to go at the table head and foot there were chairs -unusual furniture in 1536- of which one was covered with leather. There were three wall hangings painted "with steyned worke" and "iiii carpetts for wyndowes," meaning that there were four windows with thickly woven hangings acting as curtains.

The table furnishings were stored elsewhere but can be brought here to show how the community and its guests fared on feast days. There were:

- Three diapered table cloths and six "pleyne table clothes."
- 26 napkins, two diaper towels, three "pleyne wesshyng towells" to keep hands clean whilst eating greasy or sticky food, with three pewter basins and two pewter ewers for the water.
- Two silver-gilt salts, 18 silver spoons and three bowls ("masers") hooped with silver-gilt bands to be set on the Table. These are the most valuable domestic items in the Inventory.
- Three other salts, of pewter, and six copper or brass candlesticks.

Onto the table there then came, as needed, some of the abbey's 30 pewter platters, 27 pewter dishes, 13 porringers, 11 "sawsers of ii [two] sorts" and "a dosen of banquetewynge [banqueting] vessell[s]." From the kitchen with its five iron spits, three iron racks, two trivets, four brass pots, the great cauldron, colander, frying pan and "great dryping panne" the food was conveyed on a "charger" and a pewter plate.

So far the Commissioners have passed from the Chapter House to the Common Room (empty) in the eastern range, then gone up to the huge Great Chamber above those first two areas. and then - moving into the first floor chambers of the southern range- through the Children's Chamber to the Dining Parlour. Beyond that they must have found a kind of Screens Passage. In a college or manor house this would have separated the dining area from the buttery and kitchen. But at Beeleigh those were on the ground floor (with the kitchen most probably a high, two-storeyed room) and this first floor passage must have had a staircase leading down to the kitchen or buttery.

The Commissioners, however, remained on the top floor. Emerging from the Dining Parlour, they turned right into the western range of the Abbey. Here they found an unexpected domestic arrangement. Their Inventory refers to a series of Chambers apparently occupied by up to six canons and three or four servants. So no communal dormitory for these late-mediaeval religious: they had their own rooms.

The first of these chambers was called The White Chamber. It had a fireplace and a fine bed and what the Inventory calls a "Servant's Chamber next to the same," although it cannot have been strictly speaking adjacent for reason which will be clear in a moment. A third room, The Green Chamber, must have been immediately to the north of this Servant's Chamber and have abutted on the western end of the abbey church because it was the last room to be described on this first floor level (see the plan.). At this Green Chamber the Commissioners evidently retraced their steps through the Servant's Chamber. But now a peculiar thing happens - by doing this they came to "the Chamber under the White Chamber," i.e. on the ground floor. How did they get there? The Inventory gives us a clue when it refers to some bed furnishings stored in "a great chest next to the same (White) Chamber." The chest was in a space between The White Chamber and its Servant's Chamber like the stair passages which in Oxford and Cambridge colleges serve pairs of rooms on each floor level. It must have contained stairs leading to a landing, and it was these stairs which the Commissioners used.

The Ground Floor

On the ground floor of this western range were two more rooms lying no doubt directly beneath the Servant's Chamber and The Green Chamber, and northward of the stairway space. These were probably entered from the western Cloister Walk. One was another servant's chamber, the other was described only as "another chamber." Each contained a bed with sheets, blankets and coverlets, as did all the rooms in this western range. The Inventory would not include personal possessions such as chairs or stools, desks or tables with which these rooms must have been furnished, although in any case their owners may have already left the abbey and taken them.

Domestic life in Beeleigh Abbey.

At this point the Inventory ends its inspection of the domestic quarters and if these were all the chambers that the Abbey had then in its last thirty or so years it had accommodated itself to a falling number of inmates (11 in 1482, 9 in 1500) and a revised way of life. The place was more like a small Cambridge college than a monastery. But it was far more sumptuous accommodation than most colleges at that time. Each of those chambers must have been two bays in width (if only one bay deep), which would mean rooms twenty feet by ten (200 sq. ft.). The surviving buildings were beautifully reconstructed in the early 13th century of Reigate stone, (a kind of chalk) and, for the columns in the Chapter House and Common Room, Purbeck marble. The western range, with a columned "undercroft" at ground level (used for storage,) Children's Chamber and Dining Parlour above, may well have been in the same style and of the magnificence of the remains of the Refectory of another Premonstratensian house, Easby Abbey near Richmond, N. Yorks.

(ii) In the Church.

Relics: Beeleigh's own saint.

There is every reason to suppose that the abbey church, to which the Commissioners next directed their attention, was as imposing as Beeleigh's domestic buildings. It probably was, since by 1249 there was enshrined at its high altar the heart of St. Roger Niger of "Bileye," who was most probably one of the earliest members of this community after it was settled in Beeleigh about 1185. He had become successively archdeacon of Colchester and Bishop of London and was canonized shortly after his death in 1241. He was buried in London in St. Paul's Cathedral except for his heart, which was encased in lead (this was a quite usual practice) and brought back to the place after which he had been named. A holy relic, it would attract pilgrims and their offerings.

In 1507 a Maldon man, John Ormesby, added "a relic of the Holy Cross of the Sepulchre of Christ and of the Crib and Stall of Christ, enclosed in beryl" to the relic collection at Beeleigh. But these were not found by the Commissioners and had doubtless been destroyed between 1534 and 1536, as were most relics in England.

What did the Abbey Church look like?

The church had a steeple. It was not specified in the Inventory (so it had no bells in it by 1536) but it appears in a list of debts still owed by the abbey at the dissolution: £6 was owed to John Maundye of Maidstone for eight windows for the steeple. In 1540 the premises were sold, the records show, to John Gates Esq. including "all the church, the bell tower and the cemetery." The number of windows mentioned in the steeple tower argues for a taller structure than would easily rise over a central crossing of nave, presbytery and transepts, so the spire must have been either at the west end of the nave (as at Shap Abbey, Cumbria) or against the north transept (as at Blanchland Abbey, County Durham). Because the ground beyond the north transept was close to the river Chelmer, the western position, on more stable land, seems a more likely location.

The Commissioners went straight through the Canons' Choir, which would be in the crossing of the east-west, north-south areas, up to the High Altar, whose furnishings they carefully appraised: its alabaster reredos, the curtains, carpeting, brass and gilt copper cross, candlesticks and service books. Three of these books they reckoned to be worth a lot of money to other Premonstratensian communities (abroad, presumably): they talk about "2 great antiphoners in parchment, written of their own Use (the liturgy particular to this Order) worth to be sold to men of their religion: £4" and "a great mass book [missal] of their Use, limned with gold, appraised and to men of their religion: 66s 8d [£3.33]."

The Commissioners then they moved south into the Lady Chapel which contained "a pair of organs," an image of the Blessed Virgin Mary with a branched candlestick of latten before it, and an altar "hanged with stained work [painted textile]" and beside it mass vestments of white Bruges satin.

The Lady Chapel and The Bouchier Tomb.

We know where the Lady Chapel was by a survival that can still be seen (but not at Beeleigh), and an associated bequest which shows that there were at least two arches separating the chapel from the choir. In 1498 Dame Elizabeth Bouchier, widow of Sir John Bouchier, required by her will that her late husband's corpse be brought from Stebbing parish church (some 18 miles away) to Beeleigh Abbey to be buried with hers under a tomb which was to be constructed "twixt the Choir and the foresaid Chapel of Our Lady" and next the tomb of her late father-in-law Henry Bouchier, Earl of Essex and Eu (who had died in 1483) and his wife Isabel Plantagenet, aunt of King Edward IV.

The Earl's and Countess' tomb of 1483 can still be seen: it was moved by their descendant, Henry Bouchier, fourth and last Earl of Essex, between 1536 and his death in 1540. It stands between the chancel and south chapel of Little Easton parish church, just as it had been sited at Beeleigh. There is a gangway between the east end of the tomb and the supporting columns of its stone canopy, a gangway which, in its original position would provide a way from the Choir and Presbytery into the Lady Chapel.

More chapels.

There were three more chapels within the church to be inspected. Their locations on the plan are conjectural. The Jesus Chapel may have been positioned to the north of the Choir, balancing the Lady Chapel, because outsiders were intended to have access to it. We know this because of a will made in 1505 by one William Malb, a layman who had retired to live as a "commensal" of the abbey -in effect, a boarder- following the death of his wife.. His desire to have "a stone of remembrance" set in the chapel wall and his request that those attending Mass there should recite the Paternoster and Ave kneeling either in or "afore the said chapel" indicate that it was a stone building to which the laity frequently came, with an entrance within church.

The other two chapels were the Rood Chapel and St. Katherine's Chapel. A Rood was the Old English word for the Holy Cross which was placed on a screen and loft or platform between the Nave and the Choir of every church before 1549. So the Rood Chapel was in the Nave at Beeleigh. The Commissioners ordered some timber to be sold - obscurely describing it as being "the backside of the Rood in the Rood Chapel." The site of St. Katherine's Chapel must remain guesswork. The officials came last to it in their tour of the church and it seems to require the existence of a North Aisle so that it would not block the Nave. But because visitors also needed access to the Jesus Chapel without passing through the canon's Choir it has been placed midway in the North Aisle on the conjectural plan.

(iii) Buildings and land outside the Church. Seditious sympathies in the Vestry.

Leaving the church the Commissioners visited the Vestry. The five altars in the church were not provided with vestments, hangings or plate to any great value, and they discovered that the thirteen processional copes and sixteen sets of mass vestments stored there were mostly old. The Bouchier family who acted as patrons of the abbey, and had in the 15th century adopted it as their preferred burial place, had donated many of the vestments and the sight of them may have interested the Commissioners, for they were decorated with the badges of the Bouchier and Stafford families and one in particular was, after 1485, politically very incorrect: "a of blue velvet with fetter locks and Bouchier knots." Those were badges of the House of York (the fetter locks) and of Henry Bouchier, Earl of Essex, and his Plantagenet Yorkist wife. Throughout their reigns Henry VII and Henry VIII sought occasion to destroy the surviving branches of the House of York, and here in 1536 was a religious community still displaying Yorkist affiliations.

The Outer Parts.

Finally the Commissioners moved to the outer areas, traversing the cloister from the vestry to the Kitchen and Buttery (see the description of the Canons' Dining Parlour.) The final part of the claustral buildings was "the Fermory" or Infirmary which probably stood close to the Kitchen for ease of supplying sick canons with convalescent food. Then they moved to the byres, stables, pig sty, sheep pens and the abbey's mill. Their list of 11 horses, 30 cattle, 160 sheep, 4 sows "called shetes," a boar, two carts and 6 loads of hay are a reminder that this abbey was also a working farm concentrating on animal husbandry. 34 fields and 4 groves of woodland are listed in the Crown grant of the Abbey lands to John Gates.

Nowadays the remains of Beeleigh Abbey are approached by a minor road, but the Crown grant refers to a "Long Haure house called the Gatehouse." This phrase is best explained (remembering that this is an abbey and that it was situated on the south bank of the tidal River Chelmer), as referring to a building in which sculls ("long oars") were kept. That is to say, many people and the canons themselves arrived or departed in rowing boats.

Final Comments on the life at Beeleigh.

It is natural that documents produced by the process of dissolution and secularisation should emphasise the domestic and agricultural aspect of medieval monasticism, but in the case of the last White Canons of Beeleigh this may have been well justified. Beeleigh Abbey was very similar to the smaller colleges of Cambridge in the 1520s in its way of life; it was the comfortable though by no means luxurious home of a small community of studious, conventionally pious celibates who probably adopted a life-style reminiscent of that developed by the Brethren of the Common Life just across the sea in the Low Countries.

© 2003 Maldon.co.uk

Site created and managed by Basinsites

Maldon.co.uk - St. Giles Hospital

The information portal for Maldon residents, businesses and visitors

These picturesque ruins are a short walk from the town centre along the road named after them: Spital Road.

St. Giles' was a leper hospital founded during the 12th century in the reign of Henry II. The remaining buildings are part of the chancel and transepts of the chapel, which must have been on quite an impressive scale. In 1402 an inquiry recorded that the Master of St. Giles was allowed to receive all the defective bread, meat and fish in the town in order to feed the inmates, and he was to provide a chaplain for them to take divine service each day in the chapel. In 1481 the hospital was conveyed to the abbot and monastery at Beeleigh.

The dedication to St. Giles was a common one for leper hospitals, and his cult was immensely popular during the middle ages. He was a late 7th century hermit who, according to legend, was shot in the hand while giving refuge to a hind escaping from a royal hunt. Thus he became the patron saint of cripples and, by extension, lepers. Such an association with the hopelessly oppressed was strengthened by another legend in which an emperor, overcome with sense of unforgiven sin, asked St. Giles to intercede for him. The story goes that the next day while St. Giles was saying Mass, he saw a chart held by an angel on which the nature of the emperor's guilt was written: but as the saint was praying the words disappeared. This second legend is the subject of a major painting, The Mass of St. Giles, (c.1500, artist unknown) which is on display at the National Gallery in London.

In common with Beeleigh Abbey, St. Giles was closed during the dissolution of the monasteries under Henry VIII.

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 5

Professionalism in Administration

Promotion and the Hierarchy of Experience

It is evident that a convenient approach to the question of experience is via an investigation of the ages of office-holders. Age was no guarantee of political authority - and in this sense it would be misleading to describe urban ruling classes as patriarchates - but since experience is generally a cumulative effect occurring over a period of time, a comparison of ages could prove a tentative guide.

Although we will discuss the evidence of ages and lengths of political careers from most of the towns studied here, it must be admitted immediately that only Lynn provides sufficient evidence for reconstruction of an age hierarchy, and even here there are several problems which must render any analysis imperfect. These problems relate to the estimation of dates of birth and death; the medieval historian is rarely so fortunate, unlike students of later eras, as to have the detailed parish and probate records that permit confident calculations of the ages of individuals. Wills, which provide an approximate date of death, survive in toto or extracts therefrom for only 52 of the 473 Lynn office-holders studied. Fortunately for our purposes, such documents were usually drawn up at the approach of death;^[3] where there is a gap of more than a year between the making of the will and its probate in ecclesiastical courts - probate in borough courts not being a consistently reliable guide - the year of probate has been considered closer to the death of the testator, in the absence of evidence to the contrary. Deaths of men actually in office are frequently recorded, due to the need to elect replacements, and the last year of listing of a man among Lynn's jurats in the fifteenth century is tantamount to an obituary, since the office was held for life except in the event of deposition or retirement, which are usually recorded. Thus, Robert de Salisbury, first jurat in 1388, is recorded as retiring in November 1424 and in June 1429 we hear of his son Thomas being excused his appointment to go to Denmark as ambassador for the borough, because he had custody of an aged father and mother; Robert drew up his will in December 1429.^[4] Even in the early fourteenth century the records occasionally reveal retirements, as in the case of Thomas de Sechford, whose administrative involvement began in the office of chamberlain in 1297, and who was elected to the mayoralty in 1306 and 1308; thereafter he apparently remained in the background, in jurat ranks, until 1324. In 1325 he retired from the office of coroner on the grounds of old age and paralysis, an excuse rendered plausible on this occasion by his death in 1326/7.^[5] On the other hand, we have a few cases such as those of William Wyth and Edmund Westhorp, who did not formally retire from the office of jurat, yet who did not attend any assemblies during their last six years of office; in Westhorp's case this was probably due to infirmity - he had completed his apprenticeship in 1433, become a jurat in 1458, and died in 1493, a year after his last listing as jurat.[6] Even more misleading is the case of Richard Gigges, promoted from councillor to jurat in 1445 and last listed as jurat in 1451. He was certainly dead by November 1456, yet is said to have languished sick in bed for nine years before his death; if so, his active life as a jurat must have been rather brief.[7]

Year of birth is less easy to identify. Never specified, it may be estimated through rare clues such as provings of age of attainment, which was evidently 21 in Lynn,[8] or specific reference to an individual's age. Of the latter one must be wary, for in 1412 John de Lakinghithe was described as 80 years old, but in 1415 when he sought to excuse himself from appearing at Chancery on grounds of infirmity and old age, he was only 75 years old![9] Entrances to the franchise and, to a lesser extent, those to the Merchant Guild have been the principal sources for estimation of birth in this study. In particular, entrances by patrimony or apprenticeship have been considered relatively safe guides. The term of apprenticeship in Lynn lasted, as elsewhere, usually for seven or eight years and was begun in the teenage years; it was expected that an apprentice would be 21 years old before he ended his term and his master applied for the franchise on his behalf. Similarly, it was expected that all entrants to the gild have attained their majority. Furthermore, the communal duty of night-watch (from which we may infer, any position of responsibility) was not to fall to anyone under 21.[10] The use of merchant-apprentices as factors meant that they were sometimes abroad at the end of their apprenticeship terms and not able immediately to take up the franchise.[11] In the cases both of apprentices and sons of freemen, exemption from entrance fine was conditional upon their not having traded for personal profit between the times of qualification for entry and actual entry; it was therefore to their advantage to become freemen as soon as of the age of majority. [12] We see precisely this procedure in the cases of Andrew de Swanton, who was evidently the child born posthumously to William de Swanton (died August 1361) and who became a freeman in 1383, and of Philip Wyth (son of the man of the same name who died 1349) whose age was proved as 21 on the same day that he became a freeman in 1358.[13] In the absence of contradictory information, it has been assumed that entrants by patrimony and apprenticeship were liable to be between the ages of 21-25. Men who purchased the franchise have generally been considered as being a little older. Robert Wake, who purchased his freedom in 1376, was mentioned in his father's will dated 1340, when underage,[14] and there are over sixty other cases of men amerced in the leet court, involved in trade, voting in Common Council elections, or active in the borough in other ways as to suggest residency, before purchasing freeman status.

The evidence for birth and death dates discussed above has been used in conjunction with all other available information for each individual, but because of the unavoidable imprecision involved, birth dates have in most cases been estimated to the nearest half-decade, and age estimates are therefore given in terms of a five-year span. The statistics thus available, for 170 of the total 473 Lynn office-holders, suggest an average life-span within the 57-62 years range, breaking down thus:

| age | 30-35 | 35-40 | 40-45 | 45-50 | 50-55 | 55-60 | 60-65 | 65-70 | 70-75 | 75-80 | 80-85 |
|----------------|-------|-------|-------|-------|-------|-------|-------|-------|-------|-------|-------|
| no. of persons | 2 | 5 | 8 | 11 | 24 | 32 | 44 | 24 | 9 | 9 | 2 |
| % * | 99 | 98 | 95 | 90 | 84 | 70 | 51 | 25 | 11 | 6 | 1 |

* (rounded off and cumulative in reverse order)

A number of qualifications must instantly be attached to these figures. Office-holders who did not live to middle-age are likely to be under-represented, since death may often have taken them unawares, before they had made wills. That is almost certainly the case with the Philip Wyth junior mentioned above, who died before 1377 and whose will, had he left one, would have been entered into the Liber Lynn alongside those of others of his family. Since, as we shall shortly see, men tended not to enter into the mainstream of administrative duties before their 30s, the average calculated above must not be taken as applicable to the whole adult male burgess population. Indeed, Thrupp's study of London merchants shows 49-50 to be a more reasonable life expectancy, supporting the findings of Russell.[15] If we eliminate those of Thrupp's examples who did not reach the age of 30, her average is raised, but only slightly, to 53-54. The remaining discrepancy may be explained away largely as the consequence of our figures relying over-heavily on the cases of jurats, who tended to be veterans. At the same time, it is clear that a substantial majority (over 80%) of the office-holders for whom length of life has been calculated lived beyond the average life-expectancy estimated by Russell and Thrupp. Platt has noted, with regard to Southampton burgesses, that "a strikingly high percentage" reached their 60s or beyond,[16] and the same may be said for these Lynn men.

Age was not a pre-requisite for power, but it may be true that the major figures in local government, wielding the most influence, were usually the survivors of their class: the long-livers. Our office-holders, as the wealthier members of the borough community, had a relatively comfortable standard of living and servants to do some of their work for them, and so had a better chance of survival to old age. Yet death is not only no respecter of persons, it also pays little heed to age. Richard Gigges had probably barely passed his fiftieth birthday when he finally succumbed, after years of illness; and Margery Kempe's husband John may have appeared to his wife "a man in gret age passyng thre scor yer"[17] when he turned senile, but other evidence suggests he was not much past the 60 years mark. By contrast, we have men like William de Swanton of Lynn, or Hugh Fastolf of Yarmouth, still fathering children in their late 40s or 50s - a fact which may help explain the large number of underage children found in wills - and Edmund Westhorp (jurat over a 34-year period), John de Lakinghithe (jurat 27 years), Ralph Bedingham (jurat 36 years), Edmund Belleyeter (jurat 43 years), Robert de Salisbury (jurat 36 years), Thomas de Waterden (jurat 41 years), and John de Brunham (jurat 55 years),[18] men still active in administration in their late 70s and early 80s, almost up to their deaths; most of this last group were mayors more than once and several held the post of alderman too.

Estimation of age is far more difficult from the Colchester and Ipswich evidence. A smaller proportion of burgess entrances have been recorded,[19] and we know too little about the conditions governing entrance to the franchise in those towns for that evidence to be of much use in estimating birth.[20] In fact, of our Colchester officials the age of only one can be calculated with any confidence. Matthew fitz Robert le Verrer is first mentioned in the context of the 1296 lay subsidy, when his assessment and the description of his moveables suggest someone just starting out in life. As his first responsible role comes in 1301, as assessor of that year's subsidy, one is inclined to doubt that Matthew was born much later than 1280; nor does an earlier date commend itself greatly given that his father was still alive in 1307 and his mother in 1327, and that Matthew's will received probate in 1358/9 (although he does not appear in the records after 1352).[21] Matthew was therefore about 75 years old when he died. The ages of 13 Ipswich office-holders can be estimated and they average at the 54-59 years range, but so small a sample cannot be considered acceptable as a guide to the average age of the whole group.[22] However, this evidence, such as it is, still favours the idea that office-holders tended to live beyond the average life-span of the medieval burgess.

Nor are we enlightened on the subject of age by analysis of the average length of time between entrance to the franchise and the first holding of ballival or mayoral office.[23] At Lynn the average is 21 years, with a minimum of 1 year (John Urry[24]) and maximum of 42 years (John Lakinghithe); but few men (9%) held the mayoralty within their first decade as freemen, and the great majority of our examples are clustered within a decade on either side of the estimated average. At Ipswich the average is 17 years, with a minimum of 1 year (John Heved) and maximum of 37 years. At Colchester there is an average of 19 years, with a minimum of 1 year (Thomas Godestone) and maximum 37 years. In both Ipswich and Colchester, however, the examples are well spread out between the minima and maxima, with no conglomerations of statistics, and therefore the notion of an average is not very helpful. We are no better off at Maldon, where the franchise entrances of 28 of our office-holders are recorded. Judging from length of life approximations, it seems that entrances most commonly occurred in early adulthood, in the 20s. Analyses of the distances between entrance and the holding of offices of chamberlain and bailiff each produce an average of 15 years, but this is misleading as only four of the chamberlains whose entrances are recorded also held the ballivalty. Unfortunately we cannot tell whether the absence of any pattern in these towns is a consequence of trends in office-holding or in entrances to the franchise, lack of knowledge as to ages preventing us from clarifying the situation. We are thus encircled by our ignorance.

Once again it is to Lynn that we must turn for more detailed evidence of a hierarchy of experience; for, supplementing the data of men whose ages have been calculated with others whose franchise entrances at least are known, we may estimate the average ages for the holding of particular offices. The chart showing these ages[25] indicates a cursus officiorum and the association of higher office with men of greater age. The model constructed is one of men entering the corporation via the office of chamberlain, and/or that of Common Councillor in the fifteenth century, the worthier of their number being promoted into the jurats within a few years, and a large proportion of these attaining the mayoralty after a further few years service as jurats. It may be noted that, of the men who rose to the mayoralty before the age of 40, half held office in the earliest of our three chronological divisions. This impression of a younger administration the earlier back in time we look is supported by the evidence generally, although it is interesting that the average age of chamberlains - the point of entry of the cursus - does not show any significant fluctuations. The increases, from one period to another, of the average ages of jurats[26] and mayors are quite distinct and may reflect increasing life-expectation, although this is purely hypothetical.[27] The correspondence of average ages of chamberlains and jurats 1350-99 is explicable by the fact that it was not uncommon in that period for men elected chamberlains to have already served in the jurats (which it must be remembered was the sole council and an elected one), or to become jurats when elected chamberlain; there are 28 cases of this. That situation altered with the borough constitutional reforms of the reign of Henry V, producing a lower council and raising the standing of the jurats, while also prohibiting that chamberlains be chosen from the jurats.[28] There are only two cases of jurats acting as chamberlains in the period 1400-60, one pre-dating the reforms, one contemporary with them; the Common Council henceforth took over (informally) the role of the jurats in furnishing many of the chamberlains.[29]

If we investigate this age hierarchy in more detail, we are led to conclude that an effective promotional system operated in Lynn's government. In fact, there is increasing evidence that such systems may have been common features of later medieval borough government generally. In fifteenth century Oxford we find a promotional route beginning with ward constable and progressing through common councillor, chamberlain, bailiff, to permanent aldermannic status and thence to the mayoralty; a man might hold the same office more than once before moving up a step on the ladder, but he would not be asked to serve in an office lower than the one last held. The scabin's office in fourteenth century Southampton has been described as "a distinction or a reward for past services." A promotional relationship between the lower and upper councils in seventeenth century Ipswich, Stamford tempore Edward IV, and medieval Exeter has been discerned, whilst at Exeter (1340) service in the office of steward was prescribed as a pre-requisite for election to the mayoralty.[30]

At Lynn - and the same seems to hold true for the other towns studied here, as far as the poorer evidence allows determination - the lowest level of participation in borough administration seems to be in the leet. The responsibilities of many of our office-holders began as capital pledges[31] or leet affeerors, but not constables, an office generally held by men of jurat status, perhaps because of the coercive power it endowed. The minor, and very temporary, roles of tax assessor/collector also feature early in careers. Holding of these roles was not influenced by whether a man had yet entered the franchise. The same is true of bureaucratic posts, often held by non-freemen and usually by townsmen other than those of the wealthiest class. Just over a dozen of the office-holders studied from Lynn, Ipswich, Colchester, and Yarmouth (approximately 1%) held such posts, but of them only two rose to the executive offices of their towns;[32] the others were of little account, although two were briefly jurats, and at Colchester and Yarmouth a few M.P.s were men who held the post of sergeant.[33] Most of these bureaucrats date from the fourteenth century; with the growing awareness of the dignity of office in the fifteenth, we find fewer of our men serving in bureaucratic offices. Thomas Tolyot, councillor for most of the period 1443-72, refused the office of sergeant-at-mace in 1461; William Richeman appears to have turned down the same office and the janitorship of the town's south gate in 1450; and Amery Trewe (frequently councillor 1431-47) volunteered for the newly-created post of supervisor of community tenements, in 1434, only after negotiating the relatively high annual salary of £5.[34]

However, there is no evidence that any of the above offices was either qualification or pre-requisite for higher office. If there were any pre-requisite - and such factors are generally unwritten laws - it would be found in the financial office. At Exeter the stewards mentioned above, although not the principal financial officers of the community, were officers with financial responsibilities. A similar case is seen at Norwich, where the requirement that all mayors have served first as sheriff, the office responsible for the fee farm, was doubtless prompted not only by the value of shrieval experience but by the desire to ensure that holders could be found for a burdensome office.[35] We may suspect that it was usual in Lynn for a man to enter the higher ranks of government via the office of chamberlain from the fact that, of our 473 Lynn men, 416 held that office at least once in their lives. Of the 57 not known to have been chamberlain: 25 cases may be explained as due to gaps in the records or as men who were in borough administration before the office of chamberlain is known to have existed; 8 cases were of men not involved in the administrative mainstream, but acting only as M.P.s; 4 were town clerks; 5 were men who held office during the period of political disruption (1411-16) when the normal cursus officiorum was abandoned, and 4 were the atypical cases (already mentioned) of men prompted into the mayoralty or jurat ranks within a year of becoming freemen.[36] Setting aside these cases, we can conclude that 97.4% of the Lynn office-holders studied here held the office of chamberlain (although not all went on to hold other offices).

The situation in our other towns is not quite so decisive. At Colchester, where financial officers were to be chosen from persons who had never been bailiff,[37] the former were clearly junior in the administrative hierarchy but only one-third of the bailiffs are known to have served as receiver/chamberlain after that office was initiated. However, the list of known financial officers is only half complete, so it may well be that a majority of bailiffs did serve in the financial office first. Our lists of financial officers at Ipswich are similarly inadequate, but suggest that, in the reign of Henry VI at least, some two-thirds of the bailiffs were formerly chamberlains/treasurers. At Yarmouth the lists are somewhat fuller and indicate, for the same period, about the same proportion. At Maldon, on the other hand (again with inadequate lists), only one-third of the bailiffs are known to have been chamberlains. It may be noted that in all of these towns the financial office was invariably held prior to executive office; the sole exception, John Page of Maldon, occurring at an early stage (1414) in the development of the financial office there. Because of the unpopularity of financial office, very few men held it repeatedly, and the effect of Lynn's reform in barring jurats from camerarian office was to increase the number of men holding it, so that it became rare for any man to hold it more than once. In consequence, and despite the special efforts taken by borough authorities, [38] we cannot expect to find much expertise developing in this department.

According to our hierarchical model, the next step up the ladder was entry into the town council. Just over half the men who served as chamberlains in Lynn went on to become jurats. Creation of a Common Council in Lynn doubtless is largely responsible for raising the average age of jurats, by setting an additional rung in the ladder. That the lower council was the usual route of promotion into the upper is seen from the fact that, after 1418 (when the first membership of the lower council is recorded), of the 73 of our office-holders who became jurats, 51 were councillors previously. Of the remainder: 16 had previously served as chamberlains; one was the rehabilitated leader and ex-mayor of the reformers, Bartholomew Petypas; 3 were the special cases discussed elsewhere;^[39] one was a man who had served as M.P. three times (John Waterden); and the last was Thomas Salisbury, who was to have been councillor, but instead engineered his succession to his father in jurat ranks. It must be stressed again that cases of sudden promotion, by-passing established routes, although not technically unconstitutional, were atypical infractions of tradition. When John Style was made a freeman and a jurat at the same assembly in January 1439, the move provoked such public criticism from young merchants who had only just begun to work their way up the ladder of promotion, that severe measures had to be taken to quiet the malcontents.^[40]

For a more typical example of the process of promotion, we may review the career of William Marche. A waxhandler, he first appears in 1445 when paid by the community for making wax figures to go in a model ship to be presented to Lord Scales, and he purchased the franchise in 1453; from this and other evidence a birth-date of c.1425 is likely. Assigned the roles of capital pledge (1454, 1457) and leet affeeror (1457) soon after his entrance, he became involved in borough administration proper when elected chamberlain in 1459 and, after the completion of this term, immediately entered the Common Council. There he remained until 1463, when he fell from grace as the result of some imprecisely understood quarrel with the mayor, as a result of which he was disfranchised and thrown into prison (this part of his career was, of course, not typical). His rehabilitation was accomplished before 1469, when he was re-elected as councillor for a year. A further year in the Common Council (1473/4) was interrupted by his promotion to the jurats in August 1474. He was selected as one of the jurats to hold the rarely-mentioned ward aldermen's posts in 1479, and the following year attained the mayoralty, to which he was re-elected in 1481. William remained a jurat, and also coroner after 1485, until the year before his death in 1489; by which time he had exchanged his chandler designation for that of merchant, and had acquired substantial property not only in Lynn borough, but also in South Lynn and the Wiggshall area.^[41] To give one more brief example, a similar line of development is seen in the career of John Gosse, who entered the franchise at Ipswich in 1443, was chamberlain first in 1454, apparently a Common Councillor by 1459, and almost certainly a portman by the time he held his first ballivalty in 1466; four further ballivalties followed, and Gosse is still found as a portman in 1486, some dozen years before his death.^[42]

The lists of Lynn jurats show a further sophistication of the cursus officiorum in the form of a cursus honorum. Again, this is not unknown elsewhere, having revealed itself in the listing of the councils of Oxford and Stamford,^[43] although that in Lynn may be traced further back in time. From the sample analyses of lists used in our discussion of monopolisation, it is clear that the lists of jurats in office between 1430 and 1450 show a coherently consistent ordering of names, not so rigidly repetitive as to imply mere clerical copying from the previous year's list, but sufficiently similar to strongly suggest a reflection of seniorities within jurat ranks. Fluctuations such as occur in the listings are largely explicable. Some are simply clerical errors, as in 1435 when the influx of an unusually large number of new members appears to have thrown off the clerk who, however, corrected the ordering in 1436 so that it followed logically on from that of 1434. Further error, in 1479, serves to illustrate that this cursus was a conscious affair: again in that year the clerk mixed up the order of names, but this was sorted out by placing miniscule letters above each name, in an alphabetical order corresponding to the seniority indicated in the list of 1478.[44] Alterations in listing, and thereby promotion up the course, were also the result of deaths of jurat members, and the promotion of one jurat annually to the mayoralty, thus putting him at the head of the list. Mayors tended to be chosen from the 'middle eight' of the 24; whatever the intent behind this, the effect must have been to guarantee mayors who had accumulated several years of experience in the higher decision-making which fell to the jurats, and who had time to develop a loyalty to the interests of the group, while maintaining a balance of power within the ranks so that the most senior of the jurats did not monopolise the mayoralty. Mayoral promotion was the only fast route through the ranks of the jurats, which was basically a society of equals of varying degrees of experience. On the other hand, at the top of each list after mayor and alderman were the ex-mayors (nobiles de banco), the elite we have already uncovered; the retiring mayor was usually listed as the last of these. We can only speculate on how much this group may have been the real driving force behind borough government. The nobiles did not monopolise the mayoralty - in fact, 13 of the 24 jurats of 1430, and 14 of the 25 jurats of 1370, held the mayoralty at some time in their lives[45] - but they did supply the office of alderman of the Merchant Guild. Yet there is no indication this elite developed interests counter to those of their fellow jurats, it was simply a case of experience-based seniority.[46] In the period 1370-90 this careful ordering of jurats is not evidenced - it would have been a difficult task given the elective character of the jurats at that time - but its roots are visible in the recording of the names of mayor, alderman, and then former mayors, first; the special status of former mayors is visible at least as early as 1365.[47]

At Yarmouth our knowledge of administrative structure is too sketchy to reconstruct any political hierarchy. There is some indication that, notably in the fourteenth century, there may have been no age hierarchy, for a number of bailiffs evidently first held that office at a young age. We may select, from a large number of examples: Stephen de Catfield, whose merchant career began with a contract to supply the army with victuals in 1318, and who died in 1356, 35 years after his first ballival term; John de Fordele, whose ballival career lasted from 1289 to 1309, but who appears to be the same man who made his will in 1336; Richard Fastolf, first bailiff in 1303, who outlived his own children to die in 1356; Richard's nephew, Hugh Fastolf, who began his career in the customs service in 1351, became bailiff in 1354, and died in 1392; William de Oxney, 13 times bailiff 1376-1409, last heard of in 1410; Ralph Ramsey who, perhaps as a reward for his service to Bolingbroke (see below), was granted the office of controller in Yarmouth for life in 1384 (although he surrendered the office a few months later), became bailiff the following year, and rose ultimately to the county's shrievalty, dying in 1419; Thomas Halle, bailiff but once in 1397, although he later represented the borough in parliament (1423, 1429), and who was still alive in 1434; John Cranelee, bailiff in 1411, who died c.1445.[48] If we may use the average age of Lynn office-holders as a rough guide, then examples such as those listed above indicate that it was not too uncommon for men in the late 20s and early 30s to become bailiff. It may be that this is a consequence of the system of junior and senior bailiffs that seems to have existed, and perhaps was intended to give potential future leaders experience in government.

Before summing up, we may briefly look at the position of the M.P. in the hierarchy. McKisack's thesis of parliamentary experience has been echoed in, and supported by, various studies since.^[49] That thesis states: that M.P.s were chosen from men of influence, experienced in the art of local administration or versed in the affairs of the town; whether men who had actually served in borough government, or other members of the wealthy class from which the administration was recruited, they shared common interests and "they knew well what their own boroughs wanted."^[50] The statistics from the towns studied here, dealt with in the discussion of monopolisation, confirm the essence of this thesis, although we must not ignore a large minority of town clerks, sergeants, and men of little apparent note, who sat in the fourteenth century, and a smaller minority of outsiders who sat in the fifteenth. Our average age estimates confirm that M.P.s were usually men of jurat, although not quite mayoral, status. Lawson's analysis of London M.P.s 1413-37 similarly found that two-thirds were aldermen at the time of, or soon after, their elections, whilst most of the remainder held some lesser civic office.^[51] This is not to say that young men were not considered for the duty: John Walworth junior, M.P. for Ipswich in 1472, could not have been more than 24 years old, since his father had no children when he entered the franchise in 1448; and Richard Suthwell was probably no older than 30 when he sat for Yarmouth in 1455.^[52] On the contrary, it is the older of our office-holders who are conspicuously absent from the ranks of M.P.s, not surprisingly, since it can rarely have been necessary to send the most experienced members of local government - men becoming rather old for long jurnies - to do a job that could be done as well by others. But if age equals the accumulation of experience, as has been argued regarding members of borough government, and these members dominate the list of M.P.s, then we must conclude that experience played a definite role when it came to selecting M.P.s.

The evidence presented above leads to the conclusion that in Lynn there was a clear promotional system operating in government, albeit informally. It is likely that such systems, in a less or more elaborate form, existed in most of our other towns and, indeed, will probably be found in most English boroughs; one suspects it an inevitable development in a sophisticating hierarchy. Even in Maldon, the poorest and least mature of our towns, we find unmistakeable evidence of hierarchic and promotional notions. Hierarchy is expressed in a chapter of the sixteenth century recension of the custumal, setting out the graduated fines for officers refusing to accept office: bailiffs were to be fined £10, J.P.s and aldermen £7, wardemen and chamberlains £5, constables £2, other officers £1. Promotion is expressed in the 1444 custumal requirement that, once a man had served as bailiff, he should never be chosen to any lesser office except M.P., which the sixteenth century custumal expanded to include deposed bailiffs and aldermen, who were not to be chosen to any office lower than that of wardeman, whilst deposed wardemen should not be elected to any office below constable.^[53] Wealth and parentage may have had some influence over the choice of who was to be promoted, but these were perhaps of diminished importance once the threshold into the ranks of the decision-making level of government had been crossed; thereafter experience is likely to have played a crucial role in promotional decisions, in a system where men tended not to court power. It might be stretching the evidence too far to suggest that medieval borough government was a 'meritocracy'. But certainly the seeming emphasis on experience and promotion through a hierarchy is likely to have made for a relatively open form of government, in which power was shared between a fairly large number of townsmen, yet allowing for a higher degree of competency at the highest governmental level, where it was most needed to provide the efficient rule that was fundamental to burgh political philosophy. At the same time, the promotional system, particularly in the relationship between upper and lower councils, gave the urban elites some control over recruitment to their own number - including the opportunity to exclude potential dissenters, lone wolves, or demagogues, who might threaten the unity of the ruling class.[54] But it would be unduly cynical, and not consonant with the available evidence, to suggest that this control was used to create and maintain an oligarchy.

🔍 previous

next 🔍

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 4

Attitudes Towards Office-holding

The Burdens of Office

As counterbalance to the advantages of office, we may notice several detrimental features that may have served to discourage men from actively seeking office. The performance of official duties occupied time that might have been more profitably spent attending to personal business affairs. The above-mentioned grant of meadow to Ipswich's portmen was intended to compensate them since they "ben more ocupied for the state and for the worship of the toun, and oftyn more travayled and charged thanne other of the toun."[\[22\]](#) It is not easy, however, to estimate precisely how much time administrative duties took up. Presidency of the borough court, the principal task of the executives of most of our towns, was not limited to the one-day-a-week/fortnight which was the common prescription for the regularity of court sessions. As early as the end of the thirteenth century, the aptitude of medieval men for litigation was producing such a volume of court business that it was necessary to extend court sessions into at least a second day each week, or even to divide business between two or more courts.[\[23\]](#) Thus, at Ipswich the petty court developed out of the original great court, and at Colchester the hundredal sessions were supplemented by those entitled simply placita. These judicial sessions were separate from those that dealt with development of policy and making of administrative decisions, of which only the most formal and productive are usually recorded (except at Lynn) during the fourteenth century. In addition to the regular court sessions and the less frequent assizes and leet courts, there were more impromptu ones to deal with pleas requiring haste: fresh force/abatment (the burghal novel disseisin), and cases involving the law merchant in "foreign" or piepowder courts. Furthermore, executive officers could be asked to witness recognisances or apply their seal of office to private documents at other times outside formal court sessions. In 1405 it was necessary to respite the assize of bread, held in Colchester on February 9, to May 11 "causa magne ocupacionis ballivorum."[\[24\]](#) We must also remember that those men occupying the highest offices in their boroughs were generally the same men serving in official capacities in the customs service, staple organisation, and local gilds, and had to devote some of their time to these interests too.

The development of the financial office and of the bureaucracy owes something to the desire to free the executive from his more routine chores, in order to concentrate on more important matters; the fact that most executives comprised more than one official may have been partly intended to permit a division of labour.[\[25\]](#) At Yarmouth in 1491, reference was made to the duty of the chamberlains of spending 2 hours each morning and 2 hours each afternoon of every day in collecting town customs and duties.[26] Private individuals were commandeered to carry messages on behalf of the corporation to out-of-town locations, although it may be that at least some were travelling on business anyway. The same cannot be said of M.P.s, who were often required, in addition to their attendance at parliament, to transact community business at court or with representatives of other interests at the parliamentary location; M.P.s could usually expect to be absent from their own businesses for at least a month - in 1465 the Lynn M.P.s were away for 123 days, due to prorogations.[27] Absences out of town, or in performance of administrative duties in town, might have proved disastrous for the artisan of average means, but the wealthier burgesses' interests did not need such constant personal supervision: hired hands looked after fields and livestock, factors and apprentices the mercantile and industrial concerns. At the same time, some sacrifice was probably involved, as it seems that executive and financial officers were expected to remain within the town during their terms of office, under normal circumstances, or to absent themselves only on community business. In Lynn, at least, the freeman's right to claim a share in mercantile sales was forfeited by community officials if they were not able, because occupied with community affairs, to be present in person or by attorney.[28]

Executive office was also a heavy duty in that its holders were answerable for their conduct of government, both to the community and to the king. The latter required of the borough executive efficient, just, peaceable, and above all profitable administration. If the farm or other dues to the king were not paid, it may have been the community that was theoretically responsible; but in practice it was the executive and their fellows of the wealthy upper class who would have to make up the deficit from their own pockets, or bear the brunt of distraint. It was the same group who paid out when the king demanded loans from the community, or who bore the immediate payment of royal expenses contracted locally, which the Exchequer was often in no hurry to repay. In 1338 the amount assessed on Colchester in a national taxation was paid by the wealthier townsmen who, however, had so much difficulty in obtaining repayment from the other members of the community that the king had to intervene to compel all to contribute. Again in 1373 part of the town's royal subsidy was paid out of the profits of ballival office, although this was said to be voluntary. In the same year, at Ipswich, William Maister and Hugh Walle complained to the king that during their ballivalty they had been obliged to pay part of the cost of a barge, commissioned by the king, from their own money, but now (no longer being bailiffs) could not obtain repayment from the burgesses whose contributions were still owing.[29] On top of this financial responsibility to the Exchequer, the bailiffs were similarly accountable to the community for borough revenues. It was declared at Yarmouth in 1491 that if the annual budget produced a deficit of up to £10 the bailiffs must provide this from their own pockets; over £10 and a special assembly had to be called to deal with the problem. In 1423 it was ordained in Maldon that all officials involved in the collection of borough revenues would be personally liable for the payment of the same, unless they could prove that the amounts could not be levied; the same system may be inferred from the Lynn accounts of the fifteenth century. But ultimately the Maldon bailiffs were responsible for budget deficits, their goods being distrained upon if necessary; accountants were not to be permitted to withdraw from the court of account until all debts and arrears were fully paid. In May 1440 the Ipswich chamberlains of 1438/9 were ordered to produce in court, within a week, £20 that the community had loaned the king during their term, or be disfranchised.[30]

It is a sign of the immaturity of the financial system of the medieval borough that either executive or financial officers were personally responsible for payment of borough expenses from their own treasuries, hoping to recoup from borough revenues that were not always easy to collect; and that they were personally liable for any theoretical (i.e. estimated) surplus of revenue over expenditure. The same is seen in that it was these officers, as private individuals rather than representatives of a corporation whose existence was not adequately recognised by law before incorporation grants, who had to sue to obtain revenues when necessary. To this end, the Colchester receivers are found suing several persons in 1392/3. Matthew Dyer was sued in 1410 by a brewer for the price of victuals sold to the use of the community in 1405, when Dyer had been receiver. In 1396 the Ipswich chamberlains sued the town miller for damage to the town mill resulting from his neglect but, losing their case, were themselves amerced for unjust plea.[31] Lynn's mayors, and presumably the same holds true of the executives of our other towns, sometimes had to bear the expense of domiciling and entertaining important visitors to the town.[32] Under such circumstances it is hardly surprising that we hear not of men seeking office or taking office, but of them being charged (carcantur) or burdened (onerantur) with it. Nor is it surprising that this charge and burden fell upon the backs of the wealthier townsmen.

A less common concern, but one not to be ignored, was the possibility of bodily harm coming to the holders of office. Deterrent ordinances notwithstanding, in an age when men were quick to anger, the person of the executive bore the risk of assault. In 1394 Giles Elleslee was gaoled at Ipswich for assaulting a bailiff; William Rason of Maldon was fined in 1461 for attacking bailiff Robert Burgeys with a club; in 1345 Roger Costyn was in the process of assaulting John Fynch in Colchester's market-place and, when the bailiff and a sergeant tried to apprehend him, he set upon them too.[33] Sergeants were particularly common targets for assault, being much involved in the areas of enforcement, distraint, and collection of revenues. So too were tax-collectors; at Lynn it was ordained in 1374 that anyone slandering or obstructing tax-collectors would have to pay double his tax assessment. In 1327 the chief county taxer of Norfolk was attacked by a mob when he came to Yarmouth to select local taxers. And in the course of the Peasants' Revolt, the house of Ipswich's John Cobat, one of the M.P.s who had approved the poll-tax of 1377, was attacked.[34] Cases are rare, but we do find some executives killed in the course of their duty: a Yarmouth bailiff of the time of Edward I was hanged for killing a bailiff of the Cinque Ports, and an unidentified mayor of Lynn (probably William de Sechford) was killed by a Wyrehale man who subsequently abjured the realm.[35] Others from Yarmouth, Lynn, and Ipswich (as we shall see in chapter 7) were killed or assaulted outside their terms of office but in quarrels or vendettas consequent to political rivalries.

← previous

next →

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 2

The Social and Economic Background of Office-holders

Social Cohesion and Mobility within the Ruling Class

Alongside class consciousness, and perhaps fostering it, were family pride and personal ego. That the solidarity and exclusiveness of the ruling class was furthered by marriage alliances between its component families is now well-documented. In early fourteenth century Lynn the families of Schilling, Keu, Thornegge, and Massingham were so linked. Slightly later Hugh de Betele married the daughter of his trading partner John de Swerdestone. At Ipswich we discover intermarriage between the families of Maister, Horold, and Curteys; also those of Rente, Roberd, Whatefeld, and Harneys.[\[112\]](#) To provide a full list would only use up space unnecessarily. Marriages between members of leading families was a natural consequence of their close social and business contacts; probably we should not go beyond this to infer some socio-political conspiracy. For it would be possible also to cite numerous cases of scions of leading urban families looking beyond the narrow horizons of their own community for a spouse, or taking in new blood. We have just noted Margery Kempe's scorn for her husband John Kempe's less distinguished social background; it is clear that John's modest success in business and politics owed as much to Margery's dowry and family prestige as it did to his own father's position as jurat and merchant.[\[113\]](#)

The cohesiveness of the ruling class was also contributed to by factors such as business partnerships and neighbourhood. The former could also be a source of fallings-out, however. And rarely does one see such a close relationship as that of John Ashenden and Edward Mayn of Lynn: partners in a brewing operation, they entered the franchise together in 1412, Corpus Christi gild together in 1436 (each standing pledge for the other), pledged each other's wife when she entered the Trinity gild, and stood side by side at assembly meetings; they were separated only by death.[\[114\]](#) Neighbourhood is more difficult to trace because it is not always clear which of several properties owned was a man's residence; but certainly market and port areas were heavily populated by members of the ruling class. One cannot help feeling, in looking at business involvement, however, that individualism was more important than family association. Enterprise is not inherited as easily as property, and it was by enterprise that family fortunes - and political prominence - were built and maintained. We therefore encounter not only expressions of family pride, but also personal pride: a sense of self-importance. John Prymerole of Colchester bequeathed in 1452 the bed-cover under which he slept, which was adorned with the image of St. John Baptist and flowers called primeroles.

Ipswich's John Drayll left a very long will (1464) in which he required that not only his name but an image of himself be carved on his tombstone, and that St. Mary Tower be provided with an altar-cloth with his name inscribed on it so as to be visible to all. John Burghard of Lynn insisted that bedemen be hired to proclaim his death throughout England. And Thomas de Couteshale of the same town was sufficiently arrogant to provoke the hostility of the whole community by his refusal to submit to minor disciplining.[115]

Personal merit and achievement were liable to mitigate the disadvantages of birth in the case of alien immigrants. The Lynn merchant class, with its wide range of trading contacts, was willing to accept these strangers into its midst. In the early fourteenth century and before, a large element of Lynn's upper class was composed of men who could trace their origins outside of England. The father of the first mayor of Lynn, Sunolf de Ley, had settled there by 1165, and was evidently a wealthy man; his son was exporting to Norway in 1200.[116] The families of Almannia and Thurendine (Trondheim) also reflect the importance of the northern trade to Lynn. Richard de Almannia traded with Norway and Estland in 1284; John de Almannia (chamberlain 1296/7) was also a merchant, whose goods were assessed in the local tax of 1298 at £40 - the average assessment being £11. John and Peter de Thurendine were both merchants, the latter trading with Trondheim and Bergen in 1308, and both mayors. Their local tax assessments in 1299 were, respectively, £120 and £300 - making Peter one of the two wealthiest men in Lynn. Whether the family's contact with Lynn began as mercantile agents for one of the Norwegian nobles or ecclesiastics who exported to England annually must remain speculation.[117] John de St. Omer and his son Lambert, also mayors of Lynn, were on a par with the Almannias rather than the Thurendines in terms of wealth. They exported wool (1273), had dealings with the Count of Holland, and maintained their ties with St. Omer, which was one of the earliest Flemish industrial centres, its merchants heavily involved in the early English cloth and wool trade.[118] Lynn's southerly contacts are indicated by the family of John de Hispania, merchant and several times mayor in the late thirteenth century, although members of that family are found in Lynn from mid-century.[119]

The attitude towards aliens in Lynn became less open-minded as time went on, despite the fact that in the fifteenth century apprentices were frequently sent overseas to serve for a few years as factors of their Lynn masters, and the German Hanse set up quarters in Lynn, whilst a colony of Lynn merchants had been established in the Baltic in the late fourteenth century. Some, like Margery Kempe's son, settled abroad where, as factors, they had established business and social ties.[120] The only case, in this period, of an alien attaining office in Lynn is that of James Nicholasson. A maker of patens (wooden shoes), he was heavily involved in exporting wool and importing paten materials and haberdashery even before he entered the franchise in 1395. In his trading ventures he showed a marked preference for associating with men of the Low Countries rather than those of Lynn. His economic prominence in the community may have influenced his selection in October 1411 to attend the upcoming parliament, but he was replaced a few days later, apparently because of complaints that his father had been an alien. In September 1412 he obtained testimonial letters from the mayor, stating that he was of good character and reputation and had been born in Lynn of an English mother. This was evidently insufficient, for in June 1413 James did homage to the king and obtained a grant of denization; even this did not prevent a mob attack on his property at Lynn in November. A later member of the family, mayor John Nicholasson, found that the past was not easily escaped when the insult "Fleming's-brid" was flung in his face (1459).[\[121\]](#)

The same wariness of aliens at this period is seen in our other towns. Aliens in Maldon were subject to a strict curfew, forbidden to carry weapons, and obliged to take a special oath of obedience to the bailiffs. Giles Morvyle tailor became a freeman there in 1449, on which occasion he took oath that he was a denizen, born on Guernsey. It was subsequently rumoured (1457) that he was a Spaniard or a Breton; after two years of trying to disprove this, and compounding his error by seeking the support of external lords, he admitted to being a Fleming. He won back the grace of the community only by giving it his house (which was released to him) and re-entering the franchise as an alien; he was later allowed to hold minor office in the administration.[\[122\]](#) In Ipswich it was ordained in 1435 that no burgess who was alien-born should be admitted into the assembly, and in 1483 it was prohibited for any outsider to become a burgess.[\[123\]](#) On the other hand, foreign birth was not necessarily a bar to advancement. James Nicholasson went on to become councillor (1418-20), and a later Lynn man, vintner John Basse, did not find that fact that his father was born in Brabant a hindrance to his becoming chamberlain. John Swolle's father was born in Utrecht, but John acquired letters of denization in 1437 and became bailiff of Yarmouth eleven years later, continuing to hold property in Holland, Zeeland, and Flanders, as well as in Yarmouth. John Asger was a merchant of Bruges, and was in fact in that city at the time he was elected mayor of Norwich in 1426.[\[124\]](#) It seems that economic status was more important than social background in determining political prospects.

The same conclusion is suggested by other migration evidence. Since Lynn is the town for which there is the best occupational evidence, we shall use it as the main example. Of the 473 Lynn men studied, something is known of the origins of 157: 9 emigrated from locations outside of Norfolk, 23 from locations within Norfolk, and 125 were born in the borough.[\[125\]](#) Occupational analysis of these groups reveals that:

- of the natives, 65% were merchants, 9% artisans/merchants, 7% artisans, 5% professionals, 10% unknown;
- of local immigrants, 74% were merchants, 13% artisans/merchants, 9% artisans, 4% professionals;
- all the distant immigrants were merchants.

The natives' proportions are very close to the occupational ratio amongst the office-holders as a whole, but a greater proportion of immigrants were merchants, suggesting that immigration played a more important role than local dynasties in maintaining the size of the merchant class. 36 of the 157 attained the mayoralty and it seems that natives and local immigrants stood about an equal chance at this, but distant immigrants a much better chance.[\[126\]](#)

Although a nine-man group is too small to be the basis for confident conclusions, we may reasonably suspect that immigrants from distant locations were well-established financially by the time they arrived and already had interests in the town, which was the principal port through which was routed merchandise from, or bound for, not only Norfolk but also the West Midlands.[127] Henry Bermyngham alone of the nine does not fit this mould for, coming from Birmingham perhaps of an artisan family if we may judge from his alias Spurrier, he was apprenticed in Lynn as a merchant.[128] Yet even he was of Midlands origin. John Burghard entered Lynn's franchise in 1305 as "of Stoke", and this was probably Stoke-on-Trent, for his will mentions poor relations in Stoke and Burton. When the realm's great wool-merchants were summoned to advise the king in 1322, John was one of the four qualified men sent from Lynn.[129] William Pilton, who entered the franchise in 1440, evidently came from Northamptonshire, where perhaps known by his alias of William Reynolds. At his death he held land in several villis in the neighbourhood of Pilton, where his brother seems to have been living still. Conceivably, the William Pilton who was exporting wool from Ipswich in 1411 may have been his father.[130] When he became a freeman in 1445, William Lewes was described as "of Oakham", but even earlier (1440) he had become indebted to Lynn's Merchant Guild in the sum of £40. A merchant of the Calais staple by 1450, he maintained business relations with Rutland artisans up to his death.[131] Lewes' stature is indicated by the fact that he entered the ranks of the jurats only 8 months after entering the franchise. This unorthodox procedure is also seen in the cases of two men not included in our group of distant immigrants, yet who perhaps ought to be there. John Style was made jurat on the same day that he became a freeman in 1439 (a move which provoked some public criticism). Only two years later he was exporting large quantities of wine and cloth; there is some indication he may have been apprenticed in London and pursuing a career there in the 1430s, returning to Lynn perhaps as the heir of William Style who died c.1438.[132] The case of John Waryn is similar. He too was elected jurat on the day he entered the franchise (1427) and does not appear in Lynn records before this time, although a merchant family of the surname was in Lynn tempore Richard II and Henry IV. However, a John Waryn of London was warden of the English merchants' colony in Middelburgh 1421-23.[133] One member of our nine distant immigrants, Richard Selwode (about whom little is known), was identified as "grocer of London" when he became a freeman at Lynn in 1453.[134]

Those remaining from that group came from counties adjacent to Norfolk. John de Fyncham was from Lavenham, Suffolk, and was evidently no mean personage before he came to Lynn in 1349, since he was serving the king as purveyor of victuals in 1341 and as collector of the Norfolk wool-loan and lay subsidy of 1347.[135] John Bryghtzeve, who became a freeman in 1406 under the alias of John Bury, was quite possibly the merchant of the former name operating through Ipswich 1386-1402, conceivably coming from Bury St. Edmund's.[136] The career of William Caus began in the customs service at Yarmouth in 1443 and continued, soon after, at Lynn. He established a residence there and became a freeman in 1451; he may have been the William Caus of Wisbech involved in a large financial transaction in 1440.[137] Finally, John Bocher, who entered the franchise in 1429 as "merchant" and had already been shipping woolpells from Lynn to Holland in 1423-24, when a resident (at different times) of Godmanchester, Huntingdon, and St. Ives.[138]

This type of immigrant may be found in our other towns. From Ipswich: Richard Felawe, originally a merchant of Harwich, where he retained interests despite his move (c.1445) to

Ipswich where he almost immediately entered the ranks of the portmen; and John Parker, whose father was an Essex land-owner.[139] From Colchester: Ralph Algar, formerly a merchant of London who traded with Colchester men; Walter Bonefey, a Cambridgeshire cloth merchant trading in Colchester before he moved there; and brothers Thomas and John Godestone, each with landed wealth before they came to Colchester, the one in Surrey, the other in Essex - John also being a mercer of London, importing and exporting via Ipswich. [140] These are but a few of the examples which could be given. Also far too numerous to mention are the men from our towns who had close contacts with London: some moved from there to be closer to the ports through which their merchandise passed; more moved to London to try their luck in the game with the highest stakes; some simply had trade or family connections there; others acquired property or spouses there, occasionally holding citizenships in both London and their East Anglian town. London interests were particularly strong at Yarmouth, due to the herring fishery; on at least one occasion these interests intruded too far into local politics.[141] Merchant Hugh Fastolf was one of the most prominent Yarmouth rulers (10 times bailiff and 6 times M.P. 1354-77) and a man rich both in goods and lands. But his connections with London fishmongers, his interests at court, and his marriage to the widow of a London grocer prompted him to move to London (c.1379), where he became an alderman in 1381 and sheriff 1387.[142]

Movement to London was just one step in a migration pattern that generally followed a promotional route: beginning in villages, progressing to smaller towns and market centres, then to the larger towns, and finally on to London. This process took place over several generations, of course, but the movement was steady. McKinley has suggested that most Norfolk families changed their residence at least once in the later Middle Ages.[143] Richard Goodwyn was born at Sedgeford, moved as a child to Litcham, and then was apprenticed in Lynn where he became mayor in 1486; a relative lived in London. William de Lindesey's father, John, moved from Sutton Mareys (Lindsey) to Lynn circa the mid-thirteenth century, while John's brother took another family branch to Wisbech. William married his daughter to a Norwich man.[144] The son of William Bury of Ipswich moved to Colchester, although he retained burgess rights at Ipswich; Thomas Cowman of Ipswich, on the other hand, was the son of a Colchester man (whose family roots may have lain in Ipswich) and moved to Ipswich for apprenticeship.[145] William atte Fen of Ipswich married his daughter to Richard Purdaunce of Norwich, subsequently mayor there (1420), whilst William atte Fen of Yarmouth married the daughter of Robert Toppes of Norwich (mayor 1435) and himself moved to Norwich. Thomas Fraunceys of Colchester married his daughter to Robert Brasier of Norwich (mayor 1410) whose son Thomas adopted his maternal surname and returned to Colchester to claim his inheritance.[146] This constant mobility meant that families of the urban ruling classes had little time to consolidate their hold on government. It also provided constant openings in their ranks to be filled by newcomers or townsmen working their way up.

Some historians have suggested that gaps in the ruling class were filled primarily by migrants, and rarely by self-made men; the rags-to-riches theory, first seen in Pirenne's Godric de Finchale, would not find many proponents today.[147] Although it is probably true that the political influence of immigrants was proportional to their wealth, and that the sons of leading townsmen possessed advantages over other residents when it came to advancement,[148] we do not have to search hard for examples of men who worked their way up. Although Norwich's custumal prohibited serfs from becoming freemen, it may be doubted that a thorough enquiry was made of the background of each applicant. In 1347 the Bishop of Ely claimed that Richard Spynk, possibly the richest man - certainly the one with the most business acumen - in Norwich, was his villein, a fugitive from Doddington. Spynk laid out a great deal of money to thwart the claim. In 1353 Lynn merchant and jurat Laurence de Reppes negotiated a release from all claim that a Roughton man had on him or his issue as villeins. We cannot be certain that Spynk or Reppes were ever villeins, of course, but evidently there was nothing incredible in the idea of a runaway villein becoming a prominent townsman.[149] Laurence, who perhaps came from South Repps near Roughton, began his career as a tanner. John Lomb of Lynn was a butcher in 1333 but between 1348 and 1367 traded in large quantities of victuals, wine, cloth, and other goods; in the same period he was jurat several times. The similar cases of Laurence de Fordham, Richard Cosyn and others were reviewed earlier in this chapter. We may add to them John Ashenden, a brewer of the inferiores class in Lynn, who rose to the mayoralty.[150] In Ipswich Thomas dil Stonhous stands out as an example of a self-made man. His employer bequeathed him a tavern in 1320 (although he had held his own shop since 1307), after which he adopted his master's surname of le Coteler and went on to acquire large holdings - largely commercial - nearby, in St. Laurence and St. Mary Tower parishes, as well as properties elsewhere in town. He also acquired a ship and mercantile interests.[151] We may also note that the Halteby and Starling families had been established at Ipswich for several generations before they produced members of sufficient prominence to hold borough office. We have already noted that the marriage of John Kempe junior to Margery Brunham helped his career in Lynn. The same is true there of John Reed, and in Maldon of John Dale, Thomas Fuller, and Richard Galyot; all these men married into the ruling class.[152]

🔍 previous

next 🔍

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders
Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration
Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics
CONCLUSION

History of medieval York

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth

THE PRE-CONQUEST BOROUGH AND EFFECTS OF THE CONQUEST

Development of local government | Power struggles with rivals

Buildings and fortifications | Economy | Information sources

Map of York at the close of the Middle Ages

The pre-Conquest borough and effects of the Conquest

York of the tenth and early eleventh centuries appears to have been the second city of the kingdom – after London, which far outstripped all other English cities – in terms of its prosperity and population size, which has been estimated at between 8,000-9,000.

For administrative purposes the city was divided into seven "shires", best understood as wards, of which six were under the king and the seventh under the archbishop. This administration may have been associated with the "lawmen" (boroughs of the Danelaw typically having 12) who are mentioned and are thought to have been a hereditary "class" responsible for administering justice and collecting associated revenues. The opinion of such men would likely have been sought and borne weight in the communal assembly that met periodically to address issues of common concern. The archbishop's ward was essentially the area covered by the cathedral and monastic precinct, along with 189 properties occupied by laymen in that area. The archbishop also had a one-third right in a second ward, which included Layerthorpe and part of the old Anglo-Saxon settlement around the Foss. Another of the wards was called "Marketshire" and encompassed the streets known as the Shambles and the Pavement, both the sites of markets.

The Conquest had a dramatic effect on the city – perhaps no other suffered so badly from the consequences. William I's initial goal after defeating Harold was to consolidate his hold on the south. This gave the north a breathing-space in which to organize resistance; from 1068 to 1070 William faced repeated rebellions there. In response to an uprising in York in 1068, William pursued his general policy of building a castle there, garrisoned with 500 of his supporters. Despite this there was a second uprising in the city, in the following year; the castle was besieged and one of its commanders was among members of the garrison to be killed. William hurried north to relieve his forces, defeated the rebels, and punished the city by tearing down the homes of rebels; he built a second castle.

After William's departure the remaining rebel forces again attacked the castles, unsuccessfully. An alliance of Danes and English resulted in a further assault on the city later in the year, in response to which the Norman garrisons fired houses near the castles (to prevent their use by the rebels); the fire spread throughout the city, destroyed houses as well as the Minster and the large library associated with its school. The rebels nonetheless were able to capture city and castles, tearing down the latter. William again hastened north, re-entered York without opposition, began rebuilding the castles, and proceeded to break the spirit of northern resistance by a scorched earth policy.

These devastating events left York with a much reduced population: of the 1,600 residences recorded by Domesday as having existed before the Conquest, 540 had been abandoned or destroyed by 1086 and 400 others were impoverished. Only four of the lawmen were still in evidence. The damming of the Foss to create a water barrier defending the east side of one of the castles may well have had a damaging effect on the fortunes of the Fishergate community. When the first Norman archbishop of York came to the city in 1072, he found the Minster little more than a charred shell and only three of its monks had stayed in the city. Despite all this the king was demanding a higher payment of the traditional dues than his predecessor had.

It took time for the city to recover. A revival of trade and population was likely assisted by William Rufus and other Norman lords whose patronage enabled the foundation or growth of St. Mary's Abbey, Holy Trinity Priory and St. Leonard's Hospital, all of which provided clients for local or imported goods. Rebuilding of the Minster began in the last decade of the eleventh century, and the religious community was reorganized as a secular (rather than monastic) canonical chapter; this work continued throughout the twelfth century in the Norman style, together with the building of an episcopal palace. Then in the thirteenth century, through to the end of the Middle Ages, the cathedral was extensively rebuilt on a larger scale, at first in Gothic style and later Perpendicular. This almost continuous effort created employment within the city.

A further reflection of the gradual recovery is seen in a charter of liberties granted by Henry II to the city (itself referring back to earlier grants, of similar character, by Henry I), giving or confirming commercial and urban privileges along with exemptions from tolls elsewhere in England; a charter of Henry I granting liberties to Beverley models those liberties after York's and reveals that a merchant gild had been created to direct some of York's affairs. Richard I expanded the exemption to everywhere within his empire.

Other stimuli to the restoration of prosperity included the establishment of a Jewish community in York by 1130s; this provided moneylending services, in which Christians were forbidden to be active. It, however, came to much the same bad end as in other English towns. Crusade-fever and resentment on the part of debtors led to persecution of Jews after the accession of Richard I, when rioting prompted the Jewish community to take refuge in the castle and to refuse to allow entry even to the sheriff. He in turn ordered crusaders, assembled in York to prepare for departure to the Holy Land, to assault the castle. Most of the Jews died as a result. Although a new Jewish community grew up, it was not one of great size and there was no Jewish quarter in the city. Renewed anti-semitism in mid-century, followed by heavy taxation by the king, contributed to the community's impoverishment before the expulsion of all Jews from England in 1290.

previous

main menu

next

History of medieval York

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth

The pre-Conquest borough and effects of the Conquest

DEVELOPMENT OF LOCAL GOVERNMENT | Power struggles with rivals

Buildings and fortifications | Economy | Information sources

Map of York at the close of the Middle Ages

Development of local government

Henry I's charter did not delegate any local powers of self-government. Communal interests were probably represented by the merchant guild, whose alderman is mentioned in 1130 in a context showing he owed his authority to the king; curiously the alderman's name, Thomas son of Ulviet may indicate a connection with one of the last lawmen, Ulvet son of Forne (mentioned 1106), hinting at some continuity in local leadership. Nor was Henry II the type of king to go beyond the scope of his grandfather's grants, if he did not need to. Perhaps frustration with this state of affairs, in a period when London had shown itself prepared to assert its political ambitions forcefully, partly explains York's preparedness to support the rebellion of Henry's son in 1173/74 and to establish an independent commune. However, that initiative may have been taken by a clique, rather than supported by the citizenry in general, since it was individuals who were fined by the royal justices for their part in the rebellion and setting up the commune. One of those individuals was Thomas de Ultra Usam, and it has been argued he may have been the same as Thomas son of Ulviet, despite the length of time intervening. Another of the rebels is believed to have lived in a stone house that later became the city's first guildhall.

We hear of city reeves ca.1200, but these were probably acting as deputies to the sheriff, who had control over collection of the revenues for payment of the city farm until 1212, when the city acquired control for itself. There is reference very shortly afterwards to the city having a mayor. He was, or came to be, assisted by three bailiffs – together they presided over the city court, meeting in a civic building on the Ouse Bridge – and by the end of the century by chamberlains responsible for administering city finances. The bailiffs collected the revenues that went to pay the fee farm and enforced market regulations, including the assizes of bread and ale. They nominated their own successors, although mayor and community had the power to veto the nominations. At the time when we first hear of chamberlains, the city revenues that had to go towards paying the fee farm were tolls and customs on commercial goods, fines imposed by the courts, the traditional husgable (house-rents), and rents from butchers stalls. Other city officers included: three coroners, each responsible for a section of the city; bridgemasters who collected tolls and later rents and were responsible for upkeep of the bridges; and keepers of the city gates; as well of course as a town clerk. Unfortunately, loss of most of the civic records prior to the reign of Richard II makes it difficult to trace or characterize the early development of York's local government.

The threat from Scotland, at the beginning of the thirteenth century only sporadic, increased during the course of that century, and became serious enough to discourage merchants from coming to the city. Income from customs and tolls consequently fell, leading the authorities to raise the level of tolls, which in turn produced complaints from traders who had to pay them. The city also began to expand the amount of property it owned, to increase income from rents; although there were several hundred properties subject to husgable, at a fixed level of, in most cases, a penny or twopence a time the total income was not great. Local taxation had to be resorted to in times of particular financial need or shortfall. This produced complaints of excessive or unbalanced assessments in 1276 – the same type of complaint was being heard in many towns at this period.

It was the need to mount a campaign against the Scots that prompted the king, in 1298, to summon a parliament at York and to order his Exchequer, Chancery, and courts of justice to transfer there from Westminster. For almost seven years the royal government remained, during which period the city was not only the capital of ecclesiastical administration in the north and the seat of the government of Yorkshire, but also the effective capital of England. The castle was the principal seat of the relocated government, although space was also commandeered in the archbishop's palace and the Franciscan friary. The city became the focus for a war administration and gathering point for armies against the Scots. The move was not entirely popular with the bureaucrats of the royal administration, who were subjected to profiteering by local merchants and tradesmen and who probably found the city smelly and somewhat parochial after London. Even after things quietened a little and the king's government returned south, the Scottish threat continued to bring Edward II to York periodically. York was again a base for royal government during Edward III's campaigns of the 1330s; but after his attention refocused on France, the defence of the north was left to the powers of that region.

Despite York's importance as a command base for the Scottish wars, the citizens did not use this to their advantage to win greater self-government from the king; on the contrary, to some extent it exposed the city to greater royal interference in local administration. For most of the century the powers of the city authorities did not increase significantly, although a royal charter of 1312 granted the citizens exemption from jury service outside of York, and officially sanctioned the principle that all who wished to enjoy the privileges of citizenship had to contribute to the common financial burdens (e.g. royal taxations).

The growing importance of the mayoralty is seen in the creation, before 1365, of the office of a sergeant to carry the mayor's mace of office, while a second was created in 1388 to bear a ceremonial sword which Richard II had allowed to the mayor. The city customal (apparently compiled in this period) specified that mayors were to be chosen by representatives of the community, from a small selection of aldermen nominated by the outgoing mayor. An attempt to impose controls on the mayor is seen in reforms of 1372 prohibiting re-election to the office until a period of eight years had passed, and forbidding the mayor to be given any financial reward beyond his annual salary; these were ineffective, although a further reform in 1392 again targeted the growing mayoral salary and insisted that no-one be re-elected to the mayoralty until all the aldermen who had not yet been mayor had served.

The first round of reforms came in the context of a power-struggle between factions led by John Langton and John Gisburne. The former, who had been mayor every year between 1350 and 1363 had blocked the latter's nomination as bailiff in 1357. Following Langton's monopolisation of the mayoralty, there seems to have been an attempt to restore what was perceived (by some at least) as tradition: that the mayoralty should change hands every year. In 1371 the two men were in direct and heated competition for the mayoralty – so much so that the king had to intervene to prohibit debates and unlawful assemblies and to forbid either man from becoming mayor. Despite that, Gisburne was chosen as mayor, and re-elected in 1372.

Gisburne was again elected to the mayoralty in 1380, but scandals during his term of office led to dissatisfaction that culminated in a riot, and he had to flee the city. His opponents forced Simon Quixley to accept the mayoralty and compelled the city council to swear obedience to their candidate; they had it proclaimed that, should need arise, the community would be summoned to defend this government by the ringing of the bell on the Ouse Bridge. Again, the king was obliged to intervene to restore Gisburne to office and punish the rioters. When Quixley was elected mayor by legitimate methods the following year, he proceeded to arrest or fine Gisburne supporters. In an environment complicated by the arrival of news of the rebellious peasant's assault on London, prompting further popular disturbances in York, Gisburne's followers launched an attack from outside the city on Bootham Bar, and succeeded in winning entrance; they formed a sworn association and wore a common livery. St. Leonard's and the Dominican and Franciscan friaries were subject to attacks during these proceedings, though whether this was part of the factionalism or the northern mirroring of the southern revolt is not clear. Once more the king took a hand, obliging both sides to keep the peace and forcing the city to pay a large fine for a pardon.

The reforms of 1372 thus may not have been inspired by democratic sentiment so much as by rivalries within the ruling class, aimed at preventing any faction from becoming predominant. These rivalries were subsequently complicated by an assertion of community control over its governors. The intentions of the royal government, which thought in terms of top-down power, were otherwise, however. In 1393, a new royal charter gave the mayor and aldermen the powers of justices of the peace, and the city courts allowed to entertain the petty assizes. This was a prelude to the important grant, three years later, of county status for York: two sheriffs replaced the bailiffs, and the mayor and sheriffs were empowered to hear a wide range of cases in court. By this time we are seeing tinkering with the electoral procedures and disputes over elections.

The county included not merely the city, but some surrounding lands – notably an area called the Ainsty, where the city sheriffs administered justice independently from the main city courts. The latter included a general court of pleas, administered by the bailiffs and later the sheriffs, which sat on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays; a court of common pleas, whose sessions each Monday were presided over by mayor and bailiffs; and a special court for acknowledgements of debts incurred, made before the mayor. The city was still, by late fourteenth century, divided into six wards, each of which had its own wardmote court hearing minor complaints; ward constables, later referred to as sergeants, were responsible for collecting certain revenues and for assembling citizens for defence of the city.

City government was still based in buildings on the Ouse Bridge, but for functions requiring more space, in its Guildhall further west along the river. The latter was used for meetings of the full city council. A council appears to have existed throughout the fourteenth century (if not before) although only took formal shape with the constitutional changes at the end of that century. By that time we can see an innermost council of 12 aldermen which was constantly advising the mayor, backed up by a larger group of 24 probi homines ("reputable men"). In the fifteenth century the community was being represented by a further council of 48, although this was consulted only on major issues, sometimes augmented by prominent gildsmen (such as the searchers of the gilds).

York continued to be caught up in national conflicts, with adverse effects at a time when its economy was already struggling. It followed Archbishop Scrope into the northern rebellion in 1405. After quashing this, Henry IV threatened to raze the city if it offered further resistance, imposed a hefty fine on the citizens, and placed its government under royal wardens until the following year. During the early phase of the Wars of the Roses, York is seen giving gifts to a large number of lords, to curry favour (or at least avoid disfavour). The power-struggle between the parties on the national scene encouraged local factionalism in the city. This was reflected in frequent breaches of the peace, and in the form of armed confrontations between individuals or groups. Even the annual elections were often subject to violent disagreements.

After the victory of Edward IV, Richard of Gloucester came to be influential in the city, it being Edward's policy to make Richard the most powerful lord in the north. While the city and Richard did not see eye-to-eye on all matters, overall he succeeded in winning the loyalty of the city, which provided him with a contingent when he moved to defend his Protectorship (1483) and ended up seizing the throne. Shortly afterwards he returned to York for a lavish celebration, which included the investiture of his son as Prince of Wales.

Grateful for the city's support, he lent a sympathetic ear to the city's plea of financial hardship – particularly as it affected the ability to supply troops for royal needs – and its argument that a reduction in its fiscal obligations to the throne, in the form of an abolition of tolls, would allow it to re-energize the local economy; he reduced the amount of tolls the city was expected to collect each year, as part of its fee farm. The desire for a reduced fee farm was, however, probably also connected to a growing deficit that the city was carrying over from one year to the next in its annual budgets. Unfortunately, the Exchequer's refusal to acknowledge the reduction left York in the awkward position of still being subject to the full demand, yet having ceased to collect the tolls that contributed towards that amount.

The city expressed in its official records a deep regret when Richard III was defeated and killed at Bosworth. Although the city submitted to Henry VII, it was not without asserting its claim to the privileges enjoyed in the time of Richard, and the city was still prepared to oppose the king's nominations for the office of city recorder (legal adviser), asserting its right to choose its own officers – in this case from men known as former supporters of the Yorkist cause. However, to be fair, outside interference in local elections – from whatever source – had always been resisted by the city authorities.

previous

main menu

next

History of medieval York

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth

The pre-Conquest borough and effects of the Conquest

Development of local government | POWER STRUGGLES WITH RIVALS

Buildings and fortifications | Economy | Information sources

Map of York at the close of the Middle Ages

Power struggles with rivals

There were a number of independent franchises within York's boundaries. The most obvious was the archbishop's "shire", within which his officers had the power of judicial administration over minor offences occurring on lands owned by the cathedral – a court being held at one of the Minster gates – and to the revenues therefrom, as well as from hushable rents and other customary dues owed by tenants of cathedral lands. The archbishop also had the "third penny" of revenues from a second ward of the city, which included the tolls collected on the Foss Bridge. By the mid-twelfth century, the cathedral had its own fair, which provided competition with the city markets, if only temporarily.

The castles too were areas within the city yet outside its sway; there were occasional disputes between city and sheriff regarding legal jurisdiction, although they were relatively minor. By contrast, a more important case involving rival jurisdictions took place in 1390-91, when wealthy citizen Thomas de Howom successfully sued a fishmonger in the city court for a debt of £8; when the fishmonger delayed in repaying, an impatient Howom took matters into his own hands, seizing a ship anchored in the Ouse belonging to the debtor. The fishmonger then appealed to the court of the admiral of the north who, on the grounds that the ship was on a tidal water when seized, reversed the city court's decision, despite the creditor's argument that the ship was moored and that the case therefore was within the jurisdiction of the city court. The admiralty court was already unpopular and its decision in the Howom case only gave more ammunition to its detractors. The king had to intervene to stop the admiral prosecuting Howom, and the affair led to the introduction in parliament of statutes that led to restrictions on the authority of the admiralty court.

Other franchises included St. Mary's Abbey, St. Leonard's Hospital, and Holy Trinity Priory. Lay tenants living on property owned by such institutions were independent of the jurisdiction of borough authorities, who could not intrude upon the areas covered by the franchises.

Inevitably there resulted disputes over the precise scope of jurisdiction of the various ecclesiastical authorities, not least with regard to whether tenants of the franchises were to be treated as residents or outsiders in the case of toll-collection or local taxation. The townspeople felt aggrieved that residents of the franchises could benefit from the economic and defensive advantages of the city without contributing to the costs involved in maintaining those advantages. This resentment led to a series of assaults by some citizens on the priory, beginning in 1258. St. Mary's was subject to similar treatment between 1264-68, following a dispute between the abbey and city over whether abbey tenants should be subject to tolls; in the course of rioting, some of the abbey tenants were killed and houses ransacked and burned down. The archbishop intervened to put the city under an interdict, but it was left to the county sheriff to mediate a restoration of peace; the abbey then erected a stone wall around its precinct. It may have been no coincidence that city authorities were themselves, at this period, engaged in an active programme of rebuilding the city walls, an assertive expression of jurisdiction.

By 1275 relations had so deteriorated that the archbishop and the abbot brought complaints before parliament. A royal commission was appointed; its investigations upheld the rights of abbey and cathedral, including the status of the Bootham suburb (beyond the northwest corner of the city) as a separate and abbey-affiliated borough in which the city authorities had no jurisdiction. The citizens were not prepared to let matters rest here. A fresh round of discords in the early fourteenth century led to an armed band breaking into the archbishop's property at the Old Baile – which was also subject to dispute between the city authorities and the archbishop over who was responsible for the maintenance and defence of the section of city wall there. The jurisdiction of the archbishop's courts over the cathedral franchise was another source of contention at this time.

During the reign of Edward II, the city authorities tried to assert jurisdiction in Bootham, by levying taxes and holding assizes of bread and ale there. Although Edward III reaffirmed the abbey's liberties, the citizens were not to be discouraged: they blockaded the Ouse to prevent food supplies getting as far upriver as the landing used by the abbey, and issued threats against the lives of abbot and monks, who eventually were forced to flee when there was an armed siege of the abbey grounds. By a settlement of 1354, most of Bootham was restored to the jurisdiction of the city, which used the argument – often convincing to kings – that it had difficulty paying its fee farm without the revenues that came from Bootham.

Hostility between the city and the abbey continued to express itself on one issue or another. In 1377 there was a dispute over a right-of-way from the Ouse to Bootham via a road on the west side of St. Mary's; the abbey had blocked the road with a ditch, but was forced to fill it in. In the first half of the fifteenth century, one bone of contention was freedom of passage along the Ouse. In the second half we still see violent confrontations between citizens and residents of the abbey liberty.

A similar type of dispute with St. Leonard's erupted in 1401, when the brethren had a ditch dug around a piece of land considered by the citizens as common pasturage, and a gate erected there. The mayor sent twenty men to pull down the gate and fill in the ditch, which led the hospital to complain to higher authorities. We do not know the outcome. It appears, however, that St. Leonard's was resented as much as St. Mary's, for during the disturbances of 1380, the hospital had to obtain a special protection.

previous

main menu

next

History of medieval York

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth

The pre-Conquest borough and effects of the Conquest
Development of local government | Power struggles with rivals
BUILDINGS AND FORTIFICATIONS | Economy | Information sources
Map of York at the close of the Middle Ages

Buildings and fortifications

The loss of most of the early records of the city has been compensated for somewhat by the survival of a built fabric in which there are an unusually high number of medieval elements, together with a strong archaeological programme in recent decades which in particular has thrown important new light on pre-Conquest York. The cathedral and castle keep were doubtless the most prominent features on the city skyline, along with the towers of the medieval parish churches, of which there were about forty, while the abbey, priories, hospitals, and friaries must also have been among the more prominent buildings of the city.

The late medieval version of the cathedral was rebuilt on a scale intended to rival Canterbury's and in a more modern style than the Norman predecessor. The building programme began with the south transept and north transept in the 1220s, continuing with the chapter house in the third quarter of the century, followed by the nave; rebuilding of the eastern end of the cathedral, in Perpendicular style, was next, then the choir received attention, and finally in the fifteenth century the massive central tower was erected (replacing an earlier tower that collapsed in 1407).

A number of lesser buildings have also survived from the late medieval period – both ecclesiastical structures, such as a college of chantry priests built within the cathedral precinct and ruins of St. Mary's abbey, and lay structures. The latter include three guildhalls

– one now associated with the Merchant Adventurers (although not built by them) and another which came to be used by the city government (surviving only as a reconstruction of the medieval original) – and a number of houses in Stonegate and the Shambles, both of which still have a slight flavour of medieval streets. One house lying just off Stonegate is now in process of restoration and refurnishing to represent the residence of a late fifteenth century merchant and city leader.

However, other than the cathedral, it is the medieval defences for which York is best known today, for a large portion of the walls and their gates and towers has survived the centuries. Archaeological investigation of the city walls has revealed successive layers of defensive works: the Roman stone wall having been covered over by the Danish earthworks, which in turn were heightened by the Normans (perhaps at the time when the castles were built), before being further bolstered in the thirteenth century to support the medieval stone walls.

References have already been made to York's involvement in various of the military conflicts of the Middle Ages. After recovering from the disastrous outcome of its resistance to the Conqueror and later to Henry II, York was caught up in the struggle between John and his barons. The king gave York timber from the royal forests to strengthen its defences; although when the barons attacked it was a bribe rather than the fortifications that protected the city. By this time there were already gateways, called "bars", controlling access through the ditch/bank in each of the four quarters of the city. Grants of temporary reductions in the fee farm and in royal tallages followed in the 1220s, so that the money freed up could be put towards bolstering the defences.

The castle itself was rebuilt in stone during the reign of Henry III, and the same period saw most of the city walls built. Although York remained largely aloof from the next round of baronial wars in the 1260s, the threat from the Scots was becoming more serious and encouraged sincere efforts to maintain the defences. When in 1319 a Scottish army defeated an army raised by the Archbishop and Chancellor (York losing its mayor and many citizens among the dead) and posed a direct threat to York, the king had to abandon his siege of Berwick to protect the city. He then ordered further strengthening of the walls.

Regular grants of murage for the purpose began in 1251, continuing with few breaks up into the fifteenth century. Except for in the Walmgate area (east of the Foss), the walls were completed by the end of the thirteenth century; the Walmgate ditch/bank does not appear to have received walls until about 1345. At each point where the walls reached the river, a tower with a postern gate was built.

Maintenance of the defences continued to be a small but constant drain on city finances. In the fifteenth century, masons were appointed to work for the city in taking responsibility for keeping the walls in good repair. From 1449, York was allowed to assess murage at will, although not all of the revenues collected went towards the intended purpose.

In 1392 the king authorized the city authorities to acquire lands worth £100 annually to support upkeep of the bridges. The city already held property of about this value – listed in a rental of 1376 – of which the single largest source of income came from rents from stalls on the Foss Bridge; a large number of houses on or beside the bridge were also held by the city, and there were numerous shops and other buildings on and around the Ouse Bridge too providing revenue for the city. The remainder of the properties from which rents were due the city were spread across the intra-mural area; a few more were outside the walls. They included buildings and open land – the latter for pasturing animals in some cases, and industrial uses in others. Space was being rented out in some city gates and in the cellar of the Common Hall; also rented were some of the towers that were part of the walls, as well as sections of the city ditch (possibly implying fishing rights there). While some of the city properties listed in 1376 may have been purchased by the authorities, many were doubtless obtained through bequests.

The Common Hall referred to was probably a building on or near the site of the present Guildhall reconstruction. It may have been the guildhall mentioned in Henry III's charter of 1256, and a gildgarth mentioned ca.1080 could perhaps have been the merchant gild's base. Much of the day-to-day administration of the city, however, was carried out from the Tollbooth and other buildings on the Ouse Bridge. There was a council chamber in the Ouse Bridge headquarters, but this was likely for regular meetings of the aldermen and (perhaps) the 24. Full meetings attracting larger attendance from the community and, later, the required attendance of the 48 representatives of the lower council would have required the larger space of the Common Hall, and partly explains the attention on rebuilding that hall in the fifteenth century.

previous

main menu

next

History of medieval York

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth

The pre-Conquest borough and effects of the Conquest
Development of local government | Power struggles with rivals
Buildings and fortifications | ECONOMY | Information sources
Map of York at the close of the Middle Ages

Economy

Archaeological evidence suggests that the coming of the Danes stimulated significant growth in the city and its economy. The Danes preferred to settle around centres where their armies had their headquarters. By early twelfth century settlement had spread across the other side of the Ouse, and ships from Germany and Ireland were visiting it, although growing problems with river navigation, the growth in size of ships, and the development of a harbour at Hull gradually made York less attractive to sea-going vessels.

From Roman times York was one of the north's main population centres. By the thirteenth century it was drawing immigrants from far afield in Yorkshire and from the Midlands, as well as a few from Scotland, France, Lombardy, and Flanders. The city was an important consumer market itself, as well as the major redistribution point for goods destined for the northern regions. During the twelfth and thirteenth centuries it was being visited by merchants from Italy, Germany, Flanders, and France, and there is also evidence of trade with Ireland and Scotland. The bulk of trade was probably directed at the Low Countries, however, with grain, hides, and wool prominent among exports. A community of fishmongers is early in evidence, while wine merchants are also seen in the twelfth century.

Most local marketplaces are assumed to have been in the section of the city referred to by Domesday as "marketshire". Two were specifically mentioned at that time: the butchers' market, and a general provisioning market in the Pavement (which was also the location for public proclamations and punishments – the pillory was located there). The Pavement's market was probably held on a Sunday, which appears to have been the main market day of the city until about 1322, when Sunday was prohibited for sale of most goods; the market day thereafter varied according to which market was being held. In the previous century we start hearing of the Thursday Market, which eventually became the principal market of the city. There were other specialized markets further afield, such as one for fish caught at sea, held on Foss Bridge, and the cattle market held on Toft Green (at least, by the fifteenth century). The city had annual fairs at Pentecost (late May/early June) and on 29 June, which were held outside the walls on the site of the horse market.

Perhaps even more than most towns, York showed great concern to keep its lifelines – roads and river – open to commerce. The maintenance of the bridge over the Ouse was the rationale for the citizens obtaining a grant of new revenues from the king in 1392 (lands in mortmain), while keeping the Ouse clear of obstacles – notably fish-garths – led to an expensive lawsuit against St. Mary's Abbey in the fifteenth century. Similarly, attempts by the lords of the honour of Knaresborough to impose tolls on river traffic at Boroughbridge met with resistance from York. York might be considered a port; for a brief period (1337, 1339) it was even one of the official collection points of the national wool custom. Its quayside stretched along both sides of the Ouse between the bridge and the Franciscan friary. However, it was too far upriver for most sea-going vessels. It was necessary to ship goods to some point downriver, such as Selby, and transfer them to larger ships that would continue on to the Humber. By the end of the thirteenth century, corn was being ferried from York to Hull, for transfer to ships bound for the Low Countries; from the 1340s, Hull was generally considered the port facilities for York's international trade.

The king's grant in 1163 to the weavers of York of the right to form a gild and to share with the weavers of other royal boroughs in Yorkshire a monopoly on the manufacture of dyed and striped cloth suggests the textile industry was important in the city at that period. York seems to have been one of the leading cloth-making towns in England in the late twelfth century. Yet, at the beginning of the next century, the weavers were having difficulty paying the £10 annual farm they paid to the king for their rights; assuming this was a genuine expression of financial hardship, it is perhaps attributable partly to competition from imported Flemish cloth. By mid-century the weavers gild was badly in arrears of its farm, and in the early fourteenth century was trying to persuade the king to release them from the farm altogether.

The wool trade gradually gained importance for the city during the thirteenth century, although much of it was in the hands of foreign merchants. At the same time, the various leather industries appear to have employed a greater number of local craftspeople; the skippers, glovers, saddlers and hosiers had all attempted – this time without royal authorization – to form gilds by 1180. During the thirteenth century, York's society appears to have been relatively egalitarian, in terms of wealth – there were very few residents who were noticeably more wealthy than their fellows as a result of extensive land-holding or participation in international commerce.

In the fourteenth century, York's economy was affected by the Scottish wars, which both jeopardized the peaceful conditions under which commerce best flourished, yet also brought profit to those citizens able to take advantage of opportunities for provisioning the York-based national government and the royal armies, while also providing employment for craftsmen who could help furnish the army with weapons or clothing, or help with the rebuilding of city defences. Provisions were being taken from York to Berwick, while in 1316/17 and 1322 York merchants were active in the Midlands and East Anglia buying supplies for the relocated royal court. However, much of the international commerce at York was in the hands of foreigners. Furthermore, the downside of the stimulation to trade was that – with the relocation of government bringing a wealthier clientele to York, prices rose, due in part to shortage of goods (as many were diverted to the army) and in part due to local tradesmen trying to take advantage of the situation. The king, probably in consultation with city authorities, issued a set of ordinances in 1301 to regulate York's trade: ensure that good quality foodstuffs were sold at fair prices, and combat illegal activities aimed at forcing prices up.

At York as in other English towns, the growing wool trade brought fortunes for a few. In the 1330s and '40s a group of England's leading wool-merchants were among the citizenry and the city remained an important source of wool exports throughout the century. The textile industry also revived and came to be helped, as the century wore on, by the growing numbers of Hanseatic merchants taking English cloth to northern markets. Consequently, the city attracted relatively high numbers of immigrants in this period, about one-sixth of them in occupations related to the cloth industry. The weavers' guild revived to the point where it was able to purchase royal confirmations of its ancient privileges in 1346 and 1377, and by the end of the century there were 51 master weavers operating in the city. The influx of immigrants in turn strengthened the revenue base of local government. But York's merchants were not reliant solely on the wool and cloth trades, even though it tended to be merchants active in the cloth trades who were most prominent among the political elite. They were also, for example, taking grain to London, wine to Carlisle, and importing iron from Spain, oil, figs, raisins and wine from Portugal, herring, timber, furs, iron and ashes from the Baltic and Iceland. In the last part of the century, when much of the country was experiencing an economic decline, York was probably at the peak of its medieval prosperity.

However, the seeds of reversal had already been sewn. The activity of Hanseatic merchants in York was not wholly welcome; although it stimulated the local economy, it also made it difficult for York's own merchants to capture or maintain a share in international trade. Whereas earlier kings had provided encouragement and incentives for foreign merchants to be active in England, from the late fourteenth century there was a trend towards protectionism, both at the national level (e.g. the imposition of special taxes on merchants of the Hanse) and at the local level. At York efforts were made to restrict the types of goods foreigners could deal in, or impose restrictions on those with whom foreigners could do business.

Retaliatory measures were ordered by the German authorities. After rivalry turned violent in 1385, leading the authorities in each country to seize the commercial goods of merchants of the rival country, the king appointed two ambassadors – one a York citizen, the other a Londoner – to present complaints and demands for compensation before the German authorities; the complainants were merchants from a number of cities involved in the northern trade, but York's merchants were the most numerous among this group (although Lynn's merchants were claiming a larger sum of money). The dispute was patched up with a treaty, but resentment, hostility, and ill-treatment of foreign merchants (with reprisals by the other side) grew. While diversification continued to be a feature of York's international commerce, the northern trade was becoming increasingly important to its merchants. Consequently, intensification of political troubles between England and the Hanse during the fifteenth century had adverse effects on York's economy, by creating obstacles to the North Sea and Baltic trade.

A second factor in economic decline in the fifteenth century was competition from cloth producers in rural areas of the West Riding. York's weavers used this as leverage to persuade the king to allow them, in 1400, to levy charges on country weavers as a contribution towards the annual farm the gild paid for its privileges. Rural competition took its toll particularly on the broadcloth industry (as well as on the leather trades); the city's producers of worsteds and small cloths managed to hold their own. Fulling was another part of the industry in which rural competition was strong. The city authorities tried protectionist measures, ordering that no citizen have cloth woven or fulled outside York, nor buy wool in or near York unless he planned to have it made into cloth in the city. By the close of the Middle Ages, York's weavers' gild was in sufficient difficulty that it was able to convince the king to reduce its farm by half.

Evidence is conflicting on quite how much impact the declining economy had. On the one hand, depopulation is evidenced by vacant or ruinous houses and dropping property values; on the other, the financing of church rebuilding in the fifteenth century argues for continued private prosperity. Doubtless the fortunes of some declined, while others continued to get by – perhaps in part shifting their financial strategy to invest in extra-urban land (ultimately leading some families out of the city to join the rural gentry). It was more likely the city government that were worst hit, as its traditional sources of revenue – such as rents and tolls – fell, while its expenditures continued to grow in the demanding political environment of the fifteenth century, as well as the growth of public ceremony, including the mounting of the pageants of the famous York Mystery Play. By the end of the Middle Ages, York had declined to the point that it was no longer one of the country's top ten towns.

previous

main menu

next

History of medieval York

[MAIN MENU]

Origins and early growth

The pre-Conquest borough and effects of the Conquest
Development of local government | Power struggles with rivals
Buildings and fortifications | Economy | INFORMATION SOURCES
Map of York at the close of the Middle Ages

Information sources

The following is a selection of published sources of information about medieval York.

Attreed, Lorraine. "Medieval Bureaucracy and York's Fee Farm during the Fifteenth Century." York Historian, vol.6 (1985), 24-31.

Attreed, Lorraine, ed. The York House Books 1461-1490. 2 vols. Stroud, 1991.

Dobson, R.B. The Jews of Medieval York and the Massacre of March 1190. Borthwick Papers, no.45 (1974).

Dobson, R.B., ed. York City Chamberlains' Account Rolls 1396-1500. Surtees Society, vol.192 (1978).

Jones, Sarah Rees, ed. The Government of Medieval York. Borthwick Studies in History, 3. York: University of York, 1997.

Miller, E. "Medieval York." In A History of Yorkshire: The City of York. University of London Institute of Historical Research, 1961.

Palliser, D.M. "York's Earliest Administration Record: The Husgabel Roll of c.1284." Yorkshire Archaeological Journal, vol.50 (1978), 81-91.

Percy, Joyce, ed. York Memorandum Book [B/Y]. Surtees Society, vol.186 (1969).

Prestwich, Michael. York Civic Ordinances. Borthwick Papers, no.49 (1976).

Raine, Angelo. Medieval York. London, 1955.

Sellers, Maud, ed. York Memorandum Book Lettered A/Y in the Guildhall Muniment Room. Surtees Society, vols. 120 (1911), 125 (1914)

previous

main menu

History of medieval York

York at the close of the Middle Ages

This is a clickable imagemap.

NOTES:

This map is based on one of the series produced by John Speed in the early seventeenth century.

A The Abbey of St. Mary

St. Mary's became the wealthiest and most influential Benedictine house in northern England. Its origins can be traced back to a gift by Count Alan of Brittany, prior to 1086, of St. Olave's Church and some nearby land to monks displaced from Whitby and Lastingham. William Rufus enlarged the site in 1088 and construction of the abbey began the following year. As can be seen from Speed's map, the abbey precinct grew to cover a sizable area on the west side of the city: when walled in stone in 1334 (except for the wall on the Ouse side, set back from the river's edge, which was completed in 1354) about 12 acres of land were enclosed; the main gate faced away from the city, onto Marygate – Speed shows the large gatehouse, which accommodated the abbey court, although the monastic church which stood in the centre of the precinct has disappeared. Rufus' charter to the abbey granted the monks and their tenants exemption from the jurisdiction of external authorities, thus creating an enclave beyond the control of city or shire authorities and setting the stage for rivalry, disputes and bitterness.

Further information and photo

B Holy Trinity priory

The priory occupied a site of roughly 7 acres at the southern end of the city. It is believed to have been the successor to a pre-Conquest house of canons which had dwindled to almost nothing. The re-foundation in 1089 was the work of Ralph Paynell and took the form of an alien priory of Benedictines, subject to the French abby of Marmoutier; many of the properties with which Paynell endowed it had belonged to the earlier house of canons. As an alien priory, it was looked on with suspicion during the Hundred Years War and charges of harbouring spies and sending supplies to the enemy were flung at it. There were occasionally disturbances aimed at it. Nonetheless it survived the suppression of alien priories in the early 15th century and successfully petitioned for naturalization in 1426, thereafter having the effective status of an abbey, free from any foreign jurisdiction. During the reign of Henry VI it took over responsibility for the hospital of St. Nicholas in the suburbs. It was dissolved in 1538.

C Cathedral precinct

The dedication of the cathedral was to St. Peter.

Information and photo

D Castle

A Norman motte-and-bailey fortification on the site of the present Clifford's Tower (named, in the late 16th century, possibly after someone hanged there or possibly for one of the castellans), built in 1068, rebuilt on an enlarged motte after being destroyed in the anti-Jewish riot of 1190, blown down in a gale in 1228, and gradually rebuilt in stone between about 1245 and 1270. The outer wall of the castle perimeter enclosed not only the motte-and-bailey but halls and other buildings. Damming of the Foss created an additional defence on the outer perimeter, in the form of a lake. Uses of the castle included:

- as a fortress (although after 1190 it never experienced a siege);
- for housing the courts and departments of the royal government, when that was based in York for periods during the campaigns against the Scots in the early 14th century;
- as the location where circuit and county courts were convened;
- as the base for shrieval administration;
- as the county gaol.

The castle was a separate jurisdiction ("liberty") from the city, although the precise boundaries of that jurisdiction were a matter of dispute between the city authorities and Yorkshire's sheriff.

Further information

E Clifford's Tower

Information and photos

F Common Hall

A "common hall" is heard of by 1256, although its location was not identified. It is only speculation whether this might have been the hansehouse (i.e. gild hall) whose existence is inferred from a charter of 1154, in which the archbishop granted the burgesses of Beverley the same privileges as York. The connection of a community building with the present Guildhall site is evidenced only from 1378. This hall was capable of hosting large civic assemblies, and is presumed to be the predecessor of the Guildhall which represents a 15th-century renovation and enlargement. In 1445 there was an agreement between the city authorities and St. Christopher's Gild to share the costs of such a project; the gild's recompense was a gift of city-owned land nearby, on which it built a chapel and maison dieu, and the right to use the Guildhall during the 10 days surrounding the festival of St. James. Construction was underway during the 1446/47 fiscal year and sufficiently advanced to allow a council meeting to be held there in 1459. The great hall was the building's main feature, and was the location of mayoral elections and discussion of important business which required the presence of community representatives; a chamber at the west end was used for the council to meet in private. The present Guildhall is a reconstruction necessitated by damage to the original during the Second World War.

G Marketplace

The Thursday Market was the principal site for the retailing of foodstuffs; retailing could begin there at 5.00 a.m. in summer, 7.00 a.m. in winter. The market was supervised by a warden and by the fifteenth century that officer was farming revenues due the city from the market (e.g. stallage). The warden had to police city regulations regarding trading, such as the prohibitions against regrating and selling goods in private places. In 1421 John Brathwayt's widow Mary gave £13.6s.8d towards the construction of a new stone cross in the Thursday Market, as a work of charity for the benefit of the souls of herself and her late husband. She was very explicit that the money could only be applied to that purpose.

Information and photos.

H The Shambles

Parts of this butcher's market were also known as Haymongergate and Nedlergate during the Middle Ages.

Information and photo

I St. Leonard's Hospital

Tradition has it that the hospital's origins lay in the canons' responsibility for the welfare of the poor servants of the cathedral, to which King Athelstan gave support in 936 by requiring every plough operating in the diocese of York to contribute 20 sheaves of corn as alms towards this effort. A small hospital was then built on royal land west of the cathedral and given the same dedication as the cathedral. In 1246 an inquisition jury attributed the foundation to the Conqueror and identified the recipients of hospitality as the poor, sick and infirm who had no homes but slept in the streets at night. The next generation credited Rufus with the foundation. William Rufus' actual role seems instead to have been to move the hospital a little further west. Stephen constructed on the growing site a church dedicated to St. Leonard, and the hospital was henceforth known by that name.

From later evidence it appears that the charitable functions of the hospital were to distribute daily alms at its gates to 30 poor people, give alms to prisoners in the city and to leper houses, and maintain 206 sick poor folk within the hospital until they had convalesced sufficiently to be able to return to work. The hospital was staffed by 13 brethren and 8 sisters (who had special responsibility for tending to the sick and poor) pursuing a quasi-monastic lifestyle, involving chastity and renunciation of worldly goods; those with an aptitude for learning were placed in theological schools in York. Beds in the hospital might be endowed by private benefaction, with benefactors (or their heirs) nominating persons to be maintained by the hospital. In the building housing the infirmary, the lower floor was allocated to nursing exposed infants and looking after orphans and poor children; it was required that the chimney here function well, to avoid the children being harmed by smoke.

The extensive lands accumulated by the hospital were carefully cultivated and their crops, along with the sheaf-alms, sold to finance the hospital's work. However, this income proved increasingly insufficient to support needs – despite master and brethren being exhorted to avoid unnecessary expenses and forbidden to sell or pledge books, chalices, or vestments from the church – and the number of residents had declined by the early 14th century. By the end of the century, due partly to mismanagement by the masters of the hospital, as well as delinquency on the part of many in paying the sheaf-alms, the hospital was in rough shape. Fire had destroyed the church's bell-tower, and the rooves of the infirmary and dormitory badly needed repair, as did other buildings of the hospital, its manors, and the rentable properties it owned in town. The foundation alms had been pilfered and church ornaments and vestments pawned to pay the hospital's debts, while the masters' personal household had run up high expenses. The hospital's debt was £543. Despite this, the hospital managed to survive until the Dissolution.

The hospital precinct, which occupied a site of 4 acres with one gateway opening onto the road to the east and another accessing a lane running south to St. Leonard's Landing on the river, was one of the special "liberties" within the city; it was and home not only to monks but also to laymen who might have trade privileges without the accompanying civic or gild obligations. This was inevitably resented by the citizens and the brethren of the hospital at times found themselves unpopular. In 1482 the cappers gild ordered that none of its members contract out work to anyone in St. Leonards' (or other liberties), because the gild had no authority to resolve any problems that might arise between master and worker. The location of the hospital grounds against part of the city walls meant that it was responsible for upkeep of that part of the walls, another likely bone of contention.

The Multangular Tower at the south-west corner of the precinct was part of the original Roman defences and marks the south-west corner of the castra.

J Stonegate

This was one of the major highways within the city, an important street connecting the Minster with the heart of the city; civic processions to the Minster would follow that route. Many of the houses in Stonegate belonged to the church. They included shops where theological or school books were sold, as well as shops of goldsmiths (who also did a lot of business with the church). The origin and meaning of the name are debated. It seems doubtful that it could have any bearing on a paved Roman road, which would have largely disappeared by the time when the Viking "gate" was applied. Possibly it was associated with a stone entrance to the Roman city, situated at the bottom of Stonegate, which is more likely to have survived to the 10th century.

Information and photos

K Bootham Bar

On, or very near, the site of one of the entrances into the Roman settlement (it even being possible that some Roman material was incorporated in the structure), this was the major entrance into the city from the north. Parts of the structure can be dated back to the 11th century.

Further information and photo

L Monk Bar

The most elaborate of the surviving medieval city gates, Monk Bar is also the highest (four storeys, with the topmost being a 15th century addition). It was constructed in the early 14th century and was equipped with portcullis; it had a barbican which was removed in the 19th century. There is no evidence for a gate here before the 14th century, but perhaps there was some minor access way through the walls for the monks attached to the cathedral.

M Walmgate Bar (not seen on this map)

First mentioned in the mid-12th century, when likely a wooden gate guarding an entrance through earthen fortifications, its lower section of stone may date to 1215, when a new ditch was dug around the eastern sector of the city. However, the present structure was largely part of the initiative to wall the city with stone in the 14th century.

Information and photo

N Fishergate Bar

This "bar" was in fact only a small postern gate beside one of the defensive towers in the wall, which might explain why it receives no mention in any early city documents. It probably had no superstructure during the Middle Ages. The present-day tower is an early 16th century replacement.

O Layerthorpe gate

This is generally interpreted as another postern gate, of lesser significance than the principal bars of the city, although it too was referred to as a bar in the Middle Ages, and had iron-bound doors. Nonetheless, it was a public entrance, at the city end of the bridge to Layerthorpe (which at one time would have been a village independent of York, until absorbed as the suburbs expanded) and its arch over the roadway was large enough for wagons to pass underneath; it was a location for toll collection. By the beginning of the 15th century, there was a hospital (maison dieu) atop it. When the bridge was built is uncertain, but possibly not until the beginning of the Late Middle Ages; it was in existence by 1309, but there is slight evidence that a ford may have been there earlier.

P Micklegate Bar

As the entrance into the city from the south, this was the most important of the city gates. Its importance is reflected in the fact that, in a list of leading townsmen to whom the keys of the various gates were entrusted for safekeeping in 1380, the keys to Micklegate were kept by the mayor himself; but this was during a time of political strife in the city, and it was more commonly sergeants or gatekeepers who kept the keys. It was usually through Micklegate that kings entered the city and were there greeted with ceremony by mayor, council, and citizens. The present structure is three storeys high. The original gate was built in the early 12th century, the archway still showing Norman influence; in the 14th century it was heightened to accommodate a portcullis, and a barbican was added (removed in the 19th century). "Mickle" means "much" and Micklegate might today be interpreted as High Street, Micklegate being the major route through the section of the city on the west side of the Ouse. However, the gate does not lie on the route of the Roman road that had headed south out of the city, but rather on what was probably a post-Roman track.

Q Ouse Bridge

A Roman bridge crossing the Ouse was upstream from the site of the medieval bridge. There may, however, have been a wooden bridge on or near the medieval site in the time of the Vikings, connecting the area of Roman settlement and Scandinavian suburb with an extension of the settlement across the river. A stone bridge is first referred to in the late 12th century. Along the river on either side of the bridge, on both sides but particularly the eastern bank, were the staiths where ships loaded and unloaded cargoes.

It was atop the west end of this bridge, on the north side, that sat a building housing the city council chamber; the room in which mayor and council conducted their discussions of civic business was on the upper floor, while the bureaucratic administration had its desks on the lower floor; the treasury and the prisons (often called kidcotes) associated with mayor's and sheriffs' courts were also here, or nearby. A city rental of 1376 refers to 36 shops and 5 tenements on, or at the end of, Ouse bridge. They included at least one house "overhanging the river" and the chapel of St. William, also on the north side at the west end; by mid-15th century the chapel housed the city clock. Opposite the chapel, on the south side of the bridge, was a small hospital – one of several in the city called a maison dieu – sheltering poor men and women. It was said to have been founded by the citizens in ancient times and endowed with lands and rents for the support of the poor and lepers; many citizens falling on hard times were given a home there, but neglect and mismanagement had led to its decline. This was the defence made by a group of citizens accused, in 1305, of illegally forming a gild a few years earlier; they explained that their fraternity was for the purpose of refounding the charitable hospital. Public latrines were in the same vicinity as the hospital.

Each of the two major bridges within the city had a pair of wardens, city employees, in charge of it. They were responsible for levying and accounting for revenues associated with the bridges, such as rents from the properties built on or in the neighbourhood of the bridges. A tollbooth situated at the west end of the bridge, near the hospital, was presumably used for collecting customs and tolls of passage, although there is reference to a building of that name associated with the hearing of pleas. The bridge encompassed six arches, but it was probably only the two central that accommodated vessels plying the river. The city was in a long contest with St. Mary's Abbey to ensure ships could move freely along the Ouse. As well, the bridge wardens were responsible for arranging maintenance work on the bridges and any civic buildings associated with them, dealt with some expenses related to the chapels (and the chapels' various chantries, founded by private citizens) on the bridges.

Such was the burden of all these buildings to the bridge that frequent repair was necessary, notably in 1307 and 1377, while several grants of pontage were made by the king in support of repair work in the early 15th century. In the 16th century the bridge collapsed due to its deterioration and the weight of the buildings.

R Foss Bridge

The earliest reference to a bridge at the end of Fossgate was ca.1145/48; doubtless it was made of wood at that time. Rebuilding in stone occurred in the early 15th century, although it is not impossible the structure replaced was also of stone. Like the Ouse bridge, the bridge over the Foss had numerous shops and other buildings atop it and retail stalls were also set up on the bridge. The buildings included a chapel dedicated to St. Anne, whose chaplain received his salary from the city. The west end of the pond which formed after damming, and served as a royal fishery, is seen at the right edge of the map, but the larger part of the pond is not seen in this edited version of Speed's original (which showed the entire pond). The king's interests in the fishery were represented by an officer who was probably based at the Foss Bridge. The bridge was the site of the market in saltwater fish, mentioned as early as 1253; consequently a number of those living near to the bridge were fishmongers.

S Merchant Adventurers' Hall

Some of York's wealthier citizens formed the Gild of Our Lord and the Blessed Virgin in the 1350s; after obtaining royal approval in 1357, they had a hall built for themselves in Fossgate, probably completed by 1361, apparently with the intent of founding a hospital there. What became of this plan and the gild is not certain, but by 1420 the property was in the hands of the mercers gild (itself dedicated to the Holy Trinity) which seems never to have been subject to any city regulations, in contrast to most trades, but instead received a royal charter of incorporation in 1430. In the 16th century this became the Merchant Adventurers which, like its more famous London counterpart, played a major role in controlling foreign trade.

This is one of the most impressive examples of a timber-framed gildhall (with brick undercroft) to survive today,. The upper floor was the great hall where gild members met. On the lower level was a charitable hospital (for pensioners of the gild) and chapel – the charter of 1430 having granted the right to hold real estate worth up to £10 annually, from the revenues of which the gild would support impoverished or needy members and pay the salary of a chaplain.

T Old Baile

The Conqueror had two castles built in York, one in 1068 the other in 1069. Although not all are in agreement, it is generally felt the castle on the west bank of the Ouse was the younger. It had acquired the epithet "old" attached to "bailey" by 1268. By 1308 it is found in the hands of the Archbishop of York, and this transfer may have taken place as early as ca.1194. What he used it for is uncertain; one suggested use has been a prison for criminal clerics. In 1423 the city was suing the archbishop for failing to keep in good repair the section of the city wall that was part of the Old Baile perimeter; this was one episode in a recurring argument over who was responsible for defence in that sector of the city. Finally, possibly in 1464 (but certainly by 1487), the archbishop handed over the castle to the city. By Speed's time only some of the earthworks, and the outer defence that was part of the city wall, survived.

U Carmelite friary

The Carmelites established themselves York in the early 1250s, their first residence in fact being in Bootham (outside the walls). They acquired ca.1295 a new site in St. Saviour's parish, they moved into this over the next few years – a church was under construction in 1300 and its cemetery was consecrated in 1304 – coming to terms with the parish rector and St. Saviour's patron (St. Mary's Abbey) concerning tithes, burial rights and other mutual concerns. About two dozen friars belonged to the house at this time. In 1314 they obtained two grants from the king. The first was permission to alienate in mortmain their previous home to the Dean of York (who used it to found the hospital of St. Mary), while the second was permission to build a quay on the king's fishpond in the Foss, for the purpose of transporting necessities to the friary by water.

The precise extent of the friary site is not certain, and expanded over time (into Holy Cross parish, for example); but part of the boundary was opposite St. Saviour's (on Hungate) and part on Fossgate, with the initial frontage probably facing onto Stonebow, a narrow passage connecting Fossgate and Hungate, although there was by mid-14th century a gateway onto Fossgate itself. The church itself stood in the northern section of this precinct. By the close of the century they had acquired enough adjacent land that they undertook an expansion of their church. The friary was dissolved in 1538.

Further information

V Franciscan friary

The Franciscans, or Friars Minor, came to York ca.1230; their first custodian had been personally associated with Francis of Assisi. This house became the head of one of the Franciscan administrative areas into which the English province was divided. The original site proved too small and ca.1243 they moved to a permanent location south of the castle, in the parish of St. Mary Castlegate. The king helped finance the original construction, although the church was rebuilt at the end of the 13th century, and the same century saw adjacent properties acquired to expand the precinct.

The extent of the Franciscan precinct, which was walled (except on the south-eastern boundary, where the city wall itself served) is clearly indicated on Speed's map; the road on the west side was named Friargate, although the precinct did not extend quite as far as that road. The site ran southwards to the north bank of the Ouse – friars and monks liked to have access to a water supply – and there, ca.1290, the friars had a wall built; since this deflected the current to the south bank and threatened Skeldergate with flooding, the citizens had to obtain the king's permission (1305) to build a wall along the south bank as well, using money from murage. In 1299 the community of friars numbered 52. The importance of the friary, or perhaps of its proximity to the castle, is reflected in the fact that Edward II, Edward III and Richard II all lodged there when visiting York. The friary even had sanctuary privileges. It was dissolved in 1538.

A city ordinance of 1371 prohibited the dumping of offal into, and the cleaning of skins in, that part of the Ouse between its bridge and the friars' property, since water was taken from that part of the river for brewing and baking. Possibly the friars themselves were complainants, for in 1380 the king had to order that they not be inconvenienced by butchers dumping offal in the Ouse or in lanes by the friary. It again may have been partly for the friars' benefit that there was a postern gate in the small stretch of city wall below the castle, next to the friary.

W Dominican friary

In 1226 Henry III instructed some of his justices to consult with the mayor and leading citizens on a suitable site for the Dominicans. The recommendation was returned for a chapel of St. Mary Magdalene, with land behind it, in Kingstoft, on the south bank of the Ouse just within the city ditch. By the close of the following year, the friars had begun to wall in this property. They may previously have resided in Goodramgate, for they turned over a building there to the archbishop. Construction of the friary was going on until mid-century, and expansion of the precinct until at least the close of the century, although this was blocked on the southeastern side because the secular authorities did not want to give up land (Toft Green) which was needed for holding arrays of arms, trials by battle, and construction of military engines for defending the city; the green was also the site of horse and cattle fairs. Friary gateways opened onto the green and towards the Ouse. The precise boundaries of the friary are unknown, but at the Dissolution it occupied only 1 acre of land.

This was an important house for the Dominicans; provincial chapters were often held there during the later 13th and 14th centuries. The number of friars during the first half of the 14th century fluctuated between 47 and 60. It may be that the reformer John Wycliffe was one of their number in the 1350s, for there were acolytes of that name at the friary. The friary was destroyed by fire ca.1455 and a rebuilding effort was undertaken, supported by an indulgence proclaimed by the archbishop. The friary was dissolved in 1538.

X Augustinian friary

According to tradition, the Augustinians relocated from Tickhill to York, where they bought seven houses as the basis for a friary. Certainly they had established themselves in York by 1272. Their friary was in the south-west section of the city on a confined site (about 2 acres) north of the Ouse; it lay between present-day Lendal Street and the river, bounded on the west by the lane leading from St. Leonard's to a landing-place on the riverbank (just east of the present Lendal Bridge) and on the east by the lane next to the Common Hall. The walled precinct had its main gate opening onto Lendal Street. In 1300 it housed 35 friars. A catalogue of its library survives from 1372, listing 646 items. The friary was dissolved in 1538.

[MAIN MENU]

Prehistoric

Roman

Trade

Craft

Domestic

Dress

Religion

Military

Anglian

Trade

Craft

Domestic

Dress

Military

Viking

Trade

Craft

Domestic

Dress

Religion

Medieval

Trade

Craft

Domestic

Dress

Religion

Post-medieval

ROMAN YORK (EBORACUM) c. AD 71 — c. 400

© English Heritage

Founded as a fortress in AD 71, Eboracum housed first the 9th and later the 6th Legion. It soon had a civilian population and boasted fine public and military buildings. Eboracum became one of the most important cities of Roman Britain and, after 211, it was the capital of the province of Britannia Inferior (Lower Britain).

(left) Remains of a tower on the south-west side of the fortress defences found in Lendal

(right) Roman wall with arches opening part of a building in the Colonia excavated in Micklegate

Excavations by the York Archaeological Trust have revealed the complex life of the fortress — with its barrack blocks, streets, bath houses and elaborate system of drains and sewers. In the civilian areas, public and private buildings have been discovered. These include town houses with mosaic floors, and possible bath houses and temples. We have also uncovered substantial river revetments which were built to accommodate Roman ships bringing in goods from the rest of the empire.

timeline

Romans

400-1068

11th century

12th-14th century

15th-16th century

17th century

19th century

20th century

Future

The Romans arrived at the spot where the Rivers Ouse and Foss meet in AD71.

The Roman defences

They quickly set about building a sound set of defences as the local tribe – the Brigantes – were not very friendly.

We know how the fortress would have looked. This is partly due to excavation results and partly from looking at other fortresses of the same period.

The first defences were simple: a ditch, an embankment made of turf and clay, a large timber fence, and timber towers and gates. Inside was a simple pattern of streets and buildings.

The fortress was big. You could comfortably fit 50 football pitches inside the defences (20.3 hectares for the technically minded).

A large and important town grew up around the fortress over the following 150 years. It centred on the south-west bank of the River Ouse.

Eboracum

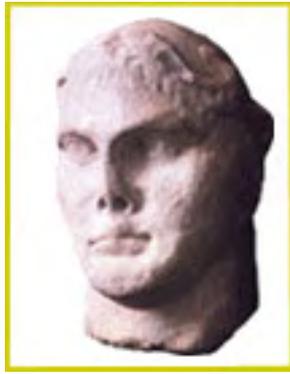

The Romans called it Eboracum. By the early third century a visitor to Eboracum would have seen a town and fortress surrounded by strong stone walls. The walls were symbols of Eboracum and Rome's importance as well as defences.

One of the most important parts of these defences – the Multangular Tower – is still here today.

city walls

home

Eboracum remained a very important settlement in the north of England. Constantine was declared emperor there in AD306. However, during the fourth century, the fortress and town started to change in character and level of occupation. How this affected the defences is not clear.

What is clear, however, is that the line of the defences established during the period from 71 to around 400 was to have a lasting effect on how York developed down to the present day.

page last modified: 22 September 2003

home | a to z | local democracy | visiting York
living | working | caring and health | learning and libraries | roads and transport | sport and leisure

Click here to support this site and buy the CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA on CD-ROM
Buy with Credit Card | Buy using PayPal | More Info...

VISIT THE CATHOLIC COMPANY FOR CATHOLIC BOOKS AND GIFTS

Devout Catholic singles called to marriage. Visit Ave Maria Singles

Get free magazines, catalogs and more from Free for Catholics

If an ad appears here that contradicts Catholic teachings, please click here to notify the webmaster.

GET THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA ON CD-ROM

- Classic 1914 edition -- the same version seen on our website
- Contains more than 11,600 articles
- Printer-friendly format for each article
- Works on Mac, Windows and Unix
- Only \$29.95 \(plus S&H\)

CLICK HERE to buy with Visa, MasterCard, American Express, Discover

CLICK HERE to buy using PayPal

CLICK HERE for more information

Ancient See of York

(EBORACENSIS).

The seat of metropolitan jurisdiction for the northern province. It is not known when or how Christianity first reached York, but there was a bishop there from very early times, though there is a break in the historical continuity between these early prelates and the archbishops of a later date. At the Council of Arles (314) "Eborus episcopus de civitate Eboracensis" was present, and bishops of York ere also present at the Councils of Nicaea, Sardica, and Ariminum. But this early Christian community was blotted out by the pagan Saxons leaving no trace except the names of three bishops, Sampson, Pyramus, and Theodicus, handed down by legendary tradition. When St. Gregory sent St. Augustine to convert the Saxons his intention was to create two archbishoprics -- Canterbury and York -- each with twelve suffragans, but this plan was never carried into effect, and though St. Paulinus, who was consecrated as bishop of York in 625, received the pallium in 631, he never had any suffragans, nor did his successors receive the pallium until 732, when it was granted to Egbert. After the flight of Paulinus in 633 the country relapsed into Paganism, and though its conversion was once more effected by the Celtic bishops of Lindisfarne, there was no bishop of York till the consecration of St. Wilfrid in 664. His immediate successors seem to have acted simply as diocesan prelates till the time of Egbert, the brother of King Edbert of Northumbria, who received the pallium from Gregory III in 735 and established metropolitan rights in the north.

This metropolitan jurisdiction was at first vague and of varying extent. Till the Danish invasion the archbishops of Canterbury occasionally exercised authority, and it was not till the Norman Conquest that the archbishops of York asserted their complete independence. At that time they had jurisdiction over Worcester, Lindsey, and Lincoln, as well as the dioceses in the Northern Isles and Scotland. But the first three sees just mentioned were taken from York in 1072. In 1154 the sees of Man and Orkney were transferred to the Norwegian Archbishop of Drontheim, and in 1188 all the Scottish dioceses except Whithern were released from subjection to York, so that Whithern, Durham, and Carlisle remained to the archbishops as suffragan sees. Of these, Durham was practically independent, for the bishops of that see were little short of sovereigns in their own jurisdiction. During the fourteenth century Whithern was reunited to the Scottish Church, but the province of York received some compensations in the restoration of Sodor and Man. At the time of the Reformation York thus possessed three suffragan sees, Durham, Carlisle, and Sodor and Man, to which during the brief space of Mary's reign (1553-58) may be added the Diocese of Chester, schismatically founded by Henry VIII, but subsequently recognized by the pope.

The mutual relations between Canterbury and York were frequently embittered by a long struggle for precedence. In 1071 the question was argued at Rome between Archbishops Lanfranc and Thomas in the presence of Pope Alexander II, who decided in favour of Canterbury. At a subsequent synod that the future archbishops of York must be consecrated in Canterbury cathedral and swear allegiance to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and that the Humber was to be the southern limit of the metropolitan jurisdiction of York. This arrangement lasted till 1118, when Thurstan, archbishop-elect, refused to make submission, and in consequence the Archbishop of Canterbury declined to consecrate him. Thurstan thereupon successfully appealed to Calixtus II, who not only himself consecrated him, but also gave him a Bull releasing him and his successors from the supremacy of Canterbury. From time to time during the reign of Henry II and succeeding kings the quarrel broke out again, leading often to scandalous scenes of dissension, until Innocent VI (1352-62) settled it by confirming an arrangement that the Archbishop of Canterbury should take precedence with the title Primate of All England, but that the Archbishop of York should retain the style of Primate of England. Each prelate was to carry his metropolitan cross in the province of the other, and if they were together their cross-bearers should walk abreast. The Archbishop of York also undertook that each of his successors should send an image of gold to the shrine of St. Thomas of Canterbury.

The diocesan history of York apart from its archiepiscopal rights presents few features calling for special remark. For its early memories connected with its founders St. Paulinus and St. Edwin, who was baptized on the spot where the cathedral now stands, its canonized prelates St. Bosa, St. John of Beverley, and St. Oswald, its great scholars Archbishop Egbert and Aleuin, reference should be made to the articles dealing with those venerated names. At the Conquest it was Archbishop Ealdred who crowned William I at Westminster, but his successor, Thomas of Bayeux, the first Norman archbishop, found everything in confusion; the minster with its great school was in a ruinous condition, abandoned by almost all its clergy. The celebrated library had perished and the city itself had been devastated in the final Northumbrian rebellion against William. Thomas had to begin everything afresh. The pontificate of St. William gave another saint to York, and in 1284 his relics were solemnly enshrined there. With John de Thoresby (1352-73) a much needed period of reform began, and he began the present choir of the minster. Another popular archbishop was Richard Scrope, beheaded for his share in the rebellion of the Percys against Henry IV. After his death he was the object of extraordinary veneration by the people. Many of the archbishops besides Thoresby and Scrope -- Fitzalan, Lawrence Booth, Scot, among them -- held the office of lord chancellor and played leading parts in affairs of state. As Heylyn wrote: "This see has yielded to the Church eight saints, to the Church of Rome three cardinals, to the realm of England twelve Lord Chancellors and two Lord Treasurers, and to the north of England two Lord Presidents."

The following is the list of archbishops of York, but there is great difficulty in determining the exact dates before the Norman Conquest and there is no agreement on the subject. The dates of accession given below are based on the recent researches of Searle, but those earlier than the tenth century can only be regarded in most cases as approximate:

- St. Caedda;
- St. Wilfrid, 664-678;
- Bosa, 678;
- St. Wilfrid (restored), 686;

DR. SCOTT HAHN
Growth by Oath
THE SEVEN SACRAMENTS
BAPTISM
CONFIRMATION
MARRIAGE
ORDINATION
ANUNTIATION
PENITENCE
EUCCHARISTIA

Growth By Oath
(CDs) $34.95
Buy Now | Read More

Sponsored by The Catholic Company in conjunction with New Advent. All proceeds benefit the New Advent website!

Subscribe to our FREE Catholic newsletter

- Bosa (restored), 691;
- St. John of Beverley, 705;
- Wilfrid II, 718;
- St. Egbert, 732 or 734;
- Æthelbeorht (Albert), 767;
- Eanbald I, 780;
- Eanbald II, 796;
- Wulfsige, after 808;
- Wigmund, 837;
- Wulfhere, 854;
- Æthelbeald, 900;
- Hrothweard (Lodeward or Redwald), uncertain;
- Wulfstan I, 931;
- Oseytel, 956;
- Eadwald, 971;
- St. Oswald, 972;
- Ealdwulf, 992;
- Wulfstan II, 1003;
- Ælfric Puttoc, 1023;
- Ælthrie, 1041;
- Ælfric Puttoc, 1042;
- Cynesige (Kinsy), 1051;
- Ealdred, 1061;
- Thomas of Bayeux, 1070;
- Gerard, 1101;
- Thomas II, 1108;
- Thurstan, 1114;
- vacancy, 1140;
- St. William, 1143;
- Mordac, 1147;
- St. William (restored), 1153;
- Roger de Pont l'Évêque, 1154;
- vacancy, 1181;
- Geoffrey, 1191;
- vacancy, 1212;
- Walter de Grey, 1216;
- Sewal de Bovill, 1256;
- Geoffrey of Ludham, 1258;
- Walter Giffard, 1266;
- William of Wickwaine, 1279;
- John de Romeyn, 1286;
- vacancy, 1296;
- Henry of Newark, 1298;
- Thomas of Corbridge, 1300;
- vacancy, 1304;
- William Greenfield, 1306;
- vacancy, 1315;
- William de Melton, 1317;
- vacancy, 1340;
- William la Zouch, 1342;
- John of Thoresby, 1352;
- Alexander Neville, 1374;
- Thomas Fitzalan, 1388;
- Ralph Waldby, 1397;
- Richard Scrope, 1398;
- vacancy, 1405;
- Henry Bowet, 1407;

- vacancy, 1423;
- John Kemp (Cardinal), 1426;
- William Booth, 1452;
- George Neville, 1464;
- Lawrence Booth, 1476;
- Thomas Scot (de Rotherham), 1480;
- Thomas Savage, 1501;
- Christopher Bainbridge (Cardinal), 1508;
- Thomas Wolsey (Cardinal), 1514;
- Edward Lee, 1531;
- vacancy during which Robert Holgate was schismatically intruded, 1544-55;
- Nicholas Heath, the last Catholic Archbishop of York, 1555-79.

The minster occupies the site of the church built by St. Edwin, which as restored by Archbishop Albert was described by Alcuin as "a most magnificent basilica". This perished in the rebellion of 1069. It was rebuilt by Thomas of Bayeux, but few portions of this Norman building now remain. The chief features of the existing building are the Early English transepts with the lancet windows known as the Five Sisters (late twelfth and early thirteenth century) and the west front (early fourteenth century), usually regarded as the finest in England. The nave and chapter-house, containing splendid examples of medieval glass, are of the same date; the Lady chapel and choir, the latter containing one of the finest perpendicular windows in the world, were fourteenth-century work. The towers were added during the following century, and the completed cathedral was reconsecrated on 3 February, 1472.

The diocese, which consisted of the counties of York and Nottingham, was divided into four archdeaconries -- York, Cleveland, East Riding, and Nottingham -- and contained 541 parishes. The religious houses, which were very numerous, included at the time of the Dissolution (1536-39) 28 abbeys, 26 priories, 23 convents, 30 friaries, 13 cells, 4 commanderies of Knights Hospitallers, and formerly there had been 4 commanderies of the Knights Templars. The abbeys and priories included some of the largest and most famous in England, such as the Benedictine abbeys at York itself, Whitby, and Selby; Bolton Abbey, belonging to the Augustinians, and the Cistercian abbeys at Fountains, Rivaulx, Jervaulx, Sawley, and Kirkstall. The churches of York itself were remarkable for their beauty and size. Ripon and Beverley possessed large collegiate churches, and many of the parish churches in the diocese were noted for their size and architectural features. The arms of the see originally were:

gules, a pallium argent charged with four crosses formee fitché, sable, edged and fringed or.

But subsequently another coat was used:

gules, two keys in saltire argent, in chief a mitre or.

The Anglican archbishops have, fitly enough, substituted a royal crown for the mitre. The city of York itself after the Reformation became endeared to English Catholics for two reasons, one being the large number of martyrs who suffered at the local Tyburn, the other being the establishment in 1680 of the celebrated Bar Convent founded outside Micklegate Bar by the English Virgins, now the Institute of Mary (Loreto Nuns). This community, which still carries on one of the most noted schools for girls in England, has the distinction of being the oldest convent now in England.

Kids Explore Americas Catholic Heritage $9.95
Buy Now | Read More

The Essential Handbook Set $75.00
Buy Now | Read More

St. Brigid Patron Saint Prayer Card w/Medal $5.95
Buy Now | Read More

Hematite Bead Rosary For Children $32.00
Buy Now | Read More

Childrens Oval/ Pink Miraculous Medal - SS $24.00
Buy Now | Read More

Faith Hope and Charity Pendant (SS) $24.95
Buy Now | Read More

The Ultimate Challenge - A Catholic/Protestant Debate (CDs) $38.95
Buy Now | Read More

Sacred and Immaculate Hearts - Ornate Gold Frame $28.95
Buy Now | Read More

Sponsored by The Catholic Company in conjunction with New Advent. All proceeds benefit the New Advent website!

DRAKE, Eboracum: Hist. and Antiq. of the City of York (London, 1736); BRITTON, Hist. and Antiq. of York (London, 1810); BROWNE, Hist. of the Metropolitan Church of St. Peter, York (London, 1847); POOLE and HUGALL, Hist. and Descr. Guide to York Cathedral (York, 1850); RAINE, Fabric Rolls of York Minster (Durham, 1859); ORNSBY, York in Diocesan Histories Series (London, 1882); RAINE, Historians of the Church of York and Its Archbishops in R.S. (London, 1879-94); PUREY-CUST, Heraldry of York Minster (Leeds, 1896); Statutes in Lincoln Statutes, II, ed. WORDSWORTH (Cambridge, 1892-7); CLUTTON-BROCK, York, the Cathedral and See (London, 189); WILLIS, Architectural Hist. of York Minster; IDEM, Survey of the Cathedrals, I (London, 1727).

For the history of the archbishops see: ALCUIN, De pontificibus poema in P.L., CI; Fragm. hist. de pontificibus et ecclesiae Eborac., c. 785 in ACHERY, Acta SS. ord. s. Benedicti (Venice, 1734); SIMEON OF DURHAM, De archiepiscopis Eboraci, 627-1154 in R.S. (London, 1882), i, 75; STUBBS, Chronicon pontificum, 1147-1373 in TWYSDEN (London, 1652); DIXON, Fasti eboracenses, I (London, 1863). For archbishops to 1373 see: Registers of Archbishops GRAY, 1225-55 (Durham, 1872), GIFFARD, 1266-79 (Durham, 1904) and DE WICKWANE, 1279-85 (Durham, 1907); GAMS, Series episcoporum (Ratisbon, 1873); SEARLE, Anglo-Saxon Bishops, Kings, and Nobles (Cambridge, 1899).

For religious houses see: BURTON, Monasticon choracense (York, 1758); BAILDON, Notes on religious and secular houses of Yorkshire (London, 1895); GRAINGE, Castles and Abbeys of Yorkshire (York, 1855); LEFROY, Ruined Abbeys of Yorkshire (London, 1891); and the maps at end of vol. II of GASQUET, Henry VIII and the English Monasteries (London, 1888); Certificates of Commissioners appointed to survey chantries, etc., 1546 (Durham, 1894-5); LEACH, Early Yorkshire Schools (London, 1899-1903); and city and county histories, such as BAINES, Yorkshire past and present (London, 1871-7); RAINE, York (London, 1893); COOPER, York (London, 1904), DRAKE, Eboracum (London, 1736); HARGRAVE, Hist. of York (York, 1818); WHELLUN, York (1857-71); SCHROEDER, Annals of Yorkshire (Leeds, 1851-52); SMITH, Old Yorkshire (London, 1881-91), and the new volumes of the Victoria County Histories (London, 1897-).

EDWIN BURTON

Transcribed by Michael T. Barrett

Dedicated to those in York who died for the Catholic Faith

The Catholic Encyclopedia, Volume XV
Copyright © 1912 by Robert Appleton Company
Online Edition Copyright © 2003 by K. Knight
Nihil Obstat, October 1, 1912. Remy Lafort, S.T.D., Censor Imprimatur. +John Cardinal Farley, Archbishop of New York

Copyright © 2003 by K. Knight. All rights reserved. Updated 15 September 2003.

Praise Jesus Christ in His Angels and in His Saints.

New Advent is dedicated to the Immaculate Heart of Mary.

Click here to support this site and buy the CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA on CD-ROM
Buy with Credit Card | Buy using PayPal | More Info..

Edwin, King of Northumbria

Born: ?

Died: 632

Father: Ælla, King of Deira

Mother: ?

Married (1): Æthelberga

Children:

Eanfleda

King of Northumbria 616-632

During the reign of King Æthelfrith, Edwin was in exile in North Wales. Upon becoming king, he attacked that kingdom, taking Elmet and Anglesey and besieging King Cadwallon of Gwynedd. During his reign he also took the Isle of Man. He was the first Christian king of Northumbria, baptized Easter Day 627. In 632, Cadwallon allied with King Penda of Mercia and attacked Northumbria in October. Edwin was killed.

return to Imperium

e-mail Joe Shetler at: shetler@ghgcorp.com

Minster History

In the Beginning

During the Roman occupation of Britain York was a thriving, well-defended settlement containing the army headquarters from which the Romans administered the north of England. These military headquarters were the first buildings on the Minster site.

4th Century stone head of Emperor Constantine.

No-one knows when Christianity first arrived in the city but by 306 when Constantine The Great was proclaimed Emperor in York it is probable there was a small Christian community among those who proclaimed him. In 312 he issued a general edict of toleration for the Christian Church. However, by the year 314 York already had its own bishop, implying that the Christian community had been meeting there for some time, probably since long before their faith was officially tolerated.

Saxon cross used as building stone in the foundations

The history of north-eastern England between 400 and 600 AD is obscure but York itself survived with its fortifications kept up and even strengthened. However, it seems that the organised Christian community disappeared during the pagan invasions that followed Roman withdrawal in the 5th century. In 625 Christianity returned to York when Bishop Paulinus accompanied Ethelburga, a Christian princess from Kent in southern England, who came north to marry Edwin, the pagan king of Northumbria. Edwin accepted Christianity two years later and was baptised, along with his court, by Paulinus in a church built especially for the occasion - this building is traditionally regarded as the first York Minster. Bede records that the church was built in a hurry ('citato opere'), that it was made of wood, and that it was small. Before Edwin's death in 632/3 work began on a larger stone church designed to enclose the earlier wooden building. Edwin died before his stone church was completed and it was finished by his successor Oswald, dedicated to Saint Peter as the cathedral in York has been ever since.

Latest News

21 Jun 2004

York Minster Fire - 20th Anniversary

08 Jun 2004

New Dean of York

more news...

Coming Events

20 Apr - 19 Oct 2004

'Foundations of Faith' Course

14 Jun - 12 Sep 2004

Exhibition: To God be the Glory

23 Jun 2004

Informal performance by Sandefjord Chamber Choir, Norway

23 Jun 2004

Concert by the University of York and Northern Sinfonia

more events...

A period of instability followed with York vulnerable to attack from Penda of Mercia and the Britons of North Wales. We know that the city was overrun at least twice and probably three times between the death of Oswald in 641/2 and the Battle of the Winwaed in 654/5. In about 670 St. Wilfred took over the see of York and found the structure of Edwin's church fairly lamentable 'The ridge of the roof owing to its age let the water through, the windows were unglazed and the birds flew in and out, building their nests, while the neglected walls were disgusting to behold, owing to all the filth caused by the rain and the birds.'

Saint Wilfred set to work renewing the roof and covering it with lead, whitewashing the interior walls and installing glass windows. Based on descriptions given of other churches built at a similar time it is possible to understand something of how Wilfred's restored church at York would have looked to the 7th century worshippers who entered it. The altar, within which relics were deposited, would have been decorated with purple silk hangings of intricate woven design. Upon the altar, raised by a book rest and in a jewelled binding, would stand the illuminated gospel book. The walls and probably also the testudo (a wooden partition screening the altar) would be adorned with icons painted on wooden panels depicting the types and anti-types of the Old and New Testaments. These church paintings were essential to the evangelization of England, being the only effective way of explaining the 'the new worship' to an illiterate population. Gregory the Great called them 'the books of the unlearned'.

Saint Wilfred held the see of York for 40 years until 705 but only when not in dispute with Canterbury or for some other reason out of the country. His successors were much more in accord with the wishes of Canterbury and Rome, at last making York a centre where both the Saxon and Roman church were at peace. In the period that followed until the arrival of the Vikings, the Church in York went through a great period in its history. Egbert, who ruled from 732 to 766 and was the first archbishop approved by Rome, hugely expanded the cathedral school and library, which became famous throughout the Christian world. The school's most famous pupil Alcuin, wrote a verse in which he listed the books in the church library. They included not only the Latin fathers, Jerome, Augustine and Gregory, and more recent authors like Boethius and Bede, but classical texts, Virgil, Cicero and Pliny among them. No other such school and library existed north of the Alps and York was truly at the centre of civilization. Meanwhile, in 741, the Minster Church had been burned down. The fire left the old church in ruins but the people of York were in a position to rebuild it and judging by the account of Alcuin it must have been a work of great splendour. He describes it as lofty, supported by columns, and having round arches and panelled ceilings. It contained thirty altars, and was surrounded by many beautiful side-chapels.

In 793, after 'dire portents' in the shape of whirlwinds, lightning and 'fiery dragons...flying in the air' the first Viking attacks fell upon Britain, destroying the church of Lindisfarne. After years of sporadic attacks, the Viking army wintered in England for the first time in 855. By 867 the Danes were occupying East Anglia, and the following year they went north and captured York. Despite losing both their kings in the fight to repel the invaders the English seem to have negotiated a truce which left them in possession of the city; but in 892 the Danes restated their claim and the see of York was vacant for eight years. For the first half of the tenth century there is very little recorded history of the church of York. Occupied in turn by the Danes, the armies of the West Saxon successors of Alfred and Norse raiders from Ireland, it was not until the reign of Edgar that the English were safely in possession of the whole of Northumbria.

These years were not, however, a time of entire depression, either for the city or its Christian population. The trading Vikings brought a measure of prosperity and the Anonymous Life of St Oswald in 980 describes York as a densely populated city, full of Danish merchants, even if its buildings were somewhat down-at-heel. The Minster survived and remained a centre of Christian worship with archbishops continuing to serve, although they are little more than names to us. Some of the Danes even showed an interest in Christianity and as early as 895 a Danish king, Guthfrith, was buried as a Christian in the Minster. In 934 King Athelstan made the Church a very significant grant of land and in 946 King Eadred presented it with two large bells. Even so, the pagan element among the north-eastern Vikings made York an insecure base for a bishop in the mid to late tenth century.

When the clouds of history rise again we find something altogether new; a line of archbishops, Benedictine monks but of Danish origin, restoring some semblance of order to the Christian life of the city and its Minster. The most distinguished of these were the second Saint Oswald, archbishop from 972 to 992 and Wulfstan from 1003 to 1023. The York of their day had become a largely pagan place, the most thoroughly Viking town of the whole Danelaw. Although none of these new monk-archbishops managed to restore a single monastery to the north they were far from negligible figures: it was the last of their line, Archbishop Ealred, who travelled south on Christmas Day 1066 for a truly momentous engagement...

Next

Copyright © 1998-104 The Dean & Chapter of York, All Rights Reserved HOME

info@yorkminster.org Top of Page ^

ANGLIAN YORK (EOFORWIC) c. AD 400 — c. 866

Prehistoric

Roman

Trade

Craft

Domestic

Dress

Religion

Military

Anglian

Trade

Craft

Domestic

Dress

Military

Viking

Trade

Craft

Domestic

Dress

Religion

Medieval

Trade

Craft

Domestic

Dress

Religion

Post-medieval

Excavations by the confluence of the Rivers Foss and Ouse at Fishergate revealed the remains of an unsuspected Anglian settlement

Little is known about York immediately after the withdrawal of the Roman garrisons from Britain in the early 5th century. There are very few traces of the Anglo-Saxons who we know settled in the area during the 5th and 6th centuries. This remains a challenge for the York Archaeological Trust in the future.

Our work has led, however, to a greater understanding of the later Anglian period. Documents show that York was important enough for King Edwin of Northumbria to be baptised here in 627, and by the 8th century the city had a reputation throughout western Europe for learning and scholarship. Despite this, we found little real evidence from this period until the mid 1980s when we discovered 7th–9th century buildings near the River Foss in Fishergate, well outside the Roman centre, and at last the lost centuries began to unfold.

The magnificent 8th century helmet found at Coppergate

Prehistoric

Roman

Trade Craft
Domestic
Dress
Religion
Military

Anglian

Trade Craft
Domestic
Dress
Military

Viking

Trade Craft
Domestic
Dress
Religion

Medieval

Trade Craft
Domestic
Dress
Religion

Post-medieval

VIKING YORK (JORVIK) c. AD 866 — c. 1067

The Viking Dig: excavations in progress in Coppergate

The Vikings captured the city in 866 and there soon followed a tremendous boom in urban development. Although antiquarian discoveries of the 19th and early 20th century had hinted at the richness of the surviving archaeological record, it wasn't until 1972 that its full potential was recognised. Excavations by the Trust, first in Pavement and subsequently in Coppergate, uncovered material which attracted international interest and the so-called Viking Dig brought thousands of visitors to York to see the excavations taking place.

Part of Viking Age Coppergate was revealed in all its detail — timber houses, workshops, fences, animal pens, privies, pits and wells. Objects indicated extensive international trade and highly skilled crafts and technologies. Wood, leather, textiles, and plant and animal remains, which do not normally survive, were recovered in great quantities, along with pottery, metalwork, bone, antler and all the debris of everyday life.

A Viking family around the fire as reproduced in the Jorvik Viking Centre

Florilegium Urbanum

Introduction | Community | Economy | Government | Lifecycle

The INTRODUCTION presents perspectives on English towns and cities by commentators at different periods, and features in particular FitzStephen's "Description of London".

Introductory essay

The vast majority of the primary sources that bear witness to medieval English towns and the lives of the men and women who resided in them each focus on some particular aspect or event. General descriptions of any individual towns are rare, as are surveys or reviews of English towns generally. We do possess a few examples of these, however, and three are given here. Two happen to be roughly contemporary with each other, from the period when we are just beginning to see boroughs emerging as distinctive entities in the social and economic fabric. Furthermore, they present contrasting viewpoints on urban society: one pro, one con. The third comes at the close of the Middle Ages.

An imaginary town, in idyllic rural setting, with typical features: riverside location;

enclosing wall with gates controlling the main entrances/exits; high street, connecting to a bridge across the river;
parish church; the square on the left side may even represent a marketplace. From the Book of Hours of Henry Beauchamp,
Duke of Warwick (before 1446).

For the earlier pair we have two monks to thank – not surprisingly, given the limitations of literacy in that period. They are unlikely to have ever had contact with one another, but each gives us a lively and entertaining perspective on English towns of the late twelfth century. The third description comes from an outsider, probably a member of a diplomatic embassy sent by Venice to London.

The lesser-known of the monks, both today and in the Middle Ages, is Richard de Devizes, a monk of St. Swithun's, the priory of Winchester's cathedral. He was presumably born at the place from which derives his surname, a small town in Wiltshire some 35 miles northwest of Winchester and, again presumably as a monk at Winchester throughout his adult life, may well not ever have travelled beyond that part of the country. Nonetheless, Winchester was an important city at that time and attracted visitors from all parts, and Richard doubtless heard news, rumours and opinions about various English towns – many of his criticisms have the tone of put-downs of the type communicated in casual conversation. Richard's brief critique of English towns is outside of the mainstream of the theme of his chronicle, and it reflects both a measure of scorn for urban society that would have been echoed by many monks (except perhaps for those of more worldly tastes) and yet an affection for his own adopted home-town.

The better-known writer is William FitzStephen, who prefaced his biography of Thomas Becket with a depiction of London during the reign of Henry II. FitzStephen, according to his own claim, served Becket both in the latter's role of chancellor, by preparing legal documents and assisting in the hearing of petitions, and in his role of archbishop, as a chaplain. He likewise claimed to be one of the three clerics who did not desert Becket during his assassination (1170). Despite or perhaps because of this, he seems to have won the favour of Henry II (whom he avoided blaming in his account of the murder), if he is the same William FitzStephen who in 1171 was appointed sheriff of Gloucestershire and later (from 1176) served as an itinerant royal justice; of that identification we cannot be certain. The biography was written at some point in the ten or twelve years following Becket's death.

The reason for a description of London preceding the biography of Becket was, ostensibly, that Becket was – like FitzStephen himself – a Londoner, being the son of Gilbert Becket, a Rouen merchant who settled in London and became an important enough citizen to serve as a sheriff of the city. Yet it is less Becket's association with the city and more FitzStephen's own that comes through in the description, which could easily stand by itself – and so, stripped of the biography, it does in some surviving versions, including one incorporated into London's Liber Custumarum. He provides us with a look at London through rose-tinted glasses, for his remembrances of the city are largely those of exuberant youth, full of wonder at metropolitan life, and eager to enjoy its pleasures. Although he does talk in general terms about aspects of the city, he also focuses on particular places, particular events – doubtless calling up the features that most embedded themselves in his memory.

It is easy to be tempted today, given the relative ease and luxuries of twenty-first century living and working conditions, to view life in medieval towns as dirty, harsh, unpleasant, and short. We must remember that this is only a perspective, albeit one not without some merit. It has an advocate in Richard de Devizes, if in tongue-in-cheek fashion; his harshest words are for London, not only because as England's sole cosmopolitan city it was the biggest den of iniquity, but also because its efforts to create a revolutionary commune in 1191 had filled him with a disgust founded on fear. FitzStephen's perspective is quite different, if naive where Devizes' is cynical; his fondness for London and his high regard for its amenities and its joie de vivre are clear enough. He has little bad to say of London, other than references to its drunks and its vulnerability to fire. His account is a rhapsodic expression of that civic pride which historians must otherwise deduce from more formal or more impersonal echoes.

Yet for all this, and despite some minor flights of rhetoric in which the author tries to display his knowledge of classical authors (a trait common to writers of that time, although the knowledge was often acquired indirectly), FitzStephen's description is credible, as indeed Devizes' chronicle is believed to be, once the satirical elements are taken into account. FitzStephen has not exaggerated for the sake of hyperbole, only for literary effect or on the basis of second-hand information which he accepts unquestioningly. Much of what he speaks about is corroborated from other evidence; the ice jousting, for example, is depicted in a medieval illustration. We can well imagine that he was an eye-witness to most of what he portrays, as well as a participant in the schoolboy debating contests he recounts with some enthusiasm. The description ranges from the macrocosm of the quality of the citizens to the microcosm of the cookshop on the quayside and the Smithfield horse-races, which surely reflect fond memories of the author himself. The popularity of fast-food and racetracks is no modern phenomenon.

This late 15th century woodcut shows skaters engaged in the kinds of activities described by FitzStephen.

There is a good deal we can recognize in FitzStephen's characterization of twelfth-century London society that rings true for city life in the twentieth century, while Devizes' account similarly reflects many of today's prejudices towards the urban setting. Plus ça change...

A description of London

A critique of English towns in the twelfth century

A perspective on English towns in the fifteenth century

main menu

Created: August 18, 2001.

© Stephen Alford, 2001-2003

The COMMUNITY Introduction | Community | Economy | Government | Lifecycle

The COMMUNITY section addresses various aspects of social life: what defined membership in the community and what were its privileges and obligations; social institutions; religious attitudes; communal events and activities (e.g. recreational); antisocial behaviour; and the construction and maintenance of the physical fabric and urban amenities.

The physical fabric

UNDER DEVELOPMENT

Membership

UNDER DEVELOPMENT

Religion

INTRODUCTORY ESSAY (image-heavy page)

Accounts of the churchwardens of St. Mary at Hill

Provision by a gild for employment of a priest

A chaplain commits a worldly sin

Provisions for the parish church and memorial services for the deceased

Appointment of a chantry chaplain

Foundation of the Amyas chantry

Foundation of the Munden chantry

Lollardy at Coventry

Town authorities accused of abetting Lollardy

The fate of heretics

Collecting for charity

Hermits used as agents for public charity

Bequests for pious and charitable purposes

Regulations governing a hospital/almshouse

Rules of St. John's Hospital

Conditions for receiving residents into St. Nicholas' Hospital

Whittington's Charity

Decline in support for hospitals and chantries

Disrespect for religious places

Religious observances of city authorities

The Corpus Christi procession

SEE ALSO:

Register of the Hospital of St. Mary

Testaments of a devout husband and wife

Pious and charitable bequests

Attendance at funerals

Socio-religious gilds

UNDER DEVELOPMENT

Social events

INTRODUCTORY ESSAY

Recreational activities at Coventry

A wrestling competition goes awry

Horse-racing

Prohibition of fencing

A gambling house in which the games are fixed

Gambling and cheating

Restrictions on games

Drinkings by the craft gilds

Participation of craft gilds in processions

Processions on saints' days

Winter ceremonies and festivities

St. George's gild celebrations

Arrangements for royal visits

Ceremonies to receive the king at Coventry

Mummers

Undesirable Christmas customs

Extracts relating to the Corpus Christi play in York

Orders regarding the Corpus Christi pageants

The Corpus Christi pageants at Coventry

Provisions for the Leicester pageants

The Corpus Christi and Pater Noster plays in Beverley

Gild for performing the Pater Noster play at York

Minstrels at Coventry

Minstrels as civil servants

Antisocial behaviour

UNDER DEVELOPMENT

main menu

Created: August 18, 2001.
Last update: March 9, 2004

© Stephen Alford, 2001-2004

The ECONOMY section explores the conduct of commercial and industrial activities, locally, regionally, and internationally, and the regulation of commerce and labour by national and local governments as well as by guilds.

Labour

UNDER DEVELOPMENT

Commerce

UNDER DEVELOPMENT

Tolls and customs

INTRODUCTORY ESSAY

Grant of exemption from tolls

Dispute over the payment of tolls by Londoners at Bury St. Edmunds

Agreement between Nottingham and Derby regarding payment of tolls

Agreement between London and Winchester regarding payment of tolls

Letters testimonial to support a citizen's exemption from toll

Complaints about tolls taken by the Northampton authorities

Usages governing the collection of tolls at Torksey

Customs charged on imports to and exports from London

Customs and regulations related to fish imports into London

Customs charged on imports to and exports from Ipswich

Tolls on imports to Norwich

Tolls collected at the Winchester gates

Grant of murage to Northampton, itemizing the tolls to be collected

Tolls to be collected at Oxford for purposes of murage

Customs levied at Sandwich on imports

Exports to northern Europe, and customs levied thereon at Lynn

Special toll paid by outsiders on imports to Bristol

Prosecution of a toll evader

Steps to combat evasion of tolls

UNDER DEVELOPMENT

main menu

Created: August 18, 2001.

© Stephen Alford, 2001-2003

Florilegium Urbanum

Introduction | Community | Economy | Government | Lifecycle

The GOVERNMENT section examines constitutional development and political activities in towns, and looks at some of the key functions of government: the maintenance of law and order, the protection of the populace, and fiscal administration.

Constitution

INTRODUCTORY ESSAY

Charter granted by Henry I to London

Charter granted by Henry II to Oxford

Charter granted by Henry II to Nottingham

Charter granted by Richard I to Northampton

Charter of the Earl of Chester to Coventry

Grant of farm by a mesne lord

Petition requesting county status be granted by charter

Charter granted by Richard II to York

Grant by Henry VI of charter of incorporation \(extracts\)

Incidental costs involved in obtaining a charter

The fragility of chartered liberties

Customs of Newcastle-upon-Tyne

Recognition by an abbot of the customs of his burgesses

Factors influencing the gradual acquisition of freedoms

Origins of some customs at Leicester

Constitutional provisions at Bridgwater

Customs of Fordwich

A colonial constitution

SEE ALSO:

Account of the setting up of self-government in A.D. 1200

Calendar of usages and customs of Ipswich

Calendar of Norwich customs

Lynn by-laws

Yarmouth by-laws

Ancient usages and customs of the borough of Maldon

Politics

INTRODUCTORY ESSAY

Ideal qualities and behaviour of rulers

Alleged extortionate practices of officials

Misuse of executive office

Offences against authority

Offences against order and authority

Provisions for election of city officers

Electoral procedures and dates

Mayoral and shrieval elections

Mayor-elect requests to be excused from holding office

Issues of concern relating to duties of political participation

Reluctance to do one's duty in accepting office

Electoral reform

Procedures for electing and initiating a new administration

Rules for orderly procedure at elections

Political settlement concerning elections and powers

The mayoralty as a focus for unity and division

A disputed election

Pluralism as an excuse for political conflict

Competitive jurisdictions

Jurisdictional disputes at Reading

Suppression of alleged borough liberties and self-government

The king of Ipswich

Factionalism within the ruling elite

Government by council versus government by executive

Party politics lead to civil disorder

Disputes over elections and electoral methods

SEE ALSO:

Account of the setting up of self-government in A.D. 1200

Oaths of officers and burgesses (Lynn)

Oaths of officers and burgesses (Ipswich)

Crime and justice

INTRODUCTORY ESSAY

Community responsibility for police duties

The role of the wardmoot in policing

Tithingman's oath of office

Requirement to be in frankpledge

Reporting crimes to the authorities

Presentments in the Norwich leet court

Investigations of various crimes

Ordinances for policing the city

Ordinances for preserving law and order

Indictments for felonies before the justices of gaol delivery

Petition to the king against sanctuary rights of a homicide

Crimes investigated by the coroner

Homicides investigated by the coroner

Trial by combat between townsmen

Reforms of judicial procedures

Custom concerning defence through wager of law

Examples of defence through wager of law

Cases illustrating defence by wager of law

London custom for waging law adapted to Norwich

Procedure for conducting an eyre

Articles for investigation by the eyre

Proceedings of the eyre at Oxford

Cases presented before the Norfolk eyre

Accusation of rape

Cases perceived as precedents or illustrating points of law

The arduous legal process

Counter-suits for trespass

Domestic induced to become accomplice to theft

Withernam

Reforms of judicial administration

Complaint of unjust arrest and imprisonment

Prison conditions

Punishment of the pillory

Hanging without due process

Citizen begs forgiveness for a homicide

The legal profession

Unethical behaviour from lawyers

Defence

UNDER DEVELOPMENT

Finance

UNDER DEVELOPMENT

main menu

Created: August 18, 2001.
Last update: March 9, 2004

© Stephen Alford, 2001-2004

The LIFECYCLE section focuses on the individual and aspects of personal life: childhood and education; marriage; careers and the accumulation of worldly goods; health; retirement and death. Women's rights and roles in society are also considered here.

Childhood

UNDER DEVELOPMENT

Adult life: men

UNDER DEVELOPMENT

Adult life: women

UNDER DEVELOPMENT

Health

UNDER DEVELOPMENT

Retirement

INTRODUCTORY ESSAY

Charitable provision for the aged

Grant of a corrody by Cirencester abbey

Corrody granted by De Vaux College to a Salisbury couple

Corrody granted by the Carmelites to a Lynn couple

Terms of employment and pension

Private contract for maintenance in retirement

Disputes over maintenance contracts

Death

INTRODUCTORY ESSAY

Mortal perils in the capital

Death by misadventure

Account of the drafting of a will on death-bed

A nuncupative will overruled

Borough probate of wills and testaments

Complications in the matter of probate

Dispute over bequests

Enquiry into the charge of forgery of a testament

Early wills of townsmen

Will of a wealthy merchant

Wills of different types

The wills and testaments of three London grocers

The wills and testaments of three leading Ipswich men

Last will and testament of a London alderman

Wills of two Southampton mayors

Testaments of a devout husband and wife

Last will and testament of a merchant's widow

Testament of a city-dwelling knight's widow

Pious and charitable bequests

Attendance at funerals

SEE ALSO:

Homicides investigated by the coroner

Proceedings of the eyre at Oxford - Pleas of the Crown

Provisions for the parish church and memorial services for the deceased

Bequests for pious and charitable purposes

Whittington's Charity

main menu

[\[contents\]](#)

Introduction

Although the character of government has been one of the most frequently addressed subjects in the field of the history of later medieval English towns, approaches to this sensitive issue have tended to focus on constitutional development and internal power-struggles between rival factions and classes. I use the term 'sensitive' because the absence of consensus amongst historians derives partly from the fact that interpretations centre on the value-charged concepts of democracy and oligarchy. The earliest studies tend to be the most obviously partisan. Brady, in 1690, set out to justify the closed corporations of his day by tracing their ancestry back to the first royal charters of liberties. Merewether and Stephens fuelled the reform movement of the 1830s by portraying borough governments as democracies thwarted by the device of incorporation at the close of the Middle Ages.

Later interpretations, while conforming to the general historiographical environment emphasising development and transition, continued to diverge widely from one another. As a consequence of his emphasis on the rising influence of the Merchant Guild (as opposed to the diminishing role currently attributed to it) Gross concluded that an originally democratic community came to be dominated by a select group of merchants who monopolised power, a process he described as "the great municipal revolution", albeit a silent and gradual one. Colby simultaneously arrived at much the same conclusion. But within a few years Alice Green, refusing to believe that history could be anything but an upwards progress, reinterpreted the evidence; she described the modification of an originally oligarchic form of government as the result of often forceful assertions by a populace inspired by democratic sentiments (which underlay the realities of practical administration). Even such a scholar as Tait found that the evidence could be made to fit both interpretations. Initially favouring that of Gross and Colby, his study of the rise of the Common Council led him more towards the Green thesis, although he remained skeptical of how truly democratic that institution was.[\[1\]](#)

These disagreements are only partially explicable by pointing to the diverse routes of constitutional development taken by different towns, for even students working on the same individual town have put forward opposing interpretations. Thus, prompted perhaps by Strutt's insistence on the inalienability of community authority, W.G. Benham (to whom the historian is indebted for the publication of a substantial part of Colchester's medieval records) held that "From an unknown period ... Colchester enjoyed local liberty and self-government on singularly democratic lines."[\[2\]](#) Geoffrey Martin, on the other hand, has denied that the popular assembly in Colchester ever had a significant share in power, whilst by the end of the Middle Ages "the governing body wears the look of a self-perpetuating oligarchy with only the sketchiest elements of popular election." [3] Again, Gray and Potter declared that Ipswich and Norwich had unusually democratic constitutions and never became closed corporations, although more careful studies by Weinbaum and Martin emphasised the strictly limited role of the Ipswich community compared to the initiative in the hands of the office-holding body, and Hudson portrayed a transition from democracy to oligarchy in Norwich. [4]

Current orthodoxy, reflected notably in the Oxford History of England and in Colin Platt's work summarising our knowledge of English medieval towns, is that democratic elements held, from the first, little real power in urban government. That government was, rather, controlled by an elite - or a succession of elites, since the sporadic popular upheavals served only to replace one set of rulers with another - characterised by social and economic prominence in the community, for wealth and authority were natural concomitants. These rulers - that is, office-holders - increasingly monopolised ('usurped' would be a more prejudicial term) participatory access to decision-making and eventually evolved into the notorious closed corporation. The opposing view, along the lines laid out by Green, now finds few proponents, although Bridbury has argued that, socially and politically, greater flexibility and accessibility were features of the fifteenth century town, and a recent study of Oxford's town council in that period has stressed the same open character. [5]

Modification of the oligarchic interpretation has also been advocated by Susan Reynolds; while Platt's book may be seen as the summation of an era of research into medieval borough history, Reynolds' cautious and balanced study, appearing in print immediately afterwards, points to the problems on which historians must now focus. She points out that:

The trouble with talking in terms of oligarchy and democracy is that oligarchy is a pejorative word: it traditionally implies not merely government by the few, but selfish government by the few. Modern writers tend to assume that all governments of the few must be selfish. [6]

'Democracy' too conjures up in the modern mind much more than it is likely to have done in the mind of the modern townsman. Green's belief that "if the towns had been called on for a confession of faith, the declaration of a pure and unadulterated freedom would have been in every mouth" [7] is perhaps more reflective of the sentiments of her own time than those of the medieval townsman, although it has some validity for the latter. Practical government, not political philosophy, was their prime concern. If we seek to discover that philosophy from the records they left, it is rarely forthcoming except from inference and deduction.

There are, then, two areas upon which this study proposes to focus. First, whether the terms democracy and oligarchy, although imperfect, are the most satisfactory that we possess to apply to borough government. Effective rule by an elite (not in itself incompatible with democracy) is not so much at issue. But was the behaviour of this elite self-interested, as that of an oligarchy must be? Was it paternalistic, an aristocracy, fitting the expectations of the medieval townsmen themselves? Does the apparent association of wealth with power allow us to use the term plutocracy? Or does the less commonly noticed predominance of the longest-living, most experienced of the leading townsmen in the upper ranks of government suggest that we are dealing with a patriarchy - or, to use Hammer's term, gerontocracy?[8] Secondly, whether constitutional theory harmonised with the realities of day-to-day government, whether they developed along the same lines, at the same rate, or whether a divergence between the two may help to explain the contradictory interpretations that have plagued the historiography of this field.

It is intended to approach these questions through an examination of the governmental systems of several East Anglian towns: in Norfolk, (King's) Lynn, Norwich, and Great Yarmouth; in Suffolk, Ipswich; and in Essex, Colchester and Maldon. This examination will rely chiefly on prosopographical analysis of the group of men who held the more important borough offices between the reigns of Edward I (in which period the regular keeping of borough records becomes widely established[9]) and Henry VI. Biographical data on almost 1300 office-holders has been compiled. It is not suggested that prosopography is the only nor necessarily the best approach. Yet, if justification were elicited, it might be noted that government is essentially the making of decisions and enforcing of the same via the exercise of power, and that both processes are strongly influenced by the human factor. As Meyer noted: "the folk of the later Middle Ages, like those of today, were governed by men and not laws, despite legal or political pronouncements." [10] If borough government never managed to measure up to the high standards expected of it - as complaints of the time suggest - or if it mutated from its originally intended form to another, the fault may lie with human behaviour as much as weaknesses inherent in the administrative machinery. With that in mind, this study will use simple prosopographical statistics [11] and individual biographical examples to throw light on six particular topics:

- the relationship of office to wealth and social position;
- the degree of monopolisation of power by an artificially small percentage of the population;
- attitudes suggesting the desirability or undesirability of office-holding;
- the extent of professionalism in administration;
- the quality of government; and
- the nature of urban power-struggles.

Prosopography has its own particular problems, as well as sharing others common to all types of research. Perhaps the most grievous is the lack of information. Richards, having entered biographical accounts of eminent local men of religion into his history of Lynn, desired to do the same for laymen, but lamented: "alas! we look and search for them in vain: hardly can one be found whose name deserves to be recorded, or remembered by posterity." Even the better-informed May McKisack, in her study of parliamentary burgesses, complained that of a large number: "There is little to be said of them as individuals, for most of them have left no memorial save a few sparse references." [12] Others have been more optimistic, preferring to emphasise the information we still have, rather than that now lost or never recorded. [13]

As regards the compilation of lists of officials, this has been achieved, for those towns addressed by this study, with few gaps during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries; only for the reign of Edward I are data unsatisfactory. Although few townsmen figure so prominently in the records as to permit the reconstruction of whole lives and careers with some confidence, enough may be learned to render a good majority susceptible to statistical analysis relating to most questions posed by this study.[14] Of 843 office-holders identified from the three principal towns researched, only 3% yield no more information than their tenure of office.[15] However, because records tend to focus on the affairs of the wealthier townsmen, it is rarely possible to examine more than one side of the coin: that section of the urban community generally described as the oligarchy.

One or two specialised problems must be noted. By the fourteenth century the hereditary surname was fairly common in towns and long enough established to be no longer a reliable indicator of occupation, parentage, or place of birth;[16] indeed, there is ample evidence to show that they were highly misleading in this respect. Some surnames continued to fluctuate during the later Middle Ages, obscuring pedigrees, whilst not a few men went by more than one surname: for example, John Ashenden of Lynn was occasionally called not only by his occupational surname of Brouster, but also by the name of Taylour (although there is no evidence for his participation in the craft); and William de Causton of Ipswich was also known as le Clerk and as Hering. The greater the amount of biographical data collected, the greater the chance of making these identifications, not always explicit in the documents. This, it is hoped, is the case with the individuals falling under this study; but it cannot be ruled out that information has been missed because of a failure to make an identification, or that two office-holders included in analysis might in fact be a single person under different surnames.

More difficult to distinguish from each other are different men of the same name, a problem intensified by the very common occurrence of a limited number of Christian names in this period, and the tendency to name children after other members of the family. An extreme case: in 1331 Thomas de Debenham, in claiming before Ipswich court a hereditary right to three shops, revealed that he was the sole survivor of seven brothers, five of whom had been named John![17] For further instance, the name Henry Bosse may be found in frequent occupation of Colchester offices between 1357 and 1433; this resolves into three individuals, but where the career of each ends and begins is a matter for speculation, for none has left a will. The same may be said of the two Geoffrey Starlings of Ipswich, whose careers overlap in the 1370s. It may be appreciated, therefore, that when the researcher is faced by a John Clerk or a John Smith, he is inclined to despair at ever disentangling the numerous individuals of those names, or determining if there is any family relationship with others of the same surname. The John Clerk who was bailiff of Colchester in 1373 was probably the merchant of that name, but he may have been one of the others who entered the franchise as "king's retainer" (1350/1) or weaver (1354). There is a list of candidates for the John Smith who sat in parliament for Ipswich in the 1440s: John Smith chandler, John Smith fuller, John Smith barker, John Smith atte Cay merchant, John Smith atte Cross, John Smith junior mercer, John Smith of Stoke, John Smith "recently of Akenham", and others all living in Ipswich during the reign of Henry VI. Given these uncertainties, one cannot expect precision from statistical analysis.

This study has even more serious limitations. No definitive conclusions on the underlying theme of the character of borough government can be drawn from a few case-studies; but to investigate every town, or at least every major town, in the depth required would involve a vast amount of time. As far as this work is concerned, the records pertaining to Lynn, Ipswich, and Colchester have been carefully searched and their fruits have been the foundation of the study. Varying degrees of work have been done on Great Yarmouth, Norwich and Maldon: the Yarmouth records have been sampled, but much information has been gathered from secondary sources; the Maldon records, although not plentiful, have all been read through, but secondary material on the town is scarce; time has permitted Norwich records to be consulted only in their printed version and office-holders have not been studied individually. The history of each one of these towns has benefited from the attentions of scholars, both antiquarian and modern. Prosopographical data relating to prominent townsmen has been compiled and used effectively by several of the more recent studies.[18] Where this study hopes to profit is not merely from concentrating on particular aspects of urban administration (as opposed to attempting the overview found in pioneering researches), but also from comparison. The towns under investigation, all in the prosperous and populous eastern part of the country, all with strong links to maritime trade, existed in a broadly common economic environment. Some problems in administrative and political development were also common, others the product of peculiar circumstances, and the solutions were likewise. By contrasting these towns we may perhaps learn something that is not easily perceived from isolated studies.

A further limitation has been the grades of officials studied. The permanent officials of the bureaucracy - clerks, sergeants and minor officers - whose annual election disguises reappointment, and who had no voice in decision-making, have not come under scrutiny. The personnel of the town councils have not been directly analysed either, due to the infrequent recording of memberships in most of those towns studied. However, in effect, a large proportion of the councillors will be found to fall under the categories that have been analysed. These include the most commonly studied groups: the executive (mayors and bailiffs) and parliamentary burgesses. The latter are not town rulers per se, but the importance of their role to the town they represented makes worthwhile an examination of their relationship (supposing there to be such) to the urban ruling class; henceforth they will be referred to, for brevity's sake, as M.P.s, although this term is not to be thought of with its modern connotations but purely meaning a representative of a constituency at a single meeting of parliament. In addition, partly to enlarge the size of the group, partly in an attempt to deal with a broader social range than has been investigated by others, this study encompasses other important elected officers: financial officers (from those five towns whose personnel have been analysed) and also the coroners of Ipswich.[19] The Colchester records suggest a justification for this selection of offices. There, two elections were held annually: bailiffs, town council and chamberlains were elected in early September; other officers were not so vital to the government and their election was left until just after the new administrative year began at Michaelmas.[20]

This study was originally undertaken to fulfill the requirements for the degree of Master of Philosophy at the University of Leicester, 1978-1982. The present text represents an expansion of my thesis, based principally upon work conducted at that time but excluded (largely for reasons of space) from the thesis, yet also with some additions deriving from subsequent research. I benefited greatly, in the course of my original research, from discussions with my Leicester colleague David Wykes and former colleague (from my time at Carleton University, when I was studying the government of medieval Norwich) Rudi Aksim - both involved in prosopographical studies of their own; also with the late Helen Sutermeister of the Norwich Survey. However, my perceptions of borough history were most deeply influenced by my M.Phil. supervisor, Professor Geoffrey Martin. Needless to say, the errors that I do not doubt exist in this study - which is but a way-station on the journey towards a better understanding of borough government - are due entirely to my own failings. A debt of thanks is also owed to the staffs of local and national archives who dealt with my many and sometimes unreasonable demands with much patience and kindness. In particular I think of Mr. David Lee of the Public Record Office and Ms. Susan Maddock, King's Lynn archivist at the Norfolk Record Office, who managed to produce documents for my perusal under the most trying circumstances. Finally, I must acknowledge the kindness of His Grace The Duke of Norfolk, E.M., C.B., C.B.E., M.C., in allowing access to his archives at Arundel Castle.

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

INTRODUCTION

Notes

- 1 C. Gross, The Gild Merchant, (Oxford, 1890), I, 108, 110, 171; C. Colby, "The growth of oligarchy in English towns," E.H.R., V (1890), espec. pp.633-34, 643; A. Green, Town Life in the Fifteenth Century, (London, 1894), espec. II, 221-22, 240, 255; A. Ballard and J. Tait, eds., British Borough Charters 1216-1307, (Cambridge, 1923), lviii; J. Tait, The Medieval English Borough, (Manchester, 1936), 28, 302-03.
- 2 W. Benham, ed., The Oath Book or Red Parchment Book of Colchester, (Colchester, 1907), i-ii; B. Strutt, The Constitutions of the Burgh of Colchester, (Colchester, 1822), ix-x.
- 3 G. Martin, The Story of Colchester, (Colchester, 1959), 36.
- 4 I. Gray and W. Potter, Ipswich School 1400-1950, (Ipswich, 1950), 2; M. Weinbaum, The Incorporation of Boroughs, (Manchester, 1937), 105-06; G. Martin, The Borough and Merchant Community of Ipswich, 1317-1422, (Oxford PhD thesis, 1955), 23; W. Hudson, ed., The Records of the City of Norwich, (Norwich, 1906), I, lx.
- 5 C. Platt, The English Medieval Town, (London, 1976), ch.4; A. Bridbury, Economic Growth: England in the Later Middle Ages, (London, 1962), 55-58; Carl Hammer, "Anatomy of an oligarchy: the Oxford town council in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries," Journal of British Studies, XVIII (1978), 1-27. See also M. Clarke, The Medieval City-State, (Cambridge, 1966), for an interpretation of continental examples, which she summarised as "from democracy, through plutocracy, to oligarchy" (p.50); however, she exhibits some confusion in attempting to reconcile contradictory evidence to this theory.
- 6 S. Reynolds, An Introduction to the History of English Medieval Towns, (Oxford, 1977), 171.
- 7 Green, op.cit., II, 240.
- 8 All of these terms have been used conscientiously by one writer or another, e.g.: E. Glover, King's Lynn 1400-1600, (London M.Phil thesis, 1970), 8; Reynolds, loc.cit.; B. Wilkinson, The Medieval Council of Exeter, (Manchester, 1931), 51; H. Hillen, History of the Borough of King's Lynn, (Norwich, 1907), I, 85-86; Hammer, op.cit., 25.

- 9 Before which, borough records are rather sparse. See G. Martin, "The English borough in the thirteenth century," Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 5th series, XIII (1963), 123-44.
- 10 E. Meyer, "English craft guilds and borough governments of the later Middle Ages," University of Colorado Studies, XVII (1929-30), 417.
- 11 Problems of comparability, lack of detail and incompleteness regarding extant records inhibit the use of statistics to provide more than impressionistic conclusions.
- 12 W. Richards, The History of Lynn, (Lynn, 1812), I, 620; M. McKisack, The Parliamentary Representation of the English Boroughs During the Middle Ages, (Oxford, 1932), 105.
- 13 J. Wedgwood and A. Holt, History of Parliament: Biographies of the Members of the Common House, 1439-1509, (London, 1936), x; R. Britnell, Colchester and the Countryside in the 14th Century, (Cambridge PhD thesis, 1970).
- 14 It is fruitless to speculate on what important information may be lost; the historian must work, cautiously, with what he has. Analyses have not been attempted where the data has been considered insufficient.
- 15 24, of whom 9 were M.P.s and possibly outsiders.
- 16 On this see R. McKinley, Norfolk and Suffolk Surnames in the Middle Ages, (Chichester, 1975), espec. comments on pp.13, 94; Platt, op.cit., 96.
- 17 G.C.R. 5-6 Ed.III m.2r.
- 18 Notably Martin, Borough and Merchant Community of Ipswich; Britnell, op.cit.; A. Saul, Great Yarmouth in the 14th Century, (Oxford PhD thesis, 1975); H. Sutermeister, The Social and Economic History of Medieval Norwich, (L.S.E. PhD thesis, unfinished).
- 19 This is the only town where a reasonably complete list of coroners can be reconstructed.
- 20 The form of years sometimes used in this thesis (e.g. 1341/2) will be understood as referring to the borough administrative year, which ran from Michaelmas to Michaelmas, except in Maldon where it began and ended in January. In Norwich the mayoral year ran from May, although the shrieval year continued to run (as the ballival year) from September. At some time in fifteenth century Ipswich it is possible that the election date of September 8 may also have become the date of assumption of office.

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

CHAPTER 1

The Structure of Borough Government

Introduction: The Architecture of Borough Records

The documents which remain as the principal physical evidence of the organisation by which the medieval borough was administered themselves demonstrate the diversity in administrative structure. The prominence of documents produced by the Merchant Guild among the earliest borough records is witness to the important role of that institution in the formative years of self-government.^[1] In most towns, however, the gild was gradually superseded as the focus of communal identity by the town court, presided over by an executive prepositus elected by the community; the grant of which privilege was the first step towards independence from an executive appointed by an external authority. This court was an amalgam of ancient institutions: the burhgemot, the hundred court, the leet court, and the folk moot or portmanmoot as sometimes known.^[2] At this stage, government and the exercise of legal jurisdiction were much the same thing, so the court was a natural focus for administration. When regularly kept records appear from the boroughs, outside of the gild context, it is usually in the form of court rolls.^[3] Such is the case in Ipswich, Norwich and Yarmouth, where series of court rolls begin in the late thirteenth century, and in the case of Colchester whose 1310/11 roll, although the earliest to survive, is doubtless part of a series begun at an earlier date.

Since the court was not merely a judicial but a general administrative institution, its rolls record more than just legal contests. Documents relating to property transactions, communications from or to outside authorities, accounts of the costs of public services, entrances to the franchise, elections of officers, ordinances, or indeed any memoranda that court or clerk felt worthy of notice, might be enrolled onto the parchment membranes or attached in the shape of schedules. In due course the regular recording of business peripheral to the principal judicial function of the court might produce sub-series. At Ipswich this took the form of entirely separate rolls, which themselves gave rise to a new institution in the petty plea court.^[4] At Yarmouth the separate membranes of each sub-series were attached together in a single annual parent roll.^[5] At Colchester such a process is only barely perceptible in the fifteenth century. Paul Rutledge, Yarmouth's archivist, has argued, on the basis of the pattern of the Yarmouth rolls, that town government there was structured simply and relatively centralised in ballival hands,^[6] but it is difficult to see that this holds any more true for Yarmouth than for Colchester or Ipswich, where the variety of names by which the town hall was known - Tolhouse, aula placitorum, guyhald, moot hall - illustrate its multi-functionalism. Strictly administrative, as opposed to judicial, business took some time to produce its own records, for an appreciation of the difference was slow to impress itself on the minds of the burgesses.[7] But in fifteenth century Ipswich the appearance of the General Court, with its registers and rolls, represents the re-emergence of the old portmanmote freed from its judicial role and dealing with burgess entrances, leases of common soil, ordinances, and general administrative decisions. On the other hand, it should be noted that, in the fourteenth century, material either not strictly relevant to normal court business, or too important to warrant such routine recording, was entered into volumes of memoranda usually begun as custumals or as the result of some significant constitutional event such as the election of a town council in Ipswich in 1309, the Colchester reforms of 1372, or Norwich's acquisition in 1345 of jurisdiction over its castle's formerly independent fee. [8]

However, when we look at the records of Lynn and Maldon a different course of development is indicated. In Lynn judicial administration lay not with the burgesses, but remained the prerogative of the town's founders and overlords, the Bishop of Norwich and the Earl of Arundel and his heirs.[9] The Merchant Gild records that survive - bede roll, morowspeche and congregation rolls, gild accounts et al. - by themselves testify to the continued vigour of that institution throughout the later Middle Ages.[10] In the absence of a strong, independent court, a wider spectrum of the community than represented by the gild focused its loyalties on the assembly, in essence a folkmoot. The first regular non-gild records produced by the borough illustrate the workings of the assembly from 1292 to 1320; their title of 'tallage rolls' does not adequately reflect their scope, for they record not only the local taxation assessments that were, at this period, the foundation of the borough's budget, but also community expenditures, entrances of freemen, disciplining of transgressors against borough custom, and other memoranda. In place of the court rolls series of Ipswich, Colchester and Yarmouth, Lynn archives boast a series of assembly records, beginning with the tallage rolls, continued by the Red Register, and then by Hall rolls and books, covering the greater part of fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. At the same time, the unusually strong concern with financial matters, in a borough where several important sources of income were in the hands of outsiders, has produced a fine series of chamberlains' accounts.[11] The Norwich administration too was decentralised and we find accounts of financial officers from the 1290s, regular assembly proceedings from the mid-fourteenth century, and a variety of other records.[12]

The growth of independent government in Maldon, as in Lynn, was retarded by the rights of its overlords, notably the Bishop of London. Assessment of the growth is also made difficult by the fact that the passage of time has not been kind to the borough's medieval archives, for even the relatively few surviving documents are in poor shape. To judge from what we have, Maldon's early administration was based on the assembly, meeting as necessary but principally at the January electoral 'court'; records of these meetings begin c.1384.[13] An ordinance of 1389 granting that a court should be held by the community in its own hall is worded as if establishing, rather than confirming, the existence of the Monday plea courts.[14] The more prestigious quarterly General Courts, presumably harking back to the borough's half-hundred jurisdiction tempore Domesday, were acquired at fee farm (with various other privileges) from the Bishop in 1403; it may be significant, therefore that the earliest court roll we possess is of the 1402/3 year.[15]

Since elections of borough officers were the function of the assembly rather than the court-as-tribunal, it is not surprising that lists of officers, fundamental to this study, are better supplied from the records of Lynn, Maldon, and Norwich than from those of Ipswich, Yarmouth and Colchester. In the latter group of towns the student relies heavily on the use of the names of executives as dating devices. It was the general, although not invariable, practice to enter these names at the top of the initial membrane of court rolls alongside the regnal year in the heading; there is some indication that years were popularly thought of in terms of the local officer of the time.[16] At Yarmouth the ballival names headed the various sub-series of the court rolls, whilst chamberlains were also named on the fifteenth century querela membranes. At Ipswich the names of the coroners were usually added to those of the bailiffs, although in the fervour of the reforms of the time the names of the chamberlains replaced the coroners' in the rolls of 1322/3.

Although, as Martin notes, "consular tables do not seem to have been an inevitable or at least a highly-prized feature of early borough records",[17] the situation changes in the fifteenth century. In the context of the development of Ipswich's General Court, the results of annual elections were recorded from at least 1430.[18] The Colchester reforms of 1372 gave impetus to the recording of names of officers, although they were simply tagged on to the court rolls as schedules at first[19] - perhaps from uncertainty as to any more appropriate way of keeping them. Gradually they worked their way into a regular position on the initial membranes of the annual rolls and were supplemented by the barest of commentaries and addition of associated administrative material. Sufficient care was taken to separate these items from the account of the lawhundred, previously the first item entered on the rolls and occurring on the same day as elections, that one is almost given the impression of a sub-series.

It is regrettable that, in the formal records of institutions, intimacy and insight are rarely glimpsed. When something is shown of the actual process of decision-making, of voting procedures, of reasoning, debate and dissent, it is like a voice from the wilderness. And when the records inform us, for example, that the 'whole community' elected an officer, passed an ordinance, or made some other decision, we are not expected to take the statement literally; what is being recorded is the legitimacy of the action taken, by declaring its source of authority, and the binding nature of the action, thereby, on all members of the community.

next

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

Created: July 30, 1998

© Stephen Alford, 1998-2003

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 1

The Structure of Borough Government

Notes (1)

- 1 Martin, "English borough in the thirteenth century," 131. To this subject we shall return later.
- 2 Precise origins of the borough court are still somewhat obscure. See M. Bateson, Borough Customs, Selden Society, XVIII (1904), xii-xiii, XXI (1906), cxlv-cxlvii; Tait, op.cit., 30-64; Reynolds, op.cit., 92-96.
- 3 Martin, "English borough in the thirteenth century," 129-30, 132.
- 4 G. Martin, The Early Court Rolls of the Borough of Ipswich, (Leicester, 1954), 17.
- 5 P. Rutledge, Handlist of the Archives of Great Yarmouth Corporation, (1965), 6.
- 6 P. Rutledge, The Court Rolls of Great Yarmouth, (1963), 5.
- 7 Martin, Borough and Merchant Community of Ipswich, 139.
- 8 Ibid., 49; Records of Norwich, I, xliii.
- 9 With the exceptions of the husting court, control of which was disputed, and the leet court farmed from the Bishop from 1309; see chapter 7. Arundel's influence was primarily restricted to the port (Arundel Castle Ms. MD 1472).
- 10 Most of these documents are still in King's Lynn archives; a few are in Arundel Castle archives. Gross, op.cit., II, 151-70, prints extracts; others have been preserved through Richards, op.cit., I, 450-66. The bede roll may be found in R. Howlett, "The early bede roll of the Merchant's Guild at Lynn," Norfolk Antiquarian Miscellany, 2nd series, pt.3 (1908), 29-79. The first extant morowspeche rolls, from the 1240's (Arundel Castle Ms. MD 426) are among the very earliest original borough documents.
- 11 Commencing in fact not in the KL/C39 series, but with the account of 1297/8 (KL/C37/2) stored among the tallage rolls.

- 12 See W. Hudson and J. Tingey, Revised Catalogue of the Records of the City of Norwich, (Norwich, 1898).
- 13 D/B 3/1/1; precise dating is prevented by the fact that at least one folio is missing from the beginning of this book. Evidence for earlier administration will be discussed later.
- 14 Ibid. f.5r.
- 15 Tait, op.cit., 48-49; D/B 3/1/3 f.6; D/B 3/3/1.
- 16 See, for example, Cal. Anc. Deeds, III, 8; P.P.R. 31-32 Ed.I m.15r.
- 17 Martin, "English borough in the thirteenth century," 141.
- 18 In a volume not now extant, but preserved for us by N. Bacon, The Annalls of Ipswiche, (1654, ed. W. Richardson in 1884). His lists are mostly accurate, as far as can be confirmed from independent evidence.
- 19 At Maldon too schedules containing lists of elected officers were attached to several court rolls, and may have been the source from which the lists in the assembly books were copied.
- 20 Surveys may be found in L. Gomme, Index of Municipal Offices, (London, 1879), and J. Round, "Municipal offices: Colchester," The Antiquary, XII (1885), 188-92, 240-45, XIII (1886), 28-30.
- 21 See M. Beresford, New Towns of the Middle Ages, (London, 1967), 218-19 for a modern evaluation of the role of the guild.
- 22 A. Ballard, ed., British Borough Charters, 1042-1216, (Cambridge, 1913), lxxxviii, cii, 206-07. See later regarding Norwich and Lynn.
- 23 Pipe Roll Society, XXXVII (1915), 129; G. Rickword, "'Haymesokne' in Colchester," Trans. E.A.S., XIV (1915-17), 143; G. Martin, Colchester: Official Guide, 4th ed., (Colchester, 1973), 81.
- 24 H. Swinden, The History and Antiquities of the Ancient Burgh of Great Yarmouth, (Norwich, 1772), 21; Pipe Roll Society, new series, XXXI (1955), 111; Rutledge, Court Rolls of Great Yarmouth, 3.
- 25 Cal. Anc. Deeds, III, 8; Curia Regis Rolls, 1210-12, 311; C.Cl.R 1204-24, 147; Abbreviatio Placitorum temp. Ric.I-Ed.II, 92. Martin, Borough and Merchant Community of Ipswich, 156-58; N. Scarfe, The Suffolk Landscape, (London, 1972), 101-03.

26 See Tait, op.cit., 188-90, for discussion as to whether election of reeves was sometimes obtained before grant of fee farm.

27 This account, found in several copies of the Little Domesday books, is published in Gross, op.cit., II, 115-23.

28 J. Ecclestone, The Rise of Great Yarmouth, (Norwich, 1959), 39; Rutledge, Court Rolls of Great Yarmouth, 11. Saul, op.cit., 7 was a little uncertain, noting the different numbers of bailiffs listed in royal records on various occasions (Curia Regis Rolls, 1207-09, 168, 1225-26, 347; C.Cl.R. 1234-37, 12), but the 8 named in 1208 probably represent the executives of two years or perhaps a mix of Yarmouth bailiffs and those appointed by the Cinque Ports at the time of the herring fair (if we may judge from surnames). The association of four bailiffs with four leets should not be pressed too far; there is no evidence of direct representation. Colchester, Ipswich and Norwich also were divided into four leets or wards; in Norwich this reflected separate settlements made between sixth and eleventh centuries; in the other two, town ward boundaries paid little attention to topographic history, parish boundaries, or the lines of town walls. S. Alsford, Influences Upon the Development of Urban Administration in Medieval Norwich, (Carleton Hon.B.A. thesis, 1977), 33-41, 53-57; Black Domesday, f.70; E. Cutts, Colchester, 2nd ed., (London, 1889), 96-98; P. Morant, The History and Antiquities of Colchester, (London, 1768), 94.

29 The two terms, different names for the same office, are used here only for the effect of distinguishing pre- and post-charter governments.

30 F. Blomefield, An Essay Towards a Topographical History of the County of Norfolk, (London, 1806), III, 43. The supporting evidence of Hudson, Records of Norwich, I, xxv, is inconclusive.

31 Ballard, op.cit., 196, 230, 244; Records of Norwich, I, xxvii, 13; Rutledge, Court Rolls of Great Yarmouth, 3, (followed by Saul, op.cit., 7-8).

32 C.P.R. 1272-81, 204; Saul, op.cit., 8; Swinden, op.cit., 219-21. We must make some allowance for local officials replying to writs in the terms by which addressed.

33 Ballard, op.cit., 226, 246; R.R. 22-23 Ed.III m.3d.

34 Gross, op.cit., II, 116; C.Ch.R. 1300-26, 344.

35 W. Petchey, The Borough of Maldon, Essex, 1500-1688, (Leicester PhD thesis, 1972), 323-24, map 3; D/B 3/3/10 m.4r.

36 On the origins of Lynn, see V. Parker, The Making of King's Lynn, (London, 1971), ch.1; H. Clarke and A. Carter, Excavations in King's Lynn, 1963-70, (1977), ch.7; H. Saunders, ed., The First Register of Norwich Cathedral Priory, (1939), 50-52, 70-72, from which we learn (pp.30-32) that the Bishop founded St. Nicholas' at Yarmouth (at that time dominated by Cinque Ports fishermen) shortly before St. Margaret's at Lynn.

37 Medieval boundaries unknown, but approximate locations are not difficult to distinguish.

38 Petchey, op.cit., 160, 324.

39 D/B 3/1/3 f.38; D/B 3/1/1 f.2; D/B 3/3/11 m.3d; C.F.R. 1356-68, 92.

40 Curia Regis Rolls, 1201-03, 151. This jurisdiction stems from a grant of William Rufus, thus pre-dating the Bishop's interest; C.P.R. 1327-30, 20.

41 Parker, op.cit., 143.

42 C47/43/255; Arundel Castle Ms. MD 1477; KL/C10/2 ff.117-18. We cannot discount the propaganda aspect of these accounts, stressing the powers of the alderman in a period of political upheaval, nor the distortion of tradition over time - some statements are highly suspect.

43 Ballard, op.cit., 190.

44 C. Parkin, A Topographical History of Freebridge Hundred, (Lynn, 1772), 121; Howlett, "Early bede roll of Lynn," 42; There is no good reason to think this roll was begun in 1204.

45 H. Le Strange made this suggestion in a paper, "Early mayors of Lynn," Norfolk Archaeology, XII (1895), 229-33, which otherwise casts little light on the problem. A gradual growth in the power of an informal mayoralty is also seen in Exeter, Lincoln and Gloucester; Wilkinson, op.cit., xvi-xvii, xx; D. Duke, Lincoln: the Growth of a Medieval Town, (Cambridge, 1974), 19; L. Fullbrook-Leggatt, "Medieval Gloucester," Transactions of the Bristol and Gloucestershire Archaeological Society, LXVII (1946-48), 256-57.

46 C.P.R. 1216-25, 100; see also Parkin, op.cit., 122. Robert is traditionally held to have been Lynn's first mayor; there is absolutely no evidence to support the story, printed by H. Ingleby, The Heart of Lynn, (London, 1925), 31, that Sunolf was first offered the mayoralty but turned it down in favour of his son. It is possible there is a connection between this selection of a local leader and the national insurrection that took place immediately before (1216-17), in which Lynn had some involvement, leading to the king sending a contingent of troops there and work being undertaken on town defences. The order of 1217 implies that the town had a mayor at an earlier time, but we cannot rely on what may simply be royal supposition.

47 Ballard and Tait, op.cit., 32, 362-63, 370; C.Cl.R. 1231-34, 465; C.Ch.R. 1257-1300, 92; KL/C4/4.

48 C.P.R. 1258-72 passim.

49 Richards, op.cit., 388, 393.

50 KL/C4/4; Reynolds, op.cit., 120; Tait, op.cit., 298.

51 Tait, op.cit., 234, 255; Records of Norwich, I, lxi. Ballival duties towards the king were largely taken over by the sheriffs created at the same time as the mayor who, however, was then given additional duties as escheator.

52 Ballard, op.cit., lxxxvii, 246; M. Weinbaum, British Borough Charters 1307-1660, (Cambridge, 1943), 109; Rutledge, Handlist of Yarmouth Archives, 95; Records of Norwich, I, xxiii. Geoffrey Martin's statement (Borough and Merchant Community of Ipswich, 44) that the 1317 charter did not so much reduce numbers as recognise the custom of two bailiffs being two of the coroners is based only on the electoral evidence of 1200 and does not fit with later evidence nor the general theory of the coroner's role.

53 Rutledge, Court Rolls of Great Yarmouth, 3; Saul, op.cit., 18.

54 R. Hunnisett, The Medieval Coroner, (Cambridge, 1961), 93-94; Duke, op.cit., 19; Ballard, op.cit., lxxxvi; Gross, op.cit., II, 117; Records of Norwich, I, 138; T. Twiss, ed., The Black Book of the Admiralty or Monumenta Juridica, II, Rolls Series, no.55, (1873), 51, 56, 152.

55 E.g. I/C5/11/5 m.1r. The link between coroners and chamberlains, as supervisory officers, is also seen at Gloucester.

56 W. Benham, ed., The Red Paper Book of Colchester, (Colchester, 1902), 15; Col.C.R., I, 28, 75; Swinden, op.cit., 136, 495; Saul, op.cit., 31-33, 41; Gross, op.cit., II, 119-20.

57 It is observable from identities of personnel, and was stated explicitly in Lynn (Add.Ms. 37791, f.50), that only freemen might be chamberlains, whereas minor officials were often non-freemen residents.

58 J. Wodderspoon, Memorials of the Ancient Town of Ipswich, (Ipswich, 1850), 128; Gross, op.cit., II, 119; Martin, Borough and Merchant Community of Ipswich, 72.

59 KL/C37/1 m.7r; no mention of them is made in the 1292 tallage roll. Extracts from the mayoral account are preserved in Parkin, op.cit., 125.

60 J. Tingey, ed., The Records of the City of Norwich, (Norwich, 1910), II, xvi, xl; Rutledge, Handlist of Yarmouth Archives, 123; Rutledge, Court Rolls of Great Yarmouth, 12-13; Saul, op.cit., 20. Chamberlains first appear at York in 1289; R. Dobson, ed., York City Chamberlains Account Rolls, (1980), xx.

61 D/B 3/1/1 f.11b; D/B 3/3/8 m.3d.

62 Red Parch. Bk., 37; Y/C18/1 f.9; KL/C9/1 f.18; Petchey, op.cit., 180.

63 Interestingly, at Gloucester it was the stewards, originally performing the duties of coroner, who assumed financial responsibilities in the early fifteenth century and who were later called chamberlains; Fullbrook-Leggatt, op.cit., 254-55, 258-59.

64 Black Domesday, ff.74-75; Martin, Borough and Merchant Community of Ipswich, 72; Twiss, op.cit., 64.

65 Red Parch. Bk., 31-32; Rutledge, Court Rolls of Great Yarmouth, 4. In Beverley too chamberlains arose, in 1382, in the context of popular resistance to the government of the town; A. Leach, ed., Beverley Town Documents, (1900), 7.

66 Records of Norwich, I, 61-62, 194-95; Add.Ms. 37791 f.45; KL/C7/3 f.249b.

67 D/B 3/1/1 ff.22, 33; D/B 3/1/2 ff.9b, 22; D/B 3/1/3 f.28; D/B 3/3/68.

68 Martin, Borough and Merchant Community of Ipswich, 140; G. Martin, "The records of the borough of Ipswich, to 1422," Journal of the Society of Archivists, I, no.4 (1956), 93; Bacon, op.cit., passim; Records of Norwich, I, 72-74, II, xli-xlii; M. Grace, "The chamberlains and treasurers of the city of Norwich, 1293-1835," Norfolk Archaeology, XXV (1935), 182-84; M. Reed, Ipswich in the Seventeenth Century, (Leicester PhD thesis, 1973), 211-15.

69 Red Parch. Bk., 39; Swinden, op.cit., 493.

70 I/C5/11/1 m.1r; Bacon, op.cit., 104; KL/C9/1 f.16; KL/C7/2 f.7; KL/C7/3 f.262b.

next

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 2

The Social and Economic Background of Office-holders

Introduction: Class and Wealth

Charles Gross, contrasting the towns of the Middle Ages with those of his own time, stated that "there were in the former fewer class distinctions, more equality of wealth, and more harmony of interests than there are in the latter."^[1] This may be true in a relative sense, but we ought not assume from it that the medieval urban population was a homogeneous group in which distinctions - of wealth, social status, and interests - between individuals were negligible. The theory of parity, discussed in chapter 1, was an ideal which arose out of probably sincere and church-inspired notions of justice and fair play, and the belief that the prosperity of each townsman depended upon the fortunes of the community as a whole.^[2] But the theory was incompatible with the human urge to exploit the facilities of the town as a centre for the distribution of goods and services. Profiteering, and the free trade which permitted it, could not be separated by mere laws from mercantile ambition; although with the end of the period of economic expansion, replaced by one of instability in trade (from circa the latter part of the fourteenth century),^[3] the merchant class dug in its heels and returned to a self-imposed, and self-interested, protectionism. We have only to look at lists of local or national taxations to appreciate the unequal distribution of wealth. Class differences based on social and economic determinants were present in the borough from Anglo-Saxon times and intensified - or at least became more exaggerated in medieval consciousness - in the later Middle Ages. They proved a destructive force, which Christian ideas of the 'common good' were too vague to counteract.

next

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

Created: July 30, 1998

© Stephen Alford, 1998-2003

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 2

The Social and Economic Background of Office-holders

Occupational Analysis

To determine the extent to which these differences were reflected in the character of borough government, the occupations of the principal governing personnel (as referred to in the introduction) have been analysed.^[4] The object of this analysis is not the usual detailed breakdown into types of product/service, but a more behavioural approach intended to suggest type of activity; it is loosely based on the divisions advocated by John Patten.^[5]

Problems encountered with socio-economic classification of medieval burgesses are basically twofold. The first is that the distinction between craftsmen and merchants, professionals and gentry, or other combinations, is often a fine line in what was a relatively unspecialised economy. This was what Gross really had in mind when he made the statement quoted in the chapter introduction. The medieval burgess of means was likely to be a jack-of-all-trades. He was a farmer, perhaps no more than to the extent of raising crops and livestock for domestic use, but sometimes on a grander scale, holding extensive fields and grazing-lands outside his town. This alone was enough to draw a man into trade, for a surplus of grain, wool, or other fruits of labour had to be marketed locally or exported.^[6] The exporter inevitably imported too; but the merchant was also a tradesman, since goods produced or imported could be retailed for further profit: from shop, market-stall, or tavern. The same holds true of the artisan. The chandler, for example, not only manufactured wax- or tallow-based products, but retailed them and might also himself import the raw materials, financing this by exporting other goods; was he merchant, craftsman, or shop-keeper?^[7] Similarly, taverners were almost always vintners and brewers too. It is impossible to ascertain from existing evidence whether a tavern-owner became increasingly heavily involved in brewing ale and importing wine in order to stock his establishment, or whether a vintner acquired taverns in order to retail his merchandise; most probably the three activities went hand-in-glove. We may note also that the trader often provided his own transportation for his trade goods, in the form of carts and ships. Men such as Robert atte Forde of Colchester, whose commercial experience made them wise in the ways of the world - and (consequently) those of the law court - were sometimes disposed to market their knowledge by acting as attornies,^[8] whilst trained lawyers were not disdainful of investing in mercantile ventures. Thus, for example, John Creeke, attorney in Ipswich court c.1451-67, was also a shop-keeper, and the Gilbert Debenhams who represented

Ipswich in parliament in the 1450s (the father a prominent member of the Suffolk and Essex gentry, and the son a companion of Edward IV) were both involved in exporting cloth.[9]

An unusually well-documented example of the diversity of activities of the medieval burgess is Thomas le Rente, prominent in Ipswich's government c.1297-1321. Besides his activities in local and national (customs) administration, he was a rentier owning (c.1315) 7 messuages and 12 rents in Ipswich and area; he held substantial lands in the local countryside on which he raised sheep and grain; he owned 6 shops, the probable outlets for his victualling activities; and he was a merchant who owned a cart, a ship and a quay, and perhaps began his career as a fisherman.[10] Enough is known of Joseph Elianore of Colchester, although his career is not as detailedly documented, to illustrate a similar breadth of interests: described as a clerk, he frequently acted as attorney in the town court, but his principal source of income seems to have been from landowning; much of this land was arable but he also had a large sheep flock and may therefore have exported wool; there is also evidence of his involvement in tile-making.[11] How should one classify men such as these, who sought a livelihood and profit from any avenue open to them, striving for as much self-sufficiency as there was scope for in the medieval economy. This same theme is seen in the ubiquitous home-brewing activities, the keeping of livestock within the borough, and the leasing of common pastures, meadows, mills, and ditches. The use of factors was a necessary evil; partnerships were largely precautionary measures prompted by the unstable environment of international trade.

The second problem with classification is that its static character fails to reflect the realities of historical development. A few examples, selected from Lynn, will illustrate this. In one of his earliest appearances in the records, in 1378, John White was paid 3 months' carpenter's wages for work on the construction of a barge for the community; by the 1390s he was regularly involved in importing not only timber and other construction materials, but also wax, linen and ashes, in return exporting cloth.[12] Richard Cosyn entered the franchise in 1428 as a dyer; he is found exporting cloth in 1441. Similarly, Simon Baxter was said to be a brewer at his entrance (1449), but a decade later was known as a merchant, exporting primarily barley, malt and ale, but also cloth and hardware, in return for fish; a namesake, probably his son, entered the franchise as a brewer in 1479.[13] A less logical progression is the case of Laurence de Fordham, the first reference to whom (1313) is as a tailor; but by the time he entered the Merchant Guild in 1335 he had acquired his own ship which he used to import wine. [14] "Cobbler" was the description appended to Adam de Walsoken's name when he became a freeman in 1302; plague-stricken in 1349, he described himself in his will as "merchant" - an enhancement of status witnessed by his two mayoral terms, his involvement in the wool trade and the royal administration thereof, and by the substantial borough real estate he had amassed. [15] This progression from tradesman or craftsman to merchant is invariable, when traceable; but the tendency for documentation to focus on mercantile activities and on individuals at the peaks of their careers doubtless obscures the process in many cases.

In the light of the problems noted above, no sensible classificatory system can accommodate every individual neatly within one of its compartments. It is felt therefore that the basic three divisions used here - of mercantile, artisan, and professional services - are not palpably more misleading than a more discriminating division would be. 'Mercantile' is intended to denote those whose primary interest lay in wholesaling or in furnishing retail outlets with materials requiring a minimum of adaptation by the seller before the sale. The evidence has warranted the inclusion - along with men specifically designated merchants[16] - of vintners, mercers, grocers, spicers, and taverners (but not, generally, brewers). By contrast, 'artisan' indicates, whether it be the labour or the product that is sold, a manufacturing service that alters a material from one form to another; commercial activities, if any, being so slight as to suggest them a mere sideline or being necessary only to supply industrial needs. At the other end of the spectrum, 'professional services' indicates the marketing of an expertise (legal, clerical, medical) without the association of a tangible product. A category of merchants/artisans has been added to show the percentage of office-holders who exhibit involvement in both spheres at some time in their lives. Also a category of gentry, men who on the whole do not concern us, being primarily outsiders serving as M.P.s. In allotting individuals to these categories, use of any inflexible yardstick has been eschewed. It has not been considered sufficient to rely solely on designations found in wills or records of franchise entrances; rather, the whole of the available evidence about each person has been weighed before placement in a category.

The results, as shown in table 1, are a little disappointing in that a large number of office-holders remain of unknown occupation. As regards Yarmouth, a more thorough search than the author had time to perform would improve the statistics; but it is doubtful that any reduction could be made in the unknowns of Colchester, Ipswich, and Maldon. Only in Lynn is that category sufficiently small as to pose no serious threat to interpretation. Nonetheless, some tentative conclusions are readily apparent. There is a more marked preponderance of merchants over artisans in Lynn and Yarmouth. In Ipswich and, particularly, Colchester a more even spread of the three main groups in governmental involvement is suggested. Whilst in Maldon the artisans outnumber the merchants.[17] It should be noted that most of the Lynn artisans identified are from the post-plague period, especially the fifteenth century; this could be interpreted as a mitigation of the hold of the merchant class on borough government, but it is just as likely due to the proliferation of borough records and the increasing tendency to specify trades (a reflection of growing class consciousness?). Occupational analysis by period might therefore prove exceptionally misleading.[18] The biases of the records as a whole make it likely that artisans are under-represented in our calculations.

Having made those provisos, however, it may be added that the results of the analysis should not surprise us, for they conform to conclusions that could be drawn from other evidence about the towns in question. The prominence of merchants in Lynn and Yarmouth seems appropriate for towns which were major ports, foci for international trade, customs centres, and occasionally staple towns. At Yarmouth, which at its peak was probably more prosperous than its larger and more important neighbour Norwich, the herring fishery and the role of the carrying trade meant that shipping was a major interest of the wealthier burgesses.[19] Indeed, as the townsmen petitioned the king in 1347 (seeking a reduction in taxation), Yarmouth, being founded on a sandbank, had no arable lands and the townsmen relied entirely on the profits of commerce. As early as 1298 the crown granted Yarmouth a special exemption on its ships being included in tallage assessments.[20] A few of the wealthiest Yarmouth men owned small fleets,[\[21\]](#) but ships were expensive and it was more common to own just one, or to share ownership with fellow-burgesses. At Yarmouth 54 of our office-holders owned at least one ship and 4 others had shares in ships; at Lynn there were 31 owners and 10 joint-owners, at Ipswich the ratio was 21 and 5, at Colchester 7 and 5.

Yarmouth and (even more so) Lynn are also distinguished by the presence of men whose commerce-acquired wealth led them into the field of financial speculation. One thinks particularly of Yarmouth's Robert de Fordele and William Elys. The former hoped to make a profit from arranging, in 1309, to assume £1213 in debts owed by the Count of Holland to various English merchants (including Robert), but spent the rest of his life unsuccessfully trying to recover this money through special tolls on the Count's subjects. Elys, with his trading partner Sir George Felbrigge, farmed Yarmouth's petty customs and subsidies from the crown between 1362 and 1382; his customs activities resulted in his impeachment before parliament in 1376.[\[22\]](#)

Two examples from Lynn are illustrative. Thomas de Melcheburn, with his brother William, built a fortune from huge exports of victuals, made the king indebted to him (in gratitude and in coin) by his many mercantile and other services, and became involved in several syndicates in the 1330s and '40s farming national customs or making a profit from dealing in wool purveyed for the king. John de Wesenham, who began his career as a cutler, similarly became rich from victual exports and won the king's favour through mercantile services; he stepped in to take over the farm of national customs when the Melcheburn syndicate failed to meet its commitments (1345). The careers of Melcheburn and Wesenham parallel again in the attainment of important positions in national economic administration: Thomas as mayor of the Bruges staple (1343-48) and searcher of ships throughout the realm (1345-46), and John as King's Butler (1347-50); and again in involvements with royal purveying and administration of the coinage. They number among the foremost capitalists of medieval England.[\[23\]](#) The lesson learned from the disasters that often befell such financiers, combined with the shrinking economy, resulted in a greater levelling of wealth amongst the merchant class of the later fourteen and fifteenth centuries, so that no fortunes were suddenly made and suddenly lost, and no merchant stood head and shoulders above his fellows.[\[24\]](#)

But these speculators were a small minority. It is clear enough from our figures that merchants were the backbone of the ruling class in all of our towns except Maldon, the smallest and least involved in the network of international trade. None of its officers is known to have owned a large ship and there is little evidence of exporting abroad. Yet even Maldon merchants could run up sizeable debts: John Burgeys owed a total of £26.6.8d in 1412, and £129.6.8d in 1429, mostly to drapers, fishmongers, and ironmongers of London and Essex.[\[25\]](#) Ipswich and Colchester were more important ports (although only the former was a customs centre), but not as close to the coast as Lynn and Yarmouth; it may also be significant that their markets were on land-based routes, whereas those of Lynn and Yarmouth were (originally) adjacent to the ports. Ipswich and Colchester show a very similar occupational division, except for a slightly greater bias towards artisans in Colchester, an early centre of cloth manufacture (notably russet). Of the 33 artisan office-holders, two-thirds were involved in this industry.

Analysis of the trading activities of the office-holders also indicates the prominence of cloth, not only of the export trade but also of the cloth-finishing industries in the town, since cloth was also imported. Of the 67 members of the Colchester group for whom some record of trading activities has survived, 51% dealt (in part) in cloth; of these, 19 are seen specifically in exporting contexts and 6 also in importing contexts. By contrast, at Lynn - where cloth was the most common, though not necessarily the largest, item of trade - of the 233 office-holders whose trading activities are evidenced, 54% dealt in cloth but almost all were exporting.[26] At Ipswich cloth was no less important as an item of trade - 53% of 57 traders handled it - but again primarily as an export item. The artisanal group of office-holders is more diverse than at Colchester, only 29% being in crafts handling cloth.

👉 previous

next 👈

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 2

The Social and Economic Background of Office-holders

The Ruling Class as Plutocracy?

Can we conclude from the predominance of merchants in the ranks of government that those ranks formed a plutocracy? The close connection between power, influence and wealth is suggested by Margery Kempe who wrote, of an attempt c.1432 by prominent Lynn burgesses to lobby for the transformation of St. Nicholas' chapel into a parish church, that

The paryschenys which pursuyd weryn rygth strong & haddyn gret help of lordshyp, & also, the most of alle, thei wer ryche men, worshepful marchawntys, & haddyn gold a-now, which may spede in every nede. [\[27\]](#)

Strikingly similar assumptions are seen in Norwich ordinances of 1449, permitting craftsmen who were likely "be wisdom and good governaunce to growe to habundaunce of wordely godes and likely to ber worshipp and astate in the said cite"[\[28\]](#) to transfer from gilds ineligible for office to others which were eligible; but here note the element of mobility. Again we see the notion in the titles applied to that one of the three urban classes which is always the target for complaints, by the other two, of misgovernment. They were known as the potentiores in Lynn, both in the early fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries, and also as "the rich" in the former period. Those of Norwich were described as "les Riches" c.1326 and as "the more venerable citizens" in 1414.[\[29\]](#) The Colchester reforms of 1372 apparently required that councillors be elected from the wealthiest ("de ceaux que plus out") burgesses, although our towns have nothing to compare with the early requirement in Exeter (1340) that no-one be elected mayor unless he possess lands or rents worth at least £5.[\[30\]](#)

Historians have perhaps a little too readily embraced the interpretation that the principle of the stewardship of the rich, advocated by the church, was the reality which underlay the diverse administrative systems found in different boroughs. In this view, the wealthier townsman dominated the upper ranks of government while the average burgess had little role in administration outside the leet court.[\[31\]](#) This conclusion is indeed hard to avoid. Meyer's analysis of London aldermen 1377-94 and Bristol councillors of 1381 showed a predominance of members of the wealthier gilds. Hammer's study of the Oxford councillors discovered that there was a definite hierarchy of wealth corresponding to the political hierarchy; if certain gilds were better represented in government, it was because their members were wealthier than those of other gilds - fluctuations in the relative fortunes of trade being reflected in changes in the personnel of government.[32]

Analysis of those of the Lynn office-holders who were jurats shows a noticeably higher ratio of merchants than in the office-holding group as a whole: 249 were jurats, 74% of these being merchants, 11% being artisans with mercantile interests, 3% were purely artisans, 2% professionals, 10% unknown. It was in a lower level of government, the financial office, where artisans were more numerous. The same seems to hold in Yarmouth where, of the 10 men designated only by an artisan occupation, 7 served as chamberlain only, while 3 attained the ballivalty.[33] However, we must beware of assuming, without deeper investigation, that because the power-holders were the wealthier townsmen we have a situation whereby towns were governed by a unified merchant class,[34] or that power was monopolised by the rich as their right. For if we condemn government by the rich then we condemn the governments of most historical civilisations.

There were good reasons why office and wealth should have gone hand in hand: office was a liability with heavy financial burdens that not all could bear, nor could the average townsman afford the spare time, away from fields or business, needed to fulfill official duties; whereas part of the daily work of the wealthier merchant or craftsman was performed by deputy.[35] Let us not say that the mantle of power was grasped by the rich, but that it fell on their shoulders. If choice was involved it was perhaps as much a question of opting out as of opting in. John de Whatefeld was by far the richest Ipswich burgess of his time: his tax assessments of 1327 and c.1330 double those of anyone else; one of only three Ipswich men to qualify for a national assembly of "greater wool merchants"; and the owner of considerable property in and around Ipswich. Yet he took ballival office only twice - less frequently than many contemporaries of more modest means.[36] He did not pursue power; he merely did his duty to his community. When we recall that probably a larger proportion of merchants than the records show us began their careers in humbler occupations, we may realize that a more crucial question than whether wealth and power were concomitants is how much mobility there was within the political hierarchy.

Before turning to that question, we must take into account another economic factor which might help us in eliminating some of those officers in the 'unknown' category of our occupational classification: landholding. At Lynn, the most mercantile of our towns, investment in property was correspondingly low; yet sufficient to cause "certain rich men and sufficient having most lands, rents and goods" to refuse to contribute towards a national taxation in 1375, on the grounds that it had been the custom in the past to assess only moveables, not real estate.[37] However, this was probably a relatively small group. For only 10% of the office-holders studied from Lynn is there evidence of investment in urban tenements as a source of rents, or in rural lands as a source of agricultural produce, pasture, or rents. Yet in Ipswich and Colchester more men looked beyond commerce for sources of income: some 30% of our Ipswich group and 50% of the Colchester group had landed interests. In 1341 an Ipswich jury listed sixteen neighbouring villis in which many burgesses of that town held lands, complaining of being assessed (in national taxations) on those lands both in Ipswich and in the vills themselves.[38]

In Colchester particularly, land may be suspected as the principal source of income of some of our 'unknowns'. Many of the Colchester 50% held only the odd field, meadow, grove, or the like in the countryside within a few miles of the borough.[39] The income from such would have been slight - doubtless domestic supplies or market-stall stock was all that was forthcoming. But interest in these lands at least suggests the inadequacy of common rights in the borough fields to fulfill the needs of all individuals; leet court records show burgesses being amerced for overburdening common pastures with their animals.

Of course a large percentage of those in the 'unknown' category is simply the result of inadequate evidence. But there are a number of prominent townsmen for whom evidence is not wanting and yet who still cannot be connected with mercantile pursuits. In 1376, just before entering the ranks of Colchester's administration, William Penne made more secure his tenure of 162 acres of lands and woods in Ardleigh and Elmstead and 84 acres in Thorpe-le-Soken; the income from this source he supplemented by serving as estate administrator for other local landlords.[40] William Buk held a 120-acre estate in West Mersea, as well as property in nearby Great Wigborough, and was involved in sheep-farming before settling in Colchester in 1330. There his interests broadened to include the export of cloth and the retail of wine and ale. However, these trade interests remained linked principally with the products of his estate; he owned several grain-barns near Colchester's port, and in 1362 was investigated (posthumously) on a wool-smuggling charge. Like Penne, he appears to have sold his services to the lord of Langenhoe manor.[41] In 1340 Thomas de Dedham and his first wife bought 75 acres of fields, meadow, and pasture in Dedham, perhaps expanding lands already held there; his second marriage some two years later brought with it the reversion of an even larger estate in Great Oakley, and after this we find him fraternizing with county gentry. The only evidence for an involvement in commerce - debts owed him by a baker, a ship-owner, and two merchants - is inconclusive and not incompatible with the occupation of farmer.[42] Like William Buk, Thomas Godestone was already wealthy in land by the time he entered the franchise (1397), his property centered around his birthplace of Godestone, Surrey. After settling in Colchester he wasted little time in finding a propertied wife. She held three manors within a 10-mile radius of the town, as well as several houses and 48 acres of land within its liberties; much of this she bequeathed to Thomas in 1424. Deed evidence shows him still much involved in property transactions in the last years of his life. Evidence of commercial activities is less conclusive: in 1410 he was trading in small quantities of salt and peas, and towards the end of his life (died c.1431) he was retailing wine and showed interest in having a ship built, a plan which may not have been effected.[43] Administrative work was a more prominent element in his career activities,[44] although his landed interests were probably his main source of income.

Similarities may be seen in the Ipswich cases of Thomas Fastolf and Thomas Denys. The former bequeathed (1452) three manors and other lands in Suffolk and Essex, which one would think to have been more lucrative than his work as attorney in Ipswich. Denys, Fastolf's contemporary and fellow-attorney, held two and a half manors in the countryside west of Ipswich, as well as several properties within the town. Mention might also be made of the Andrew family of Stoke-by-Ipswich, several members of which represented Ipswich in parliament between 1382 and 1449; some pursued legal careers, others branched out into trade, but the lands they held in the neighbourhood of Ipswich gives them the appearance more of gentry than burgesses.[45]

There are no clear trends in investment activities that are general to our towns. Britnell demonstrated a change in the character of the Colchester rulers: in the first half of the fourteenth century their numbers were composed of a mix of landlords, traders, and artisans; but in the second half of the century they were predominantly merchants. Even pre-plague families whose interests lay primarily in land switched their attentions to commerce subsequently. This change he attributed partly to uncertainties about the stability of income from land, but more to the improvement (from the 1360s) of trade prospects.[46] By contrast, Saul's investigations of Yarmouth's leading families indicated relatively low investment in property there before 1349 - and even many of these properties were for commercial use - but heavier investment in the second half of the century in houses and lands (both local and rural) although not in rents.[47] This may be explained by noting that Yarmouth's commerce was at its peak in the former period, whereas much of its mercantile fleet was lost in the '30s and '40s because of piracy and war; in those same decades there were problems with maintaining a navigable harbour, so that the town went into a slump and many survivors of the plague deserted Yarmouth. The fifteenth century is much more difficult to assess because of the introduction, in the late fourteenth century, of devices such as the 'use' and the feoffee syndicate, which mist the glass through which we gaze at property dealings. In fact, through the whole of the Middle Ages it is difficult to know precisely what part of a burgess' income came from land, for there is too little evidence on property values.[48] Local circumstances and individual inclinations combined with the overall economic environment to determine whether a burgess would show more interest in land, commerce, or legal and administrative services, at any given stage in his life. This dabbling, this readiness to seek profit from any opportunity that presented itself, might be interpreted as enterprise or, alternatively, as the caution of not putting all one's eggs in a single basket.

← previous

next →

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

Created: July 30, 1998

© Stephen Alford, 1998-2003

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 2

The Social and Economic Background of Office-holders

The Mercantile Interest

Before leaving the subject of the role of commerce in the development of a ruling class, we must examine whether the dominance of merchants suggested by our occupational analysis indicates the crystallisation of a ruling merchant class in the fourteenth century - particularly in Lynn, where the Merchant Guild remained a vigorous institution. So much so that most students of Lynn's history have claimed that borough government there was little more than the gild under a different name.[\[81\]](#) Only Gross stands out against this view.[\[82\]](#) But then he believed that trade played but a minor role in the thirteenth century borough and that the Merchant Guild therefore had not then reached the height of its power, and he also maintained that thirteenth century borough government was democratic; these views could not (as we have seen) be accepted today without considerable qualification.

The main points in the argument of those who have claimed Lynn's government was controlled by the gild are:

- that the gild alderman was ranked (in lists of jurats and witnesses) second to the mayor, was empowered to take over the mayoralty if the mayor died in office or was prolongedly absent, and chose the key members of the electoral committee;
- gildhall and town hall were one and the same;
- the members of the corporation were all gildsmen;
- the great wealth of the gild inevitably gave it great influence, especially since the corporation and the individual members of the jurats were indebted to it at various times (the gild treasury acting as a sort of bank).

These points are, for the most part, true enough. But they are liable to lead to over-interpretation: Hillen painted a picture of the gild as an ultra-conservative closed elite; Ingleby concluded that non-gildsmen were excluded from any say in town government and that jurats, councillors and M.P.s were chosen by and from the gildsmen; Parker declared that mayor and alderman were the same person and that there was a similar identity of other gild and town officers. All this is patently false. Except in the special circumstances provided for by the constitution, the alderman was almost never elected to the mayoralty, and such pluralism was more unpopular with the incumbent than anyone else, because so burdensome.[\[83\]](#) To the contrary, new aldermen were generally chosen from ex-mayors - so one might as well argue that the corporation controlled the gild! It was almost equally rare for gild scabins to serve simultaneously as borough chamberlains. Although most corporation members were also gildsmen, this was not invariably (and therefore not inevitably) the case, nor should we read anything sinister into it; most of the moderately well-off freemen joined the gild, merchants or no. There is no evidence whatsoever that membership was a pre-requisite for borough office. The pre-requisite was rather membership of the franchise and there is positive evidence that this and gild membership were not synonymous.[84] We have already, in chapter 1, dispelled concerns about the manipulation of elections via electoral committees. The use of the gildhall for assembly meetings was a straightforward rental contract and a logical utilisation of a suitable venue already in existence when Lynn obtained self-government. As for the gild's financial influence, some jurats were indeed occasionally debtors of the gild, but their debts were contracted as gildsmen not as jurats. Analysis of the chamberlains' rolls shows that the corporation was seriously indebted to the gild only in 1372/3 (£73, repaid in 1374/5) and in 1404/5 when the debt became a political issue and was repudiated a few years later by the reform party.[85] In the fourteenth century the corporation generally kept its head above water, whilst in the fifteenth it preferred to remain indebted to individuals rather than cover deficits by borrowing from the gild. In fact the gild treasury was semi-public property, the keys to which were held by alderman and mayor.[86] Apart from the special constitutional role of the alderman, who had been the leader of the community in pre-mayoral times, the gild had no formal role in Lynn's administration[87] and there is no evidence that, as an institution, it influenced corporation policy. Meyer was nearer the truth when he said that the "Gild consciousness was official consciousness." [88] The fact that the corporation was dominated by merchants, who also happened to be gildsmen thereby, produced an inevitable identity of interests of gild and corporation. Whether they were inimical to the interests of the rest of the community remains to be seen.

It is the visibility of the gild in Lynn that excites proponents of the gild-corporation theory; yet it is that very visibility which disproves the theory. Had the two merged then we would almost certainly have lost sight of one or the other. This seems to have been the case in some of our other towns, where the gild as an administrative institution in decline was absorbed by the youthful, expanding corporation. Whereas in Lynn the gild was stronger, in a town where commerce was so vital, and it managed to remain independent. In Norwich records a Merchant Guild is barely seen at all; none of the city's charters grant (or recognise) such a gild and in fact that of 1256 prohibits any gild from being held in the city, although this may have been aimed at craft guilds. Norwich has consequently been used as proof that a Merchant Guild was not an indispensable nucleus of the borough in its early days of independence. However, in 1285 Adam de Toftes, one of the most experienced city leaders (8 times bailiff since 1265), was elected alderman of the Hanse, a reputedly ancient city institution in which we almost certainly see the remnant of the gild, its original functions now largely absorbed by the corporation and itself reduced to protecting the interests of Norwich merchants in external fairs and markets.[89]

This theory is strengthened by the Ipswich evidence of 1200, when alongside the machinery of self-government was created (or confirmed) a gild machinery controlled by alderman and four scabins. All burgesses were given the opportunity to join the gild by making a payment to its hanse. To support its treasury, the gild was given a monopoly on the sale of stoneware; Lynn's gild too had a monopoly on millstones from at least the 1280s. It is interesting that gild officials were all portmen, but we should not make too much of this isolated piece of evidence occurring in extraordinary circumstances, nor of the fact that the courthouse was also the gildhall.[90] Parallelism of gild and corporation is further seen in an apparent division of freemen entrants: forinseci, outsiders who were allowed only the commercial privileges of the franchise, paid their entrance fines to the gild; whereas intrinseci, residents of the town, paid not only to the gild hanse but also a fine to the community.[91] Entrances were apparently recorded in gild documents at first, but in the second half of the thirteenth century were transferred to the court rolls and forinseci were said to pay their fines towards the town fee farm. The diminishing importance of the gild is also suggested by its infrequent appearances in later records. In 1325 it transmuted into the socio-religious gild of Corpus Christi and its subjugation is clearly indicated in that gild officers were required to render annual account before bailiffs and portmen. By 1479 the impression received from surviving evidence is that the gild's principal - perhaps sole - function was to organise an annual feast to which every burgess was obliged to come and to contribute towards the costs; this was a memory of a time when the gild was more intimately connected with the concept of community. In connection with this we may note that in 1446 the alderman and scabins were elected by tota villata. [92]

Yarmouth's gild seems to have followed a similar course. By the time that local records appear, in the late thirteenth century, the gild granted in 1208 had declined into obscurity. There is some indication that its hall, in the marketplace, was used by the corporation; although the principal building of the latter was elsewhere. It is possible that a vestige of the Merchant Gild reappears in the fifteenth century in the guise of the Magna Gilda Sancte Trinitatis of which, by the following century, every councillor was required to be a member, and the alderman was the previous year's bailiff.[93] Circa 1435 it was ordained that all Lynn jurats belong to Corpus Christi gild,[94] whilst in Norwich St. George's gild from 1452 (and possibly the gild of the Annunciation previously) took the same role.[95] None of these were Merchant Guilds, although their memberships had always been elitist. In none of our towns is there evidence that office-holding was restricted to members of a Merchant Gild, as was the case in Southampton and Oxford. The service of the guilds was most valuable rather in the nascent borough, before self-government and while an independent administration was in the process of establishing itself.

There were other less obvious legacies of the gild: as the earliest organisational form in the borough it established a tradition of recording routine business and perhaps too machinery for financial administration (treasury, financial officers, an accounting system) subsequently adopted by the corporation.[96] Perhaps most significantly, the concept of the community (defined by membership acquired through explicit application) as a fellowship of peers with mutual loyalties and obligations is an influence that might be traced from gild to borough franchise.

Yet, whatever embryonic sense of a special mercantile interest may have been engendered by the gild - particularly in Lynn - was enhanced by other institutions. First, by the 'estate of merchants' which arose in the first half of the fourteenth century as a rival to parliament, almost threatening to displace it, but declining after the failure of the English customs syndicates, and merging with the Commons by the end of the century.[97] Second, by the staple organisation that was set up in various English towns in the second half of the fourteenth century, and had police and judicial powers over its membership; although independent of borough corporation jurisdiction, its officers were much the same men who dominated borough government.[98] Both of these institution involved wide geographical associations and created the danger that merchants' loyalties (expressed in freeman's oaths) would be drawn away from local to national community, thereby undermining the integrity of the borough. Thirdly, in Lynn, by the merchant assemblies that developed in the fifteenth century; these were to discuss purely mercantile business and only merchants might be present - perhaps symptomatic of a conceptual (and insidious) differentiation of interests of the merchant 'class' and the town. It may be noted that Lynn's constitutional settlement of 1420 provided that the three keys to the chest containing the common seal be kept one by the mayor, one by a jurat, and the third by a councillor elected by all who were merchants.[99] A mercantile interest would no doubt have existed without these institutions, and we should not impose on them too great an impression of unity, for Lynn merchants were divided into parties according to the countries with which they traded - sometimes these groups clashed. But the fact of institutionalisation may have enhanced the awareness of interests separate from those of the non-mercantile members of the community.

🔍 previous

next 🔍

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 2

The Social and Economic Background of Office-holders

Class Consciousness and the Dignity of Office

Class awareness in the boroughs seems always to have taken a tripartite form, not only in England but in continental towns too. We have noted that the highest of the three classes was described by its attributes of wealth and power. Titles of the other two are not very revealing: mediocres or menes gentz were the middle class,^[100] while the lowest class was the inferiores or poveres gentz. In Lynn the latter were the non-freemen residents, but there is no evidence as to whether this was the case or not in our other towns, although a group of pauperes burgenses is seen in 1086 in Ipswich and Colchester, whilst the Norwich bordarii of that time were former burgesses who had fallen on hard times.^[101] The three classes were not merely a local perception, for the royal government acknowledged their existence too: in 1378 defining the Norwich upper class as citizens with merchandise, chattels, or lands worth £10 or more. The early fifteenth century Colchester ordinances prescribed that the headmen of the electors should possess real estate worth 40s. annually, or goods to the value of £40. And in the same period at Lynn the jurat qualifications are revealed as being possession of a good character and real estate worth 100s. annually.^[102] The same distinction by wealth is suggested in Ipswich in 1452 when the expenses of parliamentary business were assessed on the burgesses, with portmen being assessed at twice the rate of others, and in 1457 when the purchase of a barge was to be made via obligatory contributions of £20 from the bailiffs and portmen and £20 from the remaining burgesses.^[103] Behind the setting of wealth qualifications we see a fear of administration falling into the hands of men not capable of the responsibilities and demands of the task, to the ruin of all.^[104] In an age when little formal education was available to laymen, capability was judged by success in business - the acquisition of wealth.

In this we see the notion of 'sufficiency', a concept as vague as probi homines. It found expression in constitutional powers of executives or councils to reject candidates thought unsuitable for office.^[105] The growing class consciousness, of which conspicuous consumption and the taste for ceremony were symptoms, impressed itself strongly in the belief in the dignity of office. At least as far back as the thirteenth century, to commit an act of violence upon or in the presence of the executive (or even lesser officers) was considered particularly serious; it incurred heavier punishment than normal assault. This may have been partly related to the fact that bailiffs, as officers upholding royal law, were delegated some measure of the privileges of the 'king's peace'. This sacrosanctity came to include verbal attacks on the administration. Public criticism of the character or actions of the town officers was not tolerated, since it was liable to bring disrepute on them. An act of vilification in 1439 resulted in the culprit, Thomas Couper, being expelled from Lynn's Common Council, thrown in prison, and fined 40s. upon release.[\[106\]](#) The poll tax of 1379 assessed mayors at the same rate as knights and the "dom." prefaced to the names of the Ipswich bailiffs of 1284/5 may have been a mark of respect rather than a literal title.[\[107\]](#)

It was certainly in the interests of the ruling class to strengthen the status quo of the social hierarchy. One way of doing this was to introduce liveries: different designs or colours for each grade of the political hierarchy. Care was also taken not to allow persons of undignified occupations to enter the ranks of the ruling class. Bakers, victuallers, taverners, hostelers, and sometimes attornies were disqualified from election as mayor or bailiff in the fifteenth century. The royal statutes prohibiting election of such men may have been a guard against conflict of interest or the use of office to line one's own pockets. But local ordinances confirming them certainly had in mind that there was something distasteful about these occupations. In Colchester most of the occupational titles so banned were prefaced by the word "common", whilst in 1438 hosteler William Wyth of Lynn was permitted to become a jurat on the understanding that he would, within one year, have acquired an honest house where no common hostelry was held.[\[108\]](#) In 1463 Thomas Antyngham was forbidden to take up the office of Common Councillor of Norwich, to which he had been elected, on the grounds that he was a shoemaker. Tingey believed that, until 1449, only mercers had been permitted to hold the Norwich mayoralty; in fact a hosier was mayor in 1415 and a butcher in 1422. To be fair, we must note that in Norwich provision was made in 1449 for persons elected to overcome ineligibilities by transferring from one craft guild to another; John Aubrey butcher took advantage of this, moving to the drapers guild and subsequently becoming an alderman in 1461. In Colchester and Ipswich it was sufficient for victuallers or taverners to abstain from exercise of their businesses during their terms of office.[\[109\]](#) This state of affairs is in marked contrast to the situation we have already noted a century earlier, when someone like victualler and tavern-owner Thomas le Rente could be a dominant force in Ipswich politics for decades.

The dignity of office was in turn applied to the class that provided office-holders, to the point of creating an urban patriciate, a separate estate. The Norwich rulers were described as venerable citizens and gentz destat; 'venerable' was a term also applied to Lynn's mayor, alderman and jurats (although not to councillors); the most prominent of the jurats were known as the "nobiles de banco".[\[110\]](#) An example of the snobbery that this could engender is seen in Margery Kempe, the proud daughter of John de Brunham of Lynn; she felt she had married beneath her, chiding her husband "that sche was comyn of worthy kenred - hym semyd nevyr for to a weddyd hir, for hir fadyr was sum-tyme meyr ... and sythn he was alderman of the hey Gylde of the Trinyte."[\[111\]](#) The constitutional settlements in Lynn and Norwich in the time of Henry V formalised the separation of the ruling class from the rest of the community by a division of powers; in effect, they recognised that the solution to the previous decades of internal conflict was to be achieved not by reconciling interests but by balancing them.

👈 previous

next 👉

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 2

The Social and Economic Background of Office-holders

Notes (1)

1 Gross, op.cit., I, 74.

2 For discussion of the influence of Christian philosophy see S. Thrupp, "Social control in the medieval town," Journal of Economic History, supplement no.1 (1941), 39-52; R. Roover, "The concept of the just price: theory and economic policy," Journal of Economic History, XVIII (1958), 418-34; J. Baldwin, "The medieval merchant before the bar of canon law," Papers of the Michigan Academy of Science, Arts and Letters, XLIV (1959), 287-99.

3 This is of course a generalisation which cannot reflect the subtleties of economic fluctuation. See R. Dobson, "Urban decline in late medieval England," Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 5th series, XXVII (1977), 1-22, for a recent evaluation.

4 Appendix II, table 1.

5 J. Patten, "Urban occupations in pre-industrial England," Transactions of the Institute of British Geographers, new series, II (1977), 296-313; with modifications suggested to me by David Wykes. For an example of the traditional analysis, see Glover, op.cit., 27-28, 210.

6 E. Power, The Wool Trade in English Medieval History, (Oxford, 1941), 3.

7 In my analysis chandlers have been considered artisans unless there is direct evidence of mercantile activity. Corn-chandlers, who are rather called "cornmen" in the sources, have been taken as merchants.

8 Manucaptors and essoining agents may also have had a touch of professionalism.

9 Dogget rolls 17-38 Hen.VI m.7r, 4-5, 5-6 Ed.IV passim; IC/AA2/2 f.261; C.Cl.R. 1461-68, 357; W. Haward, "Gilbert Debenham: a medieval rascal in real life," History, XIII (1929), 305-06.

- 10 E122/50/11; E179/242/40; G.C.R. 8-9 Ed.I m.4r; P.P.R. 32-33 Ed.I m.5r. See S. Alsford, "Thomas le Rente: a medieval town ruler," Proceedings of the Suffolk Institute of Archaeology and History, XXXV (1982), 105-115.
- 11 Stowe Mss. 834 f.64, 841 f.35; Morant, op.cit., 47; Col.C.R., I, passim.
- 12 KL/C39/37; E122/93/31; E122/94/12-14.
- 13 KL/C7/2 f.100; KL/C7/3 f.270b; KL/C7/4 ff.51b, 200; E122/96/35, 40, 41; E122/97/8.
- 14 KL/C5/2 m.8r; Red Red. f.177b; J.I.1/612/2 m.6r; Cal.Inq.Misc. 1307-49, 250, 366-67.
- 15 KL/C37/3 m.1r; KL/Roll of wages; Red Reg. ff.87b-89; C.Cl.R. 1339-41, 167; C.F.R. 1337-47, 155-56.
- 16 Or whose activities indicate them to be so. Unfortunately the title 'merchant' was rather freely applied and on occasion may be deceptive or even undeserved; the evidence is not sufficient to permit further breakdown of the merchant category according to scale of trading activity.
- 17 It is important to bear in mind that these proportions do not mirror those of the urban populations as a whole. Glover's (op.cit., 210) analysis of Lynn entrants to the franchise 1420-51 indicates just over 20% mercantile, whilst almost 50% unknown.
- 18 Although Britnell, op.cit., 477, has demonstrated that in Colchester there was some change of character in the office-holding class after 1349.
- 19 W. Hudson, "Norwich and Yarmouth in 1332: their comparative prosperities," Norfolk Archaeology, XVI (1907), 178-80; N. Gras, The Early English Customs System, (Cambridge, 1918), 115.
- 20 Cal.Inq.Misc. 1348-77, 5; Ballard and Tait, op.cit., 119. As we shall see, the townsmen's claim was not entirely true.
- 21 See Saul, op.cit., 213, and passim for discussions of the role of shipping in Yarmouth's history (summarised in his paper in Bulletin of the Institute of Historical Research, LII (1979), 105-15).
- 22 C.P.R. 1313-30, passim; C.Cl.R. 1307-22, passim; C.F.R. 1356-83, passim; Rot.Parl., II, 327-28; H. Smit, Bronnen tot de Geschiedenis van den handel met Engeland, Schotland en Ierland, 1150-1485, ('S-Gravenhage, 1928), I, 125; N. Kerling, Commercial Relations of Holland and Zeeland with England from the Late 13th Century to the Close of the Middle Ages, (Leiden, 1954), 12-13, 92-93.

- 23 C.P.R. 1327-61, passim; C.Cl.R. 1337-39, 148, 1343-49, passim, 1349-54, 99; C.F.R. 1337-47, passim, 1356-68, 287; KL/C5/2 m.7r. An account of the careers of these men could occupy a chapter in itself. Note that, although an important member, Melcheburn was only titular head of the company, William de la Pole secretly being the controlling force; G. Sayles, "The 'English Company' of 1343," Speculum, VI (1931), passim; T. Lloyd, The English Wool Trade in the Middle Ages, (Cambridge, 1977), 198.
- 24 G. Morey, East Anglian Society in the Fifteenth Century, (London, PhD thesis, 1951), 286.
- 25 C.P.R. 1408-13, 442, 1422-29, 510.
- 26 Linen and canvas being the only significant imported cloths.
- 27 Meech and Allen, op.cit., 59, 373-74.
- 28 Records of Norwich, II, 289-90.
- 29 Add.Ms. 37791 f.58; KL/C4/10; C.P.R. 1301-07, 280; Records of Norwich, I, 61, 66.
- 30 Red Parch. Bk., 33; Wilkinson, op.cit., 33.
- 31 Thrupp, "Social control in the medieval town," 41; Colby, op.cit., 652; Green, op.cit., II, 250-52; Saul, op.cit., 9, 10, 26; Martin, Borough and Merchant Community of Ipswich, 148; Platt, op.cit., 119.
- 32 Meyer, op.cit., XVIII, 420-21; Hammer, op.cit., 12-14.
- 33 Thomas Halle draper, Thomas Carter draper, Thomas Ponde chandler.
- 34 See Reynolds, op.cit., 74-80, 137-39, for criticism of this assumption.
- 35 We shall delve further into these subjects in chapter 4.
- 36 E179/180/6 m.30d; I/C1/2/4; I/C2/25/2; E40/3633, 3819; S. Hervey, ed., Suffolk in 1327. Being a Subsidy Return, (Woodbridge, 1906), 9, 17, 18, 158; J. Davies, "An assembly of wool merchants in 1322," E.H.R., XXXI (1916), 605.
- 37 C.Cl.R. 1374-77, 137.
- 38 E179/180/11 m.16r.
- 39 Holdings in the common fields within or immediately surrounding the walled boroughs and suburbs have not been included in these calculations.

- 40 Feet of Fines, Essex, III, 148, 178, 183; Britnell, op.cit., 499.
- 41 Britnell, op.cit., 120, 352, 440-41, 470; Feet of Fines, Essex, III, 39, 108; C.P.R. 1361-64, 291; Col.C.R., II, passim; Red Parch. Bk., 46, 212.
- 42 Britnell, op.cit., 441-43; Feet of Fines, Essex, III, 54, 63; C.P.R. 1348-50, 79.
- 43 Red Parch. Bk., 85, 106-09; Col.C.R./37 m.31d, /41 m.2d, /45 mm.2r, 39r, /49 m.5r, /56 m.19d; Cal.Anc.Deeds, III, 472; Feet of Fines, Essex, III, 236, 245.
- 44 See chapter 5.
- 45 P.P.R. 21-23 Hen. VI passim; IC/AA2/1 f.152; I/C9/10/1 m.3r; Dogget Roll 5-6 Ed.IV mm.2r, 4r; N.C.C. Jekkys f.2; Wedgwood, History of Parliament: Biographies, 11, 269; C.Cl. R. 1435-41, 47, 107; C.F.R. 1430-37, 331.
- 46 Britnell, op.cit., 437ff., 494-96, 500-01.
- 47 Saul, op.cit., 217-20, 228-30.
- 48 Valuations in inquisitions ad quod damnum are too often estimates, incomplete or erroneous.
- 49 H. Pirenne, Medieval Cities: Their Origins and the Revival of Trade, (Princeton, 1952), ch.5; R. Lopez, "An aristocracy of money in the early Middle Ages," Speculum, XXVIII (1953), 1-43; A. Hibbert, "The origins of the medieval town patriciate," Past and Present, III (1953), no.3, 15-27. See also Reynolds, op.cit., ch.4, and S. Reynolds, "The rulers of London in the twelfth century," History, LVII (1972), 346-47; Tait, op.cit., ch.5.
- 50 On this see Martin, "English borough in the thirteenth century," and M. Clanchy, From Memory to Written Record: England 1066-1307, (London, 1979).
- 51 None of the Norwich mint officials elected in 1243, probably by a local electoral committee of 24 as in 1248, are among the city bailiffs of that period. H. Hall, ed., The Red Book of the Exchequer, (London, 1896), III, 1076; C.Cl.R. 1247-51, 107; W. Hudson, "A revised list of the bailiffs of the city of Norwich," Norfolk Archaeology, XI (1892), 241-46.
- 52 J. Round, "The domesday of Colchester," The Antiquary, V, espec. p.248, VI, espec. p.5; G. Rickword, "Taxations of Colchester, A.D. 1296 and 1301," Trans. E.A.S., IX (1903-05), 146.
- 53 Tait, op.cit., 73-74; Britnell, op.cit., 403-04, 408-12.

54 Reynolds, English Medieval Towns, ix.

55 The Colchester taxations, preserved by Morant, are transcribed in Rot.Parl., I, 228-38, 245-65; that of Ipswich survives as E179/242/40, 42, and has been printed by E. Powell, "The taxation of Ipswich for the Welsh war in 1282," Proceedings of the Suffolk Institute of Archaeology, XII (1906), 137-57.

56 Britnell, op.cit., 446-47; E179/107/12 mm.4r, 4d, 14r; C.P.R. 1313-17, 607; Feet of Fines, Essex, II, 173, 219, 237.

57 Feet of Fines, Essex, II, 105; Red Parch. Bk. 47, 213; Campbell ix, 4; Britnell, op.cit., 452-53.

58 Col.C.R., I, 11-12, 31, 32, 47, IV, 182; Col.C.R./31 m.8d, /41 m.2d; Colch.Ms. 57 ff.179-80; Britnell, op.cit., 448-51.

59 Stowe Mss. 834 f.64, 841 f.35; Morant, op.cit., 47; Col.C.R., I, 9; E179/107/12 m.7r; C.P.R. 1334-38, 382; C143/243/12; C143/245/9.

60 Col.C.R., I, 55, 161.

61 Colch.Ms. 57 ff.26, 239; Col.C.R., I, passim; C.P.R. 1321-24, 389; Cal. Plea Rolls, Exchequer of Jews, II, 235; Britnell, op.cit., 447, 460.

62 C143/245/9; Col.C.R., I, 11-12.

63 Stowe Ms. 841 f.35. The last two Christian names are sufficiently uncommon to warrant this hypothesis.

64 G.C.R. 8-9 Ed.I m.4r; P.P.R. 15-16 Ed.I(b) m.8r, 32-33 Ed.I m.5r; E179/242/40; E122/50/11; C143/147/16; CP25(1)/59/2; CP25(1)/60/27.

65 S. Thrupp, The Merchant Class of Medieval London, 1300-1500, (Michigan, 1948), 121; E179/242/42.

66 E179/242/42; E40/3312; W. Hunt, ed., Two Rentals of the Priory of the Holy Trinity in Ipswich, (Ipswich, 1847), 6, 7; G.C.R. 54-56 Hen.III m.6r, 11-12 Ed.I m.6r.

67 E40/3294, 3417, 3548, 3730, 3848; White Domesday f.70b; Black Domesday ff.77, 86b.

68 E40/3393, 3848, 3852, 3853; Curia Regis Rolls 1187-1201, 314; C.P.R. 1216-25, 480, 485.

69 E40/3283, 3730, 3732, 3776; E179/242/42; C.Cl.R. 1227-31, 239, 407; C.F.R. 1199-

1216, 336, 360; C.P.R. 1225-32, 17.

70 E179/242/42; E40/3919; Curia Regis Rolls 1230-32, 525; Hunt, op.cit., 5; P.P.R. 31-32 Ed.I m.12d; G.C.R. 19-20 Ed.III m.2r.

71 On this see McKinley, op.cit., ch.1.

72 Col.C.R. I, x-xi; S. Moore, ed., Cartularium Monasterii sancti Johannis Baptiste de Colecestria, (London, 1897), II, 505, 671; C.P.R. 1251-53, 453, 463, 1281-92, 445; C.Ch.R. 1257-1300, 55; Abbreviatio Placitorum, 131; Britnell, op.cit., 454-55.

73 Abbreviatio Placitorum, 180; C.P.R. 1225-32, 373; C.Cl.R. 1237-42, 467.

74 Matronymics, though less common than patronymics, are not unknown, e.g. Joseph Elianore, John Aveline, Alexander Margarete. Women had no part in office-holding, but widows sometimes continued to operate their husbands' businesses: Sibyl Flathe, widow of merchant and bailiff Robert Wyth of Yarmouth, is a good example; C.P.R. 1301-07, 98, 319, 1307-13, 302; C.C.W. 1244-1306, 168.

75 C.Cl.R. 1204-24, 235, 1224-27, 86, 94, 1268-72, 119-20, 188, 1288-96, 490; C.Ch.R. 1257-1300, 101, 123; C.P.R. 1216-25, 394, 1258-66, 373, 1266-72, 277, 473, 1281-92, 326, 485; C.I.P.M., I, 361; Curia Regis Rolls 1207-09, 168, 1225-26, 347; Feet of Fines, Norfolk, 1201-15, 37; Cal. Anc. Deeds, I, 511; C. Manning, "Wickhampton church," Norfolk Archaeology, VII (1872), 1-8.

76 C.P.R. 1201-16, 171, 1225-32, 372; Feudal Aids, V, 33, 53; Feet of Fines, Suffolk, 105; E179/180/1; E179/242/42; E40/3668; G.C.R. 39-40 Hen.III m.4r, 54-56 Hen.III m.1r, 16-18 Ed.I m.2r; Hunt, op.cit., 5; Black Domesday ff.77, 78.

77 C.P.R. 1216-25, 373; Arundel Castle Mss. MD 425, 426; H.M.C. 11th Report, appendix, part III, p.235; Le Strange, op.cit., 232.

78 C.P.R. 1216-25, 373; Arundel Castle Mss. MD 425; Curia Regis Rolls 1187-1201, 81; Pipe Roll 12 Hen.II, 22; Howlett, op.cit., 45.

79 KL/C37/1 m.23d; H.M.C. 11th Report, appendix, part III, p.235; Howlett, op.cit., 44, 60; Arundel Castle Ms. MD 426; C.P.R. 1225-32, 293.

80 C.P.R. 1201-16, 61.

next

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 3

The Monopolisation of Office

Introduction: A question of perception

The question of mobility within the political hierarchy, touched upon in the previous chapter, needs to be explored in closer detail. Monopolisation of office by an elite has been a cornerstone in the argument that medieval borough government was oligarchic in character. The records are rarely so explicit as to reveal any conscious policy of monopolisation, despite the restrictive qualifications often placed on candidates for office. Such restrictions might indeed be seen as a manifestation of oligarchy; but they may as easily be interpreted as a desire to have only the most capable men running the administration (which is itself documented) as the expression of oligarchic policy. As most studies of medieval borough history are case-studies of individual towns, errors of judgement are more easily made because of the ambiguity of some evidence; through comparison of evidence from different towns a better perspective can be obtained, with the evidence of each being amenable to interpretation through the insights provided from the combined evidence of all (although this approach too has its pitfalls).

In fact the theory of monopolisation commends itself most to the student upon an initial study of lists of office-holders: browsing through the names, the mind quickly forgets those that appear only once or twice, but remembers those cases in which the same surname appears for several office-holders. The superficiality and dangers of this approach have been hinted at earlier.^[1] Although it is usually the case that common surnames indicate a relationship between individuals, this is not always so. There has already been mention of the problems with surnames of Clerk and Smith, whilst Dyer in Colchester is equally commonplace due to the importance of the cloth-fulling industry there. For further example, the relatively uncommon surname of Joye is shared by two Ipswich office-holders - a John and a Richard - for whom there is no evidence of family relationship, and even reason to doubt a relationship; nor is there any indication that the William Debenham and the Gilbert Debenhams, of the same town, were in any way related. We will not waste space with further examples. Again, it does not follow that a single name in lists of officials necessarily represents a single person. Witness Yarmouth's three William de Oxneyes (1350-1427), its three John Elys' (1335-1400), as well as innumerable Fastolfs and Draytons sharing a limited number of Christian names; witness also Colchester's three Henry Bosses (1357-1433) and four John atte Fordes (1312-1467), Lynn's three John Wesenhams (1336-1431) and three Philip Wyths (1331-78). The glancing eye may discern that the wide time-space over which these, and many other shared names, appear indicates more than a single individual; but only close study of the lists and additional data reveals just how many.

Yet, in the end, monopolisation must be a matter of subjective judgement. Certainly we can distinguish a few men who were in office frequently and for continuous periods; but do we judge the whole by the few? And what yardstick does the historian have to say that an individual is monopolising a certain office if he holds it more than once, or twice, or three times ...?[2] Given this, it will be understood that the interpretation presented here cannot help but be open to challenge as personal opinion.

next

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 3

The Monopolisation of Office

Frequency of Office-holding

Turning first to the executive office, analysis of the executive personnel of Colchester, Ipswich, and Lynn,^[3] indicates that the average number of times mayoral office was held in Lynn was about twice, ballival office in Ipswich a little more than three times, ballival office in Colchester three times. At Lynn the average decreased over the course of the later Middle Ages, at Colchester it increased, at Ipswich it remained about the same; none of the changes is very great. These figures do not appear (to the author) to be excessive, but it must be remembered that averages are artificial statistics. About 45% of the 301 persons subject to this analysis held executive office only once, and they are balanced by a much smaller group whose members held office six, ten, a dozen or more times. There is no discernible pattern and certainly nothing that might suggest that an elite was shuffling around executive office between its component members over the course of the years. Individual inclination appears to be a greater factor in determining the number of times office was held. If we are to search for any elite, then it must be thus: in Lynn those who held executive office 3 or more times form a small group of 25 persons (27% of the Lynn group) who occupied 51% of the office-spaces; at Ipswich those in office 6 or more times form a group of 20 persons (19%) occupying 48% of the spaces; at Colchester those in office 5 or more times were a group of 19 persons (19%) occupying 52% of the spaces. But these statistics are hardly grounds for any charge of conspiracy to monopolise: this 'elite' was distributed over many generations, fairly evenly between the three periods adopted for analysis in Lynn and Ipswich, although at Colchester the members of the 'elite' are markedly more in evidence after 1349. We should bear in mind that Lynn had only a single mayor, whereas there were two executives in each of Colchester and Ipswich. It is therefore interesting that approximately the same number of persons held the executive office in each of these three towns - perhaps hinting that, in these towns of similar population size, there were a limited number of suitable candidates for mayoralty or ballivalty. ^[4] Maldon presents a slightly better case for monopolisation. The list of bailiffs there is complete between 1416 and 1450: 70 office-spaces held by 17 persons, an average of about 4 times each; 6 of these men also held the ballivalty outside this period and, were we to take their whole careers into consideration, the average would be 6 times - conceivably reducible if we knew how many others were executives in the same period. However, in Maldon the choice of candidates was even more limited than in our other towns, partly due to population size, partly to constitutional peculiarities which shall be mentioned later.

Frequency of office-holding was sometimes compounded by pluralism. The case of the Ipswich administration of 1200 has been cited as an example of pluralism and, thereby, a closed corporation[5]: the bailiffs were also coroners, portmen, customs collectors, and clavigers; the other two coroners were also portmen, and one was a claviger; other portmen served also as gild alderman and scabins. We must beware of taking this initial, experimental arrangement as typical of later times or as representative of any philosophy of government. Judging from later evidence, the bailiffs were ex officio members of the town council, as was the case with Lynn's mayor in the fifteenth century and its alderman throughout. In the time of Henry VI it was a deliberate policy that one of Ipswich's bailiffs act as one of the clavigers (with the other usually taking on the escheator's duties) - again this was the case with Lynn's mayor; it was simply part of the system of constitutional checks and balances. The bailiffs were also ex officio customs collectors, in their role as borough accountants. It was not, after 1200, the practice for bailiffs also to be coroners, although it occasionally came about; these exceptions may have constituted a genuine abuse of principle, given the supervisory functions of the coroner, and it is interesting that in 1364 the king ordered that Huntingdon's coroner be replaced on the grounds that he had just been elected bailiff of the borough.[6] There is insufficient information about Ipswich gild officers to ascertain whether they continued to be selected from the portmen; in Lynn, at least, there was a clear separation of the gild and borough offices and in 1469, when alderman Walter Cony was elected mayor, he accepted the office only on his insistence that the doubling of office not set a precedent for future electors to follow.[7]

There are some suspicious cases combining monopolisation and pluralism in Ipswich. Thomas Stace was bailiff during 18 of the 26 years between 1295 and 1321 and was also coroner in one of the years when bailiff, as well as ten times M.P. in the same period. His effective partner in office, Thomas le Rente, was bailiff during 12 of the 24 years between 1297 and 1321, coroner during several other of those years (one when bailiff), and twice M.P. When this pair was thrown out of office in 1321, one of the charges against them was monopolisation via the device of secret elections.[8] Their opponents and successors were little better: John Irp was coroner continuously from 1329 to 1343, yet held the ballivalty 5 times during this period and on 6 other occasions; John de Preston was 12 times bailiff and 14 times coroner between 1325 and 1356, often holding both offices in the same year. At Colchester one John atte Forde was bailiff 8 times and M.P. 5 times (on each occasion returning his own name on the writ of summons) between 1350 and 1375. It is possible that his example was one of the factors prompting the 1372 reforms, after which we find no further examples for a while of men re-elected bailiff in consecutive years. But apart from these few cases there is no evidence of deliberate self-perpetuation in power. This is not to say that it did not occur on other occasions, but we cannot ignore the possibility that lack of suitable (or willing) candidates is sometimes responsible for apparent monopolisation and even pluralism.

It may be suggested that ordinances restricting the frequency of office-holding represent a response to excessive monopolisation; but again there is more than one interpretation that can be given to this evidence. It is not clear whether Colchester's 1372 ordinance, that bailiffs should be changed every year, actually falls into this category or merely emphasises the constitutionality of annual election. Receivers were also to be replaced annually, but only if the community wished to do so. At Ipswich it was specified in 1320 that different men be elected as chamberlains from one year to the next; but, apart from insisting on public elections, no steps were taken to limit the frequency of holding ballival office - not until the ordinances of 1429/30 established a 2-year interval. It may be doubted that such a limitation on ballival office-holding would have suited the underlying ambitions of the reform party leaders. In the complaints of 1414, the Norwich prudeshommes charged that the popular party had maintained William Appleyard in the mayoralty over consecutive years, whereas custom required that there be a 4-year interval between office-holding. This may not reflect the original idea behind the custom, which was once capitula 53 (the main text now missing) of the city custumal and which was probably ordained about the same time as chapter 50, which forbade men elected as bailiff to refuse the office; the interval between offices was perhaps intended to lessen the burden of duty - although had the order of these chapters been reversed, another interpretation might suggest itself. The same reason must lie behind the fact that no man was elected as sheriff - the office with the heavy responsibility of ensuring payment of the fee farm - more than once in his lifetime. A 3-year interval between ballival office was set in Maldon, but not, apparently, until the 1555 charter in the context of creating a closed corporation. Nor is there any regulation to this effect in Yarmouth until 1491, when a 5-year interval was prescribed; the hefty fine for transgressing candidates suggests that, here at least, the target was monopolisation. A 5-year interval is also seen in Lynn, imposed on the mayoralty in 1455, but ordinances of 1358 set a 2-year interval. In the latter case it was clearly specified that the interval was not a prohibition but an exemption in consideration of the burden and expense of office; at the same time chamberlains were permitted a 2-year exemption. This 1358 ordinance, like that (roughly contemporary) which was put into Norwich's custumal prescribing a four-year interval, was similarly associated with penalties set for refusal of office; the Lynn assembly subsequently voided these ordinances (c.1395).[9] On the whole, the evidence suggests that intervals between office-holding were intended as a protection of those liable to be elected rather than a check against monopolisation, at least until the late fifteenth century. As the latter, the setting of intervals would have had little effect anyway, since other offices or a role in the council were generally available to former executives in interim periods.[10]

Parliamentary elections, and re-elections, have attracted the notice of many historians and, although it has been suggested (probably correctly) that they were not as important an issue to medieval townsmen as to modern scholars,[11] we may look at them briefly. But we need not enter into the arguments as to how 're-election' should be defined, nor whether all those who were elected actually attended parliament; it is sufficient here to know which burgesses were considered suitable to represent their boroughs.[12] Again the subject is one in which it is easy to look at lists of M.P.s and then jump to conclusions. McKisack was the main proponent of the theory that experience was a major factor in the choice of M.P.s, as indicated by re-elections and by the prevalence, in the ranks of M.P.s, of men familiar with local administration.[13] Lawson and Roskell went on to conclude that this showed that oligarchic closed corporations were controlling borough elections to ensure that their own selfish interests were represented; Houghton has declared that, tempore Henry VI and Edward IV, the

Yarmouth bailiffs monopolised one of the borough's seats; and Rickword (pre-McKisack) asserted that every Colchester M.P. was selected from the corporation.[14]

Such dogmatic conclusions are not forthcoming from an analysis of the parliamentary personnel of the six towns studied here.[15] In fact the conclusions therefrom are much as those drawn from our analysis of the borough executives. Just over half the M.P.s sat only once, whereas a smaller group of around 10%-20% (a little higher in Colchester) were re-elected several times.[16] In the fourteenth century town clerks were among the burgesses most frequently elected, for parliamentary attendance was generally seen as a routine affair of observing and reporting - a task for which trained clerks were particularly suited - not involving much initiative. One is inclined to suspect that Maldon's William de Pakelesham, who attended 14 parliaments 1332-44 (all but one in which Maldon was represented) may have been town clerk just from this evidence alone. There is no common pattern in the development of this elite of veterans. In some towns there was a lesser, in others a greater, tendency for re-election as the later Middle Ages progressed. From the mid-fourteenth century onwards the majority of M.P.s were indeed men who had previously served at a policy-making level of borough government - natural enough choices, since their familiarity with borough problems, goals, and resources allowed them to be intelligent observers and, if necessary, participants; but this majority was not as high in Ipswich and Yarmouth as in Lynn, Colchester, or Norwich.

There remains a surprisingly large number of M.P.s - mainly in the pre-1349 period, but also visible later - who did not participate in borough administration during their parliamentary 'careers'; most never had any role in borough government. This is only partly explicable by gaps in the records and by the fifteenth century influx of outsiders into borough parliamentary seats. There was probably no consistent policy concerning selection of M.P.s. A careful study might throw light on whether the status of men elected was influenced by the perceived importance (that is, relevance to borough affairs) of the business anticipated or conducted at each parliament. An added complicating factor is that M.P.s sometimes were tasked with the conduct of other town business at the place where a parliament was held, although not necessarily connected with parliamentary matters; this might also influence the selection of a representative (and certainly did in many cases when town clerks were selected). Although present or former bailiffs and mayors were popular choices as M.P.s - as the wealthier townsmen they could better stand the shock of returning from parliament to discover that their boroughs could not pay their expenses! - there is no sign in any of our towns of an arrangement such as that at Northampton; there it was ordained in 1382 that every mayor should serve as M.P. to the parliament next following his mayoralty[17] - again perhaps suggesting the burden of service.

← previous

next →

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

Created: July 30, 1998. Last update: January 26, 1999

© Stephen Alford, 1998-2003

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 3

The Monopolisation of Office

Membership of Town Councils

If it is elites we hunt, it is perhaps the town council that is the natural habitat of our prey. To review the evidence presented in the first chapter: the Ipswich portmen had become a co-optative council by 1309 and a life membership body by then, if not since 1200; two-thirds of the Colchester council were chosen by the other third, although this third was itself popularly elected; the 24's of Norwich and Lynn were officially life membership and effectively co-optative councils from the time of Henry V; Maldon's wardemen were also a life membership (but not co-optative) body by 1444. We may add to this by noting that Yarmouth's upper council was also life membership and co-optative according to the 1491 ordinances.[\[18\]](#) This basic information may be expanded by an analysis of town councils at selected stages in their careers. Norwich's council has not been analysed, but we may bear in mind Hudson's observation that the councils of 1377 and 1379 were almost identical in personnel.[\[19\]](#)

In the twenty years between 1370 and 1390 the composition of the Lynn jurats was the product of experimentation. In 1370 the twelve electors joined the twelve jurats that they elected, and the four chamberlains were added.[\[20\]](#) In 1372 all jurats were elected and none of the electors or chamberlains were among their number. In 1374 the practice of joining twelve electors and twelve jurats was resumed, but chamberlains were omitted, although in 1379 the mayor did select four extra jurats, unidentified but perhaps the chamberlains. In 1393 the system of electors as ex officio jurats was permanently abandoned. That system may perhaps be viewed as a half-way step between indirect election and co-optation. Eighty-three persons were jurats 1370-90, a number large enough to suggest that there was a fair degree of turnover. By contrast, a period of the same length from 1430 to 1450, after the jurats had become a closed body, reveals 57 persons, indicating an average replacement rate of 1.7 persons annually compared to 3 persons annually 1370-90. The turnover rate 1430-40 was 71% and 1440-50 was 45%; the jurats in office in 1430 all disappeared within the next two decades, except for veterans Thomas Burgh (jurat 1424-68), Thomas Salisbury (1424-51), John Saluz (1427-51), and John Waryn (1427-51).

As far as surviving documentation allows us to say, and putting aside the uncertain cases of three mayors elected by the reform party 1411-15, the mayoralty was the preserve of the jurat membership. Certainly this was held to be a borough custom in 1416.[\[21\]](#) The exception which proves the rule is John Urry, elected in 1358; his case is the more curious in that he had entered the franchise only a year before. However, he had evidently been a prominent figure in the community throughout the 1350s, loaning the king 200 marks in 1351, exporting grain, salt, ale, and cloth 1354-55, and attending a Merchant Assembly in 1356. A peer of any jurat, he became one of them immediately following his mayoralty, remaining so until his death in 1361. It may be that, armed as he was with a royal exemption from office, he had resisted earlier attempts to make him a jurat. Adding to the unusual (but illuminating) character of this case is the fact that Urry's friend and business partner, Thomas atte Bek, a man of equal prominence who came to Lynn from Cley-next-the-sea c.1349 as an heir to property bequeathed him by Adam de Walsoken, was in a parallel situation. He entered the franchise on the same day as Urry, acted as chamberlain during Urry's mayoralty, and joined Urry amongst the jurats after this term. He too died in 1361, a few days before Urry, both men doubtless victims of the recurring pestilence.[22] The case of John Urry was therefore no serious deviation from a rule that was well understood, perhaps even written into the constitution, in the fourteenth century custumal rolls which are not extant. Even the reformers of Henry V's time did not try to change this constitutional feature, except to include former jurats among those qualified for election as mayor; this could not have been but an impotent addition, since jurats left that office only through death, deposition (which disqualified them from the mayoralty), or retirement due to old age or infirmity.[23]

The Maldon wardemen have also been analysed over two periods. Between 1401 and 1410 53 men were wardemen, and it is clear that annual election was no mere form, but a reality producing a turnover higher than in the councils of our other towns. But between 1440 and 1450 only 32 persons were wardemen, confirming the picture painted by the 1444 custumal of the wardemen as a life membership body with a similar annual replacement rate to the Lynn jurats of the same period. This change seems to have occurred gradually in the late 1420s and early 1430s and not to have been the result of a deliberate act. Unlike the executives of our other towns, Maldon's bailiffs did not become wardemen after their terms of office.[23] Although 80% of the bailiffs served previously as wardemen, it was more common for bailiffs to be chosen from ex-bailiffs than from wardemen. This separation of bailiffs and wardemen fits with the balance of powers that we have already noted between Maldon's executive and council.

At Colchester 61 persons were members of the town council 1428-48,[25] suggesting that this supposedly democratically elected body was barely more open than the life-membership jurats of Lynn in the reign of Henry VI. Lists of Yarmouth's councillors are scarce, but two are recorded for May and September 1386[26]: 88% of those of May were re-elected in September, suggesting that either the council was already a life-membership body, or that annual election was little more than a formality. Not surprisingly, given that Yarmouth had four bailiffs annually, the council was dominated by ex-bailiffs (50%-63%); in fact, most of the councillors (79%-92%) held the ballivalty at some time in their lives. Certainly by 1491 it was taken for granted that bailiffs would be chosen from the council membership.[27] Complete listings of Ipswich's portmen are also rare. Analysis of the portmen of 1429/30 shows that the group comprised the 2 bailiffs of that year, 5 former bailiffs, 2 former coroners,

1 former M.P., and 2 men not known to have held office previously. The 1459/60 list similarly contains 8 former bailiffs in addition to the pair of that year.[28]

🔍 previous

next 🔍

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 3

The Monopolisation of Office

The Executive Committee

Here at last we begin to catch glimpses of the elite we have sought, in the shape of what might be described as executive committees. The order of names of the Lynn jurats is very carefully recorded in the reign of Henry VI; after the mayor and alderman are listed the nobiles de banco already mentioned, who were in fact the ex-mayors among the jurats. Even in the 1370-90 period we find that certain of the jurats continued in office, annual elections notwithstanding, in most of those years; these were primarily the ex-mayors. It seems to have been recognised that men of such experience ought to be kept in government, and it is likely that their continued presence guaranteed some measure of continuity and stability in borough policy.

Everywhere we find the same. At Colchester the ex-bailiffs tended to number among the 8 aldermen rather than the 16 councillors - this may have been an important factor in making the aldermen the superior branch of the council - and they seem to have been assured of re-election from year to year. They monopolised the ballivalty to a greater extent than Lynn ex-mayors the mayoralty. At least one of each pair of bailiffs (and often both) had served in that office before; of the 24 aldermen/councillors of 1428, 17 had held the ballivalty at some time in their lives. Once again we can appreciate the theoretical efficiency of this arrangement. The Ipswich portman council was much like the elites of ex-executives in Lynn and Colchester, lacking the adjunct of junior members from which future officers might be recruited. An ordinance of 1414 in Norwich specified that the upper council there should be elected from former mayors, sheriffs, and bailiffs (this being only a few years after mayoralty replaced ballivalty as the executive office); in the following year we see that ex-mayors had a recognised place in the political hierarchy, in that they were to participate at major assemblies and on ceremonial occasions dressed in their appropriate livery.^[29] At Maldon the ex-bailiffs, prohibited from entering the wardemen ranks (partly to preserve the integrity of the council), gradually coalesced into a higher council of aldermen from which (from 1555) all bailiffs were to be chosen and into which ex-bailiffs would retire. This group can be seen playing a role in government by 1468 when we find the ordinance, copied from some earlier book of customs, that all ex-bailiffs were required to attend any ballival summons to discuss community business; in fact there is some hint of distinction of the ex-ballival group as early as 1406. Similar executive committees arose, in the fifteenth century, in Oxford, Stamford, and Winchester. In the last, the group was known as "the Bench", reminding us of Lynn's nobiles de banco; to judge from the rare illustrations that survive of council meetings, the name seems to refer to the privileged seating position of these men in the council chamber. [30] A similar hierarchy is reflected in the 1479 illustration of the ceremony of swearing in Bristol's mayor, used as the title illustration of this study.

The evolution of these executive committees may owe much to the judicial powers granted by the king to the executive and a few assistants. These arose out of Commissions of the Peace and local administration of the labour statutes and other police matters in the latter half of the fourteenth century. At Norwich in 1404 the mayor and 4 probi homines were to be J.P.s, and in 1452 this was extended to the recorder and all aldermen who had been mayor.[31] At Ipswich in 1446 bailiffs and 4 portmen chosen by them were to be J.P.s; in practice, those chosen were ex-bailiffs. At the same time escheator's powers were accorded to one of the bailiffs.[32] In the following year Colchester received a similar grant of justices, interpreted locally as commissioning the more sufficient and wiser of the bones gentz; in practice, justices were chosen from the aldermen, a group whose members also filled the local offices of coroners and clavigers as well as that of bailiffs.[33] We can see the rationale in allotting the roles of J.P.s to men experienced in the presidency of local courts and accustomed to the exercise of authority. Yet the effect of endowing an already existing elite of experienced former executives with new powers was to create a magistracy independent of, and rivalling, the traditional borough courts - particularly the leet - which were instruments of communal authority.

🔍 previous

next 🔍

INTRODUCTION

Structure of Borough Government | Social and Economic Background of Office-Holders

Monopolisation of Office | Attitudes Towards Office-holding | Professionalism in Administration

Quality of Government | Conflict and Solidarity in Urban Politics

CONCLUSION

[\[contents\]](#)

CHAPTER 3

The Monopolisation of Office

The Degree of Popular Participation in Office-Holding

There is one more aspect of the question of monopolisation that must be considered: what proportion of the population was involved in office-holding? As far as the total populations of our boroughs is concerned, there is no point in discussing in any depth evidence which has been fully exploited by others and which can never be considered satisfactory or conclusive. After Domesday we rely on taxation lists.[\[84\]](#) The earliest is that of Ipswich in 1228, which names 475 inhabitants - even those whose tax was assessed at nil were listed. Taxation records of 1283 listed 275 persons; those of 1327, 210; and those of 1340, 198. Of the Colchester taxations of 1296 and 1301 the latter is more complete, since there are no detectable exemptions; it lists just under 400 residents, 263 being males, but includes the four hamlets within the liberties, most of whose residents should not properly be considered townsmen. In Colchester's 1319 subsidy 168 laymen, and in that of 1332 153 laymen, are listed from the same broad area. The 1332 subsidy also produces figures of 149 persons from Lynn, 281 from Yarmouth, and 417 from Norwich. These numbers contrast starkly with the poll tax returns, although these were counting slightly different things from the earlier subsidies. In 1377 the number of residents over 14 years old was 3,127 at Lynn, 2,955 at Colchester, 1,941 at Yarmouth, 1,507 at Ipswich, and 3,952 at Norwich. The 1381 poll tax is far less reliable, due to evasion; although, for example, the Ipswich return lists 963 persons, the annalist Bacon had seen a local list for the same containing 1,188 names.[\[85\]](#)

Difficulties of interpretation focus on determining what proportion of the total population is represented by those taxed; but there are no clear guides here. Consequently, the 1377 evidence for Lynn was used by Cutts to hypothesise a total population of 4,700, whilst Parker used it to suggest a pre-1349 population of 5,700; on the other hand, Clarke and Carter calculated from it a total population of 5,546 and a pre-1349 population of 9,000.[\[86\]](#) It is evident that we cannot come closer than very rough approximations. The thing to bear in mind is that the populations of medieval boroughs were very small by modern standards. Except at Yarmouth, where space was somewhat limited[\[87\]](#) - producing the curious thoroughfare system of 'rows' - we find plenty of open ground within our towns. At Lynn the residential area was markedly concentrated in that half of the intra-mural territory next to the river. Waste-land was periodically leased out by the borough authorities, but this was often to men who already held a residence in the town, and simply wanted to expand their holdings. No-one would deny that the pre-plague population, the product of a boom period, was higher than that of the post-plague period, but there has not been enough work to allow us to ascertain how fast and to what extent plague losses were made up by immigration.

However, for the purposes of this study, it is not so much the total population as the freeman population which concerns us. Green believed that Lynn was unique in having a community composed of both freemen and non-freemen,^[88] but it is simply that in Lynn the inferiores were specified as non-burgesses; since other such groups elsewhere were described as the poorer residents, it is likely that they were the ones who could not afford the freeman entrance fine. The existence of non-freeman groups is evidenced in our other towns too: in Yarmouth's custumal, which required borough laws to be obeyed not merely by every freeman but all inhabitants; in Colchester by the insistence (1373) that everyone living in the town for a year, be he burgess, foreigner having his livelihood in the town, or foreigner who frequented the town to trade, must contribute to local taxations; in Ipswich by various fifteenth century ordinances made by the authority of, or binding upon, bailiffs, portmen, intrinsic burgesses, forensic burgesses, and other inhabitants of the town.^[89] The precise basis for entrance to the franchise is not sufficiently clear in the records and may have varied from borough to borough. This makes it difficult to determine what proportion of the population were freemen. At Yarmouth there is no extant record of entrances before the reign of Henry VI; 168 burgess entrances are recorded in the 28 years between 1429 and 1461 from which records survive, an average of 6 annually - not very high.^[90] Householding played some part in qualification, since all freemen were expected to be distrainable;^[91] if so, then the fifteenth century specifications that freemen were to be householders^[92] may not be quite the restrictive manipulation of the electorate as that it is sometimes painted. Nor is it necessarily true that variation in entrance fine indicates similar manipulation to exclude undesirables, since fines were sometimes graduated according to the means of the applicant; whilst in Ipswich, at least, the freeman community had the power to reject applications by persons of poor reputation, without resorting to manipulative devices.^[93] At Ipswich the invitation in 1200 to contribute to the Merchant Gild hanse may have been tantamount to entering the franchise, but it was optional; at mid-century the ancient specification of being at scot and lot - that is, contributory to communal finances (which generally involved householding) - was stressed.^[94] At Colchester, however, it seem that householding was not initially a qualification, but that all born within the liberty had the right to enter the franchise without fine.^[95]

This last case has been the cause of problems, both for the Colchester authorities and the historian. Some townsmen simply assumed the burgess privileges, to which they were entitled by birth, without bothering to take the freeman's oath, forcing the holding of inquisitions to determine whether justified; in 1452 the corporation insisted that those entitled must take their oath or forfeit their privileges.^[96] For the historian, the Colchester situation means that records of freeman entrances there are incomplete, since they deal mostly with fine-paying immigrants. The same seems to hold true for our other towns. It would certainly explain the low annual average at Yarmouth. At Ipswich only those purchasing the franchise were recorded until the fifteenth century, the reason being that what the authorities were interested in recording was not so much the identities of freemen as the fines they had paid or owed (i.e. the records were part of the accounting system, more than a legal memory); even the few entrances by patrimony that creep into the documents, if not because of dispute, involved the monetary redemption of the sword of the entrant's father.^[97] Even at Lynn, where borough finances were an exceptionally prominent concern, and entrance fines were the second largest regular source of borough income until the late fourteenth century, there seem to be too few entrances by patrimony recorded; document losses cannot wholly account for the fact that almost half the entrances of those officials here studied cannot be traced.

The reason we are so concerned about the size of the freeman body is that most political privileges were restricted to its members.^[98] This is not surprising, since it was the freemen who were those residents: capable and willing to support the financial machinery on which independent government was founded; and willing to swear the almost conspiratorial oath of the commune, to support their fellow-freemen and the borough government in all things and to conceal the secret counsels of the assembly. No man could be trusted to lead his community who had not committed himself to such allegiance.^[99]

